And it's always the next, and the next. And so there's hope that things will get better. Of course, sometimes they do get better, until they get worse again.

That's the world of opposites. And then you have this hope that time will help you achieve this, or find this, or be more complete, to arrive, to make it in this world, whatever that means, which is a narrative in your mind that tells you I made it. And if other people agree with it, then it's real reality.

And if other people don't agree with it, then you have some narrative in your mind that other people don't agree with. That's when you grow older, time that gave you hope, something to always look forward to the next thing, or hoping for the next thing. But then gradually, you notice that time is no longer your friend.

And gradually, time is becoming your enemy, because you suddenly realize that time actually is your mortal enemy, because it's going to kill you. Oh, my God. This thing that I've always thought that was the most important thing, it's actually going to kill me.

And I've been running towards that all my life. And so, again, nobody can deny that time is necessary in this dimension of existence, which I call the horizontal dimension. There's past, there's future, and then there's a present somewhere that often is not hardly noticed.

So nobody could deny that we need time. Sometimes people look at me and say, you wear a watch? I thought you always lived in the now.

And then I say, well, I don't like to arrive late for things. Okay. And they think, oh, no, he's not enlightened at all.

He's still... It would have been wonderful if we could, perhaps if we could meet here without time and say, one day, we will accidentally all meet in here. And we'll all come together.

The universe will arrange it. So that we all come together here, because time doesn't exist. Okay.

It's not going to happen. Or it would take a long time. Maybe 10 billion years.

So we cannot deny that time is here and it's everywhere. Anything we do requires time. But another important realization is that if you look more deeply at the phenomenon of time, yes, for practical purposes, you need it.

Whatever you do requires time. But the strange thing is, time, which is past and future, nobody ever experiences the past or future. Let's look at future, for example, which is so important to many people, most people.

Has anybody ever experienced the future? No, I don't think so. You can look and google it and ask, has any explorer ever discovered the future?

Well, they say, well, maybe time traveling. Maybe there might have been people who time travel, or maybe the time travelers from the future will come here. Maybe Eckhart is a time traveler.

Who knows? And then the time travelers, there is ultimately no time. Because when you reach the future, it's the present moment.

Nothing can be experienced or happen, nothing can happen, except in the now. So ultimately, and some philosophers have realized that, not necessarily spiritual philosophers, even philosophers that were able to think very deeply, they realized that time is actually ultimately a construct of the human mind. And ultimately, time is inseparable from thought.

It's produced by thought, but it is a necessary thing here in this dimension. But in itself, it does not exist. So there were famous philosophers who came to that conclusion or realization.

And if you realize now on a purely experiential level, that your entire life is always this moment. It is experienced as now, always. It was never not now.

And yet, humans live as if some mentally projected future now were more important. So of course we need the future, we need to be able to operate on this level of time, so that things work on this horizontal level of existence. But which really is connected with, inseparable from, being able to use our minds.

Because this is where past and future arise. It's all, think about the past, your past, it is. Does it exist?

No, it only exists because now you remember it. You remember it now. And when it happened, it was now.

So it's always now, no matter where you go. So that is undeniable, there's no getting away from time on this horizontal level of existence where we live. And also your entire sense of identity, for most people, your identity is derived from time, your past.

The past is an accumulation of things in your minds. You're born into a certain situation in your life. And that is the beginning of, well, let's not talk about past lifetimes because just one lifetime is difficult enough.

Otherwise it gets just too much. You are born into a certain situation already. Family background, certain surrounding culture, your parents, what kind of people they are.

So you begin to be conditioned by those influences. You become this entity that consists of things that have happened to you, that you have accumulated mentally, things that you experienced as a child, that has a lot to do with people's identity. So you become a person, a person.

After a few years, years pass and more things are accumulated that you identify with, that becomes your narrative, your memory, and you call it my life. So that comes from the past. And that life of yours, what you call my life, is you.

That's where people, what people derive their sense of identity from. That's me. Me is all the things that have happened to me, that I have done, that other people have done to me.

And there are also things in your past that you're not conscious of. There are reactive patterns in you that you may not be conscious of. And these reactive patterns force you to react in certain situations in a predetermined way, stuff that you absorbed when you were young, and you don't know it because you're still unconscious.

Not you, of course, I'm just talking about normal human beings, not you. And so basically humans act out a script that has been given to them, like an actor on stage. The actor has a script and he or she is acting out the lines, speaks the lines.

Now imagine for the sake of this analogy, that the actor doesn't know that he or she is acting out a script. So the actor is on stage, talking, has his, what he calls my opinions, but not realizing that the opinions are the script that he learned. And so he very forcefully expresses his or her opinions, for example, this is what I believe, this is how it is, that's exactly, I can tell you, this is how the world is, whatever he says, not knowing that all that stuff is a script.

It's a conditioned mind talking. So the actor is lost in his script. And every day he performs the same, basically the same thing.

And even when he encounters new situations, he applies the old script to the new situations. Cannot relate to anything or anybody without this script, which becomes like a veil, the conditioned veil through which he or she perceives so-called reality. And that is the person.

Every person is a script, basically. Every person is a mental, emotional entity created by the past. So it's the living, the person, one could say, is the living past in you.

So if that is the script, the question arises, who or what or where are you when you're acting out the script? Where are you? Who are you without the script?

Oh, well, where are you? The answer would be, you are asleep, so to speak. And this is the term we use in spiritual discourse, the term is unconscious.

A person who is unconscious in conventional terms, he's completely out of it. That's unconscious in conventional terms. Now, spiritually speaking, unconscious is something else.

Spiritually speaking is, you are unconscious when you are completely the script. You are the script. You identified with all the beliefs, the reactive patterns, the conditioned emotions that make up your personality or your person.

You're completely identified with that. It is you, and that is the unconscious state. So unconsciousness in spiritual terms could be then defined as complete identification with the mental emotional conditioning within you, the mind and the emotions that accompany the mind.

Complete identification with that, the script is the person, the unawakened person, the unconscious person. And there are still millions of humans on the planet who basically live like that. They act out, and very often the particular script that a person acts out is inherited from their parents, and their parents inherited the script from their parents, and their parents inherited the script from, and it goes up and get many generations.

Often you have the same dysfunction in families from one generation to another. Dysfunction meaning particularly dysfunctional patterns within that script, because some scripts are far worse than others. That's another thing of course.

Every human is born, absorbs the script, but every human is born into a certain situation that then becomes translated into the script, and some have very bad scripts, and some have somewhat better scripts. Some look like really good, that's a good one. And then you have another one is what a horrible, horrible situation to be born into.

What do you do with that? And then you're forced to act that out, and then you're well, maybe at 20 years old you already end up in prison, and then you're in prison. But suffering arises through acting out the script.

If it's an unpleasant script, a bad one, then you act it out and life becomes suffering. You create suffering for yourself and others, particularly if the script is a difficult one. So you are forced to act it out, and you suffer, and you make others suffer.

Whether or not to what degree you make others suffer may vary, maybe it's just emotional suffering, maybe just every person you marry becomes unhappy because they married you. Not unheard of. Just remember your ex, in some cases.

And so the strange thing is then you have more, somewhat more pleasant types of conditioning or scripts, and they're okay, relatively okay. The fly landed on my hand, wanted to listen to the talk. Even the fly wants to awaken, but has a long way to go, or to fly.

Now, because the difficult scripts create more suffering, it is also true that if you have a difficult script, then the motivation to awaken becomes stronger. So it's often the case that part of the script, by the way, is what I call the pain body, which is the emotional accumulation in you from your childhood, past lifetimes, let's leave them alone. The emotional accumulations in you from your childhood, emotional pain that has accumulated within you, that just becomes a part of the script.

And so you are then forced to act out the emotion periodically, as you might remember from the books, you're forced to act out this emotional thing, the pain body, which becomes part of your ego. It's the emotional part of the ego. So if life gets very difficult for you, let's say you end up in prison, it's an extreme, extremely bad script, if let's say you actually do something bad, then there is a possibility because you are there now suffering the consequences of your unconsciousness.

And that is why I often receive correspondence from people in prison, when we have donated countless books, thousands of books to prisons all over the United States and other countries, Power of Now, New Earth, to the prison libraries, and then people read and I get correspondence from prisoners saying, this has changed my life. And some say, I'm still in prison, but I feel free. There's been an awakening, an awakening, they suddenly realized that all of their actions were created by their conditioning and something else suddenly or gradually emerged, because the pain was so much it forced this awakening to happen.

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:33)

It takes no time to be who you are. In this podcast, Eckhart reminds us that the world is not here to make us happy, it's here to make us conscious. He says if we don't embrace that, then we will be irritated or even outraged when life pushes us to deal with difficulties.

This, he explains, is a pitfall of the ego. He says we don't have to work hard to awaken, rather we can let our awareness shine through us. He says it takes no time to be who you are, whether we are 18 or 80.

He believes we do not need time to realize our true essence.

[Speaker 1] (0:36 - 45:55)

Identification with thought, identification with mind. Now freedom arises first when you cannot stand the suffering anymore that comes when you're identified with ego, with the mind. You've had the unhappiness, it's always there when the ego operates.

The sense of not enough, that's always there either on the surface or just underneath the surface. Something is lacking in my life. I've never, I haven't arrived yet.

I haven't started living yet. Where's the next thing that's going to make me happy? Are you going to do it?

Yes, you are. Let's sign a contract right now. Make me happy, demanding that the people shouldn't make you happy, situation shouldn't make you happy, but they never do it because the world isn't here to make you happy.

Is it here to make you unhappy? No, it's here to make you conscious. But if you don't know that the world is here to make you conscious, then you become unhappy and then the world makes you unhappy all the time because you don't know how the world that is not the world isn't here to make you happy, to make you conscious.

And once you're conscious, then there is a kind of happiness there, but I wouldn't even call it happiness anymore. There's a deeper sense of rootedness in something vast, in something that transcends the person and yet is not separate from the person. And this is where I want to go now.

We've spoken about all the things that stop you from realizing that, and those things need to be recognized. It's already part of the awakening to recognize the things that keep you in an unawakened state. You need to recognize those things.

But then from there you can actually see, well, once you need to have the readiness, and the readiness is there because you're here, how do I go into the depth dimension where I, when I say I, I no longer refer to the narrative in my mind, me and my story and my life. Just before I go there, just mention one more thing about your life. My life is something, is a narrative in many people's head that causes an enormous amount of suffering.

You can't imagine how many people's lives are made miserable by a very unhappy story in their head that they identify with and call it my life. People just driven to suicide by an unhappy narrative that tells them how awful my life is. And they never realize they are trapped in a delusion of thought.

If they were able to step out, and again, the question arises, where is your life? Oh, let me think. This is all my past, my dreadful past, my probably dreadful future, that's my life.

All the things have gone wrong, all the things that I missed, all the things that people have done to me, all the things that the universe has done to me, all that is my, all just been just awful. Nobody has suffered more than me. Nobody.

And people don't realize how much unhappiness is derived from what they're telling themselves in the head. Now these people need to come out of that if they want to be free. Do you want to suffer more?

No. Okay, are you ready to step out of the narrative in your mind that says my life and realize that you don't have a life? That the whole thing that you call my life is certain thoughts that float around in your head and you identify with them.

You don't have a life. You are life. And to realize that you are life, which is a temporary expression of the one life, the one consciousness that pervades the entire universe, you are a temporary expression of that one life.

You don't have a life. And if you don't have a life, you can't lose your life. People say, he lost his life.

She lost her life. How does that work? There's he and there's his life.

Who is he and who is the life that he lost? There's a duality there that doesn't exist. You can't lose your life because you are life.

You don't have a life. They are just memories and thoughts in your head. Yes.

But the life that you are can only be realized in the present moment. And in the present moment, the first realization comes to you when you realize that there can be gaps between thoughts. When you realize that apart from thinking, there is another dimension of consciousness in you that is not disconnected from thinking, but deeper than thinking.

We could say higher too, higher than thinking. And what is that? That is awareness or presence.

And you realize this dimension of consciousness in you right now, when you become conscious. I'm slowing down, as you might have noticed. When you become conscious that there are not only words here being spoken, but there are also gaps between the words.

And you become aware that there are these gaps between words or between one sentence and another. And when you become conscious of that gap, which we could also call a moment of stillness, you might notice that every time you are conscious of this little gap, when there's no word, in that moment you are aware, but you're not thinking. And you haven't disappeared.

In that space of awareness, the essence of who you are is there fully. And yet, it's almost, it's like nothing. And yet it's not nothing.

Undoubtedly, there is a presence that is deeper than thought, out of which thought arises. And to sense in yourself this presence that has no characteristics as such, it's pure, conscious presence. To sense that is to get in touch with the essence of who you are.

And that essence, if we had to attach a word to it, to describe it, we would probably call it consciousness. You are that consciousness, out of which thoughts come. In the same way, I sense or experience thoughts as movements on the surface, like waves and ripples on the surface of a vast ocean.

Now, if you only live on the surface, then all that you have is waves and ripples, which are thoughts. Only this dimension for you. And you can't stop thinking.

And you look for some kind of answer to who you are on that level only. Maybe if I join with this ripple, I'll feel better. Or I need to accumulate power over all these other ripples, then I'll be someone.

Or I need to own more ripples than others. But always never being able to go beyond that. So the cessation of thinking, which is not falling below thinking, which is not a regressive step to where the animals still dwell, because the animal has not yet arrived at conceptual thinking.

Consciousness, yes, but not conceptualization, not thought. The animal, are we regressing when I say, when I present to you the possibility of discovering within yourself the possibility of stepping out of thought. But I'm not saying this is a regressive step towards the animal or the vegetable realm.

The dog is more peaceful and joyous than most humans, except neurotic dogs that have lived for too long with humans. The dog is more joyous, non-judgmental, and alive than most of the people who own these dogs, because the dog does not have a burden of a conceptual self. It does not have the burden of an ego, except some neurotic dogs or cats have already beginning of little egos.

Yes, we'll put that aside. So the dog looks at you and does not judge you because it doesn't have concepts, but it's conscious. Why do people love dogs and cats?

Why do they go, because when you look into the eyes of a dog, you realize for a moment, you connect with a dog and you can sense the beingness or the consciousness of the dog looking through the eyes back at you. And this consciousness of the dog, although it's not the same as the human conscious, is also one aspect of the universal consciousness temporarily taking on the form of dog. This consciousness looks at you and for a moment you feel free to not think, and you might not even know that.

When you look into the eyes of the dog for three or four seconds, you're not thinking when you feel joy arising. Three or four seconds. And it makes you feel good.

The cessation of thought makes you feel good because then you can sense your beingness, your deeper presence, your beingness. And this is why people connect with animals. They give them moments of sanity.

And or you go to even further in the evolutionary, on the evolutionary scale, go even further back to the tree. The tree is even more peaceful than the dog, more connected with the source than the dog. The source being out of which consciousness emanates as light emanates from the sun.

Consciousness emanates from the source of all life, which is unspeakable, which can't, I don't even want to call it anything. You can't say anything about it. This is how, see, this is the universe is an emanation of the one.

And what it emanates is consciousness that exists in many different forms, like sunlight coming from the sun. You are a ray of the universal consciousness emanating from God, we could say, but not the God that usually people think of as God. And yes, these are all wonderful.

They are pre-thought, they exist, the tree and the animal exists prior to thought. We cannot return, it is not our destiny to return to a pre-conceptual level. It is our destiny to transcend thinking, which means having the ability to think without being trapped in thinking and arising above thinking, not falling below thinking.

This is why we're here. When you awaken spiritually, the ability to be above thought is then growing in you. You rise above thinking, you transcend thinking, but when you transcend thinking, that implies at the same time you transcend the person that you are, because the person that you are consists of thought and emotion and physical form.

You transcend everything when you rise above thinking. Transcendence is the key word in all spiritual traditions. It all talks about the possibility of transcendence.

The Buddha calls it freedom from suffering. Jesus called it salvation. Other terms are liberation, awakening, and so on.

They all pointed already, the ancient traditions, to this possibility of transcendence. And so, rising above thought, not falling below thought, there's a longing in humans to become free of the burden of thought that is self-serving thought, a lot of it being destructive and useless. And this accounts for the enormous amount of drugs that humans consume.

Many of them, or most of them, whether it's from alcohol to many, many other drugs, they have the ability to temporarily free you to some extent from the thinker or the thinking. But usually the price you pay is you fall below thought, but it can be liberating for a little while. If you're totally and miserably unhappy, then if you have three whiskeys, you will feel a little bit better.

And if you have four, five, or six, you may begin to feel worse and then fall off the chair. So it's not the way to go. But I can see why people are longing to go there.

And then all the prescription drugs, and ultimately the prescription drugs, free me from the torture of my own mind. Free me from the torture of my mind. And yet there is a spiritual exit available to everybody.

That is why we're here now. You don't need to work hard or struggle to realize this level of consciousness that transcends thought. It's already in you.

And the one way of putting it is to say that it is already in you, but you have been overlooking it all the time. Because the mind and sensory perceptions are so overwhelming, the mind even more than sensory perception, that you have overlooked that occasionally you experience brief moments when you're simply aware, but not thinking. Brief moments, and during those moments, you briefly transcend who you are as a person.

And then you become consciousness. You realize, well, you may not realize it, but that's what is happening. So it could happen when you're engaged in a dangerous activity that forces you so much into the present moment that you don't have time to think anymore.

In fact, any thought would be a hindrance and might even be dangerous. When you're engaged in climbing a mountain or car racing, I can guarantee that when you're climbing the north wall of the Eiger Mountain in Switzerland, not that many of you will be doing it, I can guarantee you that when you're hanging on that wall, you're not going to be thinking about your problems. And your entire historical identity will not be there.

You will be forced into complete and utter presence where there's only the present moment. And the same would apply if you're go car racing. Let me think about my problems.

What am I going to have for dinner tonight? Any thought would interfere and you would probably be dead within a few seconds. So you are forced into the present moment by some dangerous activity.

That's what, I'm even surfing, surfing. I haven't done it, but I know, I'm sure the person is surfing these huge waves. It's incredible activity.

Maybe in my next lifetime. If you're surfing these incredible waves, you're totally free of the personality. You're just a conscious perceiving presence.

Amazing. Or it could be overwhelming beauty in nature could also free you momentarily from thought activity. Just to see something overwhelmingly beautiful, the ocean, a mountain landscape, vastness of mountains, a forest, a vast forest, and you see, you hear the wind and the trees, and for a moment you're really listening.

Wow. And you go, often wow is the only remaining thought, if you can even say it's a thought. And you may not even know, you just remember perhaps later, that was such an incredible moment.

But you may not even know that during that moment, you were not thinking there was only awareness and the sense perception happened against the background of the awareness. It was not filtered anymore through conceptualization. It was not filtered anymore through thought.

So you were momentarily free of yourself. And this again comes back to Buddhism. One of the great insights of the Buddha was, he said, the self, I put in brackets, the self that you think you are, is an illusion.

It says the self is an illusion. And that is, of course, the egoic self that we are talking about, a false sense of identity. And so you go into nature, there's a vast sunset, there's a vast sky, and you look around.

And maybe for, maybe even for a minute, there's no thought, only aware presence. So you are, there's a shift in consciousness that can happen. It can also happen just for a few seconds.

When you relate to something that exists prior to thought, you might look at a flower and for a few seconds, you recognize the beauty in the flower and say, oh, and then of course, immediately the mind comes in and says something about it. But the longer the gap between a sense perception and the interpretation of a sense perception, the deeper you are as a human being. The longer the gap between the sense perception and the interpretation or conceptualization of it, so if you have, you are a very deep human being, deep meaning, awareness arising.

So the more you can look upon the world and not immediately come up with interpretations, even look around a city, a street, sitting in a cafe, or here, and you look. One of my favorite activities is sitting somewhere or standing somewhere and just perceiving. And no thought, no interpretation.

Now, from the point of view of the mind, the mind says, you no longer know what's going on, you become ignorant. But it's not, there is a deeper knowing there. This is very important.

There are two kinds of knowing something, two kinds of knowing. One is through conceptualization and one is direct knowing through awareness. We need both.

But I emphasize the awareness knowing, because the other has taken over the world and we've lost balance completely. We are at the mercy of conceptual knowing, but we have totally neglected the deeper knowing through awareness. Let me give you one or two examples.

Let's say I go somewhere, I go into a forest, or I go into a medieval cathedral, and how do I experience this forest, or how do I experience this medieval cathedral? I can experience it, I can, let's say I'm a tourist, I arrive at Chartres or somewhere in France and see this incredible thing, and at the entrance they give me, they say, would you like to hire a little thing that you can carry, put on your belt, and you put the earphones in, it tells you, it gives you a guided tour of the cathedral, it explains everything to you beautifully, it only costs 20 euros, so it surely is worth it, isn't it? Yes, it probably is. And that is one way of experiencing, you will learn a lot about this cathedral by going around giving concepts and explanations, but if that's the only way in which you experience the cathedral, you have missed something very vital, and that is experiencing the cathedral through your awareness and not concepts in your mind.

And if you do that, then you say, no thank you, I don't need the guide, and you just step in. Now if you stepped in with the recording, immediately the voice would start talking in your ears when you step in, but now you're stepping in without that, and suddenly you just look. If you have that thing in your ears, you never say, wow, it doesn't give you that space.

And then you walk, and you will notice there's very little thinking, you're just perceiving, perceiving through awareness, and then after half an hour or whatever, an hour you come out again, and you have experienced that cathedral not through concepts, but through awareness. Now ideally, if I had a choice, I would always choose the awareness rather than the knowledge, than the conceptual knowledge, but ideally, there's a balance in your life, and ideally you go, you're there for three days, the first day you just experience through awareness, you come back the next day and you have the little thing, and on the third day, you go through, and you have both in balance, you know things conceptually, and then you let go of concepts, and then you, oh, that was by, this is such and such, represents such and such, and then you're not trapped in it anymore, and you let go. Then you have balance between conceptual knowledge and deeper knowing.

Now the same applies to yourself. Now, here we have the two different kinds of knowing. You can know yourself conceptually, which you do, for example, when you visit a psychoanalyst, the psychoanalyst will analyze your past, and he will talk about it, and you'll be encouraged to explore more and more of the things that happened, and it can go on for years.

It's very interesting. That can be helpful, because often it shows you where you are trapped, it shows you what the obstacles are, can be helpful, but knowing yourself in the deeper sense is the other kind, which is knowing yourself as the aware presence, in which there's no conceptualization, because that is the essence of who you are. And then you exist in the two dimensions.

You exist as a person, physical body, psychological form, physical form, psychological form. You have a history as a person, and you have a future, and as a person, you live in time on that speeding train, and undoubtedly, as a person, you are already being consumed by the fire of time, and the speeding train is speeding up more and more. And then you also, you are there as the deeper, the essence of who you are is awareness or consciousness, which is not yours.

You are manifestation of it. It manifests through you. It is the ray that emanates from the source, and that's why you are incredibly deep.

When you realize your own consciousness, which is not your own, I just say it, then you realize how deep you are. I believe Ralph Waldo Emerson had some, I'm not good at quoting, but he had something, the essence of who you are is like a wick, like a candle, the wick of a candle that deeply goes into being. You're rooted in this beingness that far transcends the person that connects you to the totality of all life, and that is known in the non-conceptual knowing of yourself, and the non-conceptual knowing of yourself is presence, awareness, the ability to rise above thinking, not continuously, but then you can use thinking, and actually, the presence or the awareness can operate through you and actually use your mind in wonderful ways so that you can co-create with the universe. You can create things, but that's not the most important thing.

The most important thing is realizing it first. You realize that, and then you can, you're no longer trapped in your conditioned mind, but the mind can still operate, still does. You exist as a person, and you realize who you are beyond the person.

That's the end of the ego. The end of ego doesn't mean it's the end of you as a form identity. You can still operate as a normal, so-called normal human being, but not really normal anymore because normal is insane, but you don't have to become weird when you realize who you are.

You just become very natural, and you still give conventional answers. People say, when people say, oh, when were you born? You give your birthday and your year.

You don't necessarily say, I was never born. I am nobody. Who are you?

The ego can still, you have to still, even when you realize that the awareness that you are, the ego can come in still and claim something. I'm more present than you. Nobody has less ego than me.

I hope they don't put this statement of mine on a little, very short YouTube clip. Now, invite into your life that aware presence in daily life, and especially when you're getting unhappy in whatever form, that's always a signal. Unhappiness, I'm using this generic term again, in whatever form, and remember, even a slight irritation is unhappiness.

Anger is unhappiness, although the ego loves it. The body suffers when you are actually angry. Any of those things, okay, it means, okay, it's arising.

The easiest way of looking at it is, say, I must have lost the present moment. And when you realize that you've lost the present moment, because the present moment is presence, when you become aware of the present moment, your problems dissolve. Not that you deny your ability to cope with problems, so-called problems, which are challenges, increases when you no longer make these challenges into a problematic sense of self.

Always coming back to the present moment. Return to the present moment, because that's all there ever is. We talked about time.

Time seems to be the fire that consumes us all, but on the other hand, this is very paradoxical, and I just want to leave it on a, explain it on a practical level, not on a philosophical level, and not on a scientific level. Don't want to talk about Albert Einstein's theory of relativity of time, but even more practical. The weird thing is, time seems to be consuming your life, and yet you never actually experience time, except as thought in your head.

Is this statement true? You have to see in your own life. Is it true when I say you never actually experience time, except as a thought in your head?

Because all your past lives as thought. All your future, which are projections from the past, live as thought. If you remove thought, and you're just aware there's no time anymore.

There's only the present moment ever. And now, although you're being consumed by time, the physical vehicle, the strange thing is, it's always the present moment. And people have this burden of past, but it's thought.

And if you step into the present moment, you immediately step out of thought into awareness. And that can become a, you can make that into a habit, especially when thought causes you suffering or unhappiness. And most of suffering or unhappiness is caused by thought.

When thought causes you suffering or unhappiness, say, okay, just hang on. Do I want to suffer? Do I want to be unhappy?

You can do it in a simple thing. Let's say you have an argument with your partner, and you need to be right. And suddenly you realize what you're engaged in being right.

And you realize it's meaningless whether you or he or she is right. And then you just, you let go. But not in, be aware of ego, not in the sense that, okay, I'm so conscious, I'm letting go now of this.

You can carry on without me. You let go of defending your mental position. You let go of identifying with your mental position.

Just, okay, yeah, maybe, okay, it's fine. Yeah. And of course, immediately, the whole thing collapses.

Without an opposition. So you can observe how unhappiness arises, and then ask, do I want to be? How can I not be?

And then you step out, you step into the present. Now, the present moment, it's a slightly arbitrary division, but let's say three levels to the present moment. The first thing you notice when you come into the present moment, which is all there ever is, oh, I forgot to mention it.

Your entire life is always now. Although time seems to consume your life, and yet, it's always now. You never experience time, you only experience what arises in the present moment.

You can only think about time, but you cannot experience time. This is why I compared to, I don't know, I wrote that somewhere. Time is like a criminal who leaves a lot of evidence behind, but you never catch the criminal.

The evidence is an apple that you leave on a windowsill for three weeks. Oh, the criminal was here, look at the apple now. It was so fresh three weeks ago.

The evidence is the mirror into which you look at one point in your life and realize something has changed. It's either in the mirror or you, we don't know. There's the evidence of time, but that's the evidence left by the criminal, but you never catch him or her because there's only the present moment.

So the present moment takes you out of time, and the present moment is when you step out of thought because time is thought. Wonderfully effective on the practical level, but useless in knowing who you are and going deeper. So you step into the present moment, and the first thing you notice is this level of sense perceptions.

You're more acutely aware of sense perceptions. They're always the first thing you notice in the present moment, and that in itself can be liberating. Oh, oh, you just look, and you're aware.

Background awareness, looking. The next is you might become conscious of the aliveness that pervades your body. I call it, as you might know from the books, the inner body, to feel every cell in the body is alive.

So when you're really present, it's not a head phenomenon, it's an entire body phenomenon, but not the visible body, the invisible, that which animates the body, and you'll be conscious of the body as an alive energy field. Every cell is present. That's the next level of the present moment.

And then the deepest level of the present moment is that stillness in which you realize the essence of it all is consciousness. You realize yourself as consciousness right now. One way of putting it is to say you become conscious that you are conscious.

You're aware that you're aware. There's a knowing there, but it's totally non-conceptual, except when I talk about it, but the words are only signposts. You're aware of the fact that you are aware.

There is an awareness. There is a presence. Otherwise, you wouldn't perceive anything.

There is an awareness. There is a presence. Otherwise, thinking couldn't happen.

And even if everything is a dream, which is possibility that people have looked at philosophers over centuries, maybe all of life is a dream. Maybe it is. The fact remains there must be a consciousness in which the dream appears.

And so whether or not it is a dream becomes irrelevant. The fact remains there is a consciousness in which all this appears. I am that.

I, I, I, I am that. That is knowing who you are. And that is the identity that is not only your true identity.

It is actually the identity of the universe, because you are not separate from the totality. You are an aspect of the totality and the universe is in the process of becoming conscious. The universe is in the process of awakening and you are the awakening universe.

And temporarily you appear as a person, a brief appearance on the stage of the universe disguised as a person. Like a little flash of consciousness. This is one life, one human life.

Goes out, comes in, out, in. So you don't have to make an effort to awaken. Really, it's more a question of allowing awakening to happen through you.

Inviting it, yes. Practice sensory perception without conceptualization as much as possible. It's wonderful.

But when you perceive something visually or hearing, listening, whatever other sense is, see if you can be at the same time aware of yourself. Not your historical self, not your personality, but be aware of yourself as the aware presence without which you wouldn't be able to perceive anything. There would be no perception of anything.

Would there even be a universe without? Don't think so. Yes, I'm perceiving this so-called table.

Consciousness is perceiving. What would there be left if there were no perceiving consciousness? Would there be a table?

Would there be just a few atoms floating around in vast space? Yes. We don't need to pursue that because it's practical teaching.

Practical, very practical. As much as possible, step out of thought. And the more you practice that, the more you connect with the essence.

And the more you connect with the essence, the more fruitful your thinking becomes. You actually encounter insights and intuitions and realizations that before you didn't have. Fresh thoughts, new thoughts.

And you can create new thought, but it's no longer the ego. It's the one consciousness that suddenly says, oh, I'll do that. This is what I'll do.

But this lesson, this vital lesson applies whether you are at the beginning of your life and you're 18 years old or whether you're 98 years old. It applies equally to everyone. In order to realize who you are, ultimately, you don't need time.

And that's why in the Course in Miracles, it says, it has taken time to misguide you so completely, but it takes no time at all to be who you are. It has taken time to misguide you so completely, but it takes no time to be who you are. And that is a lesson for tonight and for your entire so-called life.

That is, you don't need time to realize who you are in your essence. Except for that, time is the obstacle. So there is a way of that speeding train and there is a way to escape from the fire, but not on this dimension, but in the dimension of depth.

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Know Thyself : Remembering Who We Are [100faba8-8c06-40e5-8c01-e78a3b67a274]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:33)

Know thyself, remembering who we are. In this episode, Eckhart talks with a live audience. He quotes ancient Greek philosopher Pythagoras, who said, know thyself.

Eckhart says, unfortunately, our whole educational system is geared toward only one kind of knowledge, the intellectual. But there is another aspect based on wisdom and intuition. It's that kind of inner knowing, he says, we must embrace.

Not as a replacement, but as a much needed addition.

[Speaker 1] (0:34 - 35:30)

Now, just a little reminder. In the usual state of consciousness, you're always conscious of something. And when you're present, you're conscious, except in deep meditation, you're conscious of something, but you're also conscious of yourself as consciousness.

The early 20th century spiritual teacher, Gurdjieff, called that self-remembrance. It may not be the best term to describe it, but that's what he came up with. And it could be misunderstood, as if you had to remember yourself as the historical person, but that's not what it means.

There's no memory involved. Although we could say you remember to be aware of yourself, but what is yourself? If you're not the historical person in essence, you are the consciousness, the space for it all.

And as you sit here and listen and look, you're of course conscious of your sense perceptions, but the possibility is there of being conscious also at the same time of an underlying presence or stillness. And that is the essence of you, which has nothing to do with your history. It is being conscious of consciousness.

That's the subject, the eternal subject. The moment you make yourself into an object, then you begin to remember your historical person, and then you begin to have a relationship with yourself. But in presence, you are yourself.

Big difference between having a relationship with yourself, usually problematic. So you not only have a problematic relationship with your partner and colleagues and family members and in-laws. That's not enough.

In the unawakened state, you also have a problematic relationship with yourself. My God. There's a movie about a man who gets stranded on a desert island.

There's a plane crash. He survives it. Then he finds himself on a beach and he's there for don't know how long, a year, two years, three years, survives on fishes he can catch and coconuts.

The plane that crashed was a FedEx plane. So it had all kinds of parcels that also got washed ashore and he opens them and in one parcel, he finds a beach ball that somebody must have sent to somebody. And because he has no companionship, he paints the face, eyes, nose, and mouth on the beach ball and begins talking to the beach ball.

And after a while, he begins to have arguments with it. And he's deeply offended because all the emotions that the ego experiences in relationships, he's having with the beach ball. Tom Hanks, I think is the actor in the movie.

So the patterns need to operate still. If you can't find a person, then you have a beach ball. And of course yourself too.

And that really is the meaning of knowing yourself, the deeper and the deeper sense. The ancient dictum from ancient Greece, going back two and a half thousand years, know thyself. But there are two kinds of knowing.

Our civilization basically only knows of one kind of knowing. Everything, the whole educational system, everything is geared towards increasing and focusing on exclusively that kind of knowing, which is knowing through conceptual thought. And so the majority of humans on the planet don't realize the possibility of another kind of knowing, not to replace conceptual knowledge and not even to be there in addition to conceptual knowledge, but to be there as something that underlies and is much vaster than conceptual knowledge where you can go when you choose not to be involved in conceptual knowledge, you go to that vaster place that transcends conceptual knowledge and is deeper.

It's a space, a deep space of knowing. And so the deeper meaning of the ancient dictum of going probably back to the first, one of the first philosophers in ancient Greece, Pythagoras, know thyself, can be understood on two levels. One level is to know things about yourself.

That can be helpful too, because that means you know how you function. You begin to learn about things about yourself that perhaps you didn't know because they were automatic. Sometimes in therapy, it can be helpful to get to know yourself on a conceptual level about the person that you are, hidden motivations, things that you do, but you don't know why you do, things you compulsively do.

And you might understand certain things about you on a conceptual level. But the deeper meaning is not to know yourself through concepts, but to know yourself without any concepts directly. One could call it unitive knowing rather than knowledge, knowing that creates separation.

Now, there's even a distinction in some languages of different kinds of knowing, not in English or German, but it's there in Spanish and in don't know much French, but I think it's there also in French that they have two words for to know. For example, if you say I know in Spanish, you have a choice, conozco or se. So the verb conocer is one type of knowing and saber is another type of knowing.

And it's the same in French, I believe connaître and savoir, something like that. For example, I know you, you would use conocer, te conozco, I know you. But if you said, I know who you are, you would use the other one because that's a concept.

Se quien eres, I know who you are. Knowing who you are is a concept. But if you say, I know you, there's something deeper there.

There's sometimes there's a wisdom, certain wisdom embedded in language, but that does not mean unfortunately that all native Spanish or French speakers are familiar with the deeper type of knowing. So you can know a very old illustration or example to explain it. I believe it comes from India.

You could use anything, but they use honey. So you can know honey by examining the structure of honey and where it comes from and how it's produced by the bees and the molecular structure and the chemical composition. And you can write several PhDs about honey and you can know everything there is to know.

Well, perhaps that's even impossible because there's always more to know, but you can know a lot about honey. So there you are, a doctor of honey after you have successfully defended your thesis. And one day somebody asks, have you actually ever tasted honey?

No, that's not part of my PhD. If you taste honey, you would know nothing about it necessarily, but there's a different knowing there that is more immediate, direct, nothing to do with concepts. But you know honey on a level that is deeper in a way than this person who only knows honey through concepts.

And now we can apply that first to yourself and also, of course, we can apply it to other people. How do you know somebody else? But you have to start with yourself.

So in addition to knowing yourself as this historical person, which really is knowing about yourself, you know all kinds of things about yourself and you can talk about it for a long time. You can write your autobiography and perhaps some people will be interested in it or not. Everybody has their own autobiography in their head and it consists of things that you can talk about.

So an autobiography consists of stories. This is what happened to me or this is what I did. Let me tell you the story.

And this is what I experienced, that's what I suffered. But do I know myself at a deeper level? Am I able to let go, to relinquish?

When I choose to, to relinquish all conceptual knowledge about myself, all narratives and stories and not live through the narratives and stories, although I'm able to remember them when I need to, but am I able to know a deeper essence that enables the narratives to exist, to be? You need to be conscious to have a narrative, a story. You need to be conscious to perceive things with your senses.

You need to be conscious to have an emotion. All these arise. They are objects that arise in, let's temporarily call it your consciousness, but it's not yours.

They are all objects that arise in consciousness. So your life consists on the, except on the deepest level, your life, what I call your life situation is the term I choose to use, consists of the arising of objects in the space of consciousness or the light of consciousness. Perception, it's an object that arises in consciousness.

There it is, and then it disappears and then another perception replaces it. A thought arises, a stream of thoughts arise. They can take over your consciousness almost completely.

They gobble up, they suck up. Thoughts can be so overpowering if you're in the absence of awareness. A stream of thoughts can take your whole consciousness and manufacture thoughts out of it.

And so you're completely unaware of yourself as consciousness. You're just completely identified with a thought. It takes up all your consciousness and makes it into thought and emotions.

Continuously manufacturing more thoughts. Cook, I need more. And you can see it when people talk to each other sometimes, how they are taken over by a stream of thought and confuse it with who they are.

And then they have to defend that stream of thought, whatever that stream of thought is saying, whatever position it's, whatever perspective it has. People become mortal enemies because your stream of thought does not agree with my stream of thought. And groups do it because there are collectives that are dominated by certain commonly held, jointly held beliefs.

There are some collectives that are held together by belief systems, ideologies, and everybody takes it on board. And then there are other collective of conflicting ideologies and they become your mortal enemy. And really all this happens because you don't know who you are.

You only know yourself as an object in consciousness. So the deepest meaning of knowing yourself is knowing yourself beyond concepts, not through concepts, not knowing yourself as an object in consciousness, but as the eternal subject, which is consciousness itself. And so the mind subsides and a sense of still, alert presence remains.

I am, and now you don't need to add anything to it. You just know that you are. The being is of you.

And if that can be sustained in the background, so to speak, then you could have a discussion with somebody and you can put forward your point of view, which are thoughts, without making that person into an enemy because he or she holds opposite or conflicting points of view. And you can have a conversation. And while you're having a conversation, you remain spacious inside.

But you can still clearly state your point of view without having a self-identification with your point of view. This is how I see it. But you don't derive your sense of identity from that mental position.

You don't have to give up all mental positions. You just recognize them as thoughts. This is how I see reality.

This is how I see that. But there's always something else in the background, something deeper. And then it is more likely that the awareness of that which is deeper, which is awareness itself, may enable you to think in a different way so that you not just take on board what the collective that you happen to be born into tends to think.

You don't adopt if you're born into a certain political system or whatever it may be. You don't necessarily adopt all their beliefs and make it part of your sense of identity. But you're able to.

And even our civilization, perhaps our Western civilization, is not dominated by any one particular ideology, as, for example, communist Russia was or China was. It still is to some extent. It's getting mixed up with other things.

But even here, if you may not realize that how many of the thoughts that you think are your thoughts, you have absorbed through a screen, either the TV screen or the iPad screen or the Samsung screen or some people still read newspapers, and you have absorbed certain viewpoints that most of the media tend to agree on with certain relation to your country or a group of countries in relation to other countries.

And you just absorb that, and that becomes your viewpoint. And you may not realize that perhaps it's quite a distorted way of looking. There may be other ways of looking.

But people think these are my thoughts. They're not your thoughts, and it's not just with reference to the media, but with everything. These are thoughts that you absorb from the collective.

But if you are aware, if this awareness is in the background, it is more likely that you are able to think creatively, that you can look through certain forms of almost hypnosis that if you live in a collective, you are hypnotized into that, you become part of that particular way of looking at the world. And you can see things more clearly and have creative thoughts. You can actually think better when you're able to step out of thinking.

And then when you think, don't lose yourself completely in the thinking. Then you can see more clearly. And another strange thing that happens when you can sense the essence of who you are, it's not just all of the Buddha called it, well, as it's commonly translated, emptiness is not, I don't think that's a good translation of certain terms he used like sunyata, spaciousness, I would prefer.

Some call it nothingness, but there's more to it than that. When you can sense the essence of yourself as consciousness, there's a power in there. There's a vast power in there, which has nothing to do with egoic power.

Power over somebody is really the only thing that can free you of fear. Because fear means all the little me, and you feel threatened and fearful of what's going to happen to me and all these other me's around me, the others. But to be free of fear, if you can sense that deep within you, there is a silent power.

And perhaps that is the deeper and original meaning of the term faith. Faith is to sense that power, it's not an intellectual thing. Belief, I would say, is an intellectual thing, because the term belief as a noun means you believe in the veracity of certain things that are being told.

It could be a story, you believe in this particular narrative, that's a belief. Faith is something, the way I interpret the word or use the word, is something deeper that is not connected with concepts. Faith is a deep trust.

That's perhaps a better translation, a better pointer. A deep trust in life, which you cannot arrive at through telling yourself certain things. I really should be trusting because the universe is going to look after you.

I just need to believe. You're still stuck in your head and you're saying, I just need to believe that the universe is going to look after me. The universe is going to look after me.

Okay, well, maybe that is a bridge or maybe that is a signpost that can take you to the actual realization of what you're saying. But it's also possible that it remains a signpost and you never get to where the signpost points to. I'm trying to have this trust in the universe, but I still wake up in the middle of the night in a state of panic.

I don't know why. I keep telling myself that I need to trust the universe. Now, even it's on my bathroom mirror and a piece of paper written, stuck.

God loves you. Is it a thought that you believe in that does not free you from fear? Or if it's a signpost and then it takes you to a deeper place where you realize your connectedness with the source, ultimately your connectedness with the source of all life, that there's not a separation, that you're not an autonomous entity thrown out of the universe or fallen from the sky.

So to sense your connectedness with the source is the realization that God loves you, but you don't need the words anymore. There's just a trust and there's no duality anymore because you're an extension of the one, an emanation of the one. So faith really is trust, but the trust is not something you can think yourself into.

Ultimately, you need to let go of all these concepts, although when you later talk about it, you may take them up again. But for the experience of it, you let go of concepts and you can sense in the space between two thoughts, in the space of awareness, you can sense the stillness, the presence, and you can sense it as a silent power, silent. That's the Tao, it's Chinese, a silent power.

And that silent power is inseparable from who you are. It's you and much infinitely vaster than you, both at the same time. It's almost as if a ray of sunlight that arrives here suddenly realizes its source.

A ray of sunlight suddenly realizes its own source, where it comes from. And it also realizes that it can never be totally separate from its source because the ray of sunlight somehow is still connected to the sun, which in this analogy, that's the source. So the ray of sunlight then could say, my fear has disappeared because I realized that I'm connected to something much vaster and this vastness is sustaining me.

It could say that. It could also say, and some rays have done that, I am the sun. Ecstatic.

Translated in this analogy, there have been mystics in various traditions who said, I am God. It's not advisable to say that. People don't like it.

So that power is something that you can then have in the sense in the background. It's not just a passive thing always in the background. It emanates intelligence, so to speak.

It can use your mind and it can inspire. This is the dimension of creativity, which is prior to form, but it's where form arises out of the formless. So all the great creations that humanity has been able to achieve over the centuries and millennia, anything truly creative comes because the human being who created that had some connection with the silent power within, perhaps only in the act of creation, perhaps not in their private life, but in the act of creation, there was suddenly that connectedness.

And many, many great composers and artists, and even some of the great scientists who had breakthroughs say that it came to them almost fully formed as a revelation. It already arrived as if it had been already formed at a deeper level, and then suddenly they just received it. And some report that they are overpowered almost by the sudden influx of an amazing thing that then becomes perhaps a work of art or an amazing insight or piece of music that comes from that place.

And those things that come from that deeper place are the things that remain because although most humans are not sufficiently connected to be able to create any of these things, there are quite a few who have at least have some connections and so they are able to recognize the greatness in something when they see it. And so humans value, for example, the great classics of literature. There are some books that have survived for 2,000 and more years.

It's miraculous because a book is a very fragile thing. And for many centuries, it can only survive if there were always people who valued it enough to copy it again. And then a few more copies, and then they got damaged and burned, and then one copy survived, and then some other people saw how valuable it is.

They could sense there was something transformative in it, and so they copied it again. So books such as the Tao Te Ching or the Bhagavad Gita, one of my favorite books, The Meditations by Marcus Aurelius, 2,000 years old. Somehow they survived even the Dark Ages when almost nobody could read and write except a few monks in monasteries, and they kept it alive.

But the main purpose is not to produce, necessarily produce some great thing or have some great insight that may come as an addition. The main purpose is to bring this state of consciousness into your life, and then whatever happens through it happens. And so when you know yourself in the deepest sense, then even more important than any creation, for creation, by the way, you need some kind of vehicle because you can touch the source of creativity within you that transcends, far transcends the person.

But if you want to create something, that power needs to then manifest through you into this world, and it needs some kind of vehicle, whether it is your mind, so it would be the case when you speak or you write, it would use your mind as a vehicle, that the vehicle needs a certain amount of preparation. It needs to be able to give expression to this power instead of being so overpowered that you go crazy. The God-intoxicated, sometimes considered holy men, but they look a bit crazy, so the mind is unprepared for that.

It gets overpowered by that. In order for the creative force, the creative power to operate through you, it needs some kind of vehicle, so it could be if you are a musician, then that is the vehicle, and it's not enough to take up an instrument and say, okay, I'm now going to learn the guitar, and after three weeks say, I still haven't composed the greatest guitar work ever. Why isn't it coming through me?

It sometimes takes a long time to develop the vehicle until it becomes capable of transmitting something that comes from a deeper place. There was a book published a few years ago, I don't remember the title, where the writer examined people who created great things, and he came to the conclusion through his analysis that in most cases it involved 10,000 hours of practice before the creative element came in, but even then there's no guarantee, of course, that it will. So he even examined phenomena like the Beatles.

The Beatles produced relatively simple music if you compare it to the classical music, but there is enormous spiritual power in these simple, very simple tunes, and this is why they're still playing them, and they will still be playing them in 100 years and 200 years from now. There's something there that touches you, and so it came from a deep place, but before they created that, they were playing hundreds and thousands of hours in little nightclubs in Liverpool and in Hamburg, and so he examined that, and then he compared it to others, also scientists and so on, who pursued a particular avenue of research, and then at some point after focusing mentally on it for thousands and thousands of hours, suddenly something came that was not produced by the conceptual mind, an insight that almost came ready-made, and there it was. Now that kind of thing, although I am connected with that, for me it comes through speaking and writing. That transcendent dimension uses my mind.

If I wanted to create some scientific breakthrough, it's not going to happen. I can't say, okay, now I'm going to be a scientist, and I will find the ultimate answer to whatever Einstein was looking for after he found the theory of relativity. He was looking for something else, which is called something like the unified field theory or something like that.

I don't know exactly what that means, and I can assure you that I'm not going to find it, and you are not either, unless you are a scientist. You have been focusing on that for a long time, nor am I going to excel in creating a great work of music or dance. I don't think so.

And yet if you look at a great dancer, there's not just the technique, but the practice and the technique, of course, is important. Again, we meet 10,000, I don't know if he's right, but it's just thousands of hours, and then if you're a great dancer, something else comes in and takes over, and then you are being danced, and then you become a great, and everybody goes, wow. That may also happen in certain sports where people are able to, they do amazing things.

There are even some types of sport that didn't exist 20 or 30 years ago. I don't know what they're called, but they're amazing, where people go up in the air on little boards, and they go around. How can a human being do that?

So they practice and practice, and then something else takes over, and then you have certain musicians that when they perform, some power comes through, of course, with the help of technical stuff, flashing lights and all kinds of technical stuff, and with some, it's mostly technical stuff. But with a few, there is definitely something there, and people respond to that, and that's not going to happen with me, so you can be sure that I'm not going to be a rock star in this lifetime or the next.

Eckhart Tolle Learning To Outgrow Emotional Reactivity [29aa081e-6558-4a90-a3e0-016f08687a6d]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:35)

Learning to outgrow emotional reactivity. In this episode, Eckhart talks about the importance of finding stillness. He says, we are never more ourselves than when we are still.

Eckhart then answers questions about what we can expect during the stages of awakening. Eckhart says, as we become more conscious, we learn to respond rather than react to conflict. Eckhart explains, we may feel the emotion, but it doesn't take us over because ego diminishes as we step into the light of presence.

So here we are in the present moment. And we start by becoming aware of the present moment. That may be a strange thing to say.

How do you become aware of the present moment? First, you become aware of what is in the present moment, sensory perception. Then you become aware of yourself, become aware of the inner body, the aliveness that pervades the inner body, sense of aliveness.

Every cell is alive. And there's a total sense of aliveness. And that's the entry point into becoming aware of yourself as awareness.

Stillness, one could also say. Stillness is the space for everything. And that stillness or awareness or presence is who you are, essentially.

So as you sit there, I assume you're sitting or maybe you're standing or lying. You become aware of whatever it is you're perceiving. And you're also aware of yourself at the same time, not the historical self, not aware of yourself as a thought, not aware of yourself as an emotion, but aware of yourself as the presence, without which you wouldn't perceive anything, or think anything, or feel anything.

So you're self-aware. And when you're self-aware, like now, you're present within and without meaning. You're aware of the world around you.

And you're aware of a deeper dimension of beingness or presence that is essentially who you are. And who you are, which is this beingness or presence is consciousness, the light of consciousness. And you are liberated from yourself, from the historical self, the personality, the person, the conditioned entity, you are liberated from that, not that it doesn't exist anymore, but you're no longer trapped in it.

And that's a liberation.

[Speaker 4] (3:34 - 4:01)

We'll start with our first question. On the journey to full awakening, do we go through a period of isolation or withdrawal from others when times when we might feel the need to be alone in order to maintain a sense of presence? Are there general stages that many people pass through before being present is our baseline?

Yes, good question. It is true that as you awaken, or the awakening process begins and then intensifies, you may not always the case, but it is the case for many people, you may not be able to participate in the usual ways in which people interact with each other in this world. Well, perhaps you're able, but you don't enjoy it anymore.

You don't enjoy many aspects of so called normal human interaction. You become bored with human drama, which otherwise fascinates people when they can talk about others, or the faults of others, or what has happened to others or what they have done. You get bored with having to listen to people complaining about other people, which feels a lot of human interaction, and you yourself are no longer inclined to complain about others, or about life in general, or any life situation.

And all the search for excitement through various activities that intensify your feeling of aliveness temporarily, including taking certain drugs, or alcohol, or going to places that are extremely noisy, noise filled, nightclubs, and so on, or the seeking of sensory pleasures, seeking for new experiences, whether they be sexual, or emotional, or otherwise, many of these things begin to be less interesting.

And there comes a time for many people where they find it even difficult to spend a lot of time with people that perhaps they've known for many years, they are friends, or they're family members. But yet, the desire to remove yourself grows. And that kind of conflict can arise within yourself.

You say, well, I don't enjoy participating in this, these interactions anymore. But on the other hand, I don't want to say goodbye to my friends and family members. And yet, you may not be able to help it.

The desire to remove yourself may be quite strong. And indeed, it is helpful if you're able to do that, to spend a period of time when you interact less, much less than you used to. And you don't participate anymore in human drama.

In fact, you don't like having to listen to human drama. You don't feel it anymore by your own reactivity. So the desire for solitude can be there.

And if there's an opportunity, if you're able to find some solitude that can strengthen your rootedness in presence, if you're able to spend periods of time alone, or going out into nature, or might perhaps even go to a retreat, some retreats. That's all fine. And that is, one could call it an intermediate stage where you feel that the world is becoming alien to you, to some extent, the human made world.

So you feel a sense of not belonging to this human made world anymore, or not wanting to belong to this human made world anymore. And it's certainly true that you should remove yourself from very toxic human environments, whether it's the threat of physical violence or emotional violence, whatever, some environments are very toxic. But otherwise, you may find that after a while, as presence deepens, you then go on to the next stage where you're able to actually be with people in a state of complete acceptance or surrender.

So you no longer have a desire for these people to behave differently, you're able to completely accept them for who they are. And this especially, especially wonderful and beneficial and thing to do with family members, because family members, yes, of course, in some cases, you may want to remove yourself completely from family members, if there's violence or whatever it may be. But in most cases, there's a karmic link there.

And if you're able to go back into visit your parents or siblings, or adult children, or whatever it may be, and if you're able to no longer demand in any way, internally or externally, the words or thoughts, that they should behave differently or be different. So this sense of exasperation, or impatience, or irritation with the limitations of other people, which is the other people's conditioning, that falls away as you become more present. And then you can know that you no longer feel alien to these people, you feel a sense of connectedness, deep connectedness, but not no longer on the level of mind, the deeper level.

And you can be there in an ordinary human environment, and remain in a state of presence, without fueling the unconsciousness of others, but also without demanding that these humans should be more conscious than they are, and feeling there's something wrong when they are not. And I experienced that, just to give a personal example, for a number of years I had, as I was a young adult in my 20s. I loved my father, but I also had resentment towards him.

He had, of course, he had a huge ego, especially at that time. And he had left me and my mother when I was 11, and disappeared. And his ego was so strong that one could not ever question any viewpoint or opinion that he had, because he was so identified with it.

Anybody who questioned his viewpoints or opinions would immediately trigger enormous outbursts of enormous anger. How dare you disagree with me is the underlying thought. Of course, that's all ego.

And so although I loved him, at the same time, I resented all these things in him. And when I went through the shift, through this shift in consciousness, at 29, after that, I was able to be with him. And in fact, it's always in a state of lovely presence, as I was listening, he would, he would usually talk at you not talk with you.

And I could sit and listen and accept him totally for who he was. I know that I knew that's not who he essentially is, but that's the egoic overlay. And there was a complete acceptance of his conditioning of his personality, complete acceptance.

So there was no longer any discomfort. Although I must add, even at that point, it would not have been my choice to spend a very long period of time with him, not days and days and days. But when I visited, I could spend an afternoon, I could spend two or three days being there and listen.

And then it was time to go back home. At that time, I was already living in another country. We were in different countries.

So to summarize, at first you feel alien as you begin to awaken, there's a sense of not belonging anymore, not wanting to participate, almost some kind of resentment. You don't belong to this world anymore. There's a growing need to be in solitude.

And then as presence grows, you're able to go back into the world without resenting it and without feeling that it should be different from the way it is. And so you are then in the world, to use an old Christian term, you're in the world, but not off it. You can be in it.

It does not mean that you still value highly periods of aloneness, of being just with yourself. And if you're able to have them, if your life situation allows you to have time alone, and you will enjoy that greatly, even in that second stage, when you can go back into the world and surrender, accept wherever humans are at in their present stage of development, of evolutionary development. And yet, yes, you may still love your solitude.

And loneliness, what before might have been loneliness before you began to awaken, becomes solitude. Now, what's the difference between loneliness and solitude? Loneliness means you're alone and not comfortable being alone.

There's a sense of something being wrong, something vital is missing. So that's lonely. And in state of presence or complete acceptance, the loneliness becomes transmuted or converted into solitude.

And solitude is a love something lovely. It's the same state. But internally, you experience it very differently.

Solitude is a very sweet and wonderful thing. And you can be in solitude only when you're in touch with the deeper, the transcendent dimension of who you are, the essence of who you are, the presence, the consciousness. When you sense that in the background, so to speak, and sometimes perhaps even in the foreground, then that's being alone is a lovely thing.

Not probably not continuously, but you love periods of time when you're perhaps out in nature, or you're alone in your room. And that's very enjoyable. That is also that yes, it is a sign.

One of the many signs of awakening is that you enjoy being alone. And as you bring more presence, you don't absolutely need to be alone. If there's little or no opportunity, then you're perfectly able to surrender to whatever situation you find yourself in.

So how you respond to other people is a good indicator of where you're at. So when you see that you're no longer enjoy participating in any so called normal human activities, then that's the beginning of the awakening process. And as it deepens, so first, you may want to remove yourself from the world become, you don't belong anymore, don't feel alone anymore.

And then after a while, presence deepens, and you are then you're back in the world, but in a different state of consciousness. So it's an interesting process. One more thing, when you accept other humans, let's say family members, with whom you share a lot of past, when you accept other humans, just the way they are, without demanding that they should be more conscious, or trying to change them, or justifying your own existence, when they criticize you, you need to demanding that your parents should understand you.

All these things, after a while, drop away. What difference does it make to you whether your parents understand you or not? Whether they appreciate what you do or not?

Maybe they do. Maybe they don't. When you are connected with the essence of who you are, whether somebody understands you or not, doesn't really make any difference.

You enjoy it. If they do, that's lovely. My father, now my mother, my father, whoever it may be.

So you can now understand what the spiritual path that I'm on and they appreciate it, and so on. That's fine. Or maybe the opposite is true.

They don't. Maybe they say, are you still involved in all that nonsense, Eckhart Tolle and all that nonsense? Are you still reading those books?

Why don't you do something useful? And that's a good test for where you're at, your degree of or lack of absolute reactivity towards other humans. That's wonderful reflection, which tells you how far you have progressed on your journey of awakening.

And that's, of course, why Ram Dass said, if you think you're so enlightened, go and spend a week with your parents. So there's deep wisdom in that. Because it's easy to say, okay, yes, you sit alone and say, oh, I'm enlightened.

I'm totally present. Isn't it wonderful? And then Thanksgiving comes or Christmas comes and you go to visit your parents with whom you share a lot of past.

And are you triggered into reactivity? Or are you able to come to that state of complete acceptance? And that tells you where you're at spiritually.

It doesn't matter. You could have great visions of angels and fireworks, internal fireworks. And that's lovely.

Perhaps it happens or doesn't happen. But the real test that tells you to what extent your awakening is actually, in many cases, other people. So don't run away from people.

You need them and they need you. And when you accept somebody, totally, the likelihood that they will change is much greater than when you do not accept them for the way they are. So after I was able to completely accept my father, certain changes happened in him.

He did not become totally free of ego, but in certain areas of his life, the ego diminished considerably. In other areas, it remained. But I had some miraculous things that I saw in him that were not there before.

And I believe they happened because this state of complete acceptance of another human being is something very powerful. There's the power of presence behind it. And of course, there's a whole school of psychotherapy based on this premise that when you accept somebody, totally unconditional acceptance, Carl Rogers is the founder of this school of therapy.

When you accept them totally for who they are, then change is much more likely than when you demand that they should be different from the way they are. So this is all very interesting. One can talk about it for a long time, but I think I've said enough for the time being.

I hope this is a little bit helpful.

Thank you. Hello, Eckhart. I want to say thank you because your teachings speak directly to me, and I've been practicing them since 2005.

And I've definitely seen a lot of progress in my life because of your teachings. And although I don't react to the world like I used to, neither on the outer physical level or on the inner emotional level, the world is still able to get its hooks into me and cause me to react, especially emotionally, sometimes. So my question is this.

Can I expect to ever get to a place where I no longer react unconsciously to any outside stimuli? And is this even possible?

[Speaker 1] (22:37 - 30:14)

Right. Well, that's an interesting question. You know the difference between, when we use words, between react and respond.

React, I'll just explain briefly for others. React means something that comes from your mental emotional conditioning. Your mental emotional conditioning, mind patterns, force you to react to certain situations, people, events in a certain way.

So you don't have a choice because you're not aware enough. When you react, the reaction takes you over. You become it.

Response is something different. Response arises out of awareness or presence, which means you do the right thing or you say the right thing in the moment. It's not conditioned by your past.

It comes from a deeper dimension within yourself. And that's, by the way, what is conventionally or traditionally called wisdom, which the world needs desperately. As I'm sure everybody's aware, the world desperately needs wisdom.

There's intelligence everywhere, but intelligence is not enough. Wisdom comes from the deeper level. So your question really is, is it possible to become free of the conditioning so that you're no longer at the mercy of your conditioning, where the conditioning no longer operates at all?

Yes, there are certain personal characteristics that may remain, but these are not the characteristics that cause dysfunction or suffering. There may be minor things that remain that are part of your personality, but the reactivity that is karmic and causes suffering to yourself and others, that eventually does go away. Yes, you become free of this compulsive way of reacting to events, people, and so on.

In the meantime, you don't need to now project some future moment when you, I will become free, or when am I going to be free? You don't need to ask all these questions. You're already, to some extent, you have a certain degree of freedom already when you can be aware while the reaction happens.

There's still an awareness in the background, so you're no longer totally in the grip of the reaction. So you can still feel its power. It might even still force you to say something.

So there's a discussion, and there's an emotion that builds up in you, and before you know it, something comes out that is either aggressive or defensive of your ego. And because you have identified with a mental position, therefore you need to defend yourself. That's the delusion, because you've identified with the thought, the thought, there's a sense of self in the thought, and then you become aggressive or defensive, or withdraw, whatever the reaction may be.

But it's possible that just as you say those words, in the background there's an awareness that this is what's happening. So it's still happening, but there's an awareness in the background that knows, oh, or it could be just a few seconds after you've said something, suddenly, oh, there it was. And that's an enormous gain in consciousness already, the time gap between becoming aware of a reaction, and the reaction itself shortens.

So at first, it could be a whole day or two before you wake up again. Maybe a situation makes you angry, or irritated, or a person, you have a disagreement with somebody, and only after a day or two, suddenly the awareness comes in, and you suddenly realize that all this time you have been in the grip of unconscious thought processes. Even if that person wasn't there anymore, you were still in the grip of unconscious thought processes connected with this particular person or situation.

And so a day or two later, you say, oh, and awareness comes back. And as presence deepens or intensifies, the time gap between this kind of reaction or reactivity and the incoming awareness, the time gap gets shorter, it shortens. And so then you reach a point where immediately after it's happened, immediately after the awareness is there, which means, of course, that the length of time in which you're involved in that kind of personal drama or whatever it may be, is shorter too.

So you're no longer fueling the interaction, the drama, which is the normal thing how people interact. And then after the time it has become very short, then almost simultaneously, suddenly you become aware that as you react, the awareness is still there, but yet your reaction is still there. And then the next thing is, you reach a point where you can sense the reactivity in you, but there's so much presence or awareness, that immediately it subsides because you have identified it for what it is.

This is not to be confused with suppression. There's no suppression behind this. It's just the light of your presence shines on, it's the light of awareness.

You can feel the emotion in you, and yet it does not take you over. It may not even cause any thought. Or if it causes a thought, you're aware of the thought, but you're not in the thought.

And then when you're able, when this happens, then you're almost, you're almost, you could say, 75% free. It's still there, but it's no longer possessing you. You're no longer at its mercy anymore.

And there's freedom there already. And if you have certain reactive patterns that are very strong, perhaps going back to childhood, or certain aspects of your pain body may be there. And it could well be that some remnants of this remain until the end of your lifespan here.

But it no longer matters that much, because the awareness, you're no longer at the mercy of these things. So that's really how it works. And it's a lovely process.

And you need all these things because if you were not challenged by your conditioning, then presence would not deepen. It's only when you're challenged by the conditioning and by other people who trigger your conditioning, that this presence deepens. So you actually can be grateful for all these things, because this is how the universe and how humans evolve.

They evolve through challenges. So it's a wonderful process.

[Speaker 2] (30:14 - 30:29)

It is. It really is. So I think you're right.

I think I'm about 75%. I have a ways to go, which means there's something to look forward to. And it gives me some hope.

[Speaker 1] (30:30 - 30:45)

Yes. Well, in the meantime, enjoy the journey. And enjoy the most important part of the journey, which is always this moment.

How conscious you are is determined by how conscious you are in this moment. That's all there is.

[Speaker 2] (30:46 - 30:50)

Yes. Thank you, Eckhart. I really appreciate everything.

[Speaker 1] (30:50 - 30:53)

Oh, you're welcome. Thank you. That was a great question.

Eckhart Tolle Letting Go of The Narrative of Me [6a901cd3-142f-44e7-b72a-39ce92bde6fe]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:40)

Letting go of the narrative of me. In this podcast, Eckhart says we are at a critical juncture. He explains that we must evolve to the next stage of development and transcend the ego.

He says many people try to go back to their pre-egoic state of consciousness, anesthetizing themselves with alcohol, drugs, food, sex, and work, all of which lead to unconsciousness. He says even though the ego is a key part of our development, it's time to let it go. So many of us are stuck in what he calls the narrative of me, the unhappy story we tell about ourselves, which masks our truer, more radiant essence.

He's the son of a very wealthy father, but he says, give me my inheritance. I want to make my own way. And the son goes into some distant land and he loses all the money that his father has given him and becomes destitute and becomes a beggar and even forgets his origin.

And then he sits there as a poor man by the wayside. And then the father sends messengers to find his son and say, don't you remember you are the son of such and such? And then the son travels back and meets his father.

And according to this parable, when the son arrives back home, the father loves him more deeply than before. It was the lost son, lost and regained. Paradise lost, paradise regained.

So this is our, the critical stage we are at now is we either evolve to this next stage where we regain what has been lost, but at a deeper level. We are no longer, we cannot return to a pre-egoic state of consciousness, although many humans try to do it because they can't stand living with themselves. So they try to return to this state of pre-egoic state by perhaps desensitizing themselves with certain substances and so on.

And it slows down your mind and you can become more like, some people become happy temporarily when they take a sufficient amount of alcohol and they become happy. Life is suddenly fine, but you're going to the pre-thinking stage. You're moving towards unconsciousness.

We can't go back. We have to go forward, transcend the ego and then we become free of this burden that, but we had to go through it. It was part of our evolutionary process.

So the vital thing here, what we are talking about is this state of, the state of presence, the state of almost as if you were expecting something, but you're not expecting anything, but it's a similar alertness. And then you, you go and you look around outside here without too much interference of the conceptual mind. And you then begin to sense the aliveness that surrounds you.

And then you, sometimes you choose one particular object, for example, a natural object like a flower is a very important meditation, a powerful meditation to contemplate a flower, for example, or a tree. Give yourself three, four minutes to contemplate it, not think about it, just observe, be that acute observation without any tension, just give it attention. They found that plants that are given attention grow, actually grow better than plants that are not given attention.

Attention is an energy that flows towards it and that connects you with it. And so the plant, this sounds a little mystical or weird, the plant or the tree can actually sense you, not in the same way that a human senses, but it actually responds to the attention that you give it and it loves it. So you contemplate the tree or the flower and if thoughts arise, they're not important, just let them go.

You don't have to hug the tree, you can, but it's not necessary, but if you feel inclined, then you may do so, that may add tactile sensation, but it is not necessary to sense the presence of the tree, but the tree can sense you also. And as you are aware of the beauty of the tree, the tree realizes through you its own beauty, so to speak. That is a mystical statement, do with it what you will.

I strongly sense that this is the case and there have been many studies that show that the natural world responds to human consciousness. And then also take in the totality of a space where you are, the totality of a landscape or wherever you may be, in a forest, sometimes it's good to focus on one thing and then take in the totality and again, beyond sense perceptions, there's an energy that you can feel. And then if you get much more advanced in this beautiful practice, and you have to be really advanced now to do this, you apply it to other human beings.

Not as easy, nature is easier, your dog is easier, your cat, the bird. With humans, often there's a lot in the way that obscures the being. There's the human, but where is the being?

It's there, but it may be obscured. The personality may be very heavy, the egoic sense of self may be very heavy. And it's like a dark cloud that obscures that which is beyond the being behind the human.

So with some humans, it's a little easier where there's already being shining through. It's perhaps easier here to connect with other humans as in many or most or all of you, the being can shine through the personality to a greater or lesser degree. And so when it does shine through, it's the connection is easier and you can then sense the personality and that which is beyond and you connect with that.

But you can only connect with that if you have connected with it within yourself first. Only that can recognize it. The ego cannot recognize it.

And only that can penetrate beyond the ego. Unless it could be that the ego is so dense that you cannot sense the being of that person, it's possible. And then you just have to accept and that's how it is.

But in many cases, even with obnoxious personalities, it sometimes happens that you meet such people. They seem to be around quite a bit. And even there, you can sometimes, instead of reacting to the whatever the obnoxious personality is saying, you acknowledge something deeper and you treat this person instead of being pulled to their level through reactivity.

You treat this person as a noble, let's say, I believe it's a saying from Buddhism, I'm not sure. Treat everybody as a noble guest because you recognize that which is beyond the personality and yet, and if only very faintly it's there. And instead of, this is an important skill, not to react to the egoic personality of other humans.

And especially if the egoic personality of other humans is amplified by their pain body. The pain body, when you are identified with it, becomes part of the ego. It gives enormous amplification to the ego, the pain body.

But when you recognize the pain body in yourself, it is no longer part of the ego. I believe everybody knows what I'm talking about, the pain body. The pain body is the emotion that lives in you from the past, painful emotion that still lives in you from the past and from time to time needs to rise up into your mind in order to feed either on your thoughts or on creating drama with other people.

And it loves the drama and it feeds on it, give me more of it. And the pain body feeds on that. And so if you are completely identified with the pain body, it becomes part of your ego and then the ego becomes awful, awful thing.

In some cases, it can even go as far as physical violence. So let's put the pain body aside for a moment because that's a difficult task to not react to the pain body, to be really present. Let's just talk a normal ego, which may still be not very pleasant or dysfunctional, maybe accusing you of something or complaining about something or trying to show off or trying to devalue something that you have, all kinds of weird things that egos do.

Being angry for some reason and he's taking it out on you and all these things. This person can pull you into unconsciousness or it can help you to be more present. There's always, you can go either way.

That applies to any challenge, by the way, not just challenges that come from other humans, any challenge in your life will either pull you into reactivity and unhappiness and anger and irritation and fear, or it can make you more present, more conscious, more awake. You can either go this way or that way. Same with humans.

So very important not to react to the human unconsciousness, which is the ego, but stay present. And sometimes you may be able to just ignore the dysfunctional part of their behavior and just address, not necessarily through words, sense that there's something else beyond that person, beyond the personality. So you treat this person as if he or she were very conscious, a noble guest.

And there have been stories of, there was a story of a Zen solitary monk and during the night a robber came in and wanted the few possessions that were there in the hut. And the Zen master treated him as a noble guest. Oh sure, yes, please.

Would you like this also? And then he said, I wish I could give you the moon also. And according to this story, the thief or the robber was so astonished by this that he experienced a complete change of personality.

In other words, he experienced an awakening and later he became a disciple of this master. This is not a general rule for behavior. It's only, it is something that happens spontaneously in this instance.

There is no general rule. You don't necessarily give everything away unless you, it arises in the present moment spontaneously. Again, we have the famous parable of Jesus turn the other cheek if somebody slaps you.

It's not really to be taken literally. Jesus talks in parables, he doesn't talk literally. So he says, turn the other cheek, hit me here too please.

This is simply, I believe he gave this story as an extreme example of reactivity and non-reactivity. Because in most cases, if somebody slaps you, you will immediately respond in kind and go to do the same thing. And there's no, there's not even a time gap.

There's an automatic reaction. So he's talking about be so conscious that you're free of unconscious reactivity. So there's the absence of reactivity.

Reactivity not only towards people, but also reactivity to situations that you find yourself in. Through reactivity, you're always at the mercy of whatever situation you find yourself in. The situation determines how you feel, determines your inner state.

So if something goes well, you say, oh, that's so great, and then something doesn't, or you find yourself in unpleasant surroundings, or an obstacle appears literally or metaphorically on your path. This shouldn't be happening. Reactivity also implies this should not be happening, but it is.

Yeah, but it shouldn't. And then the arguing starts in your mind or out aloud, and the complaining happens. Other people, situations, and so on.

So you're at the mercy of what happens in your life internally through reactivity. And it's an enormous discovery if you see that something can go wrong, so to speak, in your life, and suddenly you find yourself being free of reaction. Unless something can be done about it, then of course you take action.

You arrive at the airport, and there is a lineup of half a mile at the security, and what do you do? What do you do? Do you just stand there and look around and breathe?

Maybe you go home. That's another possibility. Or are you getting very upset?

Most people would get very upset, and they start thinking thoughts, and every thought makes you more upset. And then they post what's happening on their Facebook and Instagram. You won't believe what's happening here now.

And then they post angry messages to the airline or whatever. And I always recommend for people with certain spiritual practice here, in any situations like that, that any situation that makes you unhappy, yes, if you can remove yourself, fine, we're not talking about that. It's a situation that at the moment there's little choice for action.

You just have to endure it. How do you do that? Now, as an experiment, and for some people that's their first spiritual lesson.

I sometimes mention it when I give a talk in a big city, and there's oftentimes people who have never come much into contact with anything spiritual. So I suggest to them, in any situation they find themselves in that makes them unhappy, it could be a traffic jam, it could be all kinds of things. It could be on the telephone, you're trying to talk to your bank.

You know how frustrating that can be? Because you cannot reach a human being on airline, you lost your luggage, and you're trying to get somebody on airline, nobody will answer. So as an experiment, I ask, ask yourself, because you have plenty of time while you're on the phone, nobody's answering.

How would I experience this moment, if I did not add any thought to it? How would my experience of this moment be, if I added no thought to it? Okay, that's a strange thing, why people think.

Okay, you're in the same situation, that you feel very irritated, very angry, and then you ask, okay, now, how do I experience this without any thought? Then you have to somehow let go of thought. May not be that easy, but it's possible.

You become aware of your breathing, that's a good way of taking tension away from thinking. And you look around, sense perception, another way of becoming free of obsessive, unnecessary thinking. Breathing, sense perceptions, and feel the aliveness inside your body.

The breathing already takes your attention into the body, and you begin to sense the aliveness. And then there's sense perceptions also. And that all becomes part of this moment, the now.

And you're not thinking anymore, there's just this. And suddenly there's a shift, because you suddenly realize it was not the situation that made you unhappy, it was your narrative that made you unhappy. The mental narrative made you unhappy, not the situation.

Oh, that's amazing. How many people are being made unhappy by their mental narratives? And that includes, for many people, that includes their entire life.

Because what you describe as your life is a story you tell yourself from your past. It's not just things that happened during the past, it includes your interpretation of things that happened to you in the past, which may or may not be correct, it could be very subjective, almost certainly is, but let's put that aside. So there is the narrative of me, and people have this narrative that they live with, they call it my life, and it makes them very, because it's an unhappy story.

So many things happened that people did to me, and that I did to people, and things I lost, things I gained, and some narratives are a mixed bag of happy and unhappy things. That's better than totally negative narratives. But there are millions of people who are burdened with almost completely negative narratives that they describe as my life.

And they experience their so-called life as an enormous burden to carry, and they experience their life as a problem that needs to be solved somehow. Their entire identity is a problem that seeks a solution, but they never find a solution. Sometimes the solution is, I have to move somewhere.

Well, sometimes a move is good, but probably it's not the solution to your unhappiness. Or I find a different partner, but probably not a solution to your unhappiness. The unhappiness, so much of it arises through a narrative in your mind, not the situation.

And your life isn't really your life, because what you call your life, the only place where you can experience your life is in the present moment. This is your life. It's never not your life.

The present moment is always your life. Only the present moment. Only this.

Never anything that happened in the past. That is part of your life situation, one could say. So I distinguish between life situation and life.

Your life is now. Only now. Always now.

And this is the place of freedom. So how do you experience the now? To be free of reactivity.

Experiment with not attaching unnecessary narratives to what's going on in your life. Just be with it. And that includes complaining, for example.

I mentioned complaining because it's an important part of many people's ego structure. Complaining keeps many, for many egos, complaining is the main thing that keeps them going as egos. And they're always at it.

There's always something to complain about. It could be a situation, or it could be other people. That's, of course, a very common thing.

What they did, or didn't do, but should have done, etc. And you know what he said then. And I said, and then he, how dare you?

I said, what can't you do? But then he said, and then he accused me of, and I said to him, how dare you accusing me? Because you look at yourself.

And then he said to me, and this goes on, gossip is part of that also. You'll never guess what she did. Oh my God, no, you don't believe it.

And whenever all these things are being told, gossip and complaining about people, the implication, which is unconscious, is the ego is seeking a sense of superiority. Because whenever you complain about somebody, by implication, you are superior to this person that you're complaining about. And even when you're gossiping about somebody, the other person must be devalued through that in some way, because you are superior.

You can see something that they can't see. They are so stupid. So gossip happens in the same way.

The ego is always in search of superiority, and it fears inferiority. It always compares itself. When it encounters inferiority, it immediately tries to compensate through trying to diminish something that you have.

So these are very fundamental things for the ego works. If somebody has a possession that you don't have, because you can't afford it, but you're still in ego consciousness, then you would try to diminish the value of that person's possession, or explain why this person is inferior to you. So you could be, let's say, you have one man, he's in his Ferrari, and feel superior because most people don't have a Ferrari.

So the Ferrari becomes a mental object that he identifies with, mine, and he looks at others, and there's a guy on a bicycle pulling up next to him, and the guy on the Ferrari looks at him, what a loser. And the guy on the bicycle, who is very spiritual, thinks, what, look at this superficial, materialistic, obnoxious jerk, polluting the environment with this horrible, horrible car. I'm so happy I'm beyond that.

Each one is superior to the other in their own mind, one way or another. So the ego seeks identification with something, somewhere it must have a superiority. In some cases it might be physical strength or beauty, good looks, that is a big thing for many people, and you identify with that naturally when you're young.

If you look better than most others, it is almost inevitable that that comes from a very important part of your egoic sense of self, your looks. I don't know if it's politically incorrect to say that for women that could, even in these days of equality, could still be more the case than for men, but it can also be the case for men, their looks. That is fine, you have that, and if you have great looks, then that will last for quite a few years, can keep your ego happy, because you feel superior to others, don't look not as strong and muscular and great, that can keep the ego going for a while, but not forever, because time does something to your looks, then suffering begins.

It could be enormous suffering if you haven't gone beyond it by then. You've had a few decades, life gave you a few decades, but you didn't go beyond, but then the suffering starts. It could also be possessions, it could be status of some kind, family background, high social class in some places, not so much in North America anymore, but in some places in Europe still high social class.

England is diminishing a bit, but still exists. It could be knowledge, I know more than you, I'm knowledgeable, you are not, or you become part of a group that feels superior to others, you join a group, and then you have a collective ego, and it could be a religious group, it could be a sect or something, and you join that, and then your ego adopts a collective ego, that group that can be very fulfilling for the ego, and always implication is, this group is superior to others.

If it's religious, often it means we are the only ones in possession of the truth, the others are not, and the others will probably go to hell anyway. But we are the ones who are going to be saved. This is quite common, many sects have that, and people don't know, collective ego can be very, very strong and powerful, and is even more insane than the personal ego.

The collective ego can commit the most horrific atrocities in the name of the collectivity, that the individual ego would not be able to perpetrate. That is how the Cultural Revolution in China, National Socialism in Germany, many other, Cambodia, Pol Pot, the egoic, the collective ego, horrible entity. So the ego will identify with this, that I had, when I was every youngster looking for ego food, how do I find my identity, they're looking for something.

I remember I had to look for something when I was young, so what was there, what could

I, my body wasn't very strong, so I wasn't an achiever in sports at all, but my family was fairly poor, so we didn't have a car, so I couldn't say, my dad has such and such a car, my dad didn't have any car, so that was a bummer. So what to do then, for a long time I was looking, and even in my teenage years, I was still looking for a stronger, better sense, a better ego, and so I didn't have family background, or possessions, or status, or physical strength, or particularly good looks, I don't think so, but then gradually I found, as I was moving towards my 20s, I found, oh, I can become an intellectual, and become very knowledgeable, and then I started reading books, and so on, and then I got to university relatively late, and I developed an ego there, as a very highly accomplished intellectual, and I could show people, show off my knowledge, I could look down on others who didn't know that much as I did, but I was unhappy, so it didn't help the unhappiness, I still felt inadequate, but it was a temporary measure. When we talk about ego, most people imagine, if you have a big ego, you think of yourself as the greatest, I am the one, possession, or power, or great looks, you feel you are the greatest, but ego can be of many, many kinds, a very powerful, very strong ego identity, that is as strong as a victorious one, is the victim identity of the ego, if you derive your sense of identity from having been a victim of someone, or some situation, or imagine having been a victim, or actually having been a victim, now, the world is full of victims, obviously, because humans are unconscious, and they do bad things to other humans, many children are the victims of their parents, because the parents are completely unconscious, and so, many people are actually victims, but the question is, does the memory of those events, does that become incorporated into their ego structure, and they see themselves as victims of a particular person, or a group of people, it could be also collective, yes, people have done bad things to other groups of people, collective, whatever it may be, yes, undoubtedly, that is the case, the danger is, if the ego adopts that, and incorporates it into its sense of self, the main part of your identity then becomes your victimhood, and you talk about it, and you think about it, and it gives you superiority, how does it give you superiority? If you are a victim, by implication, you are morally superior to those others, who have done bad things, it could be millions of people, who knows, so, superiority is important, I do not deny the fact that many humans have suffered at the hands of other humans, and groups of humans have suffered at the hands of other groups of humans, throughout history, that is true, the danger is, if that becomes incorporated into your sense of self, and then you become a walking victim, and you love your identity as a victim, because it gives you superiority, it is a very fashionable thing, unfortunately, these days, but let us not go into this, because it might be politically incorrect, I do not want to go there, so, being not at the mercy of other egos, not at the mercy of circumstances, that is what we were talking about, before we got into ego, develop the ability of being free of reactivity in events, situations, or with certain people, that is a very important part of spiritual practice and awakening, and you practice it throughout daily life, you can practice with that, gradually, all the things that you experience in your daily life, you can have an internal shift, whatever situation you have to deal with at any given moment, if you can achieve this internal shift, realize that whatever situation you are dealing with, in any given moment, there are two aspects to it, the situation itself, where you need to do something, or take action, or whatever it may be, and your inner state of consciousness, the primary thing in any situation is the state of consciousness with which you meet the situation, that you face the situation, that if you remember that this is primary, and whatever the situation contains, and whatever you do is secondary, primary is the state of consciousness with which you meet the situation, and then any situation that you encounter in your daily life, then becomes your spiritual practice, when you do that, there is a very rapid awakening, if you can transform every situation, what's really, what is the main thing about this situation, it is my spiritual practice, that's the main thing about it, the secondary thing is, I need to talk to my lawyer about that, talking to you, and even if you sit facing your lawyer and talking about something, continue to realize, this is my spiritual practice, and then you deal with it, but you stay present as you deal with it, then everything changes, you may not succeed every time, because the world has a way of pulling you into it, it has a, it wants to hypnotize you into saying, this is what matters, nothing else matters, just this, no, what matters is your state of consciousness, that's primary, so if you can then, from the slightest irritation, through the most serious form of suffering in your life, including impending death, whatever it may be, use that as, what is your state of consciousness in which you meet it, this is my spiritual practice, and then you can go so far as to be grateful for any situation that arises, thank you for that spiritual practice, and then difficult people become your teachers, especially easy people, not so much, you can enjoy them, but difficult people become real spiritual teachers, and even if you remove yourself after being with them for five minutes, at least for five minutes, they were your spiritual teacher, your entire life changes, if you regard every challenge that arises, every situation, as part of your spiritual practice, and as part of staying conscious, and then reactivity gradually dissolves, and your ability to respond to a situation increases enormously, response is conscious response, some situations require you to take action, or to say something, or to do something, not a reaction, but action that arises out of presence, and that is wise action, Buddhists have a term, they say skillful action, and if you do something unconscious, Buddhists sometimes call it unskillful action, it's a nice term, I wish you a peaceful rest, night, sleep, and if you are not asleep, practice inner body awareness, and think as little as possible.

Eckhart Tolle Liberation From Yourself [b2e1b4f6-fdf0-45be-bdbb-ec616d371d11]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:32)

Liberation from yourself. In this podcast, Eckhart encourages participants to start with a moment of stillness. Through quiet and calm, he says, we get in touch with that part of ourselves he called the deep eye.

Eckhart says that by reaching beyond the personality and our physical bodies rooted in pure awareness, there is a deeper dimension to who we are. And he believes it is there we transcend the old inner narratives to find liberation from ourselves.

[Speaker 1] (0:39 - 31:38)

Thank you. Thank you. Thank you.

I usually start with a moment of stillness. Because it's good to be still. As I said in a book somewhere, you're never more fully yourself than when you are still.

Which also means present, it's the same. And when you're still or present, you hardly remember or don't remember who you are as a person or personality, historical person. You don't need to, you are yourself.

There's a deeper dimension of yourself that is suddenly arising, emerging, that transcends who you are as a person. And that is the most wonderful liberation. Liberation is a term that, as you know, has been used probably over thousands of years in a spiritual context.

So it's not that you as a person, it's not that the person becomes liberated. It's more liberation from the person, from complete identification with your form identity, which is the physical form and the conditioned mind. How wonderful to be free of yourself.

And yet there's a deeper self that the Buddhists prefer to call the not-self, the formless presence. And then there's a shift, and this is all part of the awakening, there's a shift in you from the conditioned entity that derives its identity from the mental emotional conditioning to this transcendent presence. What you transcend is your conceptual sense of identity, your conceptual identity.

And that's so, so liberating. But you can still operate as a person. It's not that you become incapable of dealing with the things of this world, or it could happen if you have no guidance whatsoever.

It's happened to a few people. Once you have discovered the dimension of what I recently have been calling the deep I, I, that's the pronoun I, the deep I, as opposed to the surface I, which is what you usually refer to when you use the word I, you refer to the historical person. I like, I don't like, I'm happy, I'm unhappy, I want, I don't want.

And all the things that the I does and says, there's that I, and yet there's a deeper I that is non-conceptual. You access it the moment there's a cessation in the stream of thinking, like now, and yet you haven't gone to sleep at all. Except one or two of you are suffering from severe jet lag, that's possible.

So if somebody close to you is asleep, do not assume that they are unconscious, completely unconscious. They may just be suffering from jet lag. So usually you are aware of all kinds of things, sense perceptions, emotions, thoughts, they arise in your awareness.

And if you are still unconscious, spiritually speaking, your awareness gets completely absorbed by those things. Now, every thought that arises, it completely gobbles up your consciousness, like a hungry little entity. So you're always, you're aware, the thought arises in awareness, you may be aware of sense perceptions.

But as you awaken, an added dimension comes in. And that is, you're aware that you are aware. You're aware of yourself as the awareness.

Right now, as we sit here, as you sit here, you're aware of whatever sense perceptions are arising in the room, visual, auditory, perhaps some other senses. And at the same time, you're aware of yourself, but not the historical person as the presence or as the awareness itself, without which there would be no sense perception. And if you're still thinking a little bit, there would be no thinking without that awareness, that consciousness.

So there's a, there's a twofold thing here. You're aware of whatever arises in that field of awareness or consciousness. But you're also aware of that presence or of that awareness directly.

Now that sounds, when I say it, it sounds like a duality, because I'm formulating a sentence when I say there's a subject and an object. And I say, I am aware of awareness. But that's not correct.

It's only the duality creeps in when you, the moment you use language, because every sentence has a subject and it has an object. So it's not so much that you are aware of awareness, because there isn't, ultimately there is no you separate from the awareness. So you cannot be aware of awareness, because to be aware of something is awareness.

So a better way of putting it, therefore, is to say, you're becoming self-aware or awareness through you is becoming self-aware. So that is the, the presence that has no form. Something opens up within you that is very deep and far transcends your form identity.

It connects you with something vast. It's not even something. It connects you with a great depth.

And therefore, I often use the analogy of the ripple on the surface of the ocean. And every human being is that ripple in this analogy. As long as the ripple is not aware of its true nature, it only knows itself as a little ripple.

And it looks to other ripples for fulfillment or wants to protect itself from other ripples and compete with them or compares itself to other ripples. It's a very problematic existence because it only knows the surface of reality. It's an entire, experiencing entire reality as a surface phenomenon, continuously trying to find some kind of ultimate fulfillment, happiness on the surface level, through other ripples, or other situations that are also ripples.

And it's frustrating to live as a ripple because you're just a little, this little thing. And, and some ripples manage to get bigger. They might, they might gobble up a few others and then they grow into a wave.

In this analogy, it means you have your private jet waiting nearby. It's a clear sign that you have grown into a wave. You're no longer just a little ripple.

But you're just as short-lived as the ripple. And now you have to compete with other big waves such as the ocean. It becomes problematic again.

And a moment may come when the ripple or the wave suddenly perhaps becomes frustrated with that surface existence and says, is that all there is that I can't take anymore? Because things continuously, obstacles continuously arise and there's always things that are unfulfilling. And even the most promising things that you enter into, relationships, situations, places, all kinds of, even the most promising things, there's always sooner or later some flaw appears in it.

What's wrong with the world? Why is there always this not, this ultimate fulfillment is always kind of short-lived because you're still on the surface only. And then the moment comes, and perhaps accidentally or because another ripple close to you who has gone beyond its mere ripple existence says something, or you can sense something.

And then perhaps for a moment, there's a cessation in the stream of thinking without loss of consciousness. And the ripple goes, oh, there's more to me than I thought. It doesn't know what it is.

It doesn't have a name for it, but it can sense a depth suddenly. And as it senses the depth, that is suddenly the vertical dimension has come in. It's no longer just the horizontal dimension.

There's the vertical dimension of consciousness where there's only the present moment.

Past and future exists in the vertical dimension of reality. And there's a transcendent reality.

There's the vertical dimension. And the ripple suddenly discovers that it is a manifestation, a temporary manifestation of something vast. And it is not separate from it.

It is a manifestation of it. So it's no longer just a little ripple. It senses its origin in Buddhism and sometimes in Zen, you have strange expression, your true face before you were born or all kinds of expressions to point to it.

So it discovers that it is the ocean, or it probably doesn't have a name for ocean. It discovers its connectedness to something transcendent that transcends its ripple existence. And then gradually, that's the first discovery.

And then it occasionally loses it again, but gradually it is able to have some attention in that depth, even when it is occupied with its surface ripple existence and operates there, it does that. And yet there is a depth, there's a rootedness in being. And that transforms the way in which the ripple, we'll let go of the ripple in a moment.

As you know, the ripple is you. The ripple existence then becomes no longer as problematic as it was before, a little bit more sane. The dysfunction that has created an enormous amount of unnecessary suffering, the reactivity that amplified every challenge that the ripple encountered in life, that amplified it and made a huge thing.

And then through reactivity, that challenge actually grew even worse because you amplified it. Well, the ripple, sorry. The ripple amplified it.

It's easier, we can bypass the remnants of ego in you by talking about ripples, and then the ego doesn't feel offended. That's the power of parables and stories. So the ego doesn't realize that it's about me, so it listens to a story.

And whereas before, the ego would have created a barrier without knowing. It's a little bit like a sugar-coated pill. So you give to a child, and it's, oh, it tastes good.

And then you swallow it, and then it begins to work. It's called, I believe it's called the red pill. And so you discover that there's two of you here.

This is not the ultimate truth, but a temporary way of talking about it, of approaching it, to have a little bit of conceptual understanding of it. But conceptual understanding is not it. It doesn't get you there, but it is helpful to understand it and to see the concepts that I'll give you are actually signposts, and you go where they point.

You don't walk around the signpost and, or start collecting them. Some highly knowledgeable spiritual seekers have collected signposts for 20 or 30 years. They're extraordinarily knowledgeable about old spiritual traditions, but don't realize that that's not it.

The conceptual dimension is not it. And yet, it does help to have a little bit of understanding. So there's, let's just put it like this.

There's two of you. There's you, the person, and there's you, the transcendent being that is, has nothing to do with your personal history. And I sometimes call that using the fact that the English language does not have a word for, that includes man and woman.

So you have to say human being. In some languages, you have a word that includes man and, in German, you have mensch, which is a good, is a man or woman. But in English, you have to say, human being.

Human still has the man in it, but let's let that go. And so you are, the human is the person. This is how I interpret the term.

And it's, it works beautifully. The human is the, the personality, the conditioned entity, the historical person. That's of course, everybody has a history.

Everybody has a life history and a narrative in their mind that they call my life, which is somewhat problematic. Except when you look on Facebook. So it must be only you whose life is problematic.

All the others are enjoying beautiful meals that they take photos of and are in exciting places. And then you look at it, you think, what's wrong with me? And then you start doing the same thing perhaps.

So there's two of you. There's the problematic person. No, I don't believe there's a person whose life is not problematic.

It can't be. It's, it's in the nature of a person to experience life as challenging. That is not an aberration.

It is not an extraordinary thing that has gone wrong. If your life is challenging, if you encounter problems, big and small, it doesn't mean something has gone wrong. No, that's how it's supposed to be.

What? Yes. The world would be the most absurd place if every human encounters a continuous succession of challenges.

And if that meant that something was very, very wrong, it would be absurd. So it must be then that's an essential part of being here, of being confronted with challenges. Just as every life form from a blade of grass to a tree, to a flower, to animal, the moment it's born, its life is precarious.

And it's threatened by this and that. Most life forms could get eaten up any moment by some other life form. And so they have developed certain powers to defend themselves against being consumed prematurely.

Some are very fast. Some have developed disguises. But these powers have come gradually as a response to the challenges.

So every life form is continuously challenged, not just the human. And so every life is problematic. It does not mean that there's something wrong.

Now the problems arise in two ways. We could somehow divide, although there's not a clear dividing line. There are certain problems that arise only or mainly because you are unconscious and your mind is dysfunctional.

So a very simple example, you wake up every other night at two or three in the morning, sweating profusely, not because it's hot, but because you're thinking very anxious thoughts. Clearly you're not present, as you can see when I act it out. It's called not present.

And so that is one way in which you can experience life is problematic, but it is entirely created by unconscious mind activity. That's only one example. There are many other, for example, a total misinterpretation of other people's intentions, and then react to them as if your total misinterpretation were the correct interpretation.

And all kinds of huge amounts of drama arises out of nothingness. And it happens continuously. So entirely mind generated problems, there's a huge amount of them.

And they create as much suffering as problems that are actual problems when suddenly there's an earthquake and your house collapses. Hopefully you're outside. And that's a big, that's a problem, or there's an accident.

There may be a connection with dysfunctional thinking and the accident, there may be, because you might be totally absorbed in your mind, and then you create an accident. Or maybe there's no connection. I'm not saying that necessarily is always so.

There are certain things that seem to come from the outside. You get old. That becomes a problem after a while.

It's a challenge. As you grow older, the body no longer is able to do what it used to do. It's a physical challenge.

That could also become a huge amount of mental suffering if you are very much identified with either the appearance of your body or the strength of your body. If that was the foundation for your sense of identity, then in addition to losing physical abilities, you have an enormous amount of suffering because your sense of self, which was derived from identification with the physical form, that sense of self is now becoming shaky, because the physical form is becoming shaky. And that's very, very painful for especially those lucky people who had such good karma that they came into this life with good looks.

So they never... They looked well. They were for 20, 30 years, 40, who knows, they...

That was in... That gave them... In that comparison, that gave them a sense of self.

Then, of course, humans are confronted with deep challenges of loss, not only approaching death, but also loss of somebody close to you, a premature death, loss of a loved one, sometimes loss of a whole family or lost limbs or mobility. You might find yourself in a wheelchair, all kinds of huge things we are confronted with. So you have the suffering that is generated through this misuse of the mind, unconscious thinking, and you have suffering that comes through encountering disaster in one form or another in your life.

That's not to be denied. And we will explore how that also can become an opening into transcendence. So there's the person who lives confronted with problems and with challenges, and there is the potential of discovering, and sometimes through encountering extreme forms of disaster, but not always, not necessarily, but there's a potential of discovering within yourself a dimension of depth that transcends who you are as a person.

And in this moment, when the thinking mind stops for a moment and is replaced with an aware presence, then the transcendent dimension has emerged in you. And the invitation to you is right here and now to see if you can invite that dimension into your life. And it is almost as if you disappeared temporarily, what you before you called I, because when you're not thinking and just are aware, then the person has temporarily subsided and an aware presence has arisen.

And that's the discovery of the transcendent you or the, as I call it sometimes, the deep I. And for some people it comes, and there are many, many accounts throughout history, it comes through encountering extreme forms of suffering. And that is the potential for awakening that is hiding beyond the seemingly most dreadful thing that could happen to you.

And it's all expressed symbolically, whether or not you relate to it as a, whether you're a Christian or you're not a Christian, you simply understand there's something there that the symbol of the cross points to. It doesn't, this is something, I don't think it's fully understood by most churches or conventional Christians, that what the symbol of the cross points to, and a man who is dying on the cross, to me that is the archetype of human and what is possible. The cross is a torture instrument.

It's an expression of extreme suffering. So you have this human being on a torture instrument. Now, when something happens, there is, this human being dies, is in a state of surrender, not my will, but thy will be done.

The human being dies in a state of surrender and the very torture instrument is a symbol for the divine. The cross is a sacred symbol. But the cross is also a torture instrument.

The torture instrument, the greatest obstacle to fulfillment, the greatest obstacle to, to life, it seems, is also potentially the opening into the transcendent dimension. And I believe this, to me, is the, the deep symbolism of the cross. And traditionally, traditionally, many humans who encountered awakening, who encountered it through extreme suffering, and that drove them to a point of surrender, that drove them, because they couldn't stand the pain anymore, that drove them to the state of acceptance of what is.

And then suddenly the vertical dimension opened up. That's also, you could say the cross also points to the two dimensions, the horizontal dimension and the vertical dimension.

Eckhart Tolle Liberation Through Stillness [608c479f-89e9-48ef-8e12-bcc0784a2957]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:33)

Liberation through stillness. In this episode, Eckhart leads a meditation and then answers questions from a live audience. He says the most important thing to achieve in our lifetime is stillness.

Without it, we feel frustrated, angry, and discontent. No relationship or personal success ever satisfies us because life lacks depth. He says stillness is the answer.

That sense of liveness we feel when we're free of thought.

Good afternoon, good evening, good morning, wherever you may be. Beautiful, sunny, early afternoon. And whatever time it may be where you are, it's still the present moment.

And the strange thing is, it may well be that you watch this or listen to this when it's no longer live in the conventional sense of the word, but in a deeper sense, it's always live. Even if you listen to this, watch this 20 years from now, which is possible, then hello, welcome to the present moment, 20 years from now, 30 years from now. And you will still be watching this in the only space there is, which is the space of now.

And what that is, is the space of consciousness, timeless consciousness. And that dimension is realized within you as stillness. Stillness is to be conscious without thinking, or it could also mean to be aware of yourself as the underlying consciousness even when you are thinking.

Thinking, doing, going from here to there, being active. Now, if you ask me what's the most important thing for me in this lifetime, in my life, if I had to say what is the most important thing for you to achieve, discover, realize in this lifetime or any lifetime, I would say it is stillness. To find that dimension of consciousness within you, connect with the stillness, realize that there is a realm of stillness in you.

And if you don't find that, you don't realize that, then you are condemned to continuous almost continuous frustration, discontent, unhappiness in whatever form. Nothing will ever be enough to satisfy you, at least not for long. No relationship, no attainment, no success, no circumstance, no place or location will satisfy you for very long.

In other words, you can't really enjoy life if you haven't realized the stillness, that there is this dimension of stillness in you. In addition to or underneath all the thinking and the emotions and all the sense perceptions that happen around you all the time, and those things make up your life. If you had to define what your life consists of, the entire thing that you call my life, what does it consist of?

It would be, it is sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions, feelings, that makes up your life. Your entire past exists in you as memories or other residues left by so-called past events in the emotional field. So there is no real, what you call your life, there's no past in it as such.

Past exists in you now as certain thoughts, the conditioning of your mind, and certain emotions that are linked to the conditioning of your mind. So those things make up when people say my life, that's what we're talking about. Thoughts, which includes the entire past, which exists as thought, emotions, sense perceptions.

And if that's all there is, then your life is never really satisfying. Lacks depth. If that's all there is, you are shallow.

You live on the surface of life. When you discover that in addition to sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions, there's also a stillness in you, not as one other thing, but as the space that enables all the other things, the objects in consciousness, sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions, the space that enables all the other things that make up your so-called life to be. So we are not adding one more thing when we talk about what does my life consist of?

Sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions. And now when I say stillness, we're not adding a fourth thing, no, because stillness is not like any sense perception, any thought, or any emotion. Those are all forms that arise in your consciousness.

Or we could say forms that your consciousness assumes temporarily, appears as. But you are deeper than that. Essentially, you are the consciousness space that enables all these other things to be.

And that is what we mean by using the word stillness. The most important thing, or rather, it is the most important no thing in your life. Not nothing, but no thing.

You can only do that in English. In other languages, it doesn't work. I'd like to point out to you also that as you sit there, I assume you're sitting.

Doesn't matter if you're sitting, standing, or lying. Let's say as you sit there and listen, be aware that this teaching, not the best word, but let's use it, exists also on the level of form, thought, and more importantly, the level of stillness. So as I talk to you, I'm not just conveying words.

More importantly, I am conveying stillness. How is that possible? When you notice that there are gaps between words and sentences as I speak, when you become aware of the gaps, and also when you become aware of an undercurrent of stillness that is there behind the words, so to speak.

So when you notice the two dimensions to our gathering here, people are gathering here, coming together, not physically, but coming together in consciousness. So you notice two dimensions, the dimension of perception, sense perception, words, and visual perception. And then you can also be aware of an undercurrent of stillness.

And the moment you become aware here now of this undercurrent of stillness that is behind the words and in between the words, the moment you become aware of that, you have found the stillness within you, because the stillness is not there, it's here. And that's the real purpose of our session here, is either to discover the stillness within you, or for most of you, to deepen the stillness that you have already discovered. Deepened stillness doesn't mean something happens to the stillness, it means you become more aware of it.

That stillness is not just an absence of noise, an absence of, in the case of stillness, an absence of mental noise, just as silence is the absence of external noise. So silence is outside, stillness is within, but it's not just the absence of noise, thought, but it's also a sense of aliveness, which is felt with your entire body, not the physical body, the inner body. So your body also participates in this discovery of stillness.

You become, as you first discover it, you become then more comfortable with stillness. You are then able to sit somewhere for a few minutes, in a room, outside, on a bench, in a cafe, wherever, at home, in your car, you can sit somewhere for a minute, two, three, and just enjoy being without needing to fill up every second with stuff, fill up every moment with thought, another thought, and another thought, and another text message, and another email, and some other Facebook posts, they're all filling up your mind. Very few people these days, when you look around, you hardly see anybody sitting quietly, enjoying the isness, the isness of this moment, being still inside, alert, and still, and look around, and listen, and be aware of your presence, that's the stillness. And that is a dimension where the personality, the person is transcended.

There's no ultimate satisfaction within your personal sense of self. The liberation from your personal sense of self comes with the realization of the dimension of stillness. Doesn't mean you no longer are a person, of course, you are still a person, you have a personality, but you realize there is infinitely more to who you are than the conditioned, limited person, personality, personal self, sense of self.

Part of your personal sense of self will be the collective sense of self, so it's not entirely confined to you as a person. Everybody's personal sense of self consists in part of the collective sense of self, which are certain mind structures, thought patterns, meaning, views, opinions, perspectives, convictions, all that you have absorbed from the collective, that you absorb when you watch the media, when you watch the news, you absorb the collective perspectives, and then you think they are yours. The culture in which you grow up, you absorb certain collective thought patterns that virtually everybody holds, anybody you come into contact with, an identity, a form identity, which could be connected to political affiliations, it could be connected to religion.

A lot of religion is thought structures that people identify with. There's still pockets in most religions where there is an opening into the transcendent, but it's sometimes hard to find those little openings that are within the structure of the religion, which may be 90% Thought structures, ideologies, if you identify with them, they give you your sense of self, which usually implies that you are right and others are wrong. Your collective is right, other collectives are wrong, that's an essential part of it.

Delusion, it's a form of delusion, but very, very common. So your sense of self, your person is partly personal, it's your family background conditions it and all those things, and partly collective. You may not realize how much of your thinking is conditioned by what you take in through the screen of the news and whatever you connect with, and that's fine, everybody has certain perspectives, but the danger is, if you identify with those viewpoints, opinions, perspectives, convictions, then you are trapped in thought, and that makes up the ego.

Ego is complete identification with thought forms, and then what's lacking in your life is the transcendent dimension. It's only there where you can be liberated from being trapped in your personality, your person, which is ego. And the evils of this world created by humans are due to that unconsciousness, which is to be trapped in that limited, collective, personal sense of self.

The personal sense of self, when there's no awareness of the underlying dimension of stillness, is dysfunctional enough, it creates a lot of totally, ultimately unnecessary conflict. But the collective sense of self, the ego, when humans get taken over by that, when it becomes much stronger, even in the personal conditioning, that's truly, in many cases, truly mad. And you can see the madness these days, it seems to be coming more to the surface, which may be a good thing, it's being exposed more, you can see more clearly how people communicate with each other through the internet, how angry they get, how they make others into enemies.

Just one false sentence, one false word, and people will attack you on the internet. Crazy. Don't be part of that craziness.

But how not to be part of that craziness? Well, find the stillness, and then while you, if you watch the news or read whatever people post, you can read it and you can sense the underlying stillness or presence as you read. And you may still completely disagree with what somebody says on there, but it no longer means that whoever said or posted those statements, that you regard them as your enemy.

That's crazy. Now the human ego is having a new field of operation that it didn't have before, where it can really play itself out, and that is on the internet. If you haven't found, if you haven't realized the stillness, then your entire life or lifetime really hasn't been successful, let's use a conventional term.

How do you measure success? Whether you've made it, what the world tells you success is, certainly that's not it, because all the people who have achieved it are still unhappy, frustrated, dysfunctional in many ways, unless they have found the transcendent dimension within. I've recently started to use the pointer expression, the deep I, not referring to this I, but the I, the pronoun, first person, I, the deep I.

Finding that transcendent dimension within, that's realizing the depth within you, and that is the deep I. And then you have the superficial I, which is your personal self. So when you use the word I, usually it refers to the personal self, me and my story, I sometimes call it.

And then suddenly realize there is a deeper sense of beingness or presence in you, and that is the deep I. The surface I continues to exist. It's never going to be perfect, you as a person.

Yes, the dysfunctions, most of them will go away. You no longer create suffering. You don't contribute to the suffering in this world that disappears as you become aware of the transcendent, the deep I.

And yet, on a personal level, you're not going to be perfect. You will have your limitations. You're good at this, but not good at that.

Certain habit patterns, if they don't create suffering for yourself or others, may still persist. It's fine. You have your likes and dislikes without being totally consumed by them.

There's a sense of freedom on the surface. You might prefer this to that, but if it's not, that's fine too. You can pursue goals, but they're no longer egoically motivated, which means the delusion that you're going to be happy when you attain this goal, that goals.

And what happens is you're actually happy within the activity that is there towards the attainment of this goal. You find the doing fulfilling rather than hoping for some fulfillment in some future moment when you attain what you want, because getting what you want, that's already the end. What do you do then?

So you can be enjoying the doing, the activity. Stillness doesn't mean that you become passive. Yes, you become comfortable with sometimes just being, yes, but you don't become passive.

You are still active. Your aims are no longer determined by the shallow self, the ego. Your aims come from a deeper, from your deep eye, which may want to.

There's a deeper intelligence in you that goes far beyond the conditioning of your mind. And that is really universal intelligence, your aspect of that. The intelligence that underlies the entire sense-perceived universe, that which organizes form.

And so you can pursue goals that are in alignment with the deeper eye, not for some shallow personal satisfaction, which doesn't really come anyway. And when it comes from the deeper eye, you're not excessively attached to the outcome. You enjoy the present moment, the doing in the present moment.

And if you enjoy the doing in the present moment, that means you can sense the being that's in the background. You don't get lost in the doing. So you can do, but there is a stillness behind it.

One could say it's the center of the wheel. There is the wheel spinning, but the axis, the center of it is still. The central core of stillness within you.

And then you don't get frustrated when obstacles arise on your path to where you want to go to. You realize the arising of obstacles is inevitable. How do you respond to the obstacles?

And the way in which you respond to the obstacle is very different when you are connected to the deep eye. And sometimes the very obstacle forces you to connect more deeply, become more present. All the hindrances in your life have been wonderful.

They've taken you to this point. The challenges are absolutely necessary. The challenges arise from the world of form.

And eventually they awaken you to the formless dimension of consciousness within you, which is stillness. For most people, before they awaken to that dimension, the world of form, which is the world, has to become, or has to be recognized as unsatisfying. Either through loss, some kind of loss or diminishment, or through getting everything you wanted in the world of form, and then discovering that you're still unhappy.

So this is the adventure of the unfolding of consciousness on this planet, in this galaxy, through you. You are the consciousness of the universe, realizing its own nature, realizing itself. The universe wants to become more conscious.

So consciousness comes into this dimension through you and countless other life forms, of course. But there's the one consciousness. So you are ultimately not a person.

That's only a temporary appearance, a story, a dream-like thing. You are more essentially the awakening universe. Welcome to a question and answer session.

I will select a few in the moment. Let's see what happens.

My question, it's morphed a little bit, but I'll ask it. You've used analogy of either being in a body of water and fighting and going under versus sort of leaning back on the yes and floating and letting life support you. And I understand that our first and absolute purpose is to be present.

What I think I'm missing, the missing link for me, is how I tap into the presence, listen to the presence, so that I can lean back into the yes. How do I elicit something to say yes to?

Well, the first question is, are you able to say yes to the present moment at any given time? For example, this moment is okay, right?

[Speaker 2] (25:22 - 25:22)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (25:22 - 49:09)

So it's fine. Then you have to check when the so-called next moment comes. It's not the next, it's always now.

You have to see whether you can bring a yes to it, the inner yes. And then you find an alignment with it. You're not arguing with what is.

And then you have to check in as much as you can to see whether a resistance arises or you're mentally arguing with the present moment by saying you dislike it, you don't want to be in it, you want to be rather somewhere else and so on. So that gradually you become open to the present moment. And then there's a power that can then come through you.

We could call that also true intelligence, which is not the analytical intelligence, which is measured in our IQ tests, but true intelligence. When you are denying the present moment that this, the true intelligence cannot actually operate, the unconditioned intelligence, you could have many PhDs, but doesn't help. The true intelligence does then cannot operate, or only to get a trickle of it.

But it can only operate when you come into alignment with the present moment internally. So you surrender to what is, that's another word for it. And then without asking for results, and immediately saying, okay, I've been doing it for three days, and I still don't know.

Because if you're asking for results, you can become dissatisfied and impatient. No, first of all, it changes the way in which you experience life, which is already a huge benefit. It enhances the quality of your life.

Ultimately, quality of your life has to do with your state of consciousness, not where you live. That's a secondary thing. But ultimately, by aligning yourself with the present moment, something that I can only call quality comes in, and it's very hard to describe, you can only experience it.

As you bring that in, there's a, there's a rightness or goodness to this moment, no matter what form it takes. There's a, there's a quality that comes in. And then intelligence can operate.

And then that can operate as a sudden realization after a while, but don't look for it. Just your responsibility is to be aligned internally with presence. And then something may come, tell you what it is that you need to do if there's a doing, but your being is primary.

And this is being. And so whatever you need to do may suddenly come into your mind, or it may come because somebody makes a remark, and you suddenly say, oh, ah, now I know. Or life, through some coincidence, takes you somewhere, or brings somebody into your life that has an answer that's right for you.

Many things happen when you're no longer resisting the present moment. So that's the primary practice. So it's, you become almost, one could say, already you feel as if all those good things that perhaps you want to happen had already happened, or were already happening.

Because the true source of experiencing goodness is, it comes from within. If you cannot get in touch with the unconditioned, this is where you can sense that the good that is beyond good and bad, then nothing can help you. And then that's also, you know, there are books about how to manifest things in your life, books how to create, and so on.

Sometimes the emphasis in those books is too much on getting things. And the emphasis can be that, the implication can be that, when you get enough things, when you get all the things that you wanted, finally, your life will be full and complete. But that's not the case.

You might have heard the saying, there are two ways of being unhappy. One is not getting what you want, and the other is getting what you want. And this is very true.

That means, even if you get what you want, but you still haven't found the fundamentals of going deep enough within to experience, to know who you are beyond form. If you haven't gone there, no matter what you get, won't satisfy you. But once you know who you are, you know, you are the presence, your sense of identity is derived from presence.

You can create, or rather, because you're no longer the egoic presence, the presence itself may delight in creating something in your life. The presence may be joyfully creating something in your life. And the most powerful way of creating and being the co-creator of the one creator, the most powerful way of creating is, as Jesus already said, and many other teachings, to feel the joy and goodness of life now.

So it's as if you already had what it is that you want to create. So if you think having a nicer house or place to live, you want to create that, as long as you don't believe that that's going to make you happy because you feel already, let's not call it happiness, you feel already that joyful aliveness that is presence. And then you can, if that's what you want, create a house out of that because you already have it, basically.

The joy is already in you. It's become secondary whether or not you get it or not. Jesus said, whenever you ask for something, believe that you already have received it and it will be given to you.

This is the sentence that is the secret of all manifestation, is to feel that you already have it and then you can mentally hold the image and that gives power. But it also implies that you're no longer using that to make you happy. You're just participating in the act of creation.

It's a dance. Nothing is going to stay around forever. You have a house for a while and then it disappears, perhaps, or you disappear from it.

So you can participate in the dance of creation, joyfully, without falling into the erroneous assumption that something that you create is going to really fulfill you or make you happy. You have to find the fulfillment and happiness in the present moment. Then creation becomes easier.

And then also you're not going to create silly things that the ego would have told you before. You need that. I need to be a famous movie star to make it.

Well, maybe you will become a famous movie star, but to believe that you will find some kind of fulfillment and true happiness when you become this or that or obtain, attain this or that, that's the error. So if you feel already it's there, it doesn't really matter whether you get it or not. It's the icing on the cake.

So you have to go deep enough into life to experience life in its undiluted, I'm now calling it life, but I could say consciousness, to know yourself as that one life, as that one consciousness that can create anything. But once you've sensed that, the amount of things that you want to create will be far less than the dissatisfied ego, which needs a hundred things and still isn't happy. So Jesus, again, if you do want to create something and don't believe it's going to make you happy, feel as if you already had it, and then it comes.

It's just a game. It's not serious. It's a play of form, lila, the divine play.

You can play with it. And then that takes out the seriousness of the neediness. I need that.

If I don't get that, I'm unhappy. With that comes this playful quality, which includes enjoying things that come into your life. You enjoy them while they are there without needing to become obsessed with things.

You enjoy the occasional thing. I find it hard when I look at store windows. I sometimes quite enjoy looking at a few things, but I hardly ever see anything that I would want to get.

It's very hard for me to see anything that I want to buy, including clothes. So this is relatively new, but that took me a long time. I have one little weakness.

I love mechanical watches that tick. And this is a little paradox. People say, why do you wear a watch?

I felt a little better because the Dalai Lama has the same weakness for a watch. And I sometimes look at store windows to look at watches, but the good thing is these days the watches have become so big that I don't like them anymore. They're just so huge.

It's like wearing an alarm clock on your wrist. So it's strange how you can enjoy things, but just by looking at them, don't need to have it. You enjoy it just as much.

You look at it for 10 seconds or it's fine. Oh yes, I still occasionally like to buy books. I occasionally buy books, including sometimes a few old books that I like.

They smell nice and have a lovely presence to them. So those forms I enjoy, but it's relatively limited and that's fine. The ego has enormous amount of needs and feels unfulfilled if they are not met and feels unfulfilled when they are met.

So primary practice, presence, going deep enough, realizing who you are is the presence. And that is inherently satisfying. To know yourself as presence is actually the only truly satisfying thing in your life.

And any other satisfaction is really a reflection of that. When people are happy for a moment because they just obtained and the desire they had has just been fulfilled. They were just given it or they obtained the job they wanted.

They obtained the ideal partner. Ideal until after the honeymoon, of course. They got the ideal partner.

Then there's a desire has just been met and then they can actually feel joyful. They go, why is that? It's because for a moment the desire is gone.

It's been met. So what they really enjoy is not the thing. It comes from within because the desire has been removed that had obscured that.

That's been removed. So it's not the thing that they obtained that gives the joy. It's for a moment desire has been met and it's not like the thirst has been quenched.

And so for a moment you feel. And the mind thinks it's that thing that now makes me happy. No, it's the absence of desire that suddenly allowed you to feel the inherent joy, but then it doesn't last long.

The old pattern is still there. And the next thing I'm saying, oh, no, I need more. I need something else.

That's not it. I knew somebody who he bought an expensive car. And after a few months, it wasn't the right car.

And then he bought a Ferrari. And then all of that was, yeah. And after a few months, it doesn't feel right.

It's not, it wasn't, maybe it wasn't meant to have a Ferrari. And there was a third one. I can't remember what it was, whatever.

They're probably Italian. Lamborghini Testarossa or something like that. And then later he said, oh, it's the old pieces of junk, pieces of junk.

And when he said it, I remember the famous Rolling Stones song, I can't get no satisfaction. So it's when the desire has just been met, you feel that's all it is. But always the next thing comes and the next, there's nothing wrong with desire, but to be obsessed with things is dysfunctional.

I've been working for 13 years in an office and I feel that my job is boring and useless. I learned to surrender, but I'd like to change my job, but don't know where to apply. How can I find out what will give me joy and happiness and a feeling of meaningfulness?

Well, start with where you are rather than trying to get away from where you are. You start with always the present moment and you say you have surrendered, but have you surrendered enough? Have you truly surrendered?

So I suggest when you travel to work every morning, enter the state of presence rather than drifting off into thinking so that you're present every moment, whether you're driving or taking public transportation or walk to work, be there, absolute presence. And when you're at work, do one thing at a time and bring in spacious moments as much as possible. They could only be a few seconds, one spacious breath after you made a phone call, two spacious breaths.

And then when you go to have lunch, wherever it is, either you eat the lunch that you brought with you or you go to the restaurant or the canteen or again, present with every movement. So you use what otherwise would be a boring situation and just use it as the background for presence. So ultimately you're not looking for some satisfaction in the work, but you bring a different state of consciousness to it.

So in a way, your work situation becomes like a canvas. It's just an excuse for practicing presence. And you're lucky that you have a relatively boring job, gives you great opportunity for practice.

If you had a very stressful job that kept you in a state of excitement all day long, would be more difficult. So be thankful that life has given you something relatively boring. And then you make it interesting, not in the conventional sense of interesting, but you bring that the alertness to it.

So you're not working at the stock exchange shouting like a mad person, be on the computers. Now, if there's any stockbroker wanting to ask me a question, please do. That'll be a different answer.

I don't know what I'll say. There's a way there to what it is. I don't know until you ask a question, but yes, use the situation so that as you do that, discontent disappears.

And that is true surrender. You say you practice surrender, the questioner says, but if there's discontent, of course, there's still not complete surrender. There's still, I'd rather be somewhere else.

Or the mind telling you, it's been 13 years, how many more years to retirement? Oh, and then you start counting the years to retirement. So you're losing yourself in past and future.

And you're carrying the burden in your mind of past and future, missing the opportunity of the present moment, because it's not interesting enough, says the mind. So that's good practice. And you may find if you come into such an alignment with the present moment, you feel more alive, even within the routine activities.

There is then an added dimension of aliveness that comes in and you perform even the routine activities with a greater sense of aliveness. And it is often then that change comes into your life. When you align with the present moment, instead of trying to get away from it, internally align yourself with it, so that any kind of no to the present moment dissolves, an inner no.

And so you're so aligned that actually power begins to flow through. That's why I call that the power of now. It's the power of life itself begins to flow through you.

At first it flows into your routine activities. And the way in which you relate to your colleagues at work becomes more present, somewhat different. Some people may notice it, others may not.

And gradually the universe or life notices that you are in a different state of consciousness. And often it is then that change comes into your life, either through a chance event, or a chance encounter, or a sudden idea or realization comes into your head one morning, in whatever form it comes, or some drastic thing, like suddenly your company goes bust, the company that you worked for for so long, suddenly they close down. Everybody loses their job.

Wow, you're free. But you were free already because internally you already became free. So in what way change comes into your life, we don't know.

It is much more likely to come in, but you no longer depend on external change for your inner state. That's the main thing, that you don't depend on it anymore. And even if nothing else came into your life, you would continue practice until your last breath.

And your last breath would be a conscious breath. And you would have fulfilled your purpose on this planet in this form, which is to be a vehicle for consciousness to come into this world. So you don't need to depend.

You don't depend on anything. Change is more likely to come, yes, but the presence practice is not a means to an end. You're not practicing.

You say, okay, I'll practice, but if nothing happens within six weeks, I'll stop practicing. Or the lady, a churchgoing lady, who saw she lived in a house and outside her window, there was a hill that blocked the view of the ocean. So there's a little hill.

And of course, if that hill hadn't been there, her house would have been worth much more. So because of that hill, her house wasn't worth that much. But in church, she heard, if you only have a face as big as a mustard seed, you can sail to this mountain, move from here to there, and it will move for you.

She heard that in church, Jesus said. And then she said, oh, okay, I only have a hill there, so I can let's see. And said, okay, I'm going to believe that this hill is going to move.

And then tomorrow morning, I'll open the curtains and see what happens. So she, in the morning, she got up and opened the curtains, and the hill was still there. And she said, oh, I knew it wasn't going to work.

That's the face. So to all of you who are bored at work, there may be quite a few, make it into a spiritual practice, a consciousness practice. Bored at work also means you're not particularly challenged at work.

And in the absence of life challenges, there's always the danger that you fall below thought, and you come into a routine, what you think it's acceptance, but you're really falling below thought, and you go to work, and there's a decrease in your sense of alertness and aliveness, and you become dull, and you go. And sometimes you see people who've been working in the same place for a long time, they have not, it's just, that's not surrender or presence. They've just gone below thought, not risen above.

So happy practice, present moment, be here now, as Ram Dass says, and really that is the answer, and find the joy that is in knowing who you are, consciousness. We'll take a moment of stillness. If anybody's still thinking, feel the inner body, the aliveness, feel the aliveness in your legs, your arms, your hands, and feel yourself breathing, that creates inner space, and then sense the presence behind it all.

And that presence is not something other than you, it is essentially who you are.

Liberation from the mind. In this podcast, Eckhart talks to a live audience. He says the beginning of liberation is when you realize you are not the thinker.

He says many people derive their identity from what the mind tells them. For those who have not yet awakened, that is where they find their sense of self. We free ourselves when we begin to realize there's a vast realm of intelligence beyond thought.

And the things that truly matter, joy, love, inner peace arise beyond the mind.

The liberation is the liberation from believing that this is essentially who you are. That dimension of the mind ultimately, the mental emotional entity, the conditioned mental emotional entity. And the liberation is when you realize the deeper I am or the deep I, and you're then increasingly as this is realized more in your life, more frequently, the space that this deep inner space emerges where you become still, but very present and alert in that stillness.

And then you begin to realize that is something that doesn't need any defense and doesn't need to be enhanced because it already exists in a state of fullness, which we could also call emptiness because emptiness means it has no form. So on that level, you need nothing. And when you are connected with that level, this moment is perfect as it is when you live from that level.

Now there's the level, the surface level on the surface, you may have to take action here and there on the surface of reality, but while you take action, there comes an alignment with the isness of things, because remember, is is the third person of I am, of am, it is, same thing. So there comes an alignment with the isness of things, which and the isness of things is inseparable from the present moment, an inner alignment with the isness of things. That is, you no longer argue with what is internally.

And then if you don't argue with what is, already the false self begins to crumble because it sustains itself to a large extent by arguing with what is on almost continuous inner resistance to whatever is in the present moment. That keeps the egoic self alive. Complaining does it, for example, where's the next thing I can complain about?

Oh yeah, there's something wrong, something wrong. Oh, this guy there, you know what he said? And then I said, you know what he, he didn't even have the decency of, so I told him what I thought of him, stories, stories, stories.

So you become liberated from what some traditions call the false self, I wouldn't necessarily even call it the false self, it's the surface self. But your sense of who you are comes from a deeper place. And then the surface self is fine.

It's, it's your form identity. As a form identity, you're never going to be perfect because the form exists in the world of polarities. If you become good at one thing, then it probably means that you become bad at something else.

You can develop, you can become a great sports person and break many records, but then you won't be solving problems of molecular physics. You know nothing about molecular physics. And the molecular physicist can't even jump one meter.

Oh no, I can't. So you always encounter limitations, as of course you do. So once you are able to access that dimension, it feels so, such a heavy weight lifting of you.

And what is that weight? It's the weight of what the Buddha calls the self, which he said is an illusion, the weight of yourself, the self, the surface self. There's nothing wrong with the self except when it becomes a foundation for your sense of identity.

And then it still continues to exist as your form identity. It is no longer the egoic self. The difference between your form identity and your ego is simply, ego is complete identification with your form identity.

And once that no longer happens, form identity is still there, but your sense of self comes from a deeper place. And then your form identity is no longer ego. It's just your form identity.

And the strange thing is that then these two dimensions can operate in your life, not as separate, but as in a relationship, the same relationship that the ripple has with the ocean or the wave on the surface of the water as with the ocean. That's the relationship between your surface self and your deep I, the surface I and the deep I. They are ultimately not separate.

The surface I is a manifestation of consciousness in the same way that the ripple on the surface of the ocean is a manifestation of the ocean, but they're not separate. It's only when the ripple is unaware that it is the ocean, then there's a sense of separateness, which ultimately, of course, is an illusion. And this realization of yourself as the deep I is so freeing, liberating that you feel a sense of, ah, I'm free of myself.

And then you have a compassionate attitude towards your form identity. And the form identity becomes less crazy because a form identity that is unconscious, is the ego, is crazy ultimately, even if it has areas where it can function. But there's always an element of craziness waiting somewhere.

And certain situations bring it out. You might've noticed it in people around you. I lived in a house in the countryside in England for a few years, and I had little income, so I had to rent out two rooms.

And I had a number of various people who were staying for a few months. It was a town where people kind of didn't stay forever. They passed through.

A town that attracts strange people like myself. It's called Glastonbury. So I lived there, climbing the tall hill every day.

It was wonderful. And I had tenants in my house, maybe altogether over the three or four years I was there, maybe 10, 12, 10, or 12. And with the exception of two, so let's say there were 12.

With the exception of two, the other 10 turned out to be quite crazy. But you didn't notice it at first. It's only when you start to live with people, you might have found that also.

When you start to live with somebody, after a while, something emerges in them. Sometimes it's a pain body. Sometimes it's some other mental dysfunction that's hiding in some corner of their minds.

And it comes out when it gets triggered by certain situations. And some people are so subject to mood swings that we shared a kitchen. And whenever in the morning at breakfast, I heard the footsteps coming down from a tenant, you never knew who was going coming down the stairs, a lovely, happy person or some angry monster.

And two did not manifest craziness. So the unobserved mind is crazy in one way or another. Of course, in some cases, extremely crazy.

But by the way, I'm using crazy because very soon it'll belong to the growing number of words that are politically incorrect. So I'm using it as much as possible until I can't use it anymore. What do you mean crazy?

I feel insulted by crazy. You're judging people. Well, that's true.

But then on the other hand, 200 million humans killed by other humans in the first half of the 20th century alone. That's crazy. Okay, I've said it one more time.

So your form identity begins to operate a bit more smoothly. And there's a connectedness with a deep eye. The mind, your mind becomes informed often by this other intelligence that is deeper but non-conceptual.

And then it uses your mind. It can use your mind in whatever way. So we are here to practice more this other way of knowing that comes from the deep eye.

We are educated. Most of you, some of you have PhDs. And if you're unlucky, you even have two PhDs.

So we don't need to here train the analytical mind or memory. There's nothing wrong with that. There are courses you can take and books you can read.

That's all fine. It has its place. And we're not here to increase knowledge.

We are here to access non-conceptual knowing. So there's the knowing through concepts, mental analysis and judgment. And that you do, for example, when you perceive things and you label them mentally because you know what they are, or you think you know, you can meet another human being.

And after a minute, you've already formed an opinion about that person. And if somebody asked me, what do you think of that person? You will immediately tell, well, I think he's...

whatever it is. Of course, you may have deep insight into the makeup of other people. But in many cases, the opinion that you have of others are a reflection of who you are.

And in many cases have absolutely nothing to do with them. That's another matter. They're more telling of who you are.

And you know the saying, you don't see things as they are, you see them as you are. So which means you see them through the conditioning of your mind, the screen. And that is knowing things through concepts.

And here we want to step out of that and practice knowing things through awareness or through presence, which means you don't apply thought. And that is your practice, especially here on the retreat, but for the rest of your life too. As much as you can, as you perceive things, the beauty of nature, other humans around you, or see and you breathe in, you smell, you hear the sounds, you sense the air, the breeze on your skin, all those perceptions.

And your practice is to, as much as possible, refrain from formulating an opinion or judgment. Just be the awareness through which the perception happens. Then you're living from the deep eye.

And occasionally, of course, certain thoughts will come into your head, but then may be able to recognize them as just part of your conditioned thinking. It's no longer a problem. And you no longer completely believe in every thought that comes into your head.

In other words, you no longer get taken over by every thought that comes into your head, hijacked, kidnapped, kidnapped by every thought that comes into your head. And that goes away with you. And then you talk about in your head out loud.

An example I give, you can walk through a forest here. You can look around at some birds, there are trees, there's a little bit of snow left here and there on the ground. And you can contemplate these things through applying your knowledge, because you might know the name of the tree, the name of the bird and all kinds of things.

Or you can bring a simple awareness to your perception and know it in that way. An example I give is very early on when I went through this transition of consciousness, I began to realize that this other way of knowing. I was visiting a cathedral in England.

It's not very well known, but it's magnificent. It's north of Cambridge. I don't know how far, half an hour, one hour drive.

It's called Ely, E-L-Y. It's the name of the town. It is a very ancient cathedral.

And I walked in there and walked around for 15, 20 minutes going like, wow. And then I walked out. It was an incredible, wonderful experience, that space.

Somebody later asked me a question about it. I didn't know what to answer. Because I knew nothing about this cathedral.

I experienced it only through presence in a very deep way. Now, if I had had a guidebook, or even more so a recording that you can carry that you rent and you put the earpiece in your ear, and it's a guided tour, you press a button and it tells you, okay, now step five steps further, you will see a statue of so and so. This is very interesting.

And that the architectural style and then this section was built in the 12th century. And this was so interesting, very interesting. But it's a totally different way of experiencing this cathedral.

And there's a place for it. If that's the only way in which you can experience things, you're very limited. And you are not very deep.

And you don't experience things in a deep way. Which means you don't experience other humans in a deep way either. And you don't even experience yourself in a deep way.

Everything is surface. There is a place for that kind of knowledge. But if you're trapped in that dimension alone, it's extremely limiting.

Ideally, you would have both. So you go experience that place without any knowledge, through awareness. And there's a depth, you know it, but not you can't say much about it.

Maybe later you could write a poem about it. It's possible. Because that's how creative poems use language creatively.

They have to operate first of all from bare experience. And then later they sit down and then some words may arise. If you could do both, that's a balancing act.

You learn a lot about whatever this place has, the works of art that are in it, or whatever it may be. Or the forest, the trees. But you are not compulsively trapped in that dimension only.

So you are, if you choose to experience it, not through conceptual knowledge you're able to do it. Even though you may have the conceptual knowledge. That's the advanced art of living.

But here we emphasize not knowledge. You're not here to acquire more knowledge. Because there's enough of that in the world.

All you have to do is go to your computer or your iPad and you have infinite knowledge at your fingertips. And it's not going to save you. And it's not going to save the world.

You can increase knowledge and it's increasing continuously. But it's not going to save the world from destroying itself. Only the deeper dimension, if that comes in.

And so it can only come through you. So here you experiment with the beautiful state of not knowing from a conceptual point of view. But there is a deep knowing in that.

Practice it with human beings. Look at them and just be the presence. You can look into their eyes while they talk.

And sense, while you look, sense your own presence, the underlying presence. And if you can sense your own so-called, it's not your own, I'm just using those words. If you can sense your own presence, you can sense their presence or deep eye that is, one could say, underneath the personality.

And then there's a deep connection with the other. And then the other is no longer totally other. And that's wonderful.

And then there's an outflow of goodwill towards the so-called other from you, because you no longer want anything from him or her. You simply enjoy the beingness of the other because you enjoy your own beingness. And so finally, we've come to the word joy.

The joy of being arises from the realization of being. The realization of being inherently is joyful, but it's only one word you could use. As some of you or many of you probably know, in Indian spirituality, that state of connectedness with being is described with three words that are strung together as if they were one word.

And they come from Sanskrit. And the three words that are strung together, the first is sat, S-A-T, which means being. The second word is chit, C-H-I-T, which means consciousness.

And the third word is ananda, A-N-A, A-N-A-N-D-A, ananda, which means joy or bliss, joy. Now that you put these three words together, because then they become one word, sat, chit, ananda, being, consciousness, joy. There are three aspects or facets of that state of connected, inner connectedness that is the deep eye.

Being means because being, consciousness means consciousness of being, being becoming self-conscious is inherently joyful, sat, chit, ananda. And this is a term that's existed for thousands of years in India. More practical tips so that you don't get distracted too much while you take your attention more deeply while you're here.

Take your attention more deeply into being or into attention itself, purely practical. Don't turn on the TV in your room, please. I have not installed hidden cameras to check on you.

Second, limit your interaction, the interaction with your devices. If you cannot eliminate interaction with your devices completely, and I understand that you may not survive if you do, at least put aside just maybe once a day, 15 minutes, when you check your, whatever it is that comes through, whatever text, email, Facebook, Snapchat, Tinder. It's all very important, but there's something more important and that's why you're here.

So now let's see, I suggest to you that you make an agreement with yourself not to go there any more than is absolutely necessary. And I mean, if you occasionally you have, you get it out and to take a photo is okay, but also don't interact with things around you only through imagining what it would look like as a photo on your phone and then say, okay, I'm going to fully experience this beautiful thing when I get home and look at my photos. In the meantime, I'm more interested in taking this photo because that's what the, there's a species that has developed out of Homo sapiens, a branch species called Homo turisticus.

And they, they walk around continuously with either camera or something. You see them every day, they come in buses. And then in the evening, the Homo turisticus goes home mostly.

And then you are left here and you might notice it becomes quite still outside at this time. And the days are very, very long here. You may find that unusual if you come from a more Southern place that there's still daylight around even at 1030, there's still light in the sky.

So, and then it becomes very still here. So you can walk along the lake or just wherever you are and just be, become aware of that, that surrounding stillness. And as you become aware of the surrounding stillness, of course you become still yourself.

And if you are still, it means you're not thinking or very little thinking. And it means you're aware. It means you're present.

It means you are living through the deep eye. So use nature that is around you, live through the deep eye. And during the daytime, if you're walking and there's lots of, there's a long weekend here and tomorrow is a holiday in Canada here.

So there's more tourists, Homo turisticus than usual. And if you get upset by the fact that there are so many tourists walking around, then you just practice this beautiful spiritual practice of acceptance of the is-ness of this moment. And immediately you become still too without needing external silence, complete acceptance of this moment, including the tourists.

And you're still, oh, I don't know how tourists will develop in the future as a species. In Thailand, just near Bangkok, they interviewed some near a Buddhist monastery. They interviewed some farmers and farm workers.

They would give food to the monks. That's the tradition in Buddhism in Thailand, in the South, Theravada tradition of Buddhism. The monks come with their begging bowls every morning.

They just stand there. And then the local people come and put food. They are dependent.

It's done on purpose. There's a wisdom behind it. All the Westerners would say, why don't they work for a living?

The monks stand there with their begging bowls. And then the poor people who hardly have enough themselves, they come and put some food, a bit of rice, whatever, in the begging bowl. And the monks just stand.

They don't say thank you, because it's a privilege for you to give food to the monks. That's part of the tradition. So the Westerners interviewed the farm workers.

They, why do you give your food to the monks when you have so little yourself? And they began talking to each other. Well, because we want a better incarnation next time.

So we are accumulating merit. So next time we come, we are born into a better condition. And then the Westerner asked, so what do you want to come back as in your next lifetime?

And then they talked amongst each other. And finally, the agreement was, we want to come back as tourists. Because they observe these people step out of their buses.

They're well-dressed. And some are obviously so privileged that they are quite big bodies, which means they have plenty of money. They can eat as much as they like.

So that's a great thing. And then they do all kinds of things. They seem to have sex all the time.

And so it's a great thing. So wouldn't it be great in my next lifetime to spend my whole lifetime as being a tourist? They don't realize it would be a dreadful nightmare.

Oh, yes. One more practical thing. Intoxicating beverages.

There's no prohibition here on anything. There's just a recommendation. And that is to refrain as much as possible from intoxicating.

If English is not your native language, it means alcohol. Refrain as much as possible from intoxicating beverages. However, if you cannot enjoy a dinner without a glass of wine, then you can have a glass of wine.

One glass of wine would not unduly interfere with the arising presence in you, but two might, and three will. Unless you are really already deeply engaged in presence, deeply rooted in presence, in which case you wouldn't even want to drink too much, and you certainly wouldn't get drunk. So as little as possible, I recommend none at all would be great.

But since everybody here is spiritually advanced, if you do have a glass of wine, you will not be judged. So we've talked about the distractions on the external level, television, devices, intoxicating beverages, or other intoxicating substances. I would advise against it, at least here.

And never indulge even when you're not here. As you probably know, I've already mentioned, I tried it a couple of times. I have to because people ask me questions about it.

I cannot answer if I haven't tried it. It wasn't that great. I prefer my normal state of consciousness.

It felt a little bit almost oppressive. But I can see a person who is tortured on a daily basis by their mind. It can be a relief to have a smoke.

But here we have something better. We're not falling below thinking. We are rising above thinking.

And that is the next step in human evolution. As you rise above thinking, you don't need to fall below thinking anymore because you become liberated from your mind in the dimension that is transcendent to thought. So, and another practice, of course, here is the moment-to-moment practice of accepting the is-ness of the present moment.

That's a powerful way of, and a quick way of going beyond the surface self, the egoic self, which means stop complaining either internally or externally. Of course, if there's something that needs to be changed, of course you go to the reception or you make a phone call if suddenly there's water coming through the ceiling. I hope, hopefully I'm not manifesting it by talking about it.

There's water coming through the ceiling and the mattress and you are on it and getting drenched. You don't say, accept what is, stay on the bed. Eckhart said, don't complain.

So that's not the practice. But it does mean that when you finally go to the telephone and tell them what happened, it's not done in a complaining manner that says, how dreadful this place is, how can you allow something like this to happen to me? This is dreadful.

That strengthens the ego. No, you just explain what is and what can we do about it? And in the meantime, you surrender to the fact that you're wet.

That's what is. In my very early stages when I was beginning to kind of read, not teach, but I realized after my transition, couple of years after, friends that I had, in a subtle way, they turned into kind of students of mine, which was very weird. So there was one friend that lived in almost continuous discontent with the state of things.

And then I talked to him a bit about many things. I only realized when people like that asked me questions and sometimes I became still because I didn't know the answer, never know the answer beforehand. But then because there was a demand, a question had been asked, out of the stillness, the answer came.

So he must have asked certain things and then the answer came and then he kind of said, oh, what do you mean by that? So there was a kind of spiritual awakening. And one day he arrived where we are going to meet on a, everybody had a bicycle there and it was raining.

It was totally drenched. And he came in and said, oh, totally wet. I didn't complain it at all.

He said, the wet I became, I just, I became a duck and it was totally fine. That might've not been the best example because ducks don't get wet inside. It's, therefore we have the expression water off the duck's back.

But anyway, I know what he meant, which means he became totally one with that arising condition.

[Speaker 2] (33:44 - 33:46)

From Eckhart Tolle. Thank you for listening.

Eckhart Tolle Life Without Unnecessary Suffering [43c4d8cd-f7c4-4969-9168-f55efdbbf81c]

Life without unnecessary suffering. In this episode, Eckhart sits down with an audience in Paris. He encourages participants to explore the experience of his talk, beyond the words, because it holds the seeds to awakening.

He also talks about the obstacles presented by the ego, which he illustrates with the ancient Greek myth of Narcissus, a beautiful young man who drowned in a pool of water, gazing at his own reflection. Eckhart explains there's a deep truth to this which is still relevant today. He says we risk a similar fate if we identify too closely with the ego and its insatiable demands.

He ponders the possibility of resisting the pull to turn life's difficulties into suffering. He explains that challenges will continue, but we don't have to turn every problem into unhappiness. Eckhart asks the audience to consider, is it possible to go through life without creating unnecessary suffering for ourselves and others?

It has taken a long time, but finally I'm speaking here in France and in Paris, and I'm very happy to be here with all of you. Our evening operates on two levels. One is the conventional level, words are spoken, concepts, mental concepts, and to some extent you can understand those concepts.

You listen, you understand, but the essence of our evening does not happen on a conceptual level. Conceptual understanding of what I'm talking about will not be enough to make this evening enjoyable for you. Conceptual understanding will not be enough.

It is more a question of inviting you by using concepts as signposts, inviting you to actually experience for yourself or realize for yourself what it is that I'm talking about. And what it is that I'm talking about is a certain dimension of consciousness in you that is awakening or is just at the point of being ready to awaken. And most humans on the planet don't even know that such a dimension exists, although all the ancient spiritual teachers have pointed to it and spoken about it.

And in most humans, it is only a potential, a dormant potential, but not in you because you have come here. Something has drawn you here. So we could say that the subject matter of this evening is really you.

I'm going to talk ultimately about you and I will be pointing to something in you that is easily overlooked, but is of extraordinary importance if you want to live a fulfilled and meaningful life instead of a life that is full of frustration and ultimately suffering. A life that is experienced, in the words of Churchill, who was actually talking about history, one damn thing after another, one damn thing after another. So the story, if we go back to the beginning, the story of you, let's travel back in time to a prehistoric mythological time where we encounter a young man going for a walk in the woods.

And his name, according to ancient Greek mythology, is Narcissus. He looked into the pond and he saw his own reflection in the pond. And he was amazed at the beauty of his own reflection.

Now you might think, is that perhaps a very ancient prophecy of the selfie? Can't take my eyes off it. No, it was not a prophecy of the selfie, but there's a connection, of course, there is a connection.

This is the glass surface of the selfie. And here we have the reflection of his own image in the water. That story in mythology often expresses a deep truth, which otherwise humans would not understand or could not express in any abstract way.

The truth needs to be embedded in a story. And this is, there's a very deep truth here that points to the arising of a mentally created self image that people have and live with. So it's almost as if you had a phantom that walks with you wherever you go, that is your mind created image or concept of who you are.

And that is what we call the ego. The ego is a mental image conditioned by the past, conditioned by your environment and many other factors, a mental image, a conceptual sense of self that you identify with so completely that you disappear in it and live through it. You believe that that is who you are.

And that is the conditioned mind-made self. It consists of layers, different layers. At the most fundamental level, first of all, everybody identifies, first of all, with your physical body.

That's the most fundamental level of identification. You believe that you are the body, you identify with the body that you are. And the body, of course, already is a problematic thing to identify with because you compare this body, that you say, I am this body, this physical form, and then you compare to others.

And it can be a source of pride if your body is better looking or stronger than most other bodies. The ego gets in there and feels inflated, greater. It can also be a source of suffering or shame if your body is not the way you think it should be or society tells you it should be, or when you compare it to others, it's not as strong or as beautiful.

You suffer. You have a sense of self that feels less than. On the other side, you might have a sense of self that feels more than.

But I can see how people who are good-looking or strong or both, how easy it is for them to seek a large part of their identity in their external appearance. And that can be fine for a while, but inevitably, of course, what is a source of pleasure for some years, gradually and perhaps even quickly turns into a source of suffering because the body does not last. And a day comes when you look in the mirror and the mirror image is no longer the same as it was 10 or 20 or 30 years ago, especially if you have a photo of yourself next to the mirror.

Something went very wrong here. And then it becomes a source of suffering. Now in our civilization, there are repair jobs that you can do that for a while will help you feel you're still okay and good-looking, but inevitably you suffer, begin to suffer more and more because who you think you are is diminishing.

Your sense of self-worth is diminishing and that's a source of great suffering. And of course, humans who identified with a negative body image, they are suffering already when they are young. They don't have to wait until the body grows old.

So we have identification with the body and then you put clothes on the body, of course, that they become an extension of the body and they can add something. They can hide things. They can conceal things that don't look so good or they can enhance things that look good.

And then it's nice when people are looking at me. It feels good to the ego. This is, I call it form identity, form, physical form.

And that's only the beginning of your form identity. Now we go on to what you identify with on the level of the mind, because here we have a huge set of thoughts, images, and narratives that continuously go through your head that are the result of environment, the culture you grow up in, even the language that you grow up with is more than just a communication tool. The language that you grow up with conditions you already to behave in a certain way.

And so you are recognizable to many people then as, oh, there's a French person. Others can recognize, or there's an Italian, there's an Englishman. They can sometimes easily be recognized because of that conditioning.

So you get a, gradually thoughts arise as a child grows up, begins to grow up. The child learns language. The child asks questions.

What is this? What is that? Gradually concept form in the mind of the child.

And with certain concepts, the child identifies. Identify mean it gives you your sense of who you are. It gives you your sense of self.

My toy is one of the first things. This is my toy. This is the beginning of the ego.

You cannot stop it. You cannot tell a child, don't say my toy. It's your ego.

The child has to go through that stage. The ego ideally is a stage that people grow out of as they grow up. However, that's mostly is not the case.

Unfortunately, most humans never grow out of it. So my toy, remove a toy from a child that the child has called my, creates enormous suffering. The child will cry and or scream as if you had torn a limb.

You had torn something off the child's body. And of course, if that has not happened, five minutes later, the child would have lost interest in it completely. So it is not the toy that causes the suffering.

It is a mental concept of toy that the child identifies with that causes the suffering. And that is the beginning. Then, of course, the child also is told a name.

The child identifies with a name. This is one of the first things a child is taught. You are John or whatever typical French name might be.

Pierre. Je suis Pierre. Qui es-tu?

Je suis Pierre. Now I know who I am. It's a concept.

And the concept is endowed with a sense of self. And the concept is the thought. But it's not an ordinary thought.

It's a thought that has a sense of self in it. And this is why we use the term identify. You derive your identity from that particular thought.

And once you have this thought, which is a thought form, another aspect of your form identity, then other things begin to accumulate around the name of who you are. Possessions. Toys is possessions.

Then other things accumulate. Things that you can do. Things that others cannot do.

Things that you know that others don't know. Things that your parents have and other parents don't have. And then gradually more and more things begin to accumulate around the central core of the conceptual self.

And as you then grow up, before you know it, you live through this mind-made sense of self. And you begin to develop a narrative. And you call this narrative me and my life.

That's my life. That's me. And that's your history.

Your personal history. And things in your personal history that you strongly identify with. Things that happened to you.

And especially things that other people did to you. Your parents, for example. And there's no childhood that is free of suffering.

There are always people who do things to you. So you have this sense of self that is based on your personal history. And all the things that are the conditioning of who you are.

Your culture. Your collective conditioning. Not only your country.

It might be your religion. It might be many other things that you identify with as me. That's me.

That is I. And then as you grow up, you continue to live through a conceptual reality of yourself that is revived by thinking about it and talking about it. And for most people, it's a very problematic sense of self.

There's no ego that is not problematic. And the ego, that mind-made sense of self, always has a sense of lack. Something is still missing.

Something is not right. I don't know what it is, but many people have the feeling they need to arrive somewhere, but they have not arrived yet. Other people have the feeling that their life has not quite started yet.

They are still getting ready to live. They're looking forward to a point in the future where my life actually takes off. When is it going to?

It's certainly not this, where I live now, the work I'm doing now, who I'm with, but that can't be my life. I'm waiting, as the English expression goes. I don't know how they translate that.

I'm waiting for my break, my big break. I'm waiting for it to make it. And of course, there are people who reach the age of 65 and 70 and say, it never started.

My life never started. I've always been waiting for something, both on a small scale, waiting for the weekend or the next vacation, on a larger scale, waiting for the fulfilling, the ultimately fulfilling relationship, the ultimately fulfilling financial situation, the ultimately fulfilling living situation. I've been waiting for it, and occasionally I thought I had arrived, but it always turned out to be an illusion.

I have spoken to some famous people who tell me that after they became famous, for a while they felt elated. Their ego grew and grew. And then something happened, and they were even more unhappy than before, because there was still that sense of, that's not it.

And they realized that the image that other people had of them was a complete illusion. What the newspapers wrote about them was complete illusion. And so there was this sudden realization that this is not who I am, but who am I?

And then they either take drugs in order to dull the pain, to desensitize themselves to the pain, or they opened up to the deeper dimension of who they are. So let's look for a moment at your life, which is a thing probably of great interest to you. Your life, there's not a single person in this room whose life is not problematic and challenging.

There's no doubt that life is difficult. There's nobody for whom life is not difficult. And if your life were not difficult, in other words, if you were not challenged by life, that would turn into the greatest difficulty.

If you were not challenged by life, then that lack of challenge would become your greatest challenge. But there are very few people, it never lasts for long. You might have a trust fund from your parents or grandparents.

You may have enough money and you never need to work, look for a job, have a nice house already when you're 20, and a great car when you're 20. And you can go wherever you want and there you are. And you would find that this life would become deeply unfulfilling after a few years.

And then that will turn into your challenge. So there's no getting away from the fact that life will always challenge you. Okay, we need to let go of the belief, the unspoken belief that this should not be happening, that there should be no problems in my life.

There are many people who feel that they have personally been singled out by the universe or by God or some malevolent entity to make their lives difficult. I was one of those. I was deeply identified with negative thoughts and whenever something bad happened to me, it already started when I was 16.

Whenever something bad happened to me, I had a thought and that thought would say, of course, bad things always happen to me, always to me. Look at these people, how happy they are. Everything bad always happens to me.

And it did. So the challenges are actually the most important thing in your evolution. Life seems to put obstacles in your path.

I want to get there, but now something is blocking me. There is an obstacle on my path and life does it all the time. Just the moment you think, now I'm there, I made it, I got this great job now, then something else goes wrong in your relationship or your physical body or somebody close to you suddenly has a huge problem or living situation or there's a huge marital thing, your wife falls in love with somebody else.

There's always something to interfere with a smooth functioning. You cannot have all the things that make up your life functioning smoothly, simultaneously. Living situation, work situation, financial situation, health situation, whatever else, maybe all your children are happy and doing very well and you can travel and your body's totally and perfectly healthy and everything is just fantastic.

Well, it could happen for a little while, not long, if you say, yes, I'm one of those people that you're talking about. This has happened in my life. Just wait a little and see what happens then.

So to demand internally that life should leave you alone, don't put obstacles in my path. This is not how the universe functions. Every life form experiences challenges from the smallest life form, even a plant or a little animal.

The moment they are born, they're confronted with challenges. And it's only by being confronted with challenges that evolution happens. If you were not confronted or any life form were not confronted with challenges, life on this planet or any other planet would not evolve and your life would not evolve.

And everybody here is here because you have experienced challenges. You have suffered. You have been unhappy.

And to some extent you might still be, but you're seeing the possibility of transforming the challenges of life into suffering. The challenges will not stop. But the question is, are you internally, because of your mental conditioning, transforming every challenge, the little one, the big one, transforming every problem and every challenge that life throws at you, transforming it into unhappiness, into misery, into suffering, what the Buddha called dukkha, which is translated as suffering, unhappiness, misery, unsatisfactoriness, whatever you want to call it. Now, here we come to the possibility, not of being free of challenges.

If you demand that of the universe or of God, you will be very disappointed and condemned to continuous frustration. No, not demanding that life should not be challenging anymore, but realizing the possibility of no longer transforming the challenges of life into unhappiness or suffering. This is something worth exploring.

Is it possible to go through life without creating suffering for yourself? Now, that's already a strange way of speaking about it, because it's always seems that the unhappiness in your life is created by circumstances around you. Everybody believes that, of course, this particular situation is making me unhappy.

And in many, many cases, the circumstances that make you unhappy are to do with people, because people are so difficult. You might have noticed. So for many people, other people, whether it's relationship or at work, this is a huge source of suffering for many people because other people are making your life difficult, which of course is why John Paul Sartre said, hell is les autres, which is translated into English as other people.

Hell is these people there. But of course, it can come in many forms. Now, a very interesting experiment, you start on a small scale with little suffering, which normally would not even be recognized as suffering.

As you might realize in modern life, there are many frustrating things. And I could take any of the many frustrating things that you encounter in modern life, for example, even just wanting to talk to your bank on the phone. But there's no, you cannot reach, I don't know if it's the same here, you cannot reach a human being.

You can only reach pre-recorded messages. And then you go, select this, select this. And finally, you think, okay, to talk to somebody, press zero after 10 minutes.

And then there's a waiting period now of 25 minutes. But already you've built up an enormous amount of frustration and irritation. Irritation is a small form of suffering.

It could happen at the, also another place where you can encounter this minor suffering is at airports or in traffic. These are when you get irritated. This is not usually recognized as suffering, but it is a small form of suffering.

And somebody who gets irritated several times a day over a period of years builds up an enormous amount of unresolved suffering within him or her. They build up. And then the irritation becomes part of your ego.

And you go through life just waiting for the next thing to be irritated about, because it strengthens your fictitious sense of self or the ego. And the moment you react, the ego gets inflated. Perhaps we've all met people like that.

There's nobody here like that, of course, because otherwise you wouldn't have come here. Or if there is, if you recognize it in yourself right now, that's a wonderful thing. That's self-recognition.

You might be totally irritated with me. Well, that's a great thing to opt to realize that you are irritated with the speaker. Why?

Because he hasn't said anything significant yet. So now you experiment with a small form of suffering. Let's, let's, you know, be on the telephone or at the airport or in the traffic jam.

And you get, how does the suffering arise? You need to have some awareness to ask yourself, how does this arise? Well, the mind says, well, because of this thing that's happening here, these people are totally incompetent.

Or the, the traffic, which are, I live in this, why am I living here? And this just is so, all the fumes and the traffic, it's so dreadful. And then you look more closely, is, is this situation causing you the suffering?

Or is it something that you add to the situation? What, what is it that you add to the situation? What you add to the situation is certain thoughts.

And those thoughts are not pleasant. These thoughts are saying, this should not be happening. Or they are saying, I don't want to be here.

Or they are saying, I want to be somewhere else. Or they say, this is such a dreadful situation. I can't stand it anymore.

I just can't stand it. I can't stand this. And suddenly you wake up, something else arises, awareness.

Awareness of your own thought processes. That is awakening. That is spiritual awakening, the beginning of it.

When you become aware of the voice in the head, instead of being identified with a voice in the head, there is an awareness. And you're in this situation and suddenly you see, okay, how would I experience this situation if I did not add those thoughts to it? If I just let it be without the addition of certain thoughts that are saying that this should not be happening, I don't want to be here, whatever they say.

That's a good experiment. And then in this experiment, you drop the thoughts for a moment. So there you are, let's say you're at the airline counter waiting to check in, and you've been standing there for 25 minutes.

It might even say the flight is delayed by three hours, or nobody's telling you anything. And there you are getting very irritated and say, okay, I'm not adding any thought to this moment. And I'm just experiencing this moment as it is.

And suddenly you're experiencing this moment as it is. What is it that you're experiencing? You're experiencing yourself as standing there, breathing, perceiving, visual perception.

You look around, humans, lights, people moving here and there, and can feel your body. Perhaps there's a little pain in the body because you've been standing there for a while, but that's not suffering. It's a little pain in the body.

So there you are. And suddenly you feel, well, this situation is not actually as bad as my mindset it was. That's weird.

And then you realize, actually, it's not bad at all. It just is the way it is. You no longer add mental baggage to the situation.

And you take this moment as it is. If you can take action, of course you take action. If you say, okay, I'm standing in this lineup at the airline counter.

I've been standing here for 25 minutes. Maybe there's a better lineup. I can move there.

If you can do something, you do it. But if there's no possibility of changing the situation, this is what is. So to argue internally, to argue with what is, is something that strengthens the egoic sense of self.

Because this mind made sense of self needs to have enemies. It needs to fight against this and that and that, because then it feels this boundary of me more strongly. It needs opposition.

It needs antagonism. So that's unconscious. The ego gets stronger when you complain mentally.

And the egos, you feel you are morally superior to the situation. When you complain about a person, you're obviously more superior to that person. You know what he did?

And you know what he said to me? And then I said to him, and then how can he do such a thing? Of course, not all the stories that you tell.

And the interesting thing about the stories that the ego tells is that you are always right and the others are always wrong. Isn't that strange? I'm always right.

Other people are always wrong. I hadn't realized that. I must be superior to everybody.

But of course, that's the ego. We remove a huge amount of suffering from life and unhappiness when we do not add unnecessary baggage to situations that arise. And when I say situations, what I mean is, of course, the present moment.

It's always every situation happens in the present moment. Your entire life unfolds in the present moment. In fact, there is nothing else.

We live, most humans live, as if the next moment or the one after that were more important than this moment. But it's not. This moment is always more important than the next moment.

It doesn't mean we cannot make plans. We need to make plans. But whatever plan we make, perhaps, I mean, we plan to meet here tonight.

That's fine. But the no future moment can be more important than this moment because there is only this moment. And when the future moment comes, it again is this moment.

There is no future. Although we need it for practical purposes. But ultimately, if there were a future, somebody would have discovered it and said, oh, there it is.

I found the future. And then, of course, you realize, oh no, it's the present moment. So the future is a thought in your head.

And the past are thoughts in your head. And when are you thinking those thoughts? Now.

So even the past cannot exist without being revived in the now. There is only now. Now, if we have a dysfunctional, bad, unpleasant relationship habitually with the present moment, and many people live like that.

They always want to be somewhere else. This is never good enough. They're always complaining about something.

If you live that way, then, of course, you are condemned to continuous suffering without even knowing it. And always blaming some external factor. That's the essence of unconscious living.

So one of the greatest or perhaps the most important spiritual practice is to come to a relationship with the present moment that is friendly. You might as well, because your entire life is experienced as the present moment. So no matter what form the present moment takes, even if it's challenging, you no longer resent the fact that this moment is challenging.

You accept, and then you see, is action possible? Do I need to take action? You look, and then you take action.

Or right now, no action is possible. Then you let go of any kind of resistance. And even if you take action, it's better to come to a place of non-resistance first, so that you are more deeply connected with life.

When you are in a place of non-resistance, you connect more deeply with life. You go deeper than the ego. The ego lives through resistance resistance of the present moment.

So the entire edifice of the mind-made sense of self can be transcended if your life becomes more focused on the present moment. And you honor the present moment. That's an important thing, because you encounter life in the present moment honoring the present moment.

Another word for that is gratitude. Gratitude for what is at this moment, even if it's only, you might be sitting in a room, there's a light, you have kind of gratitude for the lights that are shining here, the flowers, which means you appreciate, you give some attention, you appreciate, because otherwise you go through life always pursuing a mental phantom. One day I'm going to be okay.

I just need to get there. I just need to get to the office. I need to get there and there and there.

Of course, you can still make plans. You need to make plans, but you make plans in the present moment without believing that when you arrive at a certain point in the so-called future, this is going to make you happy. Nothing and nobody is going to make you happy.

Yes, your life can improve, of course. The external conditions or circumstances of your life can improve, and sometimes they do. That's fine.

But you're not... to seeking self-fulfillment through that is the error, is the mistake. So in other words, you need to find what is conventionally called happiness, although I don't call it happiness because the term happiness sounds a little superficial.

Something great has just happened to me. I'm so happy. And of course, the next day it disappears or it no longer makes you happy.

But there's something, there's a deeper sense of joy and aliveness and deep inner peace that is there when you live in inner alignment with the present moment and whatever form it takes. Then what happens as you practice that, this is a form of gratitude. In gratitude, you don't even need to say thank you.

You can say thank you for this or thank you for that. Or you can simply, without words, appreciate the life that's happening around you now and the life that is within you now, to feel the life that animates the body. I call it the inner body.

As you sit here now, feel the life that animates the inner body. Every cell is alive. You can feel that aliveness.

And that takes you out of the thinking mind without losing consciousness. And here we come to the actual central point of our gathering here tonight. And that central point of extraordinary importance, it is the next step in the evolution of human consciousness.

And what is that? What is this step? Human consciousness has developed the incredible ability to think over many thousands of years.

You live through a mental image. And as you do, this mental image is the ego. And the ego is never satisfied for long, never satisfied for long, and feels incomplete, has problems with self-esteem and self-worth.

We inhabit a conceptual reality, and we have a conceptual sense of self, and we impose a conceptual sense of self on every other human that we meet. We immediately have judgments about those humans, mental judgments, this and this. We immediately interpret everything according to the conditioning of the mind.

How we interpret things varies from culture to culture, but makes little difference because you would be identified with your particular mental interpretations.

Eckhart Tolle Love Is Recognizing the Other as Yourself [926e791e-50d6-4941-9810-4d751c1e5d7e]

Love is recognizing the other as yourself. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about the future of religion. He says the next step for the human race is to shift from worshiping God as a concept to experiencing God as part of our own essence.

He explains once we awaken to this realization, we no longer contribute to suffering in the world. The ego disappears and with it goes continuous judgment of others. He says when we don't react to their personalities, we recognize the sacred depth of others as the same one in ourselves and the separation between us and them disappears.

Eckhart calls it the manifestation of the one consciousness. He also says this understanding of the other as oneself is love and it connects us to a vastness that we may also call God.

Our destiny for humanity is as I see the next evolutionary stage which is this gathering actually is part of that. It looks like just people in a room listening to somebody or that's the surface on the surface that's what it is but if you look deeper there's a huge energy field that's operating and that is the awakening of human consciousness. This is the next stage in evolution of humans and the strange fact is the awakening happens you what awakens you mostly up to a point is well how do I put it without shocking anybody what awakens you is if life takes you out of your comfort zone.

Life needs to take you out of your comfort zone so that you encounter some kind of obstacles or tribulation or something makes you oh that is suffering as the Buddha called it suffering dukkha and the suffering has a function. Everybody has a spiritual teacher I sometimes say for most people it's their suffering and then you may reach a point you will reach a point you have reached a point where suffering is no longer needed for the evolution of your consciousness. It has brought you to this point and for that you could be grateful for most of you it applies that if you had not suffered what you because every human has their share of suffering if you had not suffered you would not unlikely that you would be here.

If I had not gone through deep depression and deep unhappiness for many years I would not be here. I might be sitting on a sofa somewhere drinking beer and what binge watching Netflix and feeling sorry for myself. So it's the suffering so many people have told me so many times that I heard people said if I hadn't had this serious illness or if I hadn't lost all my possessions or if I hadn't lost even in some cases through the deaths of close family members even death of children if I hadn't gone through all this loss and that I would never have understood your teaching.

It's not really teaching but I call it that and people have told me often they were given a book like the power of now by a friend and they opened it and it was completely meaningless. He said what what is he talking about they put it on a shelf years later they picked it up again and they opened it oh wow but what happened in the meantime well in the meantime the wife left him he lost his job he fell in had an accident and then Rick was in hospital for a long time but when finally recover many bad things happened that that cracked open the shell of the egoic state of consciousness it cracked open what was it Leonard Cohen or somebody had a like there's a crack a crack in everything that how the light gets out or in out I suppose. So the suffering is an essential part of the evolution of consciousness so in your life what looks like the obstacles to your awakening are actually the hidden portal to your awakening. People think if I could only I would awaken spiritually but I need to be left alone by life and I need the surroundings that are conducive to spiritual awakening.

I ideally a resort on on Bali where and I need the purest food and environment that's just brought to me so that I can meditate in peace so and of course body work I need a lot of body work too so I'm these these are ideally if I had that there would be a chance that I could spiritually awaken. I'm not denying that what you are describing may be a very pleasant experience but it is very unlikely that it will lead to spiritual awakening it could lead to a brief moment of aha a brief moment of being present of the perhaps when you're receiving body work your mind stops yes oh it's great but the real thing is the confrontation with the tribulations of your life and then enter into a state of acceptance of the isness of the present moment even if you're in a prison cell and I've had communications from many people in prison and many have said they have achieved a degree or complete sense of freedom or liberation by surrendering internally to the now to the form that this now takes and that is amazing transformation happens when you can accept this moment as it is particularly if it appears to be negative not talking about taking action in order to change things sometimes action is called for but again the question is does the action arise from a state of resistance or dissatisfaction or denial of the present moment or does the action arise out of a state of consciousness of deep acceptance but you still see what needs to be done if you're stuck in the mud somewhere to use a kind of analogy because many people are metaphorically speaking stuck in the mud somewhere if you're stuck in the mud somewhere this moment is as it is and then the next thing is you take action to get out but a different kind of action arises if the foundation was a state of consciousness of acceptance of now there are some successful so-called successful people in the horizontal in the horizontal terms of the word let's say you're business person if you are a business person entrepreneur or whatever the words are you try to create something new now are you conscious while you're doing it or are you unconscious while you're doing it if you're unconscious while you're doing it then it's all egoic based and every obstacle you encounter and you may realize if you have practiced entrepreneurship basically your entire job is problem solving every day a new problem arises and some business people think this should not be happening and they get angry with every problem that arises and then they react out of that but there are some others and they make it worse by reacting angrily against an arising problem you amplify the problem usually sometimes the problems come in the form of an unconscious human being wanting something but and you react and you increase their unconsciousness and yours and then events sometimes get blown up out of all proportions through egoic reaction and some others tend to be much more successful they don't resent the fact that an obstacle arises and they come of course they come continuously and they immediately look at it instead of complaining about the obstacle they say what is it that can be done and then they're able to be still for a moment there's a key for even very active people who may not be drawn to meditation in important situations and especially when faced with challenges can you be so alert that you're still for a moment and look the situation face the situation fully and then see what is it that can be done and the the answer of what it is that can be done then comes out of a moment of stillness and it's it will be just right for that situation it will not make it worse it will make it better it or it will circumvent the problem or it will transform the problem into something good life continuously throws things at you isn't that strange and many humans believe that when adversity happens this should not be happening there's something wrong well yes it is true that you can positively change your life to a great extent if you for example practice positive attitude positive thinking will greatly help you in transforming your life but even there life will not leave you alone you will still encounter the challenges and that's fine you will still encounter some kind of problematic situation difficult person loss of one kind or another every human needs to experience that and you can change your attitude towards it by realizing that it could not be otherwise evolution itself happens because of it it looks all the obstacles that arise seeming apparent obstacles to the evolution of your life too in consciousness the a are needed because the strength on whatever level only comes when it is absolutely needed this even applies on a physical level and it applies on the mental level and its place on the spiritual level if you want to make your body stronger you don't do it by making your body more comfortable be because there will be no influx of energy into the body because it's not needed but when you make demands on your body then there's a gap where energy is needed you're lifting a weight it's at first not very pleasant and the body is trying out leave me alone but then is this the body says i need more energy i need and then an influx of energy comes or you start jogging at first you go oh like not again at some point the body demands more energy and energy suddenly comes flowing in and then it even begins to be enjoyable with the influx of energy which would never have come if you had not let's put it in this terms if you had not made life difficult for your body the body gains in strength because you made life difficult for your body don't go so far as to make life so difficult for your body that it collapses completely that's another story you find the middle way the middle way in everything so there was a famous orator in ancient greece he had a speech defect he could not talk well as a young man and in greece to be a great speaker was one of the most highly regarded things to to be an orator and he he wanted to go beyond his speech defect and they say he in order to get beyond it he put little pebbles in his mouth and started delivering speeches to the ocean the sea and he was there with pebbles and was shouting and talking to the ocean to the sea for several years and in the end the speech defect disappeared and he became one of the greatest orators in ancient greece and again there was a demand for it it so if the obstacle hadn't been there there was a philosopher who said everything important happens in spite of everything important happens in spite of didn't don't add anything in spite of something whatever in other words something was holding it back and then it had to the energy was so when you face tribulation in this life then there's an opportunity for generating more consciousness in when you encounter difficult life's difficulties there's an opportunity for developing more consciousness and as you rise in consciousness the transcendent dimension of awakened consciousness comes in you begin to transcend these very problems that before you seemed unsurmountable you transcend them or you live with them and they are no longer that important so you can transcend them internally let's say you have a body that is disabled in one way or another and the problem then as you awaken spiritually sometimes it happens that the body gets healed and at other times it happens that the transcendent consciousness arises and the disability of the body is no longer a source of suffering for you but it was a source of suffering for probably for quite a long time until a very deep surrender happened and in this deep surrender you transcended this source of suffering and then you still have the same body and yet you're no longer psychologically suffering because you have transcended so many things in this life they can be you can overcome an obstacle or you can transcend an obstacle if you overcome an obstacle when external things you do external things in order to remove the obstacle to get beyond it if that is not possible then internally you transcend so it no longer the obstacle the so-called obstacle is still there but it doesn't matter anymore to you it is no longer so in fact you may be grateful for it so when things happen in your life you face it and you look at it and you become the alertness is required when you're faced with a difficult person or situation you become alert so that you don't react out of the conditioned mind even little things when people could get irritated airports these days airports these days are wonderful places for spiritual practice they've always been places for spiritual practice but much more so now this is a small scale thing but if you don't practice with small scale you will not practice with big things relatively small things yes your flight is cancelled again no nobody can give you any information and the luggage is lost long ago and there you are you can either react out of the conditioned mind or you can say this is what is that's what is if you have been irritated and you can use any situation it's been irritated or angry i recommend this spiritual practice and you do it like this how would i experience this situation if i didn't add any thought to it now you can't answer that unless you actually do it so how would i experience this irritating moment and these awful people who are working for the airline and and they're completely uninterested in their job anymore and so on and so on and so on how would i experience this moment if i didn't add any thought to it while i'm just standing here in this line and any thought would be for example well this line is so long i'm going to be here for at least another two hours that's a thought it's future not now there's no no two hours now this does the how would i experience this moment if i didn't add any thought to it okay let's try it we might as well nothing else to do so there you are and here you are okay i'm not adding any thought to it i'm not in other words i'm not interpreting it either favorably or unfavorably i'm not trying to convince myself this is really good that's another thought and it would be not really true in that here it just don't let anything there you are and you look around and here we come back to sensory perception that's the first thing you notice is hmm oh lights there are lights there's people everywhere or movement of people standing but you don't even call it that you just artificial lights lamps and you're breathing oh yes yes i'm breathing breathing breathing and if you if you become aware that you're breathing it's part of this moment when you when you don't add thought to it you may suddenly become aware that you're actually breathing and then when you become aware they're breathing you might also sense that there is an aliveness that pervades your entire body as you stand there because the breath kind of puts you in touch with the inner sense of aliveness that which animates the body not the physical body that the animating presence within the body that keeps it all together that you sense that but not through thinking it's through sensing it and there you are and perhaps let's say on a horizontal scale three minutes have passed where's the irritation now where's the anger where are the thoughts i can't stand it anymore nothing you haven't added any thought and this moment is actually intensely alive and you can sense this moment whatever it is that you perceive with your senses and you also become aware through becoming aware of your the inner aliveness of the body which is consciousness you become aware of being conscious in this moment you can sense that you are this presence through which you perceive everything and there's a stillness there but it's not the stillness of half asleep stillness alert stillness and there you are and this moment is now free of suffering and you suddenly realize in most cases the unhappiness that you experience in any situation is not caused by the situation in most cases it's caused by your interpretation of the situation in other words the story you tell yourself about the situation so it's not the situation it's the story there was an ancient greek philosopher the first person who ever verbalized that truth a pig that was not very well known he said what makes you unhappy is not the situation it's the story what you tell yourself about it even that little thing if that's all you remember from tonight could change your life but ultimately you don't have to remember anything because it works at a deeper level but yes practice that and always find out when irritation and other things arise how how and where do they arise at the level level of events and situations or interpretation so here we come back to the little practice that we already looked at perceiving without interpretation and then becoming aware of yourself as the awareness behind the perception so to speak the awareness behind the perception the stillness behind the perception there could even be a lot of noise outside in order to realize the stillness within you don't need the outside to be silent let's say there is a lot of noise cars or engines whatever unpleasant noise is true and you you completely let go of adding any thought to the sense perception there's a noise and there you are not adding any thought this is what is and you you become aware of the awareness that is perceiving the noise and that's the stillness becoming aware of the awareness is the stillness in the midst of noise but you can realize the stillness and sometimes it's precisely in those situations where you would have thought you could not realize it that's where you can realize it in often seemingly situations that are not conducive to awakening but they are including people great opportunity for spiritual practice is people because you might have noticed that people can be very difficult and often they are very really difficult to deal with and for many people their main source of suffering is other people so there's nothing personal in there every human being manifests their level of in evolutionary terms their level of consciousness or unconsciousness nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness or usually unconsciousness now we approach the same thing again from a slightly different angle this awareness is vital not not just the awareness of sense perception that's the beginning of it but then more deeply this the vertical dimension opens up when you become aware of yourself as a presence so to speak another way of experimenting with this ask yourself what does it feel like to be me what is the thing that actually is the most essential thing about me weird me what is the most essential thing about the sense of i is it the story of me the personality or is there something deeper for a moment then let go of the story don't you don't need it right now whatever it is that you think you are what you call my life my life is a narrative in your mind it's not your life it's your story and identification with your story is your personality but it's not your life your life is now but it is not yours life is now and you are it life and consciousness are one what does it feel like to be you right now without any reference to memory or anticipation no reference to memory or anticipation are you still there without remembering who or what you are or what is left when you no longer refer to past or future memory or anticipation who or what are you in this moment without your story and i cannot i i don't expect an answer verbally from you or conceptually because that's not the right answer the answer is deeper you can only sense what is left in the absence of the story what is left of you and that feeling how do we talk about it feeling of beingness the feeling that you are that's left feeling of presence that you cannot define it in any way there's certainly there's no age in it it doesn't matter whether you're 20 years old or 90 years old there's not it's not to do with your age it's not to do with your body which is to connect it with age it's not to do with any life situation whether you are a great success story or the opposite it's not to do with your race it's not to do with any of those things it's deeper than that not to do with man or woman as consciousness you're neither man nor woman what is left is pure presence and now that is important to just to realize that the pure presence that is left that is always there underlying everything that is consciousness itself now there's another question where does it come from maybe we'll go there maybe not we'll see but this consciousness itself is there and then this is when people get afraid of death what they don't want to lose is this there's something they feel there's something very precious that's me they don't want to lose that i don't want to lose that me and and this this very precious thing it's not a thing is actually if you go if you really go deep enough it is the consciousness that is the essence of who you are and that consciousness in ordinary life becomes mixed up with objects the one consciousness takes on different forms thought forms primarily sensory perception also become thought forms so the consciousness takes on form subgenius forms form and that means the the pure consciousness gets what could say mixed up with forms that arise it it's a little bit like well how do we you can say there's gold and then the gold becomes all kinds of ornaments and jewelry it's formed into this and this and this and this and this many things can be arise they're made of gold but the pure gold is prior to that or another analogy that sometimes occurs to me it got to me that sounds a little strange um if you don't like dairy don't listen to this analogy there's cream the cream and there's the skimmed milk skimmed milk this image came to me a long time ago when i was in deeply immersed in the sense of being and then i opened my eyes and i looked around and i very strongly felt there was the cream or there is the cream and everything else is diluted cream skimmed milk and all the things of this world and and you're the sense of being essentially you if you go deep enough it's not the story the story is all the form that consciousness has taken that's all so it's not separate from consciousness it is a form that consciousness has taken temporarily and so what is it that has taken the form consciousness itself now the analogy i often use is the ocean and the ripple on the surface of the ocean you are a ripple on the surface of the ocean for a long time you only news yourself as a ripple living with other ripples many of them making your life difficult all the rebels are there and at some point the ripple realizes it is not just a ripple it's actually part of the ocean and the tension of the ripple instead of looking at other rebels how what can i do now on the surface of the ocean suddenly the ripple goes oh because one ripple called echard said what is it is that when you stop when this thinking subsides and the rebel goes oh suddenly feels the rebel is actually supported by an expression of inseparable from the vastness of the ocean and then the rebel goes oh life isn't so bad after all and it knows how relatively fleeting horizontal life is but it's now connected to the vastness of the ocean but the strange thing is the ocean itself realizes its own being through the ripple because the ocean and the ripple are one so the realization that you are consciousness and a person only is a surface phenomenon that subsists for a while it can even subsist beyond death and take on another form especially if you were deeply identified with form the identification continues and another some what could say illusory problematic existence arises until you've suffered enough so and then you suddenly connect to the depths of who you are so this now mainstream science will probably tell you that consciousness well it actually hasn't much to say about consciousness it has no idea what consciousness is but it some scientists say consciousness is a byproduct of brain functioning in other words the chemical soup of the brain somehow produces consciousness i don't know how that could be there's undoubtedly a relationship between the brain and consciousness but is that does the brain produce consciousness or is the brain a channel for consciousness that brings consciousness into this dimension does the brain receive consciousness in this way that a radio receives a transmission and let's say the radio i don't know if people still have radios these days but whatever is the equivalent of a radio the radio is playing a symphony by beethoven and then is the radio producing it no if something a brick falls on the radio suddenly the symphony stops does that mean it doesn't exist anymore or is it just that the instrument for its transmission is no longer functioning so there are some more enlightened scientists or be questioning the material explanation of consciousness but you don't really need to even go into philosophy even just in your personal experience you can verify that who you are on every level not just on the deepest level even the level of the personality which is still relatively superficial but even there you do not exist in the physical realm if you existed in the physical realm it would be possible for a scientist or a surgeon to cut open your brain and find you somewhere if you had an existence in the physical realm it would be somewhere in the physical realm as you would exist perhaps as molecules or atoms but so far no scientist has been able to find you and by cutting open your brain you find all kinds of things it may find that the brain is no longer functioning well been like a radio that's getting too old but you with your countless memories that your millions of memories you have they live somewhere in you but where do they or do they have thought itself memory is thought what is a thought even they are scientists don't really know what a thought is there's some relationship between the brain and and thought but thought itself you cannot find thought in the physical realm so when you think something thinking itself already exists in a non-physical dimension you you cannot find it in the physical realm and if you go deeper that becomes even more true you are multi-dimensional so when you you go under the surface of things which is here under the surface of things you are already most of you is invisible all i can see of you is the physical body but what goes on in you you cannot find it in the physical realm every thought where does it live so we don't need to go too too deep into philosophical discussions but consciousness is a the greatest mystery in the universe we have on the one hand the mystery of the microcosm the atomic and subatomic realm the deeper we go there the more enigmatic the world becomes and we realize ultimately there is no there is nothing physical ultimately but it's still it's a huge mystery the other mystery is outer space if you go into space the vastness and seemingly the infinite nature of space another incomprehensible mystery when i was 12 years old i was puzzled by this thought what is beyond the universe does it have an end and i try to visualize an end of the universe can't do it because what so if it has an end there must be something beyond the end is the universe infinite two great mysteries macrocosm and microcosm but the greatest mystery is that the universe is conscious the universe is conscious wow how do i know that well i am conscious and i'm the universe of course you are you're not a particle that has come into this universe you are the universe you are the universe that is in the process of becoming conscious in this dimension so in this dimension there seems to be an evolution of consciousness even on this planet from very simple life forms gradually to more and more complex life forms more and more consciousness evolution of consciousness where does that come from i can sense the consciousness that pervades the entire universe it is within and without when you become present you can sense this presence that pervades everything that is the space is itself this sounds a little mystical i can't help it i have to say it the space itself is presence and the consciousness in you this consciousness is as i see it an emanation from a transcendent dimension beyond this universe there is a source of all life it doesn't exist in space or time traditionally the source out of which all life emerges the primordial intelligence that is behind the manifestation of the multiplicity of phenomena the primordial intelligence that is behind it all the organizing principle behind it all traditionally called god and that from there the same way that the sun shines and gives life to this planet the light of the sun continuously is life giving the same way the source the transcendent source of all life emanates into this dimension it emanates consciousness and in this dimension there is a an evolution of consciousness here consciousness itself is timeless so when you sense the essence of who you are or what you are as a conscious presence what you sense is if you don't mind i'll use a theistic term hopefully you're not too uncomfortable with it what you sense is the presence of god in you that is the realization of the essence of who you are you are an extension one could say of god the essence of who you are is timeless and when you can sense that here now nothing to think about just sense that precious presence of some people call it the i am i am beingness itself that is the consciousness of the universe and but but it does not originate in this dimension so this awakening then is sometimes also called god's realization i wouldn't go so far as to say that i am god or you are god but you are yes i know in this the ripple is the ocean and yet the ripple is tiny compared to the ocean the ray of sunlight is connected to the sun and yet the sun is infinitely faster than the ray but they are one so the the future of religion is for humans to transition from from having god as a mental concept to worship to realizing their own essence is eternally connected in oneness with the oneness with the one and then you lose your fear of death and the personality becomes something that loses its heaviness it's something you can live with for a while and the realization also affects the way in which the personality operates the personality becomes considerably less dysfunctional it still has its limitations as a human you have your limitations not the craziness disappears you don't cause suffering for yourself and others except accidentally when you could you stepped on something a worm or something okay sorry very sorry you don't cause suffering you don't contribute to the suffering of this world anymore the relationship with other humans changes you don't react to their personality you can look beyond the personality can sense the essence of the other as consciousness that's a beautiful thing when you can look at another human being and use the personalities there but you're not that concerned with the personality you yes you interact with it but you can sense more something deeper you look at a person there's you're meeting there's a presence in that presence you are one there is not two and that's how this awakening changes the way in which humans interact with each other the sense of absolute separation and continuous judgment that the ego loves disappears and you can recognize the other as in essence as yourself as another manifestation of the one consciousness and this recognition of the other as yourself is love that's what love is you recognize the other as yourself the sense of separation disappears and this is where we are going as human species we are moving into turbulent time period which is all fine it is needed for the awakening of many more humans there's those numbers that are awakening now remember the comfort zone you don't awaken in your comfort zone so your mission in this world is to manifest allow the consciousness that you are to flow into this world and to operate in this world not through the egoic mind but from the deeper level as much as possible go there the vertical dimension have many moments every day take some deep conscious breaths practice sensory perception without labeling and sense the awareness that is the essence of who you are and that connects you to a vastness that we cannot really name although i did call it god thank you

Love and connection. In this podcast, Eckhart meets with an international audience answering such questions as, Are love and consciousness the same thing? Why do our egos need to define the people in our lives as other?

He also addresses a topic that many parents struggle with, navigating screen time with children and the overwhelming impact of technology. Eckhart says, we can help our children by becoming more conscious parents.

So these are questions that people who are not physically present have submitted. Could the word consciousness be replaced with the word love to describe the essence being pointed to? Are they one and the same?

Of course, you have heard the phrase, God is love. It's a very well-known phrase. To some extent, it's a question of how you choose to use words.

Semantics, language. The way I use it is slightly different. Love is the recognition of oneness from the dimension of duality.

So you are in this dimension of duality, multiplicity, and from there you recognize your oneness with ultimately all life. So that act of recognition I would call love. And it is not just a mental thing.

It's an energetic thing because you realize your essential oneness with other humans, other life forms, the totality, and most importantly, the unmanifested. Love thy neighbor as yourself is a recognition. It's not something that you should be doing.

It's something that naturally happens when you are connected with yourself. You remember what Pythagoras said? Humans are disconnected from themselves.

That's why they meet. They run around meeting sorrow after sorrow. Why?

Because they are disconnected from themselves. And we know what that means, not just intellectually, but also we know it experientially because you have been there, I have been there. To some extent you may still occasionally be there in your daily life, but you also have realized, even if it's just occasional glimpses, but probably more, you have realized what it means to be connected with yourself.

So you have disconnected, connected. And when you are connected with yourself, which is the essence identity, then you look at another human being and you can sense their presence through your own and as your own. You are less interested.

This is an important fact. You are less interested in what makes up their personality. Yes, you see it, but it doesn't absorb your interest that much.

You see it, and that means things like that the ego otherwise enjoys gossiping about other people, telling dramatic stories of what happened, what somebody did or failed to do, and tell it to others. You know what he did? And then he said to me, and then I said, how dare you do this?

And he complained again, he just doesn't see it. What's wrong with him? People love these stories.

They think about them, they retell them, and what others did, failed to do. And usually the implication is that the person telling the story is in some way superior to the person the story is being told about, obviously, because you are judging continuously the other as lacking or not good enough or being a perpetrator of something, behavior. So there's an enormous interest in what the others are doing, what's their intention.

And all that fascinates people when they are not connected with their essence, because then the surface phenomena are so fascinating. When you connect with the essence of who you are and you sense the essence in the other, then that which is not the essence in the other becomes almost a little bit boring. So the human stories that others are so fascinated by become a little bit boring.

And when people come to you and talk to you about them, you go, okay. And you know what he said then? No, I don't.

Well, I'll tell you, and you'll never guess what I said then. I, I said, and of course, I'm always the hero in the story, the one who is morally or in some other way superior to the people I'm talking about. And this kind of discourse, this kind of conversation strengthens continuously the false self in you, the ego, because the ego strengthens itself by emphasizing the otherness of others.

It loves to make the other more other, as other as possible. And then it gets stronger. Or you can take a whole group of people and make this group of people completely other.

You can take a whole nation and make the people of that nation into the other, a whole religion. And there's no need anymore to emphasize the otherness of others. In fact, as you sense the other person's presence, the person isn't really other anymore.

One could almost then say there are no others. There's the same consciousness that inhabits every human, every life form. The same consciousness inhabits you.

There's one being, one could almost say, that inhabits everyone. There's one being that experiences itself in the disguise of a person, a little role it adopts, a little part it plays. All the world is a stage, and all the men and women merely players, somewhere in Shakespeare, I believe.

And that's amazing. So there's one consciousness underlying all phenomena, and the consciousness incarnates into forms, temporary forms, fleeting forms. When you see the fleetingness of all human forms, then the possibility arises for you to sense that which underlies the human form, your form, which is the one, the being, the one being, beingness or being.

So you love your neighbor as yourself, and you recognize your neighbor as essentially the same as you, essentially. On the surface, there are many, many differences. On the surface, humans are very different.

You can't say that all humans are equal. No, obviously not. Humans are unequal, both in their physical makeup, intelligence, level of awareness, level of energy available to them, life energy, all kinds of things.

And Einstein had an interesting statement. He said, the true value of a human being is determined by the degree to which he or she is free of the self. He had some amazing statements.

If he had not become a scientist, he would have become a spiritual teacher. Now, but let's look at that statement. The true value of a human being is determined by the degree to which he or she is free of the self.

Now, what are you actually saying? If I were talking to Einstein, are you actually saying that not every human being is of the same value? Because that statement seems to imply that not every human being has the same value.

So there's an implication there. In their essential nature, all humans are the same. The consciousness.

But the degree to which this consciousness expresses itself in their outward form differs from human to human. So there's a huge range of levels of consciousness in humans, in different humans. So the degree to which the one consciousness is the essence of every human, the degree to which that manifests through this form, that creates the differences between people.

Human beings are essentially one and the same. But on the surface, there are huge differences, of course. But the important thing is to recognize the oneness, no matter where the other human being is that you are confronting, what is the level of consciousness, even to go beyond that.

If the world as we see it is an illusion of the ego and all is massive hallucination of the mortal eye, how can I be grateful for my experiences? How can I be grateful for nature? How can I connect with my surroundings if at the end of the day, it's all a massive lie?

Did I say that? I don't remember ever saying that. But I might have said, this could be a dream, you don't know.

Or I might have said, it's a little bit like a dream because everything disappears fairly quickly, just like a dream. But it's not correct to say, all this is total illusion, especially if you're still immersed in it. And it's just a statement.

All one can say is that relative to the realization of consciousness itself, which is the timeless being, relative to that, the manifested world has a certain insubstantiality to it. But that doesn't mean you turn your back on it. It'll catch up with you.

If you say, I'm not dealing with anything anymore because it's all just illusion. I'm not having any of this. I'm doing nothing anymore.

The world will catch up with you. It will challenge you. And the world has many beautiful things in it that are a reflection of that jewel within you that in Indian terminology, spiritual terminology, has a threefold characteristics of being, consciousness, and bliss or joy.

And the Sanskrit terms for that are sat, cit, ananda. You string them together as one word, but they consist of three words. Sat is being.

The realization of consciousness is the realization of being and consciousness, bliss as one single thing, three aspects of one single thing or other, no thing. And from there, you appreciate this world. You honor the things of this world and you see the beauty of this world, but you don't have expectations that this world cannot meet anymore.

You don't have expectations to be totally satisfied by the things of this world, whether the things of this world are other people or achievements or possessions or any attainments or experiences. You engage with the world, but the expectation of complete fulfillment, joy, whatever you want to call it, is no longer there. And that means your experience of this world, of the things of this world, is no longer a series of frustrations.

Even though you might have your successes, and hopefully you do have a few successes in your life occasionally, but even that, if you cling to that, very often after a while, the success is not that satisfying anymore or it becomes invalidated by another factor or the very thing that is your success now proves to present more difficulties than you've ever had before you succeeded. All kinds of weird things happen that seem to be sabotaging, you're continuously sabotaging your search for ultimate fulfillment in this world. But if there is a self-seeking in it, if there's something longing for something, there's a you that is longing to be satisfied or liberated or find some final completion of its sense of self through some kind of achievement or attainment or possession or whatever it is, or relationship, that's frustrating because the world does not operate in this way.

It cannot supply those things. But once the expectation is gone, once the demand that you make, please make me happy, you are here to make me happy, that's very frustrating. Nobody can do that, not for long.

And so the demand goes and then you can be okay with the way things are. You can still improve situations and so on, but in the present moment, you're basically aligned with the present moment and it's always as it is. It already is the case.

So you don't argue with the isness of things. So the world, when you don't expect something that it cannot give you, is actually not that bad. It's not such an unpleasant place.

And relative to the realization of beingness, the world is only of relative importance. So otherwise things assume an importance in your life, an overwhelming importance that they don't actually have. It's very rare that all these elements, financial, relationship, health, career, living situation, that all these work beautifully together.

You can strive for it and when it happens for a while, it's fine. But know that it's not likely to last. So the disruption will come in again here or there.

It has to. If it didn't, you wouldn't even evolve. You would not grow.

You would not awaken. The world has a relative reality and is relatively important, but only one thing is of absolute importance and that's realizing who or what you are. Then you can cope with the failures in your life, which, by the way, the places where you fail or where something so-called bad happens is always a greater opportunity for spiritual awakening than the happy things.

Your comfort zone is not usually where you awaken. When you become uncomfortable, then something happens. First you suffer and then potentially you awaken. Please address the subject of prayer.

Where does it fit in and how is it done? Does it serve a purpose and can it be used to help others and the world? Many people who pray, they practice petitionary prayers.

Please, please do this or don't do that. I don't see that as extremely helpful. If you are a child, then perhaps it's nice.

I was brought up as a Catholic and I used petitionary prayer as a child and I lost interest in the church at about the age of 12 when my petitionary prayers were not answered. So I thought, obviously this is not working. There's one little hint, one certain type of prayer that Jesus talks about.

If you pray for something, Jesus said, I'm going to use my own translation or paraphrase, feel that you already have it and it will be given to you. In those few words, he gives the secret of manifestation, which is to already sense that you have it. You don't want something.

That's not an effective manifestation technique. It comes out of fullness rather than out of a sense of lack. So please give me a nice place to live is not as effective as feeling that you already have this nice place to live.

And the way you feel now is no different from the way you feel when you actually have that nice place to live. In other words, really, it connects you with being, the satisfying place to realize that you are. And then you attach a certain image to the satisfying realization of your beingness.

You combine it with a mental image, and the power of the beingness combines with a mental image, and that is a blueprint for something to appear in the sense-perceived external world. And if you are aligned with the essence of yourself as consciousness, then it becomes much more powerful because that means that the consciousness operates through you to create something. And the term that is sometimes used in contemporary spirituality is you become a co-creator with God, whatever the one.

You become a co-creator. There's a vision that arises in your mind of what this could be your contribution. And then you can become a co-creator.

And again, the way I put it now is very powerful. And it comes from a place of fullness. I have to emphasize, it does not come from a place of lack or neediness.

You cannot manifest very well if you think you need something. Please, God, I need more money. I need this.

I need... Please give me the statement, I don't have it. Jesus said, feel the same way as if you had it, and it will be given to you.

Now, how do you feel you need it? The essence of it is the realization of that alert, vitally alive stillness in you that is consciousness. Become aware of yourself as consciousness, where everything is already there.

There's nothing missing there. And if you do feel that something wants to be created, then you bring that mental image into that fulfilled place already that means you feel that exactly the same as you would if you had it. And that's a powerful way to manifest something.

It's a meditation. Make sure, though, that there is some realism also to that. There are still certain limitations that are due perhaps to your physical form.

Don't imagine you're growing wings and you're starting to fly. It would be futile for me to attempt to manifest to win a gold medal in the next Olympic Games in some discipline, except curling, perhaps. I might be able to do that.

So the goal is not based in illusion and in ego. People have an illusion of what they want to be, but I want to be a great musician. Okay.

Are you ready for 10,000 hours of practice so that the vehicle becomes ready? And as you practice, you can also begin to... And hopefully the music you produce will add something beautiful and vital to everybody's life.

And it's not just empty noise, which is not uncommon that people listen to, and three months later, nobody listens to it again. There's some other empty noise in the charts. So that's manifestation.

Another prayer, if you want to call that prayer, is simply a prayer that consists of pointers towards your essential reality. So even just a few words. You can write your own, and you can use thought as signposts to point you in the correct direction.

That is a kind of prayer, too. Regarding the topic of illness of the body, you write, Surrender to the present moment, not to the idea of illness, only to the now. End of quote.

I try, but not successfully, because I cannot understand the difference how not to surrender to the illness itself, but only to the present moment. I wrote somewhere, apparently, Surrender to the present moment, not to the idea of illness. If you have an illness...

Yes, sometimes when I speak of accepting what is, which is, one could say, primordial spiritual practice, accepting the is-ness of this moment, because you cannot argue with is-ness. It is the case already. So when I say, accept the is-ness of this moment, people think, well, if they are ill, they need to accept, let's say, whatever the illness may be, I need to accept that I have cancer, arthritis, heart disease, liver disease, whatever it is, I need to accept that I have this disease.

No, that's not acceptance of the present moment, because that would be the acceptance of a thought form as yourself having this illness. So that's not acceptance of the present moment, it's a thought form that's created, and it's a narrative. I'm not denying, by the way, that you have this illness, or that you shouldn't go, I'm not saying don't go to the doctor, I'm saying the illness manifests in this moment as either some disability, or pain, or discomfort.

It manifests in some way, or it may not even manifest in this moment in any way. You just know that you have an illness, but at this moment it doesn't manifest. So it's important not to excessively dwell on the mental image of yourself being a sufferer of this or that illness, but focus on the present moment, and whatever manifests internally or externally in this moment, you accept it the way it is.

I accept it the way it is. Then things get easier. If you accept the way it is at this moment, rather than continuously dwell in a mental image of illness.

Allow the illness to force you into the present moment more and more, especially a serious illness. Allow it to be the motivating force that pushes your attention into the present moment. Because if you leave the present moment, and you start thinking what might happen, you suffer a lot.

I have met many examples of people for whom the diagnosis of a fatal illness, which sometimes was a true diagnosis, and sometimes actually wasn't, and they became healed. So not every fatal diagnosis is actually true, but some are. But I have met people in whom the diagnosis of a fatal illness acted as an awakener, and they became radiant because it pushed them into absolute presence.

Because when you're diagnosed with a fatal illness, then it's like somebody takes time away from you. Normal future. I'm taking away your future.

That's very painful at first. Because you say, I haven't lived fully yet. I haven't completed my life.

So many things I still want to do but won't be able to do. I haven't developed fully, depending on your age. I haven't developed fully.

There's so many experiences that I still want to have but not having. This is awful, terrible. And so you suffer and you suffer and suffer, and at some point you can't stand the suffering anymore.

And then potentially you surrender, not to the idea that it's all useless and you're doomed. That's an idea again. No, you surrender just to what is.

The is-ness of this moment is what's left. Then the whole egoic structure evaporates and the consciousness that you are emerges. And suddenly you don't need future anymore because the essence of anything that you could experience and could attain or could possess, whatever, is already here.

The essence of all that is already here. Another thing is if you have an illness, not to continuously talk about it. That's important because that, again, could be connected with ego wanting to be more.

You become more problematic, and that's great. You can talk about it. Only talk about it when necessary.

And don't think about it. Okay, you cannot eliminate every thought of it, of course, but don't dwell mentally on that. Allow it to force you into the present moment.

Often healing happens when people are absolutely present, but don't even expect it, but just be present. How harmful is it for humanity in general to have so much noise, in quotation marks, from the various screens that are continuously in our face, assaulting our eyes and ears? It seems this bombardment of images has rapidly quickened and has become ubiquitous while flooding our senses at every turn.

The questioner is correct. It's terrible. And you have to limit the time you spend on it and be very alert to see if you've become addicted or not.

What effect that will have on subsequent generations that now grow up with it, already as little children, we cannot predict. It could have a disastrous effect if it disables people. They can no longer communicate with true human beings.

The attention span gets shorter and shorter because one image follows another. The mind is continuously cluttered. It was already cluttered before we developed these devices.

But now we have the devices that add an enormous amount of continuous clutter to your mind. Thought input, most of it useless. One clutter after another.

There used to be people, when they were in waiting rooms, doctors' waiting rooms or other places, or cafes, you would sometimes see people, they were just sitting there, waiting. Nowadays, it's very unlikely that you see anybody just sitting somewhere, waiting. They're all on their devices.

For what reason? We don't know. You cannot experience yourself anymore.

It takes you continuously out of yourself. You're completely unaware of what happens within. So this is a technology that, in itself, no technology is good or bad.

In itself, it's neutral. But we cannot predict what effect this will have on the generation that is growing up with it now, has already grown up with it. Can they still create anything?

If you can't focus for long, how can creativity move through you if it cannot be still? Focus attention, focus attention within, and then allow the intelligence to operate through you. If you can't do that anymore, then nothing new will be created.

So with your children, if you have children, you have to restrict the time that they spend with the devices. It won't be easy, but all the people who work in, the guys in Silicon Valley who develop these things, they all are aware of the potential hazards, and many of them restrict their children's use of these devices. Every age has its new challenges.

There's no end to the challenges. But we'll survive this one too.

Hi again. I, myself, am a mother of 2 wonderful boys. My youngest is 14 years old.

I love them with all my heart, and my youngest really keeps me challenged every day. The Internet, and Playstations, and mobile phones, and so on, so on. So my question is really, when I see my boy, he is obsessed with these things, should I just accept this?

Because I find myself struggling to bring him out to life, because it seems like he is trying to escape the now all the time. And that's hard to look at. But if you can say something more about being a parent, how do we be a parent, and see the things that our children are challenged with, how do we help them most?

Right, yes. When did he start getting drawn into these gadgets and devices? Many years ago, yes.

And you yourself, do you also use them a lot, the Internet and so on?

[Speaker 2] (35:56 - 35:58)

In my work I do.

[Speaker 1] (35:58 - 36:01)

But not at home so much?

[Speaker 2] (36:01 - 36:07)

I work a lot at home too, so yes, he sees me doing it, yes.

[Speaker 1] (36:07 - 36:18)

Before he reached this teenage stage, were you able to some extent to control the amounts of time he spent with the gadgets?

[Speaker 2] (36:18 - 36:44)

Yes, more than now, because I could say, this is it for today. And he did what I said, but now in this age, they do, and the ego is growing a lot. I think it does that in this age.

And so it's more and more difficult to talk behind the ego, and reach him there.

[Speaker 1] (36:45 - 37:55)

Yes, it's a huge challenge. I don't have a clear answer for it, what to do, but if you can offer occasionally other activities, perhaps that you do together with you and him, or the family together, that do not involve these gadgets, you could do perhaps twice a week, come up with a creative idea, what you can do as a family, and again, not many families these days do that anymore, but set that time apart, so that you can engage in that, somehow encourage him, perhaps by taking him, or to have some contact with the natural world, with nature, go on hikes, sports activities might help too, but having some contact with nature could act as a counterbalance the addictive nature, the hypnotic effect of these gadgets, as much as possible, if you can think of ways in which you get him back into nature.

[Speaker 2] (37:56 - 37:57)

But I will have to force him.

[Speaker 1] (37:58 - 38:39)

Well, at this time you still have some influence, but when he's 16, 17, then you gradually have to let go more and more, and if he continues, then you will have fulfilled your function for as long as you can, to help him not become totally addicted, offer him other ways of placing his attention, and nature is the one thing, if a human being is deprived of contact with nature, which would, by the way, include contact with an animal, do you have dogs or cats?

Yes, both. Does he relate to the dog?

He did, and now, I mean, he has to walk the dog every day, but then he's looking at his mobile phone.

[Speaker 1] (38:47 - 41:03)

Yes, it's a huge problem for all youngsters, even for adults, but even more so for youngsters. We have no idea at this stage, and you can't stop it anymore, but I would recommend for parents of young children to have a certain structure in your life, perhaps you had that until he reached his teenage years, to have a certain structure in your home environment that needs to be adhered to clearly, so that periods when they cannot use these things, as long as you can. Now gradually, you're beginning to lose control.

You still have a little bit of control now, but with every year that passes, you have less control. At some point, of course, in three years' time, you have to kind of let go completely, and the rest is up to him. You have done your best already.

You have provided certain structures in the home environment in his younger years, so he did not get totally absorbed by it, as they do in some families, and now you see the limits of your control. There are still things you can do even now, and then in two or three years' time, whenever it is, then you have to allow him to find out for himself and allow him to experience eventually the suffering that may come with that. Every generation gets challenged again by various things.

As a parent, the transition from needing to protect your child and able to allow the child to find their own way and go through their own suffering, that's the transitional point that you're going to reach soon or beginning to reach. So right now, as I said, you still have a little bit of influence, declining influence, but it's still there. So if you can think of activities to encourage him to explore nature, come into actual physical contact with nature, that would be a healing thing for him.

So I think the hard thing is to know when to work with the responsibility and to accept the moment as it is, really.

[Speaker 1] (41:13 - 41:14)

That's right. Yes, exactly.

[Speaker 2] (41:15 - 41:30)

We talked about that. We talked about this being challenged every day and staying in the presence and so on. I think it is very much challenging with children.

[Speaker 1] (41:30 - 48:32)

Yes, huge challenge. But a great opportunity to you. Often there have been quite a few questions here also on the past written questions about bringing up children consciously and what's the main thing to do to bring up children consciously.

What do we do? The main thing is your own state of consciousness at home. That's always your main teaching.

There's often a discrepancy between what parents teach their children verbally and how they behave at home and their state of consciousness. And the children know that. They can feel that, that basically parents are often hypocritical.

They demand certain things from their children, but they themselves don't do it. So the state of consciousness that you are predominantly in at home is the main teaching. I mentioned in A New Earth to be able to, for example, give your fullest attention to your child when you're listening to the child and not always equate attention with some kind of thing that they either should be doing or should not be doing.

That's how many parents relate to their children whenever they give attention. They say, Don't do this, or you should be doing that. The entire home environment seems to consist of either stopping to do something or doing something that they are not doing.

And that's the only way attention flows out to the child. There's a lack of presence, a lack of the acknowledgement of the being of the child. The entire household is dominated by doing.

And in the doing, which includes the mental doing and the physical doing, in the doing, the being is completely neglected. It's never acknowledged. The presence of the child is never fully acknowledged.

The child is not seen really by the parent. And deep down, the child can feel, can sense that something essential is missing. And what arises then in the child is a discomfort, a sense of lack, and even some anger, sometimes towards the parent, which often comes out when they reach teenage years.

For some seemingly inexplicable reason, the teenager becomes angry with the parent. And they say, What happened to this? How can he turn into this monster?

And it is often the case, don't blame yourself, but it's often the case that for years the child's being felt unacknowledged. And basically that means the child felt not seen by the parent. And then that is almost to be deprived, to be deprived of real lovingness, which is attention, and not the conditional love that is usually attached to the doing or the not doing.

And that is missing, and that's a vital thing that really brings about a lot of conflict between the child and the parent, especially as they grow into their teenage years. Can you be fully yourself? Can you be in your essence as much as possible when you relate to the child?

That includes periods when you're not talking about what he or she should be doing or should not be doing, but just giving your fullest attention. You look or you listen to what they have to say, or you look or you're asking questions, and then you listen. And sometimes it may just be wordless attention too, for brief moments, just looking.

And that changes, that brings in a different energy field into the home environment, and that's the main teaching. Everything else is secondary. What you say to the child and so on is all secondary.

Although there are things you can say that are helpful too. I have spoken a few times about the pain body in children when it begins to manifest, to bring some attention to the child's pain body after it's happened. Some children have temper tantrums or go sulking and withdraw.

So children already experience pain body attacks, some more acutely than others. And so I recommend that after it has subsided, perhaps the next day or a few hours later, you say, What did you feel? What was that that came up when you started screaming?

What did it feel like? Even perhaps ask a child to draw a picture of what this thing is because painting a picture of it creates some awareness and creates some space around it. And then the next time it comes up, you won't be able to stop it, but you can say, Oh, there it is again, isn't it?

So you're not trying to stop the pain body. You're trying to help the child to become aware of it. And you can start with that already when they're four years old, five years old.

So that is very helpful. It's an amazing challenge bringing up children. And every parent makes mistakes.

That's inevitable. But at least your son is lucky to have you because you are endeavoring to bring him up consciously. And so that's a new thing that's coming in.

There are more humans now who are actually, they may not always succeed, but they are becoming conscious parents. And that is a wonderful thing. In my generation, when I was a child, conscious parent was unheard of.

Nobody had conscious parents. Well, at least nobody I knew. All the parents were very unconscious, totally dominated by ego.

They just, the same upbringing that they experienced, they inflicted on their children. There was no change whatsoever. And so conscious parent is something relatively recent, although there may have been exceptions, of course, in the past too.

There are always exceptions. I just never met them. And certainly my parents were not conscious.

They were just as unconscious as everybody else, trapped in their own ego. And there was constant dysfunction. And it was not a pleasant environment.

And there's nobody to blame. That was the way they brought me up corresponded to their state of consciousness, that's all.

Eckhart Tolle Maintaining Consciousness in The Midst of Chaos [2137d47e-e742-46fa-84b2-cc62b613e285]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:38)

Maintaining consciousness in the midst of chaos. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions about practicing presence and peace in a world fraught with conflict and chaos. Eckhart reminds us that we are not dependent on external conditions.

He says it is possible to remain peaceful even in the midst of negativity and destruction. He explains we have the freedom to choose. He says while that choice may not be an easy one, we don't have to be drawn into the dysfunction.

We can be the light of consciousness even in the darkness.

Hello, Mr. Eckhart Tolle.

[Speaker 3] (0:42 - 0:42)

Hello.

[Speaker 2] (0:43 - 0:56)

If I may take a moment for this great opportunity and thank you for being my guiding light, my guru, my teacher, my hope in many moments of darkness and being the spark that awakened me and that continues to do so.

[Speaker 1] (0:58 - 0:59)

Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (0:59 - 1:47)

Thank you so much. My question for you today is, how do I, as an awakening soul, keep faith in manifesting global and personal love, peace, and harmony at this time when there is so much chaos, corruption, fear, and a lot of hate, actually, and anger among the global population and among those close to me? In other words, how do I not fall into the darkness of fear and separation from my source, from my essence, and from separating from others and remembering that, as you say, it is not personal, it is not who they are.

How do I use conscious manifestation to achieve that?

Thank you. Thank you very much. Thank you.

So, to use the term manifestation in a wider sense, one could say that you manifest the way in which you experience what you might call reality or your life. You could call it your life, you could call it reality. How do you experience it?

And to what extent are you dependent upon external conditions as far as your state of consciousness is concerned? How much freedom do you have? Can you live peacefully in a world that is, to a large extent, not peaceful?

And if that is possible, how do you do that? How do you not get drawn into the conflict and anger, egoic dysfunction of the world, individually egoic and collectively egoic? Let's start by looking at, to some extent, it might be helpful as a starting point to differentiate between what would conventionally be called your life, this is whatever in your daily experience of people that you interact with, whatever you do in this world, work situation, family situations, meeting people here and there, going from here to all your private sphere, there's that, so you meet all kinds of people, some familiar people, some people that you meet briefly, have interactions with.

Then you have, in this technologically advanced society, not everybody, but most people, have another level of interaction with other people, it also becomes part of what they call my life, and that is interaction through technology, you interact through social media with more people than you actually know, this is the case with many people these days, they interact with more people than they actually know in their normal everyday existence, you interact with all kinds of people that you've never met, not everybody, but most these days, because people use all kinds of things, sending messages and so on, and on social media, you also interact with people in a different way, so look at then the third level, so we have actual personal contact with people and whatever the nature of these interactions is, it could be, is it conflict-ridden, is it conflict-ridden in your, or is there some conflict, but also a certain amount of harmony in your daily life, then you look at the other level of social interactions through the media, through social media, what kind of interactions do you have there with people that you might never have met, but nevertheless you are in contact with them, what is the quality of that kind of interaction that you have, how much conflict is there, how much negativity is there, and how much is there, that is a manifestation of consciousness, you have to look at that, many people are, there are people as you, sure you know, especially younger people, but others too, there are many people in this world for whom the human interactions that they have through technology are more, much more important than the actual interactions they have with with human beings, they interact through social media with countless people, and they, the virtual world becomes to them more important than their actual surroundings, it's an amazing thing, I don't believe that is a very helpful thing, but that's how it is, it's a huge challenge, so you have that level, then you have another level where you come in contact with the world through what we might call mainstream media, you get the news and you get commentaries, and mostly these days the news and commentaries are mixed up, they come in one, you can't just get the news anymore, you already have the news already embedded in a commentary, that third level becomes also for many people almost more important than their daily existence with the people that they actually know and interact with, sometimes of course those levels can meet, for example you hear in the news about people going into stores and not wearing their masks, and then there's a lot of upheaval about that and people get worked up about this and very angry and then you can see little clips of people shouting at each other because somebody's not wearing a mask and then the other person is shouting something back, and to some extent there can be that level and the person level can meet because 10 minutes later you go into the store and you might witness something similar, so your experience of reality or your world consists of these levels, so you have to look at these three levels, first of all it's important not to lose touch with the fact that level one where you have actual human interactions with people in your daily life, which is relationships that you have, people you work with, people you meet casually, but actual human interactions, that really is the main part or should be the main part of your life, should be that the actual living experience, and so what I'm recommending is that you separate or see if you can separate those levels and look at the primordial level of your actual experience with human beings, leaving aside for a moment social media and leaving aside watching the news every day and all the other things connected with the news, whatever, leave that aside for a moment, it's important to see the difference, so when you talk about negativity and destructiveness and or anger and antagonism and conflict everywhere, first of all look at your life, your actual life, does that apply there or to what extent does that apply there, because that's an important part of your reality, it's the reality that you create, that you manifest in your personal life, that is primary I would say, is that sometimes of course the reality that you see in the mainstream, the media, when you watch the news, sometimes the two meet, as I said before, they can meet, so first of all you need to take responsibility for your life here on the level of personal interactions, that's where it starts and that's where you can do a lot of good and you can do harm too, do you contribute there to human unconsciousness, or do you contribute there to the awakening of humanity, every encounter with another human being, whether it's a person you've known for a long time, family member, spouse, whatever it may be, or whoever it may be, every interaction with another, true interaction, not talking about social media, every interaction with another human being is important, what is the quality of your consciousness as you interact with actual human beings, not not ciphers on the screen, actual human beings, what's the quality of your life on that level, and that applies even if even if we were living in a even more the situation we are moving, experiencing a certain amount of upheaval in the collective, that could be worse, it has been worse, it could get worse too, but I don't know whether we'll talk about that, a certain amount of upheavals in the collective, yes, but what I'm saying now would apply even if you lived in a war situation, I would say it's still very important, every interaction that you have with another human being is of great importance, because the world changes from there, so you begin that, do you emanate, do you have empathy, do you operate from ego, or do you judge people, do you judge, do you confuse people's ego and unconscious behavior with who they are in their essence, or are you able to see the unconsciousness in certain people that you may meet, and then look deeper, realize it for what it is, a dysfunction, a temporary dysfunction in a human being, and you can still have compassion, do you emanate goodwill towards other humans, even humans that can't do anything for you, do you have an empathy, do you feel their being, and only feel their being if you can feel your own being, and you can feel their being is a refraction of yours, you are this one consciousness, one being, so do you emanate goodwill towards others that you meet, all these are important things to be aware of, because that's where your world, that's the foundation for what you might call your reality, your world, Causing Miracles says, which is this cause for transformation, which some people find very helpful, but not everybody, every time you meet a human, it says that it's a holy encounter, a holy encounter, I would add potentially a holy encounter, because in actuality, in most cases, it's not a holy encounter, but potentially, you can recognize not just the humanity, the humanity is a conditioned part of every human being, that's the humanity, you see the humanity, and every humanity is deficient and imperfect, every human, on the level of being human, the humanity is very deficient and imperfect, so you recognize that, but are you able to recognize what I could call, I rarely use that word, the divinity in every human, because in every human, there's humanity, which is conditioned, mind, mental, emotional field, are you able to see that without completely realizing, confusing this with the true identity of that human being, or are you able to see it, and see beyond it, that means, seeing beyond it means to recognize the beingness of the other, their essential beingness, which we could call their divinity, they are also, they emanate from this one source of all life, all beings are emanations from the one source, and so you recognize that, and then it's a holy encounter, when you see more than the humanity, even though it may not be that easy, because the humanity may be quite overpowering in its negativity and destructiveness, but that's part of your spiritual practice, with every time you meet a human being, to see their divinity and their humanity, then you see, after a while, you see the divinity more than the humanity, so to speak, and this is why I use the human, I use the English term, human being, which we use because the English language does not have a word that includes both men and women, traditionally in old books, and so on, people use the masculine, all men, and they included women, but the human were never mentioned, because English language doesn't have a word for man and woman, the German language does, which is mensch, mensch means, could be, is a man or a woman, but English you have to say human being, but I think that's a good thing, because it shows the two dimensions, this, you are a human being, on the human level, you're a conditioned entity, that's, you're conditioned by your past, by your culture, even by the language that you grew up with, by your parent, the parental background, all kinds of things, you are a human, and the human only is ego, there's, so there's a human ego, and then you have the being, the human being, being is the unconditioned, the consciousness, the unconditioned consciousness, so in your daily life, what reality do you manifest in your daily life on your personal, so-called personal level, that's an important question, and now there's so many people in this world who pay relatively little attention to that level of reality, they give more attention to social media, and listening to, and watching mainstream media, they're so absorbed by what's wrong with the world, they don't realize what's wrong on the foundational level of their own life, and they try to find some kind of solution up there, but they haven't even, there's so much unconsciousness in their own life, so the foundation is, I'm not saying completely disregard things that happen in the world, but that is important too, but it comes next, it comes second, it doesn't, also does not mean your reality needs to be perfect, no, you, but you practice, you realize that it's, this level is very important, and then is the world really on that level, the world, if you are relatively conscious, and you're awakening, or awakened, then you realize on that level, your world isn't that bad, in fact, you are improving the world, because whenever you meet somebody, something, you emanate something, it comes through your words, or your actual action, you help in some way, or you, they simply feel good in your presence, because they can feel, they feel recognized, they feel recognized in their innermost being, and this is so wonderful, so you bring a different, completely a different vibrational frequency into this world, on this level, so that's, that's something to deal with, and there, there's a lot that you can, you can do there, to live more consciously, and then you look at the other levels, then how do you use social media, how, to what extent is it taking over your mind, are you addicted to it, do, how much time do you spend there, do you realize that, or do you, do you still participate in creating false images, or for example, on Facebook, people create images of who they are, how they want to be seen, and then they put out all these pictures of them, they are, and, and everybody's, most people fabricate an image, and they put that out, it's part of the ego, technology helps to, helps the ego to become more and more inflated, and then you get, you have more and more so-called friends, people you've never met, 100 friends, 200 friends, 300 friends, who are they, I don't know, but it feels good to the ego, everybody loves me, they don't, they don't even know you, they like the image that, that you have presented, and then many people feel bad about themselves, because other people, they read other people's images, they see, it's all fabrication, so don't lose yourself in that world, because you lose consciousness, you can use Facebook, but in a real way, I think it's possible to use it in a real way, without presenting some absurd image, now the next level is, what's happening out there, what's happening in the collective, and the way in which you mostly learn about it, is through consuming the media, mainstream media, either on television, or on one of your devices, you learn about what's happening in the world, and it doesn't look good, in fact, a lot of it looks dreadful, and so, now, what's very important, what is the state of consciousness that you are in, while you watch these things, to what extent do these things draw you in completely, are you aware, how much awareness is there in you, while you watch, for example, mainstream media, news accounts, and so on, do you realize what you are seeing, first of all, there are some people who select what's newsworthy, they say, this is what we want to show people, out of many, many events, every day, a certain number of events are selected, very rarely do they select anything good that has happened, it's almost as if nothing good would ever happen, when you watch the news, anything good happen today, no, it's because it's not news, nobody wants to see it, it seems, the ego thrives on conflict, the ego, because it takes sides, and by taking sides, it becomes more inflated, the false image, so the news, then, they focus on the most, I'm not saying these things do not happen, but they focus on the most dysfunctional aspects of human interactions, and by focusing on the most dysfunctional aspects of human interactions, they amplify the most dysfunctional aspects of human interaction, and this is not easy to see, that they actually contribute to the unconsciousness, first by selecting all the things that are bad, and presenting them, and then, out of those things, they focus on, take a few things and focus on that, and by focusing on one particular type of dysfunction, or unconsciousness, they amplify it, and I don't think they even know that this is what they are doing, they are in the grip of unconscious forces, they're in the grip of unconscious thought streams, collective, and humans don't realize that thought streams, to a large extent, are collective, and thought streams, they live in you and through you, they are like energy formations that use your mind, and these energy formations, you absorb them from the collective when you watch media, and ultimately, every thought is an energy formation, and everybody has experienced, occasionally, some thoughts can become obsessive, some people, it could be a melody that doesn't come out, it doesn't leave your mind, or you have some kind of thought, you can't stop thinking about this, it goes on and on, so this can happen, but on a much larger scale, huge groups of humans can be taken over by certain collective thought streams, and they don't even know that they are being taken over by certain, and usually very negative and destructive, thought streams, an entire country can be taken over by, it happened, for example, let's say, Maoist China, when Maoist China, like, for several decades, everybody got taken over by particular, everybody said the same thing, very destructive behavior, children would denounce their own parents for having said the wrong thing, and be taken away to prison, the most absurd things at the height of the cultural revolution, they would even, they would tear flowers out of the parks, they said, flowers are bourgeois, we don't want any flowers, we must get rid of flowers, the most absurd behavior, and millions of people, all dressed in the same way, all holding up a red book, and shouting the same thing, and believing in it, not realizing that they are possessed by an energy stream, which is a collective mind form, and then they come out of it now, it's no longer, China has grown a lot, it's no longer, in National Socialism in Germany was a similar movement, Soviet Communism in Russia was similar, these are collective energy streams, that people, they possess millions of people, and people are so identified with it, that because they are spiritually totally asleep, they don't know who they are, beyond those thought forms, and so, when you watch the media, you have to be careful that, realize how this functions, yes, these things are happening, what they, and they are, many of these things are not good, but first of all, you get a considerably distorted view of what's going on in the outer world, for the very fact, that all they focus on, is the worst aspects of society, of what's happening, the most dysfunctional things are newsworthy, many good things, because continuously, millions of good things happen, people helping others, many things happen, but they're not usually reported, there would not be news, yes, of course, you want to be informed, it's good, you want to know what's going on in this world, and some, perhaps, you can help in some way, in the greater, larger issues, that are happening in this world, perhaps there's something that you can do, but when you consume these new mainstream news, be aware, that it is a distorted view of reality, it's distorted, because first, they select dysfunctional, unconscious behavior, as most newsworthy, second, it's also distorted, because once they have selected, out of those things, they amplify certain things, give it special attention, that it gets blown up, and then, it's not just reporting, the reporting of the news, is also interpreted, as they are reporting it, it's not just the news, it's they're already giving you their perspective, it's seen through their eyes, and so, they create further events, by amplifying very unconscious behavior, they create further events in this world, until they don't even know, that that's what they're doing, but the important question is, are they drawing you, as you watch and consume, are they drawing you into unconsciousness, while you watch and consume, are they pulling you down, are you able to be aware, as you watch, so that you are, you don't forget, your connectedness with source or consciousness, do you know, that you are aware, and don't get completely drawn in, feel what you are watching, is human unconsciousness happening, it's not the totality of what is happening, it's you're seeing a partial view of the most unconscious things happening on the planet at this time, so it's important to know that, that then the question is, are you able to stay conscious, to realize it for what it is, to realize, yes, these things are happening, but also, it's a distorted view of reality, yes, and what is most likely happening right now, we need to be aware of that, but it is true, that there is an increase in the collective at the present time, of what we might call dysfunction, or disorder, or even chaos, disruption, we are entering, or we have already entered, collectively, a time period of collective disorder, or disruption, or chaos, there are time periods, that they fluctuate, it's always there, it's true, that the media, the media actually is part of it, they don't just report it, they amplify the disruption, and the chaos, unfortunately, I'm not blaming anybody there, the fact is, that the mainstream media is part of the disorder, that's, that is increasing disorder in this world, and my feeling is, there's more to come, so be spiritually prepared, very important, be spiritually prepared, so that you do not become part of the disorder, that's happening, and increasingly, I believe, going to happen even more in this world, the world always moves between order and chaos, there are two polarities, you should always strive for order, that's important in your life, in the world, but realize, the world, for its evolutionary progress, also needs chaos, periods of chaos and disorder, and out of chaos and disorder, a new order develops, and so there's a gradual evolution of consciousness, when there is disorder, there is a regressive movement, and which means, most people become relatively more unconscious, and in the present time, anybody who is not awakenings, even to some extent, spiritually, will be drawn into deeper unconsciousness, because they become part of the collective movement towards disorder or chaos, when structures dissolve, and that is a challenge for humans, now especially for you, everybody I'm talking to, and many others, of course, it is your challenge to stay conscious, while this is happening, so that you do not become contaminated by the collective negativity and unconsciousness, it doesn't mean that you necessarily need to completely withdraw from the world, you can still attempt to the best of your abilities, to create a better world, if you have whatever your sphere of influence may be, see if you can bring in more consciousness into whatever you do, whoever you are in contact with, be a bringer of consciousness, you bring consciousness into an unconscious world, without creating some mental conceptual image, I am the bringer of consciousness, then you're lost in ego again, but be prepared for increasing challenges in the collective, do not be drawn into reactivity, and do not be hypnotized by these events, when you watch what's happening in the media, and so on, stay present, what you are watching is an evolutionary story, humanity is displaying, probably entering a regressive period, as they sometimes happen before there's a further awakening of consciousness, perhaps, I'm not for sure, but there's a good chance we're entering a regressive period, which is perfectly fine, it's what you're watching is the evolutionary growth of the human species, and so they are manifesting whatever behavior corresponds to the particular stage in the evolution of humanity, the evolution is towards more consciousness, that's for sure, so don't lose yourself, be present while you watch, and don't watch too much, just watch enough to know what's going on, but don't be hypnotized by the media, and so you can't stop watching, and very important is don't be drawn into the unconsciousness, for example, by regarding certain groups of people as enemies of your dehumanizing certain groups of people, by calling them this, attaching certain labels to certain people, the dehumanization, of course, racism is one example of dehumanization, when you attach mental labels to a whole, to a group of people, and you egoically identify with these mental labels, so you're imposing collective identities on you, other humans, it's a deep form of unconsciousness, so there are many ways of, you can even demonizing other groups of humans in the collective, very dangerous things, but it's unlikely that this will happen to you, but it could, if you're not careful, if you're not alert, so be present, and see it for what it is, don't be part of it, but be, do not necessarily refrain from taking conscious action wherever you can, even conscious action if you engage in social media, be careful that you are not drawn into anything reactive on social media, you don't attack other people on social media that was very unconscious, you can present a viewpoint, you can present an opinion, an alternative viewpoint, whatever it is, but stay conscious in all your interactions, so the greatest challenge is, in an age when there is a growth of temporary increase in unconsciousness on a collective level, your challenge is to stay conscious as a human being, who is conscious while this happens, and I therefore recommend on a very practical level, next time you watch the news, while you watch the news, is beware of yourself, your presence, your awareness, while you watch, so that you don't lose touch with the deeper level of who you are, and see that, yes, it is a distorted view of reality, but yes, these things are happening, but nevertheless, it's not the totality of what's happening, and it no longer has the power to draw you in, to make you unconscious, it has a gravitational pull, the media, social media too, has a gravitational pull, when you're not careful, you go, and it's, you notice when you watch it, and you're not aware, your mind stops, you're not thinking, so all your mind gets completely taken over by what you're watching, all the words, while you're watching, you're not thinking your own thoughts, or very rarely, so your mind gets completely taken over, it's quite dangerous, so, but this cannot happen if you're aware, how do you, how are you aware? Well, one way that I recommend is, if you find it difficult, be aware of the inner energy field of your body, the inner body, as I call it, incorporate that into your sense of presence, so every, you are present with every cell of the body, and then you can watch, and then you realize that which is beyond all the unconsciousness, and it's in you, it's also in every one person, that they don't know it, it's in every human, but so you, you can remain peaceful, even while the world is chaotic, that's a challenge, I'm not saying it's not a challenge, and the world needs that, of course, it needs that, especially in periods of chaos, it needs a certain number of humans who remain essentially at peace, they remain peaceful, they don't contribute to the chaos of the world, and so, let's see, we're moving into very interesting times, and there's nothing to fear, if you're in touch with who you are, who or what you are, on that level, there's nothing to fear, because ultimately, what people are afraid of is death, and death, of course, is assured to the physical body, will dissolve, but find death before death finds you, and then there's nothing to fear, how do you find death before death finds you? Well, by dying to the mind-created egoic sense of self, that is a conceptual identity, and by dying to that, you realize your essential identity, which is pure consciousness, and that essential identity, Jesus called it eternal life, and in Buddhism, eternal, of course, means timeless, eternal life, in Buddhism, it's sometimes called Amaravati, which means the deathless realm, which the dimension of the deathless, the dimension where there's no death, it's a wonderful description, that's the transcendent dimension, and it's your mission in this world, is to awaken to that, and then you no longer fear things in this world, in 90 years from now, or let's say 100 years from now, everybody who is alive on this planet will be gone, so it's short-lived, the life of the human is short-lived, but the being, the being is the timeless dimension of who you are, it's who you are beyond form, and then you can watch the news not being fearful, and then even if some huge disaster were approaching, it wouldn't matter that much, because you know that everything that we perceive here is, one could say, the surface of reality, all the things we perceive with our senses is a surface dimension, and underlying that, there is something deeper, it's like the surface of the ocean, and the ocean, don't just live on the surface of the ocean as a ripple, but realize you're not only a ripple, because the ripple is going to die soon, but more essentially, you are the ocean, but the ocean would not have realized its own essential identity if it hadn't first lost itself in the ripple identity, and this is why the buddhists say, if there were no illusion, there would be no enlightenment, and so even that is all part of the evolutionary process, which is so vast, we cannot possibly understand it through the mind, perhaps this is enough for today, three moments of stillness, right now, be aware, the people you see are points of consciousness, and you yourself are a point of consciousness, the one consciousness, assuming form, different forms, and so you are that one consciousness, ultimately, I should be saying not you are, but I am the one consciousness, there's only one I, there's only one I, and I am that one I, there's no you, there's only I, you are I, and so for consciousness to become conscious of itself is very joyful, when you feel yourself, you become aware of being, you become aware of awareness, and there's joy in that, being, consciousness, joy, or as they say in India, sat, sid, ananda, being, consciousness, joy, thank you, thank you, everybody.

Eckhart Tolle Manifesting Our Wants And Needs [172acb2f-39bf-4d0c-8f6b-0392a21d9eca]

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:29)

Manifesting our want and needs. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about fulfilling our desires and what we can do to make that happen. However, he cautions against becoming dependent on external circumstances for our happiness.

He says attachment to the outcome can actually become a barrier. Eckhart believes we must visualize that what we want is already ours and that ultimately the external world is inseparable from our state of consciousness.

[Speaker 2] (0:32 - 0:32)

Hi.

[Speaker 4] (0:33 - 0:33)

Hi.

Thank you. My question was, as you practice presence and conscious living, the definition between wants and needs changed. And sometimes it can get confusing.

And so I was wondering if you could elaborate for us a simple way to define between egoic wants and versus a divine need that's calling forth to be manifest through us.

[Speaker 1] (1:06 - 1:18)

To you, how do you see the difference between wanting and needing something? Or do you see that they're very similar or are they fundamentally different? How do you see that?

[Speaker 2] (1:20 - 2:04)

Fundamentally, from my religion, they were very different. Needs were food, water, shelter, everything else was. But I live in Las Vegas and I have five kids and a pool really feels like a need and not a want.

But they did change where I realized there's a lot more up to me than I thought about what my needs are to... I'm fine if nothing changes. I'm happy and content and fulfilled.

And yet, you know, that would be nice kind of a thing versus I need this to be happy. I need this to...

[Speaker 1] (2:04 - 2:30)

That's a good starting point. So maybe without... I don't want to intrude into your personal sphere, but maybe you could share what it is at the present time that you would want or need or like to manifest at the present time.

Did you mention pool? Yes. Do you have one?

No.

[Speaker 1] (2:32 - 3:07)

Ah, okay. Well, that's good. That's a good goal to have to practice manifestation and it's something reasonable if you live in this extreme heat.

And have you already done some practice in manifesting it or are you doubting whether it would be a good idea or whether you become drawn into ego if you start wanting to manifest that?

[Speaker 2] (3:08 - 3:57)

Yeah, I've done a lot of work with it and I feel really good about it. I feel like it is, you know, like you said, that feeling of that energy, almost like turbulence, like it does need to come forth. And I find myself balanced between this new beautiful way of living and presence that, oh, it's just totally possible.

And I don't have... I'm not going to show up and how it's going to happen. I don't have to stress, I've done that, I'm not going to do it again.

And then I think I slip back into those old, and maybe that's my ego, like, but you have to have a plan and you have to work hard and there's a certain way to do it. And then I get... I don't know how to explain what happens.

[Speaker 1] (3:58 - 14:09)

Yes, yes. Well, I would suggest that you practice with that visualization. It's, as far as I can tell, it's not something that you do to enhance your egoic sense of self.

I can see the reason why it would be good for you and your family to have that. And do you know how to... the best way to manifest?

You know this, the very essence of manifestation is to... Jesus said, of course, believe that you have it and it will be given to you. So that's the key for all successful manifestation is to believe that you already have it.

And, of course, people ask, I've spoken about that a few times, but it's always helpful to mention it again. I mean, Jesus even said you can say to a mountain, move from here to there, and it will happen. In other words, he's saying that what we regard as the external world, ultimately, is inseparable from your consciousness and your state of consciousness.

And this promise that you can, at the moment in the human development, what he said there, right now, it is to be understood metaphorically to say you can tell a mountain, because nobody on this planet has yet... even Jesus didn't do it. He didn't say to a mountain, move from here to there.

But it is at the moment to be something metaphorical. It means you have enormous... there's enormous power in you to affect change in the external world, external reality.

In the long term, you could even take that literally as where humans are moving in the so-called future as humans, because it's... humans are engaged in an evolutionary process. We are not finished.

I don't know if we're even halfway there, but that doesn't... we can't know where we are, because we're in the middle of it. We don't have a bird's eye view of where we are in the evolutionary process.

Retrospectively, it's always easy to see things. So, that's where we in the middle. Are we halfway there?

Are we a quarter there? 10%? 90%?

No, I don't think so. The evolutionary goal for humans is ultimately to realize the oneness of everything that arises in consciousness is really an aspect of consciousness. And the time would come when humans once left ego behind a long time ago, and then where humans can simply manifest by holding a thought, and there it is.

In the meantime, we practice the way that we do. There's a time gap and not everything appears, but often they do if you do it rightly, and if it's not egoically contaminated. The image, the foundation is the feeling of well-being.

The well-being is not the physical well-being, it's the deeper well-being that arrives from the depths of who you are. I've just realized that the English word, the well, is a deep thing. You go down at the bottom of the well, there's the water, the living water.

So, the well-being, you have to find that well-being in the present moment, in the depths of who you are, by becoming still, becoming aware of yourself as awareness, becoming aware of yourself as consciousness. There's no longer you and consciousness. Your sense of identity merges, it becomes, it is the consciousness.

That's the wellspring, the well-being that is. Then, you have an image, the pool in your mind, and you bring the image, you merge it with a sense of well-being. So, it's already as if you were enjoying the pool, because the well-being contains every experience that you could have.

It's already there. So, the well, and this means when the pool comes, you will not, you will enjoy it, but fundamentally, it will not make any difference to your sense of well-being. It's on the surface, yes, it's nice to jump into the cooling water when it's so hot outside.

So, on the surface, it's very nice, you can enjoy that. But deeper down, there's no change in that, because you already, so that means you already have the pool. When you bring it, you merge it with the sense of, and that empowers it.

You can then either keep the image in your mind, you can, you know the famous things that people, you can read about it in many books about how to manifest, you can have a vision board, but people do. Sometimes it's, it can be quite nice, and it has worked for many people and does work for many people. And again, when you have a vision board, where you put an image of something that you look at often, again, not making the mistake of believing that this is something that you need for your happiness.

It almost seems contradictory that excessive attachment to the outcome prevents you from manifesting powerfully. Because that will take it into the future, and they would, you would create a sense of lack. So, you already, this feeling that, as Jesus said, when you pray for something, believe that you have it, it has been granted, you have it, and it will be, it will be given to you.

That's the important part is the, you have it already. It doesn't say believe that you will get it. You can also use, I don't know if you do, affirmations, verbal affirmations, that your gratitude, the one that starts with gratitude is very good, because gratitude is a very powerful manifesting tool.

The gratitude for something, not only gratitude for something, it's generally a wonderful thing to practice gratitude for whatever is in your life now. I have, every day I have enormous gratitude for the trees that I see from my living room, and just to contemplate that, I don't have a thought in my mind, I'm so great anymore, I'm greater for these trees. The gratitude is there.

Well, sometimes a thought comes in, and I've been here for many years, thought comes in that says, probably every day, several times, I look and I say, so beautiful, so beautiful. And then I look at the sky, and then I go, so beautiful. That's my gratitude.

But other people may say, more explicitly, what they're grateful for in their life, in the here and now, not some abstract thing that you call your life. What can you be grateful for in the here and now? This simple, a simple object, just whatever it is, but you can also be grateful for something that has not yet appeared in the external, like your pool.

The same feeling that you have for something that is here now, visible to your senses, can have the same feeling for something that is not yet there. So then, if you use verbal affirmations, I'm so grateful for this lovely swimming pool that myself and my family are able to enjoy every day. It's very simple, but you have to repeat it for several minutes.

But it's not just the power, it's not ultimately the words. The power is the gratitude already derives from the connectedness with the well-being within you. That's the source of gratitude.

So you bring it together. Again, in practical terms, don't overdo it, don't do too much of it. Enjoy the rest of your life in between, do an affirmation twice a day for maybe 10 minutes each time.

For example, whatever feels comfortable, or maybe in between occasionally when you're waiting for something, still feeling. Not in an obsessive way. Again, that's not powerful.

Never bringing in willpower, I will get this pool, I must have this pool. If you do, maybe you would get it, but it's not pleasant journey, and even then it probably wouldn't make you happy. So this is a simple thing to practice with, and other things may come in your life that you may want to manifest.

And that's all, that's the surface of life. You need to honor the surface of life. It has its place.

You need to honor your personal needs. You have certain needs or preferences on a personal level, but they don't dominate your life. So it's again living in the two dimensions, being and doing, the human and the being.

Thanks.

[Speaker 2] (14:09 - 14:10)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (14:10 - 14:13)

Thank you. Let's go on to another question.

[Speaker 3] (14:14 - 15:10)

Hi Eckhart, thank you for taking my question. So my question is about that balance between being and doing that you keep reminding us about. And you see, I understand that it is okay to have worldly, to desire worldly things, as long as we remain rooted in being.

Now, for those of us who aren't fully awakened yet, by default, we're not rooted in being, we're in and out of being. So could we actually achieve that balance? And if we can't, aren't we then, by trying to manifest some worldly thing, aren't we then jeopardizing our main purpose, which is to awaken?

[Speaker 1] (15:11 - 34:50)

Okay. Thank you. Good question.

Very good. Yeah. You're more likely to awaken if you participate in this world by doing rather than withdrawing as much as possible and focusing exclusively on being.

One could imagine perfect circumstances to connect with being. Some people may have enough money not to have to work. They can live in the most environment that is most conducive to meditative practice.

They can have the healthiest food imaginable, all things that are most conducive to spiritual practice, and deeply connect with being that's that perhaps would be for many people, an ideal situation, but not attainable for most people, but perhaps attainable for some people, people around these days, young people who've made a lot of money through whatever they do on the Silicon Valley internet apps or whatever they develop, and suddenly they have a billion dollars in the bank.

So you could imagine perhaps if that, I would not recommend that you try to manifest such a situation, because it would not be the most conducive for spiritual realization, because it would be like a plant that grows in a greenhouse under ideal circumstances, ideal conditions, moisture, warmth, water, air, gets everything, it grows very quickly. But the slightest thing going wrong, a draft, somebody opens a door at the greenhouse for too long, a draft comes in, and the plant quickly withers and dies. It hasn't, there has been no, this is only an analogy.

I've had many stories like that of people who were in that, including Buddhist monks I've spoken to, they lived in ideal environment in Buddhist monasteries, and the moment they got out and had to interact with the world again, they talked, I don't need to retell the stories now, but one monk told me he had attained blissful states of being in the monastery over a period. Then he had to go out into the world and interact with the world again, in the city, people had to talk to various reasons, he had to do it, talk to people, and he could feel himself very quickly losing what he thought was the state of enlightenment. And suddenly he was in a state of angry resistance, and he even found himself shouting at somebody.

The deepening happens through the challenges of life. If you could remove the challenges of life, it's virtually impossible to remove the challenges of life, but if you could remove for a period of time the challenges of life by living in a totally protected environment, that would become your greatest, the lack of challenges would become your greatest obstacle to spiritual awakening. So the very thing that you thought was the greatest thing that could happen to you would become the greatest hindrance.

The lack of challenge would, after a while, turn into your biggest challenge. It would be huge. So humans develop, grow through being faced with challenges.

Now, some challenges come to you are seemingly out, suddenly out of nowhere, they suddenly appear in your life. As you know, some challenges are of a collective nature, as happened recently for millions of people all over the planet. Out of nowhere, suddenly millions of people got faced with the challenge of this virus, suddenly came out of nowhere and affected everybody's life.

Suddenly was that the collective, these collective challenges can happen, affecting millions at the same time. In addition to the collective challenges, similar things can happen on your personal level. Suddenly there's a health challenge, suddenly there's a financial challenge, suddenly there's a challenge of somebody close to you in distress or suffering, somebody dying close to you, loss of home, breakdown of a relationship or marriage, all kinds of, suddenly these things appear, they have to be dealt with, suddenly they come.

Then there are also voluntary challenges that you can create for yourself, which is quite a good thing too, the something that you want to achieve, because then you create, it is a challenge, let's say there's a gap between, I'd like to, I'd like to become a, I don't know, whatever it may be, a musician, if you're already practicing music, I want to write a book, I want to create a, open up a hairdressing salon, I want to open a restaurant, because most restaurants are going bust now, maybe a good idea to open a new one.

That's a challenge for so many people who have worked in these fields now, huge challenges. It's to be recommended to have some goals in your life, maybe not at all periods in your life, because a person's life has different stages, and there may be a stage in your life when you don't feel called to create a challenge for yourself in order to manifest this or that, there may be a period of life when you're fine with what is, but if you stay there for very long, the world, if you don't challenge yourself, the world will challenge you. If you challenge yourself, the world will also challenge you, that's true, but if you don't challenge yourself at all, then the world will create something for you, a big one. So people who want to escape from, they don't want to interact, they don't want to participate in life so much, so they try to just keep away, no, I don't want a relationship, it's just too complicated, it's just too messy, I don't want to get in, I'm more interested in spiritual awakening, so leave the relationships alone, and then I, no, I don't want particular creative, don't want to create anything or learn something new, it's just, it's stressful and it's hard work, I'm more interested in spiritual awakening, and I just sit here and just do the minimum to keep myself alive, and so there are people like that, and after a while the universe gives you a huge challenge that you never chose, but there it is, now face that, because you haven't faced anything else, you haven't voluntarily created anything in your life, you refuse to participate in life, now here I'll give you something, because the humans need the challenge, and that could be the beginning of your awakening, it will be painful at first, of course, we grow through the challenges of life, so instead of imagining some situation that would be ideal, work with what you have, that is the training ground for your spiritual awakening, is working with what you have, and within that, practice, if you wish to do so, practice manifestation for this or that, but the challenge is here not just the manifestation, to stay connected with the present, without losing yourself in what you want to manifest, not losing yourself in the doing, do, you can't escape, you have to do while you're here in this form, you have to somehow participate in the doing of things, but don't lose yourself in the doing, that's equivalent also to losing yourself in your mind, the thinking, they go together, if you lose yourself in your mind, you also lose yourself, because mind is the most fundamental doing, it's the thinking that you do, that people do all the time, they do the thinking, so if you're completely identified with the thinking, you lose yourself in your mind, and you do things, you're lost in the dimension of doing, that's vitally important to always bring back awareness to the present moment, always, that's the entry point into the being dimension, so always, as much as possible, return attention to the present moment, so that you can, you discover the well-being that is there within you, that is inseparable from the vertical dimension that's the present moment, and then yes, if you're engaged in doing, you will make sure that the, what you want to manifest, that it, that's not a, that's not something that ultimately you do, it's something that happens for you, so when you, let's say you have a goal, and you visualize it, if you feel that you have to create it, that's not it, there's a power greater than you, that creates it for you, if you have to write a book, if you have to give a speech, let's say I, well not these days, but often I give talks to people, let's say the average number is about 3000 people, I give a talk to 3000 people, if I thought I have to do that, now I have to do this talk, that would be very stressful, and that stress would prevent me from giving a good talk, because it would not be connected, the talk happens, is the talk comes from the depths of the being, uses my mind, and then the words come, so there's no, there's no sense of doer, that is perhaps the secret, and then also Indian teachings such as Advaita, the teachings of non-duality, they often, very profound teachings, non-duality, it means that you are not the doer, if you think you are the doer, then that's a state of illusion, and then you're of course still trapped in ego, the doing happens, that happens through you, so you allow it to happen, your mind just, it focuses, but the, it's a bit like a, you can have a steering wheel or something, your mind wants to achieve, it says wants to achieve this or that, but the power comes from somewhere else, it's not you, you don't have to do it, also very important to lose the sense of once you have achieved something, some kind of great success or small success, one could fall back into the sense of, I did this, I did it, yeah, I did it, that would be falling back into illusion, all the great, let's say the people have achieved very great things, they have the greatest composers or artists or brilliant insights that certain scientists had that were not arrived at ultimately through thinking, it was a preparation for the inside, like the theory of relativity suddenly came to Einstein, suddenly the realization comes, the deepest things come as gifts from that realm of unconditioned intelligence, that's where the power lies, if then you have achieved something and you have the sense, I did it, your ego claims possession, it takes credit, if your ego takes credit for something, then you're beginning, the power becomes obscured again, for example, when I had in my 20s, when I thought I was very concerned about how is my life going to, how is my life going to be, what am I going to achieve, am I going to achieve nothing, I wanted to be, the ego was very strong, wanted to, it was fearful all the time, anxious all the time, if somebody had told me, you're going to be a great spiritual teacher, the ego would have said, oh, that's great, it's wonderful, well, let's say a psychic had told me that and the psychic, if it had been a good psychic, he or she would also have added, but you have to die to yourself first, so when you become a real teacher, it won't feel as if you had achieved something, then I would, my ego probably would have said, oh, let me think about it, I don't know if I want that and as to this day, I don't have the feeling that I have achieved these books, it's just, it's nothing, it's not, I didn't do it, it's, yes, there is a sense of satisfaction when people come and say, often happens, people say, your books changed my life or something like that and it's lovely, it's satisfying, but I know, there's no, who am I, I mean, there's just a consciousness, there's no separate entity that has achieved something, this separate entity got out of the way and then the consciousness could use that mind, that's all, I haven't achieved anything, so spiritual awakening is not an achievement, it's a realization, that's very important, so your practice then is the doing and the being, be engaged in doing and manifesting and then losing yourself, it'll happen several times, you will lose yourself in the doing and then you realize you lost yourself, for example, when some negative state arises, stress arises, very clear indicator that you've lost yourself in the doing, stress arising, impatience, anger, complaining, you lost yourself in the doing, that's, and then it's, ah, and then return and then it deepens, it deepens and then you, then it, you truly, through the challenges, partly challenges that you create for yourself in a good way, because you want to create this or that, and the answer challenges that seemingly come out of nowhere, personal or collective, you work with that, those are necessary for the evolutionary process, even the viruses are necessary, it's strange to say that, the virus is unnecessary for the evolution of human consciousness, very strange, but true, we are one, the one being, the one consciousness, then names and forms become almost irrelevant, also other things become almost irrelevant, such as gender, age, personal history, color of your skin, those things recede to the periphery, the background, you realize that which is beyond those external appearances, practice a moment of thoughtless awareness, looking at each person, and then the totality, and realize there's only the one consciousness, in disguise, disguising itself as a man or woman, or black or white, or whatever color, or whatever age, or personal life situation, whatever it may be, is the one consciousness, so a moment of stillness, when we become aware of ourselves, or let's put it in the first person, I become aware of myself as consciousness, not the person, the person is a temporary appearance, in essence, I am consciousness, and that in itself, for a limited period of time, occasionally, you could use that as a pointer, I am consciousness, to occasionally say to yourself, but after that, there's a stillness, the truth is not in the words, the truth is, the words are the pointer, I am consciousness, and that consciousness is the consciousness of the universe, of course, it's not a separate consciousness, that's amazing, it frees you from this limited, absurdly limited sense of identity of who you are, and yet you honor that also, it has its place, short-lived as it is, it has its place, whatever it is, you honor it, race, gender, whatever you, it's fine, it has its place, essentially, it's not who you are. Thank you to all of you, we will meet again.

Eckhart Tolle Narcissus And The First Selfie : Releasing Our Delusions [104036a7-6283-4837-9fd8-398132b67871]

Narcissus and the first selfie, releasing our delusions. In this podcast Eckhart talks about self-seeking. He says many people who are unawakened look for an identity in self-centered thinking.

He explained these people may define themselves through social status, good looks, or the accumulation of wealth. Eckhart draws a parallel with the ancient Greek myth of Narcissus, a beautiful man who fell in love with himself gazing into a pool of water. Eckhart jokes that this was humanity's first selfie, and he explains this myth is also where the word narcissism comes from.

He tells us the human ego has existed for thousands of years and continues to wreak havoc today. He also warns that technology and social media strengthen the ego. Eckhart advises that whatever identity we have created for ourselves, that we wear it loosely.

Don't become lost like Narcissus. Instead, make a practice of releasing our self-centered delusions.

Self-seeking, that's what most humans who are unawakened, that's where they're looking for themselves in some enhanced thought form of me, identity. They're looking for an identity in thought, a thought form. It might be perceived as possessions, status, or whatever it may be, but it's really, it's all experienced in your mind.

That is the unawakened state. And we have technology available to us to amplify the unawakened state, to amplify the human ego. That's a, yeah, all these platforms amplify what was already there before we came up with Twitter, Facebook, Instagram, many other names.

Before we came up with that, there was already the human ego. It already existed for many thousands of years. And it all started, of course, with the arising of thought, the arising of image-making in the mind through thought.

Oh, that's me. That's me. The first selfie ever taken was, happened in a mythological past in ancient Greece, when a man called Narcissus, which is where, of course, where the word narcissism comes from, a mythological figure, Narcissus, a beautiful young man.

There was a time before iPhones, of course, a long time ago. It was also time before the mirrors. They hadn't made mirrors yet.

So one day, this beautiful young man saw his image in a pool of water, and he fell in love with himself. I'm so beautiful, he said. Oh, and that mythological tale is really has a deeper significance.

It speaks of the arising of a egoic consciousness, which is an image of yourself that you live with and through. You live with and through a mentally created image of yourself. And so the mythological story of Narcissus is that reflection, a reflected me.

And then that is really the beginning of ego. And now we have selfies. So there's pool of water.

We don't need that anymore. We can continuously amplify our delusion by taking these photos and posting them into the world. And then that's me.

And then other people confirm your existence as an important figure called Instagram influencer. And then you have the power then to make thousands of people or hundreds of thousands of people as unconscious as you are. Identity, the delusion of identity.

Often people ask you, what do you do? So you have to give an answer. They want some kind of identity.

I often say, I'm a writer. Because if I say other things, it gets too complicated. I'm a teacher of being.

That's a very strange identity. Or even worse, I am nobody. And if you say that, and you mean it, because there's some truth in this, but if you say that, and there's probably some spiritual pride behind it, when you affirm your essential nobodiness with a sense of unconscious pride, because you're so spiritual, you're no longer, you're no longer an identity.

And then I am no, I am nobody. I was never born and I will never die. And what you have done, all this might be true.

But you have, you identify with another image of yourself. It's a very spiritual one, but it's just as egoic as the one who identifies with the Lamborghini Testarossa, or whatever. So to simplify, I say, I'm a writer.

And sometimes to make it even more simple, then people don't ask any more questions. I say, I'm retired. I can do that now, I'm old enough.

And it's not untrue, because I retired many decades ago from this externalized existence. So that's fine. I'm retired.

Oh, okay. No further questions asked. I was walking, not long ago, on my daily walk on this forest trail, and a couple were coming in the opposite direction, a young man and his girlfriend, wife.

And as they were walking past me, he stopped and said, I know you from somewhere. Where do I know you from? What's your name?

I said, Eckhart. Oh, yes, YouTube. I'm watching you on YouTube all the time.

And then he said to his girlfriend, he's a famous YouTuber. So I have a new identity now. And now my ambition is, perhaps I too can become an Instagram influencer.

All I need is wait for a different body. So hold your form identity loosely, because obviously, everybody has a form identity that consists of many different things. But it depends what importance you give certain aspects of your particular physical, psychological form.

Obviously, you have a form identity. It always starts with the body, of course, to some extent, you can't get away from that. This form identity begins with a body.

As you may remember, when I talk about form identity, I differentiate between form identity, which is physical form and psychological form, and essence identity, which is who or what you are beyond the physical and beyond the psychological, you as the consciousness, the transcendent consciousness, which is there. The moment you become still, and you're still awake, you haven't fallen asleep, stillness remains. That is the beginning of realizing your essence identity.

But your form identity, yes, it varies from person to person. What importance do you give certain aspects of your form? As I said, it begins with a physical body.

And for some people, that's already a huge chunk of their form identity is their physical appearance. And in some cases, it's a source of pride. So it makes you feel special because relative to others, your body is better looking or stronger.

Or for many others, it's a source of suffering and shame because the body isn't good enough. It's not, it doesn't look good enough. It's not as you compare, the ego compares its identity with others.

And then you look at other, some people are made temporarily happy by their bodies by identifying with it, and others are made unhappy by their bodies. But in either case, it's egoic identity. You might think that if you have a beautiful or strong body, obviously, only for a few years.

If you are really identified with the beauty or strength of your body, then you're in for a lot of suffering. When that beauty or strength diminishes, then you begin to really suffer. Your sense of identity begins to crumble.

No matter how hard you try to repair the decaying form, you can't really, well, you can spend a lot of money trying to patch up the things, but can't go on forever. And then eventually, as it sometimes happens with some very beautiful actors, actresses, when they get really old, and even the repair jobs don't work anymore. Then you never see them again.

They live in hiding. It's very sad. They live withdrawn, don't want to be seen by anybody anymore.

Very sad end to their lives. By the way, there's nothing wrong with, be very happy if you have a strong and beautiful body. Enjoy it while you can, is my recommendation.

But it's not to be despised. It's lovely, wonderful. It's not essentially who you are, obviously.

So find who you are beyond that as soon as possible. Before it starts to decay. Find who you are beyond that.

That's important. So, but it's not only the ego is not only amplified by identification with a stronger, beautiful body. The ego is equally amplified.

If you have a shame or unhappiness attached to what you consider to be an undesirable looking body, that's also of strong, egoic thought form. It's just as strong as the one that takes pride in your appearance. Sometimes people think ego always refers to somebody who feels better and bigger than others.

Big ego seems to be like a triumphant sense of identity. That can be the case. But the ego is equally strong.

In the opposite of that, regarding yourself as inferior and suffering because of that, comparing yourself unfavorably with other people on whatever level, seeing yourself as a victim of life, that's an equally strong egoic identity, a thought form. So the ego is not necessarily and always a triumphant sense of identity. It can be just as strong as the opposite of that.

So identification with the body, ultimately it will bring you suffering. As I said, even if your body is strong and beautiful, and you identified with that, you move towards suffering. And if your body is not, you're not happy with it, you're suffering already.

So in either case, go deeper, go deeper. And then that's one identification. The other identification may be other external things to your body.

Now, obviously, to some extent, the things that you put on your body become an extension of the body. So you look for, if you want to create a certain image, to reinforce the image that you've already created for yourself, the way you dress becomes an extension of, you identify with that, as much as you identify with the actual physical body, it becomes an extension of the physical body. So that can become important to what you put on, become part of your identity.

And all the advertisers, the manufacturers of clothes and brands, they all know that, that ultimately, you're not buying a piece of clothing, but you're buying an identity. And they all know that. And that's what they advertise.

They advertise an enhanced sense of identity. And again, it does not mean there's anything wrong with enjoying something beautiful to put on your body. The question is, does that give you your sense of identity?

Or is it simply something that you enjoy? Very big difference. In the same way with a possession, there's no need to let go of all possessions, because if you radically, as some spiritual people have done until during the past, sometimes it may work.

But the danger is, let's say you're so spiritual that you say, I don't want any more possessions, nothing. And that still exists in some countries. In India, there's an unbroken tradition going back thousands of years of humans who have done that.

And they still, some still do it. So they walk, some of them are actually totally naked. Some were just in loincloths.

They are supported because this is valued there. To relinquish all attachments completely in your attempt to find the deeper dimension with the being of you, that is where you are connected with the divine, with God's source. The danger is when you do that, you create a substitute identity for yourself as a thought form of me, the one who has let go of everything.

Therefore, the me that is superior to all those who are still attached to all those things. And that's the spiritual ego. And that's very subtle and can be very deceptive.

You can spend the rest of your life, if let go of everything, and then you have this huge spiritual ego walking around and you don't know it. So it's much more helpful, except in some exceptional cases, if that is your calling to relinquish everything, if you very strongly feel that is your calling, then that's why you have to go. But be careful that you don't create another identity for yourself, a mind made identity out of that.

Then you're trapped again without knowing it. But if you do, my recommendation is first of all, because you probably have to let go of your most of your clothes too. Don't go and live in North Dakota or Canada.

Move to Florida or here. Then at least your body is relatively comfortable. But even there, you would still encounter problems.

So my first recommendation would be to move to India. And there you will be looked after by people who kind of recognize that there's a spiritual seeker there. India is still many of these people, the renunciates, the sadhus.

Some are genuine, wonderful beings. And others do it for a living. It's great.

You don't have to work. People give you food. You can just sit around all day and be respected.

For some, it's genuine and others fake. For some people, gender is an identity. Traditionally, being either a man or woman was always an important part of your sense of self.

How important varies from person to person. In some countries where genders are still clearly defined and separated, your gender identity can make up an important part of your sense of who you are. For example, in some countries, if you're a man, you immediately have a certain superiority over the other 50% of humanity, the women, that I'm a man.

And then the woman is also pushed into identification with their role. And so the woman says, I'm a woman. And you're trapped in that kind of identification.

I'm not going into gender because it's a big topic these days. But are you seeking some ultimate identity, no matter what gender you are? There's all these things these days, LGBTQ, et cetera, et cetera.

Okay, that's fine. But are you seeking some ultimate identity in that? That's an illusion again.

Anything informed, you're seeking for some kind of ultimate completion of yourself that only the essence identity can give you. It does not mean that you cannot honor your form identity. It could also be racial.

What color is my skin? Fine, you can be happy with it. You can honor that.

But making that into your main identity, then you're trapped on the surface of life. So there's a difference between honoring your form identity and being trapped in your form identity. And also the importance is mistaking your form identity with the essence of who you are.

Mistaking that for the essence of who you are. That is a delusion. So there's a subtle way of dealing with the forms in your life and being able to differentiate between form identity and essence identity.

Then you can enjoy the life of forms. You can enjoy also a possession that you have or some possessions that you have, an object that you have. Enjoy it because perhaps it's well made or it's beautiful.

Does that necessarily mean you are psychologically attached to it? Not necessarily. It's lovely.

But you may not know whether or not there is a clinging. And if there's a clinging means you have incorporated into your sense of self. But you may not know whether there is a clinging until perhaps it disappears or somebody takes it away or it gets damaged.

So you might say, okay, I have a Ferrari, but I'm not attached to it whatsoever. And the next day you go to your car and somebody has scratched it with a dress. Oh, who the hell did that?

And you're upset for several hours. You were attached. So to be excessively concerned with accumulation of objects, that's of course a sign that you're seeking yourself in objects again.

And so there's an addiction which some people suffer from, which is called shopping. And this is they want to acquire. The happiest moments in their life is when they go into a shop and they choose something and then they get to the cash register and they pull out their credit card.

And the shop assistant puts it into this shiny luxury bag. It has a name on it that shows how exclusive it is, the name. And then you walk home with the.

And sometimes the first moment of dissatisfaction comes when you arrive home and you take it out of the bag. Do I really want this? Or you wear it once or twice, but then you need something else.

And then comes the compulsion to for more, more, more. That's part of when you're trapped in essence identity, you're always seeking for more, but not necessarily objects. It could be possessions, but it could also be more of even relationships.

It's never, never good enough, especially these days when so many potential partners are available to you on your phone. So you're in a relationship, but maybe the first little disagreement said, no, that wasn't right. He, she wasn't the right person.

And you start looking again, even while the person is going to the bathroom. And you're already looking, you're getting it out and the more can also be experienced as eating excessively or excessive consumption of alcohol, excessive consumption of food. The underlying that can be the psychological need for not being complete enough, not needed to absorb feeling something missing in myself, something important missing.

You're looking for yourself in all kinds of things in all kinds of places. And there, of course, the famous song from the, was it from the sixties or seventies, Rolling Stones, I can't get no satisfaction. I can't get no.

And of course that is the ego song. This is the song of the ego. And it's sad.

It's very sad. Just before we finish, I'll tell you a little story that happened. I don't know if it's interesting, but I met a man whenever it was before the time when you had to stop meeting people.

So it was years ago. And he's asked, what do you do? He said, I said, people do.

And I gave the most convenient answer. I'm a writer. And what do you write about?

I said, well, no, it was getting difficult because being present, present. Can you explain that? Well, I just can't really be explained in order to evade getting out of having to answer it.

I said, what do you do? And he said, I am a food and wine critic. I have a big website and that's my profession, food and wine critic.

That's not a bad life. He goes around the best restaurants, eating the best food and drinking the best wines. And he said, I'm on my way to a wine tasting in Napa Valley for the whole weekend.

And I just said, this image, this is what they do. They taste a little bit of wine and then they spit it out. And then they talk about it.

They find incredible words to describe each wine. So this is my opportunity to explain to him or to show him what this presence is all about. I said, when you taste wine, if you're very, very observant, you will notice that in the first moments when the wine reaches your tongue, you squish it around in your mouth.

In this moment, you may notice before you say something about it, you're not thinking. You're purely experiencing it in just a few seconds. And he thought, yeah, that's right.

And that's his presence. So even there, he realized that in order to fully experience that liquid, in order to fully experience it, he had to temporarily, briefly set aside any conceptualization because his consciousness was needed fully for the sensory experience of it. And then his mind kicks in.

And then the mind interprets the sensory experience and starts talking about it in ways that I could never do. The mind then begins to differentiate. It talks, it has a, it is a butterscotch-y taste and this and well, the strangest things, the taste of blueberries in the background and whatever.

Very poetic sometimes. But before he could do that, he had to fully be there in the experience, had to be present to it. And that is something that actually applies to many other situations.

You may find that in the first moments of experiencing something new, you're not thinking because you have to take it, you have to be present with it. Let's say a bird suddenly comes, it lands on a branch in front of you, a bird suddenly lands and there it is. For the first few seconds, you take it in, three seconds, maybe four.

You're not calling it anything. And then the mind may kick in and say something about it. Either it says, I don't know what bird it is, or it knows what bird it is, whatever it is, or I wonder what about it, or where's my phone, I need to take a picture.

And in the first moments, there is a complete experiencing before you name it. If you can catch the first moments, you're entering a room that perhaps you haven't been to before, or you're walking around the street of an unknown city that you haven't been to before, you're walking on the street and you're turning a corner and there a new vista suddenly opens up, here's another street. And you look and you take it in.

And there's always a gap before naming happens. And that's interesting. If you can be aware of that gap, then it can actually get longer.

When you're aware of the gap of not naming, when you first experience something, and of course, food and drink also, it's a good one. It doesn't have to be wine, it could be orange juice, it could be anything. And you taste it, your attention is fully in the perception of it.

And if you become aware of that stillness behind the sensory perception, then it gets longer. And that's a beautiful way of experiencing things by being more of the stillness that's experiencing the awareness than the person that immediately names it or finds some kind of personalizes it in some way, find some kind of personal relationship to it, wants it or doesn't want it or wishes this or all kinds of things. In any given moment, you can experience this moment, predominantly as a person with a normal, so-called normal way of living.

You're very much absorbed in continuous mental creations in psychology. Or you can experience any given moment as a presence, not as a person anymore. When you don't name it in any way, you're just aware, then you're just the awareness behind the perception, a walking awareness.

I recommend that you practice that, especially here, but in your daily life, if you can. So what happens then is the, the person somehow diminishes in its importance, and something else arises that still shines through the person, but is transcendent to the person that is unconditioned consciousness, awareness, presence, whatever you want to call it, that arises. So you diminish and something else grows, something more real than the person.

That is also the beginning of awakening. In esoteric Christianity, and some mystics have said, Jesus is the historical person who realized its essential connectedness with the divine. The transcendent dimension, therefore, was shining through him.

And that's called the Christ. This even in St. Paul in the New Testament, says something like, I'm not good at quoting, but I must diminish and Christ in me must grow. That's the realization.

That is, Buddha could be seen something similar. There was a man called Gautama Siddhartha Sakyamuni, or something like that. I don't pronounce it correctly.

And this was a historical person. And then the historical person, I suppose, at one point, he was asked, Who are you? Or something like that.

And he said, I'm awake, instead of his name. And that is the root of the word Buddha means to be awake. And then the historical person became the awakened consciousness.

And interestingly, for several hundred years, I think five or 600 years after the death of the Buddha, there were no Buddha images yet. They came much later. Perhaps the power was decreasing, they needed more images to remind themselves.

And so then the famous Buddha images, Buddha rupas were created. And some of them are very beautiful. And again, it's important to realize when you look at a Buddha image, ultimately, it's this is not the representation of an historical person.

Obviously, nobody knows what he looked like. So it's not a representation of historical person. It's a representation of a state of consciousness.

And then it can be when you know that you can be it's beautiful to look at into the Buddha rupas, Buddha images that are made by great craftsmen. They have an almost imperceptible smile on their face, very, very slight, you can hardly see it. And the ones that are not so good, they look really serious.

And if they have the good ones that have this hint of a smile, you might say, well, what's he smiling about? If all is emptiness, what's he smiling about? Well, he's smiling because he has transcended the egoic self and is rooted in spacious awareness.

In the past, when I did counseling sessions with people, which often means you just listening to their drama, usually it's a drama. And I didn't know it. But I unknowingly and perhaps stupidly, while I was listening, I was smiling slightly.

And a few times they people stop and say, what are you smiling about? I'm telling you my, my suffering. It was hard at that point, I didn't have that many words yet to explain things.

I can't remember how I explained why I was smiling, but I can do it now. It's because I could sense the reality that was beyond the drama in that person. Through my own realization, I could sense the ultimate delusional nature of their story.

And I could sense beyond the suffering entity, there was a being completely beyond suffering. I could, in other words, I could sense the sanity beyond the surface craziness. In many cases, I could sense their essential beingness, connected with essential beingness.

And that is very pleasant. And that's why I smiled, not because of the story. I wish I could have explained it to them like that.

I have these, my bells here, I haven't used them yet to signal the end of our afternoon sessions. I will now ring the bells. Lovely Tibetan bells.

Eckhart Tolle No One Can Act Beyond Their Level of Consciousness [20033f3a-7b47-4130-a1fb-afc146f3cb48]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:12)

No one can act beyond their level of consciousness. In this episode, Eckhart talks about human unconsciousness by telling the story of his father, who he says had profound anger issues. He compares his father to a volcano often brimming over with red hot rage.

And for years, Eckhart says, he resented his father and despaired whenever he had to brace himself for the next blow up. However, he reveals that after he experienced his awakening, he realized his father was not capable of acting differently. Eckhart states that he finally understood that his father, like so many people, suffered during childhood and was stuck in dysfunctional patterns from the past, resulting in his father's anger and an unconscious life.

Once Eckhart realized this, he says he was able to accept his father unconditionally and release the expectation that his father could or should be someone else. Eckhart explains why we must refrain from labeling others because of their lack of awareness and that no person can act beyond their level of consciousness.

My dad had problems with anger, huge outbursts of anger quite frequently. It was like living next to a volcano that could erupt at any moment. And he could not help it.

It was impossible. There was no possibility of being different. And so these humans are run by unconscious conditioning, usually goes back to their childhood and what happened there.

I know why my father was angry. I realized much later that it all originated in his childhood, the reasons why he was so angry. And also for a while, also, I felt a resentment towards that.

And only when I was able to awaken out of egoic consciousness, I saw that there's nothing that he could have done differently because there wasn't enough awareness. Now, when you see that, then you don't personalize or you don't create an identity for other humans out of their unconsciousness because in essence, that's not who they are. There's first recognition, then step one, you recognize that no human can act beyond their conditioning in the absence of awareness.

If there's awareness, they can transcend their conditioning. And then they begin to become conscious of their own conditioned mental, emotional, dysfunctional mental, emotional patterns, yes. So they couldn't, they can't help it.

So that's already a useful step in forgiveness, but you may not yet be able to arrive at full forgiveness because of that. Does that mean then, a question may arise in your mind, does that mean then humans are not really responsible for what they do? If they are unconscious, how are they responsible?

And does that mean then that we shouldn't punish them for what they do? If they commit a crime, are they not guilty? That's an interesting question.

The unconsciousness that operates in human, even if you are able to forgive a human, and we'll come, we'll go more fully into that in a minute, even if you're able to forgive a human for their transgressions or whatever they did, and even though the human is not responsible for their unconsciousness, and yet it is built into the structure of human life, they still need to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness. You can forgive a human being, but if a human being has done terrible things to you or to others, you can forgive them, we'll go more deeply into that. This does not release them from suffering the consequences of their unconsciousness at some point.

And usually humans who are violent often also meet violent ends. And this is karmic law, to suffer the consequences of your unconsciousness is the law of karmic retribution. If you cannot forgive, you become part of the chain of karma and there's no end to it.

On a certain level, it is useful because unconscious humans become conscious eventually through suffering the consequences of their unconsciousness. In that sense, they are responsible, only in that sense. So I have to repeat that because it's quite important.

The possibility is there for the unconscious human to awaken by suffering the consequences of their unconsciousness. And in some cases, the consequences of their unconsciousness means prison, for example. And then the state becomes the arm of karma, of karmic retribution.

In some cases, it's that, but the consequences, there could be other consequences of their unconsciousness. So yes, on the one hand, you can say they are not responsible but they still have to suffer. And that is how humans awaken, through suffering the consequences of their own unconsciousness, which brings about suffering.

And through the suffering that was brought about by their unconsciousness, they awaken. And that is also happening on a huge world scale here. If we engage in warfare, humans create enormous amount of suffering for other humans of others' unconsciousness.

Another word for unconsciousness is utter and complete stupidity. On every level, 20 years in Afghanistan, trillions and trillions of dollars, many, many dead, suffering, disruption. Then they leave, nothing has changed.

Iraq, Ukraine, and who knows? Nuclear holocaust is possible too. Produced by complete and utter stupidity, which really should be called unconsciousness.

It's a more, but really, it's just unbelievable lack of awareness. And if that needs to happen on a large scale, that humanity as a whole will produce events that bring about unbelievable suffering, then the remnant of humanity that is then left, there's a possibility that awakening happens through realizing their own madness and then waking up. But hopefully it doesn't have to become that bad before more humans awaken.

It's a good sign that we are here because quite a few are awakening. And what else? And only this can, only this can save the world, not some little change in a political structure or a different political party or whatever.

No, of course not. So unconscious humans produce suffering for others, but also for themselves, and they have to suffer the consequences. In some way, there is something that almost feels right on its own level when humans suffer the consequences.

And many cases of humans who are in prison, they've done bad things. I mean, obviously some humans are in prison who are innocent, that happens too. But humans have done bad, and they awakened in prison.

I've had many accounts, and I had actually, I'm still, it's in the plans of giving some talks in prison. We had to cancel some because of the pandemic and various other reasons. It had already been arranged for me to go to two prisons in California and give some talks there for those prisoners who want to attend, and quite a few apparently wanted.

So I will still do it, God willing. I will give these talks in prison. Some humans have awakened.

And I know from the correspondence I've had, there are some wonderful human beings in prisons. Sometimes it's just a moment of unconsciousness, and their entire life is gone. And they have awakened into seemingly very unpleasant surroundings.

They have suddenly become aware of and transcended their own unconsciousness, their own patterns through the suffering. So that seems to be the law that the self-generated suffering, which is due to unconsciousness, brings about or has the potential of bringing about an awakening. So that's good then.

You see, first of all, that they know not what they do. Can you forgive them? Forgive means not to make an identity for them out of their unconscious actions.

So to see that their true identity is beyond that, because that's the unconditioned consciousness of the being. And if they suffered enough, they might awaken. There's no guarantee that it'll happen in this lifetime.

Then they go into another lifetime and suffer even more. But for the person who has these persistent thoughts about having been a victim, in order to transcend the conceptual identity of me as a victim, you have to go deeper into yourself. Yes, the emotions are still there, but depersonalize the emotions and realize what is in you is an emotion, an energy field of anger or resentment and or anger.

So they are closely related. Resentment is a more of a mental thing, and anger is more of an emotional, emotional thing. So there's resentment, anger, mental, emotional.

So the resentment might subside if you realize that no human can go beyond their level of consciousness, and that's not who they actually are. The anger may not go immediately because that's been living in you for quite a long time. There is in the, if you're able to go beyond the energy field of anger, which most likely is not continuously there because it arises, it subsides, it has periods when it comes up, you relive something mentally, and then the anger comes back.

But you may be going for a walk out in nature and you're suddenly free of the anger because you don't remember any of that while you're looking at a beautiful tree or the sky, or you're aware that you're breathing. Use those times when you cannot feel it and you're not remembering the past to go deeper into stillness that is within you and to become present. Feel the inner body that's beyond the emotional field and be present and become still, become aware what it is, what or who it is that you are, what you are, who you are.

Are you the suffering entity that, to a body, mind, to whom that happened? Or is there a deeper place? And the deeper place actually was never touched by anything that happened.

So there is a place that's beyond the suffering of the person, beyond the emotion. Connect with that, with the being of yourself, become still, become alert. Feel yourself being the consciousness rather than the person.

You are the consciousness that inhabits the person. The bad things happened to the person and all the things that are still living you belong to the person. You are the consciousness that is inhabiting that body, so to speak, temporarily.

And if you go deep enough, that is the unconditioned consciousness. And on that level, that was never touched by anything bad that happened. And so the forgiveness then happens not through saying, okay, I should forgive you, I'll forgive you.

That may not be quite it. But ultimately, forgiveness is the realization that there's nothing to forgive. So find your deep eye, your deeper identity that's beyond all the memories and the emotional pain that happened.

Find your deep identity. Go there, especially in times when you do not feel that turmoil.

And see if you can become, stay rooted in that.

And then the conceptual identity of me as a victim will gradually or perhaps fairly quickly dissolve. It's become part of your ego. So it's very desirable to get rid of it.

It does not mean that you, any forgiveness does not mean you absolve the other person from, as I said, the suffering, the consequences of the unconsciousness. But not through you anymore. So you break the chain of karma.

But life does it. To observe karmic law on one level is quite, can be quite satisfying to people. It feels, these movings that they started making maybe in the 70s, but they're still popular, the kind of movings where you have incredibly bad people who do really awful things, killings and so on.

And then the judicial system doesn't punish them for some reason because they have a good lawyer. And then they're back in the streets. And then there comes a vigilante.

And some actors specialize in that role. And then they attribute justice and they kill them all. And people love watching these movies.

They're just waiting for the karmic retribution. A more enlightened version of a movie like that would be, yes, these are dreadful, deeply unconscious humans. And they perpetrate these acts of violence.

And finally they are arrested and they're put in prison for 30 or 40 years. And gradually in prison, they suffer and suffer in the most horrible conditions. And the moment comes where finally there's an awakening.

Ah, then karma has fulfilled its function. Karma fulfills its function when there is an awakening. In a way, karmic law is very important.

It operates. It's described a lot in the Old Testament, an eye for an eye, et cetera. And then the New Testament points to the possibility of ending that.

But it's very useful. This perhaps requires only a relatively brief answer, although you never know. It's also a brief question.

Lisa from Vermont asks, is there any useful purpose in terms of getting conscious to talk therapy or psychoanalysis? That's a good, short question. Now talking itself obviously is not going to get you there, but if the therapist is a good listener, something is possible.

If the therapist is able to enter the state of pure awareness while you talk, then a transformation is possible. You talk for a while, you talk, and then the state of presence can extend itself and you yourself become present while you're talking. Talking may be helpful up to a point because you may become conscious of a few things that you didn't know before.

If the therapist is a conscious therapist, then the transformation is ultimately not produced by talking, but because you're sitting with somebody who embodies presence, and then something is possible. At some point, you have to stop talking. If the therapist encourages talking for years, and some people go to a psychoanalyst for 10, 15, 20 years, and they talk, and talk, and talk, and talk, and talk, and talk, and there's no end to it, and it becomes ever more complex and difficult.

So talking can be helpful up to a point when it's no longer helpful, and then something else arises. There's an American, he's no longer alive, an American psychologist, psychotherapist, who is very, very helpful in that respect, Karl Rogers. And Karl Rogers teaches the state of unconditional, nonjudgmental listening on the part of the therapist.

That's the main tool. And that works sometimes, but it's not a technique. So you have to go, as a therapist, you have to go a little bit deeper.

This is not a technique that you can learn. It's not a technique. You have to go deeper.

It works beautifully when it's done rightly, which means there's presence. But there are even some psychoanalysts, which is very much a mental thing, psychoanalysis, Freudian. After a few years of sitting there and listening to their patients, they gradually apply their knowledge less and less, and their particular scheme, how they interpret things through their particular lens, and they gradually let go of that, and they become a pure listener.

And then intuition operates. The more the therapist, or anybody, you don't have to be a therapist, the more you'll be able to be a pure listener, the more the possibility arises that your intuition will speak through you when you communicate with your patient, client, whatever you call it. When you communicate with your patient, if you are a pure listener, then whatever words come to you will arise out of that deep, intuitive level of awareness.

And sometimes, if you are a pure listener, the insight may not come through you. The insight may come through your patient, because the state of presence has transmitted itself. There's an energy field of presence that surrounds you in the room, and the patient becomes found, and suddenly the patient stops talking.

He goes, oh. I tell the story somewhere in the book when I started many, many years ago. When I started seeing people and being in presence with people, I couldn't explain much.

I had no particular knowledge, but I was sitting with people in presence, and something was happening. I didn't know what. Occasionally, I would speak, and gradually, a kind of teaching arose that later became a book, but that took years.

I said things I never knew that I knew them. They came out of my mouth in presence in a particular situation. If I hadn't sat with this particular person, nothing would have come, but sometimes the insight came from them also, and so at the very early stages, for example, a woman was there, came to see me, and I was in the state of pure listening, just like, so not a single thought, just taking in what she was saying, but not particularly thinking about it.

It was just going in. Something else was more important, and she pointed out to me. She stopped talking one day and said, her mind interpreted it in a particular way, and she said, oh, you are doing healing now.

I said, what? Yes, I can feel it. You're healing me.

I know it. Oh, I didn't know that. And because I was fairly ignorant at that point, I thought, oh, I'm a healer, and then she told some other people, and people started coming to me for physical healing.

A few got healed, and some got healed, some didn't, and after a couple of years, I realized the limitations of when people only come to experience physical healing, it's not quite enough. Can you get rid of this? I have this pain in my knee.

Can you take that away? I don't know. And then I said, I'm no longer a healer.

Healing is, of course, it's a wonderful thing, but the deepest healing is, of course, beyond the physical healing. The deepest healing is the healing of the human psyche, that to reconnect with being is the true healing. Then on another occasion, which I talk about in, I believe mentioned in a book at a similar time, that when I started to see people occasionally, there was a woman living downstairs, very gifted musician who gave lessons in piano and so on, but I have to admit, a bit neurotic, considerably neurotic in the conventional sense.

Whenever you saw her in the street coming towards you, and I was not the only one, many remarked, when you saw her coming towards you, you think, here comes trouble. And invariably, when she came, she would immediately complain about something, what other people had just done to her. Can you imagine what they did and said?

And of course, she had a bad suffering in her past. She had told me about this also, terrible suffering. She escaped from Nazi Germany to England, and it's a terrible suffering.

So all these accumulations lived in her. And one night, it was 11, she rang my bell. I was upstairs, she was downstairs.

Can I come up? Something dreadful has happened to me. I need to talk to you immediately.

Real question of, are you asleep? Well, mind if I start? And then she came with a pile of papers, said to myself, you know what the landlord, what he's just done to me, he's demanded that, won't you take me to court?

You must sign these. We must take a stand against, you must sign these documents. Please sign them immediately.

And I just sat there. Oh. And she went on and on.

And just a wonderful state of deep peace descended upon me. And she, after I don't know how long, 15 minutes of 20 minutes of talking, she suddenly stopped and said, this isn't important at all, is it? That was an incredible awakening.

This isn't important at all, is it? I said, no, it isn't. And then she was quiet for a few more minutes and then she left.

Good night. Thank you. That was very puzzling to me at that time.

The next morning I saw her in the street and she was kind of back to her usual self. So it was not a permanent awakening. And she was a little bit suspicious.

She said, what did you do to me last night? You did something, I don't know what. But last night she said, well, the first, I mean, years I slept like a baby.

You did something to me. Did you hypnotize me? I don't know, I didn't do anything.

So forgiveness, recognition of unconsciousness that is not an identity. Depersonalize the emotions that still live in you. Don't attach them to a story.

Don't repeat the story. How do you get rid of the story? Take your attention.

The moment the story arises again, the reliving of it or the blaming and the accusing of it. Take your attention. Realize it's toxic and extremely unhelpful.

Take attention away from thinking and put it into your body, into your breathing, for example. Come to your senses. Whenever you recognize this mind pattern arising again, realize you don't need it anymore.

You don't want it. It's not your identity. These are impersonal energy fields that still live in you.

That's all. Oh, that was the previous question. It's all one anyway.

So this was about talking therapy and so on. Eventually the answer is always the same, of course. But sometimes the road towards the same place may differ.

You approach it from here, you approach it from there, you approach it from there, but in the end you arrive at the same place. Christine from Singapore asked, hello, Singapore, hello. It's about the same temperature there as it is here.

I was there once and I believe every day throughout the year, it's basically the same temperature. Hot, hot. Hot.

I've been watching your videos since the pandemic and it has helped me a lot in realizing I am not my thoughts and emotions. But recently I've been in this state where I'm feeling rather low and I can't seem to pick myself up from here. There are lots of old fears and worries rising up again and again, and it's making me feel annoyed.

It is as if a toddler throwing a tantrum in my mind, in my head. It's a nice way of putting it, a toddler throwing a tantrum in my head. I know that all things pass.

During this phase, I have experienced my deep presence, which was filled with peace and joy. Do you have any tips on what it is that I can do to be okay with this constant rising of doubts and thoughts? I like the image of the toddler.

With your permission, I may quote it in a future talk. Now, interesting words here. I'm realizing I am not my thoughts.

Okay, that's a good realization. The question is, is that realization still there when these turbulent thoughts arise? Or is it just, is it more an abstract realization?

I'm not my thoughts. And then the thoughts come and you are your thoughts because they take you over. So the question is, in the moment of these turbulent thoughts arising, are you able to know that you are not your thoughts?

And that knowing is not a conceptual knowing because I am not my thoughts is a mental concept. So on that level, it's easy to know that you are not your thoughts. But there is another deeper, direct, and experiential knowing.

And the question is whether that deeper experiential knowing that you are not your thoughts is there while the thoughts happen. The concept I am not my thoughts does not help you when these thoughts arise, the turbulent, then the toddler throws the tantrum, then no concept can help you. So the knowledge that you are not your thoughts need to move from conceptual to a deeper place.

There are two ways of knowing anything. One is through concepts. The other one is through awareness.

This applies to anything. It applies not just to your thoughts. It applies to anything that you know.

You can know, let's say, a tree or a flower, one of a cactus, since we're here. You can know it conceptually through saying things about it, knowing things about it, its name, and so on. And or you can know it without words.

You're looking at it or you touch it, not the cactus, hopefully. You're looking at it and not just for a second, but for a little longer, you let its presence speak to you, not through words. You can sense the inherent aliveness in any life form, a flower, tree, whatever it may be.

And you look at it and there's something there that is to unsense the mere sensory perception. You can sense that deep within. You can sense the flower too is present, but not in the same way that you are present.

There's a consciousness that expresses itself through the one consciousness, expresses itself as the flower. And so you know the flower beyond concept. And when you only apply concepts, you only know the surface of the flower, the surface phenomenon of the flower.

The same with thoughts. While the thoughts arise, do you know you're not your thoughts? Are you able, in other words, are you able to be the awareness even to your turbulent thoughts and realizing they are my turbulent thoughts?

I'm verbalizing it now, but when you realize it is not verbal, so you know these are my turbulent thoughts without saying these are my turbulent thoughts. So you're simply in the background of your turbulent thoughts. And if you have to hang on to some part of your inner body and you feel the aliveness in your hand or your feet or your legs and stay present, and then the thoughts come like a little storm or a tornado.

A toddler throwing a tantrum, that works well too because toddlers can throw terrible tantrums. Ah! Ah!

Some little children already have a pain body. You can see it perhaps from another lifetime. It doesn't mean that they are less spiritual.

In fact, the stronger your pain body is, the more likely it is that eventually you will awaken because you can't stand it anymore. That was the case with me too. So knowing that you're not your thoughts on the conceptual level is good, but are you able to know it while it happens, while the turbulence happens?

And you are. So that's the key. And again, as I say to many other people, practice while you're not tortured by the mental turbulence in good times.

Invite presence into your life in good times. Practice presence in good times so that when you're being challenged, either externally or internally, presence is sufficiently strong for you not to get completely identified with whatever turbulence arises externally or internally. You could even, as it sounds a little strange, as a little practice, set aside a few minutes and say, I don't know if it'll work, you can try it.

I'm going to invite turbulent thoughts. I'm going to invite this toddler and see what he does. Try to think turbulent thoughts.

It may not work or it may work. And see if they can stay present. Another thing that might be helpful, the influx of turbulent thoughts, at some point it starts.

At some point they begin to rise. Be very conscious and are you able to detect the beginning of an influx of mental turbulence, mental emotional turbulence? Are you able to catch it at the beginning stage?

And then it may not actually arise fully anymore. If you catch it early, be alert and it's, oh, there it is. Another question you may ask yourself, this influx of turbulent thoughts, does that, is it sometimes triggered by a particular event that is external or not?

Maybe yes, maybe not. Is it when your energy is low? I believe you mentioned some low energy here.

Yes, I've been in this state where I'm feeling rather low and I can't seem to pick myself up from there. It could be that when you feel low, there's also less awareness in you. And so then the turbulence, which is probably to do with your pain body, the turbulence comes in when there is diminished awareness in you.

So be particularly alert when there is, when you feel physically at a low energy level. You can still be alert though. Very interesting practice.

The knowing non-conceptually is of course, part of the awakening into awareness when you have the two modalities of knowing. I sometimes call that unitive knowing because conceptual knowing creates a barrier between you and that which is known through concepts. It keeps a barrier between you and the other human being.

When you conceptualize, we talked about it earlier. When you conceptualize another human being, you form images and concepts about who he or she is. And then you relate through the screen of conceptualization.

So that is not helpful. That creates separation between you and the other. Unitive knowing is to recognize and to know the other directly, not through concepts.

And the strange thing is you can have both. It's not necessarily a question of either one or the other. You can have certain concepts and ideas about another person or anything.

And yet at the same time, not be totally confined to your set of concepts that you have about the other person. There may be beautiful moments when these concepts don't operate and you're able to commune with that person without concepts. So the concepts may be there, but you're not trapped in them.

You may know certain things about a person. Perhaps there's certain behavior patterns in another person and you know this person tends to do this kind of thing. He tends to, maybe he tends to lie occasionally or quite often.

He's done it many times. And yet you are not trapped in a mental concept that he's a liar and that's all there is to him. He's a liar.

Yes, he lies sometimes, but there's more to that human being. It's a pattern that operates in him, a pattern of unconsciousness. But you're not trapped.

You don't trap yourself and trap him or her in that conceptual reality because that's all you ever meet after that, a liar, not a human being. And that's only one example of many ways in which you can conceptualize another person. He's an oppressor.

I am the oppressed. You wear glasses, you must be an oppressor. Yeah, Cambodia, crazy, crazy.

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Nothing In This World Provides Lasting Happiness [40f12108-f5d0-48c7-b893-76340b4e43b3]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:10)

Nothing in this world provides lasting happiness. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about how many of us strive to become a bigger, better version of me. He explains we do this through a myriad of achievements, wealth, status, possessions.

Eckhart says it's like the person who believes buying a more palatial home will somehow signify they've made it. He says when we're so invested in outcomes, we neglect the journey. He believes even spiritual seekers fall into this trap when they chase after enlightenment, which becomes another form of ego.

He explains these behaviors are all a misguided quest for fulfillment and identity. Eckhart cautions against looking for ourselves in everything we do because no goal will ever make us happy. He believes who we truly are has nothing to do with outcomes or achievements.

He says our deepest selves are rooted in consciousness itself. Eckhart describes it as the one transcendent source of all life. He says becoming aware of this dimension is the only thing that will bring lasting fulfillment.

The essence identity of awareness, and we are penetrating more deeply now, the essence identity of awareness has nothing to do with your personal history. You cannot say you can only get there if you have fulfilled certain things in your past. Sometimes the most unlikely people can suddenly awaken.

People in prison for crimes can suddenly awaken. Or somebody who has been practicing spiritual practices for many, many years. Perhaps can somebody awaken?

Or the spiritual practice could prevent you from awakening because you've used it in the wrong way. Because you've used your spiritual practice in your search for something in the future, something to happen to you in the future. Some new mental concept to add to your sense of identity, which is still ego.

And the mental concept that perhaps you were looking for is me as the enlightened one. That I really want to get there. And I want to become the great spiritual teacher.

And I want to get there. And I'm working hard to get there. I meditate five hours a day.

Nothing wrong with that. It can be beautiful. But what is the intention behind it?

Trying to arrive somewhere in the same way that the non-spiritual person is looking for a bigger house. Or one day I'm going to have a private jet. I'm really working towards that.

When I have a private jet and that mansion and another house there. And whatever car satisfies my ego. If possible an Italian car that makes a lot of noise so that people can look at me.

Look at me. I made it. And in the same way that a non-spiritual person looks for on this dimension, on the surface dimension I call it.

You look for some kind of completion, fulfillment of your identity. The search for fulfillment of your identity becomes a bit more refined when you become spiritual. But you may still be trapped in that search for ultimately a bigger me.

A bigger version of me. That's a pitfall of spiritual seekers. In other words they are looking to time to achieve something.

In other words it's future. You look like everybody else but on different levels. You're looking to the future to complete yourself.

Now obviously past and future, in other words time, you cannot deny on this level of existence the reality of time. And you cannot deny that even it is not a bad thing to want to improve yourself on the level of, I call it the horizontal dimension, supposed to the vertical dimension, which is a deep eye in the present entry point, present moment. In the vertical dimension, yes, obviously I'm not denying everything in the horizontal dimension.

Obviously there are things that you as a person would like to achieve. Why not? You may want to learn another language.

You need time. You can't do it in an instant. You may want to learn to play an instrument.

You need time. You want to make a cup of tea. Even for that you need time.

Or you want to experience new places and visit new places. Nothing wrong with that. And you need time to go there to experience it.

Or you might have some kind of purpose that you want to build something in this life. Hopefully not just to satisfy your ego. So for all these things, obviously time has a certain function that cannot be denied.

It was helpful for us to get together here without time, which is a date at the time we could not have met here. I could have said one day we are going to accidentally meet in Adelaide in this room. But since time doesn't exist, I'm not going to specify when.

Now that could take a billion years. But there's nothing wrong with time on this level. It cannot be denied that there is time.

It's everywhere. Whatever you do, it happens in time. Every movement happens in time.

It's a weird expression. Contemporary humans have this weird expression, I have no time. This is really weird.

I have no time for this. I have no time. Nobody has time.

But there's so much of it, it goes on and on. It never stops. And you can't get off time.

It just drags you along. You can't do anything about it. And at first, time is a good thing, because time allows you to achieve things, to experience things, to learn things, to grow, to evolve as a human being.

Nothing wrong with that. So time at first is a wonderful thing. It gives you stuff.

And then time passes, and passes. And then suddenly, what time does, shifts, begins to change. It doesn't give you anything anymore.

It begins to take things away from you. You get old, in other words. And so at first, time is a wonderful thing.

And then it kills you. So you have the two emotions. The positive one is hope.

I hope that things are going to get better. For things to get better, you need time. And the other one is fear, which is the fear that things might not get better.

They may get worse. And so many human egos, egoic, they live torn between these two. Hope and fear, both associated with time, of course.

Hope and fear. But no matter what you achieve, in the end, it all comes to nothing, of course. That doesn't mean you shouldn't strive to achieve anything.

Now, the secret is to be engaged in whatever activities that you're engaged in, in time. But not to lose yourself in the activities and looking for yourself, hoping to find a more complete version, ultimately, of your identity through possessions or achievements or recognition in time. So in other words, you look, the outcome becomes incredibly important to you in your whatever your endeavors are.

The outcome becomes extremely important to you because your sense of self is associated with the outcome. If the desired outcome of your activity does not happen, you become very unhappy. The thing lets you down.

And it diminishes your sense of self, the egoic sense of self, but not in a positive way, not in the sense of losing your ego. It just turns the ego around from positive to negative. So not to look for yourself in whatever you do.

So you're able to be active without the ego contaminating your whatever it is you do. That's very important. Now, how does that happen?

It implies that you need to be rooted in the dimension of consciousness itself, the unconditioned consciousness, the deep I, so that your sense of identity is derived from the deep I, the transcendent dimension, and not the surface I. Then whatever you do on the surface of life can be quite enjoyable. You can also be very active.

What disappears is the sense of stress, because stress means you want to be there, but you are here, and this tears you. The gap between here and there where you really want to be is what creates stress. Stress is always associated with ego.

And all the ancient teachings point to this importance of being engaged, well, not all, but many, being engaged in activities without excessive focus on the desired outcome. Yes, you have a goal. I want to learn this.

I want to become good at this. I want to experience that. You're working towards your goal.

That's fine. But there's not an excessive expectation of when you finally achieve your goal, you're going to be complete and fulfilled and happy. That is a trap and a delusion, because no goal can make you happy.

In the long term, nothing in this world can provide you with lasting happiness and real fulfillment. Nothing on the horizontal dimension can do it. And I have met people who have achieved all that the world tells you.

All the things that the world tells you are desirable. Fame, wealth, good looks, mastery at what they do. They have it all.

And many of them were very unhappy. After a period of the first few, two, three, four years of elation, they were, oh, look at me. Everybody loves me.

And then gradually they became very unhappy. Some of them became much more unhappy than other people who had not achieved all these things. The reason being, they could no longer delude themselves in saying, when I get this, I'll be happy because I have everything already.

So there's nothing left to say. When I achieve this, I will be happy. The delusion is suddenly gone because you have everything already and you're not happy.

But as long as you don't have it, the delusion can continue to operate in your mind. And then again and again you find the world is so frustrating. Relationships are a big thing.

A relationship will make me happy. I just need to find it. I need to find the one who will make me happy.

So you're looking for someone to make you happy. Oh dear. And of course, temporarily you find, yes, I found him or her or some other pronoun.

So temporarily you are getting married. Maybe not, doesn't matter. And then after the first few weeks, months, you start living together, move in together and a little bit time passes and then suddenly this other person displays certain types of behavior that's very weird.

Suddenly it's like being somebody completely different. This is not the guy I fell in love with or the person. What happened?

I chose the wrong person. And in many cases, the person that makes you happy one year, the next year or four years later, very same person becomes the greatest source of unhappiness in your life. The very person that made you happy, so happy, now makes you so miserable.

Your laughter tells me that some of you experienced that. So that too was a kind of delusion. And of course, there are some people who every time this happens, they marry, get married.

There's some people in Hollywood and other places, they've been married six times. Get married, a few months later, gone. So looking for this fulfillment in people, in places, in situations, in conditions, circumstances, looking for the ideal place to live.

And even that doesn't exist. I had friends who moved to Bali. Bali think, oh, I'd love to live here.

I would not be happy if I lived in Bali. Well, here you're already in very pleasant surroundings. But if you lived in other not very nice places, and Bali is a big thing.

I've never been there, but I've heard about it. So they moved to Bali and then they had a house and then it was great. And then suddenly one night they go, the rats were climbing up into their bedroom.

Oh, I can't stand it anymore. This is terrible. Mosquitoes too.

Let's move back to Detroit. Okay. Yeah.

So this horizontal dimension actually is, as the Buddha already said, the Buddha said, wherever you go and whatever you do, you will find unhappiness. And this is why academics, when they study Buddhism, they haven't experienced what Buddhism is. They only read the scriptures and then they read, whatever you do, wherever you go, you will experience Dukkha.

Dukkha is a term translated as unhappiness or unsatisfactoriness or misery or suffering is the usual translation. So that's what the Buddha said. So academics say, oh, this is a very pessimistic, life denying religion, or maybe it's not even a religion.

It's just a pessimistic, nihilistic. It's not at all, because Buddha said, not only said that, he also said, I teach suffering and the end of suffering, which means I show you how suffering arises. In other words, it's mind created by yourself, unconsciously created, which creates the self, the unconscious self.

I teach suffering and the end of suffering. So I show you how suffering arises, and I show you how suffering can end. So that's the other part.

Of course, academics at universities, they treat it, it doesn't mean anything. Suffering can end, it's just some kind of empty promise. So we have the horizontal dimension of life.

Sometimes you can use the symbol of the cross, which cross is an ancient spiritual symbol that actually predates Christianity, but then it became very meaningful in Christianity with an added meaning. Cross is the intersection of the horizontal dimension and the vertical dimension, the intersection. So that regards states of consciousness, human consciousness.

Humans live in the horizontal dimension is a dimension of time, of past and future, of whatever activities you have, where you as a person exist here in the horizontal dimension. Then there's a possibility of awakening to the vertical dimension of life. The vertical dimension is the dimension of awareness, we could say, or presence.

It is a state of consciousness that is very different from the normal states of consciousness, and yet not totally unfamiliar to many. The important thing to realize, it already is in you, but it is unrealized. This is why we use the analogy sometimes, or Jesus used it as the seed.

It already exists in you, but you haven't realized it, that's all. And that's a very important point, because as I mentioned earlier, many spiritual seekers, they seek to achieve awakening. They seek to obtain, acquire, attain enlightenment or awakening.

And this in itself, that desire to attain, to achieve, is actually an obstacle, because you cannot achieve something in the future that is already your deepest reality here now. So you cannot achieve it, but you can only realize it. It's the important difference between these two words.

Achievement implies time. Realization is something else. You realize something that's already here and now.

This dimension of consciousness is already within you as your very essence, but you are still asleep to it. You have not awakened to it. In India, in spiritual psychology, philosophy, whatever you want to call it, they have the interesting term, it's called Turiya.

Turiya means the fourth state of consciousness. The first state of consciousness is dreamless sleep. The second state of consciousness is a dream state.

The third state of consciousness is a normal waking state. And then the fourth state of consciousness is the one that is a transcendent state and that it is the purpose of every human being, the purpose of human life here, why you have incarnated here. The purpose is to realize that Turiya, the fourth state of consciousness.

That's all that it is. And so the strange thing is, you can only find it in the now, not in some imagined future. But the weird thing is, some people need to practice for many years, seemingly, they're seeking in time, and they need to seek and seek in time, until they finally reach a point of realization, which is that they don't need time.

But they needed the time to get to that realization. That even applied to the Buddha. He practiced spiritual practices, became highly accomplished at spiritual practices for several years.

And then after he said, there's something not right, he was practicing and practicing. And one day, I'm kind of paraphrasing or summarizing the whole story. And one day, he sat under a tree.

And he stopped, every search stopped. He gave up searching completely. In other words, time disappeared.

He wasn't thinking about his past, or I haven't achieved it yet. Why shouldn't have embarked? I was so well off when I was a young man.

Why did I leave my family? Gone. All that was gone.

No future. Just the present moment. Everything, time passed.

All conceptual thinking came to a stop.

[Speaker 3] (22:36 - 22:53)

And what arose was just pure conscious awareness. And that was the end of suffering. It was the end of the self.

[Speaker 1] (22:54 - 24:20)

And Buddha, as you may know, is not anybody's name. It's a kind of, they asked him, who or what are you? When he started to teach again from this deeper level.

And all he said is, I'm awake. Buddha means the root of the word in Sanskrit is awake, to be awake. Who are you?

Awake. And now, what is the essence of that? What is the essence of that being awake?

As a little experiment, I could ask you various questions. Let's say, put it like this. What does it feel like to be you without memory of who you are?

Without thinking about your past, or the narrative, or what you have suffered, or changed? What does it feel like to be you? What is left when you do not refer to any memory or any anticipation?

In other words, come to the cessation of the stream of thinking, so that there's a gap in the stream of thinking.

[Speaker 3] (24:27 - 24:28)

Doesn't matter how long.

[Speaker 1] (24:30 - 27:23)

Are you still there with the cessation of the stream of thinking? Are you still there? But well, the answer is, what do you mean by you?

So ask yourself, as I realize this dimension of consciousness, where there is consciousness, but there's no content to it, because the content is the thoughts. There is consciousness without content. Are you still there, and what does it mean?

Am I still, because everybody is I, am I still there? And what does it mean, I, when I has no history, and no past and future? What is this space?

What is left? What is left? Very hard to put into words, and the strange is, the moment you put it into words, it's not it.

That's why, at the beginning of this wonderful Chinese book, written 2,500 years ago, if you haven't read it, you should, Dao De Jing. Good translation by Stephen Mitchell, by the way. If you haven't read it, Dao De Jing, at the beginning of the Dao De Jing, it says, the Dao that can be spoken of is not the true Dao.

Dao is that transcendent dimension of consciousness, it underlies, it's not just in you, it's not confined to you, it's not yours, it is universal, it underlies the entire manifested universe, it is the intelligence behind it all, so to speak. Am I still, am I still there, and what does it mean, I, when I have no content? Now, you can't really answer that question, maybe it's a silly question, but the question points you to a realization that is beyond words, and that is also why, similarly to this practice, a similar other practice that also recommended often by Ramana Maharshi, the wonderful spiritual teacher, he often said to people to use the meditation, who am I?

So, these are words, of course. Who am I? He said, meditate on that.

Okay, now, how do we do that? Same thing as just, who am I? The answer is not to be found on the level of your personality, or your age, or your gender, or your sex, or gender, personality, or status in the world, whatever, nothing to do with that.

The answer is not to be found in the conceptual realm at all.

[Speaker 3] (27:24 - 27:37)

So, who am I? The stillness that follows that question is the answer.

[Speaker 1] (27:40 - 28:16)

Although you can't talk of it, I'm talking anyway, because not as a substitute for it, but as helpful pointers no more. What is left that we, my stillness is one word we could use. There's a lovely line in the Bible, in the Old Testament it is, be still and know that I am God.

That's perhaps the most profound sentence in the Bible. Be still and know that I am God. Now, look at those words.

[Speaker 3] (28:17 - 28:23)

Be refers to being, being itself.

[Speaker 1] (28:25 - 29:53)

Still refers to the inner stillness, which is a cessation of conceptual thinking. And know, there is a very deep knowing that far transcends conceptual knowledge. There is a deep knowing.

Know that I am, I am is the first person singular of the verb to be. Many people don't always realize they look so different. It is the realization of I am, without adding anything to it, it is a very essence of beingness itself.

God is the transcendent source of all life. So these, all these words, be, still, I am, God, all point to the one central reality that is beyond words. So in the stillness, you realize that, that is the I am.

And again, in the Bible, another lovely phrase when they ask God, who are you? Was it Moses or Abraham? I can't remember.

Ask God, what's your name? Who are you? And God says, I am.

I am that I am. I am, or I am the I am. I would translate it.

Eckhart Tolle Obstacles To Awakening [229d3782-1d48-4e0e-ac24-2d8eb44e0c16]

Obstacles to Awakening. In this episode, Eckhart talks about the ego and other factors that block us from deeper awareness. He explains why the ego loves opposition and thrives on feeling superior.

He says being obsessed with the need to be right in a conversation is a perfect example because some may defend their position so fiercely they become completely unconscious. He says awakening is the only thing that can save us from our egos. Eckhart believes with practice we discover a joyfulness in the depths of our being that has nothing to do with what's happening out there.

One of the most unconscious things that you can be engaged in is to be obsessed in a conversation with a need to be right. And you don't know what's happening. Why is this emotional need to be right within very unconscious people results in physical violence.

They're just discussing political thing and they get heated up more and more and then physical violence results. What for? Or driving in traffic, road rage.

Completely insane, but the ego loves it. Imagine how what the food for your ego when you get into a road rage. You are so right and that person is so wrong they're not even human anymore.

That's how wrong they are. They're not human. You might as well kill them because they're not human.

So you reduce people to mental figures, to mental abstractions and you reduce yourself because you're so identified with the mental emotional field that arises. You reduce yourself to a mental abstraction. This is the ego.

It's crazy. One important thing again, I'm mentioning it because it may still occasionally arise in you even though you are awakening spiritually. You need to be able to recognize the ego when it arises in you.

The ego loves opposition. Attempts to emphasize the otherness of other human beings. To make the others really other so that this is a mental concept and you can find this phenomenon very powerfully on the internet.

When people attack others through words, perhaps they wouldn't dare say that to their face, but on the internet, the internet is full of very angry egos attacking others and identifying with their mental positions. So you identify the mental position and if somebody else's mental position you can see as your enemy is the opposite mental position that strengthens your egoic sense of self and the ego loves that. And now through the miracle of technology you can amplify that through the technology and your anger you can send it out into the world and you can make everybody wrong except you.

If you should discover that in when you look back about the last few years in your relationships and people that you have known, if by some strange coincidence or chance you discover that you have always been and are always right in any discussion, the others are always wrong. Isn't that strange? In every discussion, how is it possible that I'm always right and the others are always wrong?

I must be superhuman. No, you have a big ego, that's all. Another thing, I mention that because you might still find it arising in you from time to time.

Related to making wrong is complaining. It's a mind pattern that complains uselessly, not because something can be done about a situation, but complaining uselessly either in your mind or out aloud. You can complain about what are the favorite complaints?

Other people. Oh that's, well there's plenty of opportunity for complaining, you might have noticed. You can complain about people, what they did, what they didn't do, what they should have done, but didn't, and all kinds of things.

You can complain about what you're doing, you're doing it, but don't want to be doing it, but you're doing it, it shouldn't be, it's a very dysfunctional state to be in, but the ego, the ego loves it, it strengthens it. So, and then you complain about a place where you are. Some people never really want to be where they are, it's always very soon, soon they find something wrong here, and you, oh great, complain again.

And then you notice, if you look, what is the, what is the logic behind why complaining, why does that strengthen the ego so much? Well, it does that because this egoic sense of self functions through seeking superiority. It needs to be superior to someone else, but even if you complain about a situation or place, you can still feel yourself, you are superior to this place that you are complaining about.

In other words, whenever you complain about something or somebody or even some activity, you put yourself by implication into a position of moral superiority. So criticizing another human being by implication, you have made yourself morally superior because you're pronouncing judgment. So it's an egoic device, it's unconscious, it strengthens your false sense of self, and this is why the ego loves complaining.

And a good spiritual practice I recommend is, especially if you can detect the complaining pattern in your mind, you know that's been there or is there, set aside, let's say, between one o'clock and two o'clock, I will see, I will let go of any complaint, and I will just relinquish complaining. See if I can go through one hour of this today without any mental complaint. So, and that's a good spiritual practice.

Now, what do you do when the moment the complaint pattern comes up in your mind, you become aware of it, and because that's your spiritual practice, and say, okay, this is pointless, it is useless, let's see if I can relinquish that. And then you let the thought come and you let go. And this is it, but it requires some awareness in you.

This only awareness can free you of the conditioned mind. And only awareness is the awakening out of the egoic consciousness. And so, the awakening is the realization that, yes, you have this form identity, yes, you have a past, but who you are is deeper than that.

And that awareness comes, begins to come when you become aware of your, the voice in your head. And you take one step back, so to speak, within yourself. And then you become aware of certain patterns, things that you tend to think repeatedly, perhaps been thinking for years, certain thought patterns that form the basis for your sense of self, certain stories that you repeat to yourself and others, things that you have done to people, things that you have suffered from people, things that you have achieved, things that you lost, all kinds of concepts. Now, the ego loves superiority, but of course, many egos find it very hard to get superiority, because for superiority, you need to identify with something that is better than others. So, there are quite a few millions of people in the world whose ego is struggling for superiority, well, you can do it at home, you can do it with your wife or your children, there you can be the controlling one who is always right, or the limited circle of your friends, but if you do too much there, you lose all your friends.

Usually, the ego looks for amplification through possessions, through a body that's better than other bodies. If you're lucky enough, your body looks stronger or better looking than other bodies, then for a few decades, 20, 30, then begins to get doubtful. You can feel superior to other bodies, either stronger or more beautiful or better formed.

So, there's this body identification, there's if you're lucky enough, I didn't, I wasn't, I didn't have a great body, neither beautiful nor strong, so that was out for my ego. Then my ego, you're struggling, how I'm verbalizing something now that was implied or unconscious, the ego looks, where can I be superior? And then my family history, was I from an aristocratic, I could identify with that as a mental concept, my family going back to the year 1200, and my ancestors, no, I couldn't go beyond my grandfather, didn't know who was his father, so there was nothing there.

And then started possessions, no, I was poor, I have no money to buy anything, I could afford a bicycle, but not a car, so there wasn't much superiority, although then I began to see, that was all in my 20s, beginning of finding superiority, not necessarily through possessions, but through enhancing a mental image. And my mental image was, I was becoming intellectual, so I identified with knowledge, that I knew more than others, and I will show you how knowledgeable I am by making clever remarks and quote obscure philosophers and literature. And I carried my knowledge like somebody else would carry a designer dress or something, that I would carry my knowledge in the same way.

And then I was on my bicycle, and the BMW went past, zooming past me and almost ran me over, and I could think, well, how superior I was to this materialistic, undoubtedly uneducated person, that BMW. So I had a mental concept of myself, obviously, as superior, and you can have that, you have to be careful with that in spiritual terms, that you don't do that to other, but you develop a spiritual concept, who you are, you're spiritually advanced. Now you may be, you probably are, because otherwise you wouldn't be here, but the danger is to live through a mental concept of who you are.

That's a conceptual sense of self, a conceptual identity. Now, what would I have done if I, at least I had my mind, and so I had a relatively developed mind, so I could have a mental concept as a great intellectual, and so one day I would become a professor, I thought. Little did I know what was going to happen, but if I didn't have that, let's say you have neither possessions, nor family history, nor a good body, nor a good, sharp mind, not highly educated, how can I be superior?

And all the, oh, yes, the ego will very quickly find one of the most powerful ways of being superior, and that is you become a victim. I am a victim. You can be a victim on a personal level, because undoubtedly, having been born into this world, you must have met people who did bad things to you.

I did. And, of course, I do not doubt that there were people who did very bad things to you. That we cannot doubt.

It is also possible that there were people who did bad things to your group, whatever collective you identify with, no doubt, this also has happened. But to make that into a basis for your sense of self is a huge prison that you voluntarily enter, but it amplifies the ego. And immediately, the moment you have a mental concept of yourself as a victim, whether a collective victim or personal victim, by implication, you are morally superior to everybody else who is not a victim.

Oh. So the ego can be superior morally, and you're still, you're trapped in mental concepts. It's so seductive, the ego.

And so, every time you, whenever you got seduced into that sense of identity, it's never long before you encounter what the Buddha called dukkha, suffering. Ultimately, in any egoic identity, very soon you encounter unhappiness, you encounter suffering, you encounter a sense of lack, of not enough, you become angry. And so, the suffering cannot be separated from being, living on the surface level of reality, only the surface of who you are.

I compare that with the surface of the ocean, and every human being is a ripple. And some are waves, but it makes no difference. If you're a big human being with VIP, you're a wave.

Most humans are ripples. This is the surface of the ocean. And the ripple may not realize, because it's so identified with its form identity, that all it sees on the surface level is millions of other ripples.

Some of which are threatening, it compares itself, it tries to be superior to as many ripples as it can, but it's trapped in its ripple identity, not realizing that it is a temporary manifestation, very short-lived temporary manifestation of the ocean. Now, imagine a ripple that never realizes that it is a temporary surface manifestation of this vast, almost infinite being that is the ocean. And it lives on the surface in a sense of insufficiency, a very ultimately very frustrating kind of life in the surface I, never realizing the deep I.

But I'm using I as the pronoun when you say I. When you're on the surface only, whenever you say I, you refer to your story, your life that is a mental narrative. And this is what people refer to when they say I.

It's the surface I. But there's a possibility of realizing a deeper I, and I call that the deep I. And that is not related to who you are on the surface level.

On the surface level, your life could be a huge success story, or your life could be, by the way, no life is a huge success story for that long, just doesn't cost, or it could be a huge failure. Let's say your entire life is one bad decision after another, and you end up in a prison cell. Let's imagine that.

So your life could be that, or it could be that. The deep I has nothing to do with that. The deep I is a timeless dimension of consciousness.

And the deep I is encountered. Now you cannot encounter it by saying, now I have it. There it is.

The deep I can never become an object in your consciousness. Everything else is an object in your consciousness. When you look at something, the sense perception is an object.

It arises as an object, and then you look somewhere else, then another object arises, and you listen to something, and there's a sound. The sound becomes an object in consciousness. Or you have a thought.

The thought is like a ripple movement, so to speak, on the surface of consciousness. These are thoughts, and emotions are a little bit deeper, but they're still fairly close to the surface. They are wave movements on the surface of consciousness.

And yet you, the essence of who you are, you are consciousness. You are not an object in consciousness, although when you live through the ego, you make yourself into an object of your consciousness, like Narcissus. It started with him.

He looked into the puddle, saw a reflection of himself, and then he lived with an object in his consciousness and said, I, that's me. Amazing. But humans had to go through that.

We had to go through this egoic consciousness, but now comes a point, very soon, if not already, where we need to go beyond this very limited understanding of who we are, because if we don't, the egoic consciousness becomes increasingly dangerous and even insane, especially if amplified by technology. If the dysfunction is amplified by technology, in the past it didn't matter, people, you could only kill so many people with a sword or a club, but now amplified by technology, that state of consciousness is becoming a menace on the planet. So it's a danger to ourselves and to all life on the planet.

The transition from egoic consciousness to deeper realization of the transcendent consciousness, which is one way of putting it, must happen now, or very soon, in a sufficient number of people, and then the world will reflect this changing consciousness. Whether this can happen without any regressive movement first, I do not know, because many developments, consciousness develops slowly, but now more rapidly than before, but it never is just an upward movement, there's always a regression involved. Whenever there's a movement, you, there's a step back, and then it comes out.

It's a wave movement of consciousness, it goes, it is possible that we may enter a regressive period, I don't know, but it doesn't matter. The important thing is there is already a growing awakening in a growing number of humans, more than ever before, still a minority, but there is an awakening of this consciousness. And now, for the rest of the evening, we need to go more deeply into this awakening, transcendent consciousness.

We've looked at all the things that stand in the way, all the things that are very seductive, they seduce us away from that realization. It's very much when you are trapped in your mind, it's a hypnotic state, and in spiritual terms, you are actually asleep. When you are completely identified with every arising thought, you are in a state of spiritual sleep.

You're dreaming a kind of dream, and the dream that you're dreaming is conditioned by your past. So humans dream different kinds of dreams. If there's no awareness, then you are, in spiritual terms, unconscious.

Spiritual unconscious is very different from conventional unconscious. In conventional terms, when you're unconscious, obviously you are, you're knocked out, you go, but in spiritual terms, when you're unconscious, you're completely identified with the stream of thinking, plus the emotions that accompany the stream of thinking. That's unconscious.

And then you're not present, you're not here, you're somewhere in your thought world. And even if a person like that looks at you, they see you through the veil of their thoughts, their conditioned mind. They're not really seeing you, not really, it's just, there's a huge sense of separation always.

This becomes the huge veil through which you look at the world, which is your mind, your conditioned mind. And you look at yourself in the same way. You become a stranger to yourself, you become alienated from yourself, you become an object in your consciousness.

This is a purely human thing. Other life forms don't have that, because it arises through thinking, which is a wonderful evolutionary step forward, a wonderful advance, but there was a huge price to pay for the development of the ability to think. There's always a price to pay.

And the huge price to pay was loss of awareness of the essence of who you are. Now, what about all the life forms that haven't arrived at thinking yet? Well, the dog, the dog, your dog or somebody else's dog, everybody knows some dogs.

A dog does not live through a mental concept. The dog has not arrived at the Narcissus thing, even if the dog might see himself in a mirror, either he begins to realize that it's a mirror or gets very excited. But it doesn't translate into a mental image.

The dog has no mental image, has no self-concept, it doesn't have a conceptual identity. The dog has no opinion about you, there's a consciousness there, but it's not abstract, it's not conceptual, it's not thinking, it just is and it looks at you. And there's no ego there, except very few.

And there are some neurotic dogs that show the beginnings of an ego, but the reason is they've lived with humans, a human neurotic ego for too long. But otherwise, it's a miracle how sane often the dog is compared to the owner of the dog. And how joyful the dog is, able to appreciate the present moment, how it greets the owner even after an absence of half an hour, as if it hadn't seen him for 10 years.

Such joy! Wow! He doesn't, he hasn't created a lot of past in the mind, it's just, so the dog exists prior to thinking.

What's happening to us, we are rising above thinking. That is a state of presence. So it's not that you no longer think after that, you transcend thinking, you're no longer in the grip of thinking.

You're able to think, but you no longer look to thinking for your identity, you no longer look to a sense or to a story in your mind and derive from it your sense of who you are.

So if you are not the story, who are you? Ah, well you are not an object that arises in your consciousness.

This is why when they asked Jesus, show us where is the kingdom of heaven, you talk about it all the time, where is it, show us where it is, and he says the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be perceived, it does not come with signs to be perceived, because it's already here, it's within and without, it's already here, it's already here. So the consciousness that you are is not something you need to attain because you are already it. It's not something that you can look for because the very act of looking, the consciousness that's looking for yourself is yourself.

I'm looking for my true self, or you can say I'm looking for God, and you're expecting God to arise as an object in your consciousness. It would be very limited because any object that arises in your consciousness comes and goes. So can you become aware then, and here's the key, can you become aware that in addition to who you are as a person, and not so much in addition, but transcendent to who you are as a person, you are consciousness?

Because this is the one thing that is beyond any doubt in your so-called life. I'm saying so-called because you don't have a life. You are life.

You don't have it because we say I have my life, you separate, you see me and my life. You are life, and life is, the essence of life is consciousness that manifests in various vibrational frequencies. So even if we are dreaming this, perhaps this is your dream.

Let's imagine for a moment that you sitting there listening to man on a chair. Let's imagine for a moment that this is a dream, and if it is a dream, there still needs to be something about this dream that makes this dream possible, and that which makes this dream possible is the light of consciousness in which the dream appears. So the consciousness is prior to everything.

The consciousness is the ocean. The thoughts and emotions, the surface of the ocean, they're not separate. So you are the ocean.

What does that mean? You are consciousness in essence, which is timeless. How can I know that I'm consciousness?

You cannot know it conceptually. You can only know it directly in the gap between two thoughts. For example, now.

And now, in this now, let's just experiment with this now. You don't need to remember anything. What for?

I mean, you don't anyway. You don't, unless I ask you right now, you don't think of your name, you don't think of your email address, you don't think of your telephone number or your entire past, unless I ask you and then you retrieve it from somewhere. But right now, you don't need any of this.

You don't need. Let's see what happens to you if you don't remember anything from right now. Just let's pretend that all that exists is this moment, and that nothing ever happened.

Wow. All that exists is this moment, nothing ever happened, and nothing ever will happen. And all that's left is this moment.

And in this moment, you don't remember your story, you don't remember your name, and yet there is something here that you cannot define. And what's left when you let go of past and future, which are thoughts, what is left is just a strange sense of presence. This is the undoubted fact that you are.

And when you say it, you would say, I am. This you cannot doubt. Everything else may be some kind of illusion when you add something to this deep sense of beingness, because when you say, I am, it's a sense of being.

If you're not familiar with English grammar, or you've forgotten about it, you might have forgotten that when you say, I am, it's the first person singular of the verb to be. It sounds like a totally different word. Why don't you say, I be?

But for some reason you say, I am. But I am is the sense of being. The sense of being, the sense of, I don't call it the sense of existing, because existing is, existence comes out of being.

X is Latin for out. So it stands out, which means anything that is manifested is existence. Your body exists for a while.

Every object exists. Sense perceptions exist. Thoughts exist.

They are manifested. But they can only exist because there's something that is formless, is a vast space that is the unconditioned consciousness prior to the arising of form. And you can sense it.

This is the great realization. You can sense it within yourself when for a moment you're not thinking, but you're not falling asleep. You're not thinking, and yet what remains in this gap between two thoughts is a sense of beingness.

You undoubtedly know that you are, that you can't question. That is the light of consciousness. You are that.

It's not an object. It's the eternal subject within which everything else arises. So it's the most magnificent thing if you can become aware here and now, or anywhere, it's always here and now, become aware to, we can put it like this now, another little signpost, you become aware that you are aware right now.

You're aware that you are conscious. That's for sure. And to say that you are conscious is already a falsification.

It happens because we're using language. Language requires a subject and an object in a sentence structure. So even to say I am conscious creates already a duality between you and conscious, as if consciousness were an addition to you.

It would actually be more accurate to say I am consciousness. I am consciousness. And I am this consciousness, I use the analogy of the ripple and the ocean, that consciousness transcends totally who you are as a person, with a personal identity, the form identity.

It is totally transcendent, but it is not separate. It's, you are the little thing that comes out of the totality, out of the vastness of universal consciousness, produces a little ripple, and the ripple is, my name is so-and-so, and I was born so-and-so, and I've achieved this, and I failed at that. But that consciousness has come out of the universal consciousness.

It is an aspect of the universal consciousness that is experiencing itself for a very short time period as a human being. A human being. I love that expression, which we have to use in the English language, because the English language doesn't have a word that contains both man and woman.

The German language has a word, mens, which is both woman and man, one term, combines men and women. English language doesn't have that. So you have to say human being.

Even, well, some people say, well, there's still the word man and the human, but let's forget about that. You have a human being. You are a human being, meaning, this is how I interpret it.

It's very, very helpful. The human is your form identity, who you are as this person. And the being is your essence identity, the transcendent dimension that connects you with the totality of all life, that you are connected with the totality of consciousness.

That is in this analogy of ripple and ocean. The being is the ocean. The human is the ripple.

So you are a human being, and you need to live in both dimensions. If you lose yourself in the human dimension only, you are lost. This is why, in some traditions, you'd say you need salvation.

You need to come to the end of suffering, because if you live only as a human on the surface level of reality with your personal history and that unhappy story of me, you are lost. Basically, you're like, oh, where do I go now? And you're always never going there, always, there it is.

No, no, go this way. No. Here, the human, and then the being.

The being is consciousness itself. The being transcends the human, but contains the human, like the ocean and the ripple. So you need to become, then, invite the state of pure beingness or presence into your life as much as possible.

And this is right now, for example, are you aware that you are conscious right now? What could be more obvious and ultimately easy to realize that this beingness is the fundamental thing about you, is you are an expression of consciousness. And there's no concepts in it.

It's only by relinquishing concepts can you realize that deeper essence. And then you can look at things, and this is a wonderful spiritual practice. Perceive things by looking or listening or touching, whatever.

You perceive things, develop the ability to perceive things without automatically mentally labeling them. Perceive, just look at a tree, and let go of the label of what it is, and look at it. And when you look at it, then there's in the background, there is an awareness, or we can call that awareness stillness.

It's another signpost pointing to the same place or no place. There's a stillness, but you need an alert, certain alertness, otherwise you lose the stillness immediately to the momentum of the noisy mind. So there's an alert stillness, and in that alert stillness, you can look.

I recommend first to do natural things that don't stimulate thought so much. You can look at a flower, you can look at a tree, you can look at the sky, the vastness, the spaciousness of the sky, without labeling it. Just, now what happens?

And you can do it here. You're sitting here, your sense perceptions, you see me, you hear the words, and you're also aware of the totality of this room. That's the surface level of this moment, is your sense perceptions.

And undoubtedly, that's already a wonderful thing, if you can step out of the conceptualizing mind and become aware of sense perceptions. You could call that come to your senses. In order to come to your senses, you have to step out of the stream of thinking, because otherwise the stream of thinking will absorb your entire consciousness.

So you step out of the stream of thinking. It helps to feel the inner aliveness in your body. The inner body, as I call it.

You've probably already practiced it or read about it in the books. To feel the aliveness that pervades the entire body, which is deeper than the physical body. There is an energy that pervades every cell of the body.

And this intelligence with an aspect of the one consciousness is the organizing principle behind all the functioning of the body. And you can sense that can provide an anchor for being present. And once you can feel the body and you look around, you do it now as I speak about it, feel the inner body, the aliveness, and then you look around, and you will be able to look.

And it's a wonderful thing. You enjoy it so much. You'll be able to look around without needing to label it.

If you need a label, it'll be there, but not compulsively label or interpret everything. Just let it be, as the song goes. Let it be as it is.

When you come into the awareness of being, you are. And it's a beautiful way of perceiving the world when you are not mentally interpreting it. That is the level of form.

And then you become aware of yourself as the one who is perceiving, but not of yourself as the historical person. Because if you were perceiving through the historical person, you would be labeling things mentally. No, you become aware of yourself as the underlying consciousness in which the perception happens, the light of consciousness in which the perception happens.

So you're aware of two dimensions, the dimension of form and the dimension of formless consciousness, the kingdom of heaven, the dimension of spaciousness, the emptiness, the spaciousness, the essence of all life. And it's not yours. It's not anybody's.

It's the one. And now, if you're thinking in terms of, well, how does that fit in with God? You haven't mentioned God.

Well, that's true. I haven't mentioned God because the term God has been misunderstood a lot over the millennia. Not by everybody, but by most.

God, you cannot, obviously, you cannot understand God. It would be, it's just absurd to even make any statement because it's totally, I mean, language consists of just a few sounds. It's just a few sounds that are made by the vocal cords and air pressure.

So you have the vowels, A-E-I-O-U, and then you add a few air pressure sound. Are you expecting to understand the secret of the universe through the combination of a few sounds? And you're asking God to explain God, but I'll carry on talking anyway.

One can only give almost a poetic image or an analogy of what that is. God is the source of all life, the transcendent source of all life. It has no existence in space and time.

It does not exist because exist means to be manifested. God is the source of all life, that we perhaps can say. Now, we could compare that because we live in this sense-perceived universe in our dimension, we could compare God to the life-giving principle that we all share, which is the sun.

And there's no coincidence that many ancient cultures worshipped the sun because obviously, without the sun, all life would immediately disappear. The very warmth in your body is ultimately derived from the sun calories. So the sun continuously emanates.

One could almost say, yes, it has a lifespan, but relative to our lifespan, it's eternal. So it's an analogy. The sun continuously emanates.

It emanates, and what it emanates is it gives life. So in this analogy, God is like the sun, but it is the transcendent source of all, not inhabiting this dimension that we know, but it emanates into this dimension and gradually creates this dimension, which is still in the process of being created. The universe, as we know it, is still being created.

The eternal source of all life emanates something into this world, and that is consciousness. Consciousness is the light of God. And when you sense the essence of yourself as consciousness, then you are aware of the light of God in you.

I do not recommend, however, that as some mystics have done in Christianity, in Sufism, in other traditions, they suddenly discovered that, and they were so overpowered that they actually said, I am God. I don't recommend that because people won't like it, and you don't need to say that. It's like the ray of sunlight.

If the ray of sunlight says, I am the sun, it's both true and not true. Yes, it is obviously still connected to the sun. It's inseparable from the sun, and yet it's not the sun.

So it depends how you look at it. But the wonderful thing is, when you realize the essence of who you are, it goes far beyond the essence of who you are. Because when you realize the essence of who you are, you're realizing the essence of the universe.

That is a miraculous thing. And ultimately, there isn't you and the universe. It's a oneness.

You and the universe are one. So when you realize something, the essence, this perceived universe is realizing something through you. When you awaken to this dimension, the universe is awakening to this dimension itself.

It's a miraculous thing. So it totally transcends who you are as a person, completely. And yet, that was the entry point.

The entry point was the unhappy little person. The unhappy little person was like the seed. And the seed became more and more unhappy as a seed.

And when the seed became sufficiently unhappy, it started to break open. And then something else emerged out of this unhappy seed. So let's be grateful for the unhappiness that has brought us here.

And the frustrating person that you have lived with for many years. Because that was the seed for the awakening of consciousness. And the suffering was the seed.

And the universe continuously is evolving into greater awakening. And it evolves not through, and this is, I hope you don't regard it as bad news. Your comfort zone, which is a wonderful place to be from time to time.

But your comfort zone is not the place where awakening happens. And perhaps you all know that because your comfort, if you were totally in your comfort zone, you would now be watching TV with a beer. I feel so comfortable.

Or you have another smoke. Very comfortable. But life doesn't allow, very soon challenges you again.

And through the challenges, the deepening happens. And even here, as the awakening happens, through the challenges of life, the awakening deepens. And the challenges continue to come, but there's a difference.

Before you are awakened, life's challenges, which are unavoidable, before you awaken, life's challenges are transformed by the unawakened consciousness into unhappiness. And there's an underlying, erroneous belief that life should not be challenging me. Why all these difficulties?

Why does life throw one thing after another on my path to make my life? Is life out, or you might call it God? Is God out to sabotage me?

Is there some weird thing at work that just, why is it always me? Always things go wrong, and then that happens, and I solve a problem here, another one pops up there. That's how life, how evolution happens.

The difference is, you can now face a challenge and see, there it is. I accept this moment as it is, and then see if you can take any action, if it's necessary or not, or possible. Accept this moment as it is, is a very powerful portal into the transcendent state.

I accept this moment as it is, then, because you might as well, because it already is. I think it's much more wise to accept it than not. The ego's very survival depends on non-acceptance of what is.

It's antagonistic to what is, and that strengthens the ego. When you accept this moment because it is this moment, and it is already, then the portal opens up into a place of alert stillness. That's also where you contact the deeper intelligence, and not just your conditioned mind.

This is the intelligence of the one consciousness. So you enter immediately, you enter the transcendent. Just a simple practice.

As I sometimes put it, make the present moment into your friend, not your enemy. That's already a very powerful spiritual practice. Become friendly with the present moment, no matter what form it takes.

And immediately, there's a deepening in you. And immediately, you feel, in the depths of your being, you feel the deep I, in that alignment with the is-ness of things. So that's a very powerful spiritual practice.

And then, when the challenges come, they're no longer transformed into an unhappy me. No, the challenge comes, and you look. And then, another aspect of what we are here talking about is it activates the deep I as a deeper intelligence.

And this deeper intelligence can deal with things in a much more intelligent way. Action arises. Insight arises.

Intuitive realizations arise from this deeper, from the deep I, the unconditioned consciousness. And wisdom arises. Wisdom is...

Intelligence itself is not enough to save us. I mean, we've developed intelligence in a struct... in a focused way through science, for example.

It's just a focused application of conceptual intelligence. It's through science. And science, which is a focused application of intelligence, is not going to save us.

Without wisdom, it'll destroy us. With wisdom, fine, it'll work. And wisdom can only arise to a human being who has some access to the deep I, the unc...

the consciousness, the unconditioned. Now, one other thing that arises when you have access to that, and you're rooted in the deep I, able to use both dimensions, form identity and essence identity. Able to have one foot in the form identity, one foot in essence identity, so to speak.

And then you have a balanced... a balanced life. And then you don't get frustrated with the things of this world, because nothing lasts for that long.

If you expect to be made happy by the things of this world, you condemn yourself to continuous frustration and suffering. So the world is not here to make you happy. The world is here to make you conscious.

And when you are conscious, you become, I wouldn't say happy, because it's a joyousness in the depths of your being that has nothing to do with what's happening out there, or not happening out there. There was a... I can't remember the exact...

I'm not good at quoting. There's a French writer, Camus, perhaps the most significant thing he ever wrote was, he said something like, in the depths of winter, I realized deep within myself an invincible summer. So what that was referring to was that dimension of depths.

So it's an analogy. In the middle of winter, I realized within the depths of myself an invincible summer. That means this came out of a, perhaps it wasn't a permanent realization in him, but in the moment that he wrote that, or he was writing about something, an experience.

And it was experience of the deep I that is the invincible summer in you. And that might be a good thing to have in the winter in Winnipeg.

Eckhart Tolle Opportunities For Surrender [22a71d30-2b53-4247-9b7d-c7bb24db8e41]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:59)

Opportunities for Surrender. In this podcast, Eckhart begins with a few thoughts on meditation. He talks about the Chinese philosophy of Taoism.

He says one of its key principles is wu wei, which he explains loosely translated means non-action or to sit quietly and do nothing. Eckhart follows up with a quote from French philosopher Pascal who said, all the troubles of humanity can be traced back to a person's inability to sit quietly in a room. Eckhart says we're so immersed in the outer world that we don't even think to look inward.

He reveals it is our job to rescue our awareness from this hostage-like state of unconsciousness. Eckhart says to start by taking small steps in our daily lives and that all of life's crises, big and small, are meant to be opportunities for surrender.

[Speaker 1] (1:02 - 33:01)

Is this what is called a meditation? Maybe it is. Natural meditation.

Sitting quietly. There's an ancient Chinese saying from Taoism. I'm not sure how to pronounce it.

Something like wu wei, which is translated as sitting quietly, doing nothing. One of the highest virtues in Taoism. Sitting quietly, doing nothing.

But it has deeper implications. It means rooted in being and aware while you sit quietly, doing nothing. Rooted in being the Tao and being aware.

There was a French philosopher, perhaps it was Pascal or somebody like that, a few hundred years ago. And he said more or less all the troubles of humanity can be traced back to a person's inability to sit quietly in a room. So as you go back into your regular daily life, hopefully the retreat does not come to an end, but remains with you and within you.

The essence of the retreat is not the physical location, but a state of consciousness. Transcendent state of consciousness. Your task is to live, one could say, in both worlds or both dimensions at the same time.

Occasionally you may lose yourself in the worldly horizontal dimension, the doing realm, the thinking realm. And usually when that happens, you will notice dysfunctional, unpleasant inner states arising very quickly. Anxiety, fear, anger, irritation.

Resentment, trouble. And if you're in that state and are disconnected again from the transcendent, the being dimension, the other dimension, that's the unconscious state. And if there is no trouble, you will create it.

That's what humans do. Troublemakers. But what's on an individual level and collectively, if you want to learn a lot, troublemaking collectively and watch the news as much as possible, have the main focus of your attention in your daily life in the present moment.

And the rest of your attention, so that's the main focus. Here's this. The rest of your attention is where you want to go to.

Whatever task you're engaged in has a certain purpose. The purpose is you want to finish the task and it has achieved its purpose. And that's here.

And that's in your peripheral, the peripheral vision of your consciousness. That's where you want to get to. And this is what you're doing in order to get there.

And your main attention is not where you want to get. And in the meantime, you're just doing it in order to get there. You can see how that's already creates an inner stress.

I'm here, but I want to be there. That's a normal way of living is the main part of people's attention is there. But in the meantime, they are here where they don't really want to be.

Rather be there. As shown in famous stickers on bumper stickers on cars, which say something like, I'd rather be fishing. When I visited Ram Dass, the spiritual teacher who is now passed away, he lived on Maui.

On his car, I saw a bumper sticker which said, I'd rather be here now. That's a good teaching on a bumper sticker. And this is a reversal almost of how humans normally usually live.

It's the opposite. That is in itself already a shift in consciousness. And then of course, you're also aware of the past, the certain things that may have relevance in the present.

That's fine. So peripherally, past and future, usually future is more important because you're moving towards that. And here's the central vision of present moment.

In the present moment, you're either actively doing something, or you are more passively perceiving something. You're there as an observer, or you're just there, not actively doing, but simply perceiving. That could be when you travel back from here already.

You might be sitting in a car. If you're driving, you're doing something. That's particularly important to be present.

Or you might be sitting on a plane. And there's a good opportunity for being the, you go into the witnessing mode. There's nothing in particular to do unless you get out your laptop and start doing.

That's fine. And sometimes, situations arise that are problematic. That's quite normal in life.

They are challenging rather than problematic. And then you face the challenge. You look at it, so to speak, not necessarily visually, but you give it attention that this is a challenge.

Instead of unconscious reactivity, the challenge is your flight is canceled. It's not one of the greatest challenges a human can have. But some people react as if it were.

And when any challenge arises, is there anything I can do to respond to this situation? Or is that something where I simply have to say, well, for the time being, I accept the way it is because right now there's nothing I can do. I heard, for example, at some airports, they're so busy, not sufficiently staffed people, when the plane lands, they're still trapped on the plane for two or three hours.

It has happened in Toronto and other places. That's a good opportunity for surrender. Some people can't do that.

They start screaming and shouting. It has no particular purpose, but they can't help it. It happens to them.

So always the question is, is this an opportunity for surrender or is action called for? And that is some practice to get used to until it becomes second nature to have your attention in the present moment rather than elsewhere. And it usually implies you are aware of your surroundings.

That's inseparable from being in the present through your senses. A more alert human being than a normal human being, but an alertness in which there is no tension. Often alertness in a human is associated with being tense, but there's an alertness without tension.

But it's not enough to be just aware of your sense perceptions. That's a good thing. It also can help you to avoid dangerous situations that otherwise you just stumble into and you don't know how you got there.

You're more alert of your surroundings. You see how animals in that sense are very alert, because if they are not, they get eaten by other animals. So many animals have this incredible alertness, alertness, not the same as the human alertness, but it is an alert awareness of their surroundings that many humans don't have.

They walk in the street and they're not really there in their mind, thinking about all kinds of things except where they are. And so they're not here. Whereas the bird sitting on a branch, or the deer that's stepping out of the forest when there's a field, and the deer stops for a moment, and the ears, they're very huge ears, they go.

And it can hear probably a hundred times better than the human. Or a bird on a branch sitting, it goes like this. And then suddenly it goes.

And of course there's no decision making involved when a bird suddenly flies off. It did not think, I'm now going to fly off this branch and I'm going to go over there. It just happens.

There's a flow to life. There's no mind. There is a consciousness there, but there's no conceptualization at all.

But when an animal rests, an animal also rests completely. It is completely at rest. Not thinking about my life.

I have to figure something out. What's the purpose of it all? This is why it can be very healing to live with an animal.

Yes, it can be quite a bit of work too, but it can be very healing to live with an animal and to have an animal presence in the house. Dog, cat, usually. This unproblematic existence, except when the dog or cat are neurotic, which can happen, but there are reasons for that.

Usually connected to their early life, just like human childhood, when things go wrong in childhood, it leaves traces. But usually dogs and cats in normal status, unless they're hungry or want to go for a walk, they can be really rooted in being and joyful. The cat purrs, the dog's tail wags, and it's a joy just to see it.

No problem with, no psychological problems, unless it's spent too much time with neurotic humans. It's a conscious practice. So an animal can bring you into the present moment, just to look at an animal in the present moment.

An animal that lives with humans may not be quite as alert as an animal out in the wild, because it knows that the environment is relatively protected. Nevertheless, dogs are quite alert, and cats too. So you become, again, the center of your attention always bring back into the present, because, first of all, because it's all there ever is.

Well, that's a good reason, because it's life itself. Your life situation, yes, it exists in time, there's a past and a future as far as your life situation is concerned, but it's not your life. I wrote about that a long time ago, but it's so important.

People confuse their life situation with something more fundamental, more real, more immediate, deeper, which is called life. Life situation is circumstances and events in your life. And most of your life situation is an experience in your mind.

And then life situation is certain relationships, work situation, financial situation, living situation, all kinds of often problematic situations. It's very rare that all of these situations are working smoothly and perfectly. Relationships, family, professional, work, financial, living situation, health situation, all working in harmony and perfectly.

It can happen for short periods, but usually something somewhere goes wrong. It has to periodically and frequently. That's normal, and that's good.

But your life situation always has this element of uncertainty, instability too, although you might not recognize that when you look at seemingly solid things. And your life is the experience of this moment, the only thing there ever is. And if you neglect that, you miss the whole thing.

And then you reach retirement age or old age, and you say, was that it? And perhaps you spent your whole life trying to arrive at some point, and the points change that you want to arrive at, but you always want to arrive at some other point. So when your attention is in the present, yes, you're more alert, which is helpful.

You notice things that before you didn't notice, people, objects, all kinds of things around you, natural things. And it's quite, everything is a manifestation of life all around you. And the deeper aspect of being present is not just being aware of your surroundings, although that's fine.

You're aware of yourself as the aware presence. And that is the secret. That is the key.

That is not something that one can easily explain. You can only experience it, what it means to be aware of yourself, not as an ego self, like having a relationship with a conceptual identity. That's me.

I don't like me, or I love me. I'm in love with me. That's happened to Narcissus, and things after that didn't go well for him.

Although you hear that quite often in certain people, they love, I love, I love me. Well, it's a little strange. Who are you?

And who or what is a me? Oh, I hadn't thought about that. I love myself.

I hate myself. Oh, that's worse, even. That's the, that's not uncommon either.

I'm not happy with myself. But who is that I that constantly says these things? Who is that I that has a relationship with ultimately an imagined entity, entity, mind made, conceptual entity.

And this happened to me one night, as I talked briefly about briefly in the power of now, when my mind said, I can't live with myself anymore. Because the I was unhappy. And I couldn't stand the unhappiness anymore.

So I couldn't, I can't live with myself anymore. And this sentence, suddenly, I looked at it. And I realized it was a very strange statement.

I cannot live with myself. At that point, I realized that there's, there must be two of me here. I and the self that I cannot live with.

That's an incredible, that was an incredible realization. There's two of me. There's the unhappy me that I cannot live with.

Who am I and who is that unhappy me? This is almost like a koan, like a Zen riddle that you can't, hard to answer or impossible to answer conceptually, but I actually can answer it conceptually. I couldn't at the time, it took years before I realized what all this meant.

And that moment, the consciousness that I am that was trapped in the movement of thought and continuously absorbed by the movement of thought. This movement of thought created the entity to the person, the unhappy person, the entity, the unhappy entity, but the mind made entity. And it was so active, that it absorbed all of my consciousness was always trapped in the movement of self identified thoughts.

So it was trapped in there. And when the, this strange statement arose in my mind, and I looked at it, but looking at the statements, a sudden separation happened between the consciousness that was trapped in the movement of thought, who suddenly was able to release itself to extricate itself from the being held, held in the moment of thought and stood back. And there was I as the consciousness, looking at the unhappy thought movement.

So it was a separation. Consciousness was withdrawing from the dimension of thinking. And then, very quickly, thinking subsided.

It was no longer fueled. Without the consciousness, there can be no thinking because thinking is not possible without consciousness. But a thought is consciousness that has taken form.

Whereas the realization of I as consciousness is consciousness that is prior to form or unconditioned. So I became aware of myself as consciousness as the I, and the thought then began to dissolve. Without consciousness, it's nothing.

And thought is consciousness that has taken form. And it dissolved and then I was kind of felt like falling into some hole, but it wasn't fear, not fearful. The next morning, I woke up and I was at peace.

Like a new, a new person or no person. I was just contemplating things around me and everything was lovely. And I didn't know why I was at peace.

And then I went around the city on the buses, still at peace, the hustle and bustle of London where I was living. I was at peace. Why was at peace?

I couldn't understand it. Of course, now, the peace that passes all understanding. Several years it took me to understand why.

That's very weird. I did not realize that I was at peace for one reason. And the reason was that I wasn't thinking that much anymore.

Especially there's no, the whole movement of thought that is imbued with a sense of self, self referential thought wasn't happening anymore. Occasional thoughts, yes. But a lot of the time, there was just awareness, but I didn't have a word for it.

I just called it peace. And so what happened then was the consciousness had withdrawn from, until then it had been imprisoned in the movement of thought and continuously absorbed by thought. And then it stepped out.

And that is, later I realized that one realization came to me first when I talked to a Zen monk. I happened to see a Zen monk and he, we talked a bit about spirituality and Zen. And he said quite simply, Zen is really quite simple.

It's you stop thinking. I had expected a more complicated answer, but then I realized that's actually happened to me. I stopped thinking, especially overthinking.

I could still think and some thinking of course still happened, but there were long stretches, but there was just a very peaceful awareness. And then what was building up was out of that awareness came a deep joy. And that was very strange.

Sometimes the joy was so intense that it was incredible. And I was just sat there forever in my bench in the park for long periods. That really is what's called bliss.

And it's just, oh, that intensity of bliss that I had for two or three years, I don't seem to have anymore. I have peace, but the intensity of bliss. Now, I don't know what it could be that when you get used to something, it doesn't stand out that much anymore.

And it becomes quite normal. And perhaps I experienced a bliss because there was still the contrast. I remember my previous state of consciousness.

And then I was there, but who knows? But this is the main teaching then, all spiritual teaching come down to this. Consciousness has to be rescued from where it's been.

Conscience has been kidnapped by thought. And this is, your task is to free consciousness from where it's been trapped in involuntary compulsive thinking. That's always thinking that is imbued, the identify with imbued.

So every thought is imbued with a sense of self. So that's the spiritual practice is that the stepping out of the moment of thought so that I is no longer confused with the moment of thought. That would be the super, the surface I.

So the cessation of thought and when you practice present moment awareness and make that the main, the central focus of your life, whether you're active or passive in that moment, it doesn't matter. If you're active, you give your attention to the doing, you honor it, you give it attention so that it doesn't become stressful. That sounds almost impossible, I know to many people.

If you give your fullest attention to the doing, it's not really stressful unless your mind project itself to some future point or your mind while you're doing something, things of several other things that you really should be doing also at the same time. Of course you can't, you can only do one thing at a time. Another definition of Zen that a master gave is Zen is doing one thing at a time.

That's too simple, isn't it? Too simple. So you give, if it's doing, you give your attention to it.

Then if inspiration is helpful in that particular activity, it will flow into what you do because you're connected with the unconditioned consciousness, the presence. With some doings, you don't need any inspiration, you just need to get it done. You do the dishes or whatever it is, you don't need particular inspiration.

All the while you do it in a place of giving it your attention, honor it rather than do something but would rather not be doing it, but I'm doing it anyway. That's how many people live all the time. If you have a work situation where you work for your daily work, you need to decide, is it possible to honor the work that I'm doing, even if it's something simple and may not be what I ultimately want to be doing, but right now I need to honor the present moment.

Whatever it is, in whatever form it arises, it's my responsibility is to honor life by honoring the present moment. And if your work situation is so dysfunctional that the environment in which you work, for example, or the kind of work that is demanded of you may be what is perhaps conventionally called soul destroying, so that this is not a work that you could do and honor it because it's just very unpleasant. If it's that kind of thing, then you need to remove yourself from that situation.

Even though you may be stepping into uncertainty, you cannot remain in a toxic situation like that where the honoring of what you do seems impossible because, for example, you might be surrounded by people who are in very negative states. There are many situations like that. But in other situations, you may be able to say, okay, this is not the ultimate thing that I want to be doing.

But for right now, this is what I'm doing. And I'm able to honor what I'm and I do it carefully and consciously. So only you can know whether you're able to do that, or whether you need to remove yourself from that situation in order to seek something else that is more compatible, that is compatible with presence.

Many, many things are compatible with presence. And quite a few other things are not.

Our experience of life is not determined by what happens to us. In this podcast, Eckhart talks to an audience in Chicago. He recalls fond memories of traveling to the Windy City to my Harpo studios back in 2008.

For 10 weeks, Eckhart and I hosted a webinar based on his New York Times bestselling book, A New Earth. The book had a profound impact on me and I wanted to share it with a larger audience and those sessions were groundbreaking to say the least. Since then, millions of people have downloaded that webcast and listened to our conversations.

If you haven't already, you really should. I believe rolling back the ego and focusing on being rather than doing opened the door to awakening for me and for many. Today, Eckhart continues his work, ever reminding us that our experience of life is not determined by what happens to us.

It's defined by how we respond.

[Speaker 1] (0:59 - 56:40)

Lovely space and wonderful people. All very conscious and present. I can feel it.

Except for one or two. And those one or two were dragged here by a friend who said you must come. But there is a chance tonight that you might begin to awaken.

You may not know what that means yet. And you might say, what are you talking about? I'm awake already.

But to awaken in a deeper and different sense, in a spiritual sense, most of you are here because you are going through the awakening process already, a shift in consciousness. And that is characterized by many things, but primarily the lessening of suffering and unhappiness in your life and a more harmonious way of relating to your fellow human beings and increasing sense of satisfaction that does not depend on external conditions, although you're still able to appreciate lovely things when they come into your life, but you do not become devastated and incredibly unhappy when the lovely things that have come into your life leave you again, because that is how the universe in this dimension operates. There's winning and losing and you gain and you lose. And there's continuous flux.

And there's the impermanence that the Buddha already talked about. And Jesus talked about, and you might say, did Jesus talk about impermanence? Well, he didn't use the term as the Buddha did.

But he said, don't get, and this is my free translation, don't get attached to the things that can be stolen by thieves or consumed by rust, moss and rust. I'm sure you know the lines from the gospels. Don't get attached to the things that can be taken away by thieves, where thieves break in and steal, or things that can be consumed by moss and rust.

So he uses these two images, thieves coming and taking things away, and the image of seemingly solid material substance turning out to be not that solid after all, because it can be quickly, relatively quickly consumed by rust. Rust dissolves the seeming solidity of matter. And moss, of course, as maybe less so nowadays than used to be, but they still occasionally get into my sweaters.

And suddenly you have a little hole in there. And if you don't take it out soon enough, the entire sweater is gone. Jesus uses these images to talk about the fact of impermanence.

So not getting attached to things, the things of this world, but being able to appreciate the things of this world. Because as you know, in many spiritual traditions, there has been the tendency, both in Christianity and Buddhism and Hinduism, there has been the tendency of completely denying the physical and material realm, or even regarding it as evil. And so there are ascetics, monks, and nuns, and so on.

In medieval times, there were even many religious people who disliked beauty. They didn't want beauty. They said, no, this is all corrupt.

This is, I would suggest, not a balanced way of being in this world. But neither is it a balanced way of being in this world with this excessive attachment to things and the unhappiness arises when you don't get what you want, or when what you have is taken away, or the unhappiness that arises when you simply imagine not getting what you want, or imagine that something that you have, you're going to lose. So you have a difference, a state of consciousness arising that is relatively free of unhappiness and capable of connecting with other human beings at a deeper level than the level of personality or person.

And I have a feeling we may be going into this also more deeply tonight. I have a feeling I'm saying this because, as you might have noticed, the talk tonight has not been planned in advance. So it comes out of the present moment.

So I don't know what's going to be said, of course. We're here in Chicago. I fairly rarely talk about the past, or especially my personal past.

I don't often think about it. However, I could not help being back here in Chicago, thinking about early springtime in 2008 when I flew into Chicago every week for 10 consecutive weeks and did the webinar, seminar on the World Wide Web with Oprah. We met here in the Oprah studio in Chicago and talked for an hour and a half about the book, A New Earth.

And people all over the world were tuning in. And by now, it's something like 50 million people have watched it by now. Just an amazing event in the collective consciousness and almost spirituality going mainstream.

For a while. It's not yet mainstream, as you might have noticed when watching the mainstream media. But that's fine.

You do not judge the evolution of human consciousness by watching television or whatever happens on the internet. This does not give you a clear reflection of human consciousness. The simple fact is that most of the things that are given importance in the mainstream media are precisely those things where human unconsciousness manifests most strongly, such as politics and all very destructive events.

So the media tends to focus there. And if you take that as a reflection of where human consciousness is at right now, you get a distorted view of where the collective consciousness actually is. So what ultimately matters is and the only thing you can take responsibility for is your state of consciousness in the present moment.

So I just mentioned briefly this event with Oprah that brought many people to the point where they were able to begin to awaken spiritually. And I'm sure there are quite a few of you here who witnessed that webinar. And that was time is a very weird thing.

You know the expression, it seems like only yesterday. And the older you get, the more often you say that. It seems like only yesterday.

And time is a very strange thing. If you look at it, we are all in the grip of time on one level of our existence. Certainly, we are all like passengers on a speeding train.

We could use that analogy. Passengers on a speeding train. And the older you get, the faster the train seems to travel.

And you cannot say, please stop. I want to get off. At least not in the physical realm.

It's not going to stop. And what is the destiny of the train? You are heading for a train crash.

Another word for it is death. So when I say you can't get off the train, that of course is true on one level. And on a conventional level, it is very true.

Another analogy that one could use for time is it's almost like a fire that slowly and then more and more quickly consumes us all. We are being consumed by time. And then in the end, you as a physical form evaporate.

And suddenly the chair, your favorite armchair where you used to sit, is completely empty. And you are gone. This is very strange.

So time is a fire that consumes us all slowly and then more quickly. I spoke a few days ago in New York at the Beacon Theater on Broadway. Yes, I was on Broadway.

And a few days before, I happened to see on YouTube, there was an old video clip that said, traffic and people walking on Broadway in 19, I think it was 1929. And it was like a five-minute clip of hundreds of people walking. All the men were wearing hats and the women too.

Everyone was wearing a hat. And cars, there were already cars. And the people were busy going somewhere very important.

Very important. But now, nobody knows who these people were because they have all already dissolved. And then, as I was in the car approaching the theater, I was looking out of the window and seeing people and cars walking on Broadway in 2018.

And realized, this won't be all that long before all these also will have dissolved. And in most cases, if you took a photo and showed the photo to someone 100 years later, in most cases, you would say, nobody knows who they are, who they were. And even if one or two are remembered, what difference does it make?

So, the very strange fact of how short-lived our existence is on this level, and facing the impermanence of things, impermanence of all phenomena, in itself, strangely, can be either a frightening thing that you don't want to hear about, or it can be either the beginning of a spiritual awakening or a deepening. The contemplation of impermanence, if you don't turn away from it, but contemplate it. And that could be a simple thing, as what I've just mentioned, is watching a clip on YouTube.

I also showed another clip, and that showed a similar thing even earlier. It was Berlin in, like, 1913, the very first cameras and short city scenes there. Just amazing to watch.

If you watch it and don't judge it in any way, just contemplate that, the fact that all these people with all their important business and all their problems, because the strange thing is, by the way, all your problems dissolve with you. When you're no longer here as a physical form, then what you thought were all your important problems, they also evaporate. And many of the problems actually evaporate even before then, because sometimes only a little bit of time is needed, and the whole thing is evaporated.

But at the latest, the problem dissolves when you dissolve. And this is an interesting fact, because many people derive their sense of identity primarily from their personal problems. So when you meet somebody and they start talking about what do you do, who are you, and if they really open up to you, they'll begin to talk about their personal problems.

And so it's amazing how many, for how many people, their own sense of self, and there may still be one or two here to whom that also applies, they regard their sense of self as a problem that requires a solution. And they are continuously looking for the solution of the problem of me. I have to work it out.

You wake up in the middle of the night, I have to work out my problems. And you might have noticed, you have problems. But if you look on Facebook, you might not realize that other people also have problems.

Because on Facebook, they are all very happy. And you see the wonderful dinners they consume in restaurants. And that gives you the misleading impression that you are the only one who has problems.

But everybody carries a burden of problems that is inevitable because life, you might have noticed, is extremely challenging. And there's nobody for whom life is not challenging. There's not even any life form in addition to human beings.

There are other life animals and plants. For all life forms, life is precarious and dangerous and challenging and fleeting. And every life form is confronted with whatever challenges correspond to that particular life form.

So that's a very interesting fact. Life does not cease from challenging you. And that doesn't change even if you awaken spiritually.

You will get other challenges, different kinds of challenges. The only difference is, as you awaken spiritually, the way in which you respond to the challenges changes. And that is all important.

How you confront the challenges of life, how you react to or respond to the challenges of life determines how you experience your life. How you experience your life ultimately is not determined by what happens to you. Because most people think that that's the case.

How you experience your life or what you call your life is ultimately not determined by what happens to you. It is determined by how you respond to what happens to you. And how you respond to what happens to you determines what happens in the so-called future.

How you respond now. Some people, whenever they are challenged by life, they behave as if there was something very wrong with their life. That things are not supposed to go wrong or be challenging.

This is not supposed to happen. And this works on both a small scale and large scale. And you might have met people, and perhaps you were one of those people in the past, people who are continuously complaining about things.

They're continuously not in alignment, continuously out of alignment with whatever is going on around them. Situations and people and places and events. Either something is there that shouldn't be there.

Something is happening right now that should not be happening. Or something is not happening that should be happening. Or I should be somewhere else, but I'm here.

And that's a huge problem. I'm trying very hard to get there, but I'm here. Now, this sounds a little weird when I say it like this, but the sad fact is that many people live like that for most of their life.

They are not aligned with what they are doing right now. Yes, they are doing it, but they are not fully in the doing because they'd rather be somewhere else. They would rather be already at the end of this particular activity.

And in that mindset, that means your life is stressful continuously. Stressful means there's a mental projection of where you need to be or should be, but you're here. So you're engaged in this activity, but you have certain thoughts that tell you either you already want to be at the end of what you're doing or although you are doing this, you really should also be doing that and that and that, but you're doing this.

Dreadful way to live. Normal, by the way. It's called normal.

And you see it when you watch the movies. Everybody's like that in the movies, so it must be normal. They're all like, and people love to see the dysfunctional way in which people live reflected on TV and in the movies.

They reflected their own dysfunction and that's a confirmation that, okay, I'm actually okay because everybody's unhappy. Everybody is living in this way or in a state of almost continuous dissatisfaction, except for brief moments, sometimes to do with having a good meal or sex, could do it for a while. This doesn't last very long.

Or you get what you wanted. You get what you wanted. The thing that you said, oh, that's going to make me happy.

And then you get it. And for a moment you feel, ah, and you feel this happiness arising and you think you feel this happiness because you got what you wanted. But if you look more deeply, you will realize that you do not really feel happy because you got what you wanted.

You feel happy because for a very short time period, the mind structure that was always unhappy with the isness of things, there's something is missing here. I need that. I need to get rid of that.

I need to get, that mind structure subsides. And for a moment, you don't want anything except what is here now. And that suddenly you feel more alive.

You feel, ah, then perhaps you begin to understand why the Buddha talked about the greatest obstacle to spiritual awakening being continuous. Well, he called it, and in the translations, it's called desire. But a better translation of what the Buddha was talking about is a more vital term is wanting, the continuous wanting, wanting this, wanting that, wanting the neediness, the wanting.

And that is a mind structure that operates in humans that prevents them from experiencing the deeper dimension of reality, which we could call the timeless dimension, the timeless dimension of consciousness. Remember, we talked about time a few minutes ago. We talked about the express train that you can't get off.

We talked about the fire that is consuming you. That is time. That is true.

But the good news is that there is, in every human, a deeper dimension of consciousness. In many humans, it is a deeper dimension of consciousness. It's only a potential, a latent potential, like a seed.

In others, the seed has already begun to sprout. There is the possibility in humans of accessing and living from the deeper dimension of consciousness. And accessing that deeper dimension of consciousness is what we could call spiritual awakening, where you realize that in addition to being a person, a personality or a person who lives in this world of time, of past and future, in addition to being this person, there is more to you.

There are other dimensions to who you are, or more specifically, there is a deeper dimension to who you are than the merely historical person. And that's why we are here tonight, because I want this not just to be a conceptual talk, although, of course, we're using words. But the aim is for you to experience, and even if it's only a glimpse, or to deepen.

For many of you, it will be just a deepening because you already are sensing what it is that I'm talking about. I know what he's talking about. You're already sensing within yourself what it is that I'm talking about when I speak of a deeper dimension of who you are, a deeper sense of identity of who you are.

Now, we need to look just very briefly. I'm sure you're already familiar with this, and you recognize it in your own life. Identity is of extraordinary importance.

Your identity. Very few things are more important than your sense of identity, which is your sense of who you are, because everything flows from there. Everything flows the way in which you act in this world, what you think, how you relate to other human beings, how you perceive so-called reality is determined by your sense of self.

Your sense of self is the filter through which you experience the world, and your sense of self is your identity. The great question about identity is, who am I? That is the ultimate question.

Now, as you may remember, in ancient Greece, the all-important dictum in ancient Greek philosophy, probably the question was first uttered by Pythagoras, one of the very earliest Greek philosophers. Pythagoras was primarily a spiritual teacher, which is not generally known. It was probably him who said the all-important dictum is, know thyself.

Know yourself. Know thyself. And the Greek philosophers regarded it as so important that it was inscribed in many places in stone.

At the Oracle in Delphi, it was inscribed in stone. Know thyself. Okay, so that points to the fact that identity and self-knowledge is extraordinarily important.

Now, in conventional discourse, if you say, know thyself, or who are you? They say, what are you talking about? Of course I know myself.

And then they come up with, that's my name. That's what I do. That's my education.

That's my personal circumstances. And that's who I am. And anything else would be absurd.

That's how I would conventionally, if you go to a TV station or something and talk, I want to explore identity. And say, what are you talking about? This is the situation.

You're wrong. We have other things to talk about that are more important. There are many things that are relatively important.

And there are other things, or rather, one thing that is absolutely important. And this one thing that is absolutely important is the subject matter for our gathering here. And once you realize that, that deeper dimension in yourself, then all the so-called problems that you have in your life, you are no longer all consuming.

They still exist on one level. But even there, changes may happen and will happen. But you are no longer consumed by your problems.

And that's a wonderful liberation. And that means you no longer derive your sense of identity from your problems. When we look very closely at what a problem is and how it lives in you, we inevitably realize that a problem exists in your mind as a thought or a collection of related thoughts.

So when you wake up in the middle of the night and you say, you think about your problems, which may be either of a physical kind, because health is a big thing, your body can cause lots of problems, especially as you get older. Another very challenging is your financial situation, can be. Another challenging thing can be your professional or your work situation.

Another problem area can be your living situation. And last but not least, other people. One of the greatest problems in your life, you might have noticed, the source of problems in your life, to a large extent, is people.

Because you might have noticed people are extremely challenging. So much so that Jean-Paul Sartre, the existentialist philosopher, said, hell is other people. So these are the problem areas.

Now, we all have problems. I suppose I have problems, but I can't remember them right now. There's a question, I actually mentioned it in one of the books, a question that you can ask yourself if you feel you're being consumed by your problems and you can't cope anymore and it's just getting too much.

The question that you ask yourself that will bring you into a deeper dimension of sanity, a deeper realization of who you are, and that simple question is, what problem do I have at this moment? And you might notice a strange shift because before you said, oh God, to have problems, you need to think about your problems. Okay, let's stay with that question for a while.

What problem do I have at this moment? Now, you might say, well, I have a toothache. I had that the other day, it was very bad, but not right now.

But even if I had it now, it wouldn't be a problem, it would be a toothache. It's only if I make a problem out of it, then the whole identity comes around it. Or you become immediately, there's always a victim, an element of being a victim when you have a problem.

What problem do I have right now? What problem do you have right now? You might not know where you're going to have your next meal.

Maybe your bank account is empty and your pockets are almost empty. I had situations in my life for quite a while like that. Now, that could be, say, you might say, of course, I have a problem now.

I have no money and what am I going to eat tonight? You've already left the now. So if you stay with the now, what problem do I have now?

Well, I'm in a prison cell and I'm in for another 15 years. Isn't that a problem? Well, it is, but I asked about now.

Now, if you really go into it, that removes past and future from your mind. And you might feel yourself breathing. And then you might become aware of sense perceptions.

And you look around wherever you are and you see what you see and you hear what you hear. And perhaps you feel that your body is alive. Perhaps you feel a sense of aliveness pervades your body and your breathing and your perceiving.

And suddenly you don't actually have a problem. You may have one later, but that won't be a problem. It'll be a challenge.

Certainly there are challenges. If a wild animal came running into this room towards me, would I have a problem? No, because there's no time to make it into a problem.

It would be a challenge. And how would I respond? I don't know.

I might run away. I might face it. I might do what they tell you in Canada when you go for walks in the forest.

If you encounter a black bear, make yourself as big as possible. And you go, ah. But if you encounter a grizzly bear, run.

Well, that might save your life one day. But an animal running towards is not a problem. It's a challenge.

And I would respond to the challenge. Now, if I wake up in the middle of the night and I think about the possibility of being attacked by an animal, that's a huge problem. And there's no solution to it because it arises in my mind.

And now you need to see, first of all, that in the present moment, a problem cannot survive. So if your attention is in the present moment, which is the entire essence of Zen, if you want to study Zen, you can either study Zen for the next 20 years or you can listen to what I'm saying right now. Which is, be present with what is, totally.

Be aligned with this moment. Let go of past and future, except when you need them for practical purposes, but not as something that tells you who you are. And give attention to this moment.

Not only give attention to this moment, whatever arises in this moment, which are sense perceptions and possibly occasional thoughts or feelings. Give attention also. And now we go already, I was going to keep this towards the end of the talk so that you don't leave before, but I'll do it now.

You go so deep into the present moment that you encounter the essence of the present moment. And the essence of the present moment is not what you're perceiving. That's fine.

When you're present, it's even you're perceiving things more clearly and more vitally. And that's already a wonderful change. Whereas before, if you're absorbed in continuous thinking, which is where problems reside, then you are hardly aware of your surroundings.

You're just peripherally aware of what's going, peripherally aware. There must be a sky somewhere, but you may not even have looked at the sky in several days. If you're really absorbed in your problems, you might not have looked at the flowers or the trees or the beautiful dog or whatever.

No, you had more important things to think about. My problems. So you were consumed by that.

And then when you step out of that already, your sense perceptions become more clear and vitally alive. And you see beauty and aliveness where before there was just an obstacle in your path. And you can see other human beings without continuously having to judge them through the mind.

Because when you're present, your sense perceptions are not filtered through conceptualization. That's just one of the keys. We come back to that.

Your sense perceptions are not filtered continuously. Sometimes of course they are, but they are not obsessively and habitually filtered through conceptualization, which means the conditioning of your mind, commenting, providing a running commentary continuously on your life experience. This is what I call the voice in the head.

That talks and talks and says stuff that makes you unhappy a lot of the time. And you don't even know that the voice in your head makes you unhappy. You think reality makes you unhappy.

You think a situation makes you unhappy. And you don't even realize that your inner commentary about a situation makes you unhappy, but not the situation. And that is in 90% of cases of unhappiness.

The unhappiness is caused by your thoughts about something, but not about that thing. You can easily verify that in any situation where unhappiness arises in you in whatever form. I'm using the word unhappiness as a generic term for what the Buddha called suffering.

So whenever you feel anything that doesn't feel good, irritation, anger, resentment, sadness, any form of stress, many, many forms of unhappiness. And now you look at the unhappiness, does it arise from the situation I'm in? Or is my mind saying that this situation is really bad and is complaining as if the complaining could bring about a change in the situation.

Now, sometimes of course, action can bring about a change in the situation, yes. When you become irritated about something, see where does this irritation arise? Is it this situation?

Because I'm standing here and I'm breathing and I'm looking around and I'm standing and I'm breathing and I'm looking around. Is that enough to make me unhappy? No, to be unhappy, I need to add certain concepts to that situation in my mind and believe in them completely and saying that this is awful.

This is just awful. Why can't they do something about it? They are so incompetent.

And your body doesn't know that your mind is creating this. The body reacts as if what your mind is saying were absolute reality. And the body feels very unhappy too.

You feel emotions that are very unhappy. And if that moment, any time when suffering arises, you say, where does it arise? Is it the situation or is it the narrative in your mind?

What if it is the narrative in my mind and not the situation? Is it the situation or is it the narrative in my mind? Now, and then you said, let's experiment now.

How would I experience this situation if I did not add this narrative to it in my mind? In other words, if I did not add useless, ultimately useless thought to this situation, then what would I be left with? Okay, let's try it out.

Where's your problem now? Well, I'm breathing, I'm looking around and still breathing and looking around. People moving, not moving.

Suddenly you're not unhappy anymore. And you see you're actually become free internally and say, okay, that's it. Here we are, here I am.

It's not that bad actually. I'm breathing and I'm perceiving things. And no thought that I can have in my mind because the delusion is, and this probably stems from childhood.

The delusion is if I can be really unhappy about it, then the thing is going to change. Many children learn that lesson because many children, very young children who often are not given perhaps sufficient attention or love by their parents, they quickly learn that when they become noisily angry and unhappy, a tantrum, that will suddenly give them attention. And so they learn without, not on a conscious level, but they learn unconsciously unhappiness works.

Unhappiness gets me what I want. And that gets stuck as a dysfunctional mind pattern in them. There may be other reasons why it happens.

It might already be in the human collective consciousness been there for hundreds of generations. But as the child learns it anew, unhappiness works. Unhappiness will get me what I want.

And it's actually true for the little child. It's true. But as the child grows up and becomes an adult, it's no longer true.

In fact, often it has the opposite effect. If you're unhappy about something that you don't have, you're even less likely to get it. So it has the opposite effect, but they never know that because they are stuck with a mind pattern that says unhappiness works.

And for decades, they practice it. And they continuously experience that it doesn't work. And they don't figure it out.

Isn't there a saying, you make the same mistake again and again, and you don't figure out, you don't learn. What a weird thing. You might still discover it occasionally arising in your own mind.

Unhappiness works. If I really, you can voice your unhappiness either internally or externally. And hopefully there's somebody there you can talk to, because if there's nobody there you can talk to and you do it externally, then you're considered totally crazy.

So amazing realization that complaining and becoming a victim in your own mind has no useful purpose, does not work, except for one thing, it continues actually to work quite well. And that one thing is, it strengthens your sense of identity, the egoic self gets stronger. The more of a victim you become, the more you can complain about people and situations and places and what's lacking or shouldn't be here or should be here, should have been said, but wasn't said.

And you can, nowadays you can do it, disseminate it on the internet too. So it amplifies the dysfunction. All that flows out continuously from your mind and it is useless, except for one thing, it strengthens your ultimately false sense of self, because this egoic sense of self that I wrote about a lot in a new earth, needs various things, but primarily it needs a sense of superiority and it needs an enemy.

So the false sense of self needs its enemies and it needs superiority. And you can actually bring that they two are very closely related. There are almost two aspects of the same phenomenon.

Now, how is it when you complain about something, do you have a sense of superiority? Yes, you do. Because when you complain about a situation or a person, by implication, you are superior to the person you're complaining about.

You're superior to the situation you're complaining about. You are morally superior to whatever it is you're judging as deficient. That gives the ego its food.

And so you carry on doing it, although it has no actual useful purpose. In fact, the opposite on a practical level, on a psychological level, it actually has a useful purpose. It strengthens your fictitious sense of self.

It strengthens the ego. In other words, it makes you even more unhappy. And unhappy egos are much stronger than happy egos.

The ego loves its unhappiness. It loves being unhappy. It loves its enemies.

So an enemy can be not only a person or a group of people, an enemy can be a situation. The ego also loves the opposition, the antagonism that comes from having an argument with somebody and needing to be right. An incredible driving force in human beings when they engage in a discussion with somebody.

It might be completely pointless discussion, but you notice after a while an incredible energy that amplifies what you're saying. It's an emotional energy behind it. You might talk about something completely irrelevant, like what's the distance from here to the moon?

Well, it's a million miles. No, it's 150,000, it's 350,000 kilometers. I think that's probably true, but the...

No, no, you need to be right. And after a while, the truth no longer matters. You will introduce a little lie because you need to be right.

I read it, I've got a source for it. I have a degree in astronomy, anything to be right. In traffic, very unconscious people experience road rage, where the other motorist is your mortal enemy.

And he or she might have done nothing more than go too slowly in front, but you needed to get ahead. And the ego in somebody who is engaged in being right is very huge, and the ego loves that. And then you get into an argument, and there's no end to the argument.

And then after a while, if it's you, you walk out of the door, and a few seconds later, the door opens again. You come back in, there's more to say. That ego itself is already quite dysfunctional on the personal level.

It's even more dangerously dysfunctional on the collective level, because ultimately, the ego is identification with mind and mental positions. Ultimately, the ego is a conceptual reality in your head that you derive your sense of self from. And that conceptual reality in the head consists of thought, of concepts.

It's a story in your mind. It had a lot to do with your past, a lot to do with certain things that you have identified with around you. That identified means you derive your sense of self from certain things like your physical body is an aspect of ego.

If you derive your sense of self from it, then the physical body is the first level of ego is a physical body. That's me. And it can be for many people, the physical body is either a great source of unhappiness, because they're not satisfied with the way they look.

So the ego cannot derive a sense of superiority from it. The ego, which compares itself to others, derives a sense of inferiority from it. So it's very unhappy.

Or the body can be a sense of pride. If your body happens to look better than other people's, then the ego will get in there and identify with the way you look. And that becomes the mental form.

And it gives the ego some nourishment for a while. How long? We don't know, 20 years.

And then gradually it gets more difficult to sustain because suddenly you realize that some people have younger bodies than you. So there's the body identification that becomes part of ego. And you can get a sense of superiority from having a better body.

And for some people, 80% of their ego even more is body. And whenever that's, it can be a man or a woman. And the day will come when you look into the mirror and you're no longer satisfied with your body.

And so you begin to suffer. And then there's still things you can do. There's a whole industry that is repair strategies to delay the inevitable for a while.

Of course, there's a difference between enjoying your good looks. If you have them, it's a lovely thing. Enjoy your strengths or your good looks.

It's wonderful. Go to the gym, wonderful things. But the question is, do you derive your sense of who you are from that?

Or is it something that you simply appreciate but you know it is ultimately not who you are. Who you are is invisible. So that's the next level then is your mind.

And there are many things there, of course, that you can identify with. Anything that the mind links into, possessions, my this, my that, my that. So if you don't have a great body, you can drive in your Ferrari.

And then the guy with the beautiful body only has a VW. So you can feel superior. But if you have neither the body nor the VW, as was the case with me when I was young, when I was in my twenties, I didn't have the body.

I didn't have the possessions. What have I got left? And finally I've got something, knowledge.

So I was reading lots of books and I became more and more knowledgeable. And then I noticed that I could hit, metaphorically speaking, I could hit people over the head with my knowledge, my superior knowledge. And all these people who had developed bodies and possessions, or I lived in England at the time, people who had family descendants going back hundreds of years, aristocrats who derived their identity from their family past.

I didn't have that either. All I knew was my grandfather and knew nothing beyond that. So none of that, these are all ego, but I could hit on, yeah, I'm a great intellectual and I know more than you.

Now that also led to an enormous amount of unease because I was at a university where lots of people who knew a lot too. So there was always the unease, do I know more than this guy or less? These are all forms of ego.

The ego can derive its sense of superiority from many things. Now I had the mind, fortunately or unfortunately, didn't have the possessions, didn't have the body, didn't have the family past, didn't have any of the things. If I hadn't had the knowledge either, where would my ego have gone then?

Oh, easy. And there are millions of egos there, all the people who don't have any of these things. And that is, they are victims.

And I'm not denying that victims don't exist on a practical level. Of course, human beings have done dreadful things to other human beings. But if being a victim or having been a victim becomes part of your sense of identity, that is the trap.

And that is where you get more deeply trapped in delusion. So you need to be able to recognize the mind structures that operate in you. Because if you don't recognize the mind structures, you are at the mercy of your own mind.

You are trapped in the conditioned mind. And that is, spiritually speaking, being unconscious. This is why it's important and even liberating to recognize the mind structures that we all inherit.

And that those are collective mind structures. So be very careful. So once you recognize a mind structure, the possibility of freedom arises.

You're able to step out of the mind and think, oh, I'm not going to go there. I'm not going to be a victim. I'm not going to be engaged in being right.

I would not rather be right than happy. And you can recognize these egoic strategies when they still want to take you over. And freedom is to step out of it and recognize that there is a dimension in you that is deeper.

We can say either deeper or higher. Depends how you look at it. I prefer to say deeper because high seems to imply that your real self is up there.

My higher self is talking to me. I'll use the expression, came to me later, it's not in the books. The deep I, I meaning the pronoun I, when you say I.

Normally, I, as you might have noticed, is one of the most commonly used words in the language. How many times a day do you say I? Many, many times.

How many more times a day do you think I? Or of course, sometimes some people talk to themselves and say you. That's another story.

And some have two people in their heads that argue with each other. Two aspects of ego. Why can't you ever do the right thing?

Well, you are trying and doing your best. No, you can't. You're completely useless.

No, I'm not useless. I just live with the parents I had. What could I have done with those unconscious parents?

I'm not useless. Yes, you are completely useless.

Eckhart Tolle Overcoming the World [6715cd92-e80f-4145-9c3d-6af9eea83687]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:05)

Overcoming the world. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about how many of us react when the world doesn't go our way. He says we either surrender and accept the situation, or more often than not, we go into victim mode.

Victim of circumstance, victim of other people, or even God. He goes on to explain if loss is involved, then bitterness and anger set in, and the ego becomes more entrenched. Eckhart mentions the ancient wisdom of Buddha, who talked about suffering and the end of suffering, and Jesus who said, you will have tribulation, but take heart, for I have overcome the world.

Eckhart asks participants to ponder what it means to overcome the world. He explains it has nothing to do with external power, because it's an internal realization. He says the turbulent times that we live in provide ample opportunity to reach the eternal, boundless part of ourselves.

Eckhart believes we overcome the world when we don't derive our sense of identity from the world.

When the self, the little self, the egoic self, when the world does something to it, either one or two things can happen. You come into a deep acceptance, sometimes after suffering, you suddenly surrender, and then something opens up, and there's a, you still are sad on the surface level, but deep down there's a peace that passes all understanding. But it can also happen when you experience loss, that you become bitter and angry.

The ego lost things that it identified with, and immediately creates another set of concepts, self-concepts that say you are angry with the world. I have been, you're the victim of circumstances, you're a victim of God, you're a victim of other people, and you become bitter and angry, and immediately the ego forms again another identity, conceptual identity. This is particularly important because we are moving into turbulent times as a collective, probably affecting perhaps the entire planet, we are moving into a time of turbulence.

I feel this is only the beginning, and at the same time this becomes an enormous opportunity for awakening into this dimension. Because the strange thing is, no human being awakens from within their comfort zone. Sad fact.

The ego doesn't like that, so the fact that there's applause here means you're already beyond ego, and you've recognized the truth of it, and this is, there's a deep, deep truth in that. I have not met any human that awakened from within their comfort zone. They awaken through facing, to use a some, almost a biblical term, they awaken through facing tribulation.

Tribulation. In this world you will find tribulation, said Jesus. Wherever you go, the Buddha said the same thing.

In this world you will find dukkha, said the Buddha, translated as suffering, can also be translated as misery, unsatisfactoriness, and all just plain unhappiness. So that's what the Buddha said, this word, wherever you go, you'll find that unless you awaken. And Jesus said in this world you will find tribulation.

Then he added, but I have overcome the world. I have overcome the world, and he shows people how to overcome the world. What does that mean?

I have, now Jesus did not have any worldly power, so in that sense he hadn't overcome the world like Alexander the Great, great conqueror, none of that. Overcome is an internal realization. You no longer derive your identity from the things of this world, but you can still live with them and play with them, it's fine, they're actually quite beautiful.

When you play with the things of this world you can appreciate form, and when it leaves you, or it breaks, or it's taken away, you did not need it for your sense of identity. You can enjoy this world when you do not need it to give you an identity. You can enjoy other human beings too, and their company, and their presence, but you don't need them to complete your identity.

Why don't you need them anymore? Because you already have found your identity, and you are connected with your essence identity as the awareness, as the consciousness, that's who I am. So this is a wonderful freedom, and now people will have to find that, because we are moving into such uncertain times.

Many people will lose things that gave them their identity, and that's a great thing, and many people will lose also a sense of certainty or security that was delusory anyway. No matter how many insurance policies you have, it doesn't mean that the universe is not impermanent and fleeting, and to look to things, or people, or situations, or places, or attainments, to look to those things for your identity, that leads to suffering and unconsciousness. Your primary purpose is to find and stay connected to the depths of who you are in being, so that you are not just a human, but you are a human being.

You're conscious of the being dimension. In the being dimension, you have no age, you're not young or old, you have no gender, sorry, you have no status. In the being dimension, whether in the eyes of the world, your life up to now has been a fantastic success story, or the most dreadful failure to take two extremes, makes no difference.

The being is beyond that. There's no age in it, there's no gender in it, there's no differentiation in that. It's the source.

Then you no longer need to defend an identity that was fictitious anyway. You are comfortable with, sometimes, with not being right. Others show you, no, you're wrong.

Oh, really? Whereas before, being right was an important part of your conceptual identity. The most dreadful thing for an egoic self is to be shown to be wrong, because it's a death, it's a kind of death.

And you can, you still have opinions, you have opinions, but the opinions do not turn into an identity. If opinion turns into identity, then we get all the drama that we have on social media and all that, because opinions have become identities. It's crazy.

What is an opinion? It's a mental, it's a concept, a construct. But you can still have the opinion and still voice your opinion without the defensiveness and the aggression that would be there if you equate opinion with identity.

But you need to have something more powerful, deeper, than this mind-made identity. And that's the essence of who you are beyond thought. So it is very important, as much as possible, to remind yourself to come into, and here we come to the one of the main portals, or the main portal into the transcendent consciousness, come into the present moment.

That is where the portal into the transcendent consciousness begins to open up. The present moment is a portal. In the present moment, as much as possible, you take your attention into the present moment, and it has stages.

It is basically, what you say, two or three stages, depending how you divide it. The first thing, when you become present, so have little practices, whenever you're waiting for something, become present. Whether you're in the car, or just a minute waiting for the elevator, or waiting for somebody to answer the phone, a human being to answer the phone, it could take hours.

And so you're waiting, and why waste that beautiful time and use it for presence? Now, how does it work? How do you, how do you transform an irritation while you're waiting into presence?

So you get very irritated. Airports are very irritating places these days, for many people. Don't have to be, but for many people they are.

Security is very slow, and it could take an hour to get through security. Oh my god, why can't they, they should have done something about it a long time ago, why can't they? They're just so incompetent, it's just unbelievable, completely unbelievable.

I'm not ever going to use this airport again. I don't know, and the rest of the world is bad too. I just don't, I just don't like people anymore.

We are going to hell in a handbasket, I can see that. You become very unhappy. There's a very unhappy person.

Why is this person unhappy? Well, because obviously, can't you see what's happening? This is why I'm happy.

You see, you've been standing here for one hour, you're hardly moving, for god's sake. Okay, why don't you experiment with something? What do you mean?

Experiment with being in this situation, without adding any thought to it. The baggage of thought. This situation, don't add any interpretation to it.

Is that even possible? Yes, it's possible. The interpretation is a habit.

It's no more than a deeply ingrained mental habit. But you don't have to be stuck with a deeply ingrained mental habit. Don't add any thought.

Don't interpret this moment, just let it be as it is. Okay, I'll try it. But if it doesn't work, I'm going to get back to you.

Okay, so you're standing there, and now suddenly you do not add thought to this, which means you haven't been standing here for an hour. You're only standing here now. Because the hour was thought.

Time is thought. The hour, the duration was created by thinking. But in the present moment, you are standing here now, not for one hour.

You're not adding any thought. And so what else is here now? Well, one obvious thing is, there's people around you.

And again, you watch people. They're moving, they're standing, moving their lights. And you watch that without interpreting.

It's either good or bad. This is what it is. And the next thing you notice is, you're actually breathing.

Oh, I'm still breathing. Well, that was a thought. But you don't need a thought.

You can just notice you're breathing without telling yourself that you're breathing. You're just breathing. And you know you're breathing.

And you feel that your body is actually alive. There's a life that pervades you. And that life is invisible.

The physical body is visible. But that which animates the body is not visible, but you can sense it. Because it's just consciousness that animates the body.

So you feel the consciousness that you are through entering the inner body. And here's the present. Here you are still standing, not adding any interpretation, not any thought to this moment.

In other words, you have become completely present. Now, if that is the case, you suddenly realize that before you experimented with this, you were very unhappy. But you were not very unhappy because of the situation, because your mind was telling you, obviously, you're unhappy because of all this.

The unhappiness was produced by your thoughts. The unhappiness was produced by us not by the situation, but by your thoughts about the situation. And you can experiment with that in many different situations.

And it works beautifully. And it's a very powerful spiritual practice. Do not add unnecessary.

Sometimes thought is necessary. But in many instances, thought is unnecessary. It creates suffering.

Unhappy thoughts create suffering, misery. And prolonged unhappy thoughts going on not for hours and days, but going on for weeks, months and years, they produce a very unhappy little me that then looks at the entire world through the veil of its own unhappiness. And nothing is perceived clearly anymore.

It's a veil that like a mist of fog that descends. And other people are unhappiness can take different forms. Some people are continuously angry or they they're full of grievances.

And so if you live with that for some time, your identity becomes one big grievance. And there are people walking around this world, they are grievances looking for a cause. And if you are a grievance looking for cause, you've continuously find causes, obviously very easily.

If you want to be angry, the world will give an unending supply of reasons for being angry. So the little practice of not adding thought. So in other words, and again, we come back to that really is stillness arises, a very powerful sense of presence is there.

This stillness is not just the absence of sounds, inner sounds. Silence, we could say is the absence of external sounds. Stillness is the absence of mental sounds, which are thoughts.

But there's much more to stillness and then an absence of something. The stillness is the presence of an enormous power, which is the power of life itself. This power of life itself, as you become more rooted in that, and go there as much as you can, and until it becomes almost, one could say, second nature to you, and it's always there in the background, then you are connected to an enormous power, that is the power of consciousness itself, that transcends who or what you are as a person.

And then it can operate through you, and you find your life in this dimension, begins to be affected by this power that transcends who or what you are as a person. What form it takes, we do not know. It might flow into your speaking or writing or doing creative work or creating something else or removing yourself totally from where you are and going.

Nobody can predict how this power will manifest through you, but it'll manifest through you in some way. If only, if you are quite old, perhaps you don't have a lot of big projects anymore when you're 95, even 85, I don't know, then it can manifest as a deep, powerful inner peace that emanates and affects people around you, even if you don't say anything. And this is what old age is supposed to be, that old age is supposed to be an opportunity for self-transcendence, because the self that you had identified with is coming to an end.

You might as well transcend it now. That's the ancient saying, die before you die, that's what it refers to. Don't wait.

The old age is a wonderful opportunity for letting go, no longer needing the egoic consciousness. But if you reach the age of 70 and you've been so trapped in egoic consciousness, you've rejected whenever anything, even remotely spiritual or whatever came into your life, you immediately rejected it. Sometimes when you're so old, nothing will free you anymore.

You're trapped in an ossified personality and a grumpy, you know, it's a grumpy old man, that kind of thing. Or woman, I suppose. Leave me alone.

I know everything. It's all nonsense. Don't give me that.

I know it all. I've seen it all. It's just rubbish.

You're just a personality, strong personality, and one day you suddenly you drop dead. So use your daily life, which is the best practice. Don't look for an ideal situation to practice away spiritual awakening.

The ideal situation is the situation you're facing right now. That's ideal for you. Use that and use the time that we are moving into for deepening, deepening, intensifying the already occurring awakening in you.

When so-called bad things happen, you look at it, let go of adding any thought to it. What is bad on one level is no longer bad from a higher level of existence. There are different levels of truth.

For example, incurring a serious illness is usually considered bad. Of course, it is a life-threatening illness. You would call it bad.

But is it? It's an opportunity for awakening, too. And I have met over the years quite a few people, many, who were faced with a life-threatening illness, and it drove them into disidentifying from all the stuff that they had identified with, and they began to awaken as pure presence.

I saw a few that shortly before they died, and they were luminous and absolutely there. The personality was completely gone. It was just an enormous, beautiful presence.

That is the ultimate possibility as you approach death. Interesting story from my own life. As you know, our gathering was postponed because I was diagnosed with a potentially life-threatening illness, and it required immediate surgery.

So that is an interesting, very interesting story. After the exam, the man, the doctor said, you have the big C word. You have cancer.

Oh, well, the moment of my personality was disconcerted for a minute, and then I sensed a very deep, there's usually a presence in the background, but the presence that I sense usually in the background somewhere suddenly filled my entire being. And then in the following days, I was just walking around as basically I had died already. I was just, just consciousness was left.

And 10 days later, I had a big surgery, and this thing was removed. And then the examination happened again, and they said, well, you seem to be free now of it. Hasn't spread anywhere, it seems.

Oh, that's fine. Thank you. It's, so this is, it came to me, I was already well prepared for that kind of thing.

But it can be a very powerful opening for anybody if you know how to, how to approach it, if it happens. And death will come one way or another. So, one could say, people love these concepts.

They have self-concepts that say, I could say, the ego always looks for new self-concepts. Okay, what can I add? Okay, now I could say, I'm a cancer survivor.

Okay, I have another concept. I could feel good about that until something else happens. Conceptual identities, again, be very careful with any, yes, also if you're engaged in spiritual awakening, be very vigilant so that you do not replace one conceptual identity with another conceptual identity.

For example, you might progress from being attached to your BMW or your Ferrari, and derive an enhanced sense of fictitious identity from that. And then you go beyond that, because you go to a talk by me, and you suddenly realize, oh, my Ferrari is meaningless. Okay, I'm letting go of that.

I'm now going on a bicycle just to show the world how spiritual I am. And then without knowing it, you have just as big an ego as before. It's just as shifted to something else.

This is sometimes called a spiritual ego. Can be very, very strong too. But so the ego is looking always, be careful so that the ego doesn't come in through the back door, as it tends to do.

Oh, I acquired another, the other day, I acquired another identity. I was walking in a forest, going for a walk, and a couple, a young couple, a man and a woman, came the opposite direction. And the man looked at me and stopped for a moment and said, I know you from somewhere.

What is your name? I said, Eckhart. Oh, yes, I watch your YouTube all the time.

And I watch you all the time on YouTube. And he said to his girlfriend, look, this guy is a famous YouTuber. Great, I'm now a famous YouTuber.

I'm very proud of that. My next ambition is to become an Instagram influencer. Now, you might think I'm too old for that, but there are many wonderful filters you can use.

And you won't even recognize me. Beware of conceptual identities. Again, people, they want to give you identities.

They want to impose identities. Don't take them on board. Don't, don't accept them.

People call me a spiritual teacher. Again, it's a conceptual identity. And it is true that in this moment, I'm a spiritual teacher.

But if I'm still a spiritual teacher, when I get out of this building, and I carry this mental concept with me and derive my identity from it, then I'm trapped again in ego. So spiritual teacher, for example, as many other things, it's a function, but not an identity. When the function operates, one could say, yes, I'm a spiritual teacher right now.

But when I walk away from here, I let go of that. And that's very important. For many of you also who are undestined, or many of you are already one way or another engaged in some kind of work with people, spiritual teaching, quite a few of you will become, if you're not already, spiritual teachers one way or another.

And again, be very careful not to build, not to allow the mind to create another conceptual identity for yourself. So always coming back to realizing that who you are is not somebody, but who you are in essence is consciousness. So when I walk away here, I sit in the car, just conscious presence, look out of the window, can feel the presence, the awareness.

I'm nobody in particular, just a field of presence. Then it's beautiful. It's free.

You feel completely free. There's nothing to defend and nothing to add. So be careful with that.

Surrender all conceptual identities, then life becomes much, much easier. And particularly important if you're engaged in some kind of spiritual work, because you don't want the ego to come in through the back door again. So the essence of our gathering here is obviously the state of transcendence that is arising in humanity.

You need for the rest of your earthly existence here, you need to embody that and make that the main purpose of your life. Of course, you have other purposes. The purposes operate on the human level, and you should pursue them if they are not totally ego-serving purposes.

That would be pointless. But there are many purposes that you can pursue. That's fine, whether you are a hairdresser or whether you are an accountant or whether you are a stockbroker or whatever it may be.

The important thing then is to realize ultimately what you do is of secondary importance, but how you do what you do is primary, because how refers to the state of consciousness out of which you act. The how is primary. So always pay attention to what is your state of consciousness at this moment.

As we started with that, when I said if there's irritation in you, be aware of that, and then be aware of yourself as the awareness. That is, you're becoming self-aware. Awareness arises more and more, and you become rooted in the awareness.

You become rooted in presence. That is your primary identity. I call it, I wrote about it, form identity and essence identity.

Form identity is a physical body and the psychological form of you. That's the me, the human. Essence identity is that which makes the form identity possible.

That is consciousness, if we want to call it anything. You are that. I am that.

That's an ancient Indian saying to, I am that, and you are that. So that is the purpose of human existence in this lifetime for you to explore. Do not allow the world to tell you whether your life is a success or not, because the world is a little bit insane.

So don't take that on board. Success is how conscious you are, and if your entire life up to this point was one huge disaster, perhaps taking one bad decision after another, that's an extreme. Most people have a mixture of things, but let's take an extreme.

Your entire life story up to now is just as dreadful. Okay, but you're here now, and if you awaken now, retrospectively, all the dreadfulness and the suffering has had a purpose. It had the purpose of awakening, and retrospectively, it all makes sense suddenly.

Wow. So that is, success is whether you are awake or not in this lifetime. Nothing else.

So you can still pursue your aims, but whether you make it or not, that's a weird expression, making it or making what, I don't know. Whether you make it or not is of secondary importance. Many people in LA are very ambitious, they want to become big stars in the big industry here, Hollywood, and yes, I'm sure there are some here, there are some who have made it already, and some haven't made it yet, and maybe they never will, or they will.

It's secondary. You pursue, you do the best you can, but in the meantime, it's all of secondary, it's, I sometimes say, it's important, but it's relatively important. All those things are relatively important, whether you're poor or rich, or whether you are healthy or unhealthy, or whether you are, whatever, successful or not successful, is relatively important.

Whether you live in an unpleasant environment, or in a wonderful environment, is relatively important, but only relatively, only one thing of absolute importance, and that is the realization of who or what you are beyond this temporary form. That's the secret of human existence. And with that, perhaps we will conclude our gathering.

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Per Aspera Ad Astra : Through Adversity We Reach the Stars! [4f0ad8a9-6548-4394-8300-6bdda231aa4b]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 1:09)

Per Aspera ad Astra, through adversity to the stars. In this episode, Eckhart answers questions about turning adversity into spiritual growth. A mother wants more emotional stability in her life.

She says she often wakes up feeling full of energy only to find the next moment she's irritable and exhausted. She's concerned about transmitting her negative moods to her children. Eckhart encourages her to remain alert when the low energy takes hold.

He also explains that sustaining consciousness during difficult times is a great art and this could become an important part of her spiritual practice. Another mom asks if suffering is necessary for our awakening, then how do we help our children to awaken without causing unnecessary pain? He says every child will encounter some form of suffering, which is part of the human condition.

He says as parents, we must use wisdom to decide when to protect our children and when to let them experience life on life's terms. Eckhart shares an ancient Roman aphorism. In Latin, it is Per Aspera ad Astra, which means through adversity we reach the stars.

Thank you for letting me ask my question. Why is it easier on some days to remain present than others? I recall even as a child waking up in the morning and feeling really good inside or the opposite.

I have studied these feelings throughout my life and I realized that on days when I awake feeling good, I have amazing amounts of energy. I'm much more present and patient and those days just like every song on the radio is a good one. Then suddenly without anything external happening, the energy seems to be gone and I'm unmotivated, tired and very unsettled.

It is almost like the energy is trapped inside because it seems like it is there. It almost makes me angry at times. I've tried to be physically active or meditate, focus on the inner body, but it is very hard to get motivated to basically do any of these activities.

This state can take a day or a week or longer and then eventually I awake feeling great again without anything external happening. I was wondering if you have any input, any kind of practice.

Thank you. Thank you. Very interesting.

Yes. Well, these fluctuations, I don't believe in your case what you're describing is not... I'm sure you're aware that there's a condition that is called manic depressive, but I don't think that's probably not what you're describing here.

Manic depressive means these are people who experience incredible highs of aliveness and then incredible lows, whether they can't do anything, can't interact with anybody. When they experience these highs, I don't think that's the case with you. When they experience these highs, they do sometimes a lot of things like they have several sex partners in one day or two or three days, or they go out and spend all shopping expeditions, spend all their money and exhaust all their credit cards on shopping, spontaneous, completely irrational decisions on their high and then they're falling back into the low.

Now, this doesn't seem to be what you're describing because what you're saying is that when you feel good, you are also very present. So a person who is manic depressive, they are not present in either state. They are not present in the high state and they are not present in the low state.

But you feel that you are present when you feel good, you're also present and you're able to appreciate things and everything is fine and you feel more creative and so on.

[Speaker 2] (4:02 - 4:21)

I have much more patience with people around me and I do appreciate things more. Everything even tastes better. It's absolutely amazing how much different these days can be.

It doesn't go into extreme that I go and have sexual relationships with 20 people, no.

[Speaker 1] (4:22 - 4:23)

Or you don't spend all your money.

[Speaker 2] (4:24 - 4:29)

No, no, no. It wouldn't be much spending anyways. Right.

[Speaker 1] (4:31 - 8:10)

So again, the important thing is to when the low states come, which I believe there's probably a physical aspect to it also. Do you feel physically weaker in the low states? When that comes, the important thing is to stay present even there so that you are able to observe the low as it happens.

It may not be as easy perhaps to stay present when you feel good, but when you feel bad, there can still be a presence in the background that knows what's happening to you so that you're not completely overwhelmed by that feeling. It's not uncommon for people, even people who are already on the path of awakening, when they feel physically not so well or have a pain here or there, they lose presence because their physical body becomes weaker and then they lose their sense of presence. It seems that there's not enough energy left to be present.

That's what they believe. And then, of course, it's also very common to lose presence in other situations like when you drink alcohol. Many people can easily lose presence then, especially if you're not deeply rooted in presence already.

And if you are deeply rooted in presence, you wouldn't want to drink a lot of alcohol. You might enjoy it a little bit here and there, but you wouldn't want to be drunk because your normal state would be so much better and more beautiful. The relief that people seek through alcohol from their unpleasant, painful inner states.

The important thing is the awareness needs to still be there in both situations, both when you feel good, when you feel great. And I don't know how that is related to the low cycles, whether that is related to your menstrual cycle. It's sometimes related in women that they go into more unconscious cycle when that approaches.

So it could, I don't know whether there's a relationship with that. That is often a challenging time for women where they are drawn into unconsciousness. But when you know that, then you can know it's approaching and you can stay particularly conscious so that you can sustain consciousness even when the low comes.

And that is the great art. This is part of, perhaps, important part of your spiritual practice is to sustain the awareness even as the physical energy diminishes and mentally you don't feel as clear, but you can still, are you still able to observe that? Perhaps you can continue even there.

Can you continue to practice inner body awareness even when you feel low? That may be helpful. Another interesting question is when you feel low, does that change your thinking?

In the low state, does the nature of your thoughts change? Do their thoughts become more negative or does it not particularly affect the nature of your thoughts?

[Speaker 2] (8:11 - 8:13)

It does affect the thoughts, yes.

[Speaker 1] (8:13 - 12:34)

That's a very important point because it affects your thought, which means you lose consciousness, you lose presence and your mind gets taken over by this emotional state that rises into up into your mind and controls your thinking. So that's why it's extremely important that you make that the main area of your spiritual practice is there so that remain alert as the low state comes. I don't know how the shift happens from the high to the low, whether it is very gradual, whether it's overnight.

So you suddenly wake up in the morning and the high is gone and you're down low, you're nodding. So perhaps it often happens overnight. So in the morning, you're somebody else.

And that's so in the morning, you're somebody else in a very low state, different kinds of thoughts get through your head. And are you able to observe your inner state at that time, especially there, catch it at the beginning when you wake up in the morning and you realize, oh, there it is, there it is. That's an important thing.

And then you stay conscious. If you don't catch it at the beginning, it's a bit harder to awaken at a later stage when it has taken possession of you completely, including your thinking. When it has taken possession of you completely, you may not be able to get your awareness back unless the awareness power has already grown in you.

But if you catch it at the beginning, it will be easier to remain. The witnessing presence can remain there even as the state continues to be there. And as the witnessing presence arises, it is less likely that the low state will use your thinking, will control your mind and your thoughts.

And if it can no longer control, then you just feel it on an emotional, physical level, but it no longer, because there's an awareness there. So it no longer, and if it does attempt to control your thoughts, the awareness will recognize that this is what's happening, that the low state is trying to control your thinking, moving to control your mind. And so there's the awareness there, and you say, oh, it's trying to control your mind.

And it can't do that if you're aware of it. If you're aware of it, and then at least it can no longer control your thinking. All you're left with then is what you feel at that moment.

And if it can no longer control your thinking, it can no longer feed itself, feed on your thoughts. Because that state, I believe it, in our terminology, I believe that state is actually part of your pain body, because not every pain body is angry. There are many other kinds of pain body.

So it takes you over. And if it cannot feed on your thoughts, it will be less intense and more short-lived, because it can't renew itself by feeding on your thoughts. So it means the periods, the lower periods will become shorter and less intense through the awareness practice.

And that's only the intermediate step. First they become shorter and less intense, and then gradually you will only experience some form of low state. It'll be mostly physical, low state without low consciousness.

And you can then accept that sometimes you experience lower states. Every human on some level does that physically. You cannot always be physically at a physical peak all the time.

So sometimes that happens, but that's all that is. It no longer will no longer obscure your awareness. Does it make sense the way I described how you approach it?

[Speaker 2] (12:34 - 12:59)

It does make very much sense. The stuff that worries me, I'm okay, not feeling okay at times, but I am a mom and I don't want that to pass over to my family, to my children, to my partner. Because I don't think it's fair.

So I was just wondering how could I deal with it myself somehow, so they don't have to deal with me being this way.

[Speaker 1] (13:00 - 13:44)

Yes. Well, in the meantime, until you become better at the practice, what would help is to tell them when you notice I'm in that slow state today. So just wanted you to know, and then they can know that's already, at least now they know.

And then perhaps they are more careful in the way they say to you, or they leave you alone or whatever they do. You explain to them that sometimes you have that low state and it's not really you. It's not who you really are.

And so, and then just practice. Catch it early on when it arises. And then that's your practice.

[Speaker 2] (13:45 - 13:46)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (13:47 - 14:58)

Thank you. And I believe that will also be helpful for many other people, because you're not the only one who has the, many people have similar experience, similar conditions in their life, or that's the fluctuation of moods. Many, many people experience that.

And the challenge is to stay present, both with the high and the low moods. Isn't it wonderful? They sort of, all the difficult areas in your life are actually always your main area of practice.

And so then you can be grateful, if not right in the moment, but retrospectively, certainly you'll be grateful for the difficult parts of your life, the adversity in your life, because that's what brings about the awakening of consciousness. Per aspera ad astra, said the Romans, per aspera ad astra, through adversity to the stars. Let's have one more question.

[Speaker 4] (14:59 - 15:00)

Hi, Eckhart.

[Speaker 1] (15:00 - 15:01)

Hi, how are you?

[Speaker 4] (15:02 - 15:40)

Fine, thank you for having us. My question was, if suffering is our spiritual teacher and leads to awakening, how can we help our children awaken without giving them a bad childhood? Do children need to suffer deeply to awaken?

And I work in with schools, and so I just try to translate your teachings to like a secular way of talking. And I just want to know, like, your thoughts on the most important tools that we can give children to prepare them for the challenges.

[Speaker 1] (15:40 - 29:37)

Right. Oh, yes, good question. Thank you.

Living in this world, some form of suffering will come to every child, of course, in one form or another. Some form of suffering will come that is inevitable. For a parent or an educator, what is required is wisdom.

And through wisdom, you will know to what extent it is advisable or good to protect the child from suffering, and to what extent you need to allow the child to suffer. Many parents, understandably, because they love the child, they have the desire to protect the child from all suffering. And that would include, when they do that, even protecting the child from consequences of bad or dysfunctional behavior, to protect the child from all these things.

As you know, the way we are bringing up children is very much different from the way it used to be 50 years ago, 100 years ago. Safety has become extremely important in people's minds, not only with reference to children, but also, of course, with reference to children, safety is very important. In many parts of the United States, not everywhere in the United States, but in many parts, it's almost, I think, illegal to allow your child to play outside in the street.

Whereas in the past, when I was a child, we would always be outside and completely unsupervised. And it was in a city, it wasn't a village, playing completely unsupervised for hours on end, going on our bikes, exploring. It was normal.

So there's now a tendency to overprotect a child, partly due to the fact that most parents only have one or two children, so they become very precious. If you only have one, rather than six, seven or eight. My dad was the ninth child in a Catholic family.

Two of his siblings died at an early age, but he still lived with six or seven brothers and sisters. And of course, it wasn't possible to closely supervise all these children, so they were free to do what they wanted to do. So there's a risk involved.

Wisdom is required to see to what extent do you restrict the freedom of movement of your child for the sake of safety? That requires wisdom. If you restrict the child's movement too much for the sake of safety, you also impede their development as finding inner resources of strength and resilience.

And to find inner resources that arise when you're faced with a challenge. When a human is faced with a challenge, inner resources are generated in order to face the challenge. So if you want to protect the child from all possible sources of suffering, then you'd also have to remove as many challenges as possible, because any challenge may lead to some degree of suffering.

There's another reason why there's overprotectiveness and extreme focus on safety, but that's a longer subject that I don't need to go into now. I perceive a shift that has happened in the collective consciousness in the past 40, 50 years. A shift from predominantly I believe everybody understands yin and yang, masculine and feminine principles that the world exists in between the polarity of yin and yang.

Until 50 years ago or so, yang was a predominant principle that governed especially the education of children, discipline, punishment. When I was at school, corporal punishment was totally normal. Things that nowadays a teacher would be taken to court for and lose their job was normal behavior.

And the students were quite disciplined. I mean, there was sometimes trouble, but there was authoritarian, overly controlling children, not allowing them sufficient freedom for creativity and movement for the sake of control and discipline and so on. That's a shift now, of course, from the yang prominent, a significant part of the population has adopted a much more yin attitude towards life.

The feminine values have become much more important, compassion towards people, empathy with people, not offending people because of their race or sexuality, but to have empathy so that we don't hurt people. They're all feminine qualities that have come in. And that's been a good thing and a necessary thing.

But no good thing, more of a good thing is an even better thing. And more than that, it doesn't remain good continuously. Too much of a good thing becomes a bad thing.

Then it shifts into its opposite. This is why yin and yang are intertwined. And that's a long story.

But as regards education of children, it's now predominantly focused on safety. Like a mother would be most concerned with a child's safety. And the dad who would represent the yang would be concerned with, okay, let's do this.

Let's go climb this mountain. Let's do it. But be careful, you must be careful.

Of course, the roles could be mixed. It could be that the man has more yin than the woman. So in that case, it could be mixed.

But there's yin and yang. So the yin is very strong emphasis on safety because up to a point that is good. And if you go beyond that point, it becomes bad and restrictive.

So again, in many schools, the famous thing, they do sports and all kinds of things. In many schools now because of this empathy that you have, you don't want a child to feel bad. It's a wonderful thing.

You don't want the child to feel bad. It is wonderful. And that's a yin thing, which means the famous saying, everybody gets a trophy.

You just need to participate and get a trophy. So nobody needs to feel bad about themselves. But you don't get challenged that much anymore.

Because we don't want anybody to feel bad because if you challenge them too much, they will feel bad if they can't meet the challenge. It's a very complex and long story. But we have now going to the other extreme where we try to remove as many challenges as possible from children so that they don't suffer.

And some parents almost succeed because they pamper the child so much. Whatever the child wants, he or she is given immediately. Every possible source of suffering is removed.

And if you could do that by the time the child reaches adolescence, the child's ego would be dreadful. A very unpleasant ego would have developed in the absence of all challenges. Never had to experience the consequences of behavior.

No behavior, no matter how dysfunctional, had any consequences. And then they become an adult. And then it gets really difficult.

Sometimes it is not possible to remove challenges. If you were successful in removing all challenges from your child, that absence of challenges would turn into the adult's greatest and most difficult challenge. The fact that he or she was never challenged in childhood by anything.

Overprotected by their parents. So wisdom is required to see how much you allow a child to have a challenge, and even to suffer by not being able to meet the challenge, and to what extent you remove a challenge from a child in order to protect them. Wisdom is required so that you have a balance, the middle way, as the Buddha called it, or the, as Socrates said, nothing in excess.

Not in excess of giving the child too many challenges, so the child is continuously struggling and not being able to enjoy life. And trying to remove all challenges from the child. The middle way between protecting the child and yet allow enough freedom to make mistakes also, that's part of it.

The child needs to make mistakes and realize the consequences of making mistakes. It's all part of the evolution of consciousness. But suffering is inevitable, no matter what you do.

And it's not bad. You have to know to bring a child up, it requires enormous wisdom. And of course, not many parents have that.

But it does, it does require, so that you can be more or less in the middle. Yes, we grow through suffering, and every child will suffer. And if a child is overprotected, that will cause them more suffering when they become an adult, because they were not prepared for life.

So whatever you do, the child will suffer. And yet, of course, we don't want the child to take absurd risks, unnecessary risks. Drugs are a huge problem these days.

You want to get a child away from that. That's a big thing. That's not to allow the child so much freedom that they become, they indulge in drug taking and all that, that is to be avoided at all cost.

It was 20 years ago, I was going for a walk. I was first time I realized the safety thing. I was, there's a school nearby.

And I walked past the school, it was just the beginning of the vacation period. And there's a big sign built signboard outside that says, summer break starting on that date, and have a good summer. And underneath in big letters, it said, be safe.

The main thing was be safe about the summer, be safe. I thought, is that the main thing? I imagined a student coming back after summer break and a teacher asking, well, what did you do during the summer break?

And students, well, I took your advice. We decided not to go to the mountains, because the risk, there's a risk where we could have broken limbs or we didn't climb the mountain. In fact, we stayed at home most of the time because life is so dangerous these days.

We didn't go swimming. No, no, it's too dangerous, can't go swimming. So we were really safe, didn't go anywhere, really safe.

So I thought, of course, safety is important. It's important not to take unnecessary risk, but it is the main thing to be safe. Why not say, have a wonderful time, but also be safe.

That makes sense. Have an adventure even, but don't take unnecessary risks. That's the middle way.

Now, any adventure implies the possibility of something going wrong, because it's not the possibility of something going wrong. It's not an adventure. It's a boring trip.

Any adventure means something might go wrong. So there is an element of risk there. And yet, no human should take unnecessary or absurd risks.

That's also true. And again, we come the middle way between the two, between the extremes. So for a parent, it's to know that you need to be wise.

How much do you allow a child to suffer the consequences of their mistakes, for example, not immediately remove the consequences? And to what extent do you remove suffering from your child? That's only in the situation you can know by being aware, because wisdom arises through awareness.

By being aware, you will know what the right action is, right? Either one way, you go towards safety or you go towards the challenge. And challenge always implies the risk of suffering.

And if you go too much into safety, you also create suffering eventually. You can't get away from it. And that's part of the evolution of human consciousness.

Eckhart Tolle Practice of Presence [6920e193-f03a-480c-a44b-ad3b0170f7f8]

[Speaker 5] (0:00 - 0:30)

Practice of presence. In this podcast, Eckhart discusses with a live audience one of his key spiritual teachings, the practice of presence. He says, presence arises when we free ourselves of incessant thinking and roll back the ego so our essential true self can shine through.

As we become more adept at the practice, he says, it's possible to stay in the present moment through all of life's ups and downs.

You don't have to be as slow as I am to be present. I'm not always slow, but often. Interesting thing to find out for yourself if you've reached a stage in your spiritual evolution where you're able to choose to be free of thinking without exerting willpower to suppress thought and without stopping your breathing and without engaging in a life-threatening activity which could easily stop your mind.

Walking on a tight rope will certainly stop your mind for two seconds before you fall off. Now, some of you are able to do that when you're not being disturbed by anything or anybody. Everything is fine.

You're sitting quietly in your room or outside and then you just go There's an intensity of awareness, but there's no willpower. You're not willing it to happen. You're not willing, you're not suppressing thought.

If you're not yet there, that's fine. You can choose other ways of taking attention away from the stream of thinking by placing attention on sensory perception into your body, the inner body, or on your breathing that's happening naturally. So as the Buddha said, when they asked how to attain enlightenment, he said, just be aware that you're breathing.

Now, as long as you're aware that you're breathing, you can't be thinking. So he didn't say, don't think, he said, be aware of your breath. So your attention moves away from mind and goes, you feel the inflow and outflow of the breath.

You even feel every subtle movement of the breath where it enters your nose and then it flows in. And then it flows out and you follow it with your attention. And then at some point you could let go of that too.

Then you're just not thinking. The important thing is you're above thinking. We're not talking about falling below thinking.

And then you're able to be in that state of pure awareness or presence, even while things happen. That's next step, so to speak, even while you're talking to your attorney, there's a court case coming up. Are you able to be in presence while you listen to what he has to say?

Or there's an obnoxious person in your vicinity. This is not an uncommon occurrence. Since a greater part of humans, if not are obnoxious, but periodically become obnoxious.

In other words, very unconscious. Humans move to different levels of consciousness and unconsciousness. It's not always the same person that you meet.

It's a delusion to think once you have become acquainted with somebody that this is going to be the same person you're going to meet the next day, because he or she may be in a very different state of consciousness the next day, or when an event happens to trigger that person into diminished consciousness. And then one of the sub-personalities that is associated with that diminished consciousness is suddenly there and talking to you. Who are you?

And that's even more shocking if this happens after you've signed a contract that says you're going to live with this person for the rest of your life. And then the mind comes up with strange conclusions. I won't trust anybody anymore.

He really let me down. He's a liar. He's just pretending to be nice.

He was so nice. No, now I know he was just pretending. No, he was nice.

Perhaps he was at a relatively more conscious stage at that time, but now he's not nice because something that you said triggered him and another sub-personality emerged, so to speak, or somebody mentioned the word money. You owe me. And you can observe it in yourself that you're sometimes more conscious than at other times.

You're sometimes very present, even in a challenging situation. At other times, a challenging situation or person pulls you into unconscious reactivity. When you wake up a few minutes or an hour later or a day, as more consciousness emerges through you, the time period between unconsciousness and waking up again out of an unconscious reactive episode is shorter.

You don't stay in it for a week complaining about people and what they did to you. Your mind never stops replaying a situation in your mind, different versions of it that could have happened if you only had said the right thing. And then you can imagine the next time you're confronted with this person, how it's going to unfold.

And you feel angry and can't sleep at night. And you don't even know what's happening to you until something suddenly, it actually is like waking up out of a dreamlike state. What was that all about?

So as far as trusting other people is concerned, can you trust people? Yes, trust everybody to behave. You can trust that they will behave according to their level of consciousness at any given time, complete trust.

No more is possible. Now to be more integrated, to be a human being that is no longer taken over by reactive episodes to such an extent that virtually another person emerges temporarily, there needs to be more awareness that there's still maybe remnants of these sub-personalities surviving for a certain period of time in you, but they no longer take you over. That you can still feel the energy behind it when certain things happen.

But what awareness does, it integrates all that. It's no longer one entity that takes you over completely. And of course, especially the pain body as the most powerful sub-personality and the pain body may even have two or three aspects to it.

So it could be divided into two or three other sub-personalities. But let's treat the pain body as one huge sub-personality when it comes up. To have that no longer controlling you, that requires that energy field of awareness around it, its presence around it.

And then you know it's still there, but it doesn't take over anymore. Or if it does, then immediately after you know, oops, there it was. So eventually awareness, then you become an integrated being with still a few energy flows here and there, but not a big deal anymore.

We'll have some questions, but before, just read two or three questions that people have been sending in questions, people who are watching us, who are with us, but elsewhere in time, in space, and eventually in time too. Except that it's always the present moment. So time ultimately is an illusion, but on a conventional level, we talk about time.

I forgot to say hello to everybody who is not physically present here, but present somewhere else on the planet. This question tends to come up very often. So it is a question that quite a few people have.

If we live with a person who is unconscious a lot of the time, is it possible to have a harmonious relationship whether the person totally awakens or not? That seems to be a recurring problem for many people. Now, if you have brought your unconscious partner here, and he or she actually came along, that means not all is lost.

If he or she is still here. So it depends in what way the unconsciousness of the person that you live with manifests from being in negative states of misinterpreting what you say or do, anger, verbal abuse, and then it goes higher up on the scale of unconsciousness to physical abuse. So if the unconsciousness is not too high up on that level of intensity, it may be possible to live with a person who may not share, not only not share your interest in spiritual evolution, but have no idea what you are practicing or reading or talking about.

If you try to point something out, that person may just be uninterested. And then if you go up on the scale of unconsciousness, then another person may be hostile towards what you're doing. And there's a big difference, but in both cases, there's unconsciousness.

Your partner may just have no idea what it is, but say, well, yeah, go listen to that guy, Eckhart. I don't know why you go there, but that's okay. I'll be fine.

That's fine. So you can live with that person. And then another one gets angry.

Why do you always have to say, I can't stand it anymore, or whatever, criticize. So you might be able to live with that. What you can live with, only you can know whether you can continue your presence practice and bring surrender into the situation with this person.

And miracles are possible. Miracles do happen. And sometimes the seemingly most unconscious person can suddenly shift.

Now, if that person is very unconscious, usually what is required is some blow, not you physically doing it. I'm speaking metaphorically. Life administers some blow in the form of big loss, accident, illness, and then deeply unconscious people are very much trapped in their ego, can sometimes suddenly open up.

The ego gets cracked. You may sometimes observe that when a person with a big ego is unconscious, when they become ill, they're lying in bed. Sometimes the ego gets even stronger, it seems, but for some people, the ego, there isn't enough energy left to keep the ego going in that, because the illness absorbs so much energy.

And suddenly this person who was never a genuine person that you couldn't talk to heart to heart, because there was always egoic posturing and egoic role-playing there. And suddenly this person is ill, lying in bed, and there just isn't enough energy for posturing and role-playing. And then for the first time, I've observed it a few times, people have told me and I've personally observed, for the first time, you can communicate with that person in a deeper level of presence.

This can also happen when people who had a huge ego all throughout their lives, when they're approaching death, sometimes miracles of transformation can happen in the last moments, in the last days, or in the last weeks of a person's life, when resentments that had been building up over a lifetime and other narratives of an extremely negative nature are let go of, can happen. It can also happen when a person is ill, that when this person recovers, that shift that you observed doesn't last. And the moment strength returns to that person, the old egoic patterns are back.

And it's like, oh my God, you're your old self again. You were so nice when you were ill. Loving and present and open.

Well, just wait, things will happen again. So if there's abuse, and these are more pronounced manifestations of unconsciousness, if there's verbal abuse, can you live with such a person? Only you can know whether you're prepared to do that, whether you can sustain your presence practice, perhaps not.

Physical abuse, if you stay with physical abuse in the hope that this person will become transformed, that is probably a delusion, but I cannot tell you what to do. But if you are alert and vigilant and observe yourself in the presence of that person, you will know what to do. You just have to see that the right course of action is not being sabotaged by certain patterns that remain in your mind, mental, emotional patterns, such as fear of being alone, fear, loss of security, perhaps the security of being with another person, even if it's fear of the unknown, stepping into the unknown.

So you may be held back by certain patterns in your mind. And if you have present enough, you can recognize that and then go beyond it. One more question from here or maybe one or two.

Now the reason why I don't select people, because if I pointed, you would have no idea who I'm pointing at. So the spotlight is on you now.

[Speaker 2] (16:57 - 17:48)

Thank you for these teachings, Eckhart. My question is, you talked in the Power of Now about listening with the body and my work as a coach, probably some other people here work in helping other people too. So hopefully it serves others as well.

I find it so challenging if I'm coaching you, interacting with you, I 100% in the external. I just find that in that moment, I'm so externally focused and yet I totally understand this concept and believe with my heart that there is this greater intelligence that I want to be able to be present for to best serve my clients. So I wonder if you have any recommendations for that?

[Speaker 1] (17:48 - 17:49)

What kind of coaching?

[Speaker 2] (17:50 - 18:05)

So I'm a certified high performance coach. So I basically help people to experience the feeling of full engagement and presence, joy, confidence that comes from living from and into their full potential.

[Speaker 1] (18:06 - 18:10)

So it's a kind of life teaching how to how to live effectively.

[Speaker 2] (18:11 - 19:01)

And yes, yes. Although it is a process, and that we take people through, but so much of my job is is really listening and speaking less. And so that's what I seek to do.

There's some of my teaching, but it is listening more than speaking. So how do you experience the listening when you listen, somebody talks, what your attention is totally on the words, or what is the I close my eyes, and I feel them, I absolutely feel their heart and I hear their words, I seek to hear their hopes and aspirations and struggles and the cracks to sort of dig in to best help them. Yes.

And that's the thing. It's like there's, I just know there's this next level.

Well, the foundation to listening is to feel yourself while you listen, rather than trying to feel the other person. But to be aware of yourself as the awareness through which listening happens, that usually affects your entire body. So you listen, you can feel that when you feel yourself, there is almost a physical aspect to it that almost the cells in your body feel more alive.

But there's also a deeper aspect to it. And that is, you can sense your own awareness, you can sense that you are alert and aware, beyond any words. But that alertness and awareness also affects the feeling of the cells in your body.

But it is deeper than the physical body, of course, it's deeper than that. So your interest in the other person and your desire to help the other person takes you out, it takes you into your mind and it takes you out there. Because you so genuinely want to engage and help.

But the greatest help, the foundation for truly very powerful help is to be connected with the essence of yourself, that primary. And then from there, you listen. And then out of that, words come.

Now, of course, you have studied whatever ways you use to teach people, you've studied all that. So you have a considerable amount of knowledge in your mind and you apply that knowledge, that's fine and good. But if you are connected with your essence identity, as I am, as I sit here, I would not be able to say very much if I were not one with my essence identity that the person has relatively little to do with it, it just floats around on the surface.

So all the words really come out of that, then the way in which you communicate would also become more intuitive. And in addition to applying the knowledge that you have acquired, which is still useful, another element would come into your interaction with the person and that is a very creative and intuitive element. And you may surprise yourself with things that suddenly you say to the other person.

And you find yourself saying things that you didn't know that you knew. And of course, you didn't know them until you said them, they come out. So there's an added dimension that will then come into your work with the other person at this intuitive element where you continuously surprise yourself.

It's almost then as if you were listening to, oh, that was so interesting what I said. Where did that come from? That often happens to me.

But to be rooted in being while you listen and listening is a great thing. Listening is such a vital, vital thing to be able to listen. It's much more than when we say listening to another person goes far beyond auditory perception.

True listening implies that you feel yourself, your conscious presence. In other words, you are aware that you are aware at this moment and the awareness is listening, not the person. And while you're listening, you're not preparing the next thing that you're going to say to that person.

So to some extent, when you're listening that way, you temporarily let go of your knowledge. You temporarily let go of your acquired knowledge. When you need it, it'll be there.

But temporarily you listen in that state of seeming not knowing, seeming ignorance, because there's no thought in it. There's just high alertness. So from a certain point of view of the ego, it would seem that you have voluntarily entered that space of ignorance, but it's not ignorance.

It's only ignorance from the point of view of conceptual knowledge. There's a deep knowing there as opposed to conceptual knowledge. And as you practice that, you actually will be able to bring the two together.

So you can still apply your acquired knowledge, but at the same time, it will be infused with creativity and intuition. And so new things will flow into it. So the two come together.

It can also happen with some people who do this for a long, long time, that gradually the creative and intuitive dimension operates more and more frequently. After a few years, the acquired knowledge plays a very small part, and in some cases even disappears. And something totally new is then coming out of you.

And that could become a new modality again that then other people study. And you write a book about it. So that's how it works.

But the foundation is feeling your presence. And you practice that, practice it with simple conversations where you're not actually trying to help anybody. Oh yes, of course, also this idea that you have to help this person is still an idea.

It's also good to let go of that, that you're not trying to help. This attempt to help, it can be an obstacle to going deeper. If I thought I have to help you all, that wouldn't work very well.

Yes, thank you very much. My question. I read your books, and there's one little phrase that you have, and I listened to the tape you've done with Oprah, the 10 sessions you did, about five times.

And you talk about it. But the part when you say, life is the dancer, and we are the dance. And Oprah said, isn't it the other way around?

And you explained it somewhat, but I didn't grasp it. And you being here in front of me is the most joyous thing in my life to have you answer that. I couldn't ask for anything more.

This is one of the most special times of my life. So if you could answer that, I think a lot of people have that question too. Thank you.

Your question is? Life is the dancer. Yes.

And we are the dance, which is the opposite of what we would think.

Well, I believe what I meant was, it's always strange when one goes to the past, and people say, what did you mean when you said that 10 years ago? Did I say that? I'm sorry, I went fairly deep.

The dancer and the dance, this analogy, if that's what it is that I used, is, the dancer is the consciousness. And life, as it unfolds in the world of form and multiplicity on this planet and in many other places, is the dance of life. The dancer is who you are in your essence.

The dancer is God, ultimately, the one, the one consciousness. You are the one consciousness. And the consciousness expresses itself as this so-called person or human being.

I love that expression, human being. You remember how I interpret human being? Human is the form.

Being is the formless. Being is the dancer.

[Speaker 7] (27:09 - 27:10)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (27:10 - 27:13)

And human is the dance.

[Speaker 4] (27:15 - 27:19)

That's beautiful. Thank you so much. Thanks.

Yeah.

[Speaker 6] (27:19 - 27:34)

Good evening. I'm French. Nobody's perfect.

So the first time I read The Power of Now, I read the French version.

[Speaker 8] (27:34 - 27:34)

Yes.

[Speaker 6] (27:35 - 27:40)

And it's been translated, The Power of the Present Moment.

[Speaker 8] (27:40 - 27:40)

Yes.

[Speaker 6] (27:41 - 28:01)

And the more I'm listening to you, the more I'm wondering if there isn't a huge translation mistake. Isn't it The Power of Presence? Couldn't we say that the now is the presence and not just the present moment?

Ah, interesting. Yes. Le pouvoir du moment présent.

Le pouvoir du moment présent. Okay, I got it. The present moment is usually, when one speaks of present moment, most people will think that what we are talking about, not you, but the uninitiated, most people will believe that we are talking about what's happening in the present moment.

That's the present moment. What's the present? And therefore, since things that happen change continuously, every moment something else happens, or if it's not every moment, but soon after, something else happens.

So one thing happens and then another and another. Nobody knows how many moments there are in one hour because there's no defined duration. But what most people do believe is that every day contains many moments.

Every hour contains many moments. And then when we talk about the present moment, they say, what do you mean, present moment? Which one?

This one? Oh, it's gone already. Where is it?

The now is somewhat better than the present moment. The now is, again, could be misinterpreted as meaning what happens in the now. But when we say be aware of the now, what happens in the now, which is registered through your sense perceptions, obviously is one aspect of the now, but it is not the now.

What happens in the now is an aspect of the now, so to speak. It's the surface phenomenon of the now, and that surface changes all the time. And then you have the now itself, which never changes, and you can verify it in your own life by asking yourself whether you have ever experienced, felt, done, or thought anything that was not in the now.

And you can ask yourself whether anything could possibly happen ever in your life that is not in the now. So the now you cannot escape from. The form it takes changes your body, for example.

When you look at your body 20 years from now, it won't be quite the same, but it will be the now, but something will have changed on the surface of now. So the deeper meaning of now is not what happens, that's not what the now is. The now is the space, the eternal space in which it happens.

And that eternal space in which it happens is consciousness itself. And consciousness is essentially who you are. So in other words, you are the now.

I wish these words had come to me when I was writing The Power of Now. But these words that you are the now, very important words, I mean, it's all implied, it's all there. But these words didn't come, they came after the book.

Book was already published, so it's too late to put it in. That's fine. People got it anyway.

Many people got it and are getting it. But so essentially, you are the now, if you understand what now is. And if we say you are the present moment, you are right.

It's more misleading than to say you are the now. So the now is who you are in your essence, is inseparable from who you are in your essence. The now is inseparable from consciousness itself, which is the space for everything to happen.

But it seems that coming back to the translation, the translator probably thought that in French, it didn't work quite as well as in English to say le pouvoir du maintenant or something. Yeah, or he could have said le pouvoir de la présence. Yes, but that would be a word that most readers wouldn't understand.

The now, they think they understand. In presence, thank you.

My heart is pounding out of my body. You have been on my vision board for six years. Okay, so I interview a lot of people, lots of great healers, and I've learned that there's a mind-gut connection.

And when people suppress their feelings, it brings disease in their body. So I'm also a certified life coach. And my question to you is, what is the difference between being in the moment, experiencing something that is happening to me or to you, and saying, let it go?

So how can I, when people are going through real feelings, how do I ask them to just let it go? Because I know that if they don't deal with it, it will create disease in their body. Right.

Does that make sense?

[Speaker 8] (33:56 - 33:56)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (33:57 - 33:57)

Okay.

[Speaker 1] (33:57 - 33:58)

Yes, thank you.

[Speaker 3] (33:59 - 34:00)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (34:00 - 42:11)

The feeling, first of all, needs to be acknowledged and accepted. You can't start with letting go. So you have to start with acknowledging it and accepting that it's there, because it's part of what is, the is-ness of the present moment.

Whether an external thing or an inner thing, it is what is. And to deny or to argue with what is creates suffering. So you acknowledge, you accept that it's there.

Then how much time you need to be with it depends, varies from person to person and what kind of a feeling it is and so on. And then the question arises, what is the link between that feeling and your thought processes? The person needs to find out whether the thought processes keep that feeling alive continuously, whether they renew by playing out, for example, a past scenario in their minds, by reviving memories from the past, by dwelling on certain narratives that are painful, repeating them in their minds, that gives renewed energy to the feeling.

So the first, the most important thing is to be aware of both levels. What's the level of my thinking? How does that contribute to the perpetuation of what I feel?

And so you also then acknowledge that, oh, these are the habitual thought patterns that go through my mind in relation to the feelings. And then you would begin to realize that the letting go, the most important step in letting go of feelings is to cut the link between your thinking and what you're feeling. How do you do that?

You do it by being aware of your thinking and realizing that thinking is pain. It feeds the old feeling and the narrative, whatever it is, is a painful narrative. And you realize that you've been keeping it alive for some years.

There's some enough awareness, you realized that it has no purpose except to make you unhappy and to perpetuate that feeling. However, you need, and this is how you can help or any counselor or therapist or spiritual teacher can help the other person by observing the feeling and seeing how the mind, the mental narrative has both. The mental narrative and the feeling seem to have a life of their own.

If they have been in there for a long time, they don't want to go. What they want is they want you to be identified with them. They don't want you to be conscious of them.

So this is really the mind aspect of the pain body and the emotional. The pain body is predominantly an emotion, but there is a mental aspect that the pain body needs to rise up into your mind in order to feed on certain types of thinking. In this case, the old narrative.

So you also need enough awareness to know that this thing does not want to go because there's a momentum behind thought patterns that have been active in your mind for a long time. So there's a momentum behind it. So you need to be acutely aware of the process of how it creates further pain.

And when you look through it and see that's actually what it does, then you've recognized you cannot be deceived anymore by completely believing in it every time it happens. In other words, you see that you create your own pain ultimately. When you see that, that's the beginning of the end.

And then you can reach a stage when the pain is no longer, the feeling is no longer fueled by thinking. Then you arrive at a stage where you realize, I don't need the feeling anymore. In fact, you don't need to let go because then when you do not revive it continuously, it subsides by itself.

So you don't need to actually say, I must let go. It lets go of you rather than you need to let go. It's because you're no longer giving it energy.

You're no longer feeding it. So that's the process. So you need to let go is a bit like saying you need to forgive.

That's another one like that. You need to really need to forgive. Okay, I'll try.

I'll really, have you forgiven your parents? Yeah, I think I have. But, Forgiveness again is in a similar way happens naturally when first of all, you realize that no human being can act beyond their level of consciousness at that time when they acted.

So if you haven't forgiven your parents and yet then you can see they behaved the way they did because they could have done otherwise. My father, for example, I loved him dearly. Well, especially after I became conscious.

And before I became conscious, I had a love-hate relationship with him. I found him very obnoxious, but there was love there too, emotional love. But then when I was free, I could love him unconditionally.

And then I could see that pattern in him that gave me so much pain. His uncontrollable anger, mostly fortunately not directed towards me, but directed towards my mother. But the anger that was directed by my father towards my mother hurt me probably more than it hurt my mother as a child.

And his anger was so explosive. It could flare up at any moment. So you were always walking on eggshells.

And then later I realized where that anger came from. Of course, it goes back to childhood, how he was treated in his family. The seventh child, the youngest child, nobody wanted him anymore.

The mother was tired. He wasn't given much attention. It originated from their anger towards his mother and so on and so on.

And later I realized he could not help himself. He did not have the awareness. He was taken over by this anger.

And the moment I realized that he acted according to his level of consciousness at the time, I didn't need to forgive anymore because there was nothing to forgive anymore. And that's a beautiful thing. So again, similar to letting go of feelings, when enough awareness comes in, the feeling lets go of you and all becomes transmuted into something, an energy field that is good.

And so forgiveness, again, cannot really be practiced in the same way that letting go can't really be practiced. It just happens. And then that's how it is.

[Speaker 3] (42:11 - 42:13)

Yeah, thank you. Thank you so much. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (42:14 - 42:19)

And so let's just take a little silence, stillness.

Eckhart Tolle Presence And Letting Go of Control [f204dce2-610e-4c91-93cd-0998edf8f6f2]

Presence and letting go of control. In this episode, Eckhart reflects on the power of presence and the accompanying state of stillness. He says it's in those moments when we're not thinking that we experience pure awareness.

Eckhart then answers questions about what presence is not. He says it's not about monitoring our inner state or exercising control over our thoughts or feelings. He believes we don't have to worry if we're living as an awakened person should.

He urges listeners to learn to live in the now and experience life fully.

Hello, everybody. You're all advanced practitioners of presence. So you're not afraid of stillness.

Don't find it frightening or disturbing, but very comfortable and deeply peaceful. And that's our starting point is to become aware of an underlying stillness. The stillness is deeper than the conventional stillness, which is either the absence of sound or the absence of movement.

It's very still, there's no sound or sit still, don't move. But this stillness is deeper, does not depend on whether there's any external sound or not. It doesn't depend either on whether you're actually sitting still or moving.

It's something deeper. It's a dimension of consciousness in you, which cannot be defined conceptually or understood conceptually, but you can know it immediately within yourself. And you know it when you're not thinking, but fully aware.

The world interprets not thinking as something negative. Hence the word thoughtless. Thoughtless in English is not a positive term in the conventional sense, but in the way which you're using it here, thoughtless is a positive thing.

Now, thoughtless is a negative term as used conventionally, because it implies that you're very unconscious, that you're not even thinking, you're kind of falling below thought. You do things impulsively with no thought, controlled by all kinds of inner unconscious forces, emotions, and so on. But here to be free of thought is to rise above thought.

And the world doesn't know much about that yet. The possibility that you can be very alert, very present, but not thinking. There's a space of pure awareness.

Doesn't matter how long it lasts just now. The moment when you're not thinking, but you're not falling below thought, you're rising above thought. You're aware of an underlying stillness.

And in that, you don't know anything, and you don't need to know anything in conceptual terms. And this is a state out of which all knowing actually arises. All creative realizations, all creative activities, anything new comes into this world through having access to the non-conceptual stillness within.

And then things come to you, the great insights come, a fresh way of looking at the world, because you're not labeling everything compulsively. Even the room you're sitting in now, you can look around the room as if you hadn't been there before, without any past. If you're not attaching any labels to anything, you can look around in like a newborn child.

But the newborn child hasn't arrived at thinking yet. It's pre-thought, prior to thought. We are post-thought.

It's a different, it's a similar state, but much deeper. So it's becoming aware of that stillness. And that stillness is the essence of who you are.

And to know the essence of who you are, you don't need to remember who you are. It's memory. So to know yourself beyond memory and beyond anticipation of what you're going to be, that's an incredible liberation.

It's a liberation from the burden of being a person. Everybody carries that burden of themselves, their selves, the burden of themselves. There's a heaviness to it.

And every self is a problematic entity. How wonderful to be able to look at somebody without the interference of thinking. Thinking comes back as soon as you need it.

It's fine. In fact, it becomes more powerful when you're able to think without losing your connectedness with a deeper dimension. So you're looking at me now.

Is that a person? Right now, except when the words arise, I'm not thinking. So in between the words, there is a space of stillness, which is just pure awareness.

And as you connect with me through the technology, but ultimately it all happens in consciousness, you may also be able to be in that state of not thinking, but just aware. So when you're looking at me and I'm not thinking, you're not looking at a person. You're sensing something that is deeper than the person.

And how are you able to sense that? Because it is within you too. It is one with what you are perceiving there.

So when I look at you, you look at me, I reflect back to you who you are in your essence.

Not to anybody, you cannot free themselves even for an instant, a few seconds from the stream of thinking. What I'm talking about is complete nonsense because they have no way of recognizing the truth of it.

It's impossible. So if you're heavily, if you're in this bubble of thought, trapped in this bubble of thought, what I'm talking about now, anybody who is completely trapped in their bubble of thought, they will believe that I'm talking complete nonsense. But if you realize it's not nonsense, if you can realize the truth of it, if only obscurely, but you know, you can sense it, perhaps just briefly, then that's it.

Then you understand, but in a deeper sense than conceptual understanding. And that was the secret of the great philosopher Socrates, was very prolific, enormously creative, very beginning of Western thought. He didn't write anything.

He just talked, but other people wrote it down. And he said, they call me wise. He said, they call me very wise.

They call me the wisest of all people. Why do they call me the wisest of all people? Because I'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing.

Now, not many people later on have understood what he's actually referring to. They thought he was just pretending not to know. No, he was referring to the state of pure awareness out of which all this philosophy came.

The state of not knowing, not conceptual knowing. And this is it. This is what Zen Buddhism is all about.

It's that state. This is ultimately what Tibetan Buddhism is all about. Tibetan Buddhism has a lot of cultural stuff around it.

But at the heart of Tibetan Buddhism is so Zen, which is the practice of pure awareness. If you find it difficult to enter that state, just by choosing to, you can use a little bit of help by being aware of your breathing, for example. And then being aware of the awareness that is aware of your breathing.

You're breathing in, you're breathing out. You're breathing in, breathing out. But you're also aware of that awareness of your breath.

Or you can feel the inner body, the aliveness that pervades your entire body. It might start with your hands and your feet. The body is alive.

So you can sense that aliveness. And then you can sense the awareness that is aware of that aliveness. And the aliveness and the awareness are one.

Everything that you are aware of in that state of awareness is you're one with. It's the end of separation. If you only know conceptual reality, we are separate from everything and everybody.

And that's the realization of oneness. You hear that word awareness a lot in the culture. There's a lot of talk about becoming aware of, raising awareness of.

That's all fine. You have to raise awareness of all kinds of issues that otherwise people are not aware of. And that's fine.

But it's always awareness of something. That has its place too. But here, this is something deeper.

We're not raising awareness about something. We are raising awareness about awareness itself. And that's a shift in consciousness that happens inside you.

In that instant, there's a shift. Let's see if there are any questions that have survived our meditative beginning.

[Speaker 3] (11:59 - 13:12)

Hello, Eckhart. Your teachings have really helped me. My initial question is the following.

So sometimes when I'm having like casual conversations with friends, I feel that practicing presence while having these conversations is quite restrictive because I feel that most conversations are either about something that happened in the past or about something that is about to happen. And I'm wondering what do present and awakened people really talk about? Because most things are either about something that's going to happen or something that has happened.

And sometimes when I'm having a conversation with a friend that is not coming out of presence, I feel that I shouldn't have it. And when I'm getting excited about a topic, I feel that I'm restricting myself by, I don't know, there's a voice in my head and I'm thinking, oh, you shouldn't be enthusiastic about this. It doesn't come out of presence.

Yeah. I don't know if that makes sense.

[Speaker 1] (13:13 - 26:28)

Yes. Well, that's very interesting. I'm still for a moment to see what the answer is.

You don't need to restrict yourself in any way in your ordinary life. Just allow yourself to feel, if you feel enthusiastic, as you mentioned about something, maybe something that's happening here now or something that's going to happen at some point in the future, you're looking forward to something. And then you think perhaps, oh, I shouldn't be looking forward too much because then I'm not present.

Or if you feel enthusiastic about something that's happening around you, I said, oh, I shouldn't be because I'm getting too attached to things, perhaps that kind of thought arises in you. And then you would be exercising some kind of, attempting to exercise some kind of control over your inner state. So there's a little controlling entity.

The controlling entity is not presence. Controlling entity is something in your mind that to a limited extent has understood a bit about presence. And then it's attempting to control the way in which you experience life, according to its limited knowledge of what presence is, but it's not presence itself.

So it's your mind still interfering and saying, you shouldn't be experiencing this, you're not present enough. And that itself isn't presence either. It's just a thought that arises.

So the presence is a simple witnessing faculty. You observe that when you're very enthusiastic about something, in addition to being enthusiastic about something, it's perfectly fine to know that you are enthusiastic about it without denying it in any way. But then the dimension of depth to whatever you're experiencing, in whatever way you're experiencing, whatever you're experiencing, by being aware that this is what you're experiencing without censorship, without believing that this is not how an awakened person would act or anything like that, that is not helpful at all.

You might be very surprised how an awakened person, an awakened person you probably wouldn't even, not normally, wouldn't even recognize because he or she would seem so ordinary in the way in which they, even having an ordinary conversation with people, being able to be completely ordinary is part of being present. So you don't have this sense of you become a very special person when you're present. You are a more ordinary person, a more simple person in some ways when you are present, because you do no longer live through a conceptual sense of self.

The censorship that you have in your mind still sometimes going on is part of a sense of self. It's part of a conceptual sense of self. So that is not helpful.

So allow yourself to experience whatever it is that you're experiencing. So allow yourself to experience whatever it is you're experiencing. If possible, be aware of what it is you're experiencing.

So if you're being very much intensely anticipating a future event, for example, then be aware of that intensity in you that says, oh, excitement suddenly arises about something that's going to happen. And so instead of telling yourself or believing, oh, I shouldn't, I must hold back because I'm losing presence. No, be excited.

But if possible, know that you are excited. Be aware of your inner state at any given time, if that is possible. And it is possible, not continuously, you will probably not be able to sustain that all the time, but as much as possible, know what it is that's going on inside you.

So attachment to the ordinary things of everyday life, again, it's not helpful or even possible. It's not advisable either to attempt to get rid of attachments. If you think, oh, I shouldn't want that because I get attached, maybe you see something nice in a shop or something, and you say, oh, no, if I buy that, then I'm going to get attached, it will be part of my ego.

And then you hold yourself back. But you probably think about it more for the next few hours or days about when maybe you should buy it. So you're creating, often you create more of an inner problem when you hold yourself back from something rather than doing it.

So the attachment is something that gradually diminishes the attachment to things, the attachment to conditions, the attachment to whatever it may be, some future moment, the attachment to those things, as more presence arises in you, the attachment gradually diminishes. And so instead of attempting to get rid of the attachment to things, be as present as you can, in any given moment. And then you'll find that gradually, you're less attached to things.

Gradually, yes, you're still able to enjoy things that you do around you, and so on. That's true. But you will find that gradually, the excitement, a kind of nervous excitement about things, that tends to gradually go away, but you don't make it go away.

That doesn't work. So you don't impose some kind of control. I mustn't get excited about this.

No, if you're excited, be excited and know that you're excited. And the more the knowing, as the knowing manifests more and more through you, the things that you're excited about, become fewer. So the things of this world, you're still able to enjoy them.

But it's no longer, they don't give you that high anymore. I've got it now. Because you cannot experience in high without some future point, experiencing a corresponding low.

So when you feel very high about something, yeah, I got it. I did. Oh, I'm so excited.

I'm so excited about this. Or whatever, some future, we're going on vacation, we're flying to Hawaii. Or having something, somebody has just given you something, or you just bought something, and you feel, oh, wow, elated.

And then that cannot exist without a corresponding low that comes soon after, or a little bit after, sometimes very soon after. Suddenly, the very thing that made you excited, suddenly, you're suddenly very disappointed. It lets you down.

That's the expression. People do that too, you might have noticed. You get excited about something you just met, fall in love.

Falling in love is that attachment. It's not love, falling in love. It's that attachment, you get excited.

And then a point will come when he or she, or whatever, lets you down. You really let me down. That's a wonderful expression.

You were up there, and then he or she lets you down. So it's not only people that do that to you, it's also situations and conditions that you encounter that bring you to a high. And then the situation that you encounter lets you down, and you have a low.

And as you experience that in your life, the more you experience that, it's through awareness that you can experience that there are people who reach old age without arriving at any kind of awareness. They are still trapped in the cycle of highs and lows, of the excitement and then the disappointment. Excitement, disappointment.

Happiness, unhappiness. It goes up, down. Some people even in old age don't transcend it.

So the more you experience this, consciously, the more you realize then that the things of this, whatever the world can give you in whatever form, whatever you can experience in this world, is fine. But as you become more present, you're no longer so extremely excited about it anymore. A good thing that comes, that you don't, ah.

You say, oh, it's very nice. It's lovely. That's fine.

And then at some point, the good thing is no longer a good thing, or it leaves you and say, oh, well, that is, that's how the world goes. Whatever arise, as the Buddhists say, whatever arises, passes away. Gain and loss.

Gain and loss. The continuous cycle. And then in an organic way, things don't excite you that much anymore, which does not mean that you cannot enjoy them.

You can still enjoy, be fully awakened, and enjoy the things of this world. If something comes into, you can enjoy the experience of something without the attachment to it. The attachment is you derive your sense of self from it.

It becomes incorporated into your sense of self. That goes away because your sense of self arises from a deeper place. So, that's the, that's the shift.

It's not something that you need to do. It happens organically as presence arises more fully through you. So, just be there as the observer, the observing presence, whatever you experience.

Don't attempt to limit yourself by thinking that this isn't how an awake person would act or anything like that. It's not necessary to do that. The main thing, then, to summarize, don't attempt to exercise some kind of control on the way in which you act in this world.

Control that is to do with how you think a present person would act. So, allow yourself to have the experience that you have. And if you're attached to something, just know that you're attached.

If you know that you're attached to something, there's already some freedom. The freedom is in the knowing. If you didn't know, not everybody who is attached knows that they are attached.

They are really attached. There isn't the additional dimension of consciousness that is the witnessing presence that can witness their attachment. That's a huge difference.

If there is a witnessing presence, then you're no longer 100% attached. You're already, you have one foot out already. And then the more you experience the disappointments in this world, depends how many years people need, how many years of life they need to experience that whatever gives them a high will also give them a low.

So, the more you experience that, the more open you will be to going beyond that limited way of experiencing the world, of being in this world. So, I hope that helps, is helpful. So, enjoy whatever comes to you without losing yourself in it.

So, just be present with it. Don't censor yourself.

[Speaker 3] (26:30 - 26:31)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (26:31 - 26:33)

Thank you. Yeah.

[Speaker 2] (26:35 - 27:59)

Hi, Iker. Yeah. So, my question revolves around fixing the person.

So, for quite some time now, I've just kind of been observing my mind and kind of playing out the same patterns day after day after day. And I just sit there and I just continue to observe them. And a lot of them revolved around fixing the person, conditioning certain behavior patterns.

And, I mean, they're not really that quite detrimental. They don't wreak havoc in my life. They're just kind of these little trivial mundane things.

But they're given a lot of importance or my mind says that they're important, especially to awakening and to try to get rid of them. But I find that any effort to change the person, to take responsibility for my life, brings me more and more back into personhood. So, it's something that I can't, it's challenging to escape because I do have a family.

I have my own business. So, there's lots of things that are going on. But at the same time, the self-will, the personal will is just kind of dropping away.

And so, there's just a lot of confusion about what to do.

There was a, I don't know if he's still popular, a psychologist, psychotherapist. He wrote quite a few books. Carl Rogers is the name.

And he created his own school of psychotherapy. It's very simple, profound and simple. There's a lot of spirituality hidden in it without explicitly talking about it.

But one could summarize his approach to personal transformation and change, which is what your question is about. One could summarize his approach saying he believed that, and he learned it through his own many years of practice with practicing psychotherapy with people. As long as you want to change something or change yourself or the psychotherapist wants to change the patient or the client, whatever they call him, it doesn't work.

Change happens when you totally accept whatever it is that arises within yourself. In the case of the therapist and the client of the therapist, the therapist in the state of unconditional acceptance, he just listens. But what he doesn't say, but what is implied is you're totally present when you're with the therapist is with a person.

Non-judgmental, totally non-judgmental, attaching no labels, unconditional acceptance or whatever. The most powerful agent for change then, and this is also implied in every form of spirituality, the most powerful way is not wanting to change yourself or wanting to rearrange who you are internally and so on, but an acceptance of whatever it is that you're experiencing, the way in which you're experiencing this moment. Let's say, for example, there may be certain conditioned patterns in you that you would rather be without, I assume from your question.

There are certain things that maybe you can even give an example, the way in which you interact with people or in certain situations. There may be certain, or when you're alone, certain things that arise in your mind that you would rather be without that must be part of your question because there are some, as you said, they're not gigantic things that make your life totally miserable. There is a succession of smaller things as far as I can tell from your question.

Is that right?

Yeah. I mean, just kind of showing up to life, like just taking responsibility for your life, not just taking a spiritual pursuit and kind of leaving everything to the side, but to kind of, as you kind of say, taking care of the human aspect as well as the being aspect. And so, I don't, I'm not actually, I'm not bothered by them.

I can see that these are just mind patterns, energy forms. I mean, even like when I was very quickly, like when I was young, for 13 years, I felt like I was in a cloud of anxiety where I couldn't do anything. I couldn't leave the house.

I couldn't go to parties. I couldn't interact. I couldn't do anything.

And I recognized in that moment, I had no free will of my own. I couldn't do anything. And I feel like that now to a lesser degree, but I'm just kind of observing everything.

And I feel like it's, I guess for me, it's a little bit, it's a little bit, it's a little bit scary and disconcerting because I do have responsibilities, but I also can recognize that I'm not really trying to change anything per se. You know, I'd read Nisargadatta and he would talk about how, you know, our responsibility is only our attitude. That's the one thing that we can control.

And so, you know, that's what I've been kind of bringing my attention to is how I'm approaching these things, but even how I'm interacting with others. So how I'm interacting with, say, you know, someone in my life that's causing friction, I'll often just go, well, there's nothing that they can do about it. Like they're not, they're not necessarily, they're not necessarily in control.

You know, they're not fully aware of what they're doing. But at times, if I continue that process, it can become very robotic. And, you know, like even just practicing like, you know, self-inquiry, I find like, can just be very kind of very stuck in the mind.

You know, it's very easy to ask, who am I? And so I guess part of it is just kind of getting out of that, that stuckness of feeling like something should be changed, something needs to happen. And because it's just, it's just been going on for so long.

And, you know, I've listened to your teacher, like, I'll just pour over your teachings. And, you know, another person that I listened to is Anthony DeMello. And he talks about, you know, stop fixing yourself, right?

Stop giving any effort to fixing the person. But, but at the same time, there's things in my life that need to get done that aren't getting done.

So it's like, it's just, it is what it is. Well, on the level of the person, you can never achieve perfection. The level of the person is always unsatisfying.

So you, if you're looking for satisfaction on the level of your personal sense of self, all the things that make up the person, all the conditioning, yes, one can improve it to some extent, but there's there remains always a strong element of dissatisfaction or unsatisfactoriness with any, any person is an unsatisfactory entity. So on that level, there's no, there's no solution. So, and every person has its limitations on the personal, every, even if you meet the Buddha, you will find on the level of the person, there will be certain limitations.

He doesn't create unnecessary suffering for himself or others. Yes, absolutely true. But there will be certain limitations.

I have limitations on the level of the person. There are things that I'm not good at dealing with, to do with paperwork and things like that, all kinds of things that I have, the person that I'm has limitations. So the, the answer is to be more deeply rooted in the presence so that you're not looking for some kind of answer on the level of the person, derive your sense of who you are from presence rather than the conditioned entity in your mind.

And then gradually the, the increasing presence to some extent affects the conditioned entity. Not, it doesn't make it perfect, but it tends to remove major dysfunctions that is there, that are maybe there on the level of the person. So as presence begins to shine through, you know, my terminology that I use is the being and the human.

As you're more aware of the being and derive your sense of who you are predominantly from the being in the, not from the mind created entity, the person, then gradually the being begins to also shine through. It's a bit like a lampshade. Let's say the person is a lampshade and the being is a light bulb.

It's an, it's an, it's just an analogy. Let's say the being that you are is the light, the light bulb, the, the shade of the lamp, the lampshade is the person that, and some lampshades are very, they hardly let any light through. And this is just, of course, it's a very limited analogy, all analogies are, but here gradually the light gradually diminishes the density of the, of the lampshade, but the lampshade will continue to have certain patterns in it.

You can't remove the patterns completely, that's fine. So the answer is not to be found on the level of whatever you do and so on, but be more deeply established in presence in everyday life, not as a separate, not just as a separate practice that you do when you're alone or whatever, but as you go about your business, be, be the, be the, have the, have that sense of the background awareness while you deal with things, talk to people, or you're on the phone, or you're on whatever it is you do, have that sense of the background awareness, and then you do everything in the foreground. And that's, and they're not separate, it's like the surface reality and the deeper reality.

And so they, they merge. That's the practice. So the practice is not trying to fix yourself in any way.

The practice is to be, to bring presence into as much as you can into every moment. And you, many times you may miss it, that's fine too, and then you become present again. That's the, that's the practice.

Don't expect perfection for, on the human level. Big dysfunctions are removed by presence, as presence. Smaller things remain often.

Did you mention Misaka Data? You're reading?

[Speaker 4] (38:44 - 38:45)

Well, yeah.

[Speaker 1] (38:45 - 41:23)

Him, for example, I mean, he continued to smoke very harmful, strong cigarettes, even after awakening. Yeah. So there was no, there was no perfection, many other things probably, on the level of the person, yet the major dysfunctions that make life miserable for yourself and others, they go away.

He didn't seem to be concerned about how long he was going to live, so he didn't, he just smoked. It was a habit that stuck with him. It's hard for me to understand how addiction like that could continue, but it is possible.

There have been cases of, even one or two cases of people who seem quite awake, teachers, who were still, actually even drank like a lot, alcohol. I don't see, I mean, I enjoy a glass of wine or two with dinner, but I don't, I can't get drunk. But who knows?

It is not for me to judge anybody else. The world moves in mysterious ways. And all I know is that major dysfunctions that create suffering in this world for yourself and for others, they dissolve in presence.

Certain other imperfections remain, they're part of the human, they can't get rid of that. If you try to become perfect on the human level, that's horrible, impossible. Also, you're subject to the polarities, good and bad, and so on, light and dark on the human level.

So don't aim for perfection. But through acceptance of whatever patterns still operate in you, conditioned patterns, through acceptance, a lot of change happens, complete acceptance. So the question of wanting to change yourself doesn't arise anymore when there's complete acceptance.

So you completely accept certain things that you observe in yourself. And then quite often change happens through that complete acceptance. Perhaps that's the next step in your practice, that's completed, then the question arises even anymore.

The question disappears from your mind, how to fix yourself, because you have seen that it doesn't work. So you give up the idea of fixing, wanting to fix yourself. And you don't even question yourself, well, am I going to be stuck with this for the rest of my life?

Or how much longer? That goes away too. So good luck with your practice.

Thank you, Eckhart. Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Presence Is the Foundation for Everything [c5af1fc9-ae24-4589-9d67-eb8d2c2e6c3a]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:50)

Presence is the foundation for everything. In this podcast, Eckhart explains why presence is the bedrock for our existence. He says without it, nothing would be possible.

He says most people define themselves through self-created labels based on our past or on an imagined future. He says we must ask, who am I right now? Eckhart believes we won't know the answer fully because it remains a mystery.

He says hiding deep inside each of us is a sense of beingness that we cannot define. Eckhart believes we derive our true self from presence and thus life is synonymous with the now.

Good morning to everyone. I haven't prepared anything for this session. In fact, I have no idea what I'm going to talk about.

Now, in theory, that could be very disconcerting, not knowing. And yes, not knowing is disconcerting if you think that you should know. If you accept not knowing, then it's actually quite lovely.

That can could be called trust or faith or resting in being. There's even a little book written in medieval times in England by an anonymous author, which I highly recommend. And the title of the book is The Cloud of Unknowing.

And it talks, of course, in theistic terms. It's about knowing God. It tells you that you cannot know God through concepts.

So you have to remove concepts from your mind and have that space of clear awareness. Although that word is not used in the book. To know, the modality of knowing through concepts is, of course, necessary.

Words, concepts. For many people, that's all there is. They relate to the world almost exclusively through concepts.

But then there's another possibility, and that is not conceptual knowing, but non-conceptual, unitive consciousness. And a term that I sometimes use is, on the one hand, you have object consciousness, where you have a thought as a form, like an object. It's not a physical one, but it's a form that consciousness takes.

That's object consciousness. And most people are completely trapped in. They don't use object consciousness.

Object consciousness uses them. They are immersed in, swallowed up by object consciousness, not realizing that that is only one dimension of human existence. And if you only live in that dimension, which is necessary for being here, but if that's the only dimension that you know, then your life is one dimensional.

And not only that, it also becomes frustrating. There is something fundamentally wrong with life or with your life if all you know is object consciousness. So you only know yourself through object consciousness, which is the movement of thought.

And not only do you only know yourself through that, which is the story you tell yourself, which you call my life. And in many cases, not a happy story. It didn't unfold as it should have.

It's not only, you only, you know yourself, so you know a very limited aspect of yourself, but also the world around you. You relate to the world around you through object consciousness. Everything is labeled and defined, and you have a personal relationship with things.

The stronger your ego is, ego meaning, the stronger your ego is, that means the more you are completely identified with object consciousness. And if you are completely identified, in other words, if you have a huge ego, massive ego, which doesn't necessarily mean you have a gigantic, overpowering personality, well, some egos do. You have some egos you meet and you go, they're intimidating.

But the reverse ego can be equally strong of somebody who is a victim of everything and everybody, and complains about the world, how unfair it all is, and sees everything that's wrong out there, and what they've all done to me, or to the group that I identify with. That's, that gives a very strong ego too. But no matter what it is, it always implies specialness.

The one who has a, what we usually identify with as ego is the big ego. Let's say I'm the biggest, or we are the biggest. It could be a personal ego says I am, or doesn't, might not say it, but I am a genius.

Or it's an ego that is collectively identified, in which case the personal does not come up very strongly. Everything is defined through our group, our identity group. And our identity group can only survive, this conceptual reality can only survive if there are others who are antagonistic.

So you have to make others into enemies, otherwise our identity as a collective will not survive and thrive. But the more I can be, the more the collective can be antagonistic towards other, that they define as others, the other, the stronger it feels its own identity, and that's the ego gets strengthened through that. So you see it, and the form it takes varies from person to person on a personal level.

And on a collective level, the form the collective ego takes varies from age to age. So the form the collective ego took in the, let's say the first half of the 20th century, leading to world wars and leading to genocide within countries and all that, leading to very destructive ideologies. In the same way that on a physical level, a human being can become infected with a virus, in the same way a thought can infect a person or a collective, a group of people, could be millions.

A certain thought form can proliferate, attract other similar thought forms to itself, and take possession of your entire mind. That can happen on a personal level. First of all, in a very simple way, when a thought just doesn't want to go away, it's kind of stuck in your mind, and you can't, you have to think about it, you can't stop.

That's a relatively harmless viral infection by thought, but it can be much stronger than that, when a certain thought form becomes so prevalent in your mind that all other thought forms become inferior to it and are influenced by it. So this is, then the person looks at everything through one particular theory, for example, well, it could be many things. I don't want to put any thought form into your head now.

When you take it to an extreme, it becomes obvious that it is insane. An extreme, for example, in the case of somebody suffers from paranoid schizophrenia, has been taken over by viral thought, which acts the same way as a virus on the physical level. It's completely taken over that person and possesses the mind of that person.

And everything this person looks at is through the veil of this heavy virus infection, so to speak, mental virus infection. It can take over a collective. Then there are certain ideas that arise in people's minds that take people over.

They can spread much more quickly these days, even through the internet and so on. These thought forms can spread very quickly and get amplified in thousands, hundreds of thousands, millions of people's lives and then take over your mind. And then you think these are your opinions.

These are your viewpoints. That's how it is. And not only that, you don't recognize them as your opinions.

It's the truth. So to you, you cannot differentiate any longer between an opinion or viewpoint that you hold through which you look at the world. You can't differentiate between that and the truth of how it actually is.

So your opinion becomes the truth and anybody else, anybody who does not share your opinion becomes the enemy and basically evil. So that's, how does this happen? It happens because what is missing is the depth dimension in your consciousness, which we could call, now we've, this is all object consciousness, complete identification with object consciousness, becomes ego, strong ego.

You are possessed by it, basically. You don't use your ego. The ego pretends to be you.

It is a thought form with accompanying emotions that says, that is the self that the Buddha talks about, that the Buddha says, one of the main teachings, the delusion, that is a delusion, that the self is a delusion. Jesus said it too. Did he?

Yeah. Now you might not know that if you only go to the church or, why would he have said, deny yourself? Just these two words.

It's exactly the same as the Buddha's teaching. Why did he say, deny yourself? What's the implication?

The implication is, it cannot be that the self is something real. It would be absurd to deny. If that's really who you are, why should you deny it?

No, the implication is that the self is an illusion. And when Jesus says, deny thyself, quite simply, what he means is recognize the unreality of that mind made conceptual sense of identity. Recognize the unreality of that.

That means deny yourself. Now, but how do you recognize the unreality of it? It's only through the arising of awareness, which is, I call it sometimes space consciousness.

It's not a science fiction term. Space consciousness isn't because it's not about outer space. It's about inner space.

So space consciousness is the other dimension, the depth dimension in you, that is really what awareness is. Now, what space consciousness cannot be understood through explanations. I could talk for many hours here and give you more definitions of space consciousness.

And you may be trying to understand space consciousness. Now, of course, here come to the first important thing. If you're trying to understand space consciousness, that's not it.

Because you're trying to apply concept consciousness to space consciousness and through concept, want to understand it through concept consciousness, you can't. So you have to take the step. Why am I then talking about it?

Because the words are not something that you should believe will enable you to understand space consciousness, but the words are simply pointers or signposts. So they are not explanations as such. You have to go where the words point.

And you'll see now where the words point. The words point towards the possibility of knowing things, perceiving things, not through the screen of thought, but through consciousness. Consciousness is the spacious awareness.

So it's finding, it begins with realizing that small gaps arise in your mind where otherwise there would have been a continuous stream one thought after another, one object after another, a totally cluttered mind, a mind that never stops talking to itself and going on and on and making your life miserable. There's a possibility of realizing that occasionally, even without you wanting to do anything, naturally, the gaps of some space consciousness arise from time to time in you. And you may not identify it as space consciousness.

It could be that those are moments that feel where you feel alive and you feel it feels good, or you become aware of beauty, or you become aware of a feeling of goodwill flowing out from you towards another human being or another life form. These are moments when suddenly you feel elevated, life feels to some extent briefly liberated from yourself. There are moments of natural self transcendence that occur in your life.

And if they didn't, nothing that I talk about would make any sense to you. Because it's only through those moments that naturally occur, and that may actually occur more as you sit here right now, it's only through that space consciousness in you that it can recognize what I'm actually talking about. If you dragged somebody here, a friend or family member, and that person is sitting next to you, now we don't know whether that person has that bit of openness of space through which he or she could understand, not understand conceptually, but get a sense of what it is, realize what it is that I'm talking about.

Or it could be that this friend that didn't really want to come here, but somehow is stuck here now, might become increasingly irritated and frustrated and longing to get away from here. So if you're not longing to get away from here, that means, in fact, if you enjoy being here for some weird reason, then that means there's something in you that recognizes what these words are pointing to is real and very important. And so they're pointing to a reality in you.

The strange thing is our mainstream kind of world, the mainstream world that you meet through the media and everything else, is largely completely unaware of that. So everything that you are told when you relate to the things of this world through the media and so on, what it tells you is absolutely important, is not absolutely important. What it tells you is absolutely important, maybe relatively important, but not absolutely important.

But if you miss what is absolutely important, then you miss the very reason for being here, because the reason for being here is for you to realize that that's the fulfillment of a human life. So space consciousness arises naturally, even if you haven't practiced meditation or anything. Meditation is a more conscious way of realizing space consciousness, but doesn't...

Sometimes it works for people. Sometimes it works in the limited setting of their meditation practice, but not in the rest of their lives. And other people don't meditate, and yet it still arises in them.

So it arises naturally. So if you can catch it when it arises naturally in your life, in a daily life, then it deepens, and sometimes the intervals of space consciousness become longer. Now, what am I talking about?

I'm talking about freedom from thought. For example, when you look at something, do you immediately need to call it something? You're looking at a tree.

Maybe you know what the name of the tree is, but does the name of that tree immediately arise in your mind so that there's no gap? You see it, and then you call it something. But even there, if you're very alert, if you're looking at a tree, and then you have something to say about it, or you think about it, even there, you may notice in the first two seconds, let's say, of looking at the tree, there's no thought yet.

Because you have to perceive it first. The perception has to be taken in. And so you need to be aware in that moment where the perception happens.

There's an awareness, but there's a brief moment when the thought hasn't come up yet. You haven't labeled it yet. And if you're lucky enough not to know the name of the tree, then that's a little easier.

However, if you don't know the name of the tree, you could still, you may still find that immediately your mind comes in and says, I wonder what that, what kind of a tree that is. And then you say, hmm, there's an app for that. You can direct your phone at a tree, take a photo, and then send it in, and then it tells you what it probably is.

And that's a miraculous thing. It's wonderful, but it's not for our practice, not useful. For our practice, an app would be useful that removes the concept from your mind.

So notice when you, when you any, when you enter a room or you leave a room, you open the door, you step outside. There's your room, you leave a room, the first step outside, and the first step you take everything in that you see out there. In those first moments, you're not thinking for the first two or three seconds, because you're just taking it in.

And then usually once you've taken it in, you see there's nothing extraordinary, because the mind looks for something to hang, to kind of latch on to this. Oh, look at that thing there. But there's nothing, and then you can, then you go into your usual thought processes.

But if you notice that when you first encounter something, there's always a moment of spacious awareness while the perception happens. Then the perception gets dulled, actually, by conceptualization. So first you have a clear perception, and then immediately the veil of conceptualization arises.

That then becomes the veil or the screen through which you still perceive, but not as vibrantly and as clearly as before. And not, but if you're very heavily identified with concepts, the initial perception almost completely disappears, and it's almost completely replaced by a mental concept. This could happen also when you meet a human being.

When you meet a human being, let's say it's a human being that you haven't met before. So there's that human being, and you relate, and immediately, at first you notice there's a moment of no conceptualization. But if you are, especially if you have a big ego, and big egos are very judgmental and critical, and they need to immediately find some kind of personal position towards that other person, some kind of interpretation.

And if it can be negative, that's even better, because then the ego can feel stronger in its identity. If you can complain about something in the other person or something, find fault in the other person. The ego loves that, because if you find fault in the other person, by implication, you are superior to the other person.

So the ego loves that, and that is how, after the initial perception of a few seconds, conceptualization arises. So if you have a strong ego, become completely immersed in the concepts you immediately formulate for that person, so immediately that human being recedes, almost disappears, and is replaced with a mental concept. And then you think you have a relationship with that person.

And sometimes people do it to each other. Even after they get to know each other, they still, they relate almost exclusively through a conceptual sense of self. And when you relate to another almost exclusively through object consciousness, without spacious awareness, then very quickly you also find conflict arises, very quickly and easily.

And the ego actually wants that. The ego might say, I want a peaceful relationship, but everything it says and does is against peace. Even nations do it.

They say, we want peace, and they prepare for war. We are the most peaceful of nations. So the one thing is then, whenever you enter, whenever you first look at something or listen to something, it could be a sound in nature, it could be even the rustling of leaves on the tree, and there's a slight breeze, and you listen to it, or any sound, you listen to it, in the moment of alert listening, you're not thinking.

And now you might not realize that, but if you realize that, it actually deepens, because then you become more fully conscious of that moment of spacious awareness. And not only it deepens, you may also find it becomes longer. And you're able to listen for longer periods of time without the interference of conceptualization, which is thinking.

In other words, while you're listening, you're still and alert. And from the point of view of the conceptual mind, in that moment of listening without concept, you don't know anything anymore. And the conceptual mind and the sense of self that arises from identification with the conceptual mind becomes very uneasy with that.

It's very, it's, it gets a little bit shaky and says, you should know what this is, you have to, you have to, it needs to take a position vis-a-vis everything, or at least label everything in order to say, oh, now I know what it is. So when you have labeled something, the mind says, I know what it is. That's, of course, an illusion.

Because just by attaching a thought, or a word, I mean, a thought is a, it's a, it's a word that hasn't been verbalized yet. By saying, oak tree, the illusion is, so now you know what it is. You know nothing because you just attached a label to it.

Doesn't mean you know what that is. And you can attach further labels to it by examining the oak tree in more detail. And you can write a PhD about an oak, oak trees.

And I'm sure people have written PhDs about oak trees. And even these days, they become more and more specialized, probably even about the little part of an oak tree, the roots of the oak tree, the leaves of the oak tree, you can write a PhD about that. There's a lot of stuff in there.

And again, yes, you know a lot. The, do you, do you know it? It's confusing, knowing with knowing about.

Knowing directly, which is through spacious consciousness, and knowing about it, which is, we need both to live in this world. I emphasize here, space consciousness, because you have it, everybody has more than enough of the other, the conceptual. So to live in this world, you need, you need both.

You need the balance between the mind, the conceptual, conceptualized, the ability to conceptualize and to think, which is important. But you also need the ability to not think. If you only cultivate the ability to think, thinking takes you over, you habitually overthink when that happens.

You engage in totally excessive thought movements, becomes involuntary. You are not using thought whatsoever. Thought has taken possession of you, and thought pretends to be you.

That's the unenlightened or the unawakened condition, which we call unconscious in spiritual terms. It's not the conventional meaning of unconscious. The conventional meaning of unconscious means you've dropped.

So when I say, these people are unconscious, it doesn't mean they're, it means they are completely identified with the conceptualizing mind. They're completely identified with thought, that is unconsciousness, spiritually speaking, complete absence of awareness or space consciousness. And so you may know a lot about a lot of things.

You may have vast knowledge of many, many things, including perhaps psychological knowledge, because there's a lot to know about how humans operate. And again, there's nothing wrong with all that knowledge. But it's always knowledge about something.

It's not a direct knowing. Now, then that's interesting. It's an interesting fact.

Sometimes a certain amount of wisdom is sometimes embodied in language. Languages arise, of course, spontaneously over centuries and millennia. And some languages, like Spanish and French, have two different words for to know.

And that points a little bit in that direction. So my French is very limited. So you have to know, connaître, and to know, savoir.

Or in Spanish, you can say, you have one, one says, saber y conocer. Say is I know, y conozco is also I know. But what's the difference?

You can say in Spanish, I know who you are. Say qui eres, I know who you are. And I know you, te conozco.

Conocer would be direct knowing. And the other one is conceptual, I know who you are. But it doesn't mean that I know you.

So one is more conceptual, the other is direct knowing. There's an ancient term in early Christianity, gnosis, I think it's spelled G-N-O-S-I-S. And I believe the G is not pronounced.

The gnosis, that's where the word knowledge comes from. And that refers to these mystics in very early medieval times, and probably even early Christian times, and probably even pre-Christian. The Gnostics, those who practice gnosis, were interested in this direct knowing, direct non-conceptual knowing.

As a human, you need concepts too. So you cannot completely dismiss the world of concepts, that's part of civilization too. But civilization that gets trapped in concepts and loses its connectedness to that which is deeper, can only become barren and lifeless and no longer creative.

Because all creativity arises from space consciousness, from that, the alert inner stillness. And the artist has to go there and produce it from there, and then it takes form. So that's the emphasis here is for us on space consciousness, because we already have more than enough of the other.

Everybody here is highly knowledgeable, obviously, whether or not you have a PhD or high school graduation, regardless, you are highly knowledgeable. And everybody here knows more than Jesus or Buddha ever did in terms of concepts about stuff, because they were not concerned with that. So in terms of knowing about the world, I mean, Jesus didn't, or Buddha didn't know about the Andromeda galaxy or how far it is, or the molecular structure of water or whatever, or the theory of relativity.

But they were not, this has its place, but they were not concerned with that. Because even then, even though we have far vaster knowledge than they had then, even then people's minds were already cluttered with so-called knowledge. And a lot of that knowledge was actually not true, because the way they interpreted the world was somewhat very limited.

And we think the way the concepts we have now are absolutely true, and we may find in a few hundred years, that many of the concepts through which we interpret the world in terms of science and technology, science and so on, are actually also erroneous. They may be as limited as the concepts people had in medieval times about the world. But we don't need to go there here, that's a secondary consideration.

The important thing is the arising and the deepening in you of space consciousness, which is inseparable from the present moment awareness. This isn't just another way of talking about it, is to talk about it in terms of present moment awareness, that is space consciousness. Now, present moment awareness, now, as you all know, the present moment is all there ever is, normally could argue with that.

And as you all know, it's written in a book somewhere too, nothing ever happened in the past, it happened in the now, because happen and now are synonymous. Something cannot happen except in the now. It can't happen, nothing can happen in the past.

When it happened, it was the now, it happened in the now. Or when it will happen, it will be the now. So there is only the present moment, the present moment and life are synonymous, life is now.

And the past and future again are already concepts that we need to function here in this dimension, past and future. But other than concepts, they have no actual reality. So what is the past?

Certain thoughts in your head. And when do you think those thoughts? Now.

So the thoughts in your head are happening now. What is future? Future is thought, it's a thought in your head.

Because if it were more than a thought in your head, you would, at some point of your life, have been able or at some point would be able to experience the future. It's an impossibility. The future as such doesn't exist.

It's other than a thought in your head. And when the so called future comes, it's again now. So there's only now.

So present moment awareness, first of all, is the awareness of what there is in the present moment. And that involves usually sense perception. When sense perception is not obscured by conceptualization, you can experience the flower, you can experience this room, and the totality of this room, you can experience it against the background of spacious awareness.

You can experience it and know it, without calling it anything in your mind. You're just aware, and there's the perception. That's beginning of the present moment.

So the beginning of present moment awareness, we become aware of what, what is there in the present moment, which could be an outer thing, or it could be an inner thing, you become aware of when you're present, you can be aware of what thoughts you have. When you're very present, you're not having any thought. When there's just presence in the background, you become aware of certain repetitive thoughts, you become aware of mental positions that you hold and defend.

You become aware in the moment of getting angry when somebody questions your, your mental position. You become aware suddenly when you become aggressive, because somebody questions your opinion, your viewpoint or your opinion, which you mistook for the truth. And then you become aware.

So you begin to disidentify from mental positions, you don't have to give up your mental positions. So you can continue to politically have whatever position you want. You can vote for whoever you want, politically, or whatever it is.

It doesn't mean if you're a Republican or a Democrat in this country, okay, I need to give up that completely. I don't believe in anything anymore, don't want any concepts. Everything is exactly the same.

That's not quite it, no. You can continue to have your position, but recognize it as a position, not completely identified with it. So if you can then have a conversation without attacking the other or having this need to defend your identity.

But if your identity, which means your sense of self, has become mixed up with your mental position, that's a bad place to be in. And that's a recipe for continuous conflict and antagonism with other people who have done the same. They've identified with their mental position, they derive their sense of self from their viewpoints and opinions.

So basically, you're lost in your mind. You're lost in ego. And it's wonderful if you can see conversation between two people who hold very different viewpoints, and yet they don't attack each other.

And when they're having it, you can have a discussion. If there's enough presence in both people, you can have a discussion that can become quite interesting. And you may even both modify to some extent your mental positions.

And you can do that because you are no longer completely identified with it. You didn't need to derive your sense of who you are from your mental concepts. And that is a fundamental shift of awakening.

So where do you derive your sense of self from, if it's not from the mental concepts in your head? You derive your sense of self from presence, consciousness itself, not the form consciousness has taken. Now, where's that?

It's here and now. And you can know it in this moment, if you're not thinking what's left of you. If you're not thinking, do you still exist?

And how do you still exist? If you're not thinking about your past, and you don't have to, let's imagine your past doesn't exist, or it's a kind of dream. It is a kind of dream, by the way, but let's think.

Let's, your past doesn't exist, it's a kind of dream. Let's pretend the future doesn't exist, it's another kind of dream. That's true too, by the way.

So there's only this moment. Now, without remembering the story of your life, if you don't revive it in your mind now, in fact, if there are no thoughts in your mind, what's left of you? Now, it's very hard to define or to even say, what is it?

Who am I without my history? Who am I without past and future? And then you can just ask the question, who am I right now?

And you won't know the answer, not conceptually. It remains a mystery, it remains an open question, who am I? But hiding in there is a sense of beingness or presence that you cannot define.

There is a sense of aliveness, of beingness or presence, which you may even feel with the entire, your entire body becomes, that feeling of presence is not just in the head. There's a feeling of just presence. What is that?

Don't know what that is, it's just presence. Without that, nothing would be possible. You wouldn't perceive anything, you wouldn't think anything.

That is the basis for everything. It's a substratum, to use a geological term. The substratum of everything is that.

Eckhart Tolle Presence, Awakening and Abundance [d1d8b961-dd69-483a-a9ec-18f53377059d]

Presence, awakening, and abundance. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions about the process of awakening and how to create more abundance in our lives. Eckhart says when we desire something, we believe that we already have it.

He says consciousness is the source from which everything flows. He also believes our state of consciousness determines how we experience life. Eckhart reminds us that while we may want or need many things, we do not need certain outcomes for our fulfillment.

He explains that on the inner plane, we already are complete and have everything we need.

Hello, Eckhart. Buenas noches. I'm so grateful for the School of Awakening and for your presence during the entire course.

So thank you for sharing the teaching with us. Thank you. So we've spoken before about asking from a sense of fullness or abundance when in need of something.

However, I don't know how to reconcile asking with accepting the present moment completely because it seems to me that asking kind of implies that something is missing from the present moment. Also, what if what I'm asking for kind of interferes with the plans of the universe or shouldn't be asked for at all? For instance, my kid was recently diagnosed with something and I would like to ask for his healing, but what if the universe needs him to experience that condition so that he awakens?

So in summary, my questions are, first, how can I reconcile asking with accepting the present moment? And second, how can you know whether what you're asking for is reasonable or in alignment with the plans of the universe?

Very good question. Very good. Thank you.

So you gave two examples. One is asking for, let's say, abundance or prosperity or something like that. And another one is asking for healing for somebody else.

So these are two examples. And I'd say I'm not sure whether I used the word asking very much. I hope not, because it's not so much asking for something when you want to manifest something, but let's stay with the, let's say, prosperity, one more prosperity in your life.

Asking for more prosperity would be to imply that you don't have it because you have to ask for it. So that's not the right approach. The right approach is not really not to ask for something, but let's start with abundance or prosperity.

You have to go deeply into the present moment where you realize what Jesus called the fullness of life. Let's use that expression, the fullness of life. In some translations of the Bible, it's translated as abundant life.

So he said, I want you to have abundant life. I want you to have the fullness of life. That's another translation for the same thing that he said.

And that's very interesting. What was he referring to? Was he referring to material abundance?

Was he referring to, I want you to be able to buy more things? Was he saying, I want you to build bigger shopping malls so that you can really have abundance? No, he was not referring to shopping malls or buying more stuff.

He was referring to a state of consciousness that is the realization of a dimension in which nothing is missing, in which there is the realization that you, in the essence of who you are, are already complete. You are totally complete and you can sense the fullness of life that is here now, that is inseparable from who you are. And that is ultimately, if you want to put a label to it, it is consciousness itself out of which everything comes.

It's the consciousness that creates everything. But before the consciousness creates things and beings, before the consciousness creates, it is primordial consciousness in its original state. One could almost say that's before the universe came into being, before the Big Bang.

What was there before the Big Bang? No scientists can go there, there's no answer. But that is the primordial state of consciousness, the state before the Big Bang, which in historical terms was billions of years ago.

But that state before the Big Bang is in you now, is in every human now, because you are a microcosm of the entire universe. And even the entire histories of the universe is contained in you. And the timeless dimension of pure consciousness that gave rise and continuously gives rise to the world is present in you as you.

And if you become very still, there's nothing left except the realization of intense stillness and consciousness, which is just you're aware that you are consciousness, you are conscious. That's the fullness of life. Whatever you achieve in this world or whatever you get is secondary, it comes out of that, it's created by that, and it will return to that.

Nothing that you create in the world of form lasts for very long. So you're no longer looking to anything in the world of form to satisfy you, because you have found the source of all satisfaction already in the depths of the here and now. And that's the realization of the fullness of life.

And from that, if you wanted to make a statement that you would like to have a more pleasant place to live, for example, let's say you live in a very unpleasant place, and you go into that, you realize the fullness of life, and you can then take a mental image, and you can merge it with the realization of the fullness of life. And that means you feel that you already have it, whatever you want to have, you no longer want to have it, you feel it's already there, because it is contained in the primordial consciousness already. And that's what Jesus meant when he said, when you pray for something, believe that you have received it.

He doesn't say believe that you will receive it. He says believe that you have received it. So it's already there in your consciousness.

And so when you do get it, you say, Oh, how nice. But you didn't need it anymore for your fulfillment, because that was, it's already there. So when you then attain something, you say, Oh, that's very nice.

Thank you. But it's no more than that. You don't get Oh, wow, I finally made it.

Yeah, I've got it. Now I have to hang on to it. And then immediately say I have to hang on to it fear comes in.

So you're lost again. Now, with reference to healing, again, you're not asking that is, I know some people do that. But that is not the deepest form of expression is sending healing to somebody.

What you again, you have to go to that place that I just described, the realization of fullness, completeness, wholeness. And then you take the image of this person. And realize that what you realize is the wholeness of yourself is also the wholeness of that person, the condition becomes irrelevant, whatever this person is, you realize, when you bring the image of this person, into the realization of wholeness within yourself, you're basically affirming beyond concept and words, that this person is already whole and complete and healed, that the level where no healing is necessary, because at that level, that person is whole. And then, if healing is appropriate, that person may experience healing, but you didn't ask for it.

You recognized the essence of this human being and you gave no attention to the condition, whatever condition, the form of this person was suffering from, you don't focus on that. And you don't say, you want to remove this condition, or you don't ask God for consciousness, please remove this condition from this person. No, you go to a deeper place, where the wholeness has never been affected by whatever the condition

So this person is whole and complete and holy, whole and holy. So again, that's the true healing. It's always, there's no longer a question of whether the universe needs or the consciousness needs this person to experience this or not.

That's all secondary. If healing is possible, it will happen in that way. And if not, it won't happen and that will be just right.

So that's the way to go for whatever the two questions. The answer is basically the same. So stop asking for stuff or anything.

It's not, you don't need to ask for anything. Thank you, Eckhart. I really appreciate it.

Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (11:07 - 11:39)

We have another question here, Eckhart. This person writes in, you've talked about how most people go through a gradual process of awakening, and that very few people have a sudden awakening. If we have a choice of whether to awaken or not, why do we not all awaken suddenly, if we have the intention to do so?

Do we really have a choice in the matter? Or is there a genetic involvement or grace perhaps involved?

Let's see. The intention to awaken, I think that's a part of the question. Intent or intention to awaken can come from a true place, or it can also come from ego.

So first you have to look at the intention or the desire to awaken can be an egoically motivated desire, in which case, of course, nothing is going to happen. So this would be the case if somebody is not satisfied anymore with whatever they have achieved, and feels this sense of something important is missing. And then he or she reads about or hears about awakening or enlightenment.

And then the same egoic self that before was looking for a nice big car or house or seeking seeking enhancement of its sense of self one way or another by identifying with this or that. It says, oh, I found something much better. It's called enlightenment or awakening.

And when I achieve that, then I'll be really, really superior to everybody else. I've been trying to be superior through many things, but I never quite get that feeling, that person would think, if not consciously, unconsciously. So it could be an unconscious desire to achieve a superior state where I'm finally going to be myself.

And finally, people are going to, or you might have an image of yourself as being a spiritual teacher. And you say, oh, well, if Eckhart can do that, I'm sure I can. I just have to work hard enough.

And then I'll be up on stage talking to thousands of people. That's what I really, then I'll be happy. So that's not the real intention.

That's an egoically motivated intention. Now, if it's real, the intention to awaken comes from a deeper place. It is often linked with the feeling that you cannot, that you're not prepared to suffer anymore.

It's more helpful to seek awakening because you want to end the suffering of your life than to seek awakening because you want to achieve enlightenment. This is why the Buddha said, the Buddha didn't say, I teach enlightenment. He said, I teach suffering at the end of suffering.

So that is a more powerful motivation, a more true motivation to seek the end of suffering, because you have seen, wherever you go, you find suffering and unhappiness. Now, then the intention to awaken is already the beginning of the awakening. So when you realize the possibility of awakening, there's a glimpse of something, there's a glimpse of what is possible when you are not identified with your mind.

It could be a simple thing like realizing that the voice in your head is not who you are. You become aware of what the voice in your head has been saying for years, repeating the same kind of things that made you unhappy, the narratives that made you unhappy, suddenly realizing that. And then you say, oh, I want to awaken out of that without knowing that that desire to awaken is already the beginning of your awakening.

And then it's a true thing. Until this happens, there's a moment where it comes as a glimpse or sudden knowing, wow, of something that's possible. You disidentify from your mind briefly, perhaps, or you have moments when you're not burdened by your habitual sense of self.

Perhaps you have brief moments of self-transcendence, either when you're overwhelmed by something in the natural world, or you're witnessing the death of somebody, or you're witnessing the birth of a baby. These are all kind of limit situations where the transcendent opens up briefly. And so you might, where it arises, we don't know.

And once you have had a glimpse or a taste of the transcendent, for whatever reason, it could be that an accident happened to you. And suddenly, you survived. But suddenly, all the things that were important in your life, you realize how that you consider important.

You realize how unimportant they all were. So yeah, you're in your hospital bed, oh my god. And so the transcendent can open up briefly through illness, accident, the experience of death and dying, even the experience of birth, or some huge problem in your life.

And then suddenly, for a moment, you're free of it. So whatever it is, this can, this happens. Before this happens, this brief opening, there isn't really anything you can do, because whatever you might read about awakening, you might read about enlightenment.

But that's not enough. If the desire comes just because you read something, it's still most likely to be egoically motivated. So the first glimpse or the first awakening comes to you.

And we don't know why it comes to you and not to somebody else. It can come through. Yes, it can come through reading of a book, when you're if you're ready for it.

But there's a reason why you're ready for it. And then a book comes into your hands and you open it. Whatever it is, a book that is, was written from a place of presence or a spiritual book, and you read it, and it begins, you begin to experience glimpses of presence or transcendence just by reading those pages.

So you don't just put the book aside and say, wow, wow. And again, you'll feel, oh, I knew that. I knew that already.

I just couldn't verbalize it. I knew it. So you recognize the truth, spiritual truth, when you see it.

These are moments of awakening. Once the beginning, you have begun to awaken, then an element of choice comes in. This element of choice, you can then cooperate with the awakening process.

And you can, some often choose in certain situations, to be present rather than to be reactive. You can realize that awakening is the most important thing in your life. Your state of consciousness is what determines how you experience your life.

It determines your actions. It determines how you react or rather respond to situations. And thereby, it determines what happens to you next in the so-called future.

So all these things you realize arise out of your presence in this moment, and that becomes the most important part of your life. So once you reach that, you can choose presence. And it doesn't mean you will always choose it, because there may be unconscious subpersonalities in you that temporarily and periodically take you over.

You may get triggered by certain people or certain situations. And you might have said, I want to, one day you say, yes, I want to, I want, I'm choosing presence. I want to be present.

And then the next day, the phone rings and, I don't know, let's say your stockbroker calls and says, I'm sorry to tell you that we invested your money in the wrong place. And it's, you only have 10% left now. Now, in that moment, your desire to be present may have disappeared because it gets overwhelmed by a reaction of the ego.

Or you get triggered by a person that you visit your parents. And you say, one day, you say, I want to continue to awaken. And then you're confronted with your mother or father, who have been telling you the same things for many decades, and they disapprove of what you do and who you are.

And you can feel yourself, you need to defend yourself and get reactive, just as before. So that often you find things, other things become temporarily more important to you than to continue to be present or to awaken. And that's fine.

That's part of the awakening process, too. In other words, you lose yourself periodically, in certain mental, emotional, reactive patterns, and so on. You lose yourself in your mind, you lose yourself in your emotional field.

That's all part of the awakening. And then you can choose to come back to presence at some point. But until you have at least experienced the beginning of transcendence, a glimpse, you can't really do anything.

It's not a choice until it's only once you've experienced the beginning of it, then you can choose or you're not going to choose all the time yet. But you can choose in many situations to be present rather than to be trapped in your mind and identified with your mind and identified with your emotional field. So there are still millions and millions of people who are not ready for presence.

And if anybody talked to them about presence, it would be completely meaningless. I often hear stories of people tell me, I gave the power of now or new earth to a relative or friend and said, you must read this, this book will change your life. And then the relative or friend, a few days or weeks later, you ask, well, what about that book?

Have you read it? And said, well, I started reading it and I read three pages, but it's total nonsense. It doesn't make sense whatsoever to me.

Why did you give me that book? So obviously, and then this story was told me several times by people who were given that book and for whom the book was completely meaningless for several years, it was on their shelf. And then things in the meantime, things happened in their lives.

And one day they picked it up like accidentally or coincidentally. And so, and suddenly it's a, wow, suddenly it meant they had, this was, it became their first opening into the transcendent image. And once this has happened, then an element of choice comes in.

But the first thing you can't choose because you don't have a choice because you're not, choice implies that there's enough awareness to at least briefly or temporarily disconnect from the conditioning of your mind. Until that awareness has arisen, presence, awareness, if only briefly, until that happens, you have no choice because you are totally trapped in the conditioned mind. You're totally identified with the conditioned mind.

There's no, it's like a very heavy layer of clouds. The sky is totally covered in a heavy layer of thick clouds. That's the mental emotional field with which you are totally identified.

There's not the tiniest opening in where you see a blue sky beyond the clouds. So for many millions of people, still there is no choice. And then something happens.

And then there's a beginning of an awakening. And after that, there is an element of choice. But even to say, let me add the last thing now, even to say that you have, now you have an element of choice is a limited way of talking about it.

Because ultimately, you are not separate from the consciousness that awakens. You are an embodiment or manifestation of the awakening consciousness. And when you feel that you have a choice, and who is choosing what really is happening is consciousness is able to manifest, to arise through you.

And you interpret it as having a choice. But ultimately, it's consciousness choosing to come through you. But it is not helpful to think I have no choice.

It's more helpful to adopt the limited perspective that says, yes, I have a choice, then it happens more easily. But ultimately, there's not a duality of who you are, and who or what presence is. So there isn't ultimately a you who chooses presence, because that would be a duality.

You are nothing without consciousness, you are consciousness. So you become you are the awakening consciousness. There isn't really a person there, they're just a temporary perspective.

So in ultimate terms, you don't choose, what happens is when you think you can choose, it means consciousness is arising through you. And, but you don't even need to go there. It's more helpful to feel that you can choose, and you're meant to feel that you can choose and in ultimate terms, there's no duality.

So there's not not you and consciousness, there isn't you and God. Consciousness, by the way, as I use the term, is, I would describe as the emanation of God, like light is the emanation of the sun. God is totally transcendent, God is not located in space or time.

God is the ultimate source of all life. But the source emanates into this dimension, consciousness, which is the light of the source, the source emanates consciousness into this dimension. And everything is consciousness.

In different frequencies, you could say, inanimate matter is you could say it's frozen consciousness. And then just like water can have different manifesting different, different levels of density and so on. So the ultimate truth is the truth of oneness.

There isn't you. And the most important thing is that there isn't you and presence, because you are presence, present is you. As I often say, as I'm sure you remember, the person that you think you are, the form identity of the person is a ripple on the surface of the ocean.

So you are that ripple as a person, you are the ripple. But the ripple ultimately has no independent autonomous existence. The ripple is a manifestation of the wholeness of the ocean.

It's a way in which the ocean takes temporary form as a ripple. It has no independent life, it has no individual, it's not autonomous, it's one with the ocean. And that's why I believe it was Alan Watts who said, the author and spiritual teacher passed away quite a few years ago.

He said, you are something that the whole universe is doing, in the same way that a wave is something that the whole ocean is doing. So you are an activity of the universe and the universe is not, he did not mean the sense of all the stuff that's in the universe, the sense of the universe, that which underlies the universe, which is the consciousness. So you are something that the whole universe is doing, there's no entity ultimately there, you are an activity of consciousness.

And to see yourself as a person is a limitation. You're not an entity and nothing ultimately is a thing. Ultimately, we shouldn't use any noun at all, because there are no things, nothing is independent, everything is active, everything is movement and vibration.

And everything is consciousness manifesting at different vibrational frequencies, but the one consciousness. And there's no permanent entity anywhere. And that's an interesting, wonderful realization.

So you are an activity of consciousness that manifests in this dimension. I could go on talking about this, but let's stop here. It's a fascinating subject.

And it's not just talking about it is, as I speak, I hope that the words can, to some extent, act as signposts, so that what the words point you experience that to which the words point, which is beyond the words. Ultimately, the essence of what we are engaged in here is beyond time. So it's not really final.

And the essence of what we're engaged in here does not leave you. It doesn't become only the surface becomes a memory in your mind. But it remains alive in you.

And if it works as it's intended to, it amplifies and strengthens the arising presence in you. And it continues to do that. So, although the externals of the situation, once this is over, will recede into the past, that's relatively unimportant.

The essence remains in you, as you, and it is a timeless dimension of consciousness of who you are. And that continues to manifest more fully through you. And that never becomes part of the past.

So, we're not leaving anything behind. It's just, we're going more deeply into the timeless dimension. And that remains.

It's all concerned with discovering the timeless dimension to who you are, and living from that. And I can, for a little while, I, as this temporary person, can reflect back to you who you are. That's kind of my function, to reflect back to you, who you are.

And if you find it helpful, and you love listening to what I say, and you can sense the presence, don't think it's, it's something that's in me. It's, if you can sense my presence, you're really sensing your presence. Because only presence can be a way of presence.

Only awareness can be a way of awareness. So, it's all in you. And the time will come, it may be approaching fast, when you can do without the reflection of presence, and you can become, and many of you already are, you can reflect presence for others.

And a time comes when you don't need me anymore to reflect your own presence back to you. And by doing that, amplify it. And that'll be wonderful.

And you will also find that increasingly, you will encounter situations and people in which, or for whom, you can be very helpful in situations where presence, your presence, I say yours, it's not yours, it's only one presence. It's just a way of speaking. Increasingly, as you embody presence, you'll find you will be, encounter situations and people where presence can make a decisive difference in situations that in other human beings, you're reflecting back to reflect presence back to others.

You can, you may be able to make a difference in a situation that is where conflict arises, and you can bring sanity to insanity. Perhaps you can make a difference even when you interact in social media, instead of being part of the madness. You can bring sanity through your contribution.

That's highly needed. And every time your presence becomes helpful to someone or to a situation, it manifests in situations, the more it grows in you. Many of you may experience or may already have experienced that occasionally you, in a casual conversation, a person mentioned something or a question arises, and you suddenly find yourself saying something that is some kind of pointer to a presence or to consciousness.

And then suddenly the other person is, oh, wow, it can bring about a first awakening in another human being. Strange thing happened when I went through the spiritual awakening. For the first few years, I couldn't say much about it.

But then gradually, I was able to speak about it a bit more, and I could see what others, how other people's minds made them miserable. And I could say to point things out, and then was engaged in spiritual conversations with people without intending to. And I could sense that the presence in me was growing more strongly every time I was engaged in a spiritual conversation with somebody.

So much so that even people who had not very much sensitivity, sometimes they said, I can feel something here strange in the room, I can feel something. What are you doing? Of course, I wasn't doing anything.

I was just, the presence was shining. And some people even felt it as an energy field in the room, which is amazing. And many of you will experience similar things.

And the more you help others, the more it grows in you. So it's just a wonderful process. And that's what the world needs, of course.

Let's have some stillness. Without the idea that we are doing meditation, meditation is not a doing. Meditation is the realization of being.

So it's a simple realization of being. Being means what's the first person singular of the verb to be? It's I am.

And that's the meditation, the realization of beingness. The realization that you are. I am.

But nothing is added to it. Just I am. Not this or that.

I am. You can either close your eyes or keep your eyes open, whatever your preference is.

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:29)

Presence, healing, and wholeness. In this episode, Eckhart answers questions from a live audience, including healthcare professionals, doctors, nurses, and therapists. They ask how to deal with the expectations of their patients who yearn for healing and wholeness.

He emphasizes the importance of getting the ego out of the way so the power of stillness and presence can shine through. It's only then can one truly be of service to others.

[Speaker 1] (0:32 - 48:45)

I brought some questions here. These survived the selection process. We'll go through some of these, some very interesting questions that you will all relate to.

How can I reconcile being a wellness professional when a lot of times I'm asleep myself? I feel like a hypocrite. There have been a few similar questions.

It is true that there are probably many people working in the field of therapy and wellness who themselves have no access whatsoever to the spiritual dimension. There are many therapists also like that. You are not one of them, because those that really have no access to it don't know even know that there is such a thing.

Or they might dismiss it as mumbo-jumbo. Although yes, certain expressions come to mind, such as when the blind leads the blind, they both fall into the pit, which is somewhere from the Bible, or from the Course in Miracles. There is a chapter entitled The Unhealed Healer.

But there's another side to this. There are many people who may not yet fully be able to live the teaching in their personal private life, who are nevertheless able to, when they step into the helping situation, the therapeutic situation, or the teaching situation, whatever it is, are able to enter that state of presence, so that this intuitive intelligence that comes out of presence is able to use their mind, the unconditioned consciousness, is able to use their mind, and then you can speak and still be extremely helpful. And that even applies to some spiritual teachers, and I've met several who actually told me that they cannot fully live the teaching in their daily life.

They, in other words, they become identified with their mind, they become reactive. One of them told me, a very famous author, he said sometimes his friends tell him to go back and read his own books. And so he was very open about that, because his friends obviously see that he cannot live the teaching.

But when he wrote these books, he was able to go into that presence, so the writing came out of that state of presence. There's another very famous author, and this was told to me privately, and he, she said, I'm sorry about our interaction many years ago, but at that time I was insane. Now that's a wonderful openness.

I think he, she had become partly insane through the rapid onslaught of fame, which is a huge challenge to the ego. And if suddenly everybody talks about you, that can really trigger the ego in a person. It can be a huge challenge.

So when he, she told me that afterwards, of course, he, she was in a different place, and could like look back, and had enough lack of ego to be able to say that. That was wonderful. But even at that time, that person was able to write these books that helped millions of people.

And you may find the same when you enter the therapy situation. If you're really able to be present with another person, you are not your usual person when, when you enter that situation, you begin to focus attention on the person. The energy begins to shift.

I could say the vibrational frequency in your entire body, you might change, is shifting to a higher frequency. You feel the presence pervading the body and the room, and then you begin to speak. And perhaps that's the very same evening when you talk to your wife or husband, you become unconscious again, trapped in some totally absurd argument and get extremely angry about nothing.

It's quite possible. And then, of course, this question may arise. The person asks, am I a hypocrite?

Am I just pretending that I know? No, because the, the power is not something that comes from the personal level of you. It comes when you get out of the way.

And so some people who may not yet fully be able to live that spiritually awakened life are nevertheless able to get out of the way in those situations. And then consciousness can use them. If only those people who could live it fully were allowed by some authority in the sky to teach or to help others, then there would be very few teaching and helping others.

So you don't need to feel that you are a hypocrite. You are here. That's already a good sign.

And you know that there is a discrepancy, and that's fine. And now if you understand how and why, then you'll be able to actually become comfortable with this shift that you experience when you go into the therapy situation with someone. You can still work on yourself, of course, with your home environment and so on.

That's, that continues. You continue to awaken. It is the case that many people who work with people are learning as they teach themselves.

So because many times as you speak, as you respond to what this person needs, you can come up with things that you find yourself find surprising. Oh, I didn't know that I knew that. Of course, you didn't know it.

It came out of that unconditioned intelligence that is the unconditioned consciousness. And a great learning happens when you teach in that way. Healing is another word for it rather than teaching, because it is, you know, healing in a wider sense, not just physical healing.

Healing of the dysfunction of the egoic mind and so on. That's the healing situation. So healing always goes both ways.

Or as the Course in Miracles says, you're never healed alone. So this, the giving and receiving of healing is the same. Another phrase that you might have heard is that you always teach what you need to learn yourself.

How do you protect yourself when people, clients, are very angry and project this onto you? If they physically attack you, then it might be best to leave the room. I've had a few experiences when I was doing counseling sessions with very angry people.

They were so angry that the energy of their anger filled the entire room. And what I experienced in those situations was an extreme intensification of presence. The slightest emotion that I would have had would have been the emotional body, really it was the extreme pain body, would have latched on to the slightest emotion and get in there and want more of a reaction.

The slightest defensiveness or whatever it may be. So to be totally clear, the anger has, there's no one there that the anger could attack. Because in intense presence, you are, so to speak, you may be visible as people can still see you, but on another level you become transparent.

So the anger comes at you and there's nothing in you that resists it. Any kind of resistance would only strengthen the anger in that person. So if you close yourself, it hits it and it comes back and it gets even stronger.

But if you become totally non-resistant through presence, there's nobody there. The anger passes right through. And that's the only way you can really protect yourself.

The ultimate protection is not to put up a shield. That's one way you could protect yourself. It might be better than no protection at all.

But the real protection is not to be there as a visible target, not to be there as something that can be hit. So you get completely out of the way. So there's no reaction at all to the anger.

And I've seen some miraculous transformations in those situations where suddenly the pain body had absolutely no, it needs something, it needs some reaction. So allow this situation to intensify your presence and experience it being transparent. And then the miracle may happen that at least there, at that moment, the pain body recedes.

When you were in utter despair, would having access to someone like you have helped you? There needs to be a readiness in the person to be helped. Some definitely want to suffer a bit more.

The openness would not be there. So at that time, when people noticed around me that I was unhappy, there was a professor of the university. He was doing transcendental meditation.

And he said to me, you really should be doing meditation. And I said, no, I don't want to do meditation. I lose all my motivation to work.

And that's not what I want. I was a bit scared of meditation. He said it would transform me and make me completely ineffective.

Because I wanted to achieve, I wanted to become an important intellectual. So meditation would have thought might be an obstacle to that. No, I'm not doing it.

So I refused to help. Could have been this was a hint of the universe said, why don't you do transcendental meditation, you might be less anxious. But I didn't do it.

So perhaps if I had met myself, I would have said, who is this guy? I don't know, you cannot help everybody, you might have noticed. And some humans need, and if they cannot, if there's no openness to be helped, it means they are happy with a spiritual teacher they already have.

And his or her name is suffering. Then they just need to experience that a bit more. Because if you show them the possibility of going beyond suffering, or somebody else in a different way shows them the possibility and somebody else does and another therapist and another, or they open a spiritual books in what is this mumbo jumbo, not ready, not ready to listen, need to suffer a bit more.

Suffering has a certain function in the evolution of consciousness. Let's say if you were an omnipotent, the omnipotent God, and you removed all human suffering right now, that's the end of the evolution of consciousness. Of course, you could, if you are totally omnipotent, you could say, let consciousness only express itself right now.

That's not how it works. It cannot express itself except through this. Suffering is necessary until it no longer is necessary for you.

And so it has a function within the totality. You can see it in your own life. I had to go through it up to that point.

And there's a lot of collective suffering. There's not only suffering in poor countries. Yes, there is.

There is different kinds of suffering everywhere. There's intense suffering in the rich countries. You can probably find more happy people in the poor countries than the rich countries.

So they're just different degrees of suffering. And so at some point, the individual realizes that suffering is ultimately self made, self produced. And then the shift happens.

And then evolution is of a different kind. It is no longer impelled or fueled by suffering. You still evolve, but it's no longer through suffering.

When you encounter a spiritual teaching or a spiritual teacher, that is the moment when that spiritual teacher takes over from suffering, the old spiritual teacher, you get handed over to the new one. That's a wonderful, that should be celebrated in a person's life, the transition from Mr. and Mrs. Suffering, or the guru called Suffering, three, three suffering, to an actual teacher. And for some reason, by some strange synchronistic event, I have two questions here, which may be by the same person.

Are you happy? And then the other one with so much sadness in the world, how can I feel joy? Be happy?

Am I happy? No, I wouldn't call it happy. Some people might use that word to point to a very deeper state of connectedness with being.

But conventionally, happy really is the opposite to unhappy. And so you go from happy to unhappy is, and then something happens. You know the two masks that for theater, comedy and tragedy, the two masks, one is a comedy.

And then there's a tragedy. So usually happiness exists as part of the play of opposites, you experience the happiness, because something makes you happy. And then that thing that made you happy either leaves you or the very thing that made you happy, suddenly makes you unhappy.

Marriage, for example. Or a relationship. Before you start living together, you're happy.

When you start living together, you're unhappy. So if it's not happy, what are we talking about? If you let go of thinking and remain as the awareness, then there is in that awareness emanates a certain peace, alive peace, joy, peace, a peaceful, joyful sense of aliveness.

Inner peace may be a better word than happiness. But one would have to add to it. It's an alive peace.

It's not the peace of having deadened yourselves to emotions, or anything like that. It's an alive, intensely alive peace. You can sense it, even if it's only just a glimpse right now.

Surrender thought. And of course, right now, if you're not thinking about the problems of your life, there are no problems in this moment. There's only a sense of beingness or liveness.

And that is the connectedness with being. And so you transcend the opposites between happiness and unhappiness. In the power of now, there's a little chapter called, beyond happiness and unhappiness, there's peace.

So instead of being subject to the fluctuations of happiness and unhappiness, there's that peace where you realize the essence of who you are. And so you're no longer ego based. Form identity, yes, but not identification with form identity.

So it doesn't turn into ego. And then you function in this world from that place of inner peace. And whatever you do, or who you come into contact with, that your actions, your thoughts become a manifestation of that.

If more people enter that place, then more people become peaceful human beings and do not contribute to a conflict in the world, the madness of the world, don't contribute to the madness of the world. Come back to the question, with so much sadness in the world, how can I feel joy and happy? Yes, there is a huge amount of suffering in the world.

Why is there suffering? Because humans are disconnected from the source of who they are. And that is the fundamental source of suffering.

That's how it arises. So if you say, I refuse to be happy, until there's no more suffering in this world. Okay, so the end of suffering, then I'm waiting for it out there.

And you might even become very active. I'm going to bring about the end of suffering, you do good things. But you haven't brought about the end of suffering in yourself.

So how is the end of suffering going to happen, even if you do good deeds, which is a wonderful thing. But if you are unhappy doing good deeds, then that unhappiness also flows into how you do those things and your interactions with other people. The shift in this world, the end of suffering, to use the Buddha's terminology, the Buddha described his teaching as pointing the way to the end of suffering.

That's the Buddha's teaching. He never used to, he used a negative term, end of suffering. Jesus talked about the kingdom of heaven, which is within you.

He used a positive term. They're both talking about the same thing. So the end of suffering has to begin with you, and then it spreads.

Then, because that changes the way in which you experience the world, it affects others. And then what you, your relationship with other human beings changes fundamentally, because only when you are in connectedness with the essence of who you are, can you have harmonious relationships with others, and can you have, feel this deep sense of goodwill towards other human beings, not conditional upon whether they happen to agree with you, or belong to the same political party, or belong to the same religion, or belong to the same nation. It doesn't depend on that, the same tribe. No, to have a goodwill or benevolence towards all humans that you come into contact with, no matter what their conditioning is.

That can only come from that deep connectedness with being, and where you do not automatically and unconsciously judge others the moment you meet them. So it needs to start with you, then this benevolence, this goodwill changes the way in which you interact with other humans, and that changes on a small scale. And then gradually other human beings here and there can also go to that place within, and then start to live it.

The end of suffering, and let's forget about happiness, let's talk about peace. So it starts with you. Be the change that you want to see in the world.

So if you want to see peace, you have to embody the peace. The end of suffering needs to start with you, your suffering. That's the end of suffering on the planet.

And then you can show the way to others too. You don't necessarily have to become a spiritual teacher, but you may. But in some way, even you don't even need to fully embody that shift in consciousness, fully enlightened master.

No, even just to be undergoing the transformational process, you already begin to teach, so to speak. Even though you might not teach in the conventional sense of the word, but whoever you come into contact with, you affect with your state of consciousness. The Course in Miracles says you become a teacher of God.

A related question here, as a grief therapist, I meet people who suffer a lot and many of them have no access to the spiritual dimension. How can I help them the most? Some people have no access to the spiritual dimension, but if they are ready, then you will help them by being present with them and not necessarily say anything about anything spiritual.

You do not necessarily introduce people to the spiritual dimension by talking about it. You can just demonstrate, for example, what it means to become aware of your own thoughts. You can demonstrate to them what it means and how it feels like to be able to observe your emotions and allow them to be there.

So you can do that together with your client, patient. What are the emotions? So that gradually he or she experiences for himself or herself what it means to be the observer, the witness of emotional states, to be the awareness.

So to really what is the spiritual dimension, there's no need ever to say anything spiritual because that might lead to defensiveness of the ego. Not just to take them to non-identification with thinking, which starts with a simple thing. What thoughts go through your head right now?

What are the most common thoughts that go to your head during the day? Are there repetitive thoughts? Okay, maybe even write them down.

And when you think that thought, how does it feel when you think that thought? Okay, describe that. And gradually the person can experience the arising of awareness.

So that he or she is no longer totally trapped in the fluctuating emotions and the continuous, incessant, involuntary thinking that happens in the unconscious state. So for many, the first awakening to spirituality is to become aware that there is a voice in their head that comments on their life, on themselves and other people all the time, and has fixed positions, and has its likes and dislikes and hates, this and that. A lot of it, the voice is very critical.

The voice tends to be more negative than positive, because when you have something positive, there's not that much to think about. When you have something negative, you can go and think about it for a very long time. It just gives you much more food for thought.

You can have a loving interaction with another human being, just you meet somebody casually, and the person is friendly, and you feel good, and you walk away, for a few moments you feel good about yourself and the other. And then what else is there to think about? That was a lovely interaction.

But then you meet somebody who is rude to you, and treats you with disrespect, and says something to you, and then after it's happened, you start thinking about it. Why didn't I respond? I should have said that, that would have hit him.

And how does he show that disrespect? Why are people so disrespectful towards me? Is there something wrong with me?

Stories, incessant stories in the mind, having been offended by this person or that person, you can think about that a lot. You can't think that much about a beautiful sunset you saw yesterday evening. What is there to think about?

But something negative, that's great. So that's the voice in the head. It loves that.

It's the unobserved voice in the head is the essence of unconsciousness. So the discovery that there is a voice in your head, and that the voice is not you, but it is a voice in your head, is the beginning of spiritual awakening. So if you can only just show a client that there is a voice in the head, and that's not you, why is it not you?

Because you know that there is a voice in the head, so there's another dimension in you from where you can know that there's a voice in the head. So that's more essentially you than the voice. And then you can also show that the voice, a lot of the time, what it says is not true at all.

And then you begin not to believe in every thought you think. That's a wonderful liberation. You realize, okay, that's just an old thought.

And then come the awareness of emotions. So that's spiritual. And some people are ready for it.

Sometimes the most unlikely people, suddenly you meet them and say, wow, he suddenly gets it. And that's the beginning of his or her spiritual awakening. And then others are definitely not ready, because it has happened a few times.

I talk about the voice in the head. What is he talking about? What voice in the head?

And then I say, that one. But he still goes, it's not a voice, I'm talking, it's not a voice. So really the spirit dimension is something very practical and simple.

It does not require a lot of talk about, you will transcend the ego when you come to me, or whatever. It's much more practical. You never need to say you need to transcend your ego.

Obviously you know that. So let me show you your true self. It's not necessary.

Just say, is there a voice in your head? I am a therapist and now feel that I don't take people's problems seriously. I don't know if I can continue to be a psychotherapist.

Now this, when I was seeing people for counseling sessions, some of them got angry because when I was listening to their problems, I would be smiling, just a very slight smile. And they got quite angry, some of them, because why are you smiling? You're laughing, do you think this is funny?

Of course the smile did not come as a result of any kind of thought process in my head. I didn't smile because I thought, oh he thinks he has such big problems and these problems are meaningless. No, none of that.

The smile came because I could sense the deeper essence of that human being, because it resonated with my own essence. And I could sense the wellness of that human being, who on the surface seemed very unhappy. I could see the relative insignificance of his or her problems, because I could sense something much deeper in that other person.

And that is also a form of healing, when you connect at that deep level from your essence to the other person's essence, and then all the problems really, they may still be important to that person, but they are only relatively important. So some people got it, they actually stopped talking about suddenly. Once or twice I had people realizing, is this really so important?

Are these problems really so important? And some people realized the amazing thing about the present moment, which is, you cannot have a problem in the present moment. All problems exist on the level of the mind.

What is this, if your attention remains focused on the present moment, there's only always this moment which may be challenging. Some present moments are challenging, there's no doubt about it. We could have a wild animal suddenly burst into this room.

But that's not a problem, because there's no time for the mind to make it into a problem, it's a challenge. And then in the face of that, you face a challenge, and then action arises. Let's say something more serious, you develop a disability.

Perhaps you suddenly can't walk anymore, that is a serious problem, it's a challenge, certainly. Then I have met people, many, who because something serious happened in their lives, first they thought, I cannot live with the burden of that problem, it's just too much to bear for me, I can't do it. And they suffered, and suffered tremendously.

And then either they came into contact with the spiritual teaching, or they did it by themselves. At some point, they couldn't take the suffering anymore. And at that point, they refused to leave the present moment, the now.

And suddenly, there's only whatever condition arises in this moment, that you face completely without any story around it, about me and my past, and my future, and what my life has come to, and it's never going, I'm never going to walk again, and it's all kinds of mental, all the, the suffering arises through the mind, not the situation, ultimately. And that's a deep teaching. The human suffering, and suffering is the psychological level.

Pain, yes, you can have pain, you can have physical pain, you can also have emotional pain, when it is not amplified by useless and incessant thinking, emotional pain has a lifespan, it arises, and it subsides. Somebody dies, a loved one dies, yes, you have emotional pain, it arises, it subsides, and it comes back a few times in waves, then surrender happens, and it's gone, and there's peace left. If the mind amplifies it by incessant thinking, the pain can go on for years.

One event can cause you years of pain, if that event is continuously renewed, remembered by the mind. And many problems that human have, actually have no existence whatsoever. The mind generates the problems, things that could go wrong in your life, worry, anxiety, what if, all these things.

So in a therapy situation, I've said this so many times, and in the books too, if you think you have problems, and everybody does, in a conventional sense, there's no life that is free of challenges, and there are difficulties for you, there may be difficulties at work, there may be difficulties financial, in your living situation, in your relationships, your health. No human exists here without having certain difficulties in their life. Of course, this is how it's meant to be, otherwise it wouldn't happen, but they don't need to become problems.

The more you are focused on the now, the more free you are of problems. That's an amazing realization. This has helped quite a few people, and that again is an entry point into the spiritual dimension, because the now is a portal into the spiritual dimension.

Here's one that is a personal one. I'm aware of fear that is almost continual in me. My parents were Holocaust survivors, and in spite of my awareness of the anxiety and fear, it does not seem to lessen.

I know you talk about, in any given moment, there's never a problem, but when you're terrified all the time, there is a problem, because you are afraid. Now this is somebody here who, a lot of the time, is in a state of fear or anxiety. It could be related to something in his past, or his parents, or perhaps other generations too.

What to do? You can't get rid of being terrified, having been in a state of fear most of the time. What you can do is not to allow the fear to rise up into your mind and control your thought processes, because then there would be a normal thing when you are identified.

The emotion that's there rises into your mind, and then it causes you to think thoughts that correspond to the emotion, fearful thoughts in this case, and then you would get a vicious circle building up between the emotion of fear, the thoughts you think, which are fearful thoughts, which give more energy to the emotion. So the more fearful thoughts you think, the more it perpetuates the fear that you feel. So to sever the link between the emotion that you feel and your thought processes, and this is not pleasant, but it's possible, you place your attention on the emotion.

You feel it. It's unpleasant, but it's not going to kill you. So feel it, and then you shine the light of awareness on it.

And you may have to do that a lot, and at first it's not pleasant, but it's a burning up of the old emotion. And the only way to get rid of it is to accept it as it is right now. If you want to get rid of it, you can't.

But that complete acceptance of what is, is actually the doorway through it. It's the transformation of it. And if it's extreme, that can become your main meditation in life, and that will become your main teacher, and that will bring about your transformation.

In some people's lives, there is one huge disability, one huge source of suffering or pain. It could be a physical disability. It could be a situation like being in prison.

It could be an emotion like that, that you carry inside, that doesn't want to go away. In certain people's lives, there is one major thing that seems to color your entire life, and affect your entire life, and seemingly makes it impossible for you to ever be free or happy or joyful. But if that one thing, if you surrender to it, allow it to be, and make it as a continuous spiritual practice, you need nothing else.

That one thing will transform you, if you surrender to it. And there will come a point when you are grateful that you had to go through that. It will be the greatest spiritual teacher.

Acceptance of the unacceptable is the great source of grace in this world. It's just a miracle. But it can be an arduous process, especially for this questioner here, who is here.

It may take a while. You have to endure it, and be with it, and surrender to it, a lot of the time. And that's your meditation.

You don't need transcendental meditation. Your pain, your fear is enough. Be with it.

Allow it to be there. And gradually, you will notice the transformation. That's the alchemy of transformation.

The alchemy of suffering into the old meaning of alchemy is base metal. There comes this guy who experiments in the chemical kitchen, and he transforms base metal into gold. So there have been in medieval times, there was a lot of interest in alchemy.

That would be the material level of alchemy. But on a spiritual level, alchemy is the transformation of suffering into consciousness. And that only happens if you bring surrender to the suffering.

The idea behind it is voluntarily embrace suffering, so that it brings about a transformation of consciousness by surrendering to it. I work as a well-being officer at a public primary school, ages 5 to 12. Well, it's a wonderful thing that at least the school has a well-being officer.

Other than being present myself, what would you recommend as the most effective ways to remind children of their essential presence? By the way, our office where children can drop in is called the space. As you say, other than being present myself, of course, being present yourself is the main thing when you are with the children.

And then perhaps you can help them with, unfortunately, is not yet taught at school, which is for children to become aware that they have emotions, but they are not their emotions. Of course, you don't tell them you have emotions, but you're not your emotions. You have to find a more direct and practical way to show them to be able to be aware of their emotions.

And then you might even be able to show them to be aware of their thoughts. How exactly you can work that out for yourself, how you do it, how you bring it to children, and who knows what comes of that. The main thing is just show them what it means to be aware without ever mentioning the word awareness, because it's far too abstract for a child, so you never mention the word awareness, of course, but on a practical level, you can show them what do you feel right now.

What does it feel like? What would that look like if it were an animal? Maybe you can even draw it, and then you draw your emotion looking like an animal.

And by doing that, there comes a slight disidentification from the emotion, because you never mentioned the word disidentification, it wouldn't make sense. So you start like that, you can see your inner states, you can draw them, and then you can look at certain thoughts they think. What are your thoughts?

What do you think? How do you feel when you think that, for example? All those things that really should be the primary subject that children learn at school, but is not yet, to be aware, an aware human being.

A thousand times more important than mathematics, or biology, or geography, or whatever else they learn. What could possibly be more important than to learn how to be an aware human being? School for me was a nightmare.

I couldn't, it was just, even occasionally now I have dreams when I am an adult, and I'm back in a classroom. How do I get out of here? And here's one question that is just a personal one.

How do I truly forgive myself for not being present with another? Well, I assume the question refers to something that happened in the past, not in the present, because if the other is here with you now, then there's nothing to forgive, you just be present. So it must be something that you were not present with someone in the past, because there was not enough presence in you.

You cannot manifest any behavior beyond your level of consciousness, either that you had no idea what presence was, you were not yet able to access that dimension of consciousness, or it was there very weak in you, not strong enough perhaps to survive in that particular interaction or relationship. Some parents have that feeling also because when they look back upon how they brought up their children, they cannot believe how unconscious they were as parents. Now, there's no such thing as totally conscious parents.

No matter what you do, there's always something that you don't do right. Absolute perfection is just not possible. But there are now for the first time perhaps in history, there are parents who are relatively conscious, who are endeavoring to be conscious as parents.

In my generation, it was unheard of. Conscious parents, what is that? You just, the parents brought you up in the same way that they were brought up in the same way that was sanctioned by the surrounding culture.

That's how you were brought up. Conscious parents, what's that nonsense? And of course, in my generation, I didn't know anybody who had even remotely conscious parents.

So forgiving yourself for not being present, there's always a tendency of the ego to identify with certain conditions. So the ego identifies with the condition of unconsciousness and says, that was me. And I was wrong, I should have been conscious at the time.

But you were not, you couldn't have been more conscious at the time than you were at the time. You forgive yourself by realizing that nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness. And whatever you did in the past, was an expression on your personal level of the evolutionary state of yourself.

If you have still an opportunity to go to this person, and perhaps explain that you were unconscious, we don't know what level of consciousness this person is at, whether this person would be able to listen to you, and even understand what you're saying, or this person may not be alive anymore, or there may not be an opportunity to speak. But either way, you forgive yourself by realizing that there is ultimately nothing to forgive. And that even applies to another person, because if forgiving goes both ways, sometimes you have to forgive yourself, but you also have to forgive somebody else.

If you do not want to carry the enormous burden of carrying a grievance, which is a dreadful thing, just one grievance towards another human being, that is a heavy grievance that you carry, can stop the arising of presence in you. So letting go of grievances is vital. In ordinary human interaction, it is very important to overlook things that humans do, because every human being that you come into contact with, even if they are awakening, they are in the awakening process, they will still manifest occasionally areas of unconsciousness.

So if you want to have a relatively harmonious relationship, many things you need to overlook in the other person. Some insensitivity may arise here and there, they may say or do something that is selfish, or that they may have a very one-sided perspective of something, they may misperceive you, they may misperceive your motivation, you misperceive their motivation, all kinds of things. So to forgive in a present situation means to overlook.

If you see a fault, don't dwell on it. So thank you. Let's take a moment of stillness.

Eckhart Tolle Presence : The Natural Path that Leads to Life [b482ea45-3728-4c2e-be1d-02bd427112aa]

Presence, the natural path that leads to life. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience about freeing oneself from the mind to find presence. He says we must become aware of the harmful thoughts that hold us hostage.

Life's crises need not drag us into unconsciousness. We can stay alert and let them take us to a deeper state of awareness. Eckhart says while the path to presence is narrow, it ultimately leads to life.

To get out of your mind, remember, I wrote about it in various places, body awareness is extremely helpful. Once you realize your mind is not stopping and it wants to drag you along, one thought after another, oh my God. And at some point you realize it's futile.

That requires a little bit of awareness, but you all have more than a little bit of awareness. You need at some point to realize that certain types of thinking, which is a large percentage of thinking, is not only futile, but harmful. Futile, harmful, it creates suffering, such as worry, anxiety, grievances from the past, resentment.

All those types of thinking, a lot of human thinking is like that. Complaining kinds of thoughts, complaining about people and situations, and this and that, and about my life. All that kind of thinking is, once there's a little bit of awareness, you realize my thoughts right now are futile.

They have no purpose. They're actually causing me suffering. And I don't want them.

I don't need them. Okay, but they don't want to go. The thought's going, come this way, come this way, and then you're back in again.

And then you know they are futile, but you're still being dragged along. Every thought that's coming, follow me. Your attention, I want your attention.

And then you say, enough. Now, you cannot use willpower to get rid of thought. Well, you could, but it doesn't really help for too long because it comes back with a vengeance.

If you suppress thought with willpower, which you could do, especially if you stop breathing, some Zen, especially Western Zen, but some Japanese too, Western Zen practitioners misunderstand Zen. And so when they meditate, they go, I'm not thinking. And of course, then after three hours of meditation, they go into the kitchen and then at the slightest thing, they burst out.

The lid is off the boiling kettle. So that's not it. But just take your attention away from the mind and a good place to take it is into the body.

Just, okay, this kind of thinking is futile. I don't need it. Therefore, I'm going to feel the inside of my hands.

Are the hands still alive or are they dead now? You can ask yourself, are my hands dead or alive? How can you answer that question without moving your hands or looking at them?

Very simple. Your attention has to move from the head, conscious, the focus of your consciousness has to move from the head into your hands. And then, you know, yeah, of course you can feel that they are alive.

It's hard to describe the feeling, but they are alive. And the more your attention is in your hands, the more you can sense that there is a life, an aliveness in every cell in your hands. Wow.

And already you've taken some attention away from thinking. You can't think that much anymore and be aware of your hands, the life inside your hands. Then why not be aware of the life inside your feet at the same time?

That takes even more attention away from thinking. And then you hold attention in both hands and in both feet. Not that difficult.

So you feel them simultaneously. So once you get hold of the sense of hands and feet, you can also sense your legs, not as strongly, but you can sense the entire body is alive too. There's an aliveness that pervades the body.

To feel that, you need to take your attention away from thinking. And that's why we do it. You need attention.

And inevitably, you cannot feel your body if you're stuck in your mind. So it takes attention away. And then you have this beautiful feeling, especially wonderful at night when you can't sleep.

Why not use this wonderful opportunity of insomnia and feel the aliveness in your body? Not a thought in your head anymore, because you can't. You cannot feel the aliveness in your body and be thinking about your problems at the same time.

And you can actually enjoy being awake at night where a minute ago you were worried and now you enjoy not being able to sleep. I hope I can stay awake longer because it's so lovely to feel every cell of the body is alive. And presence, to be present is not a head phenomenon when we talk the consciousness.

Who am I? In order to sense who you are as presence, you don't just sense it with your head. You sense it with the entirety of your being, including your seemingly so-called physical body.

But what you sense goes beyond physical when you go into the body and the aliveness of it. So to be really present, your entire being is present. Not a head phenomenon.

And as you sit here, and I'm talking about it and every word is a pointer to it. As you sit here, feel yourself as the presence. Every cell is present.

That's ultimately what presence is and it goes beyond the body. It's not really the body anymore. You go into the body and there you have consciousness.

And so that's a beautiful place to quickly get out of thinking that you don't need and that you don't want. Just a conscious choice, directing attention into the body and holding it there. And then the more you hold it, the easier it gets and the more you like it.

You love going there and you don't have to, not just at night. Whenever you're sitting somewhere, feel the entirety of, can even do it while you're driving. It doesn't mean you don't pay attention to the road.

You're still, you're fully present. It's less likely that you'll have an accident when you're present, much less likely. The weird thing is I'm a, most people say I'm a bad driver because I drive in strange ways, but I haven't had an accident in 40 years.

Nobody can guarantee that tomorrow I may not have one. That's another matter, but it's a presence helps. So don't underestimate the efficacy of being in the body, how powerful that is as an anchor for presence and can do it anywhere.

You can do it when you're on the phone talking to somebody so that you don't get lost in mind stuff and get drawn into, no, be rooted in being so that you don't go into, so there's a presence behind the speaking and you can do it easily by holding the inner body awareness, as I call it, inner body awareness. You can do it and with other things that tend to take your attention, to draw your attention out. Now, when you watch television with many kinds of programs, what it actually does is you stop thinking, but not in a good way.

When you watch television, you link into the thoughts of whatever is being talked about on the TV, you link into that, it takes over your mind. So you get rid of your own thinking, but you adopt somebody else's thinking. So your mind is still active although it frees you.

That's why people can get addicted to it. It frees you from yourself temporarily, but it does not elevate you above thinking. It really takes you into thinking and sometimes even below thinking.

But I'm not saying never watch television, but be in the body while you watch it, especially the news, because otherwise you think this is awful. Oh my God, what's happening? It's crazy.

That's all you need to know. It's an expression of human unconsciousness. So again, you have to be very careful with the many devices that people use these days, everybody uses these days, smartphones, which continuously demand your attention.

It's amazing. And this is a new challenge because it's an extension of the mind. It's an extension of the human mind.

And so it can actually amplify what otherwise would just be mind stuff. It can clutter your mind even more. Continuously incoming, seemingly important text messages, making all kinds of noises and saying, I'm important.

Look at me. And if you really see it, it's not important, but it seems to be. And it seems that you are in demand.

People want your attention. It feels good. And another, an email at Facebook and all these people are posting these new things.

And there was a time when people were waiting for something. They would just sit there because there was nothing else to do. And they would become bored if they were in their mind or an opportunity for becoming still in some cases.

So they had suddenly a creative idea because they became still for a moment and out of the stillness, which is intelligence itself, consciousness itself, suddenly they had a creative insight. But nowadays they'd sit there and the first thing they get the phone out of their pocket. They're never bored anymore.

And of course their mind is more and more cluttered with stuff. I don't do like, I don't go like that because that's a younger generation. They go like that.

I go like that. And even then, lots of things I get wrong, but you have to use these things with care so that they don't take over your life, which is another way of the mind really taking you over because they are an extension of the mind, of the thinking mind. So you have an added challenge and that's probably a good thing because it seems to be an obstacle to your arising awareness to have these devices around you, but it's a challenge.

Potentially that's a good thing. And of course it could drag you down too. Don't continuously engage with them.

Allow yourself to have spaces, not just inside, also externally. Allow yourself to occasionally sit for a few minutes, wherever you may be. Let's say there's a traffic jam.

Why not just sit and be and sense the presence that you are and be alert and still and you might suddenly get some creative thoughts instead of repetitive old thoughts. You suddenly, there's some creative insight, a new idea that can only arise out of a moment of spaciousness, inner spaciousness. You have to access that for anything creative to arise in your life.

You have to access the transcendent dimension within you. Einstein had his insights, his great insights into theory of relativity. He did a lot of thinking, but the great insights came to him as revelations and they only came to him as revelations because he was naturally a very slow and quiet and still person.

When he was a child, they had, when he was three, four, five years old, the parents were concerned because he was so slow and this is not valued in our civilization. The slow students, what valued is the quick, what's the answer? Do you have the answer?

Yeah, I know. Yes, yes. That's what it is.

But he, when you ask him a question and he goes, and maybe 10 minutes later, an answer came. And our civilization, unfortunately does not encourage that. And people who are naturally like that tend not to do so well, especially in childhood.

They may do well later, but not in the school system. So into the body, it's so important, inner body awareness. Another very simple device that is connected with inner body awareness, breathe, becoming aware that you're breathing.

It's very simple. Am I breathing or not? You probably are, but you didn't know it.

And all you do is, you don't need to change your breathing, not make some conscious effort. That's another way of doing it, but it's an easier way is simply ask yourself, am I breathing or not? And now in order to find out if you're breathing, your attention needs to go from your mind and from thinking into here, because this is where breathing starts.

It starts, the air flows in to your nostrils and there you can feel it. And you can also feel it flowing into the body. And then you know, oh yes, I'm still breathing.

And so with your attention, you follow the breath into the body and you follow the breath out of the body. It may be that your breathing naturally slows down by itself when you give it attention like that. That's okay.

But the remarkable thing is when you know that you're breathing, you're not thinking. You have to check this for yourself. You cannot be aware that you're breathing and think at the same time.

If you're fully aware of your breath, you're not thinking. Isn't that amazing? So I sometimes say just one conscious breath creates a little bit of space inside you.

A little bit of spaciousness takes you out of the mind. One conscious breath, which is in and out. That's one breath.

One conscious breath. And two is even better. And three.

Three conscious breaths. You can do it in any situation, anywhere on your computer. Again, this computer takes your attention into, it clutters your mind, takes your attention out.

It's one conscious breath. And maybe look away from the screen. Look at the sky through the window or a plant.

And a conscious breath connects you with the inner body, with the aliveness in the body. You can put them to, you can do the both practices as one. The inner body awareness and conscious breath takes your attention away, creates spaciousness inside.

And the other is, another great thing you want to practice is, and this is so important, awareness of sense perceptions without labeling. You can do it anywhere in the middle of the city, in the country, on the beach, at home, in the office, in the restaurant, in a cafe. Let's take cafe as an example.

You sit, you're having a cup of tea or coffee and you sit in a cafe and use it, instead of going to your phone, use it as a spiritual practice. It's a cafe practice, but you don't have to drink coffee with it. You can drink anything.

It's a public place. And you sit there for 10 minutes, let's say, looking around at all, what's happening around you, all the people and what they are doing and sitting. Most of them will be on their phones, that's okay, but you are not.

And you look and there's the room and you might see what's happening in the street also. And as you sit there, you get in touch with your presence, the sense of presence and beingness. Maybe feel the inner body and feel your own presence, the presence of consciousness, you as consciousness.

And then you look around and you listen, there are sounds and you look. And your practice is not to label your sense perceptions mentally. In other words, you're just looking.

And as you look, feel the presence of yourself and then look around in thoughtless awareness. It's a wonderful practice. And you will love what you see because every human is an expression of the one life in their own way.

Every human is quite lovely and lovable, but you don't have to say that in your mind. It's a realization of the aliveness of every human, but you cannot sense the aliveness of every other human if you cannot sense your own aliveness. So your own presence or aliveness is the basis for sensing the aliveness of other humans.

And by doing that, you love them in a way, not the clinging love that says, oh, I want you. You're quite happy with them doing what they do. You don't need to wanting to interact necessarily.

You just be there. You just love them. They're all manifestations of the one, the one life.

And they're all so different. Isn't that amazing? Not a single human is the same.

Out of the billions, they're all different. That's wonderful. And yet the essence in each one is the one essence that is one with your essence.

And you can sense that if you don't label them. That's a lovely practice to enjoy the aliveness of things in a limited space. If you sit, I mean, you're in a relatively passive situation when you sit in a cafe, there's a coffee, you might be tea, whatever you are drinking, but you're not doing much.

So it's relatively easy to be there as the presence. And you don't have to do it in a way that people necessarily notice. Well, they probably won't notice anyway because they're on their phones.

They don't see anything. But if they happen to be looking up from their phones, they might look a bit weird that you are not on your phone. There's something wrong with you.

So that's one place. Another place of course is in nature. And that's a wonderful way to practice also.

Choose a spot. You stand or sit somewhere. And lying is not immediately advisable if you lie down because that can easily take you below thought.

You want to remain above thought. So you stand or sit and then nature. That might even be easier than in a cafe because in a cafe, there's lots of things still happening that stimulate thought because people are talking or the general energy field is mind.

If you go into nature, you're in no mind. And then the same way you perceive in that alert awareness, the miraculous life forms around you that have no name, if you don't give them names, have no name. And if you don't obscure things with names, you can sense the inherent aliveness.

They speak to you. So there's another dimension that reveals itself to you that is everywhere in nature that you don't know when you're stuck in your mind and label things. And that's a beautiful way of practicing presence.

Don't destroy nature by getting, I mean, dreadfully, you're sitting under a tree in this miraculous place, the same place where the Buddha found enlightenment, sitting under a tree and you get out your phone. It's such a wonderful opportunity under this, trees are wonderful beings and you sit under the tree and there's the vastness of the sky and nature and to just be there in that moment not as a person, but as a conscious presence. Wow.

And don't overdo it. Even if you just do it for 10 minutes, just be there. Watch.

So the practice is sense perception without mentally labeling them. It requires an alertness. It's a choice.

You make that choice and that's a shift in consciousness. And every time you do that, you are not there as a person. The person is kind of temporarily disappeared.

You are there as a conscious presence, as the deeper presence of life itself. And that's beautiful. Same thing, practice nature, practice in a public place.

You can practice at every traffic light. If you're driving, every time the light is red, practice presence. Red light, presence.

And look at the beauty of that red light. Ultimately, everything is natural because that's energy too. It's a manifestation of energy, the red traffic light.

It has an aliveness too. It sounds weird, but it does. And so there's a light and it's telling you to be present.

People have worked out. I don't know who did it. Somebody reaches the age of 70 and they drive, start driving at the age of 20.

Somebody worked out how many, unfortunately, I don't retain a lot of information in my mind. So you would have spent a year or so or more of your life sitting at traffic lights. And for most people, that is something they don't like.

But it's, why not choose that? Be present. I also, another thing I mentioned, little activities, washing your hands, be there completely.

Takes you out of your mind. Sensory perception. Ah, water, beautiful.

Maybe scent of soap. And you give it complete attention, which means you're not thinking. You're just experiencing.

Elevator, lift, elevator. You're waiting for it. You can either get out your phone or you can just be choosing presence.

And the more you choose it, the easier it gets and the deeper you go into presence. And then you realize after a while, you didn't really choose. Presence chose you.

Presence wanted to come through you. Because sometimes people ask me, well, who is choosing presence? Well, it's just one way of looking at it.

Presence, when you get out of the way as a person, presence is there. So use all those things to transform your life. Use the opportunities of obstacles when they arise.

Seemingly obstacles. Accept each moment as if you had chosen it. That's vital.

So I've given you these portals out of the mind and into presence. And of course, a primordial portal into presence is the present moment. So that is always there.

Coming into the present moment is an aspect of every practice that I have given. It always involves coming into the, whether you go into the body, whether you're breathing, whether you practice sensory perception without labeling. It always involves being more conscious and more fully in the present moment.

Therefore, an associated practice is to simply become aware of the present moment. And that's an amazing thing too, because, and it's so vital because there is nothing else. So if you never fully acknowledge the is-ness of this moment, you miss the whole thing, which is called your life.

You miss the whole thing if you are not aware of the present moment. But how to be aware of the present moment is, encapsulates all that we have spoken about. First level of being aware of the present moment is to be aware of your sense perceptions.

That brings, it's the first step into the present moment. Then perhaps you're aware of your breathing and your inner body and sense perception at the same time. So first you become aware of where you are, what's around you or what you are doing.

And then, you go deeper into the present moment. And the essence of the present moment is you. So if you get the essence of what we call the present moment is consciousness.

And consciousness is the space in which everything happens. Consciousness is the one thing that never changes is the present moment. It's always now.

It's always now. And what is the present moment in essence? In essence, the present moment is not what happens in the present moment.

The deeper essence is the present moment is the space for whatever happens. And there's the space like the canvas, however you want to call it. So you are aware of yourself ultimately as the present moment.

And this realization that ultimately you are the present moment. Those words had not come to me when I was writing The Power of Now. So it never got into the book.

Because the words came to me after I'd already written the book. I said, oh, I should have put that in. Oh, no.

Why didn't I put that in? Oh, you're no good. I didn't do that.

So you can, you sense the essence of what present moment really means as consciousness. The one thing that is beyond any doubt that you are right now conscious. And that's not the right way of putting it.

If I say you are conscious, you are consciousness is better. You are consciousness. Everything else could be a dream or an illusion.

Including this room and me talking. Am I dreaming this? He's talking.

He's saying I may be dreaming this. Okay. Maybe you are.

Maybe all of sensory perceived so-called reality is a kind of dream. It's a way of looking at it. Certainly everything dissolves quickly.

And then, where was it? Where has it gone? It's gone.

And a dream dissolves too. But what remains beyond any doubt, even if it is all a dream, there needs to be a consciousness for the dream to be perceived. And you are that.

So that's beyond doubt. Descartes, the philosopher, hadn't gone far enough when he said, I think, therefore I am. He tried to figure out something that was beyond doubt in his life.

Or in human life. What is it that we can be absolutely certain about? Very little.

And he thought and thought and after a few years of thinking, he came up with the idea, I'm thinking, therefore I exist. If he had waited a little bit longer, he might have experienced the cessation of thinking. And then the statement would have been deeper.

Then the statement would have been, I am conscious, therefore I am. And that is the deeper I am that is very different from the I that people refer to in ordinary usage language. When they say I, they refer to the personality that exists in space and time and has a history, me and my story, me and my history is the I, I, I.

The most important word for many people, one of the most frequently used words in the English language is the word I. So it must be very important to everybody. And usually it refers to the person and the story.

But the deeper meaning of I is the presence of I. I as the presence, the underlying presence. I am.

The realization of your essence identity, as I call it. Essence identity. Form identity.

Essence identity. Form identity, if you only know your form identity and know yourself as form identity, it's a very unsatisfying place. But if you know yourself as essence identity, then form identity is actually not that bad.

Yes, there are challenges and so on, from time to time, they periodically arise. But you can actually enjoy all the things that you experience as a person if you no longer have expectations about those experiences that these experiences cannot meet. And those expectations are fulfill me, make me happy, tell me who I am.

No matter what you experience or where you go or who you meet, that won't work. And then if you only know form identity, life is so frustrating. Always you get frustrated by people and situations and it's just one damn thing after another.

But if you have, if you're connected with your essence identity, from there you can enjoy relationships because, for example, you no longer demand make me happy. Don't be unconscious. You should be perfect.

Not going to happen. Even if you live with a Buddha, after a while you will find things you find irritating. Why does he chew his food so slowly?

Why does he never get upset? Why doesn't he make interesting conversation? And again, in any life situation, a new job, a new this, new place to live, sooner or later you find things that are not that great.

But if you are in essence identity, the form identity can be enjoyed for what it is. Quite enjoyable. Quite nice.

It'll come to an end soon. I know everything does. That's okay.

Or it'll break. Or whatever. Or it may not be interesting anymore.

And what has my interest today may be boring next week. That's okay. That's bound to happen.

But in the meantime, you just enjoy a good meal. Fine. You enjoy all the life of form without demanding something that it just doesn't have.

It cannot give you your identity. It cannot tell you who you are. And you learn to let go easily because you no longer need to cling to these things because somehow your sense of self is connected to them.

And so you can buy a lovely car. And you might say, I'm not attached. I'm just enjoying it for the time being.

Or a bicycle. The strange thing is, for years I had a bicycle that was my main form of transport in England. And I enjoyed it as much.

Now I have a luxury car. Well, it's 10 years old, but it's still luxury. And I enjoy both equally.

Just, I loved that bicycle. And one day I lent it to somebody and it got stolen. I had to let go.

And that was a test. Loving something and appreciating something doesn't mean you need to be attached to it because it has it adds something to you think who you are. It got stolen.

And I knew that was a test when this lady, I was counseling her for spiritual counseling. And she said, Oh, I desperately need a bicycle. Well, I can have mine for a few days.

And a few days later she came and said, Oh, no. I didn't lock it. I bought a cup of coffee and I didn't lock it.

And it was gone. And I knew that moment was my test and my realization. Am I attached or not?

Am I feeling suffering or not? And there was a moment of sadness, but no suffering and then it was gone. And that was fine.

So whether the 10 year old car, I don't know when it gets stolen or scratched by somebody that always tells you when you think you're not attached, you may be fooling yourself. So the enjoyment of things also why not enjoy things if they come into your life, you enjoy things. Are you attached?

Is there self-identification or not? And you may never know it until there's loss or it gets damaged in some way. And if you are attached and that's a beautiful lesson too.

Wow. I didn't realize I was so attached. I've been saying for years I wasn't attached and then I wept when I lost it.

So handle things, enjoy the things of this life. People again without having undue expectations of how people should behave. Most of them have their areas of unconsciousness and they will manifest them sooner or later at work.

The quickest way is experiencing unconsciousness in people is living with them. And you very quickly see, oh that's okay. That's a how it's a human being.

If you demand that everybody should be the Buddha it's not going to happen. So enjoy life, the life of form without self-identification with form and be rooted in essence. That is the ultimate life lesson.

So then you move there's a dance I call it between form and formlessness. You have one foot in the transcendent so to speak and the other in this dimension. And so you don't disappear in the transcendent yet and you don't lose yourself in the form this dimension which includes your mind.

Also the enjoyment of new experiences learning new things using your mind that's all fine you can enjoy all that without feeling that you absolutely need that but you enjoy it when it comes. So it's a dance life is the balance finding the balance between form and formlessness another way of putting it finding the balance between doing and being that's the art of living and now being doesn't necessarily mean sitting still when I say find the balance between doing and being I don't mean part of your life you sit still and the rest of your life you go about your business the balance between doing and being is they flow into each other so even while you're engaged in activities you're not completely lost in the activity if you're completely lost in the activity you're stressed that you're mentally projecting yourself to where you want to be already but you're not there yet so to enjoy an activity is fine but if you lose yourself in it then you lose the being dimension and then life becomes stressful thinking is an activity too, thinking is part of doing and again most humans or those who are not awakening yet are lost in thinking and thinking is a form of doing it's the activity of thought so they're completely lost in thought our civilization as a whole most of it is extremely unbalanced because millions of people are lost in thought, in their minds and are lost in largely useless activities a lot of it is just not very useful but that's fine they are basically lost in doing primarily lost in thinking that's no balance this is why there's so much you don't see how much people suffer psychologically in our so called first world how many millions can only survive with pills or they think they can only survive with have to take this and this in order to not feel too unhappy so that's of vital importance now and this is part of the awakening of consciousness we now come to this balance, I emphasize being because being needs to come in more because everybody's overthinking already, everybody's overdoing and overthinking already that's why I don't talk too much about how to achieve this or that, that has it's place but I leave that to, what's the guy who goes, you can do it Robbins Robbins yeah, I mean that has it's place too, that can be very stimulating for people yeah, yeah you can do it, let's do it go for it, go for it yeah okay, that has it's place but I don't emphasize it because there's so much of that, what the world needs is to come into balance so my focus is on being I'm not saying don't do, doing is great but finding the balance between doing and being, that is the challenge so that you can think without losing yourself in thought and without identifying with thought then by the way thinking becomes much more interesting, thinking becomes much more creative and thinking is a wonderful tool for creating and manifesting but not when it takes you over completely then it's crazy it becomes insane and to a large extent the world is in that level of insanity where they're taken over by the egoic mind look at politics so this is the essence of who you are just pure beautiful presence allow this dimension to come into this world through you as the form in a way the person was a seed and it's time for the seed to give way so that the new consciousness can arise don't wait for things to collapse in your life before you become present don't let the world tell you whether your life is a success or failure because to a large extent the world is insane so how would you want the world to tell you whether you are good enough or a success but I can tell you what success is success is to become a vehicle so to speak for this new consciousness for presence so that you become aligned with the evolutionary impulse of the universe because the universe wants to become more conscious it is in the process of becoming conscious and that's what the universe wants so to be aligned with that is wonderful if you are not aligned with it you suffer much more and that's fine too eventually suffering will awaken you too and that means even those who are not aligned to the purpose of spiritual awakening in some strange way are part of spiritual awakening even those who seem to prevent or trying to prevent spiritual awakening are necessary part of spiritual awakening because that's the obstacles are so important and without them the evolution wouldn't happen when there is a crisis in your life because it will probably come sooner or later to everybody some kind of crisis be very alert so that the crisis does not pull you back into unconsciousness use the crisis like a dimmer switch to turn up the light of presence so when the situation becomes difficult or critical you go oh if you go to a doctor's office and he or she says well you may have 12 more months to live could happen and of course he or she may not be right at all but that's another matter you can go into dreadful suffering and say I need more time I wanted more time please just time more I haven't fulfilled my life is pleasant I need and that's terrible suffering and you're thinking of course overthinking your mind goes wild or you can go there's only this moment and I'm not leaving it because the moment I leave this moment in your mind I suffer so when you're confronted with a crisis that is often the case you will notice when your attention is in the moment you don't suffer you move away from the moment you suffer you can use the crisis, any crisis in your life let's say a breakdown of a relationship marriage start thinking about it allow it to force you into the present moment this is not denying if in the present moment you experience emotional pain you accept that this is what is but it's more likely that less pain will not arise even when you're acutely present I call it the sword of presence like a Japanese sword it cuts through time past, future just now and so this is the narrow path that leads to life I believe Jesus was talking about the present moment the narrow path that leads to life is just walking on the narrow path of now and then of course you are the master the moment you walk on the path of now you are the Zen master if you want to use Zen or any you are the master master is a masculine and feminine term I suppose you are the master by being a master of is a master of presence, that's all the spiritual master doesn't necessarily know more than you I'm sure for example let's say Jesus or the Buddha almost every I mean everybody in this room has more knowledge than the Buddha or Jesus had on the level of knowledge so it's not to do with knowledge it's to do with presence so if you are present and completely aligned with the present moment you are the master the moment you lose the present moment you are no longer the master and then you'll be looking for the master yourself and back into the now so the only difference between you and the great spiritual master under whatever guise is degree of presence it's not knowledge or anything like that degree of presence are you aligned with the present moment do you walk the narrow path of now and you're the master and the personality becomes unimportant it's just enough personality to serve as a vehicle so that you can speak and think you pretend you're still somebody and that's fine for the time being but something else speaks through you something else acts through you and that's the master that's the consciousness so right now at this moment everybody in this room is the zen master and so that's where the expression comes from this is it now whether you're still the master when you leave here it's a different matter only you can know it'll still be the present moment but the question, but can I sustain it and all that is just thought stuff just be responsible for this moment that's all take responsibility for your state of consciousness at this moment that's all, easy let's have just a moment of pure presence before we finish this is it, thank you

Eckhart Tolle Purpose of Existence [3307567a-9cec-44d4-9d89-ad57016f16d9]

Purpose of existence. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions from a live audience on a wide range of topics like how much of our lives are within our control? Can we really plan for the future?

How do we deal with the pain body and also stay conscious? Eckhart says if we align with the present moment and pay attention to our state of consciousness, the future will look after itself. It's only by embracing the here and now that we have an opportunity to live our lives with clarity and purpose.

And we must learn to accept each moment as if we had chosen it. Because you did.

Hello, Eckhart. My question has two parts. I like to know how much of our life is in our control.

And do we really need to plan for the future or just trust what is and have faith that everything happened as it's supposed to happen?

Okay, thank you. It's often that one answer covers several questions. It may even be the universal answer that covers all questions.

In control, well, if you try to control the future of your life, that will be quite frustrating to control what's going to happen. But you can control not so much control, but you can take responsibility for the present moment, your state of consciousness. At this moment, you can pay attention to what your state of consciousness is at this moment.

And you may sometimes find that your state of consciousness at this moment is one of not complete identification with thinking or an emotional movement, but certain identification with thought or form or a dysfunctional state of negativity, dwelling in negativity. But when you realize that it's not totally dysfunctional. If you're really dysfunctional, it means you're totally identified, you don't know it.

In extreme form, the people who are really mad, have no idea that they're mad. If you know that you're mad, you're not completely mad. If you know that you identified with a negative state, it has arisen, let's say you dwelling in fearful thinking about what might happen to you or probably will happen to you or what you're going to lose, or thinking about the past.

And you realize that this is what's happening, then of course, there's already some presence there. And then you can take responsibility and be the awareness rather than be the thought. That's the identification with thought.

And one could almost say identification with presence or awareness, which is who you really are, you are the awareness. So taking responsibility for this moment, get this moment right, which means be one with the isness of this moment, then you're getting it right. So whatever is arising around you, it is as it is.

So there's a non resistance to the isness of this moment. And whenever you live in the state of non resistance, but oneness with the isness, even the isness inside, if an emotion is there, that's what is. But there's also an awareness, you have to accept what is internally or internally, otherwise, you suffer.

So you accept what is you become the space for what is. And that is the only difference between an ordinary human and a spiritual master is that the master is one with the isness of this moment. That's the Zen master, for example, the simplicity of that is just completely at one with whatever is arising.

There's no knowledge in that it's not needed. But whatever need is needed in that state of oneness comes out of that state of oneness. So if you take responsibility for the present moment, that's when the future, of course, looks after itself, because it's no more than another present moment, or the one eternal present moment.

Future as such does not exist, as you well know, because you haven't encountered it ever. Nor has anybody else. There's no such thing as future except as a thought.

Future is a thought. It can't be more than a thought. Otherwise, you would have experienced it somewhere.

It must have come at some point. But it can't because it's future. So there is no future except as a mind form.

When you try to control the future, you're trapped in certain mind forms, not knowing it. And of course, it's impossible. You can't do that.

So you have no control over the future, but you can take responsibility for the present moment. That's the future. The future already looks after itself.

Take no thought for the moral, for the moral will take thought for itself, or something like that, whatever translation you look at. So that was one part. There was another part to your question.

[Speaker 4] (5:40 - 5:44)

Should we trust and have faith that everything happens as it's supposed to happen?

[Speaker 1] (5:45 - 14:53)

Okay. The powerful faith is to trust that whatever is happening now is fine. You trust in the isness because the totality of the universe has brought about the form that this moment takes.

Everything that happens in the universe has innumerable causes. If you try to trace it back, you have to go back to the beginning of all creation. So whatever form this moment takes in your consciousness is there because the totality of the universe has brought about this particular form, which is not going to last.

But at this moment, it has taken this form. And you trust that that's what is. And you don't ask, why is this happening to me?

What did I do to deserve that? Why do bad things always happen to me? It's not fair.

I wish I was somewhere else. I wish I were somebody else. I wish I didn't have to live with these people.

I wish I was doing a different job. Or you can put a sticker on your car. I'd rather be fishing, golfing.

But this I'd rather be is one of the many ways in which the mind denies the present moment and creates suffering out of that. And so all that is a lack of faith. One could use that.

I sometimes say, I probably wrote it somewhere, except each moment as if you had chosen it. Well, each moment really means this moment because there's only ever this one moment. So let's say, except this moment, which is the eternal now, except this moment, as if you had chosen it, that's the state of alignment with the isness of life.

I'm not telling people, well, if this happened to you, you must have chosen it on some level. I'm not telling them that, although it's a new age teaching. It's not perhaps entirely wrong.

But I'm not saying that because I don't want to make them angry. And it's not entirely correct. It's more helpful to say, except it as if you had chosen it, you don't need to convince yourself, okay, I've got this illness.

I chose that. Why? Why?

Why? Or feel extremely guilty, I have failed. I failed deeply.

I must have done something really wrong. After 10 years of meditation, I'm still getting ill. Why?

In some teachings that are otherwise beautiful teachings, they emphasize so much the physical healing aspect that's a little bit unbalanced. And anybody who follows those teachings and then develops some kind of illness immediately feels guilty, which creates another big problem on top of your illness. I'm not good enough.

So we don't need that. All you need is except this moment as if you had chosen it and then see how life develops for you, how life evolves, how life unfolds. If you just practice, you have nothing to lose.

Just say for one day, half a day, okay, I'm just going to try this out. I'll accept whatever arises, whatever comes into my life, any person, any situation, any event, I'll immediately internally be aligned. I'm going to be aligned with it.

And as if I had chosen whatever happens, I'm going to practice that for the next three hours. Now, you may not even succeed for three hours. Well, you probably will, but some people may not.

And then see how you experience life when that is your state of consciousness of acceptance. And you will see an enormous improvement, not only in the way you feel, you will also see an improvement in the way in which things are reflected back to you by other people, you will see an improvement in how other people relate to you. You will even see an improvement, this may not be as immediate in the brain, which events happen around you, if you're in true alignment with what is.

And that's a truly miraculous thing to experience. Now, but for that to have to do a little bit more than two or three hours. But even just to get your taste of it, start with one hour, 10 minutes.

If there's a place that you dislike, let's say, well, I don't know what you dislike a noisy traffic, city scene or supermarket, or the shopping mall. Well, some people love shopping mall. So don't use that wherever it is that you don't like being there.

And then, okay, let's see if I go there and say, I accept this moment as if I had chosen it, this noise, these people, these surroundings, amazing thing to do. And something you'll notice when you do that, the as if practice, your thinking mind slows down. And something opens up that's deeper than thinking awareness.

Because when you have nothing to argue about, there isn't that much to think about. When you're not you don't, you're not in disagreement with the present moment. And your ego gets deflated.

Because you have nothing to complain about. If the ego has nothing to complain about, it goes. And of course, it may react.

Because it notices it's getting weaker. And then suddenly, before you know it, you're going to, oh, I hate this. The ego can come back and grab you again.

But that's fine. It's all part of the practice. So the most powerful thing, of course, is the oneness with the present moment.

Now, a secondary thing that's connected with that is when you do things, work of whatever kind, any action of whatever kind, is not to primarily perform the action as a means to an end. But see if you can be active as an end in itself. So it's not primarily a simple example.

You are walking or driving to the supermarket and do your shopping. The walking or driving is not less important than the arriving at the supermarket. And the walking around the supermarket is not less important than finishing your shopping.

And then arriving back home with your shopping, the journey back home, is not less important. Because that's the old consciousness, the unconsciousness. It's always the next moment is the one that's more important that I need to get to.

But I just need to get this thing out of the way so that I can arrive there. So when you're driving to the supermarket, you need to get the driving out of the way. When you're in the supermarket getting your food, you need to get that out of the way, because you want to already be home.

And when you're driving home, you just need to be home already. And when you're home already, there'll be something else. You want to get this out of the way as quickly as possible, because it's just not fulfilling.

Of course, the next thing is not going to be fulfilling either, because the entire mindset is the present moment is never fulfilling. It's never good enough. The next one is always the better one.

So that means the doing is not a means, not to treat the doing as a means to an end always, but as an end in itself. That's connected with the practice of alignment with the present moment. So it can be, that's the active part of it.

The passive part of it, the seemingly passive part of it is just to embrace the is-ness of whatever is arising in this moment. And that's how you control your life. To the ego, it looks as if your life were completely out of control, but it's not.

[Speaker 4] (14:55 - 15:05)

You know, when you say at every moment, think about it as you have chosen that moment, I'm going to think about it when my teenage son's arguing with me next time, if that helps me.

[Speaker 1] (15:05 - 15:06)

Yes, yes.

[Speaker 2] (15:07 - 15:59)

Thank you. Hi Eckhart. So I've been studying acting for the last little while, and I understand how presence is important in acting and any kind of creativity, how that's connected.

But many acting teachers talk about drawing on past memories of painful experiences to bring forth authentic emotional expression when it's needed in a scene during a performance. So in a way, it's like they're calling on their pain body sort of to fulfill this creative need. So my question is, what is your perspective on voluntarily revisiting memories of past pain for the purpose of seeking authenticity in the art of acting?

[Speaker 1] (15:59 - 20:09)

Oh, okay. Thanks. Well, usually, I don't recommend visiting the past.

But there are some practices that can temporarily be helpful. One is now, for the time being, I'm a little, I won't talk about acting until the second part of my answer. I didn't know that until I said it.

Some people have a very heavy pain body that takes them over the past pain body, as most of you know, I call the accumulation of past pain that still lives in you in latent or manifested form. Some people's pain body is so heavy that they cannot stay aware when it becomes so suddenly that it's impossible for them to stay aware as it explodes into their lives, especially anger, which can, some people come so suddenly that it takes them over and they lose presence immediately. And they wake up whenever that wave of anger has subsided and say, Oh, what was that?

It's gone. Well, they were totally in the grip of it. And for those people, I would sometimes recommend to relive in their mind a past episode that something that made them angry and then experience the arising of the emotional field.

And because it's not the actual situation, but a reliving of the situation, it won't be quite as powerful as the actual situation, but powerful enough for you to practice staying present as the awareness in the background while the energy arises. And that can be a very helpful practice for those who otherwise cannot stay present. So if you can do that by reliving a past episode of total loss of awareness, they can then stay aware while that happens.

And then perhaps there may be enough awareness next time, still a remnant of awareness, even though it probably will still be happening. In the case of acting, that would be a similar thing, but you would be doing it for a different reason. You have to see whether you can relinquish that energy when you've come to the end of the acting.

If it stays with you for a long period of time, or you notice that you enter certain negative moods after you've done your acting, which stay with you for hours or days, then I would say it's not worth doing that. Then there may be another way of generating that emotion rather than visiting the past in you. If it can be relinquished as soon as you don't need it anymore, then it could work.

It could even help you with the awareness practice. If you voluntarily, consciously evoke a past emotion, which then of course is no longer a past emotion, it becomes a present emotion. Whether or not there is another way of generating the emotion you need in acting, I don't know.

I haven't done any acting. You have to find out for yourself whether you can so completely believe perhaps in the situation that you're acting out, which by the way is just like normal life. If you can so completely believe in the script that whatever it is you're acting out, and you're so completely in it that that situation itself, that of course is the script, is making you angry because you're so in it, perhaps you don't need to revisit the past.

I don't know. I don't know whether I could generate anger if I tried acting. I don't know how I would do it.

So I may try it. I'll let you know what happens. Let's see what could I remember.

[Speaker 2] (20:12 - 20:24)

There's also the reverse where an acting teacher I was listening to said that you could imagine a possibility of something happening that would be devastating to generate that kind of an emotion.

[Speaker 1] (20:24 - 21:17)

Yes. Yes, that's right. And again, you have to be careful to see whether that lingers in your energy field after the acting for a long period of time, which is not good.

If you're in the grip of a negative mood after acting in some drama, let's say, and you stay, you find yourself being in a negative mood for days afterwards or weeks, then you'll have to see how you can cleanse through meditation practice, through awareness practice, or some other means, perhaps including some physical practice, combining some physical activity with presence, so that you can cleanse yourself immediately afterwards.

[Speaker 2] (21:17 - 21:23)

Yeah, maybe using those strategies is okay. But only if you your primary one is presence first.

[Speaker 1] (21:24 - 21:26)

Yes, yes. Yes.

[Speaker 5] (21:27 - 21:49)

Yes. Thank you. Hi, Eckhart.

I have a sibling who is struggling with paranoid thoughts and delusions and he doesn't think there's anything wrong. So he doesn't want help. And I want to know what I can do if there's anything I can do to help him.

[Speaker 1] (21:49 - 30:28)

Yeah. Perhaps this answer also has two parts. I have a little bit of personal experience because I also had a close relative who suffered from what is usually called paranoia.

I see it as just an intensification of normal egoic state, it becomes much more intense so that you see that it's actually madness, a form of madness. It begins in normal egoic state as suspecting other people's motives. What does he really want of me?

Often projecting negative intentions onto other people when they aren't there at all. Looking suspiciously at strangers that you meet, suspicious about where you are. These are still considered quite normal.

And I could see that because this person, my relative, I observed her for a few years when she was still considered normal. But I already was aware of they have very strong ego, always suspecting others of not being honest and so on. There was always that looking out.

But that was quite normal. Many people have that. They're just distrustful of life and other people.

And then after a few years, I was no longer living there. But I came for a visit and realized by then she had gone further and had actually already been taken to a mental home and then come out again, and then had very strong delusions, total misinterpretations of life around her. And then whenever I visited, then I would be with her.

And whenever I saw her, I could feel myself going into an intensified state of presence whenever I was with her. And she was telling me about what was going on, mostly fantasies. And I could see the enormous amount of fear that was the basis of her state.

There was so much fear in her that her mind, and this I believe is the basis of especially what is called paranoia, which always sees a threat somewhere. Her mind attempted to interpret the fear that she felt, which comes from the state of disconnectedness from being, the state of ego. And the mind attempting to understand and explain this fear had to find some explanation for it.

So it created some external explanation because it needed to explain it. This is, by the way, also how many dreams happen in that way. We believe often that the dream, let's say we are dreaming of some monster is trying to devour us and we are in panic.

We believe that the dream causes the panic. But in many cases, perhaps all cases, the feeling causes the dream. And so that happens in a dream.

And that can also happen in paranoia. And by the way, that is also in so-called normal consciousness. An element of that is present also in normal consciousness of attempting explanations for bad feelings, instead of facing the feelings directly, trying to find some explanation of why I feel this.

So something you can do is not actually a doing, is to just listen to him in intense presence. So that there mustn't be a single thought in your head, especially not a single emotion. Because if there's an emotion in you, this heavy emotional entity will get in there immediately and grab onto the emotion.

And once more of that, especially any reaction or deny what he's saying. Of course, the moment you deny something, you become part of it. So that all that doesn't work.

Nor do you need to agree to simply total openness. If you spend more time with him, if you can bring intense presence into your interaction with him, your relationship with him, that may be a help, because it could awaken that awareness in him. If he can see that there's something that is delusional, even in a moment of a glimpse of lucidity, then perhaps the awareness can slowly grow in him.

There's no guarantee, but it's something that is a beautiful thing to do, if you want to call it doing. It's good for you, and it's good for him. Second part of the answer is, and it's not easy, but in some cases, you need to allow other humans to go through their karmic suffering.

You do what you can, and there's always a limit to what you can do. And beyond that, there needs to come an acceptance. It's the same kind of acceptance that you would practice in your own, if something were happening to you, as something difficult to bear, what used to be called in medieval Christianity, they called it the cross.

You have to bear your own. Everybody has their cross, and in some people's crosses are very heavy. So you can bring complete acceptance, and this applies to not to you, it applies to sometimes parents who can see that their teenage sons or daughters are doing dangerous and mad things.

They do all they can, but there is a limit. You can't put them into prison. You can't lock the door.

So there's a limit to what you can do. Beyond that, there needs to come to break an acceptance. Every human has his or her own learning process, and there are enormous differences in the way in which humans learn and grow.

So you also may have to do it with your parents. Your parents may be deeply in the grip of ego. They may disapprove of who you are.

Again, acceptance. All have their own learning process. It's particularly hard if you see somebody close to you.

You can see they're making dreadful mistakes, and you can see that they're going to suffer through that, but it's also true that making mistakes is one of the most important things that a human being can do in their growth. Without making mistakes, nothing much would happen. Creating conflict.

Something must go wrong in your life. As you know, without something going wrong, there's no movie. You can't watch a movie and nothing goes wrong.

Who would want to see that? So while life, I mean, every movie you see, if you go to the very, down to the very basics of the movies, means, well, there are these people, and then something goes wrong. Otherwise, nobody would pay money to watch something not going wrong.

And life in its present evolutionary state is similar, although we are moving out of that, but many humans are still in that. And the wrong is not wrong. It's just, we call it wrong.

And there comes a deepening through suffering and to learning. So we don't know what his path is, but I would suggest that you, whenever you are with him, you make it into very intense presence. That's the most beautiful gift you can give him, is the gift of your presence.

And the gift of your presence may draw forth his presence also. But that's not the main thing. It's just, you're just offering the gift.

[Speaker 5] (30:28 - 30:31)

Thank you, Eckhart. That was very helpful. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (30:31 - 48:38)

Do I have to give up wearing makeup in order to reach enlightenment? The question that may be concerned about being identified with externals, external appearance. The problem is not the makeup or the clothes that you wear, but the question is, where your sense of identity, your sense of self comes from.

Is it derived primarily from the way you look, which would include makeup, it would include the shape of your body, which would include the clothes that you wear. If that is the basis for your sense of identity, then would I recommend that you wear old clothes, remove your makeup, or do something to the shape of your body? No, these things are just externals.

The identification is the problem. So where do you derive your sense of who you are, your sense of I, your sense of self? Where does that come from?

Does it come from the way you look, or does it come from a deeper place within yourself? Does it come from thoughts, that things you tell yourself about yourself, or does it come from a deeper place that is beyond thought? What really matters is going to the deeper place where you realize that who you essentially are is not the form, the external form, nor even the psychological form of the me structure, which consists of thoughts, but the consciousness that's behind all that.

You are the awareness, you are the stillness, you are the presence. And once you know that, then you can play around in the world of form and wear makeup or not wear makeup. It makes no difference.

You can wear nice clothes or you can wear any kind of clothes. It doesn't make any difference. You may still want to wear nice clothes without being identified.

It's perfectly fine. You won't be obsessed anymore. There's a difference between enjoying and obsessing.

So it's not the externals that matter. It matters where your sense of I comes from. So if your sense of I comes from identification with form, it will lead to more suffering because your external form is going to deteriorate.

Oh, you didn't know that? Well, it's maybe not taught at school, but the external form gradually deteriorates. And so no matter how much makeup you use, it eventually can't be hidden anymore that it deteriorates.

And that's fine. And if you had not been identified with the form, it wouldn't matter that much. Actually, it's quite a pleasant thing even to watch how gradually you can hold a photo of yourself next to a mirror.

Oh, that was me 15 years ago, 20 years ago. Oh. And that's not frightening.

If your sense of who you are comes from a place of the formless consciousness, it's very peaceful. And you can even then allow the gradual decay. Really, that's what it is of the form to happen.

It's still be very peaceful. You become more peaceful. So where does your sense of self come from?

That is the question. The makeup is not the problem or the clothes. What do you think of the Occupy Wall Street movement?

Could this be a vehicle for real change in human consciousness? Several people have asked that. Of course, Occupy Wall Street is now, as I spread, of course, to many other places, not just Wall Street.

It's now called the Occupy Movement. It was even in Vancouver. And in a little corner there, there were a few Buddhist monks meditating.

And a reporter came and asked them, what are you doing here? And they said, we are occupying the present moment. And of course, that's part of the answer.

The movement prerequisite for the success of whatever that is, because I probably don't quite know what success means yet, because they're not focused on actually what exactly it is that they want. The prerequisite for success would be that the participants occupy the present moment. That is the basis.

And perhaps some of them do. They are, perhaps some of them are there. We see structures in this world that have been created by the ego, the egoic ignorance, the egoic consciousness.

And many of them are not capable of change, not true change. And true change wants to happen in this world, because there is a change in consciousness. But the old structures, which includes the politicians, the political structures, all those that are there in place, they are not capable of changing.

This has also happened to a large extent to many religious structures. A lot of the, to a large extent, the awakening of the spiritual awakening of humans that is happening on the planet, especially in certain parts of the planet, much more than others, most of it is not happening through the existing structures of the old religions, but outside of the old structures. Some of it, if the structures are not too rigid, some of the old structures may be able to become vehicles for change also.

There may be some Christian churches that are capable of that, of also being vehicles for the awakening. Some Buddhists and other religions, Sufis perhaps, then they are, but a lot of it is happening outside these structures. It's an embryonic movement, whether it grows into something larger or whether it remains for a while on the mental level as a mental thing and then grows into something else.

But I do feel certain that many movements for change are going to happen outside the existing structures. And this perhaps could be a beginning of that, of embryonic beginning of change that's happening outside the structures. Although because I say embryonic, because it's still almost unformed yet, they don't know exactly, it's not focused on anything specific.

There's just a general sense not yet, hasn't clearly taken form yet, which is fine because everything needs to be an organic growth to that. Yes, it could lead to something much bigger and other movements could arise inspired by that and then bring about change outside of the existing structures and even bring about collapse of certain existing structures, which would not be a bad thing. Although many of the existing structures are actually going to bring about their own collapse, but that's a different matter.

The banking system and so on, they are very busy bringing about their own collapse. So the danger is that because the egoic consciousness is still floating around in the collective, of course, the danger is that some of these movements get hijacked by, again, by the old consciousness. Although the impulse for it is a different state of consciousness, it's non-violent change.

So there's always the danger when that happens that the ego takes over again and perverts it. We have to just accept that that is a danger. It may not happen because there's a fairly widespread awakening on the planet.

So on the whole, I feel it's a good and inevitable thing. And we'll have to see where it goes, what it grows into, or whether something totally different will arise somewhere else. But yes, change outside of the structures is definitely happening.

And if you feel drawn to participation in some kind of movement, that's a good thing. The important thing, of course, is that you occupy the present moment while you participate so that you don't lose yourself in egoic reaction, that you can embody that state of the state of presence. And so it's not only you, it spreads from one individual, spreads in the same way that an unconscious individual can draw others into unconsciousness.

It's amazing when you can have a group of people discussing something, and one person is deeply unconscious, and five minutes later, everybody is shouting. But in a similar way, it can also happen that out of five people, one person is present, and the entire energy field of the group can be elevated into greater presence. So it can go either way.

Is Facebook an externalized form of the ego? It certainly bears enormous similarities, or is it just another vehicle which the ego has hijacked? Well, of course, to a large extent, what you see, of course, is the ego, because the majority of humans are still in the egoic consciousness.

And every human presents, as far as I can see, on Facebook presents an image of themselves that they have, and that's their page or whatever it is, the image that to them looks good. And of course, the ego is having an image of who you are. It's the Narcissus, the myth of Narcissus, who looked into a pool of water and saw his own image, and then became enamored with himself, or rather obsessed with himself.

Oh, it's me, me. This is me. Now, then you have an inner image, me, conceptual, then you have ideas and opinions about me.

It's me. And then you have the moment your identity is in the me, then of course, you inflict the same opinions on others. You are that.

So the Facebook, you see the image of who they want to present to the world. I have a Facebook page, and I have once a week or so, I have a posting. Now, I must admit, I have an inner blockage, it seems to, I still don't understand how exactly it works.

So I have to send it to somebody in our office, my contribution, and he puts it onto my Facebook page. And he tried to explain it to me. One day I will learn it.

But I do look up sometimes the comments that people make after I post something. Some are totally weird, but some are... But also many are quite lovely that people are touched, they feel their life is changing.

So there's a, there are more lovely ones than weird ones. And it's wonderful to see the feedback and see how people's lives are changing. And all they say, this is exactly what I needed to hear today.

Thank you so much. And that's beautiful. So here we are using the Facebook, not in the service of ego, but in the service of taking humans beyond ego.

There may not be anything inherently egoic in Facebook or on the internet, it could be used to amplify the ego and it can probably also be used to help in the awakening. So far, probably to a large part of it is ego, but potentially it can be part of the awakening also. Not getting drawn into the electronic media as an addiction, there's a danger there.

That it can stimulate the mind to such an extent that it becomes addictive, even more addictive than watching television. And so I know of people who, youngsters who spend hours every day, can't get away from the screen. What's the next thing?

And the next, and the next, and the next. So it's not all bad news. I asked earlier, somewhat humorously, whether there is perhaps a universal answer that answers all questions.

And of course, the universal answer that answers all questions is stillness. And it is spreading stillness that is in you now, right there, where you're not thinking, present. It's spreading in this world.

It's getting into all kinds of places where I would have thought, no way. Stillness, of course, is only a word. Stillness is the dimension where thought is transcended, where the person is transcended.

And if you haven't found the transcendence, you have missed the mark in this lifetime, which means the purpose of human existence. The purpose of human existence is not eating well, sense pleasure. There's nothing wrong with eating well.

There's nothing wrong with sense pleasure. It's not the purpose of human existence. The purpose of human existence is not comfort.

There's nothing wrong with comfort, but it's not the purpose of human existence. The purpose of human existence is evolutionary. It's awakening.

One could say to become fully human. We could say that most humans have not yet arrived at being fully human, if you want to use those terms. If you want to use different terms, you can say we are now transcending the human.

It doesn't matter. It's the same thing. Fully human, yes, that's already, I believe, Chinese philosopher Confucius already spoke about becoming more fully human.

So it's been, it started a long time ago, Buddha and so on, many teachings, becoming fully human so that we no longer create hell on earth. If you're fully human, you don't create hell anymore around you and in your mind. So that's the purpose.

And it doesn't mean that you're free of challenges. All the challenges that you encounter are helpful in awakening. So we can be grateful for whatever it is that happens in your life when things go wrong, as they tend to do.

So then the primary factor then is consciousness in your life. The rest is details. As Einstein said, I want to know the mind of God.

The rest is details. And the rest, the details in your, if you apply that to your life, is all the details of your life situation. Whatever happens, has happened, will happen, is happening, all those details of your life situation.

But what's the mind of God? What does he mean? Consciousness.

The primary factor is consciousness. That's who you are essentially, which what Jesus called the light of the world. Consciousness.

You are consciousness. You are formless, you are timeless. And knowing that, as having that as the basis of your life, that's awakening and that's the purpose of your life.

What you do externally is secondary. The question is, are you awakening as you do whatever you do? And as whatever happens, happens.

It doesn't matter whether you are in a VIP or doing something menial, it's secondary to as far as the arising of consciousness, the awakening is concerned.

[Speaker 3] (48:47 - 49:06)

I'm Oprah Winfrey, and you've been listening to Eckhart Tolle, Essential Teachings, the podcast. You can follow these essential teachings on Spotify or wherever you listen to podcasts. If you haven't yet, go to Spotify and follow this podcast.

Join us next week for more enlightened teachings from Eckhart Tolle. Thank you for listening.

Eckhart Tolle Reaching the Depths of Our Being [1d3c8ee5-aac4-40e9-9cec-6b3978539494]

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:49)

Reaching the depths of our being. In this episode, Eckhart answers questions from a woman seeking insights for her sister, who recently was diagnosed with a mental disorder. She wants to know how Eckhart views the diagnosis within the context of his teachings, asking, could there be a silver lining?

Eckhart says while dysfunction may be present, he cautions against using labels. He also shares that he believes that many mental illnesses are normal human behavior, which has been exaggerated by the ego. The solution, he believes, is to remain rooted in awareness whenever possible.

With practice, he believes we could avoid acting out unconscious patterns. Eckhart explains there is reason for hope. A path to healing can begin even in the midst of life's most challenging circumstances.

[Speaker 1] (0:52 - 0:59)

Welcome, everybody. Wonderful to be with you in the present moment.

[Speaker 3] (1:04 - 1:11)

Become aware, be aware of not so much of your existence.

[Speaker 1] (1:13 - 1:24)

You exist as a person, but beyond existence, there's a being. Existence is that which manifests here.

Become aware that you are. Become aware that you are aware. One could say, become aware of yourself.

Not the usual self, not the historical self, but the invisible, the deeper being that you are, the consciousness. When we put it in language, mistakes creep in very easily. So when I say become aware that you are aware, there's already a mistake in that, because the assumption, if I say that, would be that there's you and the awareness.

[Speaker 1] (2:21 - 2:39)

And you become aware of the awareness. Language creates that duality. So when I say become aware of yourself or become aware of awareness, there's a duality there in language, which is not there in actuality.

[Speaker 3] (2:40 - 3:02)

In actuality, the awareness that you are becomes aware of itself. Consciousness becomes aware of itself. That's what it means.

Because in essence, you are consciousness.

[Speaker 1] (3:05 - 3:49)

Nowadays, you often read things, or people speak about raising the awareness. You hear that quite often in popular media and so on. Now, it's always nothing wrong with that, but it's always to do with raising the awareness about something, which may be a good thing.

You raise the awareness about nature, the importance of living in harmony with raising awareness of certain issues. They may be real, they may be imaginary, whatever. You raise the awareness of this.

This is not what we are talking about here, because it's not the awareness of something else.

[Speaker 3] (3:50 - 4:00)

It's awareness itself. So it's to sense the being of you, I am.

[Speaker 1] (4:04 - 4:21)

The more you sense that, the more you become liberated from the person, which otherwise occupies your consciousness completely, and it becomes kind of dream-like existence. You live in and through the person with its narrative.

[Speaker 3] (4:23 - 4:28)

And then the person continues to be there, but there's something deeper.

[Speaker 1] (4:30 - 4:43)

My favorite analogy, as you know, is the ocean and the ripple. The person is the ripple on the surface of the ocean, and you are the ocean.

[Speaker 3] (4:43 - 4:51)

You're also the ripple, but the ripple is the ocean. It's just a temporary ripple appearance.

[Speaker 1] (4:53 - 5:11)

And so the essence of all this, the realization of that lies in finding the ability within yourself to realize the space that is beyond thinking, to be able to come to a cessation of the stream of thinking.

[Speaker 3] (5:13 - 5:19)

For example, now, there's nothing to think about.

[Speaker 1] (5:19 - 5:34)

What have I just said? What am I saying? You can't figure out what it means by thinking about it at all.

There's no need to add any thought to this moment, but you're fully here. You're fully present.

[Speaker 3] (5:35 - 5:50)

So the ability to be present without the interference of thought is vital. That is the arising of the unconditioned consciousness that is the ocean.

[Speaker 1] (5:53 - 6:31)

And then as you become more rooted in the awareness, that dimension, the transcendent dimension, you can even think. You continue to think without losing yourself in this unconscious thinking. Unconscious thinking means you become completely identified with a stream of thinking.

Your identity, your sense of self is then in the thinking, in the thoughts. You've lost yourself. You are lost, or you've come back to become unconscious again, spiritually speaking, unconscious.

[Speaker 3] (6:33 - 6:49)

So you can use your mind and yet not lose yourself in the mind. That's the key. That's the art of living, of lucid living.

[Speaker 1] (6:49 - 8:35)

The art of lucid dreaming is not that important. It's a nice experiment, but one of the main things is lucid living so that you can continue participating in this world of form without, yes, appreciating it, of course. You don't deny it.

You don't need to deny it or condemn it. You appreciate it for what it is. You appreciate its beauty, its aliveness.

And it doesn't have that absolute seriousness anymore that otherwise is there when the world is a place of enormous promise, which is a promise that the world can never keep, and a world of enormous disappointment. If that's all there is in your life, in the absence of the transcendent dimension, there's always a promise of the next moment in whatever form the next moment comes. And then it lets you down.

And then there's another promise, and for a while it's great, and then it lets you down again. And you get quite a few highs for a while. Well, yeah, yeah, that's it.

Oh no, that wasn't it. So in the absence of the transcendent dimension, every situation, every person, every attainment turns out to be kind of disappointing ultimately, or even creates suffering.

[Speaker 3] (8:38 - 8:46)

So you know all that. I'm just reminding you. Let's see what the first question is.

[Speaker 2] (8:48 - 9:59)

Hi, I'm very excited to be here and to be asking you my question in person. Thank you, Eckhart. My question, my twin sister was recently diagnosed with disassociative identity disorder.

Which is otherwise known as multiple personality disorder. We both never knew until now, and neither did our family, her husband, or children. My confusion over this is immense.

There is maybe something beautiful here in this. I do not know. I'm wondering if you may be able to help me understand what it is, and what it means within the context of your teachings.

I was very much like you until I encountered the power of now. I was diagnosed with generalized anxiety disorder in my early 20s, which I was told was a disassociative disorder. I no longer have this diagnosis.

My sister's challenges are just beginning. I'm very open and eager to hear your particular and unique perspective on this subject.

[Speaker 3] (10:01 - 10:04)

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (10:05 - 10:28)

I just wanted to ask you one or two questions before I answer. The symptoms, did the family notice any symptoms before the diagnosis was given by the doctor? Did your family notice anything strange in her behavior?

[Speaker 5] (10:28 - 10:43)

Well, no. Nothing that we would attribute to that. Certain inconsistencies, maybe lying, not being truthful, following through with what she said she would do.

[Speaker 2] (10:43 - 11:05)

She and I never got along just for varying reasons. Dissociative disorder is a highly avoided way of approaching the world. The family also was very much that too.

Even if they noticed things, it was avoided, not talked about, not addressed by anyone.

Right. Right. Good.

Thank you. Yeah. I do not doubt that there is a certain dysfunction there.

One needs to be careful with labels. These health professionals, mental health professionals, they were very generous with their labeling people and conditions. We need to be careful with that because then we immediately create a mental image of that person.

From then on, we look at that person through the mental label that has been created. We need to be careful with that. Although I'm not denying that there certainly will be a dysfunction.

The ego is dysfunctional. It's just a question of what degree of dysfunction there is in the ego. This condition, which is called, traditionally was called multiple personality disorder.

Like many so-called pathological conditions, they are an amplified form of ego that already exists in a milder form as part of normal egoic human behavior. For example, I'll come back to multiple personality in a second, but you can take any condition. You can take paranoia, for example, which of course can be a very serious mental disorder, but that many traits of paranoia already exist in the so-called normal human consciousness.

It's, for example, a tendency in quite a few human beings to always easily suspect hidden motives in what people do and say. You suspect what is their real motive. They always suspect that they're talking behind your back.

They're talking about me behind my back. They're always being kind of fearful of people and the intentions of people. This is still normal egoic dysfunction in many, many people.

At that level, it is not diagnosed as anything pathological. It's just a normal, very distrustful person. Behind the distrust, of course, the reason for the distrust is a sense of an underlying fear.

So, that manifests as a distrust of you mustn't trust people. When that becomes more pronounced, the mind develops a narrative that this person has very evil intentions towards me, and it's not only one person, several people. In fact, the whole city is after me now.

It can become amplified, and then it's easily recognized as pathological. It was already pathological even in its milder forms, but it wasn't recognized as such. It was kind of one of the many ways in which the ego manages to be dysfunctional.

Multiple personality disorder, again, in the absence of awareness, many, many humans, they have different clusters of reaction and behavior that become activated or triggered in certain situations or by certain people. So, when these humans are confronted with a certain person or encounter, find themselves in a certain situation, a different reaction, a different response suddenly manifests through them, which is in psychology sometimes called sub-personality. There's another personality that suddenly arises.

So, many, many humans have a mild form of different clusters of conditioning arising at different times. So, there are sub-personalities. A very strong one, for example, is when somebody suddenly gets taken over by the pain body.

So, the pain body is a huge sub-personality that exists in many, many humans, and it's not normally called multiple personality disorder, but it's basically the same thing. So, the pain body comes in and takes you over, and then you suddenly become a completely different person for a while. You were such a lovely, nice guy, always friendly, or a woman or whatever, and suddenly there's a monster there.

What happens? Well, the pain body could also be considered as a sub-personality that takes you over, but it doesn't have to be pain body. It can be other ways where suddenly people revert to childish reactions or responses in certain situations.

They suddenly become whiny and oh, poor me, whatever sub-personality has taken them over. So, what is still regarded as normal egoic dysfunction can, when it becomes more pronounced, it is then recognized as pathological, as very different clusters of behaviors that suddenly take over. There's no clear dividing line between what's still considered normal and what is pathological.

It's a spectrum. So, for the person who realizes that they have this condition, whether it's in a more pronounced form that's called pathological or a person who realizes that they behave very differently in certain situations, the first thing is to recognize it. Do you recognize it in yourself that this is what happens?

That is already an enormous gain in consciousness, to recognize that this from time to time happens to you. I don't know whether in the case of your sister, she is able to recognize that this, when the doctor told her that is the diagnosis, whether she recognizes that there may be some, there probably is some truth to it, although I'm not fond of these labels, but there may be, there's probably some truth to it, that the question is, is she able to recognize that there is some truth to it, that sometimes she manifests behavior that is different from other times when it's completely different behavior. So, that's a vital thing.

So, to the realization that this happens to you sometimes. Now, in the absence of presence or awareness, almost every human being has some form of subpersonalities, even they may be very mild, but almost every human being has some certain behavior changes between situations or dealing with different people triggered by this or that. The key to transcendence, transcending this, is the ability to observe your inner states.

The ability to observe your inner states. That is the beginning of being able to transcend subpersonalities. And that is by the, it's so important to grow in awareness or presence, because awareness is that which is able to observe what goes on inside you.

And if then you get taken over by a certain behavior pattern, which we could call personality, then at least in that moment, you know that that's what's happening. Then there's still somebody, even you may not immediately be able to stop it. It may still be happening.

For example, in the case of the pain body, you may not immediately be able to stop the pain body, but you may be able to be aware that the pain body has arisen in you and that it is thinking and speaking through you and reacting and creating drama or participating in drama. And you know it's happening. That's an enormous gain in consciousness to know that this is happening.

So as the awareness grows, the ability of these, whatever the subpersonality may be, to take you over completely diminishes. Gradually, it may not disappear all at once. Probably won't, but you never know.

But you don't lose yourself completely in them anymore. There remains an awareness. So the awareness provides a unifying field of factors.

Because awareness means as you become more aware, your identity shifts more and more. And you recognize your true identity as being the awareness rather than whatever behavior is meant, whatever thoughts arise, emotional reactions arise. You're the awareness.

So the key is, I don't know whether how you would explain this to your sister or how you can help her with that. The key is, however, as I said, be aware of what's going, what is going on inside you at any given moment. Be aware of what's happening.

Then that gradually will bring about an end of the dysfunction. The awareness is the key. I believe your sister has a mild form of multiple personality disorder.

It is not a severe form of multi-personality disorder. That is a very debilitating and serious condition. But even there, awareness is still a possibility.

It is a possibility for the person to become aware. And that's why it's also so important to practice some form of meditation or to practice inner body awareness so that the presence, you grow in presence power, so to speak. The presence grows in you.

So the presence can no longer, the awareness, the presence, can then no longer be obscured by whatever the condition is, what we call sub-personality. And for a while, it may still play itself out, but it no longer has this enormous power behind it that cannot take you over completely anymore. And that also means, this is important for everybody because as I said, it's not just this dysfunction.

It's not just something that we need to be concerned with when it becomes pathological. It's almost everybody's, almost everybody will manifest some form of that dysfunction as long as there's not a sufficient presence, not sufficient awareness. So the key is there.

Now, how you are going to help your sister exactly, I don't know. It depends what you communicate with her, but if somehow maybe some intuitively the right words may come to you that may help her so that she can recognize that she has the ability to be aware. She does not to become whatever arises, be aware of what arises.

That's the key. And that applies to everybody, of course, so that you don't, you're not many different people. Again, a mood can, many people can become a moody.

Now, one day they're great, another day they're in a bad mood. And then that determines what they think, what they speak. They are possessed by this bad mood.

And again, it's like a completely different person. I noticed that when I, a long time ago, I lived in a community with, in a house with 10 people or 12, I can't remember. And with quite a few people, I noticed you never knew who was going to, or the breakfast room, we were having breakfast and everybody had their bedrooms were upstairs.

And when you heard the steps coming down and you never knew what particular version of this person was coming downstairs into the breakfast room, who is he or she going to be today? A lovely, light, very spiritual person, or somebody who's, oh, don't talk to me, don't want to know. And again, the recognition of inner states is the key.

At least if people, let's say you're taken over by a bad mood. Okay, there's already, there's a very slight gain in consciousness. If you can, if you're able to say, don't talk to me today, I'm in a bad mood.

Well, at least there's something, at least, you know, you're in a bad mood. Because if you were totally unconscious, you would, 100% of you would become the bad mood. And you would probably even deny that you're in a bad mood because you're, in whatever way you interpret the world through the veil of the bad mood, to you would become the reality.

And so, even to say, I'm in a bad mood, better don't talk to me. Okay, at least you know it. That's already a gain in consciousness.

And then the next step is not being forced to act it out, so that you can feel the energy of it, but you remain, there's an awareness behind it. And so, gradually your identity is no longer in the arising states. They are still there, but the more fundamentally, your sense of identity is in the awareness, that remains rooted in the awareness.

And then yes, let's be, let's, I use the word rooted. Let's say, to use the analogy of a plant, a plant has roots in the soil, so the roots, if the roots are deep enough in the soil, then the outer condition of the plant, it may be very stormy or windy, and the plant is tossed about in the wind or the storm, but the roots are there, and the plant is firmly rooted there, and that this doesn't matter that much anymore, whatever happens here. But if the roots are not deep enough in the soil, then the winds come and the plants get uprooted and destroyed.

Similar analogy, of course, one of my favorite parables of Jesus, where it talks about a man who is, the man who is going to build a house, and he builds a house on the sand, and the winds come and the storms come, and the rain comes, and because the house is built on the sand, it's swept away. And then another man, before building a house, digs deep, that's what he says in this parable, the man digs deep until he reaches the rock, the foundation, and then he builds the house on the rock, and then the storm comes, the floods come, the wind come, and the house remains standing because it is deeply rooted on the rock. Now, in this parable, the rock is that state of consciousness, of rootedness in being, and then whatever happens in the outer world, because that rootedness in being is a transcendent dimension.

It's not even part of this dimension. The consciousness is not even really part of this dimension. So here, you're rooted in being, and then what conditions, outer conditions still, yes, they change, isn't that?

And perhaps even you, still for a while, you're different people in different situations, but less so, there's more, you become a more reliable person, you're no longer, from day to day, you're no longer a different personality, or from hour to hour, according to the outer situation. Another one, of course, is, I mean, if just one could give many examples, many people differ in the way in which they relate, depending on who they're talking to. So if you're talking to somebody high up, somebody famous, or wealthy, or whatever, or powerful, you talk to them in a particular way, and then you talk to somebody else who is just, has a lowly, low social status, he's just, and the way in which you talk to that person is different from the way in which you talk.

And then again, you have different personalities, it's a milder form of, everybody does it, but there's something, as you become more rooted in presence, the way in which you talk to, it depends what you regard valuable in your mind, the way in which you talk to the Dalai Lama would be the same way in which you talk to the person who is cleaning your floor, there would be no difference. Or if you're not a spiritual person, the way in which you talk to, I suppose, the richest man in the world, whoever that is at the moment, the way in which you talk to him, then would be different, you meet him on a social occasion, and then there's somebody else who is serving you the drinks. Is there a difference in which the way in which you talk to this person or the person who's serving you the drinks, then there's a role playing, you're a different person there and another person there.

The more you're rooted in awareness, you speak and relate to everybody in exactly the same way, that's the same, and you honor everybody, everybody's presence, no matter what their outer position is in this world, that's a good sign. So it's all self-observation is the key, and awareness will free you from the conditioning of your mind, so in whatever way you can convey that to your sister, only you can know that, maybe you can introduce her to inner body awareness, that's a very good start. So that's really all I can say at the moment, I wish you and your sister well, and as she becomes more aware, also your relationship will become closer again, I'm sure of that.

[Speaker 2] (30:44 - 32:01)

It's been a beautiful thing to watch for me to have been immersed in your teachings for the last 15 years or more, and then to see how that is very instrumental in helping, I see fluidity between the parts, even just speaking to her, and through my awareness and a total acceptance of her, but whatever is showing up, no matter what the symptom is, she will start to talk about fluidity between the parts, oh, a vague remembrance of this, and I can see that it's really is just a compartmentalized, compartmentalization is just the teachings have been essential in how I'm approaching her, and it's a beauty, I think there's more beauty in it to be seen, and I'm more hopeful than anything, but it certainly is a challenge, and thank you for all your teachings on being willing to embrace challenges, because for me, for the last 10 years, that was my issue, and so now I'm seeing that the freedom really is in embracing the challenge, yes, this is just another one, really I'm very thankful for you.

[Speaker 3] (32:01 - 32:02)

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Real Change Begins with Our State of Consciousness [e69ba6de-8dfc-4b29-b325-5295424845fd]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:40)

Real change begins with our state of consciousness. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience. He says the most important thing we can do is to transform our state of consciousness, to realize our connection to the Source, and let go of our self-imposed limitations.

He compares the transcendent realm to the sun. We are like a ray from that Source, shining into this world. Everyone on the planet, he says, is a brief flicker of consciousness.

Here for a short time, but connected to the eternal.

[Speaker 1] (0:41 - 30:39)

The main focus here is transforming your life. Whatever else happens when you live from a deeper state is secondary. And so one could even say that as you rest in that power, there's a book called The Power of Now.

I just remembered. So you rest. That is the power of now.

And so what's the now? The now is consciousness, timeless consciousness. As you rest in that power, fear disappears, and you know your trust comes in, and that changes the way in which you relate to other human beings.

That perhaps is more important than whatever it is that you might create in this world. It's a secondary thing. But how human beings relate to each other is more important because that creates the entire what we call the world.

It's the human-made world. The basis is how do human beings relate to each other? And how do groups, collectives, how do they relate to each other?

And at the moment, it's still, as you will know if you watch the news or whatever it is, it's not going that well. But how a collective behaves depends on the people that make up the collective, all the individuals that make up the collective. So the behavior of a nation, of a collective, is determined by the prevalent or predominant state of consciousness of the probably millions of people who make up the collective.

Now, if the collective behaves insanely, as they tend to do, if a collective behaves insanely, it does not mean that every member of the collective is of that low consciousness. It just needs a slight majority with really low consciousness or a bit more for the collective to behave insanely. And if the ego, the personal ego, is pretty crazy, but that's nothing compared to the collective ego, when it takes over your sense of identity, the collective egos are the perpetrators of most of the suffering, the human-created suffering on the planet, not the individual psychopaths or crazed criminals or crazed mass murderers like Jack the Ripper in the 19th century.

I mean, they just killed a few people. But the collectives, their behavior, if the behavior of a collective, a nation, were the behavior of a single person, you would immediately recognize that this person is clinically insane and absolutely needs to be confined. So there's a saying, there's some truth in it, comes from a 19th century French philosopher, every nation has the government it deserves.

Oh, that's interesting. Of course, what that means is there is a correlation between the prevalent state of consciousness of the majority, not of all, and the kind of government that this country or this nation manifests. So if you want to know more about the collective insanity, then, of course, I recommend 20th century history.

And you just go, how is this possible? This is completely insane, a nightmare, truly. I can't imagine it's a nightmare.

But the collective, as we said, is made up of individuals. So the change has to happen with a sufficient number of individuals in order for the collective to behave differently. And this is where relationships are important.

And relationships change as you rest in this silent power. And you can sense it in the background and sometimes even in the foreground, perhaps when you're alone or out in nature and very still, you can sense that stillness coming into the foreground and you're just completely, ah. But when you begin to deal with things, if it remains in the foreground, if you are 85% to use, you can't really quantify it, I'm just using, let's say you're 85% to 90% the transcendent consciousness, ah, absolute presence.

Now, in that state, I don't think you would be able to deal with your accountant or your bank manager. So you'd have to come down a bit from there in order to pick up the phone and be able to focus on what it is that you need to focus on or whatever you do in your job. But then there's always a question, a balance between you as a person using your mind and dealing with things in this world and you as the unconditioned consciousness.

So most humans are unawakened, so they're completely only one-dimensional. They're only their mind. But you are two-dimensional now.

You have access to the unconditioned. So when you pick up the phone, the presence recedes and you are then, I'm just picking that figure, let's say 20% present while 80% of your consciousness flows into formulating thoughts about whatever it is that you talk about on the phone or whatever. But 20%, you're still aware of yourself while you talk.

There's still some spaciousness in every relationship. The vital question in any relationship is, is there space in this relation? Is there, while you talk, while you discuss something, can you still sense in the background yourself as that spacious awareness even while you discuss, what are we going to do now?

Or how can we deal with this? There's a difficulty that has arisen and now we need to deal with it. What can we do?

What action can we take? Or you can explain your point of view without being totally or at all identified with your mental positions because you're identified with the space behind your mental positions. That changes relationships and makes the flow between humans much more harmonious because what creates an insane amount of conflict is the self-identification with mental positions, which are thoughts.

That creates an enormous sense of separation between you and the other. And not only that, it's that sense of separation between you and the other is exactly what the egoic identity, the ego wants and looks for. The ego is not looking for an end to the sense of separation.

The ego is looking to strengthen the sense of separation between you and another because the more you can judge and condemn the other and show that he or she is wrong and you are right, the more you feel your sense of self. You define yourself through what you are not. The other defines who you are.

You define yourself through the otherness of others. And so this is when individuals do that, then you get an enormous amount of conflict in relationships. But millions of individuals make up a collective, then the collectives do it to each other, and then you're engaged in an unconscious process.

The collective ego does the same that the personal ego does, except the repercussions are far worse. You need to demonize another country. And then you're constantly being told in the media, this is wrong.

And you begin to believe it. And then everybody feels, oh, we are right and they are wrong. We are the good ones and they are the bad ones.

And when you're being told, that's how it is. So it's a dysfunction. It's a serious dysfunction.

But the change must happen, begin with individuals. The change doesn't come from above, because we've tried that. We've tried to create a better, more sane society by constructing social structures.

If we created a society that is like this, then everything will be much better. Now let's implement that. It sounded good at the beginning.

Everybody should be more equal. We no longer have exploitation. And it all sounds wonderful and reasonable.

And so let's create a government of that. First, of course, you have to destroy the old. Unfortunately, there are millions of people that need to be killed in the process, but let's not think about that.

We're just looking to the future. We need to get there to this ideal society. The end justifies the means.

Is that the expression? The means justify the end, whatever. So what they forget when you create a utopia, which sounds wonderful and reasonable, you forget that there has been no change in the basic state of consciousness of the individuals.

So the egoic state of consciousness is still operating. And once the utopian government is in place, all the people that are in power in that government experience an enormous ego inflation of their own ego because this is what happens to egos when they're given power. If you want to find out about somebody's ego, somebody might look very meek and give this person ego, take one person in a country and say, okay, you are, let's say you are a simple worker and you seem to be fairly free of ego.

You seem to be very modest and except with your wife, but that's not, you seem to be more, you're becoming the president of this country. And so, because you seem to have little ego. Okay, within a few weeks or months, you will experience a transformation because the latent ego in that person is being fed and very quickly becomes blown out of all proportion.

It gets inflated like a huge balloon. And this person becomes taken over by his or her ego and then will do whatever the ego inspires him to do, which is not going to be good. So there will be power structures.

He will have enemies, not only create enemies outside of the collective, he'll create enemies within the collective. And this is how the madness will go on. You cannot create a utopia unless you have tackled the foundational thing, which is the state of consciousness of individuals.

And you can see hiding, if you look, the original ideas behind communism seemed so good when it was first. This is why so many people in the West, too, who said, oh, now we have a solution and they believed in it. And then quickly it degenerated because of egoic consciousness in the people running the country and millions got killed in the process.

But even there, there was already an element in this utopian vision. There was already a strong egoic element that needed to emphasize the otherness of others and make others into enemies, even within the country, not to mention people else. And for example, it was the class struggle, as it's called.

The antagonism between classes was emphasized and an entire segment of the population was judged as class enemies. And a huge segment of the population became class enemies. And the ego loves that, to emphasize the otherness of others and make others into enemies.

It does it on a personal level and it does it on a collective level. And many of the people who were part of the original Russian Revolution themselves became victims later of the revolutionary process. And it was an amazing, very destructive thing to happen, but it's a learning process for us to see that that is not the way we need now to go.

There's still, I can observe within the collective, the tendency arises again from time to time to divide humans into segments and make one segment into a victim segment, make another segment of the population into the enemy. And this is an unconscious process. You do it when you read the mainstream media.

They are involved in this unconscious process of division. They emphasize the divisions. They're happy with that.

I'm not going into detail. You can find out for yourself when you read the news. So the relationship between humans as you are, when you know yourself not through concepts, then there's always this knowing is also applied to the other when you relate to another human being.

And then you know the other human being also in that way. You know, perhaps, many things about him or her. Depends how long you've known that person or about the person.

So you may know things about that person, or you may know things even shortly after meeting a person. If you have certain life experience or psychological insight, you might recognize certain patterns in the personality that the person has not perhaps spoken about, but you recognize there are patterns in this personality. But you are not trapped exclusively on that level of knowledge because all you know is the way in which this personality has been conditioned to become that personality.

But you don't mistake the conditioned personality of that human being for who he or she is on the deeper level of their being. In other words, you not only know them as humans, you not only know the human level of who they are, you also know them on the being level. And that changes the way in which you interact with human beings.

But you can only know them on the being level when you know yourself on the being level as consciousness. And then you might see certain flaws in the character of this person. Most human beings tend to have certain flaws in their character.

You might have observed them in others, which all that it means is areas of unconsciousness, which is conventionally called character flaws. And you may not know them immediately, but I always recommend if you want to find out, just spend time with them. Either you go on vacation together, which is the end of many friendships, or you start sharing a house or an apartment, which is also the end of many friendships and relationships.

Because then sooner or later, and usually sooner, certain areas of unconsciousness will surface. And you say, oh, this person is difficult to live with. Of course you are not.

But you discover that there's not only the human level, there's also the being level. And you can, while you talk to a person, while you look at a person, you can sense what you share with that person, which is the essence. The same essence underneath the personality, which is the ripple on the surface of the ocean.

Underneath the personality, there is the consciousness, which is not his or her consciousness, in the same way that your consciousness is not your consciousness, the one consciousness. Every human is a manifestation, a brief manifestation of the one consciousness. And knowing the other, not only on the level of concepts, which is the personality, but also on the level of being, that changes the way in which you relate to other human beings.

It also, in many cases, although not all, there's a lessening of conflict. Because in many types of conflict, it requires two to generate conflict. If you no longer participate in generating conflict, then the ego, which wants to emphasize strength in the conflict, then will feel at a loss, because it needs the opposition.

So to approach somebody who is still ego-possessed, mind-possessed, to approach somebody in a state of non-reactivity, without fighting the ego, which wants you to be wrong, for example, that can sometimes enable the other person to have access briefly, perhaps, to something that is deeper than ego. Or the person will run away, because you're not providing enough ego food by opposing that person. Now, in living situations, of course, there are practical matters also to be considered.

So if this person listens to noisy music every night and you can't sleep and so on, there may be practical reasons for not living with that person. But a lot of conflict is unnecessarily produced through mind identification. Most importantly, what determines the relationship is an energy flow between humans.

There's an energy flow between humans that is more important than what is being said. And in the Course in Miracles, which is an interesting spiritual, it's by now become a spiritual classic. I'm not recommending it to anybody because it's not for everybody.

Some people love it, some don't. Every spiritual teaching is right for some and not right for others. And every spiritual teaching has its limitations, except mine, of course.

Yes. Oh, the ego just crept in. But there's a line in there in the Course in Miracles that says, whenever you meet somebody, it is a holy encounter.

I would add the word potentially. Whenever you meet somebody, it is potentially a holy encounter because when you recognize the essence of the other, that can even strengthen the recognition of your own essence, which is not your own. So there's a mutual strengthening.

And what you recognize is, if you want to use semi-religious language, the divinity of the other, which is the consciousness, which is the light of God, which is, Jesus called it the light of the world. And he said, you are the light of the world. Two people.

He said, you are the light of the world. Really? Just us, this little group, or the others too?

No, the others too. Oh. Oh.

What could that possibly mean when he says, you are the light of the world? Does it mean you are special? Well, it can't mean that because if it's applied to everybody, it cannot mean that you are special.

Only the people who are listening to me, only you here, you are the light of the world because you are here, but the others, of course, are not. No. It's addressed to every human being.

You are the light of the world. So what does that mean? I'm the light.

I'm not particularly important in the world. Most people would think, some people tell me I'm important, but I don't have a concept, so it makes no difference. I can only be important in the world because I have no self-concept of being important in the world.

And if you let go of self-concepts, then the power can come through more easily. So what does it mean? You're the light of the world.

Obviously, it can only mean one thing if it applies to everyone. What is the light, that which enables everything to appear, to perceive, to exist? It's consciousness.

You are a manifestation of consciousness in this world. Without consciousness, this world, what we call world, would not even be. Perhaps there would be a collection of molecules and atoms, but they have not become a world.

It needs a consciousness to create a world, even a table or a flower, without a perceiving consciousness. Perhaps it's a collection, still a collection of atoms and molecules, but it's not a flower and it's not a table. These things are being created through consciousness.

And so there's not the world there and consciousness here. The world and consciousness arise together. So you are the light of the world, means the essence of who you are is consciousness.

That's so simple. And the light of the world comes from the source. It emanates from the source, obviously, which is God, in traditional theistic language, but not in the way that the limited belief of what you conceive of as God, as a controlling patriarch who could prevent all suffering, but for some reason is not preventing suffering.

This is the argument against the existence of God. The most common argument against the existence of God is, of course, there's so much human suffering. If there were a God, he or she would not allow all this human suffering.

Or if there is a God and he or she is allowing this human suffering, this God is morally inferior to me because I wouldn't. And since the God is morally inferior to me, it's not God. So there we have it.

And of course, that's a very limited understanding which becomes the basis for the refutation of the existence of God. But the starting point is already wrong. So we can't do much with that.

But gradually the emanation, which is consciousness from the transcendent source, which is not located anywhere in space or time, but something comes into this dimension of space and time from the transcendent dimension of the one. And gradually it comes in and gradually this universe is coming into being and is still in the process of coming into being as more consciousness flows in from the transcendent source. And that transcendent source, that is what we could call God.

We cannot speak about it because it transcends anything we could name, obviously. So it's not here or there or in time. So the emanation of that, I had used the analogy earlier of the sun and the light of the sun.

So that's quite a good analogy. There's the sun, which in this analogy is the transcendent source, but it's not anywhere in the universe. It's transcendent to the universe.

And that emanates something into this universe and its consciousness is the essence. And so underlying the universe is the universal consciousness and it's expressing itself as you temporarily, a brief flicker of consciousness on the planet. Every human is a brief flicker of consciousness.

That was your life. And then it comes again. And gradually it grows.

And then suddenly a human becomes aware. Consciousness becomes aware of itself. That's amazing.

That's a totally new thing. So more fundamentally than being a person, you are something that is eternal, comes again and again. And that knowledge is only liberating when you realize it beyond concepts.

In other words, you have to taste the honey. And that's why we're here. This is the honey.

Let's have a moment of stillness.

Eckhart Tolle Recognizing The Essence of Who You Are in Everyone [d29cac30-786d-4ef2-b32b-49dc0a96c0]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:34)

Recognizing the Essence of Who You Are in Everyone Eckhart begins this episode discussing the purpose of suffering. He says suffering is the great awakener that cracks the shell of the ego. He believes through the crack something beautiful and profound emerges.

Eckhart describes it as our true essence. He says as we become familiar with this deeper dimension, we discover the very same beingness exists in others. He says recognizing the essence of who we are in everyone is just one of the joys of spiritual awakening.

So as awareness arises or presence, then it begins to shine through the person. The person no longer has the density that completely obscures the awareness, the consciousness, the unconditioned consciousness underneath. And it's often the case that the density is destroyed by a suffering.

And that is the reason why suffering has a purpose in this world. Suffering is here, including even those forms of suffering that are entirely generated by the mind. That too is there to ultimately awaken you.

So all of you have been through different forms of suffering, some very deep, some just a succession of many, many minor frustrations and things going wrong. So you somehow lost confidence in, you lost belief that this world would ultimately be able to satisfy you or make you happy. You say, that's not it.

And perhaps you became frustrated with yourself. That's possible too. So the suffering is a potential awakener.

It has a purpose and it is there to destroy you ultimately, or at least to crack, to create a crack in the egoic shell. And then something emerges through the crack. Some people in this lifetime continue to have an ego, but it's no longer totally an impenetrable shell.

Through suffering, it has received cracks here and there. There's a, is it Leonard Cohen? I think he has a song or poem.

There is a crack, a crack in everything. That's how the light gets in or gets out, I would say. So suffering destroys the false self, the identification, complete identification with your form identity.

And then there comes a point where you begin to awaken. Then suffering is no longer as necessary as before because you're voluntarily relinquishing your identification with your form, the form of you. And that is a point you've all reached, and that's why you're here.

Suffering may have been necessary to bring you here, and you may still carry suffering within you. And it is possible that this will help you to transform the suffering that you carry within yourself into a realization of what the Buddhists sometimes call the deathless dimension or the deathless. Buddhists don't like to use positive terms.

Christianity says eternal life, but the most a Buddhist would say is the deathless. And Jesus says the kingdom of heaven that is within you, and the Buddha talks about emptiness. So the Christian terminology is usually positive, not in the conventional sense.

It gives you something inspiring to say, Ah, kingdom of heaven. Where? And when?

You begin to believe in something, and that's the danger that the pointer becomes a mental concept that you believe in, so it becomes an idol. But you can't do that with Buddhist terms, so it's difficult. I mean, they've done it, but especially with the Buddha himself.

Emptiness. Do you believe in emptiness? The church of emptiness.

But all it is saying is exactly the same what Jesus said. Heaven means the sky, and the sky is vast spaciousness, the closest you can get to in this sense-perceived reality to consciousness, awareness, which is formless. So he looked at the sky, and he said this vast spaciousness.

The sky actually doesn't even exist. It's just like awareness. Consciousness doesn't exist, because it's the very foundation for existence, but there is no sky.

It just seems to be, because nobody's ever arrived there and says, I'm now in the sky. You can be in a cloud, but you can't be in the sky. You can't touch it.

It's not something. And so it's a very clever way of using something in the sense-perceived realm to point to something that's beyond that. The kingdom of heaven is, in my translation of the term into modern terminology, the dimension, which is the kingdom, dimension of spaciousness, emptiness, spaciousness.

Oh, they're talking about the same thing. The dimension of spaciousness, it is within you. Where is it, they asked Jesus, when does the kingdom of heaven come?

And this is one of the few lines that I can actually quote, because I don't have a good memory for quoting, especially scripture, but he said, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be perceived. You can never say it's there or it's over there. What does that mean?

It means consciousness itself can never become an object. You cannot make an object out of consciousness and say, oh, there it is, because it's the eternal subject. If a scientist is looking for consciousness, they can look for a thousand years and build the most incredible microscopes, and they can cut up people's brains and look for, where is that being?

They can even, you can look for, even on the level of thought. I mean, we don't know anything about consciousness and not even about thinking. What is a thought?

In what form does it live in you? How does it survive in you? Think of something, but when you were a child, did you have a dog?

Suddenly the image of the dog comes there. What did it feel like? What was your bathroom like when you were seven years old?

What was it? And you immediately can access a memory of that. Your first teacher at school, at nursery, do you remember in your mind immediately?

Because millions of things live in you, it seems, but in what form? Are there certain molecules that are your first, your primary school teacher, lived in form of certain atoms or molecules in the brain? We don't know even what a thought is.

It's all invisible around. It's invisible. So then if the scientist is looking for consciousness through the microscope, attempting to find, to make it into an object and say, ah, I have found it, he can never find it because the very thing that's looking is it.

So if you're looking for yourself, then where am I? It's a spotlight trying to find itself. And really, that ultimately means looking for God, too, as the source of all life, to look for the source without there outside.

Where is it? But what is consciousness other than the emanation from source? Something emanates from the transcendent realm just as sunlight emanates from the sun.

This is an analogy. But the source of all life that is totally incomprehensible, we can't say anything about it. Well, I am saying something, but it's not easy.

You can't say anything about it because it's transcendent. But something emanates from there into this dimension. And what emanates is consciousness.

And consciousness manifests as forms of life, billions of life forms. And gradually, consciousness emanates more. In some ways, it's an evolutionary process in this dimension, not where the source resides that is beyond time.

There's no evolution there, presumably, but I haven't... Let's not go there. The important thing is you can sense something within yourself when you become aware of yourself as awareness.

What you are sensing is the emanation, the source emanation, and that is what Jesus said, that you are the light of the world. In another gospel, he says, I am the light of the world. So both are true.

So you are the light of the world. Wow. He doesn't do that to give you a conceptual reality that says, you are very important.

You are VIP. He talks to everybody, but most people don't know that they are the light of the world because they cannot... The light shines through them, but it becomes immediately identified with forms.

They don't recognize the light, or the light doesn't recognize itself yet. So you are the light. The light of consciousness in you is the light of the world.

Without your consciousness, would there be anything here? Would this room exist? We don't know.

Not as a room. Perhaps some atoms and molecules would still be floating around, but there wouldn't be a room or a table or a flower. And so this is an enormous realization of who you are and what you are.

Every... The essence of every other human, and even the essence of every life form, is there in that recognition of who or what you are. Any human that has ever lived, that essence is immortal and ultimately timeless.

It continuously... This one consciousness continuously manifests through different forms. One could even say, to use a modern term, the one consciousness of which you are a temporary expression.

The essence of who you are is exactly one with the essence of who I am. And this one consciousness that continuously manifests through countless forms that have a short existence, there's a brief flowering of form. If you could see a speeded-up version of what's happening on the planet, let's say humans on the planet, you could see that they live, they run around for a few years, and then they die.

So if you saw a speeded-up version, you would say, humans being born, and other things being born...

[Speaker 3] (14:38 - 14:38)

Zzzz!

[Speaker 1] (14:38 - 30:47)

Gone. LAUGHTER Being born... And now we believe these are all autonomous entities, totally autonomous entities, and if they are totally autonomous entities, then it's a...

It's very tragic. Every death is the most terrible thing. But if you are not...

I'm not saying anything that you should believe in. I'm suggesting a different way of looking at the world and at humans. If every human is an expression of the one consciousness, then that never dies.

It gets recycled, to use a contemporary term. The one consciousness gets continuously recycled, and it expresses itself through countless forms, and there is an evolutionary process here at work. And every human that awakens...

And even humans who do not awaken, their life experience is brought back somehow. I had this image of bees bringing back the nectar, the flower from the... They gather from the flowers, and they bring it back to the hive.

And every human that passes out of existence brings a little bit of that life experience into the one consciousness, and then it expresses itself again. It needs to express itself again, especially if it hasn't found its true identity yet, then it is forced to reenact a similar drama. So if the essence of all life is one, and there's only one consciousness that manifests through countless life forms, then when I can sense who I am, the essence of who I am, and then I can look at you, or even think of you, and I can sense your essence as mine, it's the same.

And this recognition of the other as ultimately yourself is a wonderful thing that comes with spiritual awakening, so that you do not mistake the form, the person, the personality that's there in front of you. You do not think that that's all there is to this, because then you're only looking at the human, but you're unaware of the being. And if you only look at humans, then almost every human is not that pleasant.

Not to say obnoxious. And if you have expectations on the purely human level, one could also say that every human will let you down in one way or another. Every human has severe limitations, including this human on the human level.

Of course, you have limitations. And so if you only look at the human, you live in a very impoverished reality, and a reality that is bound to manifest continuously conflict that is ultimately not necessary, but it arises because you do not recognize your oneness with the others, the so-called other. Not only do you not recognize your oneness with the other, when you are here as an egoic entity, you have an unconscious need to emphasize the otherness of others.

You want them to be other, because the more other they are, the more you are strengthened in your fictitious sense of conceptual identity. And this works even more powerfully on a collective level. It works on a personal level, too.

People love to have their enemies. They love to argue, because when you can be right, or you're struggling to be right in an argument, you feel your identities is becoming inflated, especially as you want to be right. This is how it is.

Or if you get angry, anger can be a wonderful ego inflation. And so you can be so angry that everybody is wrong, and you are the only one who is right. And it feels, it's addictive.

To the ego, it feels, whoa, it's like there used to be this movie, TV series, The Incredible Hulk. A human who would, when this human got angry, he would become huge with gigantic muscles, and he would, all of a sudden, and people loved watching that and identify with that. Ego inflation.

That's, so the ego loves its enemies. It actually seeks out. It needs the other.

It defines its identity through the other who is not, who is different on a personal level. On a collective level, it's very dangerous. It's even more insane than on a personal level.

The need for enemies, you find it, enemies, they need to make other groups into enemies, other political parties need to, yeah. The other, oh, he is such and such. I'm not mentioning any names.

So you could easily condemn 50% of the population into the other of your own country. You can do that. The, oh, dreadful, dreadful.

And the others say, oh, dreadful, dreadful. And this happens on the internet more easily because you communicate with many humans that you don't actually see in the flesh. They just appear as conceptual things that's a few words on the screen, and then people get very angry.

And it's wonderful ego food to communicate on the internet, and people are addicted to outrage, Twitter outrage. The dysfunction of the human mind manifests in different time periods in different ways. So here we have, for example, Twitter, one thoughtless tweet can destroy your entire life.

Because a million people are outraged by what you said. Oh, dear, what have you said? So the need for enemies and other nations, you need to, we must have an enemy.

Who are we if we don't have an enemy? Or it could be a racial thing, too. Oh, this race against that race.

It could be genders. It could be men against women, women against men. But the need for enemies in order to experience one's own identity as stronger, that's there, that's part of the egoic dysfunction.

And in politics, you see it all the time. We don't need to go into that. Don't want to depress you.

You're depressed already, probably, if you've been watching the news. Or anxious. What's going to happen?

What's his next tweet going to be? So the need to emphasize the otherness of others is there very, very strong, because the ego needs it. Imagine, let's say, if you are, let's say your identity is based on political affiliation.

You belong to a political party, or you totally agree with one party, and you feel a significant part of your identity is derived from belonging to this particular group. But it only gives you identity because there are other groups that don't share what this group believes in. So there you have other, and this sustains your identity.

Now let's imagine you're entering a twilight zone, as in the old movies, Twilight Zone. And one morning you wake up, and you find that every human being on this planet belongs to your party. And believes exactly the same thing that you believe.

Exactly the same. Nobody disagrees with anything. Your entire identity would collapse.

You're nobody suddenly. You don't know who you are anymore. In fact, you're nobody, because the other has disappeared.

So, instead of emphasizing the otherness of others and with the part of the egoic insanity, the dysfunction of the ego that has created so much suffering on the planet, when you can recognize, because you have, at least to some extent, you have some access within yourself to the transcendent dimension and the essence of who you are, which is conscious awareness, and then you meet another human. And even if the other human belongs to the other party, you can look at them, and you can still disagree with what they say, but you can sense the essence of who they are beyond the conceptual content of their minds. You can look beyond, and yes, you see the conceptual content of human, you still don't agree with them, that's perfectly fine, and yet you sense there is something that you share and that is consciousness, the essence of who you are.

And then it would be possible to actually even have a conversation if the other has also some access to it. If not, maybe not. Then it's possible to have, perhaps, just to have a conversation.

And if you have a conversation, then the need to be right is no longer there because you no longer identify totally with thought, with mental positions. Mental positions, which is conceptual thoughts, no longer give you a sense of identity because now your sense of identity is derived from a deeper place. Then you can freely discuss something, and the need to prove the other wrong is not there, and yet you can state your case.

You can state this is how it is. You can state the facts, well, at least the facts as you see them. The other person may state the same facts but see them differently, who knows?

But at least you can have a conversation, and perhaps you can meet somewhere in the middle. It's possible. But the important thing is this emphasizing the otherness of others, which is an egoic need, is no longer there.

And so there are still many things you may not share with the other, and that's perfectly fine, and yet you can sense something within the other that is one with who you are. And with that comes a certain benevolence towards other human beings, which otherwise isn't there. Benevolence means goodwill.

Also, there's an empathy. There's a compassion, even loving kindness towards others, even those who hold different mental positions. There's an underlying loving kindness towards others.

Love, one could even say, it hadn't been misused so much, but love ultimately is the recognition of yourself in the other. So ultimately then, you only ever really love yourself in a positive sense. It's a good thing.

You really love because you recognize the essence of who you are in everyone. So you love yourself. And that is a deeper meaning of loving yourself, beyond the form identity.

And for that, you don't even need to put little stickers on your bathroom mirrors that say, I love myself. At least I'm trying to. Because that's still, on that level, you're still, there's a duality.

You split yourself in two, and you say, I love myself. I'm really happy with myself. And this is not a bad thing.

It's an intermediate step, perhaps, for many people who before hated themselves. Not very pleasant. And then you can have a, you begin to love yourself, but you still have a, there's a split there.

Who are you, and who or what is it that you love? Is it the image that you have of yourself in your mind? Is that what you love?

And what you can talk about? I'm really good. And this is not a bad thing, but you're still experiencing the duality, the split.

But who is the I that loves this thing that you call yourself? So the split remains. Those, this can be transcended, because then you are yourself.

You no longer need to, the split occurred, as I mentioned before, you might remember if you listen. The split occurred when, expressed in mythological terms, when this young man called Narcissus in ancient Greece happened to look into a pool of water and saw his own image before there were any mirrors or selfies. He saw his own image in a pool of water.

And this is a mythical tale. And he fell in love with himself.

[Speaker 3] (30:48 - 30:48)

Ah!

[Speaker 1] (30:49 - 38:42)

I love myself. Oh! This shows the mythical, there's a deep truth there.

It shows the development of the self in the human psyche. The development of an image that humans construct for themselves, which this became possible because humans had started to think a wonderful evolutionary development, but there was a downside. The downside was that they began to derive their identity from the process of thinking.

And then they constructed mental entities and called it myself. And so the self is a post-conceptual and even an image of who you are. I am beautiful.

I love myself. And this man was no longer happy after that. He lost his happiness and other bad things happened to him, which I don't remember.

And so that shows the split that occurred when the ability to think in humans grew and grew and then identity became bound up with thinking. Now we have reached a stage where we are able to transcend that so that our identity is no longer trapped in thinking. It's no longer derived from thinking.

But of course we can still think. In fact, think much better without the dysfunction of seeking yourself in thought. If you seek yourself in the movement of thought, that is a dysfunction and leads to enormous amount of suffering and conflict with others.

So you can see how a dog exists prior to conceptual thinking and a dog does not have a self-image. I often point that out because it's a miraculous thing. Your dog does not have a problem with self-esteem, for example.

No dog I've ever seen has a problem with self-esteem. And no dog hates himself or herself or itself. And no dog loves him or herself because the dog doesn't have a conceptual self.

It has no self. The dog is itself. It is just...

It doesn't have a problem with himself, itself, herself. It doesn't have... It's not a problem.

And this is how humans love their dogs and other animals, pets, cats too. No problem with body image either. And body image is a source of huge suffering for many humans.

Body image? Oh my God. They hold their magazines who live only for the purpose of addressing people's body image.

You read them every week or every month because it's so problematic. But not to the dog. The dog just is.

The dog has... Even a fat dog, which... I mean, the dog is fat because the humans give him too much food.

But he still doesn't have a problem with it. There's no conceptual identity. It hasn't arrived at a conceptual identity.

Maybe it never will. It's because the conceptual thought processes haven't started. And so...

But we have, and we can't go back. We're not regressing to the state of the dog or the cabbage. We're not...

The cabbage is even happier than the dog, probably. But we are not regressing. No, we are transcending.

We are rising above conceptual thinking, not falling below, unless you drink too much, or intoxicating beverages can easily pull you below thought. And then for a little while before you collapse, you're as happy as the dog wagging its tail. So while we're here, make it your practice, in between sessions, to invite presence into your life so that you don't carry this burden of your problematic identity around with you wherever you go.

Become present, sense perceptions, alert to sense perceptions, so that there's a diminishment in the amount of thinking that you do, without falling below thinking, but rising above thinking. Alert presence, sense perceptions, breathing, walking, doing things, handling something, putting something away. Be there, present in every movement.

Enjoy whatever it is that you are handling. Give it attention. All the little things that one would, or you might normally overlook, and the little things, the table, the surface, the touching it, looking at its presence too.

It is, it's there. Acknowledging all the little things that surround you and the little things that you do. Life consists of mostly little things that you do.

Even if you are VIP, ultimately the moments when you step into your private jets are brief, but after a while that becomes a little thing too. It becomes meaningless. It's only meaningful at first.

So little steps, be able to, one step at a time, acknowledging beauty around you, even when you hadn't seen it before. And so you become still, you become present. Funny thing happened just before our session.

I have this clock here. It has traveled with me for many years. And just before this session, the second hand broke off and it stopped.

And it still stopped. That's a, as the Buddhists, the Buddhists like the word auspicious. It's a very auspicious sign.

The end of time.

[Speaker 2] (38:49 - 38:51)

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Releasing Barriers to Presence [e7b86298-ecad-4b36-8eb6-ada4012de834]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:38)

Releasing barriers to presence. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience about clearing away the obstacles to presence. Eckhart says the entire universe is awakening and is in the early stages of something vast.

We are a part of that. To be spiritually awake means releasing barriers created by the mind. Eckhart says while the ability to think is a great evolutionary achievement, people have become so enmeshed in thought they've lost touch with their deeper essence and their spiritual legacy.

[Speaker 1] (0:40 - 54:18)

It's good to be back. I could live here. Who knows what the universe is planning.

So if you haven't been with me before, it might not look very promising to have this man sitting on a chair, knowing that he's going to talk for who knows for how long. He doesn't even walk up and down the stage and gesticulates. Well, he does gesticulate, but he doesn't get up.

And there's no PowerPoint presentation. So there needs to be something here that makes up for the deficiencies, external deficiencies. And that which makes up for the eternal deficiencies is inside you.

Externally, there's only a man sitting on a chair talking for an hour and a half or two hours, who knows, three, four. And yet the words may have some interest, but the words are not the main thing here. Although I'm probably going to talk all the time.

So the words have two functions. Either they point to something that is beyond words, something that you can only recognize from deep within you. In other words, it's not to do with believing in anything I say, but realizing that the words are signposts.

They point. That to which they point is within you. One could say it is a certain state of consciousness.

And to the extent to which this state of consciousness, which we could call the awakened consciousness or presence, can use other words. Again, the words are just the signposts. To the extent to which that awakened or awakening consciousness is already active in you, to that extent you realize what it is that the words point to.

And you don't realize that conceptually. It's not so much to do with understanding conceptually, because what I'm going to talk about does not require you to mentally work out what it is that I'm saying. What's he talking about?

Presence? In other words, you don't need to think very hard while you're here. And if you can refrain from thinking altogether, that would be best.

I'll come back to that in a second. So one way the words are being used is to point to that, and then the signpost then works. The Buddhist expression, you might have heard, the teaching of Buddha, but could be any spiritual teaching, is a finger pointing to the moon.

That's the teaching. And the Buddhists say, don't mistake the finger for the moon, because that's what the dog does. When you point at something to your dog, it says, there, look, the ball is over there.

The dog looks at your finger, it doesn't look at the ball. So don't do that. The words are the finger pointing to the moon.

Go to the moon. Don't stay with a finger. Another function, the second function, the words have, is they may occasionally, from time to time, point out certain obstacles that you are likely to find within yourself to the realization of that moon.

Let's go to the tonality now. The realization of that consciousness in you. There are obstacles in human beings, in the human mind, that are recurring, that many of you will recognize when I point them out.

But it can be very helpful to point out what the obstacles are in you to the realization of what we might call the state of presence. I sometimes call that the new consciousness, the awakened consciousness, and that is the larger context in which our gathering here happens. It is the context, is the awakening of human consciousness, which one could describe as the next stage in human evolution.

It would be erroneous to believe that humans are a already finished product. They are a work in progress. In other words, they have not been fully formed yet.

We tend to believe that humans were created, well, that's the biblical, some time ago we got, or that we tend, evolutionary process has created humans, but many people believe this is now, we have arrived now, evolution has come to an end. It hasn't. It's really only the beginning, the early stages of something vast, a vast universal movement of consciousness.

The entire universe is awakening, and you are an expression, a temporary expression in this particular form of the awakening universe. So, if you enjoy being here, and it seems to you that time is not passing, that means there's something in you that recognizes already the truth of what I'm talking of. And that will probably, hopefully apply to most of you, but there may be a few people here who didn't really want to come here, but they couldn't say no to a spouse, or sibling, or friend, and said, okay, I'll come along, I'll check that guy out, see what he has to say.

And then, if this awakening, the awakening of the new consciousness has not yet started in you, then it is possible that you may find sitting here extremely boring, and you may want to feel free to get up and leave. I'm not going to say, what are you doing? And nobody will judge you, because most people here are already beyond that kind of thing.

And if you need to go to the bathroom, or toilet, I don't know whether it's called toilet or bathroom here, don't hesitate, because you might think, oh, if I go to the toilet, people will think that I'm not getting it, or you could just sit there and say, I have no idea what he's talking about, and getting bored out of your mind, which that might be a good thing, or you could tell yourself the ancient dictum, this too will pass.

And if you really go into that, this too will pass, that may take you into presence. So miracles are possible. So the starting point is always, of course, the present moment.

If your attention is fully in the present moment, then you are awake spiritually. But what does it mean to have your attention fully in the present moment? The normal way of being in the present moment is not to be fully there.

You are there physically, but your mind is somewhere else. Your mind is either in the past, or in the future. For many people, the present moment exists only as a peripheral phenomenon in their lives.

They know there's something there that's the present moment, but the underlying belief is there's something much more important that I need to be concerned about, and that's not the present moment. What I need to be concerned about is how to get from here to there, because there is more important than here, always. That's a normal way of being in the world.

It's unconscious. People don't know. Nobody actually says there is more important than here, but they live as if, always, the next moment, the there in time.

It could also be the there spatially. They live, most humans still, especially those who are not awakening yet, as always, as if they needed to get away from this moment. Brief interludes when you're okay in the present moment.

Brief interludes like sensory pleasure. Can you enjoy a meal? It's good to be present, but you can't do it for too long, and you get ill.

Another thing, of course, that takes you into the present moment is having sex. Also, of course, takes you into the present moment, but that doesn't last that long either. And then, of course, another thing that takes you into the present moment is certain substances that you can take.

You can smoke something. And that takes you to the present moment, but there's something that I'll talk a bit more about that in a second. This is, you can drink also.

You can have a stiff drink, as they say, and what happens then, the voice in your head, especially the smoke, the voice in your head is not as frantic anymore. It doesn't, because as you probably know, people have a voice in their head that talks all the time. I don't mean the people who are mentally ill, who actually hear a booming voice that talks to them, but there's always something going on that comments on your life, and has things to say, and that's the normal, compulsive, involuntary thought processes that go through your head all the time, and that it tells you stuff.

It has a commentary. It's the running commentary on your life, and that's thinking. It's fine.

Thinking is an incredibly wonderful evolutionary step forward. It was an amazing development, the ability to think, but it, over time, over a millennia, a considerable downside developed of thinking. A great evolutionary attainment, but for everything there's a price to pay.

So a great evolutionary attainment, and it enabled humans to do the most incredible things, to create cultures, and philosophy, and science, and so on, but thinking gradually took over their lives more and more. Some anthropologists have put forward the theory that when thinking first started happening in humans, of course it coincided with words, where people started to use language. So the words existed, first they existed in the head as thought, and they existed spoken as sounds.

So as they started to use language, then thinking grew, developed. And some anthropologists have put forward the theory that they have some evidence for it. I don't remember what the evidence is.

That when humans first started to think, they believed that gods were talking to them in their head, because it was such a new thing, that suddenly there was a voice, that there was words forming in their minds. And they had, then suddenly they knew who they were. They had names, things had names.

They had names. Who are you? Me, John.

You, oh. And you begin to believe that there's some ultimate reality in the sound that you create for yourself, and that was the beginning of gradually, very gradually, becoming identified with the voice in the head. And that took thousands and thousands of years.

And now we've reached a stage where almost every human is identified with the narrative, the story in their head. It talks to them, sometimes in the first person, I, sometimes in the second person, which means you talk to yourself. Why can't you get anything right?

Why did you do that? You can have a monologue, you can have a dialogue, you can even be a third person. Now you might remember that from the time when you were completely identified with, you're not anymore, because that's why you're here.

If you were a hundred percent identified with the voice in your head, the compulsive thinking, you would not have come here. There would be no reason to come here, because what I'm talking about would be totally and utterly incomprehensible to you. So the fact that you are here means there is, something has arisen in you that is deeper than thought, that the new consciousness, what a presence, a new dimension of consciousness is there.

For many humans, it's not there yet, and for many humans, the voice in their head is a daily torture, daily torture, because it creates misery in people's lives. It creates an enormous amount of unhappiness, because it has things to say about you, that you are not good enough, you should have done that, you should do that. It complains about yourself, it complains about others, it complains about situations you're in.

It tends to dwell on negative things rather than positive things, because negative things, it can really get in there and become active. With good things, it's harder. I can think for hours about yesterday, when somebody was offended me, and after it's happened, I start thinking, I should have said that.

Why didn't I say that? Next time I meet this person, this is what I'm to say. How dare he not respect me?

I just, people like that shouldn't be allowed to exist. Why doesn't, why doesn't? This is just, you can go on for hours thinking about, and you feel more and more angry, and this is only one relatively insignificant incident, something that happened yesterday, but the mind even there can get in there and amplify that, instead of saying, okay, it's finished, gone, just be present.

It disappears immediately. The animals don't do that, because they cannot keep alive things mentally in their head. So, some, I described in the Power of Now, I was watching, I was writing the Power of Now, and I would go every day for a walk in the park, and I saw the duck, two ducks getting into a fight, and they get quite angry, it seems, when they are fighting.

And then I was surprised, the, that was a teaching of the ducks, they were teaching me the next, something to add to the next chapter in the book. They got into a fight, and immediately, when the fight only lasted 30 seconds or less, and suddenly it was over, and they swam off in opposite directions, and both ducks, and they always do that, they kind of get up on the surface of the water, they almost stand up, and they flap their wings violently, and when they've done that, nothing ever happened. They swim on.

There's no mind that keeps alive what happened just now. And they have dissipated the energy of it. A great teaching.

But humans do the opposite, if you are unconscious. Unconscious, by the way, I'm going to use that word quite often, probably, tonight. Unconscious does not mean the conventional meaning of unconscious, as you know, is.

So, when I talk about unconscious humans, I'm not talking about, but they are all unconscious in a spiritual sense, means completely identified with the compulsive, incessant thought processes in your heads. Identified with every thought that comes into your head. Now, what does it mean when I say identify?

Identify means to do with identity. It's to do with who you are. It's to do with your sense of self.

So, when you identify with the thought, the thought has you in its grip to such an extent that every thought has a sense of self in it. So, you derive your sense of self, of who you are, your sense of self, you derive it from the voice in the head. And that is, for still millions of humans on the planet, that is still their daily reality.

Their sense of identity, who they are, is derived from the narrative in their minds. And that's an amazing dysfunction, because it creates an enormous amount of suffering that is actually unnecessary. The identity that is rooted in thought is always one that is deficient.

It's, you feel you are never enough, and this moment is never enough. There's always a great sense of something, something is lacking in my life. And what it is that's lacking in your life, every human who is identified with their mind has that sense of, there's something vital that's lacking in my life.

There's something not here that should be here. And what it is, varies from person to person. But it is an underlying structure in the, what I call the egoic mind.

So, ego, in the sense that we use it here, is the sense of self that is completely identified with thought. And, as I mentioned, the tendency of thought, of the egoic self, which is the mind-made sense of self, which is an image of who you are, consisting of certain stories you tell yourself in your mind, and you call it my life. My life.

That's very problematic. On the level of the story of my life, there's nobody in this room whose life, on the level of the so-called my life narrative, that's not problematic. It's heavily problematic.

My life is not easy. Let me tell you about it, if you're willing to listen. And then you can tell me about yours.

I'm sure it's not as bad as mine, but I'll listen. So everybody carries around a conceptual self that they call my life. And the moments when you're happy, really happy with your life, usually don't last that long.

It is more normal to be, to a greater or lesser degree, unhappy with your life. If you're happy today, or right now, just wait a little. Because things will change, because humans get continuously challenged by situations, and then you become unhappy again.

So the voice in the head, the compulsive, tends to dwell on things that are not good, rather than things that are good. Why does it do that? There's so much more to think about when it complains, than about something good.

Yesterday's sunset, that was so, let's say, you saw a sunset yesterday, it was so magnificent. And in the moment of seeing it, it freed you for a moment from the voice in the head, because you just went, wow. And you felt more intensely alive suddenly.

Why? You didn't feel intensely alive because of the sunset, or it seems that way. You felt intensely alive because you were so overwhelmed by the beauty of it, that for a moment, your thinking subsided, and something else arose, and that something else was presence or awareness.

And you went, and in that moment you felt more intensely alive than you would normally do. And then, of course, on the next day, you can say, that was such a wonderful sunset. I felt so alive.

But apart from that, the mind cannot do very much with it. Compare that to complaining about the person who offended you yesterday. How much the mind can do with that, and how it can get in there and amplify the story, and fantasize what you could have said and will say the next time, and people in general are so unpleasant, and you don't really want to be here with people anymore, and all kinds of things.

So it's hard on the good things, the so-called, the mind can't do that much with it. It tends to dwell on the negative, and the egoic self, the mind-made self, gets stronger when it can complain about something, and when it can make something into an adversary or an enemy. It loves that, because it feels stronger in its sense of self.

People do that. There's often such a thing as a collective ego, nations, groups, entities, collective entities, they love their enemies. They love to make enemies, because then it defines your sense of self more, and you feel more yourself.

It's all illusion. It's all mind stuff. So the mind-made sense of self is a terrible curse, and that is something that we need to transcend, so that we can actually use thinking in a powerful, focused, constructive way, and actually create and manifest things through thinking.

Thinking is an amazing tool. Where thinking becomes destructive is when it assumes your identity, when you do not think, but thinking happens to you. People say, I think.

It's not true, because the thoughts that go through their head, they have no control whatsoever over the thoughts that go through their head. So to say, I think, is actually not true. It would be truer to say, I am being thought by my thoughts.

Thinking has taken possession of me to such an extent that I think I am it. So in other words, I am actually possessed by my own mind. And how this possession manifests varies from person to person.

It has something to do with your past history. It has something to do with the cultural environment in which you grew up that conditioned your mind to think in certain ways. So that varies enormously.

If you grew up in Saudi Arabia, you would think very different thoughts, unless you lived in the West for a long time. But if you were in just one, just to take one example, you can make many others, you live in one particular culture, enclosed, and you get conditioned by the thoughts of that culture. And if you go in Australia, you have different kinds of thoughts that go through your head.

You get conditioned, the mind gets conditioned in that way. But in either case, if you are not awakening yet, you are completely identified with that. Then you look at reality through this veil or this screen of mental concepts, including the sense of identity, which is mental.

And then you look at the world through that and don't even know it. You don't see anything clearly because you look at it through the veil of judgments and conceptualization. And whatever you perceive, you comment on it.

You immediately call it something. And in most cases, you have some kind of opinion or mental position towards it, including human beings, every person you meet and immediately have, hmm, the mind will tell you about something about them. Or situations, you find yourself in places, situations, people, wherever you are, most people's attention is much more in the narrative in their head than what's actually happening around them.

So that is, it is a case of really being possessed by the conditioned mind. It's a dreadful fate, dreadful. I can sometimes, when I see people, they are so burdened by their personality, which is the conditioned self, there's this, sometimes I feel as if the people, many people are carrying this heavy burden of this personality, which you have been carrying for years.

And then sometimes the older they get, the more rigid it becomes. And immediately they know everything. Whatever you say, they have an opinion about it.

And they don't know it's an opinion, they think it's the truth. And you can't argue with them. It's impossible, completely pointless.

So they are so identified with, they believe in every thought that comes into their head. That's how it is, let me tell you. You just talk to people about politics, that tends to stimulate that kind of dysfunction.

And nowadays you're not confined to speaking to one or two people, the same dysfunction, you can do it on the internet, you can do it on Facebook. You put forward your positions, your mental positions, but you don't know it's a mental position, you think it's the truth. And then you come into conflict with others who are also identified with their mental position.

So you have a conceptual sense of self, a narrative, the me, that's me, me and my life, me and my opinions, me and my likes and dislikes, me, that comes into conflict with other conceptual identities. And actually loves the conflict, because the more you're in conflict with others, the more strongly you can feel your fictitious identity, you feel it even more strongly. That's why some religions in some countries, they need their enemies, you can even see it now, the same mind structure that created the insanity of the first half of the 20th century, with hundreds of millions killed, the same pattern of insanity emerging again.

When I listen to the news, I think, what are they doing? They need their enemies, they must, the collective needs another enemy to fight, we must, and they all participate, the politicians, the media, yeah, they are the evil ones. I'm not saying there are no, there are certain very unconscious people around, political leaders, not to mention any names, but, the big question is whether people who are already very unconscious are drawn into politics, or whether, even a relatively conscious person, when he or she gets into politics, becomes unconscious, I don't know, I haven't solved that yet.

So the important thing is to realize then, there are thoughts that continuously go through your head, and are you able to be aware, for example, of certain repetitive thoughts that you tend to have in your mind? Because they may be there every day, they may resurface in many situations, in relation to other people, to yourself, do you have recurring thoughts about yourself, about your life? Have you already come to a conclusion about how your life is?

Have you reached the conclusion that your life has been failed, you have failed in the endeavor of your life, your life has been a disaster, you've missed out on everything? Is the narrative in your head, what's it telling you about yourself? What is the story of my life?

What is it saying? Is it pleasant, is it unpleasant? Now the question is, what reality does that actually have?

Of course, it's connected with your past, your historical past, you remember the past, you remember things that went okay, you remember the things that didn't go according to expectation, and out of that, a narrative forms, and you call that my life. Now, a great degree of unhappiness in humans that they live with on a daily basis does not arise from the situations they find themselves in. A greater amount of unhappiness arises that is created by an unhappy narrative in their minds, which they call me and my life.

And they don't know that. If they could look through that and see that a large amount of unhappiness in my life, and unhappiness could be anger, it could be sadness, it could be resentment, unhappiness can take many forms. Even a slight irritation is a small form of unhappiness.

And so many people are unhappy with themselves, or they put all the blame on others, which is still part of your narrative. And then you're unhappy with all those people who have messed up your life. I'm not saying that things are done to people that are bad, but I'm talking here about deriving an identity from your historical past, or the way in which your mind interprets your historical past.

It may not be actual events, because if you ask your sibling about a similar thing 20 years ago, he or she might have a completely different story of the same event. Happens quite often. So me and my life, and people are trapped in the conceptual my life, and the problematic my life, and they carry around this burden of my life.

I hope it's going to work out in the future, because I still have years left. I could still achieve happiness. That's the hope.

But then the hope has a downside, and that is, what if it gets worse? And so you go from hope to fear. And of course, I can tell you, it might get better for a while, and then it will get worse, because you're going to die, and the body, either you just die suddenly, or the body gets older and older, and then you're hard to walk anymore, and you get retired, and you don't have an identity anymore that has to do with your social function, and there you sit, and it really is getting worse now.

Who am I now? I don't have a job anymore. Nobody tells me who I am.

Of course, eventually, there's always the form begins to dissolve. I'm not saying that you should not try to improve the conditions of your life, but more importantly, is to realize that you do not have a life, because that's, people say, my life. Now, if you look at the structure of that sentence, my life, there's a duality there, because if you say my life, that implies that you have it.

It's mine. So it implies two duality. If you say my life, there's you and the life that you have.

It belongs to me. It's mine. So this thought, this language creates a duality in your mind.

Call it my life. That's interesting. So there's me, and I have a life, and then the fear comes in, if I have a life, I might lose it.

And of course, then you visit the cemetery, and you say, yes, they all once had a life, and they lost it. They lost their life. And that's going to happen to me too.

Not realizing you're trapped in certain mental formations that create an illusory identity, and actually create delusion. You don't have a life, because there is not a duality. Without life, there's no you.

So you can't have it. You are one with life. There isn't you and life.

You are life. You don't have it. Now, if you are it, you can't lose it, because you are it.

Of course, we'll have to see more deeply what we mean when I say you are life. But let's for a moment stay with that. You are, you are life, you don't have a life.

So you can say it for yourself, in your mind, I don't, I don't have a life, I am life. This is the end of duality. You realize there's, there's a oneness of you and life.

And when I say life, we can use another word, the essence of being alive. What is the essence? Let's go there slowly.

What is the essence of who you are? What is the essence of the life that you are? Okay, now, normal humans, which means unawakened humans, say, well, the essence of my life is my whatever they identify with.

It's my possessions, my what I have, what I know, what I, my body, all those things that I identify with, let's see, the essence of who I am is whatever I derive my identity from. It could be the physical body, or it could be my car, or my house, or my work, my function in society, or it could be friends that I have, things that I have attained. These things are all in the mind also, let's say your, your, your sense of identity, which is you compare yourself to others all the time, which is you do when you're in your mind, you compare yourself to others.

Let's say your body looks better than other people's body for a while. These two will pass. But for a while, you can get in there and then you become this is my body that also is a mental formation.

So it's not so much you identify with the body, you identify the thought of my body. That's what you identify with. You don't identify with your Ferrari, if you have one.

It's the thought of my car, which makes you superior to others who only have a little car. Or your body makes you superior to others who have a puny and weak body. So you can display for a few years, you display your body on the beach and feel good about yourself.

And after a while, the day comes when you look in the mirror. What happened? There's something wrong with the mirror.

In the past, the mirrors that people made were so much better than the mirrors now. So for a while you identify with this or that, that is quite normal. And so when you ask what is the essence of who you are, most people will tell you, well, I am this is who I am.

This is what my identity is derived from this, this, this, and this. And this bundle of things is who I am. It's not always positive, because I was just talking about having a body that looks better than other people's body.

You could have a body that looks worse than other people's body. And so that serves too. You could either either you look for something else that gives you an identity, like, actually, you're more intelligent than all these stupid beach bums.

So you can say, look at these people, but you have so much more knowledge and intelligence, you can look down on them. Or you can be more spiritual. So if you I can't afford a Ferrari, I'm on my bicycle.

And you say, look at this materialistic person, the Ferrari. Or if that doesn't work, you can see how unfairly treated by life you have been and how so much more miserable you are than most, most people. And you've really been a victim of, of circumstances.

You've been a victim of your birth and of your, your parents did a dreadful job with you. Maybe if their parents had been more conscious, things could have worked out. But they weren't.

But that that also gives you a strong conceptual identity. So if you can't have a positive one, the negative ones can be just as strong, if not stronger, you can have a huge victim identity. It's a favorite thing.

Sometimes in the collective, certain egoic things become fashionable for a while. Nowadays is the victim identity for certain groups of people are very fashionable. So people can feel Oh, yes, we are all been victimized by those people.

And of course, there's some truth in it, in some cases. But to derive an identity is a delusion to derive a sense of identity from that is a huge delusion. That is not who you are.

That's all my life. That's all. So if you are not all those things, so when I asked, Who are you?

If I ask that question, don't go, let's do this for a moment. Don't go into the past. Can you feel or sense who you are without reference to the past in you?

You don't even need to remember your name right now. What for? You don't remember your email address or your phone number or what happened to you 10 years ago.

Don't need to remember that. Can you still get a sense without reference to your personal history? Can you get a sense of beingness or presence?

There's no past in that at all. But what is that? You can't really describe it.

All you know is that you are, I am, you can sense the underlying beingness or presence of you. But to really sense it, what needs to happen is that for a moment, the stream of thinking needs to subside. And it may be happening for many who at this very moment, the stream of thinking that is normal for most people that never stops except when they fall asleep.

The stream of thinking for a moment subsides. And when I asked you whether you couldn't be sense yourself without reference to your personal history, what I was really talking about, what I was really asking was, can you get a sense of your presence without thought? Ah, and there's enormous revelation here.

This question, who am I, does not have a real truthful answer on a conceptual level. It's not in thoughts or words. The true answer to who am I has no thought in it.

It is a sense of presence or beingness. And you can only sense that if, even if it's only a moment. So the stream of thinking subsides.

And what happens is you are completely present without your mind saying anything. You can perceive everything, you can still, you can see, you can hear, you're fully there. And your mind is still.

Still does not mean that you've gone to sleep. It's the opposite. You're actually more alert in that stillness than you would be if you were identified with this continuous stream of thinking.

That's the stillness, the inherent stillness that actually every human has that you don't need to work hard to attain stillness. Or think that if I follow the right course of action, it might take me 10 years and then I'll be able to have a still mind. No, it's already there.

And if you're not totally miserable and unhappy every moment of your life, that means without perhaps you knowing it, anybody who is not extremely miserable all the time has a little bit of access, without even knowing it, to that stillness within. They don't know it. All they know is from time to time they feel a little bit good.

They don't know for three seconds they stopped thinking. They might have some other explanation of why in that moment they felt good. Maybe they were looking at a dog in that moment because the dog wasn't thinking anything about them, because the dog doesn't think.

The dog is conscious but not conceptual thinking. The dog does not have an opinion about you. And so when you were petting the dog, perhaps you suddenly felt good about petting the dog.

Why? Because for a moment the dog freed you of the judgmental conceptual mind that otherwise would be very active if you were petting a human. It would say something.

Of course you can't do that because people would think you're insane. You can't go up to a human, may I pet you? That would be nice if they did that to each other.

But the humans have judgments about you. So whenever you go to a human, you know that he has certain thoughts about you. So the other human cannot free you from your thoughts.

But the dog or the cat can for a short moment free you from your thoughts. And in that moment it feels good. That's why people love their pets so deeply.

There's a reason, a deeper reason why they love because the pet frees them a little bit from their minds. And there are moments when you interact with your animal that you can experience brief moments of thoughtless awareness. Two seconds, three seconds, but it's enough to keep you going.

It's enough so that your life doesn't become totally miserable. And then you might have other moments. You might have moments when you engage in some physical activity.

You swim or you climb a mountain and then there are moments that your total presence is required by the activity so that there's not enough left for thinking. And again you feel intensely alive. Oh, that was so good.

Why was it so good? Well, I love it. It's just so good.

I don't know why it's good. Well, it's good because it freed you for a moment from the incessant stream of thinking. And there was some degree of awareness or presence arising.

But you didn't even know that. So it's always that that dimension of consciousness is in every human. Now, I must admit, there are still millions of humans where it's so deeply hidden in them that they have no access to it.

But there are others who are beginning to awaken to this dimension within themselves. So now you don't have to wait for certain things to happen to briefly free you from your mind. You don't have to wait for the next encounter with a lovely dog in the street.

Or you don't have to wait for some beautiful moment in nature when you take in the totality of a forest or the vastness of the sky and you go, ah. Or at night you look up into this clear sky, the vastness of space, the countless stars, which are suns, most of them, and the vast distances and the stillness of it all. And you go, it can still your mind too.

That was my first meditation when I was a teenager. I didn't even know what meditation I did. At that time, nobody talked about meditation in the West.

I looked up at the sky at night. We were living, when I was a teenager, we were living in Spain, so the sky was often, in the summer especially, totally clear. And I would sit on the roof of the house and go, ah, ah.

What I'd realized many years later that while I was doing that, there was no thought in my mind. The space, the outer space created in me that inner space or inner spaciousness. So that's another word for it, another pointer.

The inner spaciousness. If you don't find that, and I'm saying find or discover, I'm not saying achieve or attain. It's not an achievement or attainment because it's already there as the essence of who you are.

But you have to discover it, that it is already there. If you don't find it, you are condemned for the rest of your life to live a very frustrated existence because life will be just one damn thing after another. One damn thing and it never leaves me alone.

But what really doesn't leave you alone is your mind, which reacts to every little thing that happens and amplifies every little thing that happens. It's not so much what people call karma. It's not so much what happens to them.

It's how they respond or react to what happens. And when you're unconscious, you amplify every little challenge in your life becomes a big thing in your mind. Oh my God.

It was only a little thing, but it gets amplified and personal conflicts arise all the time.

Eckhart Tolle Releasing Our Anxious Inner Narrative [2ad2194c-07ac-4ae7-9249-e99e12af177d]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:57)

Releasing our anxious inner narrative. In this podcast, Eckhart talks further about dealing with adversity. He says, when we experience challenges in the form of loss, including jobs, homes, relationships, political instability, or the pandemic, it's actually an invitation to connect more deeply with the present moment.

Eckhart says the conditioning of our minds determines how we respond to situations. He says, if we spiral down into fearful thoughts whenever a crisis occurs, it's a sign that we're out of alignment. He believes the first step is always to remain in the here and now.

Eckhart says, when we meet adversity with alertness, we learn to transmute fear and are no longer dependent on what's happening around us. It's then, he says, we realize our path to freedom begins with our state of consciousness.

Whenever you encounter adversity or loss or extreme limitation that suddenly comes into your life, some kind of disruption that comes into your life, that is a call to come more intensely into the present moment, first of all. So allow the, whatever form the adversity takes, whatever it is that you're experiencing right now, allow it to, one could almost say, force you into the present moment. If you're not in the present moment, you will be in a state of fear.

So the first step for manifesting something better is to forget about manifestation and be completely concerned with the present moment only and give your fullest attention to the present moment. That includes not only whatever is happening around you at the present moment, right now, your sense perceptions and so on. This is, of course, part of the present moment.

It also concerns the thoughts that you're going through your mind at the present moment. So there's a huge difference between having thoughts go through your mind and being aware that certain thoughts are going through your mind at the present moment. This is something very important, easy to overlook.

Thoughts go through your mind all the time. For most people, particularly people who have not awakened yet in any way, who are still unconscious, which means completely identified with a thinking mind, for those people, there's no awareness behind the thought. This is why we say they are unconscious.

Without awareness, there's only the movement of thought and the movement of thought reacts to whatever is happening around you. And the way in which the movement of thought reacts to whatever is happening around you depends on the way in which your mind has been conditioned by past experiences. So the conditioning of your mind determines how you react to things that are happening around you, how you interpret them, what kind of narrative you create around what is happening around you.

You talk to yourself, that's the voice in the head, the thought processes. This talking to yourself becomes a narrative. Without awareness, you are completely identified with the stream of thinking that is reactive to whatever is happening around you.

And if something is happening that is challenging, in other words, some kind of adversity, limitation, loss or disruption of your life, then the normal thing for most people is a very scary narrative that arises in your minds. The way in which you interpret what's happening is scary because you're not only looking at what's happening now, you're also extrapolating from there and saying, how is this going to affect me? What's going to happen tomorrow, next week?

You project yourself into the future where you see things are getting even worse than they are now. You see already how whatever is happening now, how it's going to affect your life and you play out scenarios in your mind which are not pleasant and you don't know what you're doing. You believe that what you're experiencing is the reality, but it's not the reality.

What you're experiencing is what your mind has created. It is a narrative that your mind has created as a reaction to what's happening around you. So you're not experiencing really, you're not experiencing reality.

You're confusing what is happening in your mind with reality. Once an awareness comes in, another word for it is presence. When awareness comes in, you suddenly become aware of the kind of thoughts that your mind is creating.

That is the beginning of awakening, spiritual awakening, the awakening of consciousness. That is to become aware of the way in which your mind functions and what it says. And this is why it's so important to become conscious of the present moment because that is an intrinsic part of being present is to become aware of what your mind is doing in this moment.

And this is why I said, the first step is to forget about wanting to manifest something different. We can go there later. The first step is become more intensely, more acutely aware of the present moment because without that awareness, you are at the mercy of your mind, the conditioned mind, without even knowing it.

You have become a victim of your mind. And so it is true to say that for many people, their worst enemy lives between their two ears and they don't know it. So the most foundational step is coming into the present moment, which implies the arising of awareness or presence.

And as that awareness arises, you become aware not only of your immediate surroundings, which is part of the present moment, but you also become aware of the thinking mind and what sorts of things your mind is producing. And you look at them, are these thoughts truly a reflection of reality or are they a fiction that my mind is creating, projecting itself into the future where things are usually seen as going to get worse. And then you experience the emotions.

Emotion usually reflects mind activity. So if your mind is producing thoughts that are telling you that your situation is dangerous or critical, although in the present moment, it is very unlikely, highly unlikely that your situation is dangerous or critical in this moment. If it is dangerous or critical, of course you take action.

You have to do something to get out of this immediate challenge, but it's highly unlikely that in this moment there is immediate danger or your situation is critical right now. First step then is coming into this moment and realizing, okay, you become aware of sense perceptions. Then you become aware of thoughts.

It may take a little while for some people who are deeply identified with the stream of thinking. It may not even be very easy at first to become aware of sense perceptions, which is part of being present. Why is it not easy for many people to become aware of sense perceptions?

Because their entire consciousness is continuously being absorbed by the conditioned mind. And so their entire attention is in the thought processes. Their entire attention is consumed by unconscious thought processes.

And if somebody says to them, become aware of your surroundings, it may not be easy at first for people who are deeply, deeply trapped in fearful thinking, particularly, to even liberate some of their attention, so to speak, take some of your attention away from thinking and direct it towards sensory perception. So you may find, particularly when you find yourself in a challenging situation, when the mind has become very reactive and is thinking and thinking, what am I going to do now? What's going to happen to me?

I need to do something, but I don't know what. And all kinds of scenarios. So your mind is, your attention is completely taken up by the unconscious thought processes.

And if then I say, or whoever it is says, become aware of your sense perceptions, you may find there is an almost magnetic pull by your mind. It wants to continue thinking, and it has a certain, I sometimes call it a certain gravitational pull. There's a gravitational pull like a magnet, and you cannot free even a small part of your conscious attention and give it to sense perception.

And sometimes your mind may even be creating a thought that tells you why you cannot give attention to sense perception. And that thought might tell you, what's the point? I've got other problems now.

I have to think about my life. I can't, this is completely irrelevant. I have to solve the big problem of me, my life, my life situation.

I have to think about this. Don't tell me about, become aware of my surroundings or sense perception is pointless. So that the gravitational pull of the conditioned mind is there, and it might even find some kind of justification to prevent you from taking attention, even some attention away from unconscious thinking.

But once you discover that, you say, okay, you don't have to believe in every thought that arises in your mind. You don't have to believe every thought. And even that little realization, that little realization, I don't have to believe in every thought that comes into my mind is already the beginning of a liberation from your mind.

Oh, I don't have to believe in every thought. Interesting. Because that already implies that there's at least a minimum of awareness.

It's not just the thought processes. When you realize that you don't have to believe every thought in your mind, then that already implies that there's some awareness there from, because it's only from awareness you can be aware of a thought. This is a very subtle thing.

It's fundamental to understand this because your mind, your consciousness has another dimension. There's a dimension of consciousness in you that we can call awareness or presence. And most people still don't know that.

And millions on our planet still are so identified with the mind, they have almost no awareness. Some awareness occasionally arises, but they don't recognize it. In other words, there may be occasional moments when the mind subsides briefly.

And that's a little bit of a liberation, but they don't really, they don't know, they don't recognize that and immediately the mind starts up again. So you become aware of your thought processes. And then you realize how much of your thinking is directed towards the future, how much it is creating a scenario that is fearful.

And you realize the connection between what your mind is saying, the voice in the head, it's partly a voice in the head that thinks about, it could also be a visual images that arise to accompany the voice in the head. There are visual images that arise. And when these visual images arise, then for example, you see yourself suddenly as a homeless person sitting on a bench.

Oh my God. You see yourself living in your car. Oh my God.

And fear arises. But the thing is, if you were actually living in your car for a while, some people are, and if you became present in that moment, it actually wouldn't be that bad. Somebody once gave me an old car.

That was the first car I ever had. That was shortly after I spent a period of homelessness. There were sometimes nights when I spent in that old car and I enjoyed it tremendously.

It was just almost romantic to be in this little bubble. This is just a little anecdote. What this is pointing to is really the present moment is never quite as bad as the mental projection of some future bad moment.

And in the mental projection of some future bad moment, there's nothing you can do about it. But if there's something in the present moment, you can meet whatever arises with the power of your conscious presence. This is what is.

So you become, you come into this moment, become aware of this moment and realize in this moment, there is no problem as such. That's a very strange realization. It's not a denial.

It's not a denial. It takes you to a deeper level, a deeper consciousness, and that is presence or awareness. So you realize coming into this moment, you've taken some attention out of your thinking mind and some attention now goes into sense perceptions.

This is a very important part of becoming present. In this moment, sense perception means you look around and you listen, whatever noise may be there. And you really give attention to whatever it is you're looking at or listening to.

You become, come to your senses. If you come to your senses, look at the sky, trees. Anything natural is the best thing to look at if you can, but it could be anything.

So you come to your senses means there's less mind activity, more presence. And then we become aware that the mind activity that you have been engaged in is ultimately not helpful. That the mind activity itself, the narrative, these unconscious scenarios that the mind created, they are not helpful.

You become aware that worrying is not helpful. And worrying, which is thinking in circles, thinking the same things in the same lines, again, without any possibility of taking action. It's not only not helpful, it's actually destructive.

And when you become aware of that, you can more and more let go of unhelpful, mind activity and replace it with aware presence in the now. Now, what about the fear? What about the anxiety?

The anxiety that has been in you for many people, it's in the background most of their lives, some fear, some anxiety. And when they're being challenged as now, the anxiety that is a kind of background, distant background noise for some people is almost always there, but sometimes obscured by them a second, that suddenly becomes very pronounced. This anxiety in the face of a challenge, the anxiety that had already been there in the background, the fear, that now comes out fully and you are in the grip of it.

And now you become aware of the link between your thought processes and your emotions. And you realize that your unconscious thought process, such as boring, actually fuel the emotion that we call fear or anxiety continuously. So a vicious circle arises, and then the emotion that you feel, which you feel it, tend to feel it in your stomach, you feel it, a contraction, almost a painful thing dwelling in your stomach or solar plexus area, but it can affect the whole body.

The whole body can be tense. It interferes with the harmonious functioning of your body. So it's very, this anxiety lowers your immune system on the physical level.

Even mainstream medicine recognizes the fact that what they call stress, which stress is mostly fear and anxiety, it lowers your immune system and you're much more susceptible to illness. It doesn't mean if you're not anxious, you will never catch the illness, but you are much more susceptible to being sick when you are in an almost continuous state of stress or anxiety. So then the fear, of course, rises up back into your mind and creates more emotionally charged fearful thinking, which is not just fearful thinking.

It's now emotionally charged fearful thinking. And that creates even more of that emotion. This is why it's called a vicious circle.

The fearful thinking feeds the fearful emotion with energy. One could say the fearful thinking vibrates at the same frequency as the fearful emotion. So it is food that the emotion loves.

So it wants more of it. Once you're on the grip of worrying, anxious thinking, you don't want to stop. Well, you might want to stop, but you are not even there when you're completely identified.

It does not want to stop. So you are trapped in a fearful vicious circle of fearful thinking, creating fearful, the emotion of fear and the emotion of fear rising back up into your mind and creating emotionally charged fearful thinking. And when you are in that state, you cannot think clearly.

Whatever thought that arises, what do I have to do now? What can I do now? It's very unlikely that you will have a creative and a useful thought.

Whatever your action you take on the basis of fearful thinking is likely to be not wise, not effective and probably wrong and leads to more suffering. In whatever way you interpret the world through the veil of fearful thinking, in whatever way you interpret the world when you're in the grip of fearful thinking is going to be a complete misinterpretation. But to you, when you identify with it, it's the reality.

So the first thing is to become aware of thoughts and emotions. That means the awareness has arisen. It's there.

Then once you recognize the futility and destructive nature of certain types of thinking, you're able to increasingly let go of it and replace it, not immediately necessarily with positive thoughts, because you still have a negative emotion there. So if you immediately replace the unconscious fearful thinking with positive thoughts, there's a conflict between the emotion that is still there, which is the fear, and the thoughts that are floating on top there, and you will feel that there's something not right because the emotion says you're in a critical state and your mind has a thought that all is well, life is good, I'm going to be abundant. It's unlikely that this will be effective. So again, realize what kind of thoughts go through your mind, recognize the futility and destructive nature of these types of thought, and then replace these thoughts, not immediately with positive thoughts, but with awareness.

Replace, instead of engaged in negative thinking, be more present as much as you can, be more in the present moment, because after all, that's all there ever is. The mind doesn't seem to know that. All there ever is, is the present moment.

There's nothing else ever in your life, so you might as well give it some attention. You might as well make it the focus of your life, because that is, it unfolds in this now moment, everything. Future never comes, it's always now.

When the future comes, it's the now. When the past happened, it was the now. When you remember the past, you remember it now.

When you think about future, you think about it now. There is only now, so you might as well give it your fullest attention, make it the focal point of your life, and then see what you can do with the so-called future. But first, you need to come into a relationship with the now that is helpful, sane, and that is friendly.

Become friendly with them. When you enter the now, you see the now is not really that, is not a threatening place most of the time, except when there's an emergency happening, then you have to do something, an immediate life-threatening or whatever it is. But the now is actually a much more benign place than the mind would be able to recognize.

But you need to have your awareness there. You have to, you need to be aware. You need to be present in the now in order to recognize that the now is actually, can actually be your friend.

It's not your enemy. The now is your friend. You become friendly with the present moment.

So you begin to cut the link between your thought processes and the emotion because you let go of these fearful thoughts. You recognize their futility. Instead, you're much more present.

Thoughts will occasionally still come in, and then you recognize them, let go, be more present. However, in that presence, the emotion of fear may not and probably will not immediately disappear because it's been there for a long time. So even if you no longer fuel the emotion with your thinking, you become present, and you may notice, yes, I'm aware of, more aware of sense perceptions, the aliveness of this moment.

You can see perhaps beauty in things, the things that you didn't give any attention to before. However, you can also still feel this anxiety or fear living in you, still there. Even when you're no longer feeding it with your thoughts, you can still feel it, there it is.

And that becomes part of your experience of the present moment, that anxiety. Now, what do you do with it? The normal tendency would be to say, I want to get rid of this.

I shouldn't be feeling this. I don't want to feel this. And some people cannot tolerate the anxiety, so they need to, they might go to their doctor and say, please do something about this anxiety.

The doctor will then give you a prescription. In some extreme cases, those things may be temporarily helpful in some extreme cases, but a lot of the time you would have missed an opportunity. And that is the opportunity of evolving through facing pain or suffering.

If you face the emotional pain that you feel, that it's anxiety or fear, and not try to run away from it, or say, I can't, it becomes so uncomfortable. Being in your own skin can become so unpleasant and uncomfortable that you just want to run away or say, please give me something to do it. I don't have to feel this anymore.

But actually it doesn't help to want to get rid of it. It just creates another layer of anxiety or problems on top of the emotion. Now, I suggest as an alternative approach is to make the emotion that you feel that still lives in you part of your experience of the present moment and accept it in the way you accept the totality of the present moment.

And that's a new way of living, a very powerful way of living, a very powerful way of connecting with a deeper level of consciousness in you of finding enormous power that dwells in you. If you can accept the present moment as it is internally, externally, and internally. So it's not going to kill you.

The anxiety is there, but it's not going to kill you. It might kill you if you react to it and create further anxiety. And you then allow the anxiety to be there as it is completely.

It's almost like saying, it sounds a little strange. It's almost like saying, I don't mind being anxious. Sounds very paradoxical, but it's a very interesting experiment you can conduct.

Any form of unhappiness, of course, some unhappiness is telling you that something is wrong in your life. That's a different story. But habit to unhappiness that arises in you no matter where you go and what you do, unhappiness arises in you.

No matter where you go and what you do, fear and anxiety are there. And this applies to countless humans on the planet. Now, as an experiment, as I said, what happens when they say, I don't mind being unhappy.

I don't mind being anxious. But of course, you're not fueling the anxiety with your thinking. You're aware of your anxiety.

So if you reach that step where you're no longer giving it further fuel or food, and you're becoming aware of the anxiety. And as you place your attention on it, which is part of the attention that's in the present moment, you become aware that it's actually, there's very intense energy in that fear. Almost a burning energy in that fear.

But the energy is not a flowing energy. It's trapped energy. It's like being in a, like a boiling kettle.

You're holding the lid down. It's the energy is trapped, but there is enormous life energy in that fear. And if you can completely accept your fear at this moment, without feeding it any longer with your thinking, just being aware of it, that's what it is.

You may find in a very subtle ways, a change happening. And the change is, it's a transmutation of this energy of fear. When you accept it completely, a transmutation of this energy into intense presence.

So the same energy that before was fear, when it's completely accepted, it suddenly goes, and there's enormous power that was in there trapped. And suddenly it becomes fuel for your consciousness, becomes transmuted into presence or awareness. When it's completely accepted, and then it's no longer fear.

It's just in suddenly intense awareness. And that intense awareness is like a, one could almost say a higher intelligence that suddenly begins to operate in you. You're no longer just reliant on the conditioning of your mind.

There's an intense presence there. And now it doesn't mean it happens once, and then it's never fear again. After that experience, you have to experiment.

It may not last very long, the initial transmutation, then you may fall back into fear. And the fear may repeatedly try to rise back up into your mind and make you think fearful thoughts. And from time to time, it probably will succeed again.

And you fall back into the same pattern, but then more and more at shorter and shorter intervals, you wake up again and you realize that this is what's happening. And so, and then again, you come to a place of just acceptance, and then notice that the transmutation happens again. It is not just fear.

It can be with any kind of suffering in your life. When it's completely accepted, a transmutation begins to happen. And that is how suffering is actually an essential part of the evolution of human consciousness.

Because if you reach a point where suffering can be transmuted into a higher consciousness, awareness or presence, it becomes fuel for presence. The collective suffering that humans are experiencing at the present time is also an opportunity that's opening up for millions of humans, not that they're all going to recognize that and be able to use it, but some will, perhaps many an opportunity for the beginning of an awakening, or perhaps even more than just the beginning of an awakening, the opportunity for an awakening of consciousness. Because if you don't, then you stay stuck in suffering and you cannot create, manifest a better life for yourself or a better world from the place of suffering.

You need to have gone beyond suffering in order to be able to manifest a better world. So the foundational step then is what I just described. And then you, as the transmutational process continues in you, then you're able occasionally to perhaps have certain thoughts that are no longer in conflict with the emotional reality in you, because there has been a transmutation of the fear.

And when you can feel that intense presence, this is a good time, if you even want to do it, you can have a visualization or an affirmation of the goodness of life or the abundance of life, that life is abundant and it's no longer a lie. Because when you sense that presence in you, before it was fear, perhaps, and then it's become presence, there is a feeling of intense aliveness. There is a heightened aliveness in that presence that would not have been there if life had not challenged you and first made you suffer and then caused you to become more conscious in order to transcend the suffering.

That's how evolution happens. And so there is an aliveness in that conscious presence that is inseparable from what we may call abundance. That brings me to one of my favorite sayings of Jesus.

He said, I want you to have abundant life. That's in one translation. In another translation, he says, I want you to have the fullness of life.

So some Bibles translate it as abundant life. Some Bibles translate it as the fullness of life. I want you to have the fullness of life.

He's talking, yes, abundant life. What does that mean? Abundance in conventional terms, when you think of abundance, we think of many things.

You can have lots of things and you have abundance. But true abundance is something, it's not lots of things, although maybe lots of things may come to you, but you don't need lots of things in order to experience abundance. You experience abundance through experiencing the presence within you is the abundance.

It is the fullness of life.

[Speaker 3] (38:54 - 39:06)

The fullness of life that is within you now. Oh, and then we come to another saying of Jesus.

[Speaker 1] (39:06 - 49:18)

So talking about Jesus, let's use another very important. The most important thing anybody's ever said about manifesting things is in one sentence that Jesus said, all the books written about manifesting. Once you understand that one sentence, you don't need to read any of them.

And that sentence is, when you pray for something, believe that you have received it and it will be yours. Now, the key, of course, is not believe that you will receive it. The key is believe that you have received it, and then it will be yours.

The will be refers to the thing, whatever it is that you pray for. But what does that mean? How can you believe that you have received it when obviously you haven't received it?

Now, this can only be understood together with his statement about the fullness of life. It is when you realize the fullness of life that is the power of your own consciousness. It's not your own, but let's just call it your own.

It's universal consciousness. And this awareness, this presence is universal consciousness. It is, let's temporarily call it your consciousness.

It's not yours because if you say your consciousness, you have a separation between you and consciousness, but there is no duality here. There's only the consciousness that you are. So when you realize that this, the power of your consciousness, the power of consciousness is the fullness of life.

And nothing that you could add to yourself could be any greater than that. So when you realize the fullness of life, which you can only realize in the present moment, when the emotion of fear or other negative emotion has become transmuted into intense presence, then this intense presence is the fullness of life. Anything else that you could obtain in life and that you as a person may want, or may enjoy, or may need on a personal level is the icing on the cake.

Now to this important realization that all manifestation, you can only be a really successful manifestation practitioner if you realize that whatever you manifest is the icing on the cake, because you already have the cake. You are the cake. If you don't realize that, then life is frustrating because even whatever you do manifest, if you think that's the cake, it's not going to satisfy you for long.

It might even make you sick if you eat too much cake. It may make you sick. So the cake is the essence of who you are, is the presence.

If you then, if you bring an image of what you want to obtain or achieve into that feeling of presence or aliveness, then that can become a very powerful manifestation. You want to have a better place to live, perhaps, whatever it is, but you don't need it to experience the fullness of life. You can only be successful at manifesting if you don't need whatever it is that you want to manifest in order to give you the experience of the fullness of life, which we could use other words to describe it, the experience of being fully yourself, the experience of having made it, the experience of a fuller sense of identity, whatever it may be, because people don't, they don't want the thing that they think they want.

They want the feeling that that thing will give them. You don't want the car just for the sake of the car. You want the feeling that is associated with a car and the mental image that's associated with, I am the owner of this car, it's my car.

That's what they want. The car itself would be meaningless. So they want, whatever they want is always a secondary thing.

They want this fullness of life through something else. So I'm really describing how manifestation does not work. And even if it did work in that way, and sometimes it does in a limited way, it's not the answer and it doesn't make you happy and it won't ultimately solve anything.

So the powerful manifesto, if that's a word, is the one who was already in touch with the fullness of life and manifest from the fullness of life. And again, Jesus said, there are so many beautiful things there. Find only the kingdom of heaven that is within you, which is, again, the fullness of life, which is the presence, the unconditioned consciousness, and all the things that you need or think you need will be added onto you.

That's an amazing thing. It's so, it's even when you do not specifically attempt or practice manifesting specific things in your life, which some people do and some don't, it's an interesting practice. Even if you did want to manifest specific things, your life will change as a result of being in touch with that dimension within you, the fullness of life, because from there, manifestation happens.

It even happens when you're no longer even want to manifest because you're fine, but you represent then a different level of consciousness in this world. And the way in which you experience this world changes, and the way in which you affect the world changes. So you cannot help but manifest when you undergo this shift in consciousness.

And even if you don't undergo it fully, you still begin to manifest a different world. First of all, a different world for yourself, because the way in which you experience the world depends on your state of consciousness. The one person may react to the same circumstances very differently from another person, depending on their level of consciousness.

So one person gets encounter a particular form of adversity, a very unconscious person, and reacts in their way. And so they experience a very different world from a person who meets the same adversity from a different, from an awakened state of consciousness, experiencing a different world. And not only that, the way in which the, let's say, whatever event you're experiencing in the present moment, the state of consciousness from which you meet this event determines the subsequent development of that event.

This is a somewhat esoteric thing, but the so-called world and your state of consciousness are a single phenomenon. There is not really a world if nobody experiences it. So the consciousness that you are in the world are a single thing.

When your consciousness changes, the world changes. First of all, the way in which you experience the world changes, it basically means the world changes for you. And if the world changes for a sufficient number of people, then even the so-called outside world changes.

So for the world to change, there needs to be a shift in consciousness. But you begin to experience this in your own life first, and then you begin to inhabit a different world. So you always, you manifest, of course, always, most people manifest, as I'm sure you know, most people manifest unconsciously because they're conditioning, the way in which your mind is conditioned determines how they experience events in their life.

And that becomes their world. So they manifest every moment. So how do you manifest your experience of this moment?

That's another way of looking at manifestation. How do you manifest this moment? It depends on your level of state of consciousness.

You are not dependent, ultimately, on external conditions. And that's when you realize that, that you are not at the mercy of what's happening or not happening around you. This is a wonderful realization, a wonderful freedom, that your consciousness is not dependent on this or that happening or not happening.

That's an incredible realization and sense of liberation.

Eckhart Tolle Releasing The Ego's Grip [652e9ebc-69dd-4d24-b246-ba7b9d7d161b]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:07)

Releasing the Ego's Grip. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about the pitfalls of the ego and the need to feel superior. He explains we seek an identity through external distinction, like wealth, fame, even our nationality, to dispel the anxiety that we're not enough.

He says the focus on image creates a false sense of self. He shares examples from his own life. He shares it growing up.

His family struggled financially, which left him with low self-esteem. He asked why bad things always seem to happen to him. To bolster his feelings of inadequacy, Eckhart says he pursued intellectual achievements, which came easily, but his sense of superiority soon vanished in the wake of his negative thinking.

Eckhart says for a time he sought refuge in complaining and victimhood. But after he experienced an awakening, the old patterns gave way to something greater, and his self-hate evaporated. He explains he finally understood the meaning of Buddhist teachings about suffering and the end of suffering, and how liberation emerges when we release the ego's grip.

[Speaker 1] (1:09 - 40:01)

A huge part of identity is collective. Let's say you derive your identity from your nationality or your nation, and there's nothing wrong with that. You can be, you can love your country, this is, there's nothing wrong with that.

But what about feeling superior through being a particular nationality? That is, the ego comes in there. We happen to be in America, but it could be in any, any country.

Let's say I'm American. It's obviously superior to everybody else. Implication, it could, I'm just seeing an example here, could, and if we're in another country, I would say that nationality.

Now imagine that the entire planet was American, and everybody's American. You could no longer define your sense of self through being American. It's impossible, because you haven't got the other anymore.

The other has disappeared. The whole thing has become meaningless. I'm American.

The other says, me too. And what about, yeah, me too. In fact, it wouldn't only be that.

The entire term American would not exist in the absence of the other, would disappear. If the entire world were blue, everything is blue, every human is blue, the word blue would not exist. You need the other.

So the ego needs the other, and it defines itself through the other, and it needs a sense of superiority towards the other. I'm talking about this because some of you may still have remnants of that in your life, and so it's very helpful to know how it operates, so when it surfaces in your life, you can recognize it, and in the act of recognizing it, you become free. It's only when you are in the grip of the ego, then you are a slave.

You are possessed by, ultimately, the egoic mind, without knowing it. You're possessed by the stream of thinking that goes through your head, and if you say, I think, that would not ultimately be true, because people who are completely identified with the stream of thinking, they don't think, because thinking, when you say, I think, it implies volition. It implies that you have some kind of exercise, some kind of control over, but for many people, the thinking happens in their mind, and they have no choice in what thought comes into their mind.

So it's not that they think, the thinking happens to them. They might say, I'm thinking about my problems, and I can't stop thinking about my life. It's just, I can't stop.

You are not thinking. The thinking happens to you. You're not doing it in the same way that you're not beating your heart.

You can't say, I'm beating my heart. The heartbeat happens to you, and even breathing. Breathing, you can stop it for a little while, but not for long.

The breathing happens to you, too. It takes place of its own accord, and in the same way, anybody who is completely identified to the stream of thinking is something that happens to you. It lives in you, pretends to be you, whether the story of the me is predominantly of a personal kind, in which case you feel it's based on the image of possessions, it's based on abilities that you have but that others do not have, something you can do, and there's nothing wrong with that.

It's a wonderful thing to cultivate skills, whatever it may be, to learn to play an instrument, to learn to write, to dance, many, many things. It's a wonderful thing to engage in acquiring new skills and new abilities. It's part of life, but the question is, is that being used unconsciously in the search for an enhanced sense of self, a stronger identity, in which case you always need the other who cannot do what you can do.

If you want to be famous, many egos want to be famous, and then feel, once I'm famous, then everything will be great. Once I just want to be famous. Now, again, in order to be famous, the implication is that there's millions of people who are not famous.

You need millions of people to be not famous, because otherwise fame has no meaning. So when you say, I want to be a celebrity, at the same time you're saying, I want millions of people not to be a celebrity. It's amazing.

Imagine, let's go to some twilight zone place, and suddenly you wake up in a country where everybody is famous. Everybody is equally famous, which just means, of course, that everybody knows each other, and everyone says, oh, you are so great. And whoever you meet says, you are so great.

So are you. You are just wonderful. Now, that may sound quite nice, but to the ego, it's not satisfying at all.

The whole thing would be meaningless to the ego. If everybody is famous, it means nothing anymore. Then you have to look for something else.

So clothes, whatever it may be, some people pay little attention to the way they dress. For others, it's important, not always the case of ego identification. They may just enjoy something lovely, but in other cases, it is unconsciously seeking for more of an identity, differentiates yourself from others.

Some people dress in a weird way, very weird clothes. And of course, your ego is saying, look at me, I'm a non-conformist. Look at you, you are all conformists.

Look the way I, not me, I'm just an example. Look the way I dress, which clearly shows that I'm superior to you because I'm a non-conformist. And so are my friends.

All my friends are non-conformists too. We live together. Again, it's a statement that you said you need, again, you need the other.

The other is inferior. One way or another, if the other is not inferior, the ego cannot survive. It's somewhat insane, but that's how it operates.

Collective egos, collective egos are huge in some countries or in some cultures more than others. In our Western civilization, the ego tends to be a bit more personal, their personal characteristic that you look for to enhance your sense of self. In other cultures, and of course older cultures, it was mainly collective, the collective identification with the tribe.

You are a member of this tribe and all the other tribes are less than human. Only we, we are the ones, whatever you call yourself, we are, the others are nothing. That's early manifestations of collective ego are like that.

And in later times, nationalism and so on are expressions of the same egoic dysfunction. So, it's amazing once you recognize how and where the ego seeks superiority. In the past, in many countries, because we had a kind of, for a long time, we had a Yang civilization, a patriarchal society that only started to change around the 60s for Western civilization.

And in some places, it's still very much Yang, where the man has more power than the woman. So, any male that comes into this world, a significant part of his identity in those places is, I'm a man. The implication being, no matter how stupid you are, you're automatically superior to 50% of the population who are not a man.

So, that gives you your sense of, a huge chunk of your sense of self is you're a man. Again, a fiction, a fiction in your mind. If everybody were a man, it would be meaningless.

I had a struggle in my early life to find an identity. Well, many youngsters have, but of course, my struggle was much more serious than other people's struggle. Much worse than yours.

Youngsters look for, at an early age, look for an identity. You have to, for example, you see it in impoverished parts of big cities where you have gangs. After you have shelter and food, the next thing that humans look for is an identity.

It's so important. It's a huge psychological need. So, in parts of big cities, you have gangs.

You have tattoos that show what gang you belong to. Then they commit murder and often are murdered just for this identity, just to have an identity. I need to belong to this.

That's something. You desperately need the other who is not part of your gang. The way I see it is, the ego is something that grows until you reach adulthood, and as you go into an ideal world, and as you reach adulthood, you slowly begin to grow out of identification with a false sense of self.

Then you grow into a deeper, and of course, this is where we are going here tonight. We're on the way. You go into a deeper sense of identity that has nothing to do with the surface reality of the egoic sense of self.

So, that's where we are going. But unfortunately, in this world, still the majority of humans are stuck in the egoic consciousness to the end of their lives. But to a greater or lesser degree, the egoic consciousness varies in its intensity or density from person to person.

Not every human has the same huge ego. Some egos are gigantic, and other egos are a little bit smaller with small cracks into something deeper, where a human being can relinquish temporarily their sense of self, their sense of the story of me, and temporarily they go, ah, wow, look at that sky. Or you listen to some music, I mean real music, not the kind of thing they play in restaurants.

You listen to some music, and temporarily it liberates you, it gives you a taste. While you listen, or while you might even play the music, while you play this music, temporarily you have a glimpse of the state of consciousness that we might call self-transcendence.

And so it feels enormously wonderful in that state.

It's not just the sounds that you are either listening to or producing and listening to. Yes, they have something to do with it, but what these sounds do is they temporarily cause the compulsive thinker to recede. A presence arises from within you, so the entire egoic identity temporarily recedes.

You can sometimes see that when people listen to music or play music, and then there's a kind of temporary transformation in them. They go, ah. It's a liberation.

It's a temporary liberation from yourself. But usually it doesn't last. But it's good to have a glimpse of this self-transcendence.

So we have the ego. As I said, I had quite a struggle finding an identity at first. The body couldn't be my identity because I had a not very strong body.

So people made fun of me, and I wasn't very strong, so I didn't move to Miami for that reason. And so my ego couldn't go do very much there, and it would look for something else. Now, my parents didn't have much money, so we didn't have more than anybody else.

In fact, we had less than most people. So where would the ego go there? I can't do anything.

I'm looking, looking. Where is my identity? Well, the first identity I found is a beginning of an unhappy and complaining me.

That was the first beginning where I had a thought form. And whenever something bad happened in my family, which was always, there's always some drama going on, almost every other day something bad happened. So the thought in my mind was, of course, some bad things always happen to me.

For several years, I had this persistent thought, bad things always happen to me. Of course, I knew it. I knew it wouldn't go.

I knew we couldn't go on vacation because there's no money, and here we are stuck at home. And then I had to lie and say, we're back to school. And they said, where did you go on a vacation?

I had to invent some place where we went because we didn't go anywhere. But I couldn't say, you couldn't say, well, we couldn't afford your vacation. Couldn't say that.

It's a desperate struggle for more of an identity. Until finally, when I reached the age of 19, 20, I finally found that I can actually read books. I loved reading books.

And I can acquire knowledge. And I become an intellectual. If I become an intellectual, I'll be more knowledgeable than most people.

Got it. I got it. I found.

Now, that was the road to unhappiness too, unfortunately, because as acquired more knowledge, and then I showed off my knowledge, feeling very superior to others. And, but strangely enough, together with that came a growing sense of depression and unhappiness. There was a false sense of self.

And there was a continuous fear of not knowing enough, of not being enough, of others knowing more. And finally, I made it to university. And of course, there were always others who knew more than me.

And then became more and more unhappy. So interesting how one looks. There's always dissatisfaction that comes.

Now, for many humans, I'm just in the last stage of explaining egoic identity and its various manifestations. For many humans, they desperately search for more of an identity. And if they can't find it, if you don't have more than others, you don't look better than others, you're not stronger than others, your abilities are not greater than other people's abilities, you don't know more than other people.

So where are you? Where are you superior to others? Where?

What does the ego do? Where does it find its sustenance? One simple thing it can do, it can continuously, either mentally or out aloud, it can complain.

It complains about places. It complains about situations. It complains about other people.

It complains about everything, in your mind or out aloud. Now, what is the implication when you complain? The implication when you complain is, let's say you're complaining about somebody, you know what he did?

You would never ever guess what he did. And then he said this, and then I said that. He would always do that to me.

He always does it. He's completely dishonest. Stories, one story after another.

But in every story you complain about something or somebody, the implication being that you are superior, because you are the judge. You are judging this person as inferior. When you complain about a person, the implication is you are superior.

When you complain about even a situation, you complain about a situation or a place, the implication, the unspoken implication is you're superior to that situation. You're just, this is how it is. I'll tell you how it is.

That's how it is. It's awful. Just look at that.

Great. The ego can live on complaining alone, because you're always, by implication, superior to that which you are complaining about. So people are trapped in that.

They don't know it. And so there may still be remnants in one or two of you of that mindset that loves complaining. And every complaint strengthens the fictitious sense of self.

And then it loves enemies. The ego loves connected, these are connected. The ego loves to make other people into enemies, because you emphasize the otherness of others by treating them as an enemy.

To define your fictitious sense of self, you need the other who is not what you are, who is less than you. The ego loves to emphasize the otherness of others and say, these people are my enemies, whether you call them enemies or not. You do it, the ego does it on a personal level.

You do it on a collective level to other countries. This is a tendency to treat other countries as enemies. I can see it sometimes when I read the news, and so you can see there's an unconscious collective mind pattern.

The people don't even know what they're doing, because they're in the grip of a collective mind pattern. They need to demonize another country. And they did it much more strongly, of course, in the first half of the 20th century.

But even now, this pattern survives. You need to define yourself through the the other. Okay, so we have emphasized the otherness of others by complaining or judging and so on.

Continuously gossiping, being critical about people and situations. Always find something that's wrong. When you find something that's wrong, you are far superior.

You're pronouncing that this is wrong. I know. And if that doesn't work, a great one, and this is the last one I give as an example, if you don't know more than others, you don't have more than others, a great egoic identity is to see yourself as a victim of others.

Wow, that's great. You are the victim or a particular group that you belong to is a victim. Now, I'm not saying there have not been and are certain groups that have been victimized.

That's true. But the question is, are you deriving your sense of identity from something that ultimately is just a fact that happens or has happened? This is a very common one, especially these days, because we have moved from a yang dominated society into a more yin dominated society move, which was a wonderful, necessary thing.

And that means humans have developed an empathy towards others that they didn't have before. An empathy with other human beings, an empathy with other groups of human beings, the disadvantaged, the poor, the marginalized, minorities, because we moved from yang into yin, this compassion and empathy arose was a wonderful, wonderful and necessary thing. But anything can be used by the ego, the ego will get in there, no matter what you do, when you're not conscious enough.

So because there is much more empathy, which is a great thing, but you take it so much further, and more and more humans unconsciously realize that, oh, either I can derive very satisfying, well, not really no, no egoic sense of identity is ultimately satisfying. But I can derive a strong sense of identity from considering myself being a victim. You have to be very careful with that, that you don't fall into that trap.

It's very easy to fall into. So any victim identity, which can also rise through an illness, by the way, you can, if you have contracted a serious illness, in your mind, you form a mental image of me, the sufferer of this illness, I am, and that can become the main part of your fictitious identity, I'm the sufferer of this illness. Or if something bad has happened to you in the past, which bad things have happened to many of you.

But are you deriving your identity from that? So basically, we've been talking about the bad news, which is the ego. And so where's the good news?

The good news is that there is in you, in every human, but in most humans, it's still majority of humans, it's still dormant, so to speak, there is the possibility of realizing a deeper dimension of consciousness than the egoic consciousness. That possibility is in every human, but it's not realized in every human. But we could almost look at it as a seed that has not yet sprouted in many, many humans, and they are still stuck with it.

In most of you, the seed of this new consciousness, or the transcendent consciousness, which is presence, has sprouted with one or two exceptions. Some people didn't come here by their own free will. They were dragged here by somebody, and they're sitting there longing to get away.

I shouldn't have, why did I, couldn't I say no? I should have said no. This man is insane, I don't want to...

All the ancient teachings really point to this awakening, whether they call it, as the Buddha called it, this is the end of suffering, which really means it's the end of unhappiness, which is self-generated in your mind. Buddha defined his teaching as, he said, I show you suffering and the end of suffering. By saying that, he meant, I show you how suffering arises, and I show you how it can end.

Suffering is the unhappiness in whatever form it manifests, and if unhappiness manifests in you in whatever form, you spread it. If you make yourself unhappy, you make others around you unhappy, without even knowing it, because you make yourself unhappy without knowing it, you make others unhappy without knowing it, it becomes your reality. And it used to be the case that you make others unhappy in your immediate environment, but nowadays, because of the wonderful advantages of technology, you can make others unhappy on the other part of the world too.

And they read your comments and say, oh yeah. So, through the miracle of technology, the unconscious unhappiness can spread very, very quickly, and the toxicity of the egoic state of consciousness can very quickly engulf the entire planet. Wow, great achievement.

So, the Buddha said, I show you suffering and the end of suffering. Jesus talked about a strange term called salvation. Salvation is something, again, as I see it, it's the same thing, different word for the same thing.

Jesus also talked about the kingdom of heaven being misinterpreted for 2,000 years, because people think kingdom of heaven is where you go to when you die, or kingdom of heaven is something that eventually comes here, and we just need to wait for it. Although Jesus clearly said, literally, I usually don't keep quotes in my mind, but I happen to remember this one. He clearly said, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be perceived.

You cannot say, oh, it's over there, or it's over there, for I tell you, the kingdom of heaven is within you. So, it's not an external thing that you can say, there it is, because the kingdom of heaven is a state of consciousness that is possible for humans to realize. And I would like to change the way this term has been written about.

Kingdom of heaven belongs to the terminology, belongs to previous ages. In our modern world, it becomes more understandable if we rephrase the kingdom of heaven and call it, or kingdom, I suggest, dimension. It's the realm, it's the dimension.

Heaven, what's heaven? Heaven is the vast sky. Heaven is the vastness.

In many languages, sky and heaven are the same word. It's the vastness of the sky. So, he talked about the dimension, and this heaven, I translate as spaciousness, because the closest thing in this sense-perceived world that you can get to spaciousness, what is it?

I mean, how do you find an analogy for spaciousness, the vast spaciousness of the sky? The dimension of spaciousness, the kingdom of heaven that is within you. So, within you, there is a dimension of consciousness that is spacious.

It is not cluttered. It is not full of the clutter of one thought after another. Continuous mental noise.

That's not what it is. It is a dimension of inner spaciousness. So, this is what he was pointing to.

Another term the Buddha used, of course, is the term emptiness, which again, sunyata is one term in Sanskrit. Sunyata, emptiness. Again, I don't like that translation very much.

Sunyata is spaciousness. Spaciousness. One of the main things the Buddha taught is spaciousness, inner spaciousness.

So, what is inner spaciousness? Inner spaciousness is here and now, in this moment, right here and now, you don't remember anything about your past or anything about your so-called future. Let's say, what is left of you, here and now, if you make no reference to the past, if you make no reference to the future, in fact, if you pretend that past and future don't exist.

Is there anything left of you if you do not remember your past? Not even your name, not even your email address. You don't remember your past and there's no future.

Let's say you have no past and no future. What is left of you? And you have to be very alert to find the answer to that.

You have to be very alert. There's no past. There's only this moment.

And what is it? Are you still there? If you do not remember your past, in other words, if you don't think, are you still there?

Is it possible for just a moment to not think without falling asleep? It is. It only needs to be maybe just a few seconds at first, not thinking, just a sense of inner spaciousness, a moment without thought.

What remains when you relinquish thinking? An alertness remains, an awareness remains, a sense of beingness or presence remains that you cannot define in any way. A sense of I am, but you can't add anything to the I am.

You just know your beingness. You know that you are. You can sense the beingness that you are.

Perhaps you can even sense it with your entire body. Every cell of the body sense the beingness of you. That is the entry point in something, a deeper sense of beingness.

I am. I call it, this is a term I didn't write in the books because it hadn't come to me at that point yet. This is a term that I now call the deep I.

You have the surface I when you say I need, I want, I love you, I hate you, I love myself, I hate myself, I don't like, I like. It's the surface I, the mind created. The deep I is the spacious I.

The deep I is the realization of beingness, the realization that you are. But that you is very different from the surface you, the surface I that has no history. That dimension of consciousness has no history.

It has no time to it. It is what is called in spiritual literature, eternity. Eternity meaning not endless time, but timelessness.

Eternity is timeless. There is a deeper dimension of consciousness in every human. It is not yours.

I might sometimes call it your dimension, but it's not yours. When you enter this, the deeper dimension of consciousness in which you are not thinking, but you remain alert with no tension in it. There's no tension, just an alert presence.

Maybe a little bit like the bird that goes, just alert. That's the deep I that connects you, that is one with something very profound that goes far beyond who you are as this temporary little entity, because you've come out of that temporarily as this being, the being of you, the being that incarnates temporarily and takes form as a human being with a name and a history, very short-lived. That being comes from a very deep transcendent place, and it is ultimately the light of consciousness.

All you know when you are not thinking about your past and your future, and in fact when you are not thinking, all that remains for you to know is that you are conscious. If you were not conscious, you wouldn't perceive all this. It's only in the light of consciousness that this is being perceived, and that's an amazing realization, because it could well be that you are dreaming this moment.

There have been philosophers asking themselves over the centuries, is life ultimately a kind of dream? You could look upon it as a dream. So let's say you're dreaming, and you're dreaming that somebody is sitting up here on this stage on a chair, and he's saying, you may be dreaming.

Now, you can doubt everything. You can doubt everything except one thing, that you are conscious. Even if you are dreaming, there must be a consciousness in which the dream appears.

That is the space for it, in the same way that what we perceive as external space allows everything to be. The most important thing about this room is not the things that are in the room, nor is it the floor, the ceilings, and the walls. That's not the essence of this room.

The essence of this room is the spaciousness, the space, but you can't actually see it. You can't really say, show me where the space is, and then you go, oh no, it's here, or it's everywhere. You can't even point at it, in the same way that you cannot point to the inner spaciousness.

That's why Jesus said, the kingdom of heaven, which is a dimension of spaciousness, does not come with signs to be perceived. You cannot perceive it. Now, what is that consciousness signs will tell you if they ever even mention the word consciousness?

In most cases, they don't, because they don't know what to do with it, because you cannot find it under the microscope, and you cannot find it by cutting open somebody's head and examining the brain. They will not find consciousness, and they will not find you. They will not find a single thought through, no matter how powerful the microscope is, so there is something in you that far transcends anything in the physical realm, and of course, yes, signs will still tell you consciousness is a byproduct of the physical brain.

It's not. The physical brain is, yes, it can be compared to a transmitter of consciousness. It could be compared to a radio receiver that receives, let's say, beautiful music, but the radio doesn't produce the music, but it's necessary for the music to express itself in this dimension, and at some point, the radio will break down.

It doesn't mean it's the end of the music. This is just an analogy, so there's undoubtedly a connection between the human brain and consciousness, but the human brain is not the physical brain. The chemical soup of the brain does not produce the miracle of this world, even the miracles that humans have produced.

Yes, they've been pretty insane in many ways, but they were also wonderful creations that happened through humans.

Eckhart Tolle Releasing Unconsciousness [26d21115-83eb-44c5-9bcb-d5ffc6dea4ef]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:33)

Releasing unconsciousness. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience and he says, sometimes we experience a gravitational force that seems to push us back into unconsciousness. We may feel overwhelmed by watching the news or experience a painful loss.

In those moments, we return to the practice of presence. That's the best thing we can do for ourselves. Eckhart says there's a higher purpose at work and awakening is deeper than our suffering.

[Speaker 1] (0:35 - 32:25)

Consciousness, the greatest mystery of the universe and the essence of who you are, undoubtedly. So the reason why you are here, on one level, there's a personal reason why you have come here. On a deeper level, you're here because the universe wants to and is in the process of becoming more conscious.

There is an arising of consciousness here. And there are, it seems, two factors at work. There is the impulse that pushes consciousness into this dimension.

And there is something else that wants to hold it back. There is a gravitational force that sometimes makes it appear that the universe is designed to keep you from becoming conscious. It's designed to sabotage your attempts of being conscious.

That is the gravitational force, the unconsciousness, a certain heaviness. When you listen or watch the news, most of the things that are presented to you as the most important things that have happened on any given day are a reflection of the gravitational force. So it can be very misleading if you actually believe that the things that you watch and listen to through the media on a daily basis, that those are the most important things that are happening on the planet at the moment.

Now, it's very, very easy to be seduced into believing that because the entire culture seems to support that view. So when you listen to the news, when you watch the news or read about it, a lot of it, maybe not all of it, occasionally you get a few interesting things that almost get in there by mistake. Most of it is about the unconsciousness and the effects of unconsciousness in humanity.

And a lot of it is about those humans who are the most unconscious. Unconscious, I believe most of you probably know what I'm talking about. Most of you will know that I'm not referring to those humans when I describe them as unconscious, that they are actually...

That is not the meaning of unconscious in the way I'm using it. And it's not the meaning of unconscious when you speak, when we use the term in a spiritual sense. So just for those few of you who may be relatively new to this or to this kind of language, the way we use unconscious here refers to complete identification with the stream of conditioned thinking that continuously occupies, goes through people's minds, plus the emotions that correspond to that stream of thinking.

There is absolutely, in an unconscious person, there is zero awareness beyond the stream of thinking, which is determined by the way in which this person has been conditioned by the surrounding culture, both the collective culture a person grows up in and the personal influences. In other words, they believe in every thought that arises in their head. There's not a slightest space between them and the thought.

There is, in an unconscious person, a complete lack of inner spaciousness. There is no awareness. There's only thinking.

And spiritual awakening, of course, is the awakening of awareness, which is a dimension of consciousness. That is, we can use either one of two words, that is deeper than thinking, or we could use another word, which I perhaps tend to use more often. None of these words is absolutely correct.

Higher than thinking. There is the possibility in every human for the arising of a dimension of consciousness that transcends thinking. Now, in many humans, that possibility is a latent one.

It's dormant. It's a seed that has not sprouted whatsoever. But any human, no matter how unconscious, can, if certain things happen to this human being, there's the possibility that even the most unconscious human can suddenly, or through a series of experiences, which are mainly experiences of extreme suffering, can become conscious.

Suddenly, this little seed begins to sprout, and there's suddenly a minimum of awareness arising. Now, for a very unconscious human, in other words, now we know what unconscious is, totally identified with the conditioned mind, so that you inhabit a conceptual reality, mostly, and you judge whatever you perceive around you, every other human being, you judge them through the veil of your conceptual reality. So all you ever see is a completely distorted view of what things are like, or what another human being is like.

And you have a totally distorted view of yourself, too. A conceptual sense of identity, only conceptual, meaning it consists of thought structures, thought forms. And so when that happens, for example, it's easy to condemn a large section of humanity for certain reasons which are conceptual, because, for example, they don't believe the same things that you believe.

Therefore, they are less than human. Therefore, I need to kill them. That sounds crazy.

Of course, it is insane. But it is the reality of many humans, and has been for a long time. Now, a certain percentage of humanity are awakening out of that complete identification with conditioned thinking, and this is why you are here.

You would not be here if the transcendent consciousness that is beyond thinking were not already arising in you. That has brought you here. And it sometimes happens that people book a place to come to a retreat, or a conference, or a talk, and a day before, or on the day that they're supposed to come, the mind takes them over and says, what's the point?

Why should you go to that retreat? Why did I book that? It just doesn't make sense.

Why should I waste my time with that? And then they believe in the thoughts that arise, and the gravitational pull of the unobserved mind takes over, and then they stay home and don't come, and are miserable there. And the next day, the unobserved mind says, why didn't you go to that conference you had booked?

You always do that. You never, never stick to anything. You're no good.

And so you can be miserable that way, and you're still trapped in the conceptual world of only thought, no awareness of thought. And then in those humans, there's no stillness. The stillness is the space between two thoughts where awareness shines through, where awareness arises.

And in many humans, that has not happened yet. In others, it happens sporadically. And there are many, including many of you who are here, you are going through the awakening process, which means sometimes you're awake and conscious, and sometimes you're not.

And you know the difference when you get trapped in your thoughts, and they are telling a whole story about life, about yourself, about other people, about what they did and didn't do, and should have done, and what you should have done but didn't do, could have done, and might still do, but probably won't. And then you get trapped in there, and you inhabit a world of misery. You create your own personal misery, and occasionally you have little moments when you say, oh, isn't that great?

This great thing has just happened to me. And then you put this on Facebook, look, this has happened to me. Nowadays, you're not confined to your head for your conceptual reality.

You put it out there, this mental construct, and you very carefully choose the things that you put out there. And it's a mental construct, supported by pictures of yourself. Or look at me, this is where I am.

It's a mental construct. And then those people who read it, they believe that that is your reality, and they feel bad. And then to make up for that, they create their own mental construct.

And so the clever human mind has come up with countless inventions to avoid stillness, more now than ever, as it come up with things that constantly demand your attention, and stimulate the identification with thinking, that greatly increase the clutter. Clutter is the word I use for useless thinking, the clutter of your mind. It is fed daily by a continuous stream of incoming text messages that you need to think about and reply to.

Many of them say nothing significant, most occasionally. And then many other things, social media, you think you're having a relationship with other human beings, but it's a very superficial relationship. A lot of it is conceptual.

I have met people who have fallen in love with people they've never met. They met them online, and they fell in love. What do they fall in love with?

A mental image that they have formed. Somebody who came to me when I was still doing counseling years ago, fell in love with a man. He fell in love with a woman, and he talked to her.

That was, I think, in times even before Facebook and things like that happened. He fell in love, and maybe she fell in love with him. For several months, they talked every day.

And I said, you have to meet. You don't make plans for getting married before you meet her. And finally they met, and that was the end of it.

So the unconsciousness is something that in many of you still arises occasionally. You get taken over by mind streams. You again believe that every thought that arises is the truth.

You do not question your thoughts. You forget about Byron Katie, who says, is that true? When a thought arises, is that true?

Is that really true? So most of you are here because you are engaged in this awakening process. The awakening process is happening in you.

You may not be conscious all the time, present all the time, but it's there enough for you to bring you here, and it has began to transform your life. And then there may be a few people here in whom this has not happened, and the only reason why they're here is to please their spouse. Or they couldn't say no.

Or a friend who says, you have to come to this. You really need it. I want you to understand what he's talking about.

And your friend says, maybe he talked for two hours and he didn't say anything. Now we're at a peculiar time on the planet that makes it even more important for us to be here at this time when there is an intensification, seemingly, of unconsciousness. Although what you hear in the news is not the whole story by any means.

This event here, for example, is of greater importance, although it only involves maybe a thousand people, is of greater importance than almost anything you will read or watch in the news tonight, because it involves humanity reaching a new level of consciousness where they no longer generate insanity and suffering for themselves and each other. But is it going to be on the news tonight? I don't think so.

Unless one person goes totally crazy in here. Now this is funny because it's absolutely true. And when you look at it like that, you can see that that also is insane.

That if one person becomes crazy out of thousands, then that's the news. But a thousand people becoming conscious and not being crazy is not the news. Despite the fact that what we hear and listen in the news is distorted and one-sided, it is true that there is a certain intensification of unconsciousness on one level on the planet.

And at the same time, there is also an intensification of the arising of new consciousness. So there's an acceleration or intensification of both the gravitational pull that creates senseless suffering and the arising of the new. So as I said, in the mainstream media, it's mostly the gravitational pull is the news mostly.

But then there's an underground movement of which we are almost underground. Not totally underground anymore since Oprah, but so it's gone a little bit overground. She helped a lot with that.

That's there. But what is happening here is still dismissed by the, a lot of the mainstream media. They have a certain way of reporting on it if they ever, if the rare cases when they do report on it.

And that applies even to the so-called the high level media. It would be rare to find a objective report. And if the New York Times wrote about this, there would be an element of irony of creeping in and dismissing it as a fad.

Mindfulness is a fad. It's a passing phase for humans who haven't made it. It's a substitute for whatever.

So on one level, things are getting worse. Seems that is true. But on another level, things are getting better.

You sometimes read people saying it's never been as bad as it is now. The world situation is so critical now. It's never been as bad as it is now.

Well, people have short memories or haven't read any history books. All you need to do is go back to the first half of the 20th century if you think it's never been as bad as now. You're fortunate.

Your karma is, must be relatively good that not only that you're here, but you are not living through the first half of the 20th century. It was the height of insanity and senseless suffering. Not only the two world wars, but all the other conflicts in between and including governments killing their own people by the millions in Russia, Germany, China, Cambodia, and so on.

So anybody who doubts that the human mind does not have a strong element of insanity, which is the gravitational pull of the unconsciousness, should really read some history, history book, just a short account. And then you, and then you read the details. This is unbelievable.

In the same way that even now, when you read certain things that happened today and yesterday in certain parts of the planet, see, this is totally crazy. And yet the unconscious beings in the West, it's not as much on the surface is not as the unconsciousness is not so immediately apparent in the West, Western countries, but it's connected to the extreme forms of violence that's happening on other parts of the planet. It is connected.

I don't want to get into politics. So our task is primarily to embody the new consciousness, which I sometimes call presence. And this is why we're here.

So that this presence can arise more fully in us. That's the reason why we are here. There's nothing you can do ultimately about changing the world out there.

Although if you will feel called upon to help in certain areas, that's a wonderful thing. The most vital thing is to tackle the roots of human unconsciousness. The human unconscious tackling human suffering on the level of cause that is vital.

Then you can help alleviate suffering on the level of effect. If that is what you feel you need to do, you can help humans, or you can travel to places where there's turmoil and suffering. If you feel called upon to do that, knowing that you may not survive, that's fine.

And you can help there. But knowing also what matters is your state of consciousness, because that creates the world. The world is a reflection of your state of consciousness, what you experience as the world as your reality.

There's a strong correlation between your predominant state of consciousness and how you experience reality. There is a saying, which may not be a politically correct statement, but I'm not too concerned about political correctness. Political correctness, by the way, is a wonderful thing because, I'll just mention this briefly, even to talk about political correctness may not be politically correct.

I don't know. Political correctness starts with, this is how through the, when there's lack of awareness, there's also lack of balance. Because only awareness can bring in the balance between the yin and the yang, for example.

So when humans suddenly become aware that if I make certain statements about certain groups of humans that is insensitive, and when I make those statements, those humans are affected by it and they suffer. And this is a wonderful realization. It means there's empathy in you.

There's an awareness of how your words impact another human being. There's an awareness that your judgments of a whole race, of a whole group of people, a nation or a tribe or whatever, impact these people. And so you are more careful with what you say.

And this is how political correctness arises, what is now called political correctness. It arises from something good, the ability to empathize with another human being and to see that your judgments are just judgments. So there's some awareness there.

And then if you take something to an extreme and then awareness gets obscured again, and then that in itself originally was a good thing, becomes completely unbalanced. And then suddenly you say, there's something dreadfully wrong with you if you call a group of people that includes women, you guys. Apparently the latest thing, that's not politically correct because they are women, they're not guys.

This is just one example of many, if you can read about it for hours on the internet and you can get upset about it either one way or the other. Now you take something to an extreme. Why do people say you guys?

Because of the inadequacy of the English language, which does not have a second person plural, does not have a you that means all of you. It only has you, which means you can mean one person or you can mean many people. So they came up spontaneous with this you guys and many women use it to address other women and say you guys.

And I think unless we eliminate that expression, which is possible, otherwise in 50 years time it'll be in the dictionary. It will have become the second person plural, which means you, which other languages have a different word for it. In Spanish it's vosotros, in German it's ihr.

So there are extremes of political correctness when it becomes insane also. And whenever awareness disappears, whatever the mind does, sooner or later becomes a form of insanity in the absence of awareness. Communism was a wonderful thing to start with.

Communism was, you could see the dreadful inequality between how people, certain groups of people were exploiting all the millions of workers and somebody saw that, we need to change that. Look, these people are exploiting all these workers. We need to remove power from these capitalists and the state will run things.

It's all wonderful. So they wanted to create a better world. It's a great idea.

But what they had not thought about is their own state of consciousness. And the ego, the ego, that ego by the way is the unconsciousness of identifying with your mind completely. So they had looked at the, how do we need to change the world?

But what they forgot is how, what about my state of consciousness? And then the same evils that they wanted to eliminate, they recreated in another way. And you find it in all the countries, in many third world countries where every few years the government gets overthrown and a new government comes in.

And of course, very often the people who want to overthrow the government, they have good intentions. They say these people are corrupt. We need to get rid of them.

Look, they're exploiting the people. True, true, true. So vote me in or whether you want me or not, I will, I will remove this government, this corrupt government and I will create a better government for you people.

And the moment they achieve power, the latent ego in them suddenly grows. Give power to a seemingly meek person who has no worldly power and seems, oh, this person is relatively egoless. He's so, this is a person who has, has a job.

He's told what to do and he does it. Or she seems, the ego is always in these, the politicians, they have the big egos. And look, this, this man has no, virtually no ego.

And this is because the ego has not many opportunities to enhance itself. The only place where his ego functions is at home when he relates to his wife and his children. That's where the ego can have a little bit of strengthening.

But give this person real power and the ego will suddenly, the latent ego will suddenly grow to a monstrous size. And this has even happened in spiritual communities. There was a spiritual community in Oregon last century where some of you may know it.

Osho, the spiritual teacher at the community in Oregon. A few people were given power in that community and they were very, very meek and mild people, especially one woman was given all power. The woman was before very, very almost subservient and seemed to have no ego whatsoever.

And the moment she was given power, it only took a few weeks, a few months, and suddenly in ego inflation happened very quickly. And suddenly you have a monster there. And suddenly people started walking around with machine guns in the spiritual ashram.

She said, we need to protect ourselves from these evil people outside. Ego, the ego loves its enemies. It needs its enemies to, in order to enhance its own fictitious sense of self.

So it creates the enemies, totally unconscious. And that's how many politicians do it. When other countries are demonized, the media do it.

All forms of unconsciousness, lack of awareness, when ego takes over and runs the show. And the suffering that humans are enduring, the collective suffering, most of it is not due to, at least not in the past two or 300 years, is not due to natural disasters, such as earthquakes and floods and volcanic eruptions and tidal waves and so on. A larger part of it is human created.

And that's an amazing fact. Millions of people going through, living through hell in the 20th century alone, but the hell is created by other humans. That is the state of consciousness that has been prevalent for a very long time on the planet.

I do not usually predict the future because it's, I believe you cannot really predict it because there are many factors that are involved here. I am absolutely certain of the awakening of humanity, that it will happen. And the fact that we are here is a sign, of course, that it is happening already on a certain scale, on a certain level.

What I am not certain of is whether the awakening that's arising in a certain percentage of humanity now, the spiritual awakening, whether that is sufficient to prevent the gravitational pull of the old consciousness, to call it that, from creating enormous havoc, thereby producing suffering for millions of people on a collective scale, which in turn will eventually bring about an arising of the new. So the only question is here, is the new consciousness of humanity going to arise out of where we are now, or are we going to experience before there is a large scale awakening of humanity?

Because this is not yet large scale, it's large scale in certain small areas of the planet. Does humanity, is the unconsciousness so heavy that humans need to go through a period of intense suffering before there is a collective awakening? And the intense suffering will be self-created.

And that question applies to any individual also. Is this human being capable of spiritual awakening, or does he need, or he or she need to go through more suffering before it can happen? It's a simple thing that applies on all levels, both personal and collective, for the individual and the collective.

Eckhart Tolle Right Action Follows Awakened Consciousness [8c82cac7-073e-4862-9fd9-016d046c756d]

Right action follows awakened consciousness. In this episode, Eckhart explains to a live audience that a deeper movement has brought them together and the goal is to help them awaken. He says many ancient spiritual teachings point to this timeless idea of metamorphosis, including the parables of Jesus and others.

He explains that the root of the word Buddha means to be awake in Sanskrit. Eckhart explains when we shift to higher consciousness, we have access to wisdom, which is far deeper than intelligence. Ironically, he says more knowledge will not save us.

In fact, intelligence often works in service of madness, technology, war and weapons of mass destruction. He believes only wisdom together with right action will help our ailing world and these can only spring from awakened consciousness.

Wonderful to be here after such a long time in this beautiful place. Thank you for your welcome. Let's come into the present moment.

It might be a good idea, which simply means to start with to acknowledge the present moment, what is. If you have encountered any kind of irritation on your way here, which is quite possible because one encounters many sources of irritation every day. Then I suggest to that you look at it, feel it.

And instead of saying, I am irritated, you say, there's irritation in me and I can feel it. This is a big difference. It's not just a play with words.

The difference between saying I am irritated or angry or sad or whatever the condition may be and saying, this is what I feel or that that is what is in me at the moment. By saying that you have taken a step back. You're not in the grip of the irritation.

You're the awareness behind the irritation. And that's the beginning of an awakening to be the awareness behind whatever arises. And if one starts with any, whatever has arisen in the past hour or in the past two and a half years, many people carry all kinds of stuff that has accumulated during that time, particularly when we all had to face the same collective challenges.

It could be fear. It could be anger. You are beyond that, but most humans don't know that yet.

The term we use is awakening. We are talking about the possibility of a awakening. This is why we're here.

Our evening, this gathering here is an event that should be seen in the context of the awakening of human consciousness. And almost all of you are here because you are already awakening. If you were not already awakening, you would perhaps never have heard of this or would see no point whatsoever in listening to me.

And I welcome particularly those a few people here. I'm sure there are some who were dragged here by a friend or relative and said you really must come and listen to this guy. And if that is the case, if somebody told you that, I think I'm sure he or she is right.

The question is though whether this evening will be meaningful to you. It may be, in which case it could bring about the beginning of an awakening. Or it could be that you're not quite ready for awakening yet, which is fine, in which case you would find this evening at best boring and possibly even irritating.

And that's fine too. If you absolutely cannot stand it anymore, feel free to remove yourself. Nobody will judge you because most people here are sufficiently enlightened not to judge anybody else.

And if you're not ready, then as I said, it's absolutely fine. All it means is you need a little bit more suffering. And the universe, or whatever you want to call the greater intelligence that lies behind all phenomenal existence, will make sure that you get what you need for your awakening.

So that's all very well. Now it may well be that awakening is not necessarily something, even though it may be happening to you, it may not necessarily be a term that you would have applied to what you experience as perhaps as some shift in consciousness, some improvement in your mental emotional state, a greater ability to harmonize with the present moment. But perhaps you would not have called it awakening, or you may not be quite sure why we call it awakening.

And if you are totally new to this, you say, I'm already awake, what is he talking about? But if you look at traditions, spiritual traditions, it's a very ancient term, the term of awakening. It goes back thousands of years to the time of the Buddha and perhaps even beyond.

The Buddha is not a name. The term arose when 2,500 years ago there was a man, Gautama, who later became known as the Buddha. People asked him, he was giving spiritual teaching, probably about living in the present moment.

And they asked him, who are you? What is you? Who are you?

And instead of giving his name, he said, I am Buddha. At that time, it wasn't a recognized title. But the root of the word Buddha in Sanskrit is to be awake.

So all he said is, I'm awake. That's who or what I am. Well, that's interesting.

So the Buddha is the one who is awake. Now, and you might look at this hidden teachings in Jesus in the Gospels that are not usually understood by conventional Christianity. They have a superficial interpretation of it.

We could call that exoteric Christianity instead of esoteric Christianity. Jesus says, for example, in, now I'm going to impress you with my knowledge, chapter 13, verse 37, Gospel of Mark, he says, and what I say to you, I say to all, stay awake. Oh, stay awake.

And many, there are various parables about staying awake. So the, his disciples, he was, his function was to awaken his disciples to bring about at least the beginning of the awakening process. And then now the challenge is to stay awake.

We start to awaken, but now you have to stay awake. So quite a few times in various places, Jesus talks about the importance of staying awake, staying alert. All ancient teachings, all true deep teachings point to that.

It's a timeless message. And one more thing, if you go back and look at spiritual traditions in ancient Indian spiritual philosophy, there is a term which in Sanskrit is Turiya. Turiya means the fourth, first, second, third, fourth.

Turiya means the fourth. Now what that refers to is the fourth state of consciousness. First state of consciousness is deep sleep.

Second state of consciousness is the dream state. The third state of consciousness is conventional wakefulness. And the fourth state of consciousness, Turiya, is the state of, well, the awakened state, the aware state.

So it points to that as ultimately the next stage in human evolution. And this is why we are here. The wider context for being here goes far beyond the individual personalities that are here, including this personality.

There is a deeper movement happening here that has brought us here together. And that is the movement of the awakening of consciousness. That's why we are here.

And this evening is designed, one could say, or intended to deepen or accelerate that awakening, and also to point out possible or likely obstacles that probably will arise in your life to prevent the awakening. Because there are certain patterns in you that do not want you to awaken. The patterns that make up the egoic self, the egoic sense of self, which is the state of consciousness of normal wakefulness.

But compared to the awakened state, normal wakefulness is a dreamlike state. Now, of course, I don't just want to talk about it. I would like this gathering to be experiential, so that it's not just words or concepts, although it operates, of course, also on that level, but something deeper arising, something deeper that is touched in you, and that perhaps by being here accelerates, comes forth more easily and more quickly.

All spiritual teachings are really ultimately here to save time. Ultimately, you get enough suffering and you awaken eventually. And that is the strange thing.

The awakening into this new aware consciousness, another word we could use, to be present, another word we could use to point to it, it strangely, and I must say, unfortunately, it doesn't happen while you are in your comfort zone. It hasn't happened to anybody in their comfort zone, although everybody's longing for a comfort zone. Ah, I can finally, everything is fine.

I've sorted out my life. My relationships are great. Not that you should not strive to have a great life, to live well, to achieve things, to have good relationships is a wonderful thing.

Okay, that is true. But it's also true that quite often, relationships are not that good. And it's also true that for many people, the main source of suffering is their relationships.

And that's only one, one source of suffering. So many things make up your life situation. Your relationships are very important, your health situation, your professional situation, your living situation, where you live, what your status in society, whether could you consider yourself to be a success or failure, weird terms.

And certainly, if you listen to this world to tell you whether your life is a success or failure, that is very misleading because this world is, to a large extent, let's say, to put it mildly, a little bit insane. And if you allow the world to tell you your worth, that you're listening to a somewhat insane person to tell you who or what you are. So what awakens us is the difficulties of life where you get a shock here and there.

One word we could use is adversity. So we encounter many different kinds of adversity that begins in childhood. There's no child that does not encounter already at an early age adversity, difficulties, challenges of one kind or another, some far greater than others.

That is true. But no child is free of suffering. And even if you are a very conscious parent and a very careful parent, if you want to, you do all your best to prevent the child from suffering.

You do everything in your power to prevent the child from suffering. And then if you succeed for several years in preventing your child from suffering on all levels, then unfortunately the fact that the child has never encountered adversity will become the child's greatest suffering. So you can't win.

And of course adversity comes. It can come as a personal challenge. It comes into your life large and small.

And usually people complain when challenges happen. Challenge is a term that is a kind of euphemism for something, but usually it's bad. But if you're spiritual, then we call it, it's a challenge.

Well, that's good. Okay. If you're not spiritual, it's dreadful stuff.

Awful, awful. Oh, it's a challenge. It's easy to tell somebody else it's a challenge, but when it happens to you, it might be different.

So challenges will come. Every day small challenges come. And then periodically, from time to time, bigger forms of adversity come into your life.

It's inevitable. And that is always the possibility of awakening out of the egoic state. The possibility arises.

It does not necessarily happen yet. As one first, second, third challenge comes into your life, the possibility is there. So there are not many things you need to remember from this evening because it's not memory-based, concept-based.

But if you don't remember, one thing is when unexpected things happen that your mind says, this shouldn't be happening. Why is this to me? Why does he behave like that?

He shouldn't do that. He shouldn't have said that. That shouldn't be happening.

Why am I here? Can't they do something about it? They really shouldn't.

All kinds of narratives in your mind that make you unhappy. Not the situation. The narrative makes you unhappy.

Oh, that's an interesting thing, by the way. When you find irritation arising or some kind of suffering, the Buddha calls it dukkha, which is, he says, wherever you go, you'll find it unless you awaken. Dukkha, usually translated as suffering, can also be translated as unsatisfactoriness, misery, unhappiness.

Wherever you go, any situation, relationships, sooner or later, often sooner rather than later, something goes not quite right. Have a look at your relationships. You fall in love.

Oh, that's the end of my suffering. And so at this early stage, before you move in together, you can always tell when you're in a restaurant with a couple sitting and having dinner, you can tell whether they've been married for a while or it's their first or second date. It's their first or second date.

It's a totally different way they look at each other. They look at the other as a kind of god or goddess. They are not living together yet.

And then they start living together and then, oh, I forgot to mention the married couple or the one they've been living together for a while. They relate to each other in a different way. They may both be on their phones.

And I sometimes wonder, are they texting each other or is one or both of them already looking at the app that they forgot to delete that brought them together in the first place? I want to see what else is out there. So you begin to live with somebody and then one day something arises in that person that you didn't know was there.

Who is that person? Some weird, some kind of transformation. They're probably this nasty creature.

And suddenly you have to, and then you really begin to doubt, have I made a terrible mistake? Maybe you've already signed a piece of paper that's, to promise you're going to be together forever, then it's even more problematic. But no matter where you go, whatever situation you go into, you will encounter, something doesn't quite work out the way it is expected.

So humans have this vision that it is possible to achieve, to have your life work out on all levels and for very brief moments in time that is possible. My health is great, fantastic relationships, great income, wonderful place to live, beautiful children, they're all doing well. Everything is absolutely fine.

Everything on every level. Well, if that is the case with you at this moment, then just wait a little. And sooner rather than later, somewhere, somewhere, something is no longer right.

And life continues like that. But humans, they always believe there's something drastically wrong if they meet these unexpected challenges. There's something drastically wrong.

Because they believe that the world or life is here to make them happy. And that is a huge misperception. And if that your belief is here, the world is here to make you happy, then you will become very frustrated because it can't do that.

And so if you have this discrepancy, your expectation, and the reality that life is always problematic, it always brings up something, no matter how much positive thinking you do, which is a wonderful thing to do, how careful you are in arranging your life, you do your best everywhere, even then, and you should do your best. And positive thinking is good, far better than negative thinking. So I recommend positive thinking, but it will bring good things into your life.

But nevertheless, adversity will still happen. It is designed to be so. So humans have this expectation there's something wrong with their lives.

That's how life works. A reflection of life is a movie. If you watch a movie, it's a reflection of life.

Now, one could almost say the plot in every movie, if you want to simplify it to its simplest denominator, I can describe the plot in almost virtually every movie that you see in the following way. Very early on in the movie, something goes wrong. Something has to happen to the characters.

They have to be challenged in one way or another, unless it's an absolute comedy and just everything goes wrong and you're supposed to laugh about it. So something needs to go wrong, otherwise you will fall asleep in the movie, or you'll walk out. So what keeps you awake in the movie is adversity that the characters encounter of one kind or another.

Wow. So in the movie you demand it, but in your personal life you resent it. So the things of the world are not here obviously to make you happy because if that were the case, the world would be failing you.

And of course, some people have this underlying belief that the world is somehow withholding something from them, that the world is being unfair to them. Or they call it God, and then they stop believing in God, because if there were gods, wouldn't that mean that only good things happen to me? If I go to church every Sunday and pray, doesn't that mean that only good things will happen to me?

And no, it doesn't. So they blame God, they blame the world, they blame certain sections of society, etc., for their unhappiness. But it's in the nature of things.

Of course we should improve our lives and improve society also. And there can be improvements, but to pursue a utopia, either in your personal life, a utopia of everything absolutely great, or to pursue a utopia collectively, which was the case for example with communism, there were perhaps some good ideas behind it. We must achieve equality, we must achieve to make life better for everybody.

That was a good idea. What they neglected to consider is that it was only a good idea, but the awakening had not happened in any of them. So the egoic state just had a good idea.

And then it tried to implement that idea with disastrous results. Disastrous, millions and millions dead, killed. Disastrous results starting with a good idea, good intention.

Isn't there a proverb about intention? The road to hell is paved with good intentions. So good intentions are good, but in the absence of awareness, which is another word for the awakened state, in the absence of awareness, good intention is not enough.

It often brings about the opposite. And awareness is inseparable from wisdom. What we call wisdom arises out of awareness.

And so without wisdom, we cannot bring about a better world, and every avenue we pursue and any action we take to bring about a better world very often is counterproductive and actually makes things worse. Do you want to attack a problem without knowing all the repercussions and consequences? Because intelligence is something that is different from wisdom.

Wisdom is something far deeper. Wisdom arises out of the awakened state. Intelligence is usually in the use of the ego.

So an increase of intelligence is not going to save us. An increase in knowledge is not going to save us. We already are drowning in knowledge.

It's all in your phone. You can get all the knowledge you want in your phone and it can drive you crazy. So intelligence is often in the service of madness.

You build weapons of mass destruction. You need great intelligence to build these things, and yet it's intelligence in the service of madness. So what the world needs is wisdom.

Wisdom is able to see the totality of a situation, and it doesn't attack one problem. It sees the totality. Then right action, which is a Buddhist term that's frequently used, right action arises out of a right awakened consciousness, and right action cannot arise out of the egoic consciousness.

So this is the context. This is the awakening. Now let's go more deeply into the actual realization of the awakened state, and what is the unawakened state.

To put it in the most simple terms, the unawakened state is you are run by the thinking mind. There's a continuous stream of thinking that goes through your mind, and it absorbs your intention almost completely. You're completely in the conceptual mind, and you can look at a person quite often.

You can see how absent rather than present a person is. They're completely in their thinking mind. You go, they're not really here.

They just have enough consciousness so that not to stumble, to trip over some furniture, or to stumble into something. Just enough awareness of their surroundings, and even then maybe not even enough until an accident happens because they're totally in their minds. So there's the voice in the head for many people.

It never stops talking. It's a continuous little man or woman or maybe a transgender person, who knows, and it is talking, commenting on things, interpreting, judging according to its conditioning. That's how it is.

I wonder what he's doing there. What is this? What am I going to do tomorrow?

Yesterday, tomorrow, yesterday, tomorrow, next moment, last moment, never this moment. Always previous moments or next moments. So you live almost exclusively in past and future.

There is the burden of the past, which often for many humans, yes, there are some good memories, but even good memories bring up nostalgia because you feel bad because the good things are no longer here. So even the good memories can make you unhappy. But then there are many bad memories.

Bad. There are grievances. There's all kinds of feelings of guilt.

What you did, and you now know it was bad. You shouldn't have done it, but it was 20 years ago. Guilt or grievance, something that somebody or the world did to you.

Oh, and you carry it like a burden. For many people, they have this veil. They look at the world through the veil of mental, emotional conditioning.

And more often than not, the veil is not a pleasant one. There are many people who carry a huge amount of grievances in their mental, emotional field. And then if a person lives with a grievance or many grievances, they become a walking grievance.

And there are people, many who are, one could say there are grievances looking for cause. The slightest thing that goes wrong will add fuel to the underlying accumulated emotion, pain body, I call it. And it will feed that.

It will look for the things that are wrong. It will look for things to be unhappy about. It will look for things to criticize in others.

So the egoic state is a state of complete identification with the thinking mind. And so then you live with the burden of past and future. The future often is anxiety, because who knows what's going to happen to me.

The future, of course, also promises hope. Maybe things will get better. And of course, sometimes they do get better until they don't anymore.

So you have hope, you live with hope. Everybody looks for the future for some kind of relief or liberation. I look to the future because I hope that my life is eventually going to work out, out there somewhere.

It's going to work out. I still have that hope. I'm going to make it.

That's a weird expression. Are you going to make what? I'm going to make it.

Yes, you can make it. What am I going to make? It means to arrive at some point of completion.

And sometimes you do achieve things, which is wonderful, but ultimately what you were looking for through that achievement, it cannot give you. What you are looking for is something deeper. What every human is looking for is something deeper than the world can give you.

The world can only challenge you, give you challenges and adversity so that you awaken. The world cannot, as I said, it cannot make you happy because it's not here to make you happy, but it has another purpose. It is here to make you conscious.

That's how it operates. Also, that means whatever arises in the present moment is just right for this moment, for you at this moment. But if you are stuck in the mind, the egoic mind, then you will completely ignore or even continuously dislike the present moment.

And that is an amazing way to live. It is dreadful, but millions still live like that without knowing it unconsciously. They live for the next moment until they get very old.

Then they know there's not much time left. Then the past becomes more and more important. The happiness of the past.

So living for the next moment is for most people unconscious and quite normal. They live hoping that at some point they are going to achieve fulfillment. And little fulfillments come here and then.

There's nothing wrong with it. It's wonderful when you achieve things. It's even wonderful when you fall in love.

Enjoy it. It's not going to last, but enjoy it. I've met, fortunately, been able to meet over the years quite a few people who are, in the eyes of the world, highly successful.

They've got everything. They've got fame. They've got money.

They've got everything. They have got their private jets. They can go anywhere at any moment, can have anything, any pleasure.

And they've told me that after they achieved fame and fortune, there was an initial time period when there was elation and they were on a continuous high. But then gradually, more and more, they experienced a very deep low in their mental emotional state, including depression and not wanting to live anymore. They had everything.

And some had to go to drugs to make life bearable. Had everything. It wasn't enough.

It wasn't enough. And then you can't fool yourself anymore. When you have everything, you can't fool yourself.

When I achieve that, I'll be happy. No, you have achieved everything, but you're not happy. So the worst thing would be for you to achieve to get everything that you want.

And then you can't fool yourself anymore and look to the future for some fulfillment. And that's really dreadful. So that is the human condition.

And it all is connected to who you sense yourself to be. Your identity. Your identity as who you are.

Your sense of self. That is the foundation for your life. Your sense of self.

And everybody is concerned with identity from childhood onward. The identity becomes very important. Of course, every human needs shelter and food, sustenance, shelter.

And one could say almost the next thing, well, the next thing is, as a human grows up, needs some kind of love or affection. But that's already bound up with identity. Because if you don't get love and affection, then you already have a deficient sense of self that's developed in early age.

So identity refers to your sense of self. And where does your sense of self come from? What does it mean to be you?

And usually, most humans, especially those who are not awakening yet, they look to their sense of identity through a narrative that is connected to their past. So I call that sometimes the story of me. So everybody has the story of me.

I call that, well, it's a narrative. And people call it, this is an interesting expression, they call it my life. So you think about my life.

Let me think about that. Well, it's a mixture of good and bad. It's been all kinds of weird things in the past.

And certainly, almost everybody says it didn't quite go the way I had imagined it to be when I was 18 or 17. And many people have a feeling something went wrong somewhere. Strangely, many people have the feeling they haven't started to live yet.

It's almost like I'm still, I'm hoping at some point I'm going to start living. Soon. I just need to meet the right person.

I just need to get that job. I just need to find this or that possession. Or if people would only recognize my worth, or one recognition of one kind.

It's an unconscious process. The longing, my life hasn't actually started yet. And some people have that throughout their life until finally they are surprised that they reach retirement.

And they still, maybe a few years before retirement, you can look to your retirement as the liberation. Then I can start living. Now I know when I retire, then I can start living.

Okay, two more years. One more year. Six months.

And then the moment comes. You sit in your office and the clock reaches five o'clock. It's my last day.

And then off you go. And the first few days and weeks are great because you go to the golf course and then sit around. If you have sufficient funds, you can have your cocktails.

You may not have sufficient funds these days, so that's another problem. So a few weeks pass and you sit there and you take a trip and you come back. And then you move to a better climate because you don't, let's move to Florida, okay.

And then you sit in Florida, just looking at the sun and then you play another game of golf. And then a kind of fatigue sets in. And then the mind says, and now what?

And nothing. Who am I now? I had this title.

I had a job description. I was the vice, the vice president of this company or whatever. And now I'm no longer a vice president.

And a great part of my identity was derived from the concept of vice president of the company. And suddenly the concept has dissolved. And who am I now without that?

Well, that's weird. I get this weird feeling of not being nobody anymore. It's, you're retired.

And it's a strange thing that it is not uncommon for people to die just two or three years after retiring because there's nothing there anymore to live for. They were looking towards retirement for some kind of solution, but that's not it. Everybody's looking where it cannot be found.

It cannot be found in the future. That what you're looking for cannot be found in the future because, don't tell anybody, but there is no future. There is no future.

There just seems to be a future. How can you say that there is no future? Obviously there's a future because I'm going to have dinner later.

And tomorrow I'm faced with, I'm going to have to meet that awful person again. Yes. How can you say there's no future?

Okay. In your immediate experience of life, have you ever experienced the future? Let me think about that.

Actually, no. But haven't you always thought the future was more important than the present moment? And do you treat it, do you treat the present moment as only a stepping stone towards a future?

Continuously, you are on your way somewhere, which is on a practical level, future worked quite well, but on a deeper level, future is very misleading. So I could say we are here for one and a half to two hours. I don't know how long, but do you actually experience the one and a half or two hours except as a thought in your mind?

Ultimately, you experience this event as a present moment experience, not a future. There is no, you cannot experience the future. So what we call future, although necessary here to function in this dimension, it's a necessary and very helpful thing.

Sometimes people look at me and they say, oh, you wear a watch? Why do you wear a watch? I thought you teach the now.

And in fact, quite a few people have given me watches that they have specially made. They say now, now, now, now. And somebody else gave me a watch with a totally blank face.

It has no mechanism in it at all. So when you look at it, you say, oh, it's present moment. No.

No, the reason why I wear a watch is there are two reasons. I don't like to be late and keep people waiting. I like to be on time.

And on a practical level, future works quite well. We met here because we use future for practical purposes. Otherwise, we meeting here, we would have waited a long, long time to meet here accidentally at some point.

One day, accidentally, we will all come together here. It could be maybe half a million years. And then finally, here we are.

So there is a paradox. On one level, you cannot deny the existence of time, certainly. In fact, on that level, where you cannot deny the existence of time, you also find that time, first of all, it gives you the possibility of growth and development, which is wonderful.

It gives you that possibility on this horizontal level, I call it. On the horizontal level, time gives you a child grows, gets stronger, learns things, etc. And even spiritually speaking, on the perspective of the horizontal dimension, the spiritual awakening seems to take time.

So time, on the one hand, seems like a good thing up to a point in a human being's life. And then time becomes your enemy, so to speak, because it is like an illness that you caught at the time of birth, and it certainly is going to kill you. There is no doubt that time is going to kill you and me.

And sometimes it does it in a cruel way. It begins to erode your body, which looked so great when you were young. Like, look at a fresh apple, put it on your windowsill.

It just exudes energy, and it's shiny, even without applying any substances to it. It's shiny on your windowsill, and there it is in its full splendor. And then you come back two weeks later, you left it on your windowsill, and it's a little bit less shiny.

Something is beginning to happen to it. And then you come back three, four, five weeks later, and it's beginning to kind of shrink, and it looks wrinkly. And if you leave it for long enough, it goes...

And the same happens to your body. You derive a significant part of your sense of self from identification with body image. And then this gives you, for perhaps 20 years of your adult life, it gives you a sense of who you are.

If you're a very beautiful... In addition to having a beautiful body, you might be so lucky that even your face is beautiful. They don't necessarily go together.

So the body becomes important for everybody. And even if your body is not beautiful, to some extent you identify, which means you derive your sense of self from the appearance of your body. So if it's beautiful, it gives you an enhanced sense of self.

And that sustains you for quite a while. If you're really strong and beautiful, then that can become the main part of your identity, is that, because you impress everybody you meet, either with your strengths or your beauty or both. The ego seeks always some kind of, through comparison, it seeks some kind of superiority, and it fears inferiority.

It seeks superiority. So the egoic sense of self is then derived from this image-making in your mind, a conceptual identity. And it's never happy for long.

It's rarely really at ease, except when it's taking a few drinks or drugs. Then you achieve some kind of self-transcendence, which is a spiritual term. Self-transcendence is to become free of yourself in the sense of egoic self, limited self.

Self-transcendence, everybody is ultimately longing for self-transcendence. They don't know that. They are longing for it.

And then all they can think of often is the need for some kind of substance to take in, for example, alcohol or some kind of smoke or other things that are quite destructive. When you have a little smoke, you may notice a change happening. Your mind slows down.

The mind which fuels your sense of self, the narrative of me and my life, slows down. You can't think that much anymore about your problems. I wanted to listen to this talk.

You can't listen. Your mind slows down. And after a few more puffs, you feel better.

But why do you feel better? Because you have achieved a small degree of self-transcendence. Ah, you're not thinking about your problems anymore.

You're kind of a bit more present. And then you go, you suddenly feel like a weight lifted off your shoulders. And some people, again, they laugh kind of crazily when they smoke that stuff.

And an outsider might think you've suddenly become enlightened. But you haven't. But you had a little glimpse, a little glimpse of self-transcendence.

However, it is not a direction of true awakening. Because the way I put it, you are falling below the thinking level. You think less and less.

And that's why you feel happier. You feel, perhaps, feel a little bit more your sense of being in the background a little bit. But you are moving in the direction of back to sleep, to unconsciousness, instead of rising above thinking to a state of relaxed alertness, which is presence.

So freedom from thinking is self-transcendence. It doesn't mean you don't think anymore, but you are no longer trapped in the dimension of thought, which before gave you your identity. That is the identity where you mentally construct an image consisting of words and images that becomes you.

You call it my life. And it's always problematic. There's no life that is not problematic.

And people spend a lot of time thinking and talking about their lives. They carry a burden and they call it my life. Does that sound familiar to some of you?

They walk with a burden, which is their life. But where is that life? What is that?

Well, it's not your life. You call it your life. But the truth is, that's your life situation, which has a past and future.

But your life is inseparable from the present moment. It can only ever occur, be experienced, happen in the present moment. That's where life is.

In fact, life and now are inseparable. There is no life apart from now.

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:26)

Rising above life's challenges. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience. He asks when life's challenges strike, how do we respond?

Do we rise above worn-out patterns with new awareness or do we spiral into the old unconsciousness? He says we shouldn't blame ourselves when we relapse. Suffering and setbacks are necessary and vital part of the awakening.

[Speaker 1] (0:28 - 39:36)

How reactive are you still? And don't condemn yourself. Whenever you discover some kind of reactivity in yourself, whenever you discover you've fallen back into complete identification with arising thoughts, it's good.

That discovery is the decisive moment. Oh, you lost it for a few hours, you lost it for a day or two. Challenges particularly.

And so wherever a problem arises in your life, a challenge arises in your life, there's the test. Are you a reactive person? Does the challenge draw you back into your reactive personality with its old conditioned patterns?

Or are you able to rise above conditioned thinking and then deal with the challenge? And you begin with little challenges. There are more little challenges in your life than big challenges.

You have both and then you have medium challenges. But the small challenges in your daily life probably come several times a day. And that's already a beginning of practice.

And you yourself can just think back on a day what were the small challenges. Now the challenges are of two kinds. External challenges and challenges that arise purely out of your mind.

There's no external situation that's challenging, but your mind is telling you that you are finding yourself in a challenging situation. At three o'clock in the morning, in bed, in a retreat, everything is quiet and fine, but suddenly your life is very challenging. And it's called my life.

Oh my God, my life. It's my entire life is just, what's the expression? I have so much on my plate.

Nice English expression. I have a lot on my plate. I have so much on my plate.

How am I going to deal with all this? How is it going to work out? You could even carry that your life, quotation marks, you can carry the burden of your life around with you, even as you walk around the lake.

You're walking with the burden of my life and you'd see the enormous discrepancy between the beauty of nature and my life. And you feel even worse about my life because nature is so beautiful, but you don't, you don't get, it's just, you feel so heavy and that's the unconscious state. And that's a huge challenge, but you don't even know it's a challenge for you.

It's, that's the reality of my life. And you never realize that the entire phenomenon that you call my life is ultimately a mental abstraction. And this mental abstraction is what gives you your sense of self.

It's amazing. And this is a burden, an enormous weight that you carry with you. I can often see it, not so much here, although I can't see every one of you, but I don't see that the heaviness that people carry in ordinary existence.

I sometimes, when I look at people, I feel that compassion because I can see what a heavy weight they are to themselves. And they don't, they don't know it. I can sense, I can feel the heaviness of their person, of their personality.

And for years, it has accumulated more and more. Very strange. This is just a little anecdote, but it's connected to this.

I'm often recognized in the street or wherever I am. That's just how it is. But quite often, I recognize the person who is going to recognize me three times later.

Before they look at me, I know that they are awakening. And that it is much more likely that the moment they look at me, they're going to recognize me. But not necessarily.

Of course, they have, might have awakened through other avenues of awakening. But the likelihood of being recognized, I often see that in people. He or she is, I don't think it like that.

It's just a knowing that without concepts, and I can sense any second now, they're going, oh, my God. Or not. But very often, I can be absolutely sure that they have never heard of me, or anybody else, anything to do with spiritual, because there is such a dense veil that they carry around, such a heavy weight.

There has not been even a glimpse of the transcendent dimension. There are still millions who live like that. And so, they carry that heaviness, and that heaviness is their personality.

And there's suffering in that. And they may not even know that they are suffering, that the entire entity is a suffering entity. They don't know it because suffering has become so habitual to them that they no longer know they are suffering.

It's like a noise in the background that never stops. And after a while, you don't hear it anymore, until suddenly, this noise, which is quite disturbing, suddenly it stops. And you go, oh, what was that?

Well, that was a noise that had been going on for years, and you didn't even know it because it had become habitual. So, there's the suffering entity. The egoic self actually is invested in its suffering.

It grows through the suffering, through the resistance, through the complaining, through the drama, through the whatever it is. It loves it. It thinks it's it.

So, the heaviness of the personality here begins to recede, and it doesn't disappear completely. Of course, you remain a person with certain characteristics. But as the awakened consciousness that's emerging gradually becomes integrated, certain aspects of your personality also begin to change, especially the very dysfunctional ones that are creating suffering for yourself and others.

And there may be some that just don't change, but that's not a big deal. You may have certain limitations in this or that area, and it doesn't change. There was a spiritual teacher, a very powerful teacher in India, Nisargadatta, who was a chain smoker before awakening and remained a chain smoker after awakening.

He actually sold cigarettes before he awakened. He was a cigarette seller. You might have said, well, that's not very good karma.

But of course, when he awakened, he transcended karma. And finally, he died of throat cancer. It didn't matter to him anymore.

And some people judge him and say, if you were awakened, you would not be smoking anymore. That makes sense, doesn't it? But it didn't.

It was a limitation. So, give it some time, this integration, and apply the presence to every arising challenge in your life. And challenge, the greater part of challenges, well, a large part of challenges comes through other people, you might have noticed.

People can cause lots of challenges because they're so difficult to deal with. It could come through your health situation, the body, and it could come through your work situation, which is related to your financial situation. Those are the challenges that have certain external causes.

So you have, on the one hand, challenges that arise just through your mind, the unobserved mind, and then others, actual challenges in your external life. But the question is, what is the state of consciousness with which you meet the arising challenges in your life? And ultimately, your entire life is not determined by what happens to you, but by how you respond to what happens.

That is your freedom, how you respond to any event that happens to you. And your response determines further events. The important thing is that you gradually begin to realize, oh, the sound is making a strange sound.

And you gradually begin to realize that what until recently you called my life is ultimately something relatively insubstantial. It's a story in your mind. And then that becomes less of a burden.

The entire narrative of me, of me and my life, is then gradually, and that is part of the integration, is gradually no longer perceived as a burden. And you no longer derive your sense of who you are from the story of your life, the narrative. So who you are is the presence now, and that's timeless, and it's unconditioned.

And all that remains then is memories. Of course you remember your past, but you have now at all completely different relationship with your past. What is that when we talk of your past?

Thoughts in your head is your past. And what's your future? Thoughts in your head is the future.

So both past and future are experienced and cannot be experienced in any other way as thoughts in your mind. The rest is just the immediate experience of this moment. And even whenever you label whatever you experience in this moment mentally by judging it this way or that, that's also the past that is coloring the way in which you're experiencing this moment.

So you have a certain relationship to whatever is arising in this moment, and you call it this or call it that, but there's another way of experiencing this moment, and that is accepting it as it is without the compulsive need to label it. And that's an amazing liberation. And then you are living as the deep eye more and more, and you no longer get the sense that you are this huge ball of problems that needs to be solved, a bit like the Gordian knot that's in Greek, I believe, in ancient Greek mythology.

I don't think it was even mythology, I think it's an actual historical fact. There was a Gordian knot, K-N-O-T. There was this huge thing, a rope that was tied into a huge knot.

I don't know how big it was. And the challenge was to disentangle this Gordian knot, and nobody could do it. Oh my God.

And they said, whoever can disentangle it will conquer the world. That's the story. And then a young man came, his name was Alexander, I think.

And he looked at it, and he drew his sword and cut through it. And so he became Alexander the Great, who conquered the known world at the time. And so the Gordian knot, I'm using this story as an analogy.

For the egoic self, it means you have tied yourself into a Gordian knot, me and my problems. And then you attempt to disentangle one thing after another. But while you solve one problem here, another one pops up there.

And then you go there. And then, okay, I've dealt with this now. That work problem is solved, finances are working again, that's great.

And then suddenly, your spouse goes off with someone else. Or suddenly you have a pain here to go. Life never leaves you alone for very long.

But the main thing is that this entity that the Buddha calls the self, it doesn't take time to transcend it. Because you would have to, to some extent, psychoanalysis tries to solve the problem of you. Although there is something to be said for occasionally looking at certain things in your past, but your main area, your main focus needs to remain the present moment, except ways when you might suddenly discover why it is that every time somebody makes you wait, you become extremely upset and angry, far beyond what would be warranted by this particular situation.

And suddenly you may remember, as you become more conscious of your emotions, that perhaps when you were a child, who knows, your dad abandoned you and the family when you were very young. And this sense of abandonment comes over you, even when you're waiting for somebody and somebody arrives late, you overreact totally because there's a heavy pain body associated with the idea of abandonment. And this has been unconscious.

And suddenly, as you bring more presence, you become more aware of that emotion that arises, instead of being it, you are the awareness that sees the arising of the emotion. And then it sometimes happens that when you clearly see the arising of an emotion, you may suddenly also remember where it started. You may, or you may not.

It could be helpful if you remember where it started. It's not an absolute necessity because it could have started in another lifetime. It could have started 30 million years ago when you were a sea creature crawling along and then you got eaten up by another one.

And that was the beginning of your pain. But the Gordian knot of yourself, the sword that Alexander used to cut the Gordian knot is what I sometimes call, I haven't used that expression in a while, is the sword of presence. And the sword of presence cuts through the accumulations of time in your mind.

Time is in your mind. The sword of presence cuts through all that. And that is the, the image of the sword is a helpful one here.

And that is the entire teaching of Zen is based on that approach. It is a cutting through the BS. The unobserved mind creates that.

Or as Fritz Perls, the founder of gestalt therapy, I believe said, there are three types of garbage that the mind can create when it's not being observed. And that is chicken shit, bullshit, and elephant shit. If you can access this sword in any situation, especially when you feel the arising of unhappiness in whatever form, access the sword.

It is not suppression. It has nothing to do with suppressing a feeling. Suppressing a feeling requires willpower and requires you to go tense and you go, I'm not going to feel that.

I'm too present to feel that. I'm spiritual. I don't feel things like that anymore.

Sometimes you get, especially Westerners, but maybe also some Japanese who practice, who are Zen practitioners, they look extremely stern and, but there's something vital missing. They're mistaking willpower for realization, for presence. The true Zen master may look also stern, but they're behind that sternness, there is something else.

The high quality drawings of ancient Zen masters, you can see both dimensions. You can see the sternness in their facial expression, but a softness behind it. So that's the Zen master might look at you and go, but there's something else behind it.

This is not willpower. It's the sword of presence that cuts through time. So whenever you feel any kind of dysfunction arising in your life externally, any form of unhappiness, and I'm using this generic term, could mean all kinds of things, any form of suffering or unhappiness.

First of course, you need to recognize that it's suffering, that it already implies there's some awareness there. To get irritated somewhere is already a mild form of suffering, to get irritated by somebody or by some situation. The ego loves the irritation because the irritation makes something or somebody wrong.

The thing that irritates you is wrong. The person that irritates you is wrong. Oh, he's so irritating.

What does it mean? It means I get irritated when I look at him. He's not irritating.

I irritate myself when I listen to him. And when I look at him, I irritate myself. That's more true to say than he is irritating.

That's a ridiculous protection. So you do it to yourself. And as awareness grows, you realize that, that these are inner states that you do to yourself.

And then whenever any irrit, upset, or unhappiness in whatever form arises, you go, okay, I lost the present moment. Where is the present moment? Oh, it's here.

And the first thing, then quick two steps. First thing, sense perceptions. Suddenly you come to your senses.

That's part of being present. And then you go deeper. You become aware of yourself as the presence.

That's the sword. And there can be no, unhappiness can survive in the state of presence. No problem can survive when you're totally present.

A challenge? Yes, but not a problem. Do you have a problem?

I ask that in the power of now. Do you have a problem at this moment? Even if you have a toothache, it's a toothache.

It's not a problem. Yeah, but I need to go to the bathroom and I'm sitting here in the middle. I can't get up.

It's not a problem. No matter what happens, it's not a problem. I can't pay my mortgage on my house at the end of this month.

I asked, do you have a problem now? Yeah, I have a problem now. I can't pay the mortgage at the end of the month.

Now means now. So you have to come into the now. At this moment, there is no mortgage anywhere.

I can't see it. There's neither mortgage nor missing payment or anything of that kind. There's none of that at this moment.

The time may come when I sit down at a table and a piece of paper and I focus attention on the situation that may require action. And then I apply focused thinking. Money, where is it coming from?

What action can I do? Then you become still for three, four, five seconds and alert. So you're still present.

Even while you're thinking about how to solve the problem of how you're going to pay the mortgage at the end of the month, you're still. You go into stillness, alertness. Then you think again.

Then you come to the end. What else is there that I can do? I don't know.

You go back and you might have another thought and you write down the possible causes of action. And in the meantime, you don't complain about the situation and feel sorry for yourself. Mental image of poor me, victim identity.

Why is this happening to me? What have I done wrong? Why is this always happening to me?

If that hadn't happened, this wouldn't have happened. Why did I allow that to happen? I should not have allowed that to happen.

Then I would be able to pay the mortgage. Why am I so stupid? Why am I always so stupid?

It goes on. It goes on and on. It's all mental constructions.

And then the amazing thing is something almost magical happens when you become aligned with the is-ness of things and live more and more in the present. First, not only are you able to apply focused thought much more powerfully, which you might need to solve what that particular situation, which is no longer a problem, it's a situation to be solved. Problem means your mind is thinking about it without any possibility of action right now.

And it's wild thinking, wild imagining even worse things. What happens if I can't pay it? I have to move out.

I'll be in the street or I'll be in some crummy little place or I have to buy a tent and I'll be living in a tent and I'll get winter will come and I'll be really cold and I'll catch a cold and I'll be ill and I can't pay the hospital bills. You apply focused thought to a situation and there's no longer a complaining entity, somebody who feels sorry for themselves. There's no victim anymore.

You're not a victim of life or anybody, not even a victim of yourself, of your dysfunctional behavior in the past. Many people have considered themselves victims of their own dysfunctional behavior. I should never have done that.

Why did I do that? I wouldn't be in this mess now if I, all that falls away when you approach the now with, you have this sort of presence it brings. But not only that, some magic comes in when you're aligned with the isness of things instead of internally resisting the isness of what is. Circumstances, I've experienced it many times in my life and other people have confirmed it.

Circumstances have a tendency of becoming more helpful, even though there may not be a direct correlation between an action that you take and a particular circumstance that is arising. In other words, it could be considered as a synchronistic event that suddenly arises that is helpful in your situation, but you don't know how it arose because there seemed to be no connection between anything that you did. And suddenly that thing arising, it could be a person you suddenly meet or some information that you suddenly receive that opens a new way forward for you, an event, whatever it is.

This is why it does not seem to be, Carl Jung called it an acausal, which means a non-causal connecting principle, which means under the surface of this external sense-perceived reality, there's a deep connectedness of all things and all people. And when you align yourself with life, which is now, then the channel into the underlying invisible dimension where all is connected, the channel opens up. And then the totality tends to work for you rather than against you, which does not mean that life will be completely free of challenges.

It does mean, however, that you no longer perceive life as antagonistic. You no longer perceive it as hostile. The universe is no longer perceived as hostile.

And that's a huge shift. Millions of people still consider the universe hostile. And when this shift comes, when you align yourself with life, which is now, and that now has a depth to it, and that now is more than what's happening in the now, that now is the essence of who you are, that now is consciousness, that now is the space in which everything happens.

It's the underlying intelligence behind the manifestation of phenomenal existence. There's an underlying field of intelligence that connects everything, and you are only an aspect of that. And so it is much more likely that helpful circumstances will arise and solve your problems than if you are resisting what is, then you really have to struggle.

And if it is an external problem, not just an external challenge, not mind-created, a true external challenge also has the capacity of dolting you into awakening. It can give you a shock. It can destroy huge chunks of ego that had been there before.

And suddenly you're faced with this huge challenge. And people have gone through spiritual awakening only sometimes, even without ever having come into contact with any spiritual teaching, purely because the ego got burned up through enormous suffering in the face of challenge. And then the next stage was suffering drove them into surrender, total acceptance, no more complaining, no complaining entity.

It burned up the ego in them. Content suffering can burn up the ego. There are some people in prisons, a few, I don't know how many.

Of course, there are some people who are in prison falsely accused and condemned, but others have done very bad things in states of complete unconsciousness. And there are some people in prison who are in for life or even on death row. And through the suffering, ultimately self-inflicted, the karmic retribution that came to them, the suffering of either knowing I'm never going to get out of here or death is awaiting.

That suffering, for example, imagine I'm never going to get out of this prison. That's what they tell me. I'm never going to never.

So you project yourself into this unending dreadful future. And it's dreadful suffering. Your entire life is total, a total failure and totally messed up.

And I messed up completely. I did that. It's so painful.

And every day I have to think about that. What could be more awful? And then after dreadful suffering, something inside happens and and suddenly there's just intense presence.

You don't even go to the future anymore because it's been taken away from you. And there you are, the egoic identity completely burned away through suffering. So suffering is one way and entering presence voluntarily is a little easier, but you ready to do that now because you have had the suffering that you have had.

It has taken you to this point where you realize the possibility of voluntarily entering by choice, a different state of consciousness. This possibility has arisen in you, which is an enormous thing in human evolution. In the past, evolution has happened very, very slowly, a gradual increase in consciousness through multiple life forms over millions of years.

And now for the first time, a life form can consciously cooperate in entering a new stage, a new evolutionary stage, a new state of consciousness. But you needed the suffering to, it has had to function. And many of you know that you would not be here if you had not gone through states of unhappiness and varying degrees of suffering.

So let's be really thankful. You need suffering until you don't. And you have reached a point of realization where you don't need more suffering for your further, the evolution of your consciousness.

But in case you do, life will give it to you. You will continue. I'm not promising, I'm not telling you, you will not experience further challenges in life.

The difference, however, is as presence arises more and more, you're not transforming the challenges of life into unhappiness and into an unhappy identity. You're not transforming the challenges of life into an unhappy self, a victim self, an angry self, a complaining self, a heavy self, a very dense self, a self that if you were conscious, you would never want to live with. Unawakened people in many cases live with an entity, this mind made self that is so unpleasant, they would have left it long ago if that were a person that they live with.

They would have said, no way, I'm out of here. I'm not living with you. I don't want to live with you.

You make me unhappy all the time. And in a way, many of you have reached that point where you realized something else is possible. There is another way.

And so that was the beginning of your awakening. So as your practice, choose, they don't have to be long, brief moments of either when you're contemplating or when you're doing things, pure aware presence. So the person recedes, presence arises, and you begin to do little things in presence, and then you do bigger things in presence.

And that's how the integration happens. But choosing presence is vital. This is how the consciousness arises.

Now the question that may have popped up in one or two of you, I can almost hear it, is who chooses presence? Well, it's certainly not me as the ego doesn't choose presence. I'm now suggesting an alternative perspective on it that might be more helpful.

We could also say that presence chooses you. And then the next question arises, well, why did presence choose me? Well, you got out of the way.

For a moment, you stopped thinking and presence was there. But why was I able to stop thinking? Because presence was pushing up.

It wanted to emerge. Now, as you might have noticed, there's no question to the why questions. There can always be another why.

Children sometimes do that. The new state of consciousness wants to arise in humans. It's pushing.

And if you're totally close to it, millions, unfortunately, still are. Just watch the news tonight or don't. If you're totally close to it, the ego is so dense and heavy that there's not the slightest crack.

Then, of course, life knows the only thing that works is suffering. That's not fair. Yes, it is.

That's how it works. And ultimately, there are different levels of truth. They're all true on their own level.

Suffering is dreadful on its own level. From a higher level, human suffering is like a nightmare that you wake up from, from a higher perspective. And ultimately, no human being is an autonomous entity.

Every human being is an aspect of the totality of human consciousness. And the totality of human consciousness is an aspect of universal consciousness. So what looks to us on one level as a suffering entity from another level is an inevitable part of the awakening out of the dream of unconsciousness that the universe is dreaming.

You can know this even in your own life. You can look back on your suffering, as I can, and see how necessary and vital it was for the awakening. So if that's true in my life, it must be true everywhere else.

And it is even true when it seems totally senseless for the individual who is suffering. Because quite often, this particular individual may not awaken through the suffering. There's millions are suffering and die without experience and awakening of consciousness as this individual entity.

But the individual entity ultimately is only one aspect of the totality. And the essence of that individual entity is a timeless essence of consciousness itself that is never lost and cannot die. So ultimately, what is suffering is not truly the essence of who you are.

And from a higher perspective, all human suffering is the nightmare of humanity that is bringing about an awakening. If you had a nightmare, your desire to awaken, which would be much greater to awaken from that sleep, that dream, than if you were engaged in a relatively pleasant dream. Okay, let's have another drink.

And now another sensory experience. And it's, oh, it's not that bad. Let's dream a bit more.

Do you want to awaken? No, I don't think so. I'm not ready.

But suddenly, the door opens, and this incredible monster comes in through the door. Oh, my God. Do you want to awaken now?

Yes, please. Don't forget your sword of presence.

Eckhart Tolle Rising Above Our Limited Sense of Self [01af0a39-d2ac-4fd7-b6bc-b2da69e93ec6]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:54)

Rising above our limited sense of self. In this episode, Eckhart answers questions from a virtual audience around the world, including a young woman struggling with very low self-esteem. He explains intense self-criticism often originates in childhood and he says affirmations can help, like I am one with the power of all creation.

He explains it's important to be grateful for the opportunity to heal because it pushes us to grow beyond our limited sense of self. A young man asks when to stop connecting with dysfunctional family members in his life who are pushing him to the brink. Eckhart explains very unconscious people have no freedom of choice because they are totally controlled by their unconscious conditioning.

Eckhart encourages the man to think of visits with his family as a spiritual practice. He says all of life's difficulties can be a powerful force in our journey to awakening.

[Speaker 2] (0:56 - 0:58)

Hello Eckhart, how are you everyone?

[Speaker 1] (0:58 - 1:02)

You are in, where in Ireland are you?

[Speaker 2] (1:02 - 1:08)

In Kilkenny, so south of Ireland around, yeah, yeah, so it's raining here now.

[Speaker 1] (1:10 - 1:14)

The green Ireland, the green, it's why it's green.

[Speaker 2] (1:15 - 2:07)

Yeah, that's it. Just my question Eckhart, I wanted to ask you how I can overcome my constant belief that I am not good enough or stupid as I feel this thought filters through my life in so many situations. I started a job in the last couple of months and every day I go in and I am afraid of getting in trouble for making mistakes and usually I do because I carry this belief and end up feeling worse because of it.

It's like a vicious pattern. In my relationships I can see it too as a belief of not being good enough gives me low self-confidence and I act and behave in this way. Because of this many times I don't get respected.

I would love to be able to hold my head up and be able to speak for myself and not feel worthless, an image I carried with myself for many years. Can you give me any advice on this and thanks so much and I love your teachings.

[Speaker 1] (2:08 - 18:01)

Thank you. Quite a few people have similar belief and it often goes back to childhood. I don't know whether in your case it originates in childhood relationship or your parents related to you, whether they often criticized you or these can often be the cause.

But whatever the cause may be, what you're faced with is the situation right now. There's already, let's be grateful, that one thing has already happened and that is that you are aware that that is a form of conditioning within yourself. That's already a gain in consciousness because without the awareness you would completely believe that.

You don't 100% believe it anymore because there is an awareness you know that is a form of conditioning in you and the awareness is a beginning of the ability to go beyond it. In practical terms, I would say there's one intermediate step you can take and then there's a more fundamental thing that you need to realize. The intermediate step is you could use certain affirmations, you can choose them yourself, to affirm that you are capable and powerful and intelligent and that you are connected to the power of consciousness itself.

You are an expression. By intermediate step I mean you can use words to point you somewhere that is beyond words. And what they point to you is that your identity needs to go deep enough into consciousness itself where this is where true self-confidence lies.

I've often had questions by people about self-confidence and that's connected also one could say to you it's a there's a lack of self-confidence that's part of what you're describing although you didn't use the term self-confidence but that's an aspect of it I'm sure right is not you don't have self-confidence because you think you might be making mistakes, you may not be good enough. So, the confidence is lacking and of course in the in New Age teachings you have many approaches you can take to self-confidence. They also use sometimes affirmations that you use and they're not necessarily bad affirmations can be good but then no no more than intermediate step so that you can connect to the power of the power of life itself the power of consciousness itself that is in you.

You can for example say I am one I am one with the power of all creations it is within me it is one and I am one with it the power of creation is within me and I am one with all power behind all creation I am one with the intelligent with universal intelligence the consciousness that you are is the light of God shining through you the consciousness that I am is the light of God shining through me I am filled with the power of consciousness why not repeat that and then so that you can sense within yourself the power of consciousness itself the the true self-confidence is not confidence in the in the limitations of your personality there's something in you that transcends the personality and that is where true power lies true self-confidence is faith you know there's a it's a religious or spiritual term the term faith do you have faith Jesus said if you have faith you can do anything you can tell a mountain move from here to there and it will move now what is faith it doesn't mean you believe in a certain story that people tell you or something like that that true faith is the awareness of power the power that is inseparable from who or what you are and true faith is you can sense that power that lies beyond your the personality beyond the person so awareness of the power is faith and the true self-confidence is not the you don't become you're not confident in your whatever abilities you may have because in some in some ways you will be better than other people in certain ways and not as good as other in other ways that's quite quite normal that cannot be otherwise but the awareness of the power of i call it there's a book called the power of now it refers to that it's um if you can in ordinary situations in your daily life if you can sense that predominantly you are a presence rather than a person when you're when you're with somebody you can can you sense the presence that you are rather than who you are as a person and that is awareness of power the power of presence in you if you want occasionally to use affirmations as a signpost you can say i can sense the power of presence in me i can sense the power of presence in me you can say all the power of creation is mine to draw upon for i am one with it all the power of creation is mine to draw upon for i am one with it i am one with all the power of creation these are just words of course but they they point you to to a dimension that is beyond words so that you can feel that incredible power of life itself in you that far transcends who or what you are as a person and then you can go into a situation and feel totally confident not so much as a person but because you you embody consciousness itself you embody that you are the light of the world as Jesus said you embody consciousness itself and that is true self-confidence so you have to in order to have true self-confidence you need to transcend the limited sense of self so and then you have real self-confidence the other self-confidence is always it's not the real thing i mean you you find in this world some people have huge egos and some of these huge egos seem incredibly self-confident but if you if you could look into their inner states you can see that there's always fear underneath it even in the biggest ego there's an underlying sense of fear and insufficiency that's why they need to compensate and have power over others and compare themselves with others continuously the ego is always comparing itself with others and it fears inferiority and it seeks superiority even if it's hidden the ego seeks superiority but it's very much afraid of inferiority of being less than another so it it fears that this constantly comparing yourself to others is inseparable from egoic consciousness every ego does that the ego is always am i better or knows where do i fit in here and that is something that is transcended as you go beyond ego find other affirmations that confirm but not affirmations that affirm the power of you as a person but the power that is beyond the person the the transcendent power and when you become still you can sense that within yourself there is a a presence in you that is life itself that is that is consciousness itself you can feel that you can sense that if you can be rooted in that then for example if you are hesitant and what to say or not to say in a social situation if you can be present the self-consciousness disappears and you most spontaneously say or do the right thing so that which is right what is right for that particular situation in that particular moment i remember when i was in my 20s very much trapped in egoic consciousness i was very self-conscious as the word and shy even going into a room let's say into were visiting visiting some people there were five or six people sitting in a room i knew one or two of them the others i didn't know there's always an enormous sense of contraction and didn't know what to say and how to speak to them and they're always hesitant i might say the wrong thing or this person is much better looking than me this person knows more than me this person says how do i fit in it was horrible every situation i went into there was a sense of unease and anxiety and fear and perhaps you that anxiety you perhaps you also feel still in certain social situations and that is part of the egoic consciousness but you are you are on the spiritual path and you're already on your way beyond that you have had i can see that you have had already moments or periods where you are connected with the transcendent dimension within yourself now it's only a question of bringing that out even when you're engaged in the outer world when you're engaged with people in situations in the outer world that's the next step in your evolution but the most fundamental thing has already happened the connectedness with source you have already connected conscious connection with source that has already happened now you that that awareness of that connectedness with force you you tend to lose it when you go about in social situations and work situations then you tend to lose that sense of connectedness that you can have when when you're alone in your room or in nature then you have it and when you go out then the old forms of conditioning take you over again when you're when you're relating to people and so on and part of the your particular conditioning is to say i'm not good enough i'm going to make a mistake i always make mistakes and you can recognize that this might even come as certain thoughts in your mind that i'm not good enough if the thoughts like that arise it's important to recognize them as thoughts that are not true they are conditioned thoughts in your mind recognize and again the ability to observe your inner states includes the ability to observe what particular thoughts arise in your mind and to realize that many of those thoughts are actually not true they are conditioned thoughts that go back most probably to childhood they are conditioned thoughts they are not true they are just conditioned thoughts that still survive in you so you don't have to believe anymore if thoughts tell you you are not good enough or that you are going to make a mistake again whatever the thoughts say you recognize them as just thoughts in your mind but they're not true i don't know have you heard of byron katie the spiritual teacher her main practice is to challenge or question your thoughts especially thoughts that create suffering and so you look at a thought and you ask is that true and in in most cases you have to say well how do i know this to be true no it's not it's not true so you no longer believe in every thought that comes into your mind that's an enormous gain in consciousness you no longer believe in every thought that comes into your mind especially those negative thoughts that seem to diminish you they are all lies they are not true and so you just recognize them so you separate the thoughts you have about yourself from who or what you are increasingly you become the awareness that is aware of those thoughts and then gradually those thoughts will no longer have power over you and then they will gradually dissolve so that's a shift and then you can be extremely effective in whatever bug situation you are because this is an the obstacle is no longer there so the true power can flow through you true power can flow into your speaking into your actions and then real self-confidence is there that is not confidence in the limited abilities of you as a person but you as a manifestation of consciousness itself the power of creation is in you and one with you and then you can sense it at all times so the limitation that you find in your life at the moment still is part of your spiritual path overcoming this form of mental emotional conditioning in you is part of your spiritual path and as such it's very important so be grateful for it because it is a motivating factor on your spiritual journey it is important for you to go beyond that and I can see when I look at you I can see the the essence of who you are and I can see how loving and powerful and clear that essence is and the rest is just fogs in your mind or thoughts in your mind so awareness will dispel this mental fog and then you can be who you truly are I hope that helps a little bit yeah it does thanks very much for that it's very helpful thank you I go by now and I can work on it yes yes that's your

[Speaker 1] (18:10 - 18:16)

practice so that is perhaps could be your main spiritual practice work on that those situations

[Speaker 2] (18:17 - 18:23)

yeah because a motivator for me anyway to overcome it yeah yeah thanks time to answer

[Speaker 4] (18:23 - 18:59)

it anyway yeah thanks thanks thank you hi akar first I just want to say that you've really saved my life and brought me out of some really dark places and I'm very grateful oh good thank you my question is how do you know if it's time to stop communicating with the troubling person in your life whenever I interact with my parents my pain body is triggered I try to use it as a spiritual practice but I'm starting to wonder if healing can take place when my wounds keep getting reopened right just one or two questions for you I assume you are you're not living with

[Speaker 1] (18:59 - 19:08)

[Speaker 4] (19:08 - 19:31)

your parents anymore my parents are divorced so I'm living with my mom and stepdad but I'm not the parents I'm talking about are my dad and stepmom right so your dad and stepmother you visit them occasionally I'm no longer speaking to them but I did used to visit them right well many people have similar dilemmas of the question is to what extent is it possible for you to practice presence when you are with people with whom you share a lot of past and who trigger certain emotional reactions in you the question is should you continue to consider this a spiritual practice or is the situation so toxic or are the people so unconscious and toxic that you need to remove yourself and no longer engage and perhaps reconnect with them when you feel more deeply rooted in presence or awareness it requires wisdom to know whether to pursue to continue to pursue the relationship in many cases it can be very helpful to regard it as a spiritual practice and when you go when you meet with parents or other family members when many people get together around the table and it can be a very joyful occasion but for others it is the old conflicts arise again the old personal negative interactions arise pain bodies get triggered and so on it's always good to try as much as you can if there's a person with whom you share or parents or one parent or parent enter another they might have remarried again which is always a more difficult situation often the more difficult situation anybody who asks themselves this question I would recommend that you maybe you have already done that I recommend that you experiment with are you able to regard your interaction when you go there visit them are you able to regard this interaction as a spiritual practice and to what extent to what extent are you able to stay present present while you're interacting you may not need to want to go very frequently if it's very difficult but only when whenever the occasion arises when certain thanksgiving or whatever the occasion may be or you go from time to time you visit them and you realize before you go this is my spiritual practice now you may be able to stay present it may be a struggle or each time you go you may lose presence because there's so much past that gets triggered in you that it obscures the arising presence in you so if you find that that every time you go no matter how hard you try you lose presence then it would be better not to go there at least for a while until you become more deeply rooted in that state of consciousness and even then it could be that those people are so unconscious and toxic maybe there has been physical violence or whatever it may be it could be that even when you become more deeply rooted you may still not want to reconnect that is possible but internally what happens internally is very important so that you do not carry residues of resentment within yourself about them that is part of your spiritual evolution that ultimately accumulated resentment that you have towards these people in your life with whom you share a lot of past that needs to and will dissolve in the arising of presence even if the people are very very toxic and very extremely unconscious to the point of physical violence or abuse then in that case you may not want to reconnect even unless you become really present but what needs to arise is the recognition that what they did they acted according to their level of unconsciousness because no human being can act beyond their level of consciousness very unconscious people have no freedom of choice because they are totally run by their unconscious conditioning Jesus used the expression when Jesus said to his followers he promised them freedom you were the truth will make you free you'll become free and the disciples said but we are nobody's slave why why are you saying we will become free we are nobody's slave no and he said no you are the slaves of sin now sin if a deep understanding of sin is dysfunctional behavior due to unconsciousness so sin is deep unconsciousness the original meaning of the word as it's used in the bible in the new testament is missing the mark you miss the mark of human existence to miss the like an archer you misses the target you miss the mark which means the purpose of human existence is to become conscious and to awakening consciousness to meaning of sin is you miss the mark which means there is the purpose of human life you remain unconscious so you are the slaves of unconsciousness that's really what Jesus was saying so these very unconscious people who perhaps perpetrated violence or other transgressions upon other people or you as you become more and more more present you recognize that they were the slaves of their own unconsciousness and they did it because they were they were not there was not sufficient consciousness in them and when you recognize that you may not return and reconnect with them but internally something happens which we could call forgiveness because then you realize they couldn't help it and then forgiveness happens internally so that you don't carry inside you a sense of grievance any grievance that you carry within yourself would become an obstacle to the full arising of presence any grievance you carry towards another human being is a is an obstacle that is still in you that's why and forgiveness isn't something that you actually kind of need to do it's something that happens as presence arises forgiveness becomes easier and easier and eventually it happens by the last bit goes away by itself one could even say that there's nothing ultimately there's nothing to forgive but you can only say that when you're really present not something to believe in when you're really present you see there is nothing to forgive they did because they couldn't do otherwise sometimes people ask me does it mean people are not responsible for what they do yes that's what it means very unconscious people are not responsible for what they do and then people say well so that doesn't sound right if we if we do not hold people responsible for their their transgressions and their whatever they perpetrated but that that doesn't seem to be right well on the one hand they are not responsible for what they do on the other hand it is a universal law of human evolution that every human being has to suffer the consequences of their own unconsciousness you could call that karma what you want to they have to suffer the consequences of their own unconsciousness and usually that whatever they do to others eventually they suffer and by experiencing the consequences of their in some people people may go to prison because they maybe they killed somebody or they perpetrated abuse and violence or whatever they did because they couldn't help it and then they suffer the consequences but it's not just prison but it could be present they suffer the consequences of their own unconsciousness and when that happens the possibility arises for awakening because the suffering that ultimately you create potentially becomes the motivating force forces you into an awakening and that applies to humanity as a whole also because virtually all the problems that humanity is facing in this world now are due to human unconsciousness all the whatever on whatever level you look actions are done in a state of unconsciousness and so on a collective level the suffering that humans are creating collectively also potentially will bring about yes it will bring about suffering on a collective level and potentially it will bring about an awakening the suffering awakens people and the suffering was created by the human ego ego is unconsciousness so ego creates suffering and suffering ultimately awakens you so the ego has built into itself a self-destruct mechanism the ego creates dysfunction dysfunction creates the suffering and the suffering brings about the end of the ego and an awakening so the the ego has there's a self-destruct mechanism built into the human ego on an individual level and a collective level so if you take a higher viewpoint no matter whether you look at it on individual or collective level if you take a higher viewpoint you see the suffering that is now being experienced increasingly on collectively on the planet is also part of the awakening of human consciousness on its own level it looks bad but there are different levels of of looking at things what is bad on one level may be perfectly fine on a higher level for example i've met many people who've said if i hadn't suffered this or that in some people it was a serious illness it was an accident it was great loss something bad so they came to me and said if i had not suffered this i would never have understood what you're talking about and i would not have awakened if i had not faced death in that situation or lost everything i had if i hadn't experienced this bad situation i would not have awakened at all i've heard that many times from people so this works individually and collectively it doesn't mean we do not we do not say that a situation that is conventionally called bad we do not suddenly say oh it's not really bad it's good no on its own level it's bad from a higher perspective it's part of the evolution of human consciousness so we don't need to mix up the levels we still need to recognize something bad as bad violence perpetrated by humans on other humans genocide although things are pretty bad really bad you could say evil on this level can't deny that but then if you look from a higher level even that is part of the evolution of human consciousness and ultimately the essence of each human being is immortal and so that suddenly you say oh but it's not if it's just a belief it doesn't really work you need to realize deeply within yourself that which transcends all that happens in this dimension here but it's part of the evolution so coming back to the individual relating to humans that are difficult with whom you share a lot of past try to make it into spiritual practice is if it's impossible after a few quite a few tries and you find every time you get triggered you get unconscious you want to then it may be good for a while to remove yourself and become more deeply rooted in presence and then you will know whether it's time to reconnect or whether you may not want to reconnect and yet internally letting go happens so there's no accumulation of resentment anymore and when there's no accumulation of resentment anymore it may even be possible to go into very toxic environment it has i've met people who are able to do that they went back to their abuser and were able to be to just interact with them perhaps visiting them in prison one or two cases visit the perpetrator in prison and speak and listen and in exceptional cases this has happened and it's wonderful when it does happen but only you can know whether that is something that is right for you to do and only the presence in you through the presence in you we will know what is right wisdom is what is needed for you to realize what is right for you in any given situation so you are telling me that at the moment you are not you're not visiting them anymore and that may be the right thing for you to do at the moment and as you become more deeply rooted in presence see how you feel in the little whenever that may be and then you reconsider the situation and you may feel now i'm strong enough to go back in or not only time will show what is right for you so normally i don't give specific advice to people about what to do in a particular situation but i've basically just given you a choice a choice of things of what you might do so thank you thank you i'm oprah winfrey and you've been

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:40)

Rising above the thought. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience. He says, sometimes in our efforts to become present, we fall below thought.

It happens when we're consumed by negativity. We reach for something to take away the pain, perhaps alcohol or drugs or food. We may feel relief for a short time, but eventually that discomfort always comes back.

What we need to do is resist the pull toward unconsciousness. To awaken spiritually, we must rise above thought to reach a state of alert presence.

[Speaker 1] (0:44 - 52:21)

It's good to be back here after a few years. And surprisingly, it's still the present moment. It's very strange.

We are surrendered to the present moment. We are not complaining about anything. And if we stop complaining mentally, that's already the beginning of the end of the ego.

The ego thrives on complaining. And as a spiritual practice, before we get into the talk, while people are still looking for their seats, as a spiritual practice, I highly recommend catching yourself in the moment when your mind is complaining about something. And you may be surprised that it happens quite often.

It can complain about where you are, or the claim that you're not where you want to be, who you are with, what people do or fail to do, or have done or should have done but didn't do, and many other things. Let's say there may be four reasons why you've come here. The majority of you, most probably, have come because you are going through a shift in consciousness, even though you might not have interpreted as such, an awakening.

And I will be talking probably a lot about that tonight. So if the term awakening is not entirely clear to you, although you may be awakening, then it will become clear in the course of the evening, not just conceptually, but also experientially. So you're awakening, you're going through a shift in consciousness, and you're here because you know this event, our gathering here, can be a deepening of that, or an acceleration of that awakening process.

Second reason why you may be here is you are ready to awaken, but not quite realize what stepped over this line of where you suddenly dis-identify a little bit from your thinking mind, which is awakening. So you're ready, and you've come here because you have a feeling that this guy may have something important to say, but you're not quite sure what. I have a feeling there's something there, but I'm going to check him out.

Okay, so it may work for you, or it may not. If you're not ready, it means you have to suffer a little bit more, and then you'll be ready. A third group of people, a relatively small number, are here against their will, because they couldn't say no to somebody who said you must come to this and listen to him.

I'm sorry that you're here, but you may be surprised. You may suddenly be surprised, or it may be excruciating. You have to wait and see.

And now we come to the fourth category of people who are here. They have come here mistakenly because they really wanted to go to the beer fest, and somehow they had too many beers even before coming and drifted in here. It's significant that next door I'm told there is a beer fest happening tonight, and that's interesting because that is two venues next to each other, and both are concerned with going beyond thought.

The one is becoming free of the torture of your mind by consuming a few liquids, beer usually in this case, and thereby gradually falling below thought. And that can be a kind of relief for somebody who is tortured by their own thought processes without knowing it. They think they're tortured by life, but they're tortured by their own mind.

And there can be a temporary relief, but I call that falling below thought. And if you go on with that, then eventually you fall off the chair or you fall physically. And spiritual awakening is quite simply rising above thought into a state of alert presence.

And that is why we're here. This is perhaps the most essential part of the evening together here. We are here to enter that state.

And mostly what I'm talking about, I assume what I will be talking about, I say assume because of course I have no idea what exactly is going to come out of this mouth, is coming out of the present moment. I assume I'll be talking about that state of presence, pointing to it, but most importantly, helping you to go more deeply into it. And also helping you to understand possibly the obstacles that are rising in you habitually to that state that we call presence, that we could also call awareness.

There may be some other names we could use to describe it. So here we are in this moment. You are listening to me and you might have noticed now that most people have taken their seats.

I'm going to just for a little while, talk a little bit more slowly. They'll probably speed up again after that. I'm talking a little bit more slowly because I'd like you to be aware of the spaces between the words also, not just the words.

You can also be aware of some music in the background, which undoubtedly is the beer fest. And that's okay. Doesn't interfere too much unless your mind says it does.

It doesn't. So as I speak, become aware of the silent spaces between the words. Just notice them.

Notice that in addition to the words, there are silent spaces, very brief. And a strange thing happens. If you observe yourself closely, you may discover that when you're aware of the silent spaces, you're not actually thinking.

In the moment of noticing a space between two words, two sentences, two sentences, in the moment of noticing, you're not thinking because you cannot notice a silent space and think at the same time. There needs to be something in you that corresponds to that silent space. And that is the inner space of awareness.

And amazingly, that is also a way of realizing who you are at the most essential, the most fundamental level, because you are essentially that silent presence, that awareness, that consciousness. That is the essence of who you are. It's the essence of each person in this room.

And that's an amazing realization. It transforms the way in which you perceive your identity, your sense of self, because that is perhaps one of the most important questions in life, in your life, is the question of identity. And that's why the ancient Greeks, in ancient Greek philosophy, probably going back to Pythagoras, one of the most important sayings they had, which is actually inscribed at the Temple of Apollo at Delphi, know thyself, know thyself.

That is one of the most important things in your life, to know who you are. Now, most people think they know who they are because they identify with, first of all, of course, you have a physical body. And on the level of form, that physical body is, of course, a part of who you are.

I call that, this is the level one of form identity. So the most important realization, this is so essential. I don't know why they don't teach that at school or university.

The most important realization is that there are two dimensions to your identity. Whereas most humans on the planet, which is all those who are not yet awakening, only know themselves through one identity, one dimension. And that's the dimension of form, form identity.

Form identity begins with the physical form. And that is the first thing, of course, when you meet somebody else, the first thing, of course, you notice is the physical identity of that person, a man or woman with a body and an external appearance. And that's the first thing you notice.

And with yourself, many people who are unawakened are very, very strongly identified with their physical form. And that's only level one of their form identity. They are very strongly identified with their physical form, either in a positive or a negative sense.

Meaning some people are proud of their body and appearance. Look at me and compare themselves mentally to other bodies who are not as beautiful, strong, whatever it may be. Very strongly identified with body and with appearance.

And that's all negatively identified. I'm very unhappy about my body. It looks so awful.

That again is a negative identification with body. And of course, that's amplified these days through the clever technology that humans have developed. Selfies are very popular these days.

And usually they show aspects of your body, I suppose, your appearance. So you go. And then you send it out to as many people as possible.

And then everybody, all your friends, including hundreds of people you've never met, they look at your body or your external appearance and feel bad because you look so happy. And that makes them feel even more unhappy than they were already. And to compensate for this, they also get out their phone and take a selfie.

A selfie looking extremely happy. And perhaps you can find a background that makes people feel envious. Or you show yourself in a restaurant having this incredible meal.

And for a while that can keep people, well, not never happy for very long, but busy and you feel relatively okay in that dimension. Of course, sooner or later, a time comes when the body changes, strangely changes its appearance. And you may think that the mirrors are no longer as good as they used to be because you don't look quite the same as before.

And so there are many options open to you. But you begin to be then a little bit unhappy more because you identified with something that doesn't last. And particularly people who had a very strong body identification become very unhappy as they grow old.

Very unhappy. And nobody has told them that such an identity is extremely limited. Extremely limited identity, but they don't know that.

That's all they have. And then suddenly the body that made them feel superior now becomes a source of great unhappiness. And that is the fate of all those who do not go deeper within in order to discover deeper levels of who they are.

So I never particularly was tempted to identify, even when I was young with my body because it wasn't particularly strong or good looking. So what do I do? I felt inadequate.

It was a source of suffering. However, I realized I am more than my body. I'm also my mind.

If I can't look stronger and more beautiful than the person next to me, I can be more intelligent. I can be more knowledgeable. So my sense of identity shifted instead of physical, although there was some negative identification, but my sense of identity shifted to my mind.

It shifted to that, which of course is the next level down for your form identity is your mind. Your mind is all the accumulated knowledge and memories and so on that are kept alive by thought processes. So to compensate for my inadequate body, I read as much as possible so that I could make other people feel inferior to me because they didn't know as much as me.

So I was still very uneasy, but whenever I was in a group of people, I would immediately start talking about knowledgeable things and show how much I knew to make other people feel less than me. That's a very normal egoic strategy. Was that the ego saying, don't talk about me so much?

Of course, I wasn't happy. I was continuously in a state of unease because there were always people who knew more than me. What do you do with them?

And then there were others who didn't know more than me, but they had something else to identify with. They had high social standing. Went to university.

I met a few lords and ladies. They didn't do anything to deserve those titles. They were born with them.

So the baby comes out of the mother's womb and say, well, this is lady so-and-so. And many of those people, they derived a very significant part of their identity from their social background, upper class. Basically, it means family history.

So they identified very strongly with that and it could give them a sense of superiority towards most others. And even if the others were more intelligent, you had so much more class, so much more influence, background, whatever you call it. Even the way you speak in English language in England, even the way you speak, you will immediately show others, well, not a little bit less these days, but when I was young and lived in England, the moment you opened your mouth, people would judge you, what social class you were.

Working class, middle class, upper class, upper middle class, upper class, or many, of course, pretending, trying to sound very upper class in an exaggerated way. It's very embarrassing, but they thought it worked. Again, people are looking for an identity and the sense of identity is never ultimately satisfying.

They're always looking for more. They're looking for something to strengthen their sense of identity, to strengthen their sense of who they are. And the ego, basically, that's what the ego is, to have a sense of identity that is based on the conditioned mind plus the emotions that reflect the conditioned mind.

Usually, people think when one speaks of a big ego, that ego is people who are bigger than life. They have a huge ego. They think they are the greatest and the most wonderful and superior to everybody.

That can be one aspect of ego. There's also another ego. If you don't have enough stuff to identify with, you don't have more knowledge than most people, you don't have a great body or appearance, you don't have social class background, you don't have possessions, what do you do then?

What do you identify with then? Oh my God, who am I? All of them, the ego work very cleverly shaped to a kind of victim identity.

I am so, I've been treated so unfairly by life. My parents, it started when I was born, dreadful background, life always been at a disadvantage, always been a victim, either you personally or you can identify with the whole social group and say we have always been victims and we still are victims. Of course, there are individuals who have been, born into very dreadful circumstances.

There are also, there have been on our entire groups of people who are born into bad circumstances. That is undoubtedly true. The danger is making that into your sense of identity that keeps you trapped very much in a kind of prison, very seductive.

There's a big tendency these days for people to have a collective victim identity, very seductive for the ego. You can read about it on the internet very quickly how it becomes more and more fashionable almost these days to have a collective victim identity. And that again, there are men who feel they are the victims of women, we men, there are women who feel they are the victim of men, that all men are basically bad.

And then there's a smaller group of men who think all women are out to get them, don't want anything more to do with women. And that's 50% of humanity dismissed. It gives you a sense of identity.

So be careful with also political viewpoints in your mind, mental positions that you share with groups of others. Of course, everybody has certain mental positions concerning politics or whatever it may be. The danger is that that becomes the most significant part of your sense of self.

Then you are trapped in this, what I call form identity. You may have gone beyond the physical form of the body, but you are still trapped in a mental form identity. And if you are trapped in a mental form identity, you need others, other people or groups of people to totally disagree with you so that you can make them into your enemies.

That is a very common strategy of the mind-made fictitious, ultimately fictitious sense of self that is the ego. And you have to be very careful with that too. Very seductive, especially if you start going on the internet these days and social, social, whatever it's called.

You go on the internet these days and see a lot of unconscious mind activity and attacking other people, attacking groups of people, attacking individuals in the most vile way. People who are so deeply trapped in their form identity that this ego has to, it loves making others into enemies, other groups. It's an unconscious process.

Don't allow yourself to be drawn into that through social media and all those things that people use these days. The unconscious need to make either individuals or other groups of people into your enemies, even in very unconscious people at the point of you want to kill them. So those are the most unconscious.

And if you're a bit still unconscious, but not extreme of unconsciousness, and you shout at them and you say they are the most dreadful human beings that ever lived on the planet. You are identified with your mental positions. You're identified with your mind.

And the more you emphasize the otherness of others, the more you feel that your sense of identity gets stronger and enhanced. It's a delusion. Really, you are more deluded than before.

The more you strengthen the ego identity, the more deluded you actually are as to your true identity. And the more trapped you become in this mental, ultimately conceptual prison and think that is who you are. But it's an unconscious process.

The ego needs enemies in order to feel the boundary around itself more strongly. Religions, some religions do it. So you have the disbelievers, the unbelievers, disbelievers, they are less than human in some extreme forms of religion.

Or those who do not share your particular belief, even within your religion, in some cases are less than human. These are extreme forms of egoic unconsciousness, but the egoic unconsciousness also manifests in less extreme forms. There's a whole scale in which this egoic unconsciousness manifests.

And it's all based on identity. It's not ultimately knowing who you are. Now, this does not mean that you do not have a form identity because obviously every human being has a form identity.

And needs to some extent honor their form identity. We're not saying you're not a body, don't think about your body, just don't, no. And we're not saying don't have any political viewpoint, it's dangerous.

No, we're not saying that. Even I have political viewpoints. I don't talk about them because I don't want to lose 50% of the audience.

And the other 50% would go, yes, yes. It's much more important that you awaken, that I reach as many people as possible so they awaken so that wisdom can manifest in their life. And then you are no longer trapped in your mental positions.

You may still have them, but you no longer, and this is the key, you no longer derive your sense of who you are from your mental positions. Therefore, you are no longer threatened when somebody questions your mental positions. Whatever the mind has identified with, when somebody questions your political viewpoints, questions your religion, questions your beliefs, questions even insignificant things, that the car that you drive is actually not very good.

You didn't, you know that. What? My car, this identification, honoring who you are on the level of form is fine, not only accepting, but also honoring this body.

Of course, you look after the body. You do your best, exercise, nutrition, and so on. You do your best to look after the body so that it lasts, if possible, for as long as possible, or at least until you become enlightened, and then it doesn't matter anymore.

Because then you don't need time anymore. But until you're enlightened, you need time, or you think you need time. The greatest error is that, of course, that you think you need time to be enlightened.

You don't, but you may need time until you fully realize that you don't need time. We'll be going into that more deeply in time. So there is an identity that, yes, you have a form identity, and it is to be honored.

You have a form identity as, for example, perhaps most of you are Irish. That is part of your form identity. That is part of what you inherit it, and that is part of the culture into which you were born.

It is not something to be totally dismissed and to say, oh, this is worthless. I'm just into, this is part of who you are on the level of form. It is not who you are on the deepest level.

It is not who you are in the essence of your being, but it is who you are, part of who you are on the level of form. And it's good to acknowledge that. You can love your cultural background, why not?

But if you identify with it completely, then the danger is that the ego misuses it, uses it, ultimately misuses it, and it will make other cultures that are not yours, has this tendency of making other cultures into either less or enemies. It strengthened itself through that. So for example, to recognize your own culture is fine, but to dismiss or to attack other cultures, then you realize ego has come in.

The ego always attempts superiority of others. Always its attempt is, it's an unconscious process. Its attempt is superiority.

And it loves its enemies collectively and individually. So there's a difference between loving your culture, but not needing it ultimately to tell you who you are, just realizing it's part of your form identity. Same thing, accepting your viewpoints and perspectives on politics or whatever it may be, but realizing that is not who you are essentially.

Then when you come into contact with another culture, you can have a friendly exchange. It's lovely. And you can learn from other cultures and be interested in other cultures and still value yours.

You can also share a conversation with somebody who has a different persuasion politically. And this person may question your beliefs and you can defend. Yes, you can defend your mental position without the feeling that you are defending your life, without the feeling that you're being attacked by somebody if somebody questions your mental position.

That is the difference between having a mental position, a perspective, a viewpoint, or being identified with your mental position, which means you derive your sense of self from it. That is the danger. That is the delusion.

That is the egoic unconsciousness. And that is something we need to grow out of. And we are growing out of it because if we don't grow out of it, we create more and more havoc on the planet because the egoic delusion, the ego is basically insane or it has degrees of insanity.

So identification is the identification with form identity is egoic delusion, but accepting form identity and valuing form identity is fine. Now, the only way you can not be identified with your form identity, which is your body, whether you're a man or a woman, that's for many people is a big identification already, country, nationality, culture, family background, education, knowledge, all abilities, all the things that people, the only way you can not be identified is using it as the source for your sense of self is to discover in yourself a more essential, deeper sense of who you are.

And this is why we're here. And that is the spiritual awakening. So you have the two dimensions.

We're going more deeply into that now. We have the two dimensions of who you are. You are here as a form identity with a body and with a cultural, a mental cultural background, knowledge, education, mental conditioning, the personality that you are also on a level of who you see yourself as a person is an essential part of the ego too.

You have that, which is your story. And again, we need to add this one to form identity. It is also a danger to identify with your personal history and derive your sense of self exclusively from your personal history with all to do with your form identity.

Your personal history is what makes you the person, the personality that you are now. That you, the personality that goes through life manifesting your particular type of conditioning because everybody here has been conditioned. Their minds, your mind has been conditioned in a certain way.

Obviously, since you were born, you were born into a particular family. So you already start to get conditioned by that family background. You're born into a particular country and this conditions you in that way.

You're born into particular, perhaps a religion that conditions you in that way. You are born into particular circumstances, financial and otherwise, whether your parents are educated, not educated, what kind of school you go to, all those things gradually come together and they form certain mind forms which are ultimately thought forms. And these thought forms, they come together and these thought forms that are most frequently activated in your mind form this personality that you are.

That's another aspect of your form identity. And for most people, that's all they know. They only know themselves as that.

They only know themselves as this person that they are. And they identify with their form identity. And all the other things I mentioned before are part of that, their political views and all this forms the personality of the person.

And everybody has conditioning, of course. You can't not be conditioned. Your mind is conditioned by the surrounding culture.

If you had been born in some country away from here, you would not be the same person that you are now. If you had been born in Saudi Arabia, you had been born somewhere in Africa, you had been born somewhere in South America, you would not be the person you are now because your mind, your mental conditioning would be different. The one thing that would not change is in the absence of awakening, you would be completely identified with your conditioning.

And so that is something important to recognize that you have a personal history. Some of it you know, you remember. Many things you remember about that makes up who you are.

Some things you don't even remember. They are unconscious forms of conditioning. You may have to go to a psychoanalyst or someone like that to uncover hidden memories and that has certain usefulness, but it does not awaken you.

It has a certain usefulness. So the strange thing is though that on the level of the personality and your personal history, for most people, that story of who they think they are is not terribly happy. There are many people who go through life feeling miserable a lot of the time and they're being made miserable by something that they call my life.

My life. My life is making me unhappy. This is a very common way of living and suffering.

My life is making me unhappy. There may be a few of you still here who have that notion that their life is almost a burden to them and that so many things went wrong. So many things that happened should not have happened and other things that should have happened didn't happen.

So many people live with that and there are many regrets. There are grievances. There are mental accusations of myself.

How could I have been so stupid of other people? Look what they did to me. All kinds of things that you carry around which are...

Now, what are those things that you carry around? The guilt, the regret, the grievances and so on all to do with your past. What are those things?

Those things, it really all boils down to they are thoughts in your head plus emotion that reflects the thoughts. So it's an emotional, a mental emotional entity in you. These are thoughts about you, about your life and these thoughts you call your life but all it is, is thoughts.

So here we again, we come to the point of identification which is always ego, unconscious identification. When you identify with every thought that arises in your head and in the case of your personal history, it's a narrative. The personal history is basically a story.

A story you tell yourself and others of what happened to me and the story has even an unconscious part to it. It might just be there, certain emotions but basically there's a narrative in everybody's mind and people call it my life. Not realizing that ultimately what they call my life are concepts that they keep alive in their mind.

So it is a mental, a mind made sense of identity and this is the most normal way for people to live. Everybody who is not awakened and has not even touched that dimension within them, they are totally trapped in that. They don't know that they are trapped and millions of people on the planet are made miserably unhappy by the narrative in their heads.

The narrative that says my life that went wrong here and there and there are so many regrets and also I've missed out on life, it's too late now. What's the point of it anyway? Oh, it's so awful and you tell yourself the story.

You can tell it to others too. They may be, perhaps they'll listen. Let me tell you about my, you think you've had it bad?

I'm just, let me just laugh. You, you can't complain. Let me tell you my story.

It all started when I came out of my mother's womb. I cried, I couldn't stop crying. It was so, so awful.

I knew I didn't want to be here and then it went downhill from there. Now, if that's not your life, where is your life? If that's only concepts in your head, ultimately thought forms that you mistake for who you are if those are thought forms.

So if those thought forms are ultimately not your life, they are the story of you. They may be your life situation. That's because who you, what your life situation is now is connected to the so-called past.

The so-called past has brought you here. You're in a particular life situation, in a particular location where you live, particular work that you do, family, relationships or none. And all that is your life situation and your life.

And it's not who you are ultimately. And to look for yourself in the realm of the mind, which ultimately the realm of concepts, mental concepts, which is really what it is, the story. It's a collection of mental concepts is very limiting and is a source of unhappiness because no mind made self, no conceptual identity, which is what the ego is, no conceptual identity is really a very happy one.

Most conceptual identities live in a state of almost continuous sense of not enough. There's a sense of lack. There's something that hasn't happened yet.

In my life, something hasn't happened yet. I hope it's going to happen. I don't even know exactly what it is, but I have this strange feeling that I haven't started living yet.

I have this strange feeling that it hasn't started yet. Weird. I'm waiting for my life to start because so far that can't be my life.

That wasn't good enough. That's not it. And then suddenly you're surprised you're 75.

It still hasn't started. Before you're 75, you can still have the delusion that when I retire, when I finally retire, I'll start living. Then, or before you had a few other delusions, before you had other delusions which turned out to be delusions, for example, when I finally find the ideal partner, then I'll be happy for the rest of my life.

That was one of the big delusions because obviously you married the wrong person. Because when you started living with that person, you realized that that wasn't the person you married. Suddenly you say, who is this guy?

Who is this person? Oh my God. Big mistake.

And then you had a few other delusions that suddenly you had arrived because finally you got the promotion or whatever it was. And then, yes, okay. But then you went into that situation.

There was something wrong there. There was a big downside to it. All the people around you were out to get you and there were intrigues and the energy field in that company was dreadful.

Yes, the salary was good, but you were miserable every day. And then you find every situation you go into has a huge downside or turns around and becomes the opposite. The person who makes you happy today makes you unhappy two years time.

Same person, weird. So that sense of self that has this sense of something lacking. It's always a sense of insufficiency, of not enough.

That is the conceptual sense of self. That is my life that either hasn't started yet or hasn't worked out yet. Or then you have hope.

I'm going to make it. Interesting expression. I'm going to make it, whatever that is.

The world tells you, you have to make it. I am going to make it, I hope. And then on the other side, you have the fear.

I may not make it. And then you wake up in the middle of the night. I'm not going to make it.

Oh my God. I'm going to be just as insignificant as I'm right now. I'm not going to be recognized by everybody as extraordinary.

If somebody when I was in my 20s had told me I had a big ego, more on the unhappy side, this is the victim ego side, but anyway, big. If somebody had told me, let's say, if I had gone to a psychic and that psychic said, you will be one day a great spiritual teacher, my ego would have gone, wow, yeah. I'm going to be significant.

Now, if the psychic had been a good one, he would have added, but you have to die first. And it's not going to give you any personal satisfaction. What?

That sucks. What do you mean I have to die first? Well, perhaps he would have explained, your entire conceptual identity has to go.

So when you become a spiritual teacher, you're not going to be proud of being a spiritual teacher. So on that level, it's not satisfying. And so I probably would have said, I don't know if I still want it.

So we have my life and it's a conceptual identity in the head and it's a huge limitation to be trapped in it. Again, you can honor your history. It's coming back to accepting and honoring who you are.

That's part of who you are on the level of form. It's fine. You can remember your past.

You can look at the photos. You remember stories, what happened, but there's no longer a sense of getting your sense of self from that. So how do you not identify?

Now we come to the core of it. How do you not identify with your form identity, your conceptual self? Well, here we come to the ancient Greek dictum again, know thyself.

Know thyself at the deepest level. Now, interesting fact is at the temple of Apollo in ancient Greece, there was that inscription, know thyself. But of course, most people didn't know what to do with that.

Okay. Well, they went to the Oracle at Delphi and ask questions about, am I going to meet the right person? And then the Oracle would say, so I said, I lost this ring, where did I leave it?

And then the Oracle would say something, please tell me where I'm going to be in 20 years time. Okay. These are all very superficial things that people were seeking.

And this is why there was this inscription, know thyself. But nobody knew, but they had put a key there, a secret key on this building in order to show people how to know themselves. And that secret key for several hundred years, nobody knew what it meant.

The secret key in ancient Greek, it was the letter E, E, E, E in Greek. And just one letter on the building. And you, what does that mean?

And several hundred years later, the philosopher Plutarch explained it in one of his writings, it's the second person, quite simply, it's the second person singular, and it means you are, you are. And that is the secret key to the saying, know thyself. What does that mean?

You are. So when somebody reads that, somebody reads that, you are. So how would you, when you say to yourself, of course you say, oh, I am?

Yes, you are. I am? I am what?

Now, the interesting thing is nothing was added to it. It just said, you are. It doesn't say you are Greek, you are a man or a woman, or you are this or that, or you are a Democrat or Republican.

It just said, or you're rich or poor, or old or young or whatever. It said, you are. This is a pointer.

It's a pointer, not an explanation or anything. It's a pointer. So when you read you are, you translate it as I am.

I am what? Now, this pointer is very significant. It points to the essence of who you are that is deeper or higher, one could say, than your form identity.

for more Enlightened Teachings from Eckhart Tolle. Thank you for listening.

Eckhart Tolle Rooted In the Being Dimension [85a51464-f619-4186-9187-c7e82a2eb20b]

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:45)

Rooted in the being dimension. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions like, is it possible to remain in a permanent state of acceptance? And how do we deal with our fears about what others think of us?

Eckhart says it's not realistic to expect that we will be consistently peaceful and harmonious. The challenges of our lives will affect us, but not at the core of who we are. We remain rooted in what Eckhart calls the being dimension.

He explains we go beyond the duality of happiness and unhappiness to find peace. Eckhart says the degree to which we are free from the opinions of others depends on our connectedness to the deeper dimension of who we are.

[Speaker 5] (0:46 - 1:11)

Hello, thank you so much for teaching. My question is, is it possible to be permanently in that state of profound peace, love and happiness and deal with the challenge from there? Or we will always be pulled into and out of that state through the challenge?

[Speaker 1] (1:12 - 1:18)

Right. Is it possible to be always in the state of, what did you say? A state of?

[Speaker 5] (1:18 - 1:23)

A profound peace where you are the peace and the love and the happiness.

[Speaker 1] (1:24 - 12:20)

Thank you. Thank you. It would not be advisable to have a certain expectation that you need to arrive at a place where you are always at peace and whatever word you want to use it, always the same peaceful state.

I can only talk from my own experience or realization and what I have observed in others who have gone through the awakening process or are going through the awakening process, it's inevitable that there will be certain fluctuations in your life. There may be fluctuations on the physical level. There may be times when you have less physical energy than at other times when you have more physical energy.

Then there may be certain events in your life that happen that you could be on a beautiful vacation somewhere or in a beautiful natural setting and feeling very peaceful, or you could just have achieved something that you have desired, you achieved professional success or whatever, and then you feel very happy. And then there may be other times when you lose something big, something is taken away, somebody dies close to you. These are external things.

These fluctuations will affect you to some extent, but never at the core of who you are. So what remains in the background is that field of peace. So if somebody dies next to close to you, your parent or even a child dies, of course you feel sad.

You feel, you weep, you cry, and the sadness will linger for some time and come in waves, come and go. And yet what does not happen, despite the sadness, you do not become devastated. It does not devastate you to the core of your being.

There remains in the background a substratum, to use a term from geology, there remains a substratum of peace. Even there may be some turmoil on the surface, but you're never totally caught up in that. There's always that you can step back and you're aware of that background of peace.

It's always that's there. On the surface, you may weep and cry if you're standing at the grave of a loved one, and yet you are not devastated, as to use that term. There is still a peace in the background.

The opposite is also true. When something wonderful happens to you, let's say you suddenly, well, some people think something wonderful would be to win the lottery, or you get the big promotion, or you suddenly become famous. Many people want that.

They think that would be the greatest. They've asked many youngsters, what do you really want to become in life? In the past, the youngsters used to say, I want to become whatever, a fireman, or I want to become a footballer, I want to become whatever.

But now, significant section of people, youngsters that they ask, they say, I want to become famous. This is the effect of things like Instagram and so on. Some say, I want to become an influencer.

Instagram, influencer has relatively little meaning. But so famous is something that many people think that's the greatest thing that could happen to you. So let's, then the other extreme, something that's great happens to you and you feel, wow, wonderful, great.

Yes. But even that, you don't completely lose yourself in that. It doesn't take you over to an absurd degree, but you overvalue an external circumstance to an absurd degree.

The overvaluing of an external circumstance that happens to you, you say, that's it, that's it. No, it's not. So you can be pleasant.

So it's great, you're happy. Yes, you're happy. But you're not lost in your happiness.

There's still the same background of peace. And because if something makes you happy, some circumstance makes you happy, very often, the same circumstance at a later point will make you unhappy. So I have met quite a few so-called famous people, and they've told all the same story.

At first, they were elated. And then they became actually more unhappy than they were before. Because they could no longer project some future state that's going to make them happy because they had already achieved all the things that they could have projected in conventional terms.

They could have projected that could make them happy, lots of money, a private jet, fame, and fortune. Got all that, what now? So you don't lose yourself neither in the so-called negative things that happen, nor in the so-called positive things that happen.

So you remain rooted in the being dimension. What happens on the level of the person? Yes, you can be happy.

Unhappiness, deep unhappiness does not happen anymore. You can be kind of, feel sorry about something that happened, but it's not really unhappiness. Some spiritual teachers use the term happiness, but I believe it's not, maybe it's a mistranslation.

Some people say, some teachers say, your true nature is happiness. I wouldn't use the term to describe this, the deeper state of connectedness with being. I would not describe that as happiness, because happiness is, wow, isn't it great?

Yeah, great, so wonderful. Oh, and then the next day, oh my God, oh no, you got, that's unhappiness, happiness, unhappiness. I believe in the power of now, I wrote a chapter that's, the title of the chapter is, Beyond Happiness and Unhappiness, There is Peace.

Beyond happiness and unhappiness, there is peace. And so that means neither the happiness nor the unhappiness are that pronounced anymore. It doesn't mean that you haven't lost anything.

The enjoyment of life, you might think, oh, I can't enjoy the good things anymore. No, you still enjoy them, but you don't overvalue circumstances. And so the feeling of goodness comes from a deeper place.

It does not come from the circumstances of your life. That's where you're going, where you're moving towards. So don't expect to be totally free of the fluctuating, somehow superficial reaction to the circumstances of your life.

They're a little bit there, a little bit, but not at the deepest core, you're rooted in being. So you become no longer at the mercy of circumstances in your life. You welcome the good things and you accept the not good things.

There's surrender, acceptance, unless you can change something, you accept, you welcome. And in a strange way, you'll find that you're less likely to awaken than in the bad times. That's universally true.

In your comfort zone, you are less likely to awaken because who would want to awaken from a pleasant dream? Oh, it's so nice. But when the pleasant dream turns into a nightmare, then the incentive to awaken is really there.

I can't stand this anymore. So it's only when you're out of your comfort zone that spiritual awakening becomes possible. So welcome whatever arises, still be pleased when it's good.

And when it's not good, or it doesn't look good, then practice acceptance. And if you cannot accept at first, and you feel angry or sad, then you practice secondary acceptance. First acceptance is what the circumstance or the event.

Secondary acceptance is, you might feel angry or sad about something, and you simply accept that you feel angry or sad right now. So if you miss the first chance of acceptance, then you react, and then you become aware of the reaction. And then you say, okay, I feel sad or angry.

That's what is right now. So you always get another chance of acceptance. And the acceptance is a doorway that always connects you or reconnects you with the dimension of being.

That's the opening into being through the acceptance. Acceptance of what is, this moment, acceptance of what is, connects you with the being dimension. When you accept what is, you're no longer, as far as your inner state is concerned, you're no longer at the mercy of what is out there.

So you realize your inner state is no longer dependent on external conditions. And that's a wonderful liberation, because external conditions are extremely unstable. Nothing lasts for very long.

Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (12:21 - 14:02)

Hello. My question, Eckhart, thank you for giving me this opportunity, is in regards to know which is your views in regards to coronavirus and these past two years and the approach that has been taken. I'm very aware of the suffering, and my heart goes with people that have suffered and still are suffering.

Myself, I am not vaccinated. I'm 43, not vaccinated. I have decided not to.

And I have, most of the time, I feel peace within that decision. But at times, I also feel like judged by others. Sometimes my family, my husband, he's vaccinating himself, but he's very supportive.

And also, I feel at times also isolated, because everyone I know has taken a different path. And although I don't want to convince anybody to do something different, it saddens me a little bit that thinking that we made taking a choice due to fear. So my question is really, I don't fear the virus.

And I say this with the greatest respect. But I sometimes feel like I fear what others can think of me. So is this fear ego?

Also, how long can someone be strong enough to recognize the inner voice and despise being perceived as careless to continue following the inner voice? Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (14:03 - 41:26)

Thank you. Thank you. Well, the question is, what others think of you?

To what extent does it affect me? Does it affect you? What others think of you?

Well, the more you are identified with an image of who you are, which is ego, the more important it will be to you what image of you other people have. So the degree to which you are free from being affected by other people's opinion of you, it depends on your connectedness with the deeper dimension of who you are beyond the person, the being dimension. When you're rooted in being, then whatever opinion somebody may have of you is not terribly important anymore.

Yes, it's nicer for other people to think you're a great person than for other people to think you're a bad person. Again, this connects with what we said in the previous question. It may affect you a little bit if somebody thinks badly of you and you feel a little bit happy when some other people think well of you, that's fine.

But it doesn't affect you at the deepest level. The main work is to awaken to who you are beyond the person. Then yes, you still get affected a little bit by what other people think of you, but not at a deep level anymore.

And then you can tolerate even not being liked by others. When you become well-known, then obviously anybody who does something in this world to make a difference, no matter what you do, will also generate a lot of opposition and dislike. So anybody, no matter what you do, when you create something, you put yourself out there.

Many people may love you and others may hate you. I realized that many years ago when the first book came out and then the internet started happening and I started reading comments on whether people thought of the power of now. And at first they were all wonderful.

And I said, oh, I think that's very nice. I feel good. And then as it became more widespread and reached other people, people in the mainstream, then certain segments were very negative.

And I could feel a little bit of, oh, reading a negative comment doesn't not feel as good as reading a positive comment. And then later on, as I became more well-known, then there were many, many positive comments, just wonderful. And like 5%, 10%, very negative comments about this dreadful guy.

Who does he think he is? Terrible charlatan, the Antichrist, all kinds of, of course, Antichrist must be true because I'm helping people find inner peace. So it must be the Antichrist.

But I found the strange thing is the negative comments are more memorable than the positive ones. That's just how the human mind works. So I could read 30 positive comments and three negative comments.

And the next day I would forget all the positive comments. I still remember the negative ones. This is how all human minds operate.

Negative things are more memorable than, than positive things, it seems. I call that stickiness. They have a stickiness, they get sticky thoughts in your mind.

Anyway, I decided then at some point not to read any comment. And for the past years, I haven't read hardly any comment about what anybody says. It's, it's doesn't matter.

It's I don't want the stickiness of the negative ones or the good ones. It's fine. I let go of that completely.

And that's very liberating. But in the greater context of the virus, now you might have noticed that there's an enormous amount of emotion around it in human beings. There's an enormous amount of animosity towards other, one group against another group.

There's an enormous amount of fear around it. And fear, of course, as we know, diminishes your ability to think rationally. I could tell you now what my position is about the virus and the vaccine and so on, but I'm not going to because who cares what my position is.

And if I told you what my position is, if I either said, you, those who refuse the vaccine are really irresponsible and selfish, and they're not thinking of others, and it's just dreadful. Or if I said, those who take the vaccines, they are, and they, and who love the mandates, they are really sheep. They're just being, allowing themselves to be manipulated by these irrational, crazy politicians.

And they're total sheep. They don't know what they're doing. Whatever I said, I would lose one third of my audience in whatever direction, because there would be a reaction.

He's against the vaccine, or he wants us to be sheep or whatever it is. It doesn't really matter. The important thing, my job is to help you birth the awareness.

When the awareness is there, you will know what is right for you to do, because that's wisdom arises with the awareness. I'm not here to convince you of this or that, or, or whatever it may be political or whatever it may be. It's all secondary.

It's all secondary. The main work is, my purpose, and for some of you, it's arising as your purpose also, is to be the bringer of awareness to this world. Your contribution to this world is awareness, consciousness.

Then humans, when the awareness is there, whatever humans decide to do will come from a place of wisdom. Wisdom, a word that's not used a lot nowadays, but it's extremely important. That any decision you make comes from the deeper place of wisdom.

Whatever it is, be very alert, so that you don't get taken over by a fear reaction. On top of fear, often anger arises. Anger, in most cases, there's fear underneath anger.

There's fear, and then comes anger. If you're angry with a group of humans who have the opposite views from your views, then it's something to be aware of, to observe in yourself, and to observe your thoughts, and to observe the emotion. Bring awareness to whatever it is that you feel.

Anger is a good thing to be aware of when you notice it. Where does it come from? What thoughts are creating the anger?

What thoughts in your mind? What is the fear beyond it? Our society has been very reluctant to deal with death, or the possibility of death.

To some extent, the virus, although the likelihood that an individual, unless the individual is old or has certain preconditions, the likelihood may be relatively small that you die of the virus, unless you are careless, or you're old, or already ill. The possibility is there, and so it's a wonderful opportunity to look death in the face, the inevitability of death, because don't wait until death is actually very close to you, but we'd never know how close it is, but become aware of the inevitability of death, and the fact that human life, the life of form, is short-lived, and become aware of that in you that is beyond death, which means it is the invisible you, which is almost all of you is an invisible being, and die to the image of who you are, the person, so there's no longer total identification with the person. The being is eternal.

The being beyond the person is eternal. The Buddhists use the term the deathless, Amara, deathless, no death. It is a dimension in yourself that you can become aware of.

In fact, it is the awareness itself. Jesus called it eternal life, which is the same thing. Eternal means timeless, eternal life, so die, the famous saying, die before you die, die to who you think you are, die to the egoic image of who you are, and you die in the every moment when the stream of thinking stops, and a space of awareness arises, you have died for a few seconds.

The person has died, and then the person becomes revived. The person, this consciousness, a person is consciousness incarnating into form, you could say, the consciousness assuming a form, that's the incarnation, which to become form, and so when you identify, consciousness is identified with form, consciousness is asleep, it is dreaming the dream of form. Every person is consciousness dreaming the dream of form, and in that collective dream, there comes a moment where the possibility of awakening from this dream arises, and most of you have reached that point, the possibility of awakening from the dream of form, then consciousness detaches from identification with form, primarily form is mental form, thought forms, because everything that you perceive in the so-called external environment, you experience it as thought forms. If I look at the table here, I experience this table as a thought form in my mind.

Is there really a table there? I don't know, but I know that there's a thought form in my mind that is the table, I experience it as the table. Philosophers, many philosophers asked, is there such a thing as the thing in itself, beyond our perception of the thing?

We don't know it, it doesn't matter. These are all forms that arise, so identification, consciousness identifies with form, why, I don't know why it, that's part of the evolution of this universe, in this dimension, it's, there is a dream, consciousness actually wanted to dream, I assume, and then consciousness wants to awaken out of the dream, and that's a decisive thing, is the awakening out of identification with form. Buddhists talk about the end of reincarnation, but the aim of Buddhists is no longer having to reincarnate from one lifetime to another, they think that's a dreadful thing, so the Buddhist practice is, has the purpose of coming to the end of having to reincarnate, and finally you're free of this compulsion to reincarnate, and Buddhists ask, well, how many more lifetimes do I need before I reach the end of having to reincarnate? And well, maybe some teacher might tell you, if the teacher is not very enlightened, he might tell you, well, you need another, I would say, 25 lifetimes, but it won't happen unless you, unless at least 10 of those are really miserable, and then perhaps you will awaken, okay, well, thank you, at least I have some hope, only 25 lifetimes, okay, it's not that much, I suppose, then you have time, time to suffer more, or a teacher might tell you, you can stop the cycle of reincarnation now, not when you die or after death, but now, well, how can I do that?

Simply by not reincarnating into the next thought that arises, because thought is primordial form, not reincarnating into every thought that arises, what does it mean to reincarnate into a thought? It means to completely identify with the thought, to be in the grip of the thought, then you become the thought or the emotion, you reincarnate in it, you become it, so the end of the cycle of reincarnation, if you're able to step out of thought, the compulsion to have to identify with every thought that arises, and you find the space of no thought, which is awareness, you have already reached the end of reincarnation, so if you do not have to reincarnate into every thought that arises anymore in this lifetime, then you have already died, and you do not need the compulsion to reincarnate after death as this conscious entity that's still there beyond the body, but still has certain characteristics and needs for another dream, it needs another dream of form, and this need for another dream of form, which is another lifetime, is no longer there, and whatever it does then is a matter we don't need to talk about now, there are other dimensions it can go to, but the important thing is, or you might choose to reincarnate to help others, that's what, again, the Buddhist teachings say, if you are a bodhisattva, the bodhisattva is the being who has become free of the need to reincarnate, but chooses to reincarnate in order to awaken others, so maybe you will do that, who knows, or you might say, no thanks, I've had enough, so the important thing then is to die now, which is quite simply step out of thought, step out of identification with thought into awareness, and then it becomes not that, it's no longer that important what other people think of you, it's very much a surface phenomenon, and then you'll know what is right for you to do in this world also, it's wisdom only arises, the person has no wisdom, the person may have kind of intelligence, intelligence is part of the human mind, it's borrowed, it's consciousness too, but consciousness that has taken on form, so the person may be intelligent, but completely unwise, you cannot equate wisdom with intelligence, there are people that are very intellectual, or have two or three PhDs, and in their field, they are very intelligent, but in actuality, they are really stupid, and they take decisions that are extremely unwise, so it always comes down to the same to the same thing as find who you are beyond the conditioned entity, and use the situation of the virus also, and so instead of making you unconscious, this challenge, as it has done to many people, it can make you more conscious, allow the challenge to make you more present, and this is, I've said that before on various occasions, but it's important to repeat, because people tend to forget, there's a line that humans reach, below this line, whenever they are confronted with adversity, difficulties, challenges of major kind, humans are beyond this line, they tend to lose consciousness when faced with adversity or challenges, they become more unconscious, they're more reactive, more angry, more irrational, then other humans are above that line, when they encounter also adversity, challenges, big problems, something going wrong, if you're above that line, the challenges that you encounter, whether of a personal kind or collective kind, actually help to make you more conscious, you become more alert, more conscious, acceptance, you practice acceptance of present moment, you go within, and if a situation becomes difficult, you become more alert, it's like a dimmer switch, the dimmer switch on the light, when things go wrong, the light goes up, so there's this dividing line, when you reach that, you're above this line, then the bad things that happen to you will help to make you more conscious, as long as you are below this line, there's not sufficient awareness yet for this to happen, then the bad things that happen to you will make you more unconscious, for most of you, the bad things that happen now will help to make you more conscious, and the bad things, just to use a generic term, bad, the bad things that happen are extraordinarily important for the total evolution of humanity and consciousness, the bad things are what propel the evolution of consciousness, that's the weird thing, that your purpose is the transmutation of suffering into consciousness, and so the bad things that happen are vitally important, otherwise consciousness would not evolve, because the bad things are the dream turning into a nightmare, and then you want to awaken, and so people ask strange things, like why, the usual argument for the non-existence of God is, if there were a God, why would he allow all these terrible things to happen, that's a simple argument for the non-existence of God, that you hear all the time, and it sounds quite convincing, they say, well, if there were a God, I mean, this is the terrible suffering that's happening on the planet, I wouldn't allow that to happen, if I were a God, people say, I wouldn't allow that, therefore, if I am morally superior to a God, obviously, then there is no God, that's the argument, the departure point for this argument is the image of a controlling figure somewhere, this controlling figure could intervene and do things, a controlling father, for most people, it's still a father, that is, of course, a complete misperception of what God means, God is, first of all, it is impossible to define what God is, it's the source of all life, transcendent source of all life, God has no location in space or time, you can never say, there is God, but God, the light of God emanates into this dimension gradually, and the light of God is consciousness, and the consciousness that you can sense in yourself as yourself is the light of God, and so there's a gradual evolution in this dimension, and every form of suffering, at some point, you will realize that it was all part of the birth pangs, this is actually a term used by St. Paul in the New Testament, the birth pangs of the awakening universe is the suffering, it's a nightmare, it's a bad dream, but it's part of the awakening, out of that comes consciousness, the caterpillar experiences a very unpleasant death, before it becomes a butterfly, and you couldn't explain to the caterpillar what's going to happen to him, he wouldn't understand, so it's a process of transformation, suffering has its place, and then it can be transcended and overcome, but suffering is vitally important up to where you reach that line, after we go above that line, suffering still happens, but is continuously transmuted into consciousness, suffering is transmuted into consciousness, suffering arises because of the bad things, then transmuted into consciousness, and then suffering is no longer suffering, it becomes presence, suffering becomes presence, so both in Buddhism and in Christianity, the essential teaching is about the purpose of suffering, in Buddhism, one of the main things Buddha said is, I teach suffering and the end of suffering, there are many things in Buddhism that you read that were added later, scriptures that were written later attributed to the Buddha, but there are some things that are absolutely so powerful that you knew that's what he actually said, I teach suffering and the end of suffering, which means I show you how suffering arises, and I show you how suffering can be transcended, and what about Christianity? The central image of Christianity is a human being nailed to the cross in suffering, the central image of Christianity is one of suffering, now many people say, if you're a Christian, you may still interpret it in one way, non-Christians often say, isn't that dreadful, I don't want to see cross, there is a deep meaning behind it that could perhaps be intuitively grasped by humans who would not be able to understand it conceptually, so if you identify with the archetype of suffering on the cross, the archetypal human, if you identify it, whenever you encounter your suffering, you can participate in the suffering of Christ, in the past humans have done that and have achieved some degree of surrender and awakening by identifying with the archetypal human, let you see, he stands for all humans, that's how I see it, and for the possibility of rebirth, the possibility of resurrection, which is a transformation, which is the shift in consciousness, a new caterpillar becomes a butterfly, so we have come a long way from your question, but it's all connected, so let's, I trust it makes sense to you and let's just repeat one more time, the importance of adversity, bad things happening, use them, use whatever happening, whatever happens in your life when it does happen and accept, surrender, become more present through any challenge, difficult situations, difficult people, emotion, people in deep pain, body, emotion and so on, be very, very present, there's a saying in the Latin language from Roman times, which it's a Latin proverb, it goes, which could be translated through adversity to the stars, is translated as adversity, but literally it means the rough things of life, the unpleasantness, the unpleasant things, but it's adversity, anything bad, through adversity to the stars, that points, there's a lot of wisdom in that saying, to the stars is a symbol for rising, rising above being merely human, rising to a higher level, let's say another question.

[Speaker 2] (41:27 - 43:09)

Yes, my question is, it was actually my experience during my meditation, six days meditation retreat, so prior to the retreat, some stressful event happened, so the first two days, I was thinking heavily of that event and I know, okay, I should stop thinking, however, I couldn't because I was suffering and on day three, because I think after talking to counselors and now also kind of sitting in my meditation, I was like, I don't want to think about it anymore, my brain is like so hurting by thinking intensively all day long for two days, so suddenly my brain, the voice in my head, quiet and I heard an inner voice rising and it was a very like soft, loving, wise, like wisdom voice and talking to me and answering all the questions I ask, so I was like, okay, I experienced spiritual awakening, however, the next day, my brain was trying to make sense of it, I was like, how did that just happen and I was going crazy, I was like, did my mind just make that up, did my mind just pretended a spiritual awakening, I still don't know the answer, but I'm just learning to surrender, however, I still want to know what's your thought of the experience I just experienced, I experienced.

[Speaker 1] (43:09 - 55:15)

Right, well, thank you, very wonderful experience, now the mind when it takes over, will always question and doubt, it likes questioning and doubting, it does that a lot and the mind cannot understand, it cannot understand wisdom, the mind itself can understand wisdom, but you can, so if you look back, was that experience real, the peace that you felt, was that real, yes, what is the quality of the thoughts that came to you, you have to, this is the same thing when sometimes when inspiration happens, you connect with the deeper level of who you are, the unconditioned consciousness and when you connect with that, it sometimes rises into your mind and uses your mind as an instrument and then you can speak wisdom or you can think thoughts that may be profound or of significance, you can always, you look at what arises, if you're in a state of, seems like a state of deep peace and then something comes, what's the quality when you speak, what is it that arises out of that state, that's, that will tell you what is the, you recognize them by the fruit, the fruit that comes if the, that comes from the New Testament that's saying, wisdom arises out of that state, with you that state was a temporary emergence and then it got obscured again, when it got obscured again, you lost touch with it and doubt came in and questions were asked and so on, you can recognize that this is what the mind does when doubt comes in, you don't have to believe in every thought that then comes in and so if you continue to observe the thoughts about it instead of finding out something significant by thinking about it, then that brings awareness back, some awareness comes back by observing your thoughts, so that you're not completely trapped in the thoughts again, also the egoic mind does not like your awakening because that means it loses its grip on you, the egoic mind could be seen as a little entity made up of emotional mental formations is an entity that does not want to give up its hold on you, it thinks it's you, so it likes to interfere with the awakening, it likes to bring up thoughts, for example, I often recommend that people have little short meditations during their daily life, when they just take a few conscious breaths as much as they can observe, take a few conscious breaths and then I often point out, often the mind will tell you, I can't do it now, I don't have the time now, I have so many things to deal with, it's a thought, now do you believe in that thought, when it says I can't do it now, I said I don't have the time, it's obviously not true because everybody has one minute time, unless you're involved in an emergency situation, everybody has one minute time to take a few, two or three conscious breaths, everybody, no matter even a busy, very busy person, you have a minute, well, you have a minute to go to the toilet, then you can have a minute to do a little mini meditation, everybody has, but the mind will tell you, no, no, I can't do it now, I'll meditate when I'm a bit more peace, I have too much on my plate now, I can't do it now, many thoughts can take you away from awakening, thoughts that are actually designed to keep you asleep, thoughts that are designed to keep you identified with thoughts, this is why fearful thoughts are particularly strong, if fear arises, fearful thoughts can really prevent you from awakening for a long, long time, because they're empowered by the emotion of fear, so the important thing is don't believe in every thought that comes into your head, become aware of the kinds of thoughts that arise at any time, this awareness is, that's the beginning of the state that you had during that time, so it's more likely to come back and then remain in the background, so that you have a background to your thoughts, that's more important than the thoughts, that's perhaps the vital thing here, to be aware of this background to your thoughts, which is the aware space, space of awareness, more important than whatever the thoughts are saying, and that's the practice then, is to not to fight the thoughts, but to observe them, to become aware of them, so that you are the space and not the thought, the thoughts will succeed many times probably in drawing you in again, but and then at some point you notice it, usually when you begin to get very unhappy, you become anxious or fearful or you become whatever the thoughts are doing to you, that can be a great awakener, say I'm unhappy, why am I unhappy, and then you look and then you might say, okay, for the past hour I've had unhappy self-talk, self-talk, narrative, an unhappy narrative, I'm unhappy because my thoughts are making me unhappy, unhappy is a generic term, there may be mild forms of unhappiness, when you're just kind of anxious or irritated or other more extreme forms of unhappiness, but the greater part of unhappiness is produced by your thoughts, and so if your thoughts are making you unhappy, then become aware of your thoughts, so that they lose the power of making you unhappy, and then they gradually dissolve into something else, it's amazing how much unhappiness arises for human beings, simply out of their mind, yes, there are difficult situations that may arise quite often, but the greater part of the real unhappiness arises out of identification with narratives, unhappy narratives, because the unhappy narrative becomes an unhappy me, an unhappy self, an unhappy entity, the person, an unhappy person, repeated unhappy narratives, identification with unhappy narratives bring about an unhappy identity, and this identity is a self, the Buddhists call it a self, it's a delusional entity, and humans, many humans carry the burden of a very unhappy self, their entire life is a bundle of unhappiness, they don't know it, this is part of, this is an aspect of what we described as the dream, the nightmare, it's a very heavy unpleasant dream, but humans, they carry the burden of an unhappy self, and the unhappy self consists of repetitive narratives that is called my life, my dreadful life, my problematic life, my awful life, me and my life, sometimes I call it me and my life, and then you have to start thinking about it even more, because how can I solve this problem of me and my life, and the more you think about it, the more problematic it becomes, but so it's what people call my life, they carry as a burden, not realizing it is a mind-made entity, a mental emotional entity that they identify with, consciousness identifies with, and one quick way of getting out of that is present moment awareness, and this is why I sometimes say, what is your problem now, and then you have to admit, well, right now, I don't have a problem, right now, this is just what is, what is right now is this moment, is there a problem, no, well, maybe you have a toothache or could be, but it's a toothache is not a problem, but this moment is no problem, so the more you step into the now, the more you get out of the narrative, and as I described in a book somewhere, very important, your life is not the narrative, the narrative is, might be your life situation or interpretation of your life situation, your life situation is different from your life, your life is now and always, and only always now, my life is only this now, consciousness now, my consciousness now, this is, my life is inseparable from now, my life situation involves time, it involves past and future, entire stuff that I need to think about for it to exist, I need to think about it, if I don't think about the past, it doesn't exist, if I don't think about the future, there is no future, future does not exist, nobody has ever encountered it, it only exists in the mind, we need it for practical purposes, that's fine, no doubt about it, but otherwise, we don't need it, other than practical purposes, because it doesn't ultimately exist, there's only now, your life is now, become more concerned with your life now, give more attention to your life than your life situation, if you don't give more attention to your life now, then the funny thing is, even your life situation improves, your life is now, life situation is past and future, and it's a mental creation, so that's the importance of, that's all part of awakening life, and then you experience the fullness of life in the present moment, regardless of what's happening, the fullness of life is a fullness of being, the being that you are, beyond the conditioned entity, the person, so that's the answer, I wish you well and continue to observe your mind, be the observing space, observe it from the space of awareness, and rather than being the thought, don't believe in every thought that comes into your mind, thank you, so let's just, again, as we, same as we started, alpha and omega, the beginning and the end is awareness, stillness, eyes open or closed, doesn't matter,

Eckhart Tolle Self Transcendence and the Evolution of Humanity [223ff334-126b-4f88-afba-833f94c80106]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:52)

Self-transcendence and the evolution of humanity. In this episode Eckhart talks with an audience explaining the primary reason for this gathering is to become more aware of our transcendent consciousness, the part of us that is beyond the limits of our personality. He says we can do that through stillness because when we practice stillness we counteract what Eckhart calls possession by the mind.

He explains most of us are completely absorbed by thinking without realizing it. The good news he says is we can change that. Eckhart believes we should resist the thought I am angry and instead say anger is in me.

With this we don't become the emotion. It's a subtle shift. Can you feel that?

Eckhart says eventually these small steps lead to greater awakening.

[Speaker 1] (0:54 - 31:31)

I like to start quite often with a moment of stillness because stillness is of vital importance in your life. If you don't have access to inner stillness then your life will be unsatisfying and not very enjoyable. However in a huge place like LA or New York it is sometimes problematic to begin with stillness because on your way here in LA you traveled probably in the car like most people here and you might have experienced small forms of unexpected events.

Well I don't know if traffic jam in LA is unexpected but you found perhaps irritation arising because we're going to be late. I told you you should have left earlier. No it was you.

You did that etc. There are all kinds of stories probably associated with it but irritation may have arisen perhaps even a little bit of anger and that might still be lingering in your energy field right now or some of you possibly and if that is the case I suggest the following little practice instead of saying I am irritated which is already better than not even realizing that you are irritated and allow the irritation to control your thinking. That is the deep unconsciousness. So you don't even know you're irritated because you're in the grip of it.

It has become you temporarily. It has taken possession of you and the thoughts associated with it. Interesting.

Then the next thing is you let's say you know you're irritated and then you say I'm irritated. Okay now as a practice I would suggest to say there is irritation in me. Now it might you might think it's just a play with words but it's more than that.

To say I am irritated or I am angry yes it's better than being so angry that you have become the anger totally. However you are still equating I identity with the emotion that has arisen when you say I am angry. I because I refers to your identity.

You have to be very careful with whenever you say I am what you add to that because that becomes your identity. Your mind made identity. So instead of saying I am irritated or I am angry there is irritation in me.

There is anger in me. It might seem insignificant to you at first. The shift is that the I has taken a step back and the I is no longer identified with the anger.

There is an awareness that the irritation or the anger is there. This is a little very subtle shift in consciousness and this is a small example but this is very profound really this little seemingly little shift in consciousness. You take a step back instead of identifying yourself with the anger you become the awareness for the anger.

The space of awareness in which the anger arises. The identification is no longer there. You're not denying it.

It's there. It's an energy. You can feel it in the body and it attempts to use your thought processes in order to renew itself continuously.

And sometimes it succeeds and for an hour you think angry thoughts or you can't even listen to this talk here because there's so much lingering irritation. What am I even doing here? Because it it goes into all kinds of it creates new associated thoughts of similar vibrational frequency.

You don't know it but you are ultimately possessed by the mind. So with this little exercise there's anger that is irritation in me. Okay.

Is that so bad? Not really. It's temporary.

It comes and it goes. Now the big thing is if you are aware that it is there you are the awareness. You are not that which arises.

You are the space for what arises. That's an amazing shift. And this is the all essence of awakening.

I'm jumping in at the very beginning of the talk already to the very essence of it. Just in case somebody's in a hurry and needs to leave early then at least you get the essence of it. Okay I'll give 40 minutes to spiritual enlightenment and or spiritual awakening and then I have other things to do.

So this little shift, the stepping back, you become the knowing of whatever arises in your inner space instead of becoming it. That's awakening. That is spiritual awakening.

And that we can practice here and now. So whatever you feel in your energy field, that's what is. And you're aware of it.

You are aware of it. The awareness is also stillness. When you become aware of that dimension within yourself, stillness has arisen in the background.

And that's an amazing thing. The word stillness of course is limited. One could use other words.

To point to it. And I probably will use in the course of this evening, I probably will use other pointers. Because some pointers work better for certain people.

Depends on your inclination. So now perhaps we are ready to be aware of stillness and to have a moment of stillness. Without thinking I have to do a meditation now.

Let's do a meditation. I'm not even saying that. Just be aware of stillness.

Be alert. The alertness is the stillness. The alertness is the awareness.

And that is the essence of our gathering here. Which is, operates on two levels. The conceptual level.

Every talk operates on the conceptual level. Because words come. You hear the words.

You decipher the words. It's concepts. Mental concepts.

Most talks are exclusively mental concepts. Spiritual talks, if they are true, have an added dimension that is more important than the concepts. Although the concepts point to it continuously.

And this dimension is, we could call it stillness. We could also call it the transcendent consciousness. Where you become aware of yourself.

Not as a person. You are also a person, certainly. But deeper than that, you are a space of consciousness.

I sometimes use human being. This is a concept. You are a human being.

I am a human being. I love it that we have to use two words in the English language. To say that in some languages, like German, you have one word that means both man and woman.

But in English, you don't have one word that means both man and woman. You have to say human being. And unfortunately, the man is still in the human somewhere.

The you man. Some people get angry with that. The you man is the personality, is your mind, your mental emotional field, the conditioned entity as which you exist here with a personality.

Habitually, what usually you refer to when you say I, you refer to that, the you man, the person, the personality. You and your history, which makes up the person. And that's what people refer to when they use everybody's favorite pronoun, I.

What are your pronouns? I. That's my favorite one.

And that's what people, if you listen how many times a day you say I. Many, many times. And what does the I refer to?

It refers to the human you, obviously. It refers to you and your personal history, the accumulation of thoughts and accumulation of residuals of emotions that you have accumulated in previous past years. All kinds of things make up the you man, the I, the person, the personality.

Most people go through life never going beyond that identity that is based on human conditioning of the mind and the emotions. Me and my story. When people say my life, they talk about my life.

They say, what do they refer to? They refer to, ultimately, a narrative that you remind yourself of and tell yourself. All the things that make up the I.

Do you want to hear my story? I would love to tell you my story. Please listen.

And then you will confirm that my life is very, very hard. And it's been very problematic. I've certainly suffered more than you.

That's the narrative. What people say, talk about my life, the I refers to my life. It's a narrative of me.

Okay, everybody has one. The narrative of me, this mind-made identity, is never happy for very long. It is in a state of neediness and always there's some insufficiency hiding there.

There's something missing. That's an interesting way of putting it. If you're exclusively trapped in that level of existence, there is this nagging feeling that there's always something, with rare exceptions, except you have a great meal, or you've just drank some alcohol, but we'll come to that later.

But there's a residual sense of you haven't quite arrived yet, or it hasn't happened yet. Something big that was supposed to happen hasn't happened yet, or there's something missing. I'm not in the right place.

I'm not with the right person. I thought I was when I got married, but now I'm not so sure. And then, now most people these days meet online, so then you finally establish a relationship, and you fall in love, suddenly you feel fulfilled, and then you start living together.

And the I that was saying, now I have found the person that's going to complete me totally and fulfill me, and you are him or her. You are my love. I need you.

Don't you dare leave me. And then when you start living together, a moment comes, sooner or later, and usually sooner, when something happens in the other, this wonderful, magnificent, faultless being that you married, suddenly changes, if only for a few minutes, and a little monster comes through, and then suddenly doubt arises, and then you go to the bathroom, and while you sit on the throne, you get out your phone, because nobody goes to the throne anymore without their phone, and you suddenly remember that the Tinder app is still on there, and you start, maybe I could do better than this. And again, the sense of something not quite right, very quickly, comes back.

Oh dear. And it's, it's always there, except in moments of brief fulfillment, when you just achieved something that you were longing for. You passed the exam, you got the promotion, you win the lottery.

There's a moment of, ah, I got it now, I got it. And it doesn't last very long, you might have noticed. A few days, if you're lucky.

And again, the old residue, this, the old, the unease comes back, something's still missing. People say, sometimes say they're unhappy with themselves, and other people are predominantly unhappy with other people. You know, you might have noticed that one of the most frequent ways in which you encounter suffering in this life is through other people.

Of course, there are other causes of suffering too, it could be your body and so on, but other people are really something. And that's why the French philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre realized that at some point he had a big ego, and he wrote in one of his books, Hell is Other People. So there's an, this unsatisfactoriness that people have to live with.

Brief moments of relief, yes, I just mentioned an achievement for a moment, yes, falling in love, fall in love, then you fall out of love. And then other brief moments of liberation from this undercurrent of dissatisfaction or neediness, non-completion, whatever it is, brief moments of relief come sometimes, if you're lucky, you get them, if you go out into nature, and you walk, and if you're really able to be present and take in with all your senses what the sky, the light, the trees, whatever they may be, the ocean, whatever, wherever you are, the grasses, the smells of, you're in nature, surrounded by nature. If you can really be there, and not many people who go into nature are actually there, they're still so trapped in their mind that they're not really there, but if you can be really there for a while, then you experience temporary self-transcendence. Temporary self-transcendence through that.

For a moment, the self, which is you, your personal history, your story, what you identify with as you, the personality, the troublemaker, subsides. And there is a consciousness there, but the I, this habitual I, subsides. And so this is what I mean by self-transcendence.

This is what humanity needs, is. The next step in the evolution of humanity is self-transcendence, which is going beyond egoic consciousness, and that's why we're here. Our gathering here, we are here to either deepen the self-transcendence that has already begun to arise in you, or to even give you a glimpse of what self-transcendence is as an actual experience in this moment, not just something you think about.

Self-transcendence, you let go of the I, you're out in nature, and you go, wow, wow. Wow is an interesting, I don't know if it's a word or just a sound when you say, wow, wow. Wow means your mind has briefly stopped, and there's a sense of wonder and awe.

By the way, Socrates, the great philosopher, said, all philosophy starts in wonder. You wonder. You are at the miracle of existence.

Temporarily, you are free of the burden of yourself. You're surrounded by the sense of nature, the sounds, the sights of nature. Oh, it's beautiful.

So nature can offer that to you. It can temporarily free you from yourself if you are really fully there, but you have to be there with all your senses. That's wonderful.

So other moments of self-transcendence can be very, very short. You look into the eyes of a baby, one year old. There was one baby on the plane in the aisle opposite.

This baby must have been maybe just a few months old, maybe four months, five months. If you look into the eyes of a baby for a moment, you may be able to experience self-transcendence because when you look into the eyes of the baby, the conceptual mind has not begun to form yet. The conceptual mind is still undeveloped.

So they are not burdened by any ego or any concepts. So what looks at you is just pure consciousness looking through the eyes of the baby at you. And often you see humans respond often by saying, wow, what a beautiful baby.

But in the moment when you say, wow, for a few seconds, you again, you are free of yourself. When you don't want anything from the baby, you're just happy experiencing being with this incredible creature. Wow, wow.

And so the wow means the mind has temporarily stopped, the thinking mind. And that's the key, the stopping of the thinking mind. The thinking mind itself is fine.

The problem is identification with the thinking mind, deriving your identity, your sense of who you are from the thinking mind and the story that the thinking mind tells you continuously. I often also suggest to you that animals, just to relate to an animal, if you don't want anything from the animal, just able to just contemplate the animal. Similar if you look into the eyes of a dog.

And some people, it's the only time when they can feel a little bit of joy when they look into the eyes of a dog. For a moment, self-transcendence has happened. And because the dog again has no concepts, it is not imposing any judgments on you.

It is not stimulating your thinking mind because the dog does not have a thinking mind. There's consciousness, but not conceptual consciousness. In other words, the dog has no opinion about you.

That's a relief. And the dog thinks you're wonderful. The famous prayer, of course, is, please God, make me into the person that my dog thinks I am.

Now, of course, the dog doesn't think, but the dog just responds. Some people are kept sane by their pet. Otherwise they would be totally absorbed in their egoic identity that is derived from the thinking mind.

So there are moments when they can relate to, oh, they're kept sane by their pets. It's amazing. There's a little book that I produced together with a cartoonist, and the title is Guardians of Being.

I call dogs and cats guardians of being. If you lose touch with being, because humans have lost touch with being, because they're only humans, then the dog is the guardian of being. So I've been speaking about the human level, the human you.

But you're not just human, you are also a human being. And being, in the way I use this term, the being of you is the transcendent, which the Buddha calls the non-self, and which in traditional Indian spirituality is called the Atman, the self, with a capital S, which is not the person. They seem to be talking about different things, but they're talking about the same thing.

They just use different concepts to point to it. So your life purpose is not fulfilled until or unless you realize the being dimension in you. It's not enough to be a human.

You have to become a human being. Now, of course, the being is already there underneath the person. Underneath the person, there is this vast consciousness.

The analogy I often use is of the ocean, and the surface of the ocean. The person as which you appear in this brief lifetime or few years, you are somebody, somebody. Interesting word.

You are somebody for a brief few years, and then suddenly you are nobody, because the body is gone. One day you're somebody, and the next day you are nobody. The strange thing is they still refer to you when you're dead.

They refer to your body as there he is. So the body is part of the human, of course. Now, the amazing thing is, when you really look into yourself, then you realize that the part of you that is visible to the senses, which is the physical body, is the relatively minor part of who you are.

The moment you move to thoughts, what nobody knows, scientists don't really know, what a thought is. What is a thought? Where does it live in you?

Where does it live in you? Mainstream science is still largely totally materialistic, which means it says that matter is all that exists, and everything is matter. And it says that consciousness is a byproduct, or they say epiphenomenon, other words a byproduct, of the human brain in some way.

This is a long, one could talk about this for a long time. I don't want to go this way and entertain you in that direction. I want this to be an experiential gathering rather than intellectual gathering.

But ask yourself the question, what is a thought? Where does it live? All your memories.

I suggest, for example, the memory of your deceased grandmother, or the memory of you when you were a child. When you were a child, you lived in a particular place, maybe you had your own room, and you can suddenly recollect many details of the room that you had when you were a child, even how the doorknob felt when you opened the door, the carpet, the furniture. And you can remember your grandmother or your first teacher when you first started school, the teacher you had then.

And you can remember, okay, now you haven't perhaps thought of your first great teacher in several years, but now that I mention it, suddenly the he or she pops up. Where and in what form did this first teacher of yours, or your grandmother, or the memory of the room that you lived in when you were six years old, and of course there are hundreds of thousands of memories like that, but where did this live in you? In what form?

Was it molecules and atoms in your brain that somehow certain atoms represent your grandmother, and other things represent other molecules, represent other things? The weird thing is, if a surgeon opens up your brain, he will not find any of your memories. He will not find you.

That's a strange thing. He cannot find things, but not you. Because you do not exist on a physical level ultimately, only as a physical body, but the depth of you as who you are, even who you are as a person, which is still limited, you don't exist in the physical realm really.

I don't know where you exist, perhaps in the cloud. The cloud that you... and then you download the memory from the cloud.

So every thought is invisible, but it can, of course, it uses the brain in order to express itself. Emotion too, the emotion itself is not visible, but it can manifest, of course, with physical symptoms in the body, but in itself it's an energy field, a non-physical energy field. So the entire structure of the psychic structure of you is essentially invisible.

This is why in the famous little book, The Little Prince, I think it was, famous classic, it says, what is essential is invisible to the eye. That means all the other senses too. What is essential is not visible to the senses.

So you are essentially invisible. The way I see it, is thought does not even exist in this dimension. That's all.

You are multi-dimensional. You exist as a thought-made entity. It's associated with a physical realm, but it is not confined to the physical realm.

Your thoughts are invisible. Your whole sense of who you are is invisible. Nobody could find it by looking for you in the physical realm.

You're not there. And that's, it's an amazing realization that who you essentially are is, you're invisible. All the thoughts that go through your head, they are not visible to the senses.

Interesting. And that's only the surface part of you, even there.

Eckhart Tolle Sensing Presence in Another [99916929-40e6-490f-b8f2-b9b8d6a48083]

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:29)

Sensing presence in another. In this episode, Eckhart answers questions on a variety of topics. What is the soul?

Is it possible to awaken when we are depressed? And how do we sense presence in another? Eckhart says we experience the presence of others when we release our conceptual thinking about them.

He says when we let all that go, a space opens up and we are free then to experience what is sacred in others and in ourselves.

[Speaker 5] (0:31 - 0:46)

Hi. Hi. So my question is whether there's an exercise or a practice that can help us sense the presence in a tree or another person or really in anything.

[Speaker 1] (0:47 - 11:17)

Right. Thank you. Well, it's not so much a practice or an exercise, but it's a way of being with, let's say, something natural, a flower, a tree.

People are more difficult. It's easier very often to be present with something natural than a human, especially initially as you become familiar with this state of consciousness. The secret is to, first of all, give yourself some time just to be with it, to be.

The secret is giving it attention, which means mostly you look at it. You look at it and you give yourself time to just be with it. You look at it.

You could be outside the tree. It could be a potted plant or even just one flower. But trees are wonderful, wonderful things, wonderful beings.

So you look at a tree, give it attention, give it attention. Look most at the details of the tree, like leaves or little branches, and then look at the totality of the tree. Give it attention so that you don't think about it.

The secret is not thinking about it. Then even the notion of tree goes away because if you don't have the concept of tree in your mind, then who knows what it is you're looking at. The concept of tree limits it because when you have the concept of tree or the name of the tree, that limits it because then you think you know what it is.

But the amazing thing is you don't know what it is. Just because you call it something, you still don't know what it is. It's a mystery.

But you lose awareness of the fact that this is a deep mystery. The moment you name it and you completely believe that's what it is, now I know. You don't know.

You just attach a concept or mental sound to it. Well, this happens. I know what this is called.

It's the Norfolk Island Pine from the Norfolk Island in the South Pacific. That's where it was first seen by a European, but as you other humans saw it before, he called it Norfolk Island Pine. But then you have to forget that this is not a Norfolk Island Pine.

Forget about it. It's not a tree. Don't impose any concept on it.

Just look at it silently. Both the details and the totality. Sometimes you switch to the totality of it.

And then occasionally you look at the little details. And then again the totality of it. And then you remain with the totality of it.

And then as you continue to be alert and still and look at it, there's not only the tree, there's also be aware of yourself as the consciousness in which the tree is being perceived. You can sense the presence, your own presence. You sense it.

So there's the tree and there's you as the perceiving consciousness. And then there is a realization that there's also a presence in the tree, but you can only sense it through your presence, the presence that is in you. There's a shared presence.

And you know that tree beyond conceptualization. You know it non-conceptually. You know it's being non-conceptually, but only because you've gone to that dimension within yourself.

And from there, you can know the tree. Conceptually, you don't know anything. But non-conceptually, you can sense its being or its presence.

In the past times, humans had that naturally because the thinking mind were not quite as developed yet. And they were not yet completely, totally in the grip of their thinking mind. There were still spaces left.

So humans in some parts of the world, they may still have it. Humans had the ability to perceive the sacredness of nature because that's what it is. They did not dismiss it through conceptualization.

They knew there was something mysterious there. Mysterious means you don't really don't know there's something, there's a depth to it. There's more to it than meets the eye.

That's really what it is. Just as there's more to you than meets the eye, infinitely more.

And so, you can sense the beingness of the tree.

And then the tree, if you have a tree nearby, or in your backyard, or somewhere nearby, you can choose one tree and go back to it occasionally and commune with it in that way. You don't have to become a tree hugger. I mean, it's nice to hug a tree, but people make fun of tree huggers.

You can hug a tree, but you don't have to. That's not an essential part of it. But the same can be with the pebble.

With a human, you have to penetrate through the mental stuff. The personality can be in the way before you can go deep enough and sense the depths of another human, especially a human that you've known for a long time. So, give it attention.

Be with it. And it always teaches you stillness. Everything in nature, except perhaps a noisy monkey or something.

This is why in Buddhism, or in Zen Buddhism, they use the expression, the monkey mind. Because there are some species of monkeys that make a lot of noise. And Zen Buddhists, I believe, referring to the human mind, they call it the monkey mind, because it never stops talking and making noise.

But a lot of nature is very still. The trees are wonderfully still. The trees can teach you stillness.

You just tune in, give it attention. The tree can teach you how to be rooted in being. Wow.

The tree is not in a state of anxiety. It's not in a hurry to grow. It just is rooted, not just rooted in the earth physically, but it's rooted in being.

So in nature can teach you stillness, which is wonderful. Flowers can teach you stillness, but you have to give it attention. Let go of concepts.

And then we regain something that we lost, that is sensing the sacredness of nature. That's really what is needed if you really want to change our relationship with the environment and with nature. Yes, we can logically.

We realize that we cannot go on destroying nature and using it as a commodity and so on. But the important part is to regain our sense of sacredness of nature. And the strange thing is, it's not just regaining.

When you regain something that you lost, you regain it at a deeper level. So a human who's becoming conscious and then communes with nature, in a way, yes, thousands of years ago, humans were also able to do that. But there's an added element when somebody has gone through the whole egoic phase and come out the other end, and then awakened there.

There is a yes, regaining, but with an added dimension of added consciousness. Before it was a natural state, it was natural to regard nature as sacred, to have this reverence for nature. That was a natural state.

They didn't know anything, any other that was known. But now we've gone, we lost it. Now there is a possibility of regaining it.

And that's always an added dimension. That's the evolutionary development. And even when you look out of the window, wherever you are, there may be some nature there.

Even if it's just the sky. The sky is also a wonderful thing to contemplate. Give it attention.

Don't think about it. Don't call it anything. Just give it attention.

Like innocent perception. Ah, wow. And the sky, of course, is a great analogy for the consciousness, the vast spaciousness of the sky.

Heaven, sky. So the secret is in, be with it, let go of any concepts, realize that you don't know what it is. Realize whenever you attach a label to something, it gives you the illusion that you know, but you don't.

Be comfortable with a state of not knowing what this tree is. And then you know it at a deeper level. So let's see if there's another question.

[Speaker 3] (11:18 - 11:19)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (11:19 - 11:20)

Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (11:21 - 12:11)

Eckhart, thank you for your teachings, your wisdom, and your wonderful sense of humor. My question is around the concept of soul. You have in your teachings this wonderful way of illuminating the deeper meaning behind many different philosophies and signposts.

And that's really helped me to make a more meaningful connection that supports my process of awakening, even though that's intellectual when it's like, oh, it clicked. But depending on how it's being referenced, soul seems to have both individual and universal qualities, depending on the cultural reference or the religious reference. And I'd really welcome your thoughts on what is soul?

How does that relate to consciousness?

[Speaker 1] (12:12 - 22:19)

Thank you. Thank you. Great.

Wonderful. Now, to some extent, of course, when we talk about words, it's semantics means the meaning of words. So how do we choose to use a word?

Often, people use the same word and mean different things. Sometimes when, for example, when I use the word ego, people sometimes misunderstand because what they mean by ego is very different from what I mean by ego. So often I have to explain, this is what I mean when I use the word ego.

So what do we mean when you use the word soul? But in the first instance, one could say it is the invisible part of you. It is the hidden 90% of the iceberg, so to speak, that which is not physical, the invisible you that obviously is who you are.

The most important thing probably is to understand that you don't have a soul. It would be truer to say that you are a soul. You are a soul.

Now, what that means is, in essence, you are an invisible being. Now, if you move from the physicality where I can see you, you move one step down to your thoughts. Already there in the realm of thoughts, which is not the deepest realm, which is still the realm of form, but they're non-physical forms.

Already there, there is invisibility because you cannot physically, even with the strongest microscope or analytical scientific analysis, whatever, you cannot actually find a thought. You can have certain correlations in the physical realm that may correlate to certain thoughts in the neurons of the brain, but what are the thoughts themselves? You cannot find them.

You have millions of memories, probably, they're all invisible, and no scientist would ever be able to identify, no matter what instrument they use, even if they can't open your brain, would not be able to identify that invisible realm of thought that's just beneath the surface. It's still form, yes, but it's invisible. And all that is, where does that actually, what does it actually mean?

I sometimes give examples to make, illustrations can sometimes help people to actually see and feel what I'm saying more clearly. Think of any memory, any of your thousands and hundreds of thousands of memories, you can just ask a question like, do you remember your grandmother when you were such and such an age? And at that moment, you can retrieve the memory and there's suddenly, there's your grandmother.

Do you remember when you were 10 years old in where you lived? What did it, the front door, what did it feel like to open the front door, the handle? What did the kitchen look like?

Or your room? You can go there. Now, where was all that?

Where did that live? All those memories? Where is, are there atoms in your brain that represent the kitchen that when you were six years old, where you lived, are there atoms or molecules or subatomic particles in your brain that stand for your grandmother that you knew when you were 10 years old?

Where does all that live? It doesn't live in the physical realm, but no one could find it. Although there is a correlation, of course, between the brain and consciousness, in the same way that there's a correlation between the radio and the music the radio plays.

So, this is the realm, the invisible realm of we are begins already there. Then you go into the emotional, emotional realm, where do emotions live? What are they exactly?

Even that we don't know that because they're also, yes, there is a physical counterpart, there's correlation in the body, and what you feel in the body are connected, obviously, and even thoughts and the body are connected. You can think a thought can create changes in your physical body, but the thought itself is not physical. Imagine biting into a lemon, you cut open a lemon, and now you're biting into the lemon, and you're tasting it.

So, if you imagine it, you can feel saliva responding, accumulating in your mouth. Although nothing has happened, thought has created a reaction in the body. And then you move further into invisibility, then you go into all the subconscious, all the memories, and the subconscious, or we don't know where that lives.

Now, to some people, the soul is the person that people are in this lifetime, the invisible part of that person that goes from lifetime to lifetime. But that's a very limited view of who you are, that obviously, for some people that they call that the soul, and then they say, okay, when I die, I'm going to meet my grandmother again, maybe, who knows, maybe you will. But will your grandmother eternally remain your grandmother in some other realm?

Is she not going to evolve into something else? Are you going to spend the rest of your life after death in a family reunion? Because people say when they die, they meet family members, and then what?

Okay, then you go on, and you're with your family, maybe you don't even like them, I don't know. So, you spend eternity with your family members, and nobody ever evolves any further. This can't be right.

So, the personalities, they may, this part of what some people call soul is the personality with all its memories and so on, but then there's nothing deeper. And they believe that remains intact. Either it remains in the realm where the deceased people go, which some people call heaven, or whatever it is, or some call it the astral dimension.

Either it was there intact, and then it remains intact until, who knows. But that can't be right, because then there will be no further. And you just imagine the very limited personalities that then you'd be stuck with an extremely limited personality for the rest of your existence in some other realm, dreadful.

So, the continuation of just this person in some invisible form, which some people believe is the soul, that can't be right. But if you go deeper, and realize that you are not actually an entirely autonomous entity that lives here as itself. You are an aspect of the totality, and you are connected to the totality.

And if you go deep enough beyond the conditioned entity into presence itself, the unconditioned consciousness, there you and that transcendent dimension merge into one. You're only an emanation of that. You don't actually exist as an independent entity there.

You are eternally an emanation, eternally connected to source. You are an emanation of source, of like the sunlight is an emanation of the sun. You are an emanation of God, actually, to use that word, eternally.

And that is a deeper meaning of soul, is to realize that in essence, you are a transcendent being that does not have a life of its own. There's no such thing a life of its own. You're an expression of the one consciousness, the one life, and you're eternally connected to that.

So, there's not ultimately, there's only the one soul of the universe, the one being, and you are a strand or whatever you want to call it in that, the one soul, you are a strand in that, or is a cell in, to use an analogy from the physical realm, you're a cell in that universal being, and always in one, an essential cell of that. So, soul is deeper than common assumptions of people. They're very, they actually are very limited.

So, and again, these are not the very ultimate explanations, but they're approximations just to watch the truth of who you are. Thanks.

[Speaker 2] (22:21 - 24:25)

Hi, Edgar. Nice to be here with you. Thank you for taking my question.

I have a history with suicidal depression from a very young age. I am 32, and this began in my early teens. I have been to therapy, taken antidepressants, and even worked through the 12 steps of recovery.

I no longer take drugs, medicinal or recreational, and I have made great advances in my spiritual journey. I have a sense of deep I, and I make it a daily practice to connect and live from deep I. I still have work to do to dissolve pain bodies, but I can honestly say that I'm not afraid to die.

I often think to myself, I won't go looking for my own death, but if the universe decides that it's my, that my time has come, I will be at peace with it. I am at peace with it. Is it possible to be friendly with death, even though I have a suicidal past, or is this just another form of suicidal ideation that I need to be aware of?

And I want to add that as I read it out loud, I know that it is possible to be friendly with death, but I'm at a point where I have a lot of purpose in my life, and everything I do from parenting to entrepreneurship comes from deep I. So I feel like I'm living a purpose, but once that's over, like, it's kind of like, it's over. So that's kind of where I'm coming from.

Like, is that healthy to have, or is that something that I need to be aware of? Thank you.

Thank you. Thank you. Well, it's very good to have acute self observation as you have, because it's very easy to fool oneself.

But in this case, I don't think you're fooling yourself. As you say, it could be to say that I'm not afraid of death could be a hidden form of actually longing for death, which you don't, but to be actually to become no longer afraid of death and say, if or when it comes, I'll be fine with it. That is a, it seems to be the case with you.

That is a clear sign of spiritual deepening, where you have realized that the essence of who you are is beyond death. And you're not afraid to die, which I'm not either. Although I'm not inviting deaths necessarily.

But this is one of the most important parts on the spiritual path is to first of all, to become aware acutely of death, of mortality, to face death, and be aware that you are going to die. You already have faced death because there was a time in your life, as you say, when you felt you were drawn to suicide. I had the same in my early life.

Suicide was always a very often a great temptation. Even as a child, when I was 10 years old, I remember often thinking about it. And I remember things like, we lived in a four-story house in one apartment on the ground floor.

And one day, they built scaffolding to paint the house. And you could climb up as you wanted. There were ladders going up the scaffolding to the top floor.

And I thought, I was very, very happy. I said, well, while this scaffolding is here, if I have to, I can climb up and jump down and I can commit suicide. That would be my way out.

So lucky that as long as the scaffolding is here, there's no problem. I can kill myself anytime I want to. That was quite a relief.

And that was childhood. So perhaps it's for some people, it can be a good thing to have gone through that and have transcended that. And to become free of the fear of death is a clear sign of spiritual deepening and awakening.

And ultimately, that becomes the end of all kinds of fear. Because the primordial fear for most humans is a fear of death. And many other kinds of fear are subsidiary fears.

And they also tend to drop away. And as fear drops away, also other negative emotions that are associated with fear, like anger. Anger often is underneath the fear.

People who get angry easily are actually, the anger is hiding the fear that's underneath it. So to go beyond fear is the primordial fear is the fear of death is a very important milestone in one's spiritual evolution. One of the great shortcomings of our civilization is that it's the denial of death.

Death is something that absolutely is regarded as a virtually taboo subject. And it leads to overreactions in many situations. Even now that humans are being challenged by the COVID virus, the fear of death can easily lead and has in many cases lead to diminishment of the ability to think rationally.

Because once fear invades your mind, your ability to make rational decisions diminishes. So it fears kind of a toxic emotion that once it invades your mind, you cannot think clearly anymore, no matter how intelligent you are. Once it invades your mind, you cannot think clearly.

It's like a virus. Fear itself is a more dangerous virus than the actual physical virus that we are facing. So and the ultimate fear is the fear of death.

And many people get very angry with other people for various reasons, in our situation with COVID, for example, because they are in a state of great fear. And then when somebody comes across somebody who is not doing what you think we should be doing, or is doing something that you think we should not be doing, get angry, they get very upset, very angry. Why?

Because they're very fearful. Why are they fearful? Because we don't know what to do with death.

We don't, we haven't, we've never faced it. In ancient cultures, when human beings reach adolescence, they often had to go through initiation rituals, sometimes very dangerous ones. And some of them died.

We had to face a dangerous situation like going out into the wilderness or face dangerous animals, or going into a cave and being left alone, or even being injured physically. Nowadays, you would think this is horrible, horrible. How can they do things like that?

But there was a certain wisdom there, a natural wisdom, that if you don't face death at some point in your life, you can never go beyond the fear of death. And you will never deepen as a human being. So these initiation rituals, they mark the passage from childhood to adulthood.

The adolescents had to face, came face to face with death, the possibility of death. And that brings about a deepening. And then once you immerse from the ritual, you were an adult.

You were not enlightened, but you had faced death and there was a deepening that happened in you. So you've, you came also face to face with the death, with the possibility of death. You were even looked at death as I did, as a possible way out, a possible solution.

And then went beyond that, and it brought about a deepening. But now to be in a state where you don't fear death is a clear sign that you've come a long way. And deepening has happened.

And I don't believe it is a disguised form of wishing for death. It is not from what I can tell by listening to you. It is a genuine, it is the genuine thing.

You have gone beyond the fear of death because the deepening has happened. So that's, I'd like to tell you that to reassure you. And I'm glad you asked the question, but it's good to be very observant because as I said at the beginning of the answer, it's sometimes easy to fool oneself.

So I'm glad that you are alert enough and looked into yourself to ask that question.

[Speaker 2] (32:35 - 33:48)

I appreciate that. Thank you. I want to just say that the looking in seems a bit crazy making sometimes.

You know, like when you were saying that a lot of the fear is afraid of dying, I can say that as you were saying that, it kind of clicked as to the way I live my life with my son and the way I am in business and relating to people. There is no fear. There's a ton of uncertainty all around me, but I'm just confident in what I'm doing.

And sometimes that same confidence seems crazy making it's like, am I crazy or am I just that comfortable taking this step? So I appreciate what you say that, you know, a lot of it is a fear of death because then it makes sense that that confidence is coming from a place of abundance, wholeness, stillness, not false ideations.

[Speaker 1] (33:48 - 38:11)

Yes, exactly. Yes. Yeah.

Occasionally the mind may come in and can question anything mentally. You can sometimes question yourself. Well, is that the real thing?

Am I really at peace? This is what the mind does. So you don't need to necessarily give it too much attention because the mind likes to doubt things and so on.

So that's just fine. But I believe you've already, you know, you're rooted in something deeper than that. You're rooted in the being and the rest of your life, of course, challenges will continue to come.

And once you reach a certain point, a challenge instead of making you more unconscious will make you more conscious. And so that's universally true. Any challenge that you meet, either as an individual or as society meeting a collective challenge, either it makes you more unconscious, or it makes you more conscious.

This is just a goes beyond my answer to your question, just a general remark. The COVID situation has had this effect on many humans, millions of humans. It has made many, many people more unconscious than they were before.

And it has made others a smaller number, but others more conscious than they were before. And this is the case with any challenge that you meet, whether it's personal or collective challenge, it'll either push you push you down or pull you up. Many people say they're more aware now they've grown in stillness and awareness.

Many others, because of so much fear, and fear is associated with unconsciousness. So it has triggered so much fear in millions of humans, that this fear has become quite toxic, and has invaded many human's minds. And you can see how even the media, they all they love, not just to present the facts, they love the fear.

They themselves are in the grip of the fear. Most of you have probably become more conscious to this collective challenge. Now, what about all those people who have become less conscious, even becoming irrational, attacking others because they're angry with other people and so on?

Well, their past just takes a little longer. Because this means you suffer, you're suffering, you begin to suffer more. And suffering is also a great awakener, eventually just takes a bit more time.

So as you suffer more, and you create suffering unconsciously. And eventually suffering, suffering reaches a certain point, where awakening becomes a possibility. And that's the past for many humans.

For many of you who are here with us, suffering as a teacher has fulfilled its function, or it's close to fulfilling its function. That's a decisive milestone of transition from needing suffering, because otherwise you wouldn't evolve, to no longer needing suffering and continue with your evolution, without needing the teacher of suffering. Once you go beyond that threshold, evolution also speeds up, you grow deeper more quickly.

Suffering is a long drawn out process, it takes time, it goes on and on. So that's, that's, I believe, is the case for many of you. Either you don't need it anymore, you've already reached that point, or you're close to it.

And it's just a little bit more. Thank you. Thank you, everybody for being here.

Let's have a moment of stillness.

Eckhart Tolle Spiritual Awakening Is A Realization Not An Achievement [d1cec235-9d6e-4cb7-9e5b-2a3133776af0]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:38)

Spiritual awakening is a realization, not an achievement. In this episode, Eckhart addresses concerns about using conscious manifestation for both practical as well as spiritual purposes. Eckhart cautions listeners that awakening should not be something we put on our to-do list.

He says it's not another goal that we attain. He believes when we define enlightenment in those terms, it becomes an obstacle. Eckhart says awakening is not an achievement.

It's a realization, which really means it's already here.

[Speaker 1] (0:40 - 4:22)

Thank you and welcome everybody. Become aware of the present moment. Become aware of the present moment, not only the manifested form of the present moment, but also the unmanifested essence of the present moment.

Those are the two dimensions. The manifested, what you can see and hear and so on, sense perception, thoughts, emotions, and underlying that, the present moment itself, which is the unmanifested essence. And that unmanifested that we call here the present moment is actually timeless and is inseparable from who you are.

So at the deepest level, one could say that you are the present moment. And what that means, of course, is that you are the consciousness, the timeless space or consciousness within which all manifestations of life unfold. It gives rise to all manifestations.

So when we manifest, the manifestations arise out of the unmanifested. It's important not to lose touch with the unmanifested, which is the stillness, the conscious awareness or presence. Because if you don't, if you're not rooted in that, you're lost in the world of manifestation.

And then no, nothing that you manifest can free you or make you happy or liberate you or tell you who you are. So that's always important to bear in mind when we talk about manifesting. The Buddha actually said, I'm not able to quote it verbatim, but it's a famous sutra.

The Buddha said, there is the unborn, the uncreated, the unmanifested. If there were not the unborn, the uncreated, and the unmanifested, there would be no escape from the born, the created, and the manifested. In other words, you would be lost completely in the world.

Wonderful sutra saying of the Buddha. I'm sure more or less literally, he said that. So something to remember.

[Speaker 3] (4:27 - 4:35)

Hello. Thank you for having me. It's an honor, Eckhart, you have shined such a light on my path.

Thank you so much.

[Speaker 1] (4:36 - 4:38)

Thank you. Thank you very much.

[Speaker 3] (4:39 - 5:23)

So my question is, if I'm honest, what I really want to manifest is of a spiritual nature. And I find this is the same for many on this path. But these spiritual intentions are not so easy to simulate in terms of feeling like we have already received or to visualize.

Can you address how manifestation can be applied to spiritual yearnings? Or is manifestation only to be applied to practical purposes while we work on our spiritual practice?

[Speaker 1] (5:24 - 32:51)

Thank you. Thank you. Good question.

One important thing to be aware of is that you don't make the mistake of regarding spiritual realization, or being enlightened or being egoless or being in permanent conscious connectedness with source, whatever you want to call it, not to regard that as a state to be achieved. It's very easy to fall into that error of wanting to become fully awakened, for example. And then you might say, this is part of the question.

Is there something I can do perhaps to manifest this awakened version of myself? So if you have this intention, or this image in your mind, you want to arrive at a fully awakened state, whatever else you want to call it, that will become a great obstacle. Because spiritual awakening, or the egoless state, or whatever it is, cannot be achieved in the future, you would be creating an image that you then pursue, wanting to reach or achieve.

And you won't achieve it, as long as you have an image of yourself that you want to achieve. You're striving towards that. In other words, you make it into a goal, like everything else, the things that you want to achieve in this world.

But the one thing that you will not achieve by making it into a goal is this state of awakening or being fully yourself is another way of putting it being, realizing the essence of who you are. So you will be striving away from the only place where it is accessible to you. And that's in the vertical dimension of the present moment.

So for everything else, manifestation practices can be helpful, but not for realizing who you are. Because there's no, you don't achieve anything. You don't attain anything by spiritual awakening.

That it's not an achievement, it's not an attainment, it's a realization. That means it's already here. So if you look to the future for it, you miss the fact that it's already here.

And you don't realize that that's the place where you haven't been looking. Because there is, you're looking to the future. And this is why I'm saying it becomes a great obstacle.

If you look to the future for enlightenment, fulfillment, whatever it may be, that becomes the obstacle and you won't find it and you will be striving. Even you might be engaged in arduous spiritual practices, very determined to awaken, but you have in your mind a future goal that you want to achieve without, you might not call it that, but underlying it, underlying your practice is this assumption of arriving at a future goal. And that is the greatest obstacle to that realization.

Because what is future? Future is basically inseparable from thought. Because the future exists only in your mind as a thought form.

I'd be very happy to listen to anybody who wants to prove me wrong. Because then he would probably would come to me and say, here's a future. I have discovered it.

So far, nobody has come to me and said, here's a future, you are wrong. The future is more than just a thought form. And I don't think anybody will come.

And now that means if you're looking to the future, you have a thought form that you are pursuing of yourself as the fully awakened one or whatever term you use. So you're pursuing a thought form in the future, which the inseparable future in thought. And then you reach the end of this incarnation and you become frustrated because you haven't found it.

Why not? Because the thought form or the future, the future self prevented you from discovering what's already here, discovering who or what you already are. So it's a reversal of normal practice is yes, you need time for everything in this world in order to do this.

Any action unfolds in time. For anything you pursue, you want to acquire something, achieve something, become good at something. All these things require time.

Yes. But the one thing that does not only not require time, but the one thing to which time is the obstacle is that self-realization. For everything else, you need time and that's fine.

But to find yourself, you don't need time. That is an amazing realization. The Buddha also had to learn that he didn't know that when he started off.

When the Buddha started off, he realized the unsatisfactory nature of normal human existence. He saw there's so much suffering, you die. So he saw the unsatisfactory nature and said, there must be a transcendent dimension, there must be something beyond.

So for many years, he practiced seeking to find enlightenment, transcendence. And he practiced the most arduous disciplines with great teachers. He almost killed himself with the spiritual practice.

And after several years of spiritual practice, he still wasn't any further to his goal of enlightenment. And then he said, well, I've had enough of that. That, by the way, is not a literal quote from the scriptures.

This is my free translation. He said, I've had enough. And he stopped his spiritual practice and he sat under a tree.

And then that was the big moment. He sat under a tree. And suddenly, the realization happened, enlightenment.

What does that mean? All doing came to a stop, he realized through the doing, you cannot achieve being. Being needs to be discovered, but not achieved.

So no matter what he did, he didn't achieve it, because you cannot achieve it. You cannot achieve enlightenment. You can discover it.

It's already here. And when he sat under the tree, all doing came to a stop, all future came to a halt, there was no more future. All seeking stopped, seeking for an enlightened version of myself, basically.

That stopped. And then it happened, the realization came to him. And that was the moment of enlightenment.

So there's a deep lesson in that. Now, of course, some people say that the Buddha's search through spiritual practice was unnecessary. You could say that.

If he had realized before he started his arduous spiritual practice, if he had realized that that was unnecessary, and not only unnecessary, that it was ultimately misleading, then he could have sat under the tree immediately. Okay, that's an interesting perspective on it. But one could also say that he needed to go through that in order to realize the futility of it, and then give up.

The surrender only happened as a result of being frustrated with spiritual practice. So who knows whether one could say it wasn't necessary at all, or he had to go through it. I have a way of putting this.

And that is, the question is my answer to the question, do you need time for spiritual realization? Do you need time to wake up spiritually? And my answer is, you need time until you realize that you don't need time.

So you come to a point of the vertical dimension suddenly opens up. So one cannot really start. Some spiritual teachers do that.

They tell people, there's nothing you can do. There's nothing you need to do about waking up. You either wake up or not, or discover who you are.

Very often it's not very helpful. And so I think the doing, it's helpful to do, to want to achieve this or that. Every human being needs to arrive at a point where the doing is realized as ultimately not leading to the ultimate goal or realization.

But you may have to become frustrated several times, quite a few times before you realize that no amount of doing will ultimately lead to the realization of who you are. In fact, the doing is the obstacle. But sometimes you need to go through that state of doing to fully realize that.

So to pursue a state that you want to achieve is not to be encouraged, but to realize that there's nothing to achieve. And who you are in your essence is already complete, full, perfect. In your essence, there's nothing that you could add to who you are.

You're already one with God, to use that term, one with source, the source of all life. You're already one with that. On the level of manifestation, there are many things where you could improve your life as this manifested being that you are temporarily.

You can learn new things, explore new things, achieve, get, obtain. And then of course, it leaves you again. Nothing stays with you in the world of manifestation.

It comes and then it goes. So there's nothing wrong with doing and achieving and obtaining, but for realization, it's not helpful. It's a hindrance.

So we come to the point of where doing and being are reconciled in yourself. To reconcile in yourself the dimension of being with the dimension of doing. And that is the ultimate art of living, we could call it, that we need to learn or master, is a reconciliation of these two dimensions in yourself.

If you let go of all doing, then an important dimension is missing in your life. It has happened to some people, some people who have had sudden realization. So they just lost all interest in doing anything.

To some extent, it happened to me too. For a few years, I lost interest in doing. And then I realized I'm still here and the universe requires me to do certain things.

It requires me to do certain things. I could feel it and there was a pull. And finally, I had to do.

Now, the last part of my answer perhaps is, is there anything, any kind of affirmation could possibly be helpful in realizing this essence of who you are? Could there be any affirmation that could be used as a pointer into the vertical dimension? And yes, you could use certain affirmations.

They don't express the truth, but they can be a pointer. For example, there was an Indian spiritual teacher, Nisargadatta Maharaj. He had a little store where he sold cigarettes.

Not karmically the most beneficial job, but that's what he did. And he went to a spiritual teacher and the spiritual teacher said to him, you are not a person, you are consciousness. Sorry, he wasn't highly educated, but he listened carefully.

And then for quite a long, don't remember for how long, several months or a year or two, often in his mind, the thought would come, I am consciousness. I am consciousness. And this little thing brought about his awakening.

Not the words, but the words were pointers. The important thing is what the words point to. So the words, I am consciousness, what comes after the words is the realization.

It's not in the words. So I am consciousness. And then you stop, the thought comes to an end.

And when this thought, I am consciousness comes to an end, the realization that I am consciousness is suddenly there. And in that sense, a verbal pointer can for a little while, if you don't overdo it, be useful. I am consciousness.

Or you could say, if you want to have a little bit of link with creativity, the infinite creative power of the universe is within me and one with me, because that is the unconditioned consciousness. The infinite creative power of the universe is in me and one with me. But then you have to stop the thought.

Don't carry on continuously. You can say it a few times, but the important thing is to stop the thought. Then the thought is used as a pointer, not as some kind of explanation to believe in.

There's no point in, I believe that the infinite creative power of the universe is within me and I'm one with it, doesn't help you, unless it becomes a deeper realization. The realization comes when the thought stops. You need to leave the pointer behind after you have used a pointer.

You go beyond the pointer and then comes a moment of just silence, but it's alive, stillness, alive, spacious stillness. And then there's the realization. And then you can sense it, the truth of the point, what the pointer said, you realize the truth of it and then you don't need it anymore.

So that's a little bit like one could say, spiritual practice can also have that function. You need to know all spiritual practice needs to take you to the end of the spiritual practice. It needs to take you to the end of thought.

And at the end of thought, you don't fall below thought, you rise above thought. At the end of thought, there's awareness. So that sense, the Buddha said he compared his teaching to a raft.

There's a river. How do you cross the river? You build a raft, the boat.

And this boat or this raft, you step in and it takes you to the other shore of the river. When you've reached the other shore of the river, you leave the raft or the boat behind. You don't need to carry the boat around with you after you've reached.

Now, in this teaching of the Buddha, the other shore, the other side of the river, of course, means the dimension of being the transcendent dimension, the realization of the essence of who you are. That's the other, the other. This shore is the manifested in this analogy or in this parable.

This shore is the world of the manifested. The other shore of the river is the world of the transcendent. So the raft is something that you may use, and then you leave it behind.

You don't carry a raft around with you. And so if you use certain pointers, yes, you can. It's best to find your own that are simple expressions of who you are, who or what you are in your essence.

So certain affirmations, simple affirmations, even, I just mentioned, I am consciousness, Nisargadatta used for a while. You could even drop consciousness. If you want the simplest affirmation that points to the vertical dimension, you just say, I am.

You don't even need to add consciousness. Might be even better. I am.

And after you've said I am, sense what that means. But you've left the words behind. I am.

Sense the deep meaning of those words. So in that sense, it can work if you use it for a limited time. And so you could say, it's a manifestation practice that you could use, very simple, to discover the unmanifested.

An unmanifestation practice. But you don't have to. Some people, for some people it's helpful.

To use pointers and others don't need to do that. Another simple one, of course, is there's only this moment, for example. There's only this moment.

This moment is all there is. The now. And then realize deeply what that means.

And that's beyond concepts. There's only now. It's when your mind is taking you to all kinds of unpleasant places.

You can always, you come back to there's only this moment. There's only this. That's a, and the now, of course, is the opening into the vertical dimension.

So you become aware of the present. Whenever suffering arises, you don't want to manifest suffering, but millions of people on a daily basis continuously manifest suffering. But you don't want to.

And so when you, the beginning of an awakening is the realization that you are manifesting suffering. Of course, that's already an awakening there, because if you're very unconscious, the blame for all your suffering is always elsewhere. It's never in your own mind.

When you're very unconscious, other people, the world situation, fate, God, destiny, your karma, your parents, the unjust system, whatever, all kinds of things, they're all to blame. They cause your suffering, and you haven't realized that you are manifesting, your mind ultimately is manifesting. And in fact, if you tell this to a person who is not ready to hear that, they will get very angry, very angry.

But that realization, your mind, the unconscious mind, manifests suffering. And when you discover that ultimately the suffering arises in your mind, because your mind reacts to things, your mind creates a narrative that makes you unhappy. Not the situation, but the narrative that your mind creates around the situation makes you unhappy.

When you discover that, that's the first stage of the awakening is, oh, and at that moment, that's an amazing discovery that virtually all your suffering is created by your mind. Amazing. And then you realize you don't want to manifest that anymore.

And then you want to manifest something else. But first, before you manifest something else, you need to stop manifesting suffering. And a good way is bringing your attention into the present moment.

What is my problem now? Nothing. What's wrong with this moment?

This moment is as it is. What's the problem? So bring your attention to now.

Whenever you feel unhappiness arising, look at your mind and bring attention to the present moment, which always means the externals of the present moment. That's a manifested dimension of the present moment. And then the essence of the now, which is consciousness, awareness, presence.

So that's how you stop manifesting suffering. And then you can, if you want to manifest other things from once you have the foundation, which is the being, then you begin to work on the two levels. So you reconcile the two, the being and the doing in your life.

And that's your purpose. And you will not always succeed, it's you fall back into, usually you fall back into losing yourself in doing, and then you suffer. And this unhappiness that arises, you can then use as a very helpful way of telling you, you've lost yourself, you've lost the present moment.

And once you know that, you can come back. Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Stopping The Madness [d2d053c6-348a-49e4-80be-f42f1f62d625]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:45)

Stopping the Madness. In this podcast, Eckhart explains that humanity is at a pivotal point. He says the most urgent task of our lives is to connect more deeply with the transcendent part of ourselves.

Eckhart explains the possibility is always there, just waiting to be discovered. He uses an ancient Greek term called metanoia, which means a profound spiritual awakening brought about by a dramatic shift in consciousness. In certain mystical traditions, it's called Buddha nature or Christ consciousness.

Eckhart says once we realize we're indeed the light of the world, we do not have to be a part of the craziness anymore. He says we can stop the madness by learning to dissolve it in ourselves first.

[Speaker 1] (0:47 - 28:54)

It's vital for humans, especially now we are moving into a critical time period for the totality of humanity, which is also an incredible opportunity for disidentifying from the unconsciousness that otherwise governs the world. So how do you do it? In a way you don't even do it.

It's just a cessation of, one could almost say the cessation of doing and the realization of being. And doing on a primordial level is thinking. Humans are thinking all the time except in dreamless sleep.

They're thinking and thinking and thinking and thinking and thinking. It's no cessation. And then life gets more and more difficult.

Then you watch more and more in the news on TV and whatever it's called the news is not the news anymore. It's just opinions. It's just stupid manipulation.

And you watch him and you get drawn into that. And you think it's also real. And then you see anxiety arises, anger arises, suffering arises.

And as humans, as the suffering increases, as I said before, the motivation to awaken in many humans also increases. So we are here to realize this and to actually welcome the challenges we are confronted with externally, because they are a great opportunity for the awakening of consciousness. Humans don't awaken except through difficulties, obstacles, problems, challenges.

And then your state of consciousness, the state of consciousness with which you meet the external situation changes, which means how the way in which you experience an external situation changes. And now this sounds a little mystical. What subsequently happens on an external level is also to a large extent determined by your state of consciousness in the present moment.

What subsequently happens in the so-called future, which never comes, because you can only experience the future as the present moment. So you can never experience the future except as a thought form. Interesting to realize this, the only reality the future has is as a thought form.

You cannot actually say, oh, there it is, because the moment you say there it is, it's the present. So how things evolve in the so-called future are linked in very fundamental way to your state of conscience in the present. So if you meet a difficult situation or a difficult person in a state of consciousness that is not reactive, but in an awakened state of consciousness, which means present, alert, then it changes also the situation, the external situation, how it develops from there onward.

Or you can, if you're unconscious, you face an external situation and you amplify the problem of the external situation that you're facing by your unconscious reactivity of the ego itself. It feels threatened in the situation and all the things that you do in order to remove the situation or make it better actually makes it worse. So it amplifies when you're unconsciously reacting all the time, you can observe it even just meeting a single human being, a difficult human being.

And many human beings are very difficult, you might've noticed. So you meet a difficult human being, how you react if this difficult human being triggers the same in you, an angry human being triggers anger in you, then you amplify his or her anger. And then it grows and grows and grows, might become violence.

And this applies to any situation. If you are in a reactive, unconscious, the unconscious state of reactivity, then you amplify the problem. And this is what happens a lot on every level here.

This is an unconscious way of dealing with things. Whenever you're motivated by fear or anger, this is what happens. You think you're resolving the situation, but you're amplifying it.

And so the key is then to realize this dimension within yourself that is beyond the thinking mind and all the mental, emotional turbulence. And this happens very easily in a moment, like now, when your mind, your thinking mind subsides, comes to a stop. Now, what remains?

You can't say what remains, but you know what remains directly. The sense of presence cannot be defined, the sense of beingness. This is the most beautiful thing.

These moments without thought, but it's not loss of consciousness. It's loss of thinking when it's not needed because thinking is useful for many things and destructive for many other things. And so you discover when it's useful and you let go of it when it's destructive, when it destroys your enjoyment of life, your enjoyment of the present moment, your ability to just be, to acknowledge the aliveness of things around you, to acknowledge the present moment, to have some gratitude for the richness of life and all life forms around you.

All this you lose when you're continuously absorbed only in thinking. What remains then when thinking subsides, awareness remains or presence, whatever you want to call it. In religious traditions, in mystical Christianity, it's called the Christ within.

In some Buddhist schools, it is called your Buddha nature. These are just names to talk about it. That's what remains when thinking subsides and there's only a sense of spacious presence like now.

And in that spacious presence, strange thing is you don't know anything anymore, of course, because there's no concepts anymore in your mind. You don't know anything on the level of concepts and yet that is the essence of who you are, this beingness or presence. So you don't know yourself anymore as an object, which is when you live through the ego, then you become an object to yourself and your consciousness and you have a relationship with yourself.

You can say, I love myself, which is better than hating yourself, but you still have a relationship with yourself. You're not yourself. You have a relationship with yourself.

It's better to love yourself than to hate yourself. True. But you still have a relationship with yourself.

There's two. I love myself. I'm two.

But with the realization of being, you are yourself. And so you cannot know yourself as an object of knowledge, but you can know yourself as the eternal subject of all knowing. And that's where wisdom arises.

This is the source of all real knowing and the source of all true intelligence is in this non-conceptual vast intelligence, which is the intelligence of consciousness itself, which is one with who you are. And then when you can link into that, you become inspired. It can inspire your mind.

Your mind can create when it's linked into that. You have creative thoughts, you have creative input, ideas. You take action that is wise rather than, or as the Buddhists skillful, skillful, wise action, rather than unconscious action that produces more suffering for yourself and others.

Perpetuates karma. So this realm of true intelligence is the non-conceptual realm. Yes, you need concepts and you can use concepts, but don't lose yourself in concepts.

Don't look for yourself in concepts and then have a narrative in your mind that says, this is who I am. It's just a story of one concept linked with others concepts. The story of yourself is not essentially who you are.

It's a story versus this limited entity of the person. It's a surface phenomenon. It's not who you are, but it's the realization of who you are.

That's the awakening, but it's not conceptual. So look for the cessation of thought. Look for it in little moments like now.

Whenever you look at something natural, the sky, a tree, the ocean, any plant or flower or animal, don't label it. Just be alert and present and perceive it. And as I said before, when you go into anything natural, when you go into nature, you can then sense something that is almost awe-inspiring.

I'm not romanticizing nature. Of course, nature can also kill you, but there is something there that is holy or sacred. And humans have to find that urgently because then they are not going to destroy nature anymore.

Ultimately, humans have been destroying nature for some time because they have lost the ability to sense what's there. There are old forests. Some are still here in Canada and other parts of the world.

There are forests that have been there with gigantic trees that have been there for thousands of years, thousands of years. They are sacred spaces. But if humans cannot sense it anymore, then all they see is possible profit.

What can we do with it? What can we do with it? They look at the whole world in terms of doing.

What can I do with it? Because they have lost sense of being. It's a terrible loss.

But you've also lost it with reference to yourself. You can't sense your own being. That's why you cannot sense the forest.

You can't sense your own holiness. And that's why you cannot sense the holiness of the forest or the sky or the ocean. It's not impossibly difficult what I am suggesting is the most important task in your life, which has become particularly almost, one could say, urgent at the present time.

This is a task of realizing the transcendent dimension to who you are. Very simply by realizing that you do not have to think all the time. That there's always a possibility in yourself.

It's just waiting to be discovered. You are waiting to be discovered, so to speak. That dimension is always there.

The moment thinking subsides, you feel that stillness. It's another word you can use. There's a stillness.

I wrote a little book called Stillness Speaks. It's a small book designed for meditative reading, not consecutive reading, just little entries. The first sentence in the book, if I remember correctly, is, you are never more essentially yourself than when you are still.

So when you're, this is the same thing. It's just another term pointer to describe it. You're still when the mind subsides, but awareness is not lost.

In fact, awareness has grown. Consciousness, awareness. This is the light of consciousness that Jesus said, you are the light of the world.

It's in one of the gospels. In another gospel, he also said, I am the light of the world. Both statements.

What is he talking about? You are the light of the world. You are the consciousness of the universe.

That's what he said. You are the consciousness without which there wouldn't even be a universe. You are essentially not a person.

You are the consciousness of the universe disguised briefly as a person. But the consciousness of the universe wants to realize itself through you. This is very strange.

So in other words, the universe is in the process of an awakening. It's an awakening of consciousness. One could almost say the universe has led a dream like existence for a very long time.

When forms were identified with just the form and gradually loss of realization of the essence. With humans, that has become very extreme. A tree is still rooted deeply, not only in the soil, but in the beingness of life.

When you look at a tree, you can sense it is one with itself. You have to be still to be able to sense that there is something there that beyond sense perceptions, the presence of the tree. It's a manifestation of consciousness too.

Or even an animal. You can look at an animal without always having to label it. And you just look or touch or listen.

And it also is a manifestation of the one consciousness. And it's still more rooted in being than a human, even your dog. And the dog is already kind of becoming humanized in many cases.

But even the dog or the cat, they are still more deeply rooted in the beingness of themselves than humans. Humans have gone out a long way, lost themselves in mental abstractions, but it's all fine. It all was meant that way.

So it was all necessary. But what's necessary now is the next step, the shift in consciousness. Jesus called that the repent, which has been mistranslated.

Metanoia is repentance. It's a Greek term used in the Old Testament. Repentance, an important concept in the teaching of Jesus.

Repentance is a shift, a turnaround of consciousness, which is not, they translate it as repentance. And then they thought it means you say, oh, I'm such a miserable sinner, which, well, you probably are because your mind is dysfunctional. But then if you create an image of yourself as a miserable sinner, you're stuck again in delusion.

So metanoia is the Greek, ancient Greek term, traditionally translated as repentance, but really means an inner shift in consciousness. And that's what it's all about. And it's great opportunity now, especially if you want to first avoid further suffering for yourself and avoid contributing to the suffering of the world or humanity.

They go together. If you don't want to contribute to the madness, because there is at the present time, an increasing craziness in the energy field, you can either become part of it and contribute to it, or you begin to dissolve it in yourself. So the key is become aware of yourself as a conscious presence, consciousness, become aware that you are conscious.

For example, one could say that there's no doubt, even if your entire life is a dream, including this moment, there's no doubt that in order for the dream to happen, there needs to be a consciousness, the light of consciousness in which the dream appears. And you are that, whether you call it a dream or reality, it doesn't matter. You are the light of consciousness in which this appears.

So everything can be doubted, except consciousness. You can doubt everything about yourself, except that you are conscious right now. And even that, when you use language, we distort things.

Even to say you are conscious is not quite correct, because that would imply that there's two of you. There's a you that is conscious, or even to say I am conscious, it's not quite correct. Because language so easily creates duality.

I am conscious means there's an I and there's a consciousness, but that's not right. I am consciousness is the most accurate way of saying it, instead of I am conscious, because you are not separate from consciousness, you are consciousness. There's no you without consciousness.

You are the light of the world. And a person, by the way, you're also a person. But if you're a person that is rooted in the realization that you are the light of the world at all times, then you become, by the way, a much better person too.

It's the icing on the cake. It's a side product. It's a side effect of awakening.

You're no longer a totally crazy person. You're not part of the craziness anymore. Well, that's a wonderful thing, not being part of the craziness of the world.

That's your task, especially now as the craziness is increasing, your task is not to be part of the craziness. So the key is awareness, presence. And that is, be aware of yourself as a conscious presence.

And then recognize that conscious presence in everywhere else, every other human, every life form, you can sense there too is the same conscious presence in a different, one could say different vibrational frequency. But you have to become still. Thinking needs to subside if only for a moment.

And awareness remains. Become still. Take a breath.

One conscious in breath, one conscious out breath. If you observe, this is a lovely mini meditation. Observe the breath going into your body and coming out of your body during that time you're not thinking.

And so that's the way if you can use, you can use your breathing by being aware of that you're breathing and you can, that becomes part of being aware that you're aware. As you know, I also recommend to feel your inner body. The energy that pervades your entire body, which is consciousness.

And so you become aware of this inner energy field of aliveness. It pervades your hands, your arms, your legs, your feet, entire body, but it's not the body anymore. It's the unseen.

You can't find that when you could cut open the body and you can't find that. It's beyond what can be perceived. It actually exists in another dimension.

That invisible presence that you are, that you cannot find when you cut open the body and look for it. The invisible presence that is the essence of who you are does not actually exist in this dimension. It exists in another dimension.

Even that you can say that the dog, what you love in the dog, yes, the dog may look nice or the cat may look nice, lovely to look at, but you can sense there is an inside to the dog. The dog has an inner being, but you cannot cut open that dog. Let's say the dog dies or does you cut open and you look for that inner being.

You can't find it because all you find is bones and blood and flesh. Where's the dog? It's not in the bones and the blood and the flesh.

It doesn't actually exist in this dimension. It is in another. You are a being and every is from another dimension.

And only the outer part comes into this dimension. You are, as you know, you're essentially invisible. You are invisible.

The essence of who you are is invisible. Even just thought is already invisible. You can't find a thought by looking for it with instruments, let alone the deeper consciousness of who you are.

You're invisible. And this presence is not subject to decay or time or death. But when you only know yourself as a person, then you continuously have the fear of death.

And ultimately all fear comes down to the fear of death. So the, if you want to lose the fear of death, know yourself as this invisible presence that actually doesn't even exist in this dimension. That's already in another dimension.

And you realize if you have to talk about it, but you don't have to say it, that ultimately there is no death. And to know that it's a direct knowing, that means all fear goes, because if the fear of death goes, then ultimately, because that's the root of all fear, the ultimate loss. So that's the secret of awakening, of bringing about a shift in consciousness in yourself and bringing about an end of the craziness and restore or restore sanity hasn't been here for on the collective.

Sporadically, there has been some sanity, but a lot of insanity in the collective energy field. And there are times when the insanity increases as it did in the first half of the 20th century, it was to the two world wars and other dreadful conflicts, huge amount of collective insanity. And then it got in the Western world, at least got better for quite a few decades.

And now we're entering another period of insanity, but we are more ready for it. Now, many humans are more ready to awaken now than before. And of course, you are one of them.

Otherwise you wouldn't be here, unless somebody dragged you here and you can't stand it anymore. So meditation ultimately is, yes, it's very helpful. What we are talking about is the meditative state as your normal state of consciousness.

So you're all, there's always a background of awareness in your life. And then you return to just aware presence and you look around. And then it means more and more present moment living.

The present moment is actually usually not bad at all.

Eckhart Tolle Suffering As Spiritual Teacher [b976cdfd-8554-479f-9427-dfee78c245f8]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:39)

Suffering, a spiritual teacher. In this episode, Eckhart leads a short meditation and then answers a question about our fear of suffering. Eckhart says suffering plays an important role in the evolution of our consciousness.

Without it, we would not grow in awareness. He says for many people, suffering is their primary spiritual teacher and much of our pain is self-created through dysfunctional thoughts and behaviors. Eckhart believes the pain can also be a catalyst for spiritual growth.

He explains, if we focus on the power of the present moment, our difficulties diminish, and once we awaken, we no longer need to suffer.

[Speaker 1] (0:42 - 6:29)

Thank you, welcome everybody joining us here, wherever you are, whatever time it is, where you are, it's certainly the present moment. Let's take a moment to just become aware of ourselves and let's, for a moment, connect with our audience and become aware that each being is a point of consciousness, assuming a particular temporary form, and you yourself are a point of consciousness or a ray of consciousness, the one consciousness, assuming a temporary disguise as a person. And it may be possible for you to get a sense of non-separation or one-on-one, oneness by realizing that what you see externally as different beings at a deeper level is the one being, the one consciousness, taking on different appearances, persons, personalities, and become aware of yourself without figuring anything out mentally through thinking, but just being aware.

So in essence, you are that awareness. And ultimately, there's only one I. When you say I, it can either refer to the temporary person or when you say I, it can refer to the, your deeper identity as conscious awareness.

And there's only one I at that level. And that realization transforms everything. It transforms how you perceive the world, how you interpret the world, transforms the way you do things.

It even transforms your thinking when you do think, because then thinking is no longer self-serving and you're not looking for yourself anymore in the realm of thinking, identifying with thinking. So such a wonderful, simple realization. It's the realization of being, that's the foundation.

But you still exist here as a person in this dimension, and inevitably you become involved in doing as a person. And that includes manifesting. Sometimes you may consciously want to manifest this or that, not necessarily all the time, and not necessarily everybody will want to live in that way.

We may be going into that, but you cannot escape the challenges of life in the realm of doing. But that's okay if you don't lose connectedness with being, that transforms the way you experience the world of doing, of phenomena. So we may be going into this more as we look at the questions, but this, our starting point, that's the foundation for your whole life, whatever you manifest in this play of forms.

On the level of form, everything is temporary, and that's just how it is. And whatever you manifest in the world of form also is fine for a while, but it's all temporary. And that's fine, that's a temporary realm that you also inhabit, but it's not terribly, terribly serious anymore when you're connected with being.

You honor it, very different. You give it attention, you honor it. You are thankful, the important part of manifesting, to being thankful for whatever is here in the present moment, to appreciate all the forms of life around you, animate or inanimate, and realizing that the essence of it all is inseparable from who you are in your essence.

So let's move on to the first question.

[Speaker 3] (6:32 - 7:30)

Thank you, thank you. Well, I've realized that surrendering to source, surrendering to what source wants to create through me is important, and I sometimes get fearful when I approach that place. My thoughts sometimes wonder, well, what if the universe wants me to get sick?

Or what if the universe wants a loved one of mine to pass away? And when I go there, of course, I feel this restriction. And so I think I have a fear of suffering.

I'm just afraid to suffer. So does the universe want us to suffer? It's one of my questions.

And then how should I approach overcoming this? It's almost automatic restriction that I get when I get fearful.

[Speaker 1] (7:32 - 24:33)

Thank you, thank you for your question. It's a very profound question, the role of suffering. And suffering is an essential part of the evolution of consciousness.

But it's also a sign, of course, that the awakening hasn't happened yet. And a lot of suffering is generated by unconsciousness. And paradoxically, the very thing that's generated by unconsciousness will eventually awaken you.

So this unconsciousness is the egoic sense of self. And one could say the egoic sense of self has built into it a self-destruct mechanism. It was designed like that, let's put it like that.

And eventually it will create its own dissolution through suffering. Now, if you live consciously, if you, and this is an enormous step forward for a human being, to become aware that it is possible to no longer be completely in the grip of the conditioned mind, which is the ego, and then to make the main purpose of your life, your inner state of consciousness, and to realize that the important thing in any situation is to be present, when you make that the main priority in your life, then you don't really need, neither do you create a lot of suffering anymore, because a lot of human suffering is self-created both on an individual level and on a collective level. If you look at humans, all the humans that died violently, the past 100 years, 200 years, the past millennium, whatever, the greater part of humans that died violent death, they were killed by other humans.

Yes, there were also humans killed by epidemics and earthquakes and so on, but the greater part of humans killed in the 20th century, for example, because that's the closest to us, were killed or murdered, you could honestly, by other humans through warfare, internal strife, genocide, and so on. So a lot of that suffering is, of course, obviously human created, and on an individual level also, a lot of the suffering, I could almost say all the suffering, I don't want to say anything that people find difficult to accept, so let's say a lot of suffering, is the greater part of your suffering is self-created through dysfunctional thought processes, through old forms of conditioning, through which you perceive reality and misinterpret and distort reality completely and react to events, thus amplifying the unconsciousness of others, thus creating more drama. And so that's the, the unconscious state creates a lot of suffering. But strangely, it's that suffering eventually, wakes you up, maybe not always in this lifetime, but there's always the potential for it to wake you up.

When you begin to live consciously, however, you become aware of the conditioning of your mind, the element of freedom comes in for the first time, you are free to choose something different. There is another way, you realize there is another way rather than the old unconscious reactivity and so on. But when you're always at the mercy of other people and external conditions, as far as your inner state of consciousness is concerned, when you're in a reactive, in other words, unconscious mode, you're always at the mercy of external conditions, you are reactive to external conditions.

So the world is, you ultimately see yourself as weak, although maybe perhaps not consciously, and the world is there as a threatening thing that you perceive as something outside of you, always waiting to sabotage your plans and so on. That's how it sometimes seems. So when you begin to live consciously, then yes, the element of freedom comes in, but also you no longer need the suffering to awaken you.

When you suffer, that's an involuntary awakening. Ultimately, the universe is moving towards the awakening of consciousness. You are part of the awakening universe.

And so the universe awakens. When you are unconscious, there's the universe, ultimately through the suffering generated by the egoic consciousness or unconsciousness, forces you eventually into awakening. But when you voluntarily begin to make presence the main purpose of your life, the universe does not need to force you into awakening.

It doesn't need to knock you on the head and to show you in order to shake you to wake up. You are less likely to encounter disasters and huge drama in your life, much less likely, suffering in other words. When you consciously participate in where the universe is going, which is awake, when you consciously participate in the awakening process, you no longer need to be forced through suffering to awaken.

It doesn't mean that challenges do not come into your life anymore. Challenges continue to come, but increasingly the challenges of life no longer create suffering in you. They make you more conscious.

Once you have embarked on that journey of awakening, the journey of awakening, there's an expression in Buddhism that says you become a stream enterer. You begin to enter the stream of awakening. You are a stream enterer.

Once you're a stream enterer, you are voluntarily aligning yourself with the purpose of the whole, the purpose of the universe. And by voluntarily aligning yourself, you no longer need the violence of suffering. You no longer need the universe to shake you awake, to create enormous suffering.

And that means it implies you don't create it for yourself anymore in how you meet events, circumstances, people, no longer in a reactive way. This means you no longer amplify other people's unconsciousness because you're in a state of presence when you meet others who are unconscious, big egos, difficult situations, challenges, the collective challenges like now, you meet them consciously in a different, in a non-reactive way. So already the amount of suffering gets reduced.

The more present you are, the more the amount of suffering is reduced. You don't need it anymore. Challenges, yes, you still need challenges because the challenges deepen your presence.

And there's always a possibility when challenges happen that you may fall back into a reactivity that's also possible. And then you begin to suffer against and then you encounter suddenly intensified suffering again and then you wake up again and you move out of that. So inevitably, of course, everybody here will encounter loss and ultimately your body will eventually dissolve.

And everybody is moving in that direction, obviously, but that is no longer a source of suffering. If you're, for example, if you're completely identified with your body, as the body then gets older, no longer looks that good, becomes weak, you lose abilities, can't do this anymore, can't do that anymore. And we're all moving in that direction.

If you are completely identified with it, it's very enormous suffering involved in that. Let's say you were identified with your good looks and then the years pass, go by, and then there's no denying anymore that your good looks have completely disappeared. But for decades, you derived your sense of identity from your good looks, better than others eagerly seek superiority.

Then you suffer enormously because your very sense of self crumbles. That is much more painful than the gradual dissolution of your physical body, that psychological pain, that psychological suffering. So on many, many levels, the less conscious you are, the more you suffer.

And the more conscious you are, the more you begin to transcend suffering. So your fear is unfounded. You will continue to encounter challenges, but it is not the case that when you voluntarily embrace presence and make that the main purpose of your life, then suffering is no longer your main spiritual teacher.

I sometimes say, everybody, every human on this planet has a spiritual teacher. For most humans still, the majority, their spiritual teacher is their suffering. And eventually their suffering would bring about an awakening, but perhaps not in this lifetime, but there's always a potential.

And then you may encounter, suddenly as you begin to awaken, you might awaken to encountering an actual spiritual teacher that's not suffering. It could be a teaching, it could be something you read in a book, something somebody says, and then suddenly the awakening process begins. At that point, the need for you to have suffering as a spiritual teacher decreases as the awakening process begins.

And it's a wonderful process. And if some great disaster should come into your life and you've already begun the awakening process, then there's a good chance, probably you will then, that will be the one thing that brings out a total flowering of consciousness. And I've seen that a few times with people who had already been practicing presence for many years and then something went wrong with their body.

And that was the final realization, the final awakening suddenly came and complete transcendence of not only of suffering, transcendence of complete transcendence of ego and so on. So in a word, the more present you are, the less the need for suffering as a spiritual teacher. Because when you're present, that presence becomes your teacher.

The unconsciousness creates the suffering and that suffering becomes a teacher. There's a deep, suffering is a very, both in Christianity and Buddhism, suffering is a key concept. In Christianity, the archetypal image is Jesus on the cross, the archetypal image of human suffering.

In Buddhism, the Buddha said, I teach suffering and the end of suffering. Many things that you read in Buddhist scriptures were written much later after the Buddha, but there are some that I feel, I have no doubt that the Buddha actually, virtually literally said 2,500 years ago. And I have no doubt that he did say, I teach suffering and the end of suffering.

The Buddha said, wherever you go, whatever you do, you will find suffering, dukkha, suffering. But he was talking about the unconscious state. And then I teach suffering and the end of suffering, means I'd show you how suffering arises and I'll show you how suffering can be transcended.

That's the teaching of the Buddha. It's just, that is ultimately all spiritual teaching. The image of Jesus on the cross shows the function of suffering.

So there's intense suffering, then the state of surrender, and then there's a transmutation and the rebirth and the cross, the torture instrument becomes a portal into awakening and is inseparable from the divine. So the suffering has a purpose until you don't need it anymore. So one could say suffering is necessary until you don't need it anymore.

And many of you, if not most of you, maybe all of you have reached the point where you really, you don't need suffering anymore as a spiritual teacher. So I trust my answer has given you some relief, but I didn't say to give you relief. I said it because that's just how it is.

Eckhart Tolle Suffering Consciously : Confronting Illness and Addiction [4de96610-7f7c-4371-9908-01d0f35e376a]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:38)

Suffering Consciously, Confronting Illness and Addiction. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions about addiction and facing illness consciously. A woman who had cancer fears its return and the possibility of an early death.

While difficult, Eckhart encourages her to practice presence by staying in the moment, this moment. He believes this is what allows for less opportunity to play out scenarios where death seems imminent. He urges her to release the mental gymnastics that plague all of us.

He says it's imperative that we work with life's challenges and allow them to push us into awakening.

[Speaker 4] (0:40 - 1:31)

Hi, Eckhart. My question has to do with a couple of years ago, I was diagnosed with cancer. And every six months, they scan my body to see if it's returned.

And my poor little ego starts suffering and becomes terrified. And I don't know how to stay in the present. I'm not suffering right at this moment with pain or with death imminent.

But I veer into that panic quite often. And yeah, I get really scared that I will have a bad death in the sense that I won't be aware. I'll just be screaming, Mommy, and my ego will take over.

And even though it's all future concepts, I know. But yeah, so how do I have a good death?

[Speaker 1] (1:32 - 14:03)

Right. Well, thank you. That's a very relevant question, what we've been talking about.

So you are at the moment you are free of cancer. But in your mind, there is a possibility that it may return. And all the things that could happen as a consequence of that leading to death.

That means, of course, you are more aware of mortality than you would otherwise be. If this were not happening, you are much more aware now because you've been through one cancer episode. And you got cured.

But you are now much more acutely aware of the proximity of death, the possibility of death than a normal person would be. And that can be a bad thing because it can take over your mind and lead to all kinds of very fearful thoughts, creating very fearful emotions. And it could consume the rest of your days, even if the cancer never disappears.

In fact, it could be just almost worse than the actual condition. So here we need to look at that. My recommendation is that you accept or you use this situation and allow it to force you more into the present moment.

Because you will notice that when you leave the present moment, you begin to suffer. In your mind, you leave the present moment. You create a future scenario where the cancer has reappeared.

You suffer much more than in an ordinary life, a person who does not face this situation that you are facing. It is also true that when they leave the present moment, they tend to suffer more. But much more true in your case.

So life has created a situation for you that makes it abundantly clear that leaving the present moment is the beginning of suffering. So if you want to end the suffering, you can use this situation and allow it. I use the term force to force you into the present moment.

And then in the present moment, here you are. Less thinking happens in the present moment. You will notice the more present you become, the less you are burdened by unnecessary mind activity.

And there are lots of spaces of just awareness. In nature, you look at the sky. This alertness can fill your entire body, one could almost say.

You are alert with every cell of your body. And here you are. Every moment is precious because ultimately there isn't every moment.

There is only ever this one moment. It takes on different forms. There is only ever this one moment.

And then you notice every time you leave the present moment, suffering arises again. That's an alarm clock. This is the alarm signal for you.

It says, come back to the present moment. And so use the situation. It can be enormously helpful like a very strict, stern, spiritual teacher forcing you to be present.

Of course, if you don't want to be present, then it means you want to suffer. That's fine. You are allowed to suffer.

But you realize where suffering arises. The most powerful motivator for spiritual awakening, more powerful than wanting to achieve enlightenment. It can be deceptive.

Well, I want to achieve enlightenment. This is the highest version of me that I can think of. That can be an illusion.

Probably is. But the motivation to be free of suffering, that can be a very powerful thing. I want to be free of suffering.

And that entails and implies many other things. A shift, a change in your consciousness where suffering arises. This is the reason why, again, coming back to the Buddha and Jesus.

This is why the Buddha, the essence of the Buddha's teaching. The essence was actually not enlightenment. The essence of the Buddha's teaching was the end of suffering.

That's the very essence of the original teaching of the Buddha. The end of suffering. I believe enlightenment was added later by followers of the Buddha.

Which is not totally untrue, but it can be very misleading. The Buddha himself, I'm sure, the emphasis of his teaching was the end of suffering. As he said, sometimes with these teachers, Buddha goes back 2,500 years.

Sometimes you don't actually get what they said. You get what later the disciples wrote, sometimes centuries later. But there are a few terms that are so powerfully true that I'm sure Buddha almost literally said it.

And so he said, I teach suffering and the end of suffering. Which means I show you how suffering arises, and I show you how it can end. I've just explained the essence of Buddhism.

So Christianity, or rather Jesus' teaching is the kingdom of heaven or the fullness of life. Another term Jesus uses. I want you to have the fullness of life.

Or I want you to show the kingdom of heaven that is within you here and now. Same thing. You can't have the fullness of life when you're suffering.

So Jesus talks about what is there when suffering comes to an end. Buddha does not talk about what is there when suffering comes to an end. He says you don't need to talk about it.

It arises naturally. When suffering comes to an end, the essence of who you are arises naturally. There's no need to talk about it.

That's why Buddha didn't talk about the God that is within you or anything like that. No need to talk about it. Just bring about the end of suffering.

Then we have the fullness of life. Yes, same thing expressed in positive terms. The kingdom of heaven.

Which is, as you probably know, in my translation, what is translated in the Bible as the kingdom of heaven. I have re-translated it into modern terminology. Kingdom is no longer a term that modern humans relate to.

Well, there's still the United Kingdom, but normally there are not that many kingdoms anymore. Kingdom was a big thing at the time. So I let go of the term kingdom.

What really he's talking about when he says kingdom is dimension. The dimension. The dimension of what?

Of heaven. Now what is heaven? Again, heaven is an analogy he used.

It means the sky. Because heaven and sky are the same word in many languages. And probably also in Jesus' language, Aramaic.

In French, in Spanish, in German. The heaven is the same word as the sky. Cielo, sky.

The dimension of the sky. Sky is an analogy. Means he's using a term from the sense perceived world.

In order to point to something that is beyond the sense perceived world. And the closest term he could find in the sense perceived world is the vastness of the sky. The empty spaciousness of the sky.

Because the sky is spaciousness itself. So he very, that was actually very wise and clever to use that term. The closest that you can get to the formless consciousness in the sense perceived world is to point to the vast spaciousness of the sky.

Because we're talking here about the spaciousness of awareness. Of consciousness without objects. Just consciousness.

I call it sometimes space consciousness. As opposed to object consciousness. Object consciousness is the world of things.

Including thoughts. Space consciousness is awareness. Presence.

Awareness of awareness. So the dimension of spaciousness. That's my translation of the kingdom of heaven.

The dimension of spaciousness which is within you. Which is a dimension of consciousness that is in every human being. Does not need to be achieved because it's already there.

So it's not an achievement. It's a discovery. Now that's good news because if it's an achievement then you might never, how long is it going to take me to find it?

You bring in time. If you think in terms of achievement, you have to bring in time. One day you will achieve enlightenment.

Okay, how many lifetimes? Well, I'll give you about 25. Oh dear, it's a long time to wait.

When you think in terms of achievement, but it's not an achievement. It's a realization of what's already there. The essence of who you are is already there in every human being.

It's just not recognized. You haven't found it. Well, you have, but many humans haven't found it.

They don't know it's there. And when they don't know it's there, it is as if it weren't there. And they live and act as if it weren't there.

And that brings in the craziness into this world. They are deluded. They are acting from a basis of a deluded sense of identity.

A deluded sense of self, which is the ego, personal and collective. It's often a mixture of the two. Collective ego, us against them.

Personal ego, me against him or her, whatever it may be. So your practice then is awareness practice continuously. The escape from suffering.

And you have a strong motivation now to escape from suffering. So it can be the most wonderful thing, actually, that's happened to you. And the same can be practiced even I have known people who are very close to actual death.

They knew I only have a few more, two more months or something. And even then it didn't matter how much time was left. They were still able to go suddenly very deep.

And some people experienced a miraculous transformation where their personality dissolved almost completely. And there was just a luminous being there. And then a few weeks later they died.

Which means that their life was totally fulfilled because the flowering of consciousness happened through them. Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (14:07 - 15:20)

Hi, Edgar. Hi. An honor and a pleasure for you to have some time to answer my question.

So my question is related about addictions. One of the biggest challenges for humans in the path of awakening and spirituality in general are addictions. Some of them can be very destructive and dysfunctional.

Thinking itself can be one of the greatest addictions some of us can have. Others directly affect the health, relationships, self-care, and whole families and communities. So how can one deal with this type of addictions like alcohol, drugs, porn, eating, et cetera?

How can one keep on the path of the change when sometimes it's very discouraging when you feel powerless, when you feel that your willpower is not there anymore, that something else inside of you is governing your life and taking the wrong decisions for you when you know it. It's very, very discouraging. How can one avoid the pain of falling back into the darkness of this world?

How can one stay awake in the moment of temptations and weakness? Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (15:21 - 40:51)

Very good question. Thank you. So now, as you know, there are many degrees of addiction.

Some are such a grip on you that, for example, addicted to a drug like heroin, which is very destructive, or some alcohol addictions to maybe some others. They have such a grip on you that you cannot get out without some help, some external help. With some, you may need some external help, like a structure.

Many, many thousands of people have been helped through Alcoholics Anonymous, AA, what they have devised. For heroin, too, or similar things, this thing has such power over you. It's like a form of possession that you need some help.

Even if you get help in a structured setting, helping to free you, when you come out again, the danger after a while arises again. Although then, there's a possibility of doing something about it. Let's look at other addictions that arise, like overeating or drinking, but not perhaps the most destructive form of alcoholism.

But nevertheless, not being able to live without consuming large, fairly large amounts every day. Still functioning, perhaps, but not being able to stop it. Addiction always means it is stronger than you.

We can call it addiction. Sometimes people lie to themselves. They say, oh, I could stop, but I just don't want to.

But that very often is a lie. They lie to themselves because they confuse can with being able to and not wanting to. But they say, I don't want to, but they can't.

This is why an alcoholic is anonymous. Although I have no personal experience with it, but I've heard accounts from people. One of the first things you have to do there is to say, I am an alcoholic.

I can see why they do that. I would change the way it's phrased. Because if you say, I am an alcoholic, you make being an alcoholic into your identity.

Once you've made it into your identity, it's harder to become free of it. But to say, I am addicted to alcohol, that is the truth. I cannot, I've tried, but I cannot stop.

That is the truth. That's fine. Although I would not recommend to say, I am an alcoholic.

And even to say, I am an addict, which might look honest, but it's ultimately not the case. This is not who you are. You are not an alcoholic.

You are not an addict. It is something that has taken possession of you, but it is not you. So let's say you can still function.

There's maybe overeating. There's alcohol every day. And often people need to reach a certain discomfort, a certain amount of suffering, so they realize what's happening to them.

They reach a certain point where it's beginning to create some form of suffering in their lives. Affect the physical body, whatever it may be, whatever form. Affect the way in which the mind functions and they realize it no longer functions.

So you have to reach the point where you're beginning to realize there's something wrong. It's affecting how I function in this world. Until you reach that point, you're probably happy with your addiction and you're actually enjoying it.

But every person who is addicted to something will reach sooner or later, will reach the point where they realize it's affecting their life in one way or another. And they have to do something. And then there comes the possibility of the question, is there awareness, enough awareness in you so that you can bring some awareness into the compulsive behavior?

For example, a person who overeats habitually, and again, why are they doing this? Before I carry on, I just wanted to mention this thing. Why are they doing this?

Why do they have the compulsion to overeat? Why do they have the compulsion to have these drinks every day? In many cases, there's something they don't want to look at within themselves.

There's certain emotional mental states that are painful. And in order to escape from this pain of certain emotional mental states, they would rather ingest some substance in order to dull the pain to some extent. And temporarily, it works.

Temporarily only. Inevitably, when you use a substance to dull some form of pain that you don't want to face, eventually, the pain will get worse. And eventually, the substance will no longer work for you, except in larger and larger doses.

And in larger and larger doses, it affects the body and the mind more and more adversely. So this is the cycle of suffering that happens. So it often begins with an unwillingness to endure suffering, mental emotional suffering, an escape from suffering.

And suffering can even be, let's say, some teenagers start to take drugs. It's overt. They start taking a drug.

Why do they take it? Well, they might say they want to experience the excitement of this high. They want some high.

Why do they want a high? Perhaps they don't feel any high, any deep sense of aliveness in their ordinary life. Perhaps there's a lot of frustration already building up in their ordinary life, a lot of unhappiness building up in their ordinary life.

And if they want to experience a high, the reason already could be their normal state is not all that pleasant, which is undoubtedly the case for many youngsters. Their normal state is not pleasant, probably these days less pleasant than in the past. So the beginning of it is always a sense of there's something not quite right, but I don't want to face it.

I'm verbalizing it. It's not consciously expressed, usually. And adults do it, too.

They come to some suffering, emotional, mental suffering through a life situation. And they don't want to feel this suffering anymore, so they go. There's also the drugs that are prescription drugs, which are huge, huge, huge, even for children, many.

And again, are they all in extreme cases? They may do some temporary good, but in many, many other cases, they don't. They remove the possibility for you to use the suffering as a way of becoming more conscious.

So a very vital thing, and this could be taught to youngsters, too, when there's an unsatisfying mental emotional state and you begin to suffer anger, irritation. Anxiety is a very big one. Or some depressive state, deep sadness.

Nihilistic state. Nihilism is a very common disease these days. Nihilism means it's all purposeless.

What's the point of it all? Nothing makes sense. Why even do anything?

Why even make an effort? It's nihilism. The world is pointless, meaningless.

Nihilism started very strongly when Darwin, I would say, with Darwin, because really what Darwin was implying, even though he wasn't saying it, he was implying that the entire universe is an accident. It's arbitrary. These life forms have accidentally come into being.

It's random formations. There's nothing, no meaning behind it. There's no intelligence behind it.

These are random, accidental formations. That's the theory of evolution. Undoubtedly, there is evolution, but humans believe that there's no intelligence behind it.

That's the essence, really, of Darwin's theory of evolution is these are random formations over millions of years, but no intelligence that is guiding the evolution. He never looked at that. He had some abstract, in a different compartment in his mind, Darwin still talked about God, but that different compartment in his mind had nothing to do with his theory anymore.

So there was a draw in his mind in which he put the concept God, and then he went on with his theory of evolution. It took quite a while before that seeped into the collective consciousness of humanity, because even people who have never even heard of Darwin are now affected by it. The universe is basically pointless.

Now, there's always been humans around that experienced that state of consciousness that we call nihilism. There have been isolated humans throughout history, but nowadays we have a large section of humanity is affected by the disease of nihilism, and for many, drugs are the solution. By the way, if you want to read the Bible in the book of Ecclesiastes, which is a wonderful work of literature, which really shouldn't be in the Bible, but it's a great literature.

It starts with the famous sentence, vanity of vanities, all is vanity. That's the beginning of Ecclesiastes in the Old Testament. Now, vanity in modern terms means pointlessness.

Vanity of vanity, everything is utterly pointless. This person who wrote this book of Ecclesiastes wrote about whatever you do in your life is ultimately meaningless because you're going to die anyway. So, I assume that was an old man who had come close to the end of his life and said, what's this all about?

It's nothing. And then he wrote a literary masterpiece, but it's not a spiritual book at all. It's not even religious, but it found its way into the Bible miraculously, but it's worth reading.

So, it shows the state of nihilism, Ecclesiastes. Now, humans miss a great opportunity when they immediately run away from unsatisfying states of whatever their mental emotional state is. If they're able to endure the suffering for a while, as suffering, instead of immediately wanting to run away from it.

And the suffering that comes, there's a very important term here in spirituality, very, very important to do with suffering, and that is suffer consciously. When suffering arises, don't run away from it. Look at it, feel it, see perhaps how it arises.

Does it arise from some situation outside? Does it arise in your mind? But don't run away from it.

So, you don't make it bigger than you. It's not bigger than you. And as you face suffering, it's of course not comfortable at first to face suffering and to endure it, to suffer consciously, but it brings about an evolution in consciousness, a deepening in yourself.

If you give yourself this opportunity as suffering arises, then suffer. So, now let's give you a simple, very simple example from everyday life. Let's say your addiction is overeating.

Many people who overeat say that often they find themselves munching on something and they don't even know when they started. It's just so unconscious. I had a friend who had a very big problem many years ago with overeating.

And he said to me often he would find himself at night sitting at the kitchen table and biting into some cookies or cream cake or donuts and eating it. And he couldn't even remember how it got into his mouth. He went to the fridge unconsciously.

He reached into the fridge and went back to the kitchen table and started munching and suddenly thought, oh, I'm munching a donut again. And then he said, and this is symptomatic for many of these cases, almost every time his mind found, now he was telling me this because he was already becoming conscious of it. So, his mind then, every time he discovered that he was engaged in this addictive behavior, his mind would find an excuse.

And it would formulate something like, you've had a rough day. You really deserve a treat. It's been such a rough day.

Or it would say something like, well, why don't you? It's the only pleasure you've got in your life, the only one that's left. Everything has been taken away from you.

So, you might as well do it. You've got nothing left. And for many years, he believed in these thoughts.

And as awareness rose, he could suddenly look at that thought and see how deceptive it was, justifying it was an egoic thought, ultimately self-destructive. It's an enormous realization that he was just, his mind was justifying his addictive behavior. And then I had conversations with him that gradually he was able to become conscious, more conscious.

And I suggested to him, I suggested to anybody, not just overeating, but also drinking, for example, or other forms of addiction, or even the cell phone addictions. When you feel the addictive urge coming, to be able to feel the addictive urge already implies that there's some awareness there. So, you're not immediately completely taken over.

You can feel the desire to have a drink. And then you're already looking, where is the, the whiskey is over there. So, you have to go there and get a glass out of the cupboard.

So, the desire rises. If there's not awareness, create a gap between, I'm not immediately saying you must no longer engage in this addictive behavior. That's too much to ask.

But to initially create a gap between the realization that this desire is now arisen and fulfilling the desire. So, if you feel the desire to have a drink or to go to the fridge, because there's a cream cake waiting for you there, and you've had a rough day. So, bring about a gap between doing it and observe the urge to do it.

And the urge to do it is not pleasant. It's a form of suffering, because you're not giving it what it wants. So, the urge to do it is there, but you shine the light of your awareness on it.

And you can do that for five minutes every time before you indulge in whatever behavior it is. And in some cases, you may find that the urge diminishes and disappears temporarily. Then, of course, yes, it will reappear again.

And another opportunity arises for you to create a gap. Give yourself five minutes. Don't say to yourself, I must not drink and I will not drink.

That may not work. Or I must not eat this cream cake. No, may not work.

But five minutes. Give yourself five minutes. What does it feel like, this urge in you?

Is it pleasant? No. But it is.

There it is. Feel it. Give yourself space.

So, the urge itself, the addiction in you, can bring about more consciousness. While you are not fulfilling the addiction, yes, you are suffering in some way. But that's conscious suffering.

And conscious suffering is enormously helpful in the evolution of your consciousness. Conscious suffering. So, I recommend that to anybody if they feel tempted.

People are, especially in present times, many people are experiencing restrictions on their life. Even now, still going on in many places. When the pandemic is still locked down, some places still happening.

And leading to a lot of suffering in many humans. Children too, many, many children suffering. As suffering arises, don't try to dull it or remove it or try to run away from it.

Be with it for a while. And you begin to realize that it is not stronger than you. Conscious suffering.

You consciously endure it. And then you may also find, because there's an awareness there, you may also find that a lot of the suffering might have been created by certain thoughts in your head. You had certain unpleasant thoughts that created this.

The thoughts that were telling you, for example, I can't take anymore of this. This is all dreadful. My life, what's my life come to is totally pointless.

Why am I even here? Totally, utterly pointless. Suddenly you observe these thoughts.

These thoughts make you suffer. Yes. But you've brought in awareness.

So conscious suffering is a key for many people to spiritual realization and awakening is instead of running away from states of suffering, bring awareness to them. Accept them. Bring in time limits if you like, as I suggested.

Similar to this, you need to have compulsively grasping this every five minutes. There must be something new here. And this is a terrible thing.

I mean, it's a wonderful technology. It's miraculous. It's incredible, but it's also terrible.

If it's misused and if it takes hold, possession of you, it's terrible. And again, if you feel the urge to, let's say you're waiting somewhere, you're at the elevator or in a waiting room or there's a lineup. And everybody's on there while they're waiting.

Almost everybody you can see is on. And you can feel your hand reaching into your pocket or your back to get out yours, too, because everybody else is doing it. There must be something here to look at.

And at that moment, observe the urge, but don't do it. Just stay with the urge. Feel it.

Observe it. There it is. And after a few minutes, two or three, you may find it temporarily subsides.

And then you're free for a little while of the urge. And then it may come back. And then you do it again.

You feel the urge rising, but don't do anything about it. There it is. And then it may happen that you forget yourself.

And it may happen that suddenly you find, oh, I've been five minutes I've been on this already. I didn't even know how it got into my hand. It just appeared in my hand.

This happens, too. That's fine. You can't succeed every time yet.

That's fine. But again, even this for people, especially youngsters, unfortunately, to deprive a person of this thing for a day would lead to enormous suffering in many people. It's amazing, isn't it?

I mean, not long ago nobody had it. And now to deprive a person of this for one day would lead to suffering. But it also would be a wonderful opportunity for awakening if you can face the suffering and suffer consciously.

And perhaps at the end of the day, you would taste a certain amount of freedom. And you'd suddenly be able to engage again with other human beings and with nature instead of the virtual world, which for many people, especially young people, the virtual world is more real than the real world. It's dreadful.

Dreadful addiction. So addiction is the escape from suffering, but it doesn't work. And this escape from suffering eventually leads to even more suffering.

But even then, you can still suffer consciously. Let's say you have been addicted. It leads to more suffering.

The opportunity there again is to suffer consciously. It's a very deep secret for spiritual realization. And it's why suffering is an important part of the illusion of human consciousness as expressed by the Buddha.

I teach suffering and the end of suffering. It's an essential part of the teaching. Without suffering, there wouldn't be awakening, of course.

It's also expressed in the image of a person with dreadful suffering on a cross. No, he is certainly suffering. It's a central image of Christianity is the image of suffering.

And the central teaching of the Buddha is the teaching of suffering. And in the case of Christianity, Jesus is the archetypal human. And the archetypal human is the human who goes through this dreadful suffering and then dies and then reemerges.

And so that contains a deep wisdom, not through words, but it's embodied in that. So we'll leave it at that. Thank you for your question.

It was great. Thank you. I hope that's helpful.

So let's stop here. And a moment of stillness. Don't need to call it meditation.

Just a moment of just awareness. Just aware of what is here now. And aware of yourself.

Aware of yourself as the presence, not the person. I am. That's the deepest knowing I am.

And it certainly is not complicated. Thank you.

[Speaker 5] (0:00 - 0:24)

Suffering and awakening. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions from a live audience, including one about how suffering can lead to awakening. He says we need challenges in order to evolve.

The great paradox is we are liberated when we surrender to life's difficulties. Eckhart says eventually we can become grateful for our suffering because it pushes us to become more.

[Speaker 4] (0:28 - 0:30)

Hi, Eckhart. Thank you for taking my question.

[Speaker 6] (0:31 - 0:31)

Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (0:32 - 1:28)

So it has to do a little bit with suffering and awakening. And I'm just going to read it. I have lived an incredibly traumatic and violent life for most of my life.

And I'm still unsure how to use the suffering and pain and trauma to help bring myself into awareness and awakening. So can you elaborate more on how that's done? And there is a second part to the question that relates to it.

You've said that the purpose of the life of life is to sort of go into the, to become awakened. So I'm kind of taking it like if this, why aren't we just born awakened? But why is there the need for this suffering to bring us there?

And do we choose this suffering or does it just happen?

[Speaker 1] (1:29 - 19:30)

Well, thank you. They're big questions. The first question you asked, how can I use the suffering?

That question is unnecessary because you are already here for a reason. Without the suffering, you would not be here asking this question. And the fact that you are here means there is awareness arising in you.

So suffering has already fulfilled its purpose in you. You don't have to, there's nothing additional that you have to do. It is happening organically.

So that's one thing. So it's good to acknowledge that you have already come a long way. How do I know that?

You are here. And you've had a very difficult past, a difficult karma, perhaps one could say. And there's been a lot of suffering.

And now the next part of the question, or the other question is the, why do we need to suffer? And can we go beyond suffering? Perhaps that was part of your question too.

So interesting if you look at two of the big religions of the world, in one of them, the central image of that religion, the absolutely central image, is a man who is being tortured and killed unfairly. And he is nailed to a cross. That is the central image of Christianity.

Now, some people would say that is just awful. So how can people, some people have negative associations with church Christianity and say it's a terrible thing. Well, it depends how you look at it.

There's also deep wisdom embedded in that because it is the archetypal human, archetypal means stands for all humans, the archetypal human, the significance of suffering in the evolution of humanity, because that man on the cross also, he dies and is reborn, as the story goes. So if he didn't, if he hadn't died on the cross, he would not have been reborn. Buddha has it in more conceptual terms.

Buddha describes his own teaching in the following words, I teach suffering and the end of suffering. That's a literal quote from the Buddha. A lot of Buddhist texts were actually written at a much later time.

It doesn't matter. But there are some utterances that I feel, I don't think, that I feel are actually true utterances of the Buddha. And this is one of them.

I teach suffering, which means I show you how suffering arises in your mind. I teach suffering and the end of suffering, and I show you how suffering can come to an end. So in the Christian image, you have the crucifixion and the resurrection.

So you have suffering and the end of suffering. In Buddhism also, Buddha says it is inevitable that you will find suffering until you awaken out of identification with form, identification with the psychological form of you, which the Buddha calls the self. If you don't recognize that who you think you are is ultimately an illusion, the self, the mind made self, you suffer as long as that happens.

When you recognize it as an illusion, you transcend suffering. That's the end of suffering. The evolution for humanity and for every human being is to suffer and then reach the end of suffering.

And the end of suffering is the awakening. So the power behind that makes awakening possible is suffering, until you reach the point where you realize that you don't need it anymore. You need it until you reach this point, the brink of awakening, that you don't need to suffer anymore.

Now the suffering is the encounter of extreme disruption in your life, extreme limitation in your life, the infliction of violence on your body and on your mind. All those things are extreme forms of limitation and disruption. Some children are born already into a terrible environment where the, I don't know whether that is also your case, but where the parents are very unconscious and they cannot help but perpetuate their unconsciousness and inflict it on their children also, and so on.

So some are born already into that and others encounter suffering at a somewhat later stage when suddenly they're confronted with accident, illness, serious loss in their lives, approaching death or the death of people close to you, suddenly ending up with nothing anymore, you're nobody, you're put into prison, whatever it may be. In other words, your life becomes very painful. Who you are as a form identity, as the self, becomes unbearable.

So I, for example, I've seen people, spoken to people who have awakened in prison cells after years in prison, very dreadful conditions. And you could say, of course, they're suffering there because there's extreme limitation and unpleasantness and dreadful possibility of violence every day. And suddenly something in them happened, which one could describe as they couldn't stand it anymore.

And there was no solution on the outer level. In prison, not much you can do. Well, you can try to escape, but you may not succeed.

So there's no solution on the outer level, your external situation. The only possibility is transcendence. And transcendence is achieved through surrender.

Surrender means everything that resisted the conditions of your life drops away. Everything that has resisted any situation, especially the present moment in your life, it drops away. So you're forced into presence by suffering.

It's happened to some people without any help of spiritual teachings or books. Some people did it organically. And suddenly they find deep inner peace in the same situation, because they're not complaining anymore on any level, neither mental nor emotional.

There's a deep surrender that's expressed in Christianity, when Jesus was supposed to have said, not my will, but thy will be done. And also the gesture on the cross is one of surrender too. I have a cross.

I bought a little image of it. We were in Assisi, which is in Italy, where St. Francis lived, after whom, by the way, a big city in the United States is named. Not everybody knows that San Francisco is based on St. Francis, but named after St. Francis. There's a cross that somebody painted of Jesus, even on the cross, very old. And this cross is supposed to have spoken to St. Francis. And anyway, long story short, there you have a Jesus who is not suffering anymore.

He's still on the cross, but he's totally at peace. He's not in agony. It's just complete surrender.

He's not smiling, but he's not in agony at all. And he's like voluntarily, virtually. It doesn't even look as if he's nailed to it anymore.

It's just voluntarily, just in that, just is there. I love that cross. He has already transcended, even on the cross, already transcended.

These are deep wisdom teachings, not conveyed through words or concepts, but conveyed in a different way through images and so on. So it's not only human beings. There's a radical life for every life form is precarious.

And there is suffering. Every life form experiences suffering. And some of them, every animal will experience suffering.

Of course, then the less consciousness there is, the less the suffering actually experienced, like a tree in certain conditions probably also suffers, but not as consciously. The more conscious you are, the more acute the suffering becomes. And the humans are those who suffer the most, I could say.

Without obstacles in your life, without hindrances, without limitations, you would not evolve as a human being at all. It's the limitation. And on every level, I sometimes give an example, even on a physical level, what do you do if you want your body to get stronger?

What do you do? Well, you do, you have to exercise, you have to weight lift, you whatever you do, you go jogging, whatever you do. Now, I put it differently.

What are you really doing when you're doing that? Now, I'm putting this in slightly peculiar terms. In order to make your body stronger, you have to make life difficult for your body.

Because lifting a heavy weight, you're not making life easier for your body. Your body would probably rather lie on a sofa and be a couch potato. You have to lift the weight, or you're jogging.

Oh my god. I mean, you're making demands on your body. Life gets very difficult for your body.

And at some point, now when things get difficult, there is a demand for more energy, on whatever level. Ultimately, it's all consciousness in different vibrational frequencies. On the physical level, making your life difficult for the body is a demand for more energy.

Because for the body to cope with these difficulties, more energy is called for, and the body calls for more energy. And then at some point, as you exercise, there is an influx of renewed energy. And at that point, it's not difficult anymore, the body actually enjoys this influx of energy.

And suddenly, you enjoy the running, or the jogging, or the weightlifting. Because if life had not become difficult for the body, the influx of energy would not have happened. Similarly, in a good work of literature, a novel, or even in a good movie, something needs to go wrong for the characters in order for the movie to exist.

Because otherwise, nobody is interested. If the character is not confronted with any problems, nobody would want to watch that movie. I mean, imagine a beautiful cruise from Southampton to New York, where nothing goes wrong, but everybody's having a wonderful time on this big ship called the Titanic.

That movie would never have happened. It would not be very interesting. Watch two and a half hours of people cruising on the Titanic from England to New York.

Every character needs to be confronted with limitation, challenges, and difficulties. The character, or the main character, that is the beginning of the plot of the movie. It has to start with something going wrong.

If nothing goes wrong, there's no evolution, there's no development, nothing. In a good movie, as the character is confronted with problems, he or she eventually begins to change. Sometimes the character is very dysfunctional or has a huge ego.

And then things happen to him or her. And then life gets more and more difficult. And then the character has to generate energies of whatever level in order to overcome or transcend the difficulties, the limitations that arise.

And that becomes the movie. And then at the end of the movie, or the novel, the character has changed, has deepened through the suffering, is no longer dominated by ego, has had deep insights into life. And this is how literature and good movies can also help the viewer or the reader to participate, to some extent, in the transformation of the character.

Because to some extent, when you read a really good novel, or you see a good movie or theater, to some extent, you will identify with the character. And if the character goes through a shift, first the character suffers. Often the character suffers because of his or her dysfunctional conditioning.

The character creates his own suffering. And then if you have identified with the character, you can participate a little bit in the shift in consciousness that's happening to the character. And that is the transformative power of great literature, because it gives you a deepened insight into the human condition and the possibilities of the human condition.

And so, wherever you look, if a gardener plants a, whatever it may be, a bulb of a flower in the soil, quite often the gardener puts extra soil on top to make it more difficult when the bulb sprouts, to make it more difficult to push through the soil for the stalk to come up. Another example, if you plant a plant in a greenhouse, where conditions are perfect, it will grow very quickly. And then you take it outside, it'll die very easily, because it hasn't developed the necessary resistance.

It doesn't have the necessary energy, which could only have come with experiencing limitation and difficulty. And then even the tree and the plant will then demand more energy, not consciously, but there is a certain consciousness embedded in every plant. All life forms are manifestations in different degrees of the one consciousness.

So, every life form experiences, even being born is the first difficulty, so precarious. I mean, every animal that's being born, every human being born, in the past, childbirth was the most common form of death, was death of the baby or the mother giving birth to the baby. Everything is precarious, and the evolution is dependent on challenges, which for quite a while I experienced as suffering, until the breakthrough happens, and then the suffering has fulfilled its purpose.

And then, yes, you continue to evolve, but you are a conscious participant in the evolution now, as you are, because you are here. You know that you can evolve without needing more suffering. You will get challenges, of course, there's no end to challenges, but there's no longer a need to transform the challenges into suffering.

That is the difference. So, obviously, it's already working in your case, as I said, because you're here. So, the transcendence is already happening.

And be grateful, maybe, I don't know whether you've already reached that point, but you will if you haven't reached it yet, where you can be grateful for your suffering retrospectively, as I am for my suffering. Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (19:32 - 20:07)

Yeah, I got a question, maybe a kind of a non-typical question. So, let me read it to you. Can you compare the awakenings between, one, the awakening you attained through grace, and two, our no-mind awakening that we get when we do your awakening practices?

And will our practices in attaining the no-mind state lead some of us to the level of your realization?

[Speaker 1] (20:09 - 20:16)

So, can you read again the last couple of sentences?

[Speaker 2] (20:17 - 21:54)

Sure. Basically, it's, can you compare the awakening that you got, which you've said a few times, as a result of grace, which comes out of no activity of your own in attaining this state, and compare that with the kinds of experience that we're experiencing when we're in this state of no-mind, and feeling this state of, as you say, non-manifestation, things of that nature. And the second part is, basically, it's down to, if we're practicing the exercise that you are giving us, and Adyashanti, or Gangaji, or Muji, or all these other guys, is that going to lead us or give us a higher probability that we will attend the fundamental shift in consciousness that has occurred in you, as opposed to the kind of thing that we're all experiencing?

I get the impression, for example, that a switch went on in the enlightened people who continue to remain enlightened, and we're like a dimmer switch, and you're like a ten, and we're like a dimmer switch on like one. And I was wondering, is there any chance that anything we can do can get us to move over into being deeply realized, continuously, like the awakened people that I've studied with and know about?

[Speaker 1] (21:55 - 28:13)

Thank you. Thank you. It's fine.

Yes. Well, the best advice I can give you, although you may not find it very satisfying when I say it, is not to look for some state to be achieved, but to be focused on the present moment. The great hindrance for spiritual seekers, especially, is wanting to achieve some state that is described as awakened, enlightened, whatever it may be, that they might have seen in teachers, wanting to also achieve that state.

Remember how the Buddha achieved, so to speak, his enlightenment. First of all, as I'm sure you know, for several years, he practiced very hard, all kinds of difficult spiritual practices, including extreme forms of fasting and so on. And after several years of practicing, he realized, I'm still not there, because he wanted to find Amara, the deathless realm.

He wanted to get there. And then he gave up. He said, that's it.

Then he already had disciples at that point. And the story goes that the disciples thought, okay, he's lost it. They left him.

And the Buddha, the significant moment is, then the Buddha sat down under a tree. And in that sitting down under a tree, he was no longer looking for anything or any state whatsoever. All movements to the future had come to cessation.

There was no longer movement into any image, needing or wanting to achieve anything. The sitting by the tree symbolizes total surrender to the present moment and complete, virtually, the complete collapse of psychological future, not wanting anything anymore. The wanting, the wanting is an important subject in Buddhism.

He said, letting go of desires, which, of course, desire, another word for desire is wanting. And for some spiritual seekers, as for the Buddha, the Buddha gave up all desires, but one big desire remains, the desire for enlightenment. So, and that was his desire for enlightenment was the greatest obstacle for him.

But he didn't know that until he became so frustrated and experienced suffering through his spiritual practice. But more so, the suffering that he experienced was the non-fulfillment of that desire. Because the desire for awakening, all other desires that human have become that one desire.

And that was the greatest obstacle to his realization. And when he dropped that, that was it. The realization of being happened when he let go of any idea of becoming, becoming anything.

So, thoughts of becoming, when these thoughts are surrendered, then the realization of being is here already. And this is why some teachers, as you probably know, I personally don't put it like that. But, well, maybe I do sometimes.

Some teachers have said, you're already enlightened, you just don't know it. Now, for many people, that doesn't make sense, because they know full well, they're not enlightened. They say, well, how can this be true?

Of course, the unconditioned consciousness that you are, is already there in every human being, it is covered up by mind movement. So, the being, on the level of being, you are already complete. There's nothing to be added or to be realized, you're already complete.

On the level of becoming, which operates on this horizontal plane of time, on the level of becoming, there's a lot that you can still achieve. You can learn things, you can have new experiences, you can acquire things, and all kinds of things can, on the level of becoming, that's fine. That level is here in the horizontal dimension.

But the mistake that people make is that what they used to deal with the horizontal dimension, they apply to the being dimension, where it's no longer helpful. In fact, it's the greatest hindrance. The idea of becoming is the greatest hindrance in realization and awakening.

So, when that is dropped, you are already who you are, timelessly, and then you realize, ah, and there was nowhere to go. There was nothing. I didn't have to become anything.

This is why it's called the realization of being. It's not the realization of becoming. And so, that is the simple answer, and I believe that you understand that.

It makes sense. So, all that is needed is that it's not even a doing. It's just the letting go, just letting go of the becoming, the stream of becoming, and that's it.

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (28:14 - 28:44)

Hello. Thank you. I wanted to ask you about the experience of being in a marriage or in a relationship with someone who is in a different spiritual place than yourself.

I'm really struggling, and sometimes I feel like I entered a nightmare that's not mine, and it feels like a trap, and I feel trapped, too.

[Speaker 1] (28:46 - 34:30)

Yes. So, again, we could describe this as a form of extreme limitation in your life. Your life is kind of being limited by this.

I assume you live with someone who is perhaps ego-controlled. Yes. So, limitations, there's two ways you can go when you encounter a limitation of that kind, something that limits your life.

You can overcome it by taking action, and if action is possible, then you take action to change the situation or to remove yourself from it. If it becomes unbearable, it's the possibility of removing yourself, you remove yourself from it. If you're in a situation, if you, let's say, not necessarily in your case, if you repeatedly find yourself in a situation, this is just a general remark, it probably doesn't apply to you, there are quite a few people who move from one unsatisfying relationship to another.

They always think after a while you live with a person, okay, that was the wrong woman again, that was the wrong man again, I did it again, why do I always choose the wrong, and then this thing repeats itself, and repeats itself. And then to take action in order to overcome, just by removing yourself is no longer the best strategy, because obviously, there's something within you that recreates the same situation again and again. And then you need to look at yourself and see whether there are certain patterns in your mental-emotional field that draw you to certain people.

This isn't, I'm saying this in general terms, because it applies to so many people, but this may not be applied to you, in this particular case. If something becomes unbearable, almost, yes, removing yourself, you cannot change another person who is ego-dominated just by trying to change him, that doesn't work, as you may know, you can remove yourself, and then accept the consequences. The same would apply to a job that you cannot stand, you're in a job situation that makes you unhappy every day, and simply for the security to remain in that job situation is not helpful, it's an egoic desire not to face uncertainty, you're condemned to be unhappy for the sake of security, whether it's a job, if for some people it's marriage, you can overcome by taking action, which often means removing yourself, or another way is you can transcend a situation where you give up your inner resistance, in certain situations are better dealt with by overcoming, which is taking action, which might mean removing yourself, or if the situation can be changed, you do something, some situations are better dealt with in that way, other situations are better dealt with through total acceptance of the surrender to the present moment, then internally you are free of the situation, this is particularly helpful in situations where there are reasons why you cannot remove yourself, or you cannot take action to change it, some situations are like that. Some people feel, there are many people who feel trapped in a marriage, and again, you cannot continue, you're not taking responsibility for your life, if you remain in a situation that continues to make you unhappy, that is like a weight that you carry every day in your life, either you overcome it by removing yourself or changing the situation, or if that is for some reason not possible, and I'm not saying that fear of uncertainty is not a good reason for not taking action, but there may be other reasons why something is not possible, and then you simply practice surrender, you then internally transcend the situation, and you find deep inner peace even in a situation that does not look ideal in any way, that still has a lot of limitation. I don't want to ask too many personal questions, because you may not want to, I don't know if you want to talk about it, for how long have you been in this, maybe I can ask that, for how long have you been in this situation? In this situation, maybe about a year, right, you didn't start this way, and you are living together with someone, I'm married, right, and are you uncertain whether you want to carry on in that marriage, or how do you feel about this for you?

[Speaker 3] (34:32 - 35:00)

I don't know about the future, the near future, I think yes, and if in the further away future this won't work, I kind of don't want to try again, I don't believe there will be someone really suitable for me, and if there isn't, I just don't want to do this again.

[Speaker 1] (35:01 - 39:31)

Yes, well, I cannot give you specific advice, I never tell anybody what to do, except on an inner level, but what the right course of action is, must arise from within you, I just pointed out the possibilities, be careful with tolerating a situation that is continuously making you unhappy, either you transcend it, which means the same situation no longer makes you unhappy, because you have totally surrendered continuously to the present moment, or you take action to remove yourself or change the situation, whether it's a marriage, or a job situation, or any place where people live together, you have to choose between the two possibilities, because otherwise you perpetuate your unhappiness, and your pain body will grow, it does not help you towards awakening, so at some point, sooner better than later, you have to decide between the two courses of action, or transcendence, if you want to call it action, overcome the situation by doing something about it, or removing yourself, which is doing, or total surrender of including the limitations and dysfunctions of the other person, no longer any demands that this person should behave differently, if that is possible, it may not be possible for you to surrender to that, certainly if physical violence is involved, I believe it is not, would not be a good thing to surrender, but otherwise become still, become aware, take responsibility for your life, see which course of action is the one that you choose, overcoming through taking positive action, or transcending through surrender, those are the two choices, this is the only advice I can give you, and it is my wish and hope that you will be able to have the strength, sufficient awareness, to take the correct action, once you've done it, if surrendered, you could practice surrender, maybe say, okay, I'm going to surrender for the next three months, and not complain about anything, see if I can totally accept this other, totally accept, maybe you can't, you may have to find out whether you can surrender for a certain period of time, and then you see, no, I can't, then you remove yourself, this dilemma is not uncommon, there are millions of people who are trapped in this similar dilemma, so that's what's my advice, life is difficult, let's see, life is difficult for everyone, and it's erroneous to demand that it shouldn't be difficult, and as it says at the beginning of that book, I think it's called The Road Less Travelled, a kind of classic, the first sentence, one of the best sentences in any book, life is difficult, but if you completely accept that life is difficult, it's no longer difficult, this is the one book that I never never read, because the first three lines were so good, I don't need to read the rest of that book, this is so good, thank you, thank you, thank you everybody, thank you so much for being here with us and with yourself, I wish you well, be present, be at peace, be here now, there's only this moment, the moment of stillness, thank you, thank you, thank you.

[Speaker 5] (39:33 - 39:52)

Eckhart Tolle Surrendering the Ego [d545ad1c-1367-4844-92b0-08c5a23f7183]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:36)

Surrendering the ego. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions from a live audience. He addresses topics like surrendering the ego, what to do with anger and how to confront our fears.

Eckhart says fear arises when we become drawn into negative thinking and project it into the future. He goes on to say that most of the time fear has no basis in reality because when the future finally arrives, it's actually the present moment again. And in the present moment, there is usually nothing to fear.

[Speaker 4] (0:43 - 1:05)

Eckhart, my question is around surrender. I'm curious. Once the egoic shell has, has cracked open and the light of consciousness is peeking through, can the ego surrender itself to that light of consciousness or ultimately must it be surrendered?

[Speaker 1] (1:06 - 2:37)

I often talk of the ego as if it were an entity. It's not really an entity. It acts as if it were an entity.

It seems to be an entity that has taken possession of you. But ultimately what it is, it's only a particular way of your mind to function, an identification with the mind. So the ego itself is that dysfunctional way in which the mind works.

And when that comes to an end, the dysfunctional way cannot put an end to its own dysfunction. It can only dissolve when awareness arises. Awareness is not thought.

Awareness is consciousness prior to thought. And you realize that you are that. And whatever the mind produces and says are thoughts.

But the thoughts are then no longer endowed with a sense of self. And that's the end of the ego. When you no longer identify with every thought that comes, that's the end of the ego.

So that's what happens. So I don't know in the way you formulate the question, the ego cannot dissolve itself, but in the light of awareness, it dissolves.

[Speaker 4] (2:37 - 2:39)

Then what is that willingness?

[Speaker 1] (2:40 - 2:41)

That willingness?

[Speaker 4] (2:41 - 2:43)

To allow it to be seen?

[Speaker 1] (2:43 - 5:17)

That willingness is the evolutionary impulse of the universe, which created the ego in the first place in order to transcend it now. It was an evolutionary step for mankind. The ego was an enormous step for mankind, a great thing.

And then it came, or is coming now, to the end of its lifespan. That particular evolutionary movement or manifestation that we call ego, it had a lifespan. It has outlived its usefulness now.

We have learned a lot through it. And now it needs to go. And that's always a critical stage.

The transition from one state of consciousness to another is always critical. There could be a falling back. We're at this transitional stage where the ego now needs to dissolve.

The caterpillar has come to the end of its useful life as a caterpillar. It's been fine. The caterpillar was happy for a while, crawling up the tree and eating the leaves.

Now there are no leaves left on the tree. And it's time for the caterpillar to cease being a caterpillar and turn into something incredible. That little slimy thing, suddenly it doesn't know what's happening to it.

The caterpillar doesn't say, I must become a butterfly, or I'm trying to become a butterfly. But the caterpillar suddenly notices that crawling is becoming more and more difficult. And it's looking for leaves.

It's eaten all the leaves of the tree, so there's nothing else to eat anyway. If it doesn't change now into a butterfly, it'll die. So that's what's happening to humans.

The shift to a different evolutionary level or dimension. Us being here, that's all part of it. It's part of the shift.

The butterfly is emerging right here. The caterpillar is not totally gone yet. It's the transitional period.

Even you can notice in every one of you, sometimes you're still a caterpillar. And at other times, you're already a butterfly. Present, aware, non-reactive, aligned with the present moment.

Thanks.

[Speaker 2] (5:23 - 6:18)

Hi, Eckhart. Thanks very much for having me. When my pain body becomes activated, how do I lessen its grip on me?

It seems that when it is activated, I can be aware of it, maybe not continuously, but at least intermittently. And I can watch it act out. But despite this awareness, I continue to feel agitated and almost controlled by it, or at its mercy anyway, for several hours, often in the middle of the night, when my awareness would rather be sleeping.

So I often think about your description, about your observation about when ducks fight, and how they are able to flap their wings after the fight is over, and release all this negative energy, and then they're able to float along peacefully. So I guess my question is, how do I, metaphorically speaking, flap my wings?

[Speaker 1] (6:20 - 6:22)

What is it that usually triggers it?

[Speaker 2] (6:23 - 6:36)

I don't know that there's a usual thing. You know, it could be something minor that happened at work, and it's in the middle of the night, and I'm thinking, you know, oh, if I had done this differently, or here's what I would say, you know, and things are going over in my head.

[Speaker 1] (6:37 - 6:42)

And so there's... So what triggers it is certain thoughts in your head.

[Speaker 2] (6:42 - 6:50)

Yeah, absolutely. And I'm aware of it at the time, you know, when I'm aware, geez, these are just thoughts, you know, why can't I just turn this off? But it doesn't seem to happen.

[Speaker 1] (6:51 - 7:03)

So sometimes the emotional pain-body reaction comes when you think about something that happened the previous day, and not necessarily in the moment when it happened. It happened when you started thinking about it.

[Speaker 2] (7:03 - 7:03)

Correct.

[Speaker 1] (7:04 - 13:36)

Yeah. It's important to observe the relationship or the link between thought processes and emotion, and it's important to cut the link between emotions and thoughts. Otherwise, the thoughts are what keeps the emotions alive and feeds.

In fact, the pain-body feeds on certain types of thinking, because thought is energy. And if you're not observant enough, you don't realize that by feeding the pain-body with your thoughts, you amplify it, and you keep it going in that way. That doesn't happen to the duck, because the duck has not arrived yet at the level of thinking.

There's consciousness there, of course, but the duck does not think to itself, what this other duck did to me a few hours ago. It was so terrible. When that happens again, what am I going to do?

And then relive the situation in the mind and feel the emotion even more. You're really in the grip of the pain-body when the pain-body is totally linked into your thought processes. And when you're thinking through the pain-body, all your thoughts are then determined by the emotion, which could be fear, it could be anger.

And so your thinking becomes totally contaminated by the old emotion inside you. And that means whatever you're thinking about, whatever situation you're thinking about, whatever person you're thinking about, whether it's yourself or somebody else, is going to be total distortion of reality, because your thoughts will be controlled by the pain-body. So you're looking at the world and at yourself and at other people through the emotion.

And so you're thinking, and then sometimes you can either listen to yourself in the mind, or you can listen, it's easier to listen to somebody else who is in the grip of the pain-body talking about how they perceive the world at that moment. And you can see then how deluded they are. But they don't know that.

They think that's the only way of seeing it. And that is absolutely correct the way I judge this person or the way I judge the situation. There is no other way.

That's how it is. He betrayed me. He deceived.

He did that to me. There's no separation then from emotion and thought. So to see how it arises, and if you can catch it at an early stage when the thought comes, and if you feel the corresponding emotion arise, you can then see, ah, I just did it.

I just woke up the pain-body. And then there's an awareness there. At that moment, perhaps the emotion is already there and will linger for a while.

But if you don't continue to think about it, but continue to be the awareness, then it will subside more quickly. And then you're not in the grip of it. You cannot perhaps immediately get rid of the emotion, nor is it necessary.

But you can be, in fact, allow it to be there as it is, is actually quite powerful rather than feeling I shouldn't be feeling it. Because in the spaciousness, it can actually dissolve when you allow it, not resisting it. But being careful that it does not link into your mind, and then feed on your thoughts.

And then you have the vicious circle, emotion generating thought, thought amplifying the emotion, emotion generating more thought, and so on. So it requires alertness. So if it's particularly at night when you experience that, then when you wake up in the middle of the night and the process begins, then you have to be alert at that time.

I also recommend when you wake up in the middle of the night to immediately go into the feeling of the inner body so that your attention moves away from the mind into the energy field of the body and feel the aliveness within the inner body as you lie there at night. And that is actually becomes part of being present. You're present with your entire being there.

And you feel that, that presence inside you and the need to think then lessens. If you are not able to do that, then be careful to catch the first thought and see how it generates the emotion. It's also possible that the emotion has been lingering there has not perhaps been able to come out during the day, and it's waiting now to feed on your mind.

So it's been waiting there. And it uses then that moment when perhaps you're still a little bit sleepy and just waking up to creep into your mind. Alertness is required.

It's not the emotion that you need to get rid of. It's the link between the emotion and your thought processes. If you can cut that, but you can only cut that by being aware, by being alert.

And the stronger the emotion is, the more alert you need to be. So you require what I sometimes call the sword of presence so that you cut the link between the emotion and thinking. You pull the sword and you become the warrior.

So the duck is fine, it just doesn't think. So it's easy to go like that. And if you have observed ducks, how when they return after the fight, flap their wings, and there's not a trace left of the, if you can even call it emotion, the energy of the fight that was there, the agitation that was there.

And then you go, flap their wings and go. Nothing, it's all just gone. But humans can't do that except perhaps the Zen master, but the Zen master didn't have the emotion in the first place.

So.

[Speaker 2] (13:38 - 13:39)

Thank you.

[Speaker 5] (13:45 - 14:02)

So my question is fear. What is fear? It seems like there's many forms of fear.

I woke up this morning, I had fear to get up and ask this question. There's fear of not getting your teachings directly, absolutely, you know, clear as day. So if you could just talk about fear, what is it?

[Speaker 1] (14:02 - 19:36)

If you direct attention inside yourself in the moment of experiencing fear, you can find out the answer for yourself. However, I will continue to speak. Thank you.

Just to give you a little bit of direction in that process of finding the answer for yourself, because only that's the true answer. It has to be there in your experience. With a certain alertness when fear arises, you say, oh, how did that come?

What was the process leading to it? And inevitably you find, I'm sure you will find, certain thought processes about not what's happening now, but what might happen in some future moment, as this did this morning when it arose. And at this very moment, if you do not leave this moment mentally in your mind and think, am I going to get it, what he says?

Am I really going to get it? Or if you think, what clever thing can I say next? Then more fear may arise.

But in this moment, as you stand here, look at me, there's nothing to fear, is there? Where's the fear now? The fear is only before it happens.

But before it happens, so it's the fear of the future. It's not the fear of the present. Now, since the future doesn't actually exist, only the present exists, it's the fear of nothing.

It has no basis in reality, because when the future comes, it's the present again, there is only the present. And in the present moment, there is nothing to fear. So the fear arises when you become drawn into certain thoughts in your mind, you identify with the thoughts, and then you project yourself mentally away from the now.

And that's the origin of fear. I'm talking about psychological fear. There is something else that is sometimes called fear that happens when there is true and immediate real danger.

So if there's true and immediate real danger, a wild animal suddenly appearing here, or if I point a gun at you, you may, I won't, you may experience, there's a contraction happens, or your heart starts beating fast. Something is going to happen, so you may have to remove yourself, or you may have to fight, whatever. That is not really fear, it's the instinctive response of the organism, because some action may or will be required.

And so you may run away. So your heart, the energy is already building up. And that is also called fear, but that is not the fear that we are talking about.

And it's fairly rare that you're actually faced with actual situations where this kind of fear would arise. So 99.9% of your fear is psychological fear, and that applies to virtually everybody. And for those people to whom that not, if they live in very dangerous place, please ask me another question and we'll address that, because there's also a spiritual teaching in that.

If you lived in a place where there's absolute chaos every day, wherever that happens to be on the planet at this time, if you lived in Afghanistan or Somalia, and you never know, am I going to reach the end of the day, or is some gunman going to burst in here, could happen at any moment. There's a wonderful teaching in there too, but we won't talk about that here, because that's not your reality. Your reality is psychological fear.

How do you then remove psychological fear? Well, you observe how it arises, and you observe where your mind is taking you all the time, and where you follow the mind with your attention. And once you notice that this is happening, and fear is arising, you can say, okay, what is the reality of the ways, what is there to fear in this moment, because that's all there is.

Then you stop following your thoughts, and you take attention into this moment, and you realize nothing. In other words, presence. You become present to this, more and more your life becomes present moment centered, rather than future centered.

You're a young person, so a young person's life tends to be more future centered, if you were 70 or 80 years old, you would probably be more past centered, but both are dysfunctional states. Thanks. Nothing personal in that.

It's a collective dysfunction.

[Speaker 5] (19:37 - 19:38)

Sure, I know, I see it.

[Speaker 1] (19:39 - 33:36)

So the shift in consciousness is your life becomes present moment centered, rather than past or future centered. And with that comes an enormous shift, that is the shift in consciousness, which means you can still deal with the future, the so-called future, preparing things, taking steps, making plans. Of course you do those things.

You can refer to the past, because sometimes you may need to remember things from the past. You can even learn from mistakes you made in the past. Oh, yesterday, the other day, I did that.

I'm not going to do that again, because it hurts when I do that. So that's good. But you don't live there anymore.

You don't live in the past, and you don't live in the future. And it would be amazing to see how many people live in past or future. They live there.

And it's insane, but it's normal. It's normal. Normal insanity is not recognized as insanity, because it's normal.

So your practice then is the focus of your attention increasingly on the present moment. What is the next step that I need to take now? Do you deal with this now?

Not tonight, not tomorrow, now. It doesn't mean you never think about future or past. No, of course you still sometimes do.

But you don't live there anymore. You live in the now. And so it's a reversal, because in the normal dysfunctional state, you live in past and future, and occasionally you visit the now.

And when occasionally you visit the now, suddenly you feel so good. You feel, oh, life is good. You feel joyful.

You feel intense sense of aliveness. You see beauty, even in little things. You can relate to another human being with loving kindness without wanting anything from him or her.

You can do an act of kindness and help another without any secondary thoughts of what you want to achieve by helping this person, which means you bring in future again. You experience the joy, for example, of helping not as a means to an end, but as an end in itself. And all that you experience, and people who usually live in past and future, many of them occasionally visit the present.

Otherwise they would be totally unhappy. Now they're only 90% unhappy. So occasionally they visit the present, and then that's when they feel particularly alive and particularly joyful, or they have a creative insight.

Why? Because for a moment, the mind stopped, and there was that openness. But this can be reversed from being an occasional visitor to the now and living in past and future.

You reverse it. You become an occasional visitor to past and future, but you live in the now. So that's the only way to become free of fear.

Now you may also occasionally experience fear rising. Normally it's associated with the thought process or triggered by a thought process. There can also be an accumulation of past fear in a human being, because if you have lived in fear over many years, then that energy field has built up inside you, and this would then be part of what I call the pain body inside you, the fear lives in you then as an emotional energy field.

So many pain bodies are made up to a large extent of fear. And sometimes when you look at certain humans who are possessed by their pain bodies, what you see when you look into their eyes is the fearful pain body. What does he want from me?

Why are you smiling at me? You want something. There are many countries where the collective pain body is very strong, and if you go to those countries and you smile at people in the street, they might even run away or call the police.

So this is a wonderful shift. Then you move from never feeling at home really, or very rarely feeling at home in this world, that means you live in past and future. And only if you inhabit the now, you actually begin to feel at home in where you are in the world.

There are many humans who wherever they go they feel there's something wrong here. Of course they're not at home within themselves. That's the practice.

And if fear arises from your pain body, well, it's not produced, perhaps it was triggered by one little thought about what might happen next week. But sometimes one little thought of what might happen next week can trigger an enormous influx of fear suddenly, out of proportion to the triggering thought. And that means it's the pain body.

And when that happens, you have to just be present with that and observe what it feels like as an energy field. If you don't observe it, in other words, you are the witnessing presence, it can take over your mind and make you think more fearful thoughts, because it loves that. That's all it knows.

So if you should experience accumulation of old fear triggered by certain thoughts, some people have panic attacks, that can be extreme manifestations of fear in the middle of the night. Okay, presence. It helps if you invite presence into your life when you're not invaded by fear.

So when the fear comes, the old fear, then there's enough presence power in you to be able to observe it. But if you don't invite presence into your life in neutral situations, then of course, there won't be enough presence when the fear comes, which is very challenging. So it's very simple, really be at home in the now.

And that means you connect to who you truly are beyond mind activity. Surrender to anger question. I'm an angry woman.

I expect too much from people and I'm always disappointed. Is there any help for me?

Well, the good news as I see it is that there is already some degree of awareness in you.

If there were not, you would be angry at me because I disappointed you in some way. Or whoever, somebody else, or the politicians, or whoever. So there is already a degree of awareness, you've discovered an habitual emotion in you, which is anger, and you have discovered a habitual mind pattern, which is that you expect too much from people, which always leads to the same result, which is disappointment.

Now all that needs to happen is for the awareness to grow, and then you will find that the anger diminishes. And this is probably already happening. The degree of old emotion that people carry varies from person to person.

With some people, the patterns that they carry are very deep and carry an enormous amount of energy behind them. And for those people, even as the awareness arises and they're already aware of the patterns, perhaps not as fast as they happen, but always just afterwards, after an episode. And the episodes, of course, are frequent.

And then at some point there's an awareness even as the pattern happens. And that's a good, it doesn't mean the awareness necessarily can stop the pattern, the old reactive pattern from arising, but it's there. And then it's there again and again, and then at some point the pattern is weaker, still arises, but is weaker.

But there are, as I said, in some humans, the patterns are very deep-seated. They have been there for generations, if you're in that level. Genetically, you can see perhaps the same pattern in your siblings.

You can perhaps see the same pattern in your parents and your grandparents. And if you look back further down the line, you could see the same patterns in a village in Italy or wherever your descendants came from, or London in 1500, or wherever. And you could trace it back a long, long way.

And it's been renewing itself, even perhaps adding to itself when there were upheavals like dreadful, the Thirty Years' War, the suffering of the Middle Ages, the World Wars, the atrocities, and perhaps there was some involvement with that. So some humans carry an enormous amount of heaviness inside them. And for those, even as the awareness is there, there can still be a considerable time lap before those things actually dissolve.

And the more heaviness you carry, also, the more intense the light of consciousness, or you could call it even the fire of consciousness, the more intense it needs to be to transmute, to burn up or transmute. It's probably a better way of looking at it. It doesn't get destroyed.

This is just stuck energy to transmute those patterns. So if the patterns in you are relatively light, just a little bit of presence coming into your life will make a substantial difference to your life. If your patterns are very heavy, it can take a little longer.

But also your motivation should be stronger because you will experience more suffering than others. So the motivation to awaken would also be stronger in those people who have a heavy, really what I'm talking about, a heavy pain body. So to this question, I would like to add then, is it possible for you, or perhaps has it already happened, that when you are expecting too much from people, as you put it, which is a mind pattern, have you been able to, as this pattern arises in the form of certain thoughts, have you been able to, or are you able to, from now on, to notice that the pattern operates again?

Or as anger arises in you again, so many years of anger, and that is again, are you able to be there as an observing presence, to sense it, to feel it, and there's, oh, there it is again. And the more you are, then the pattern does get weakened, and the awareness grows. And that's all there is to it.

So I would say perhaps you are more conscious than perhaps you yourself realize already of the unconsciousness in you, of the unconscious patterns in you. I'm an angry woman is the beginning of the question. You remember in AA, Alcoholics Anonymous, I believe the first thing people have to do is to admit that they are alcoholics, because as long as they deny it, the pattern will continue.

And so you're doing it, you're facing it. Now, don't make the mistake of believing that being an angry woman is part of your identity. And the same way I would tell the alcoholic not to believe that being an alcoholic is their identity.

It's fine at that point to say, I'm an alcoholic, there's a relative truth to that. There's also relative truth. When you say, I'm an angry woman, it is not the absolute truth.

It is nobody's identity to be an alcoholic. And it is nobody's identity to be an angry person. Those are patterns that operate in you.

But temporarily to say that can be helpful. It's relatively true. It's temporarily true.

It is not absolutely true. As long as you know that it's fine. So facing something that has been unconscious and make it bring it into the light of consciousness, it's wonderful just to see it.

It's an enormous gain to say, I'm an angry woman, from just being an angry woman, and perhaps even denying that you're an angry woman. I'm not angry. How dare you?

You are angry. Look at what you said yesterday. You always accuse others, don't you?

And you can't argue with pain bodies, you might have noticed, because whatever you say is wrong. It'll just fuel the pain body.

Eckhart Tolle The Bare Naked Is-ness of the Present Moment [264a9709-23c6-40af-8d4b-8622873a6066]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:00)

The bare naked isness of the present moment. In this episode, Eckhart laughs with his audience. He exclaims, there's hope for humanity when such a big crowd seeks greater consciousness.

He also explains that inspiration can quickly turn to perspiration when we encounter obstacles, especially with the people in our lives. He quotes existential philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre, who famously said, hell is other people. While Eckhart believes that is an ego-based perspective, many of us feel that life is full of experiences we shouldn't have.

We think something is wrong with us or that God has a grudge when misfortune strikes. Eckhart says the greatest part of unhappiness comes from our minds and the stories we tell ourselves. He says the answer to life struggles will never be found in our thinking.

He believes we find freedom when we release our inner baggage, unencumbered, to discover the bare naked isness of the present moment.

[Speaker 1] (1:03 - 35:31)

Wonderful welcome. Thank you so much. And a lovely energy field.

So many humans becoming present. Wonderful to see. There is hope for humanity after all.

It's easy to forget if you look on the internet. So you're all here. Almost all of you are going through a transformation of consciousness, one could say, to a greater or lesser degree, although you may not call it that.

Something has shifted in you or is in the process of shifting. And why we are here is to deepen that shift in consciousness and to anchor it more deeply within yourself so that the state of presence can be sustained in everyday life. And everyday life is, as you might have noticed, continuously challenging.

And the most challenging thing about everyday life, or one of the most challenging things, is other people. Because people are, you might have noticed, extremely challenging. These challenges that continuously appear in your life are often regarded as something that should not be happening.

These problems, why do problems crop up always? No matter where I move to or what I attain, sooner or later, and usually sooner, there's something that goes a little bit wrong. Something happens that's not supposed to happen.

And life is full of these events. And in many people, not you, there is an assumption that there is something wrong with life because life is not meant to be continuously challenging, to bring up, to pit obstacles in my path, so it seems quite often. And you say, well, what is wrong with life?

And some people take it personally. They say, what's wrong with my life? There's something very wrong with me.

Or they take it personally and say, there's some god or god who must dislike me, because I encounter one obstacle after another. So that is an underlying assumption in many people's mind. But that is delusional, because these challenges are meant to be there.

They are an essential part of being here for a little while in this dimension. And if it were not for the challenges of everyday life, big and small, there would be no awakening of consciousness. So through the pressure of challenges, we are being awakened.

And not only humans, every life form experiences life as precarious and fragile and often difficult. Many obstacles have to be overcome, not only for humans, but for all other life forms. Even a blade of grass has to overcome obstacle until it finally comes up out of the soil.

And every animal, every bird can see how alert birds are when you observe a bird. You could say the bird looks really present. And compared to many humans, not you, the bird is actually very present.

When you observe a bird, you see the bird goes like very present. But it's been like that for hundreds of thousands of million years. It has to be alert, because this alertness is there.

It has survived. This has been generated over thousands and hundreds of thousands of years. All the birds that were not alert, they disappeared.

They got eaten up. The survival of each individual bird is continuously precarious, and the bird has to be alert. So the bird is being forced into that state of alertness.

This is just one little example. And I know from my own life, and many of you know from your life, that you have gone through a certain amount of suffering in life. There were challenges, there were problems, you had to confront them.

Unhappiness arose. And at some point, something shifted in you. At some point, there was a deepening, there was an awakening.

And at some point, you realized that the greater part of, to use a generic term, suffering or unhappiness in your life, which unhappiness is huge in the human consciousness, a huge weight in human consciousness, the greater part of unhappiness actually arises through a dysfunctional use of your mind, and not so much the circumstances of your life. And that's an interesting realization, that the unhappiness that you experience, even if there are big challenges, small or big, the greater part of the unhappiness you experience arises through certain kinds of narrative in your mind, certain stories that you tell yourself about life, other people, or yourself. And that's an interesting realization, which you can verify at any time, tomorrow, if you haven't done it yet, any, the moment slightest irritation arises in a situation, anger arises, discomfort arises, ask yourself, what is causing this?

And the first answer will be, well, obviously, this rude person causes me to be irritated and angry, or this situation that I'm stuck in, the place where I live causes me to be irritated or angry, or a certain condition that my body is experiencing is causing me to be anxious or sad or angry that something has happened to me. And so there's always, the first thing is, you see the cause is there, there, there, that's the cause. And on the surface level, this is perfectly true, but that's only the surface level.

So tomorrow, when you encounter the first little thing that brings about perhaps a minor form of unhappiness in whatever form, be very alert, like the bird, and say, does it come from this situation? And let's say I'm stuck in the, I'm stuck at the airport, my flight's been canceled. This is a small, little situation, not a huge problem, but sometimes you might make it into a huge problem, the mind.

So you're there, you feel anxious, angry, irritated. Ultimately, you're suffering, it's a small form of suffering. Now, ask yourself, if I did not add any narrative to this situation that I'm finding myself in, how would I experience this situation?

Narrative meaning certain thoughts that go through your mind that refer to the situation. Now, if I did not add the, ultimately, since we are using an airport analogy or example, this narrative you could consider to be excess baggage that you carry around, and you carry it around in your life. You don't know it.

And that becomes the burden of me. It becomes a burden of self, a heavy sense of self. And you start discovering it in a little situation, like at the airport.

You start discovering already the burden of yourself. How would I experience this situation without the excess baggage of my narrative with which I judge the situation? Okay, you have plenty of time because your flight has been canceled, so you can experiment.

Say, okay, now I'm here. Now I am letting go of the narrative. Nothing has changed in the situation.

The external situation is still the same. On the board, it says, canceled. Or maybe you're standing, and there's a huge lineup, 100 people or more, which before, this was a terrible situation.

You're finding yourself absolutely dreadful. This airline is an awful, awful airline. That's all gone because now you're experimenting with experiencing the situation without the narrative.

So you remove the narrative. What remains then is the bare, naked is-ness of that moment. The is-ness, the simple is-ness of the present moment.

Nothing has changed externally, but you have put down or let go of the excess baggage in your mind. And what is it that you're now experiencing? You're experiencing your body standing there.

You experience your sense perceptions. You look around. You listen to whatever sounds may be there, whatever other sense perceptions may be there, and you realize that you're breathing.

Oh, that's interesting. I'm breathing. And then you say, okay, this isn't as bad as I thought it was.

Actually, without the narrative, I feel alive. I feel I'm breathing. I'm even beginning to feel a little bit of aliveness pervading my body in this moment.

I can feel that there's an aliveness in every cell of the body that pervades. I feel alive. I'm breathing.

And you don't even need to tell yourself that. You simply notice it. You notice whatever sense perception is here in the present moment.

And suddenly, you're experiencing the same situation as no longer something that causes you suffering, because you have removed the mental narrative, and you are simply facing the is-ness of this moment. And as you do that, that is a shift in consciousness. You have become present.

And the sense of self that actually thrived on complaining a lot begins to dissolve, or at least recede. This sense of self that, yes, let's admit it, this sense of self that loved complaining about situations, that loved and almost was addicted to complaining about all these people, other people, what they did, and then situations, and then politicians, and all these awful things, awful, just... And it complained about my life, my spouse, my boyfriend, my girlfriend.

The only thing it perhaps didn't complain about was my dog. So, when you become present, the narrative recedes. And instead of experiencing the present moment through the narrative in your mind, which is all conditioned by the past, these are thought structures, streams of thought that go through your head.

And when you are not present, you are in the grip of these conditioned streams of thought that go through your head. And a lot of the time, the thoughts are negative. They're more negative than positive.

It's a strange fact. When something so-called bad happens to you, a person is rude to you, or insults you, or doesn't acknowledge you, or something during a trip, something goes wrong, something bad, you think about for a long time. This is how the human mind does it.

Oh, well, he insulted me. Now I know what I should have answered when he said that. Why didn't I say that?

Next time, I'm going to say, and you continue to experience the emotion of that moment, and you replay it in your mind, that situation. And there's a continuous self-talk in it. There's the mental dialogue, monologue or dialogue.

Monologue is when you say, I, I, he, I. But for many people, it's a dialogue. They talk to themselves.

Why didn't you say that? Well, I couldn't think of it in the moment. So the mind splits itself in two, and then you have a discussion with yourself.

And one part accuses you, and the other part defends you. And you don't even know what's happening, because this entire thing that's happening in your mind is, at that moment, is your reality. And there is nothing beyond it in that moment.

It constitutes your, this is how you experience the world. This is how you experience life. And you don't even know.

This is what we call unconscious. You don't know that you're unconscious. Unconscious, when we use the term, we're not using it in a conventional sense, because in a conventional sense, when you say, I'm unconscious, it means you, I am, and you can't even say, I'm unconscious, because you're unconscious.

But in spiritual terms, when we use the term unconscious, it means something different. It doesn't mean that you've fallen off the chair. No, it means you're completely identified with this stream of thinking.

Any thought that arises, you're completely in its grasp. Whatever it is, the thought gets hold of you, it lives in, it arises, you've taken it on, perhaps probably in the past, some certain thoughts from the world around you, so you begin to think certain thoughts that reflect, to a large extent, the thoughts that other people think. They're not your thoughts, you just take them on from the world around you, so they live in you, and then they proliferate, they're like little entities, they're in your mind, and they go, and they're a bit like a virus.

A virus can infect your physical body, but a thought can very often have the same function as a virus on the physical level. It's a mental virus that can take over your mind, and very often it does. Amazing realization.

So you have all these thoughts, and yet there is a self-identification with thought, with the stream of thinking, which means you are not really there. There is a stream of thinking pretending to be you, so to speak. Interesting, very interesting fact.

So this is what in many spiritual traditions is called the illusion of the self, as the Buddha called it. One of the main points of the Buddha's teaching is the self that you think you are is ultimately a fiction. It's ultimately a fiction in your mind.

You live through a fiction in your mind, and this fiction in your mind is continuously sustained by this stream of unconscious thinking, thought activity. And it's not only the Buddha, it's many other spiritual traditions. And even Jesus said, deny thyself, deny thyself.

Those two words, or maybe a three, deny yourself. They're very profound, exactly the same. Why did he say deny thyself?

Because the self is real, and then you should deny it. The implication is you should recognize the self as ultimately not real, and by recognizing it as ultimately not real, it is denied. So you're not fighting it, you're not saying to your real self, go away, I don't want you anymore.

How do you deny? So when Jesus says, deny thyself, it means recognize the unreality of what you so far hitherto consider to be you, your identity, your sense of self. Realize that ultimately it is a mental fiction, and you live through it.

If you don't awaken spiritually, if there's no awakening, then for the rest of your life, you live identified with this mental fiction of yourself, and a lot of that is an unhappy self. Okay, well, you get breaks. You say, oh, life is good.

I just got a promotion. Oh, great. And then six months later, you're ill with stress because the job is so hard.

Or suddenly you say, oh, I feel so great because I've just had this drink, and my problems don't really matter that much anymore. And there's a longing in humans to be free of the burden of their sense of self, which for many humans, it's a very unhappy self. It is amazing the burden that many humans, millions still on this planet, they carry around with themselves without knowing that it is a mental fiction.

You, even some of you, may have remnants of this in your life. You may experience when you start thinking and talking about something that you call my life. My life.

Oh, my God. This is what it has come to. It wasn't meant to be like this.

Something happened on the way to F it all up. Something, I don't know what, but there can't be a God because otherwise he would have done something to help. I had imagined something much, much better when I was 18 and 19.

Oh, I imagined these just lovely things happening. Great marriage, job, all kinds of wonderful things. I was meant to be fulfilled.

Life was here to fulfill me. Why didn't it do that? And then you think about my life.

For some people, it's a very unhappy story. There's an enormous amount of regret, an enormous amount of resentment from past, an enormous amount of grievances, huge baggage they carry around in their mental, emotional field. There's guilt, regret, grievances.

Oh, and then this you take to be you. These are thoughts that go through your head. It's a story, the unhappy story of unhappy me.

Let me tell you about me. Surely it's worse than your story. I'm sure it's worse than your story.

And then the other ones, oh, no, you haven't listened to mine. And then, of course, not every sense of self is totally unhappy. Some are sporadically happy.

Occasionally you have periods of high. Great. Everything is going fine.

Everything is going fine. My health is fantastic. Strong and good looking body.

And get just a great relationship. Just going fantastic. Great job.

Oh, fantastic. Just made my first million dollars. Already thinking about a private jet.

Oh, I need a few more million before that can happen. Children are doing so well that they're all the best at school, at university. They're all great.

They're going to have a fantastic career. Friends, fantastic circle of friends and everything. Very rare.

And if one or two of you are happy to be in that particular life situation right now, I don't want to be negative, but it's not going to last very long. So, identity is the question. Who am I?

Am I that story of me? And the story of me is, of course, based on the past and it looks to the future for its fulfillment. So, it derives its identity from the past, the things that I have achieved or my failures or my successes or the things that people have done to me or the things that I have done to other people, the things that I have acquired, the things that I have lost.

Those things make up the story of me. And you remember it and that's my life. So, you call it my life.

But what you call my life is a story in your mind. And that's why most people who are not, those people who are not awakened at all to a deeper dimension of consciousness that we call presence, we could also call it awareness. There are other words.

Those who have not awakened to that are trapped in this delusional sense of self. And many humans spend the rest of their life in an increasingly, in many cases, increasingly unhappy sense of self, unless there are little openings into the transcendent dimension, which can sometimes happen through a serious illness that you contract. It can happen to approaching old age and you realize suddenly that at some point you're going to die.

And then the story becomes at first very unhappy or somebody close to you dies. Or you had identified with the, let's say you were lucky enough to have a great looking body, better than others. So, you could derive your mental sense of self identification with the thought form of my body is superior and better looking than most people's bodies.

So, that's a little story in your mind too. It's not ultimate. It's not the body.

It's the thought of my body. So, you had a great sense. And then you moved to Miami because here you can display your body more easily.

If life has given you the gift of a healthy, strong, beautiful body, enjoy this gift that life has given you. But if your sense of self is, for example, primarily, as in some people's cases is, is primarily derived from identification with this body image, then, of course, you're in for suffering in the future. Because a moment comes as years pass and they pass.

The more years in your life, the more quickly they pass. It's a strange fact. So, the years pass and then the years become decades and then two decades pass.

And then one day you stand in front of the mirror and something, you suddenly notice something has happened to my body. And then suffering arises because you had identified with something temporary, something ephemeral, something that ultimately is not you, but you had taken it to be you. And then you say, oh my God.

And then you buy a different mirror just in the hope that it wasn't you that got older, it was the mirror. But it wasn't the mirror, it was you. Then, of course, you can, if you can afford it, you can engage in certain repair mechanist jobs.

You can see if, okay, you can delay the aging process up to a point, but already suffering becomes part of that. And I know some people who were so strongly identified with their body as they grew older, they became very, very unhappy because their entire sense of self got eroded. Of course, humans not only derive their fictitious sense of self from this mental image of my body.

There are many, many ways in which the fictitious sense of self can proliferate, can grow in you. If it's not the body, it could be something that you put on the body. That's something that you wear.

Okay, then you have a new sense of, an additional sense of self. Your clothes, you merge mentally with your clothes. So you say, this is my designer outfit, and it looks great.

I'm not saying there's anything wrong with it. If it's something beautiful, you can enjoy it. We're talking about something else.

We're talking about deriving your sense of identity or part of your sense of identity from something external. So you have clothes and they can show how you... Now this sense of identity that we actually call ego, the fictitious sense of identity is the ego.

The ego lives in an almost continuous state of insufficiency. I'm not enough yet. There's something big still lacking in my life.

That's an underlying sentiment, an underlying feeling, an underlying thought. There's some... I haven't arrived yet.

There's something missing. There's something lacking. I'm not enough, but I'm looking.

I'm looking to acquire more, to be more, to become more, in order to develop a fully satisfying sense of self. But of course, on that level of existence, you can never achieve an ultimately and lastingly satisfying sense of self. But many humans don't know that, so they continue to search.

Now what the fictitious sense of self lives on and looks for continuously, what it needs, it compares itself. It needs to compare itself to others. And so as it compares itself to others, this fiction in your mind, it needs to find some area of superiority to others.

It needs to stand out more, to feel it is a bit more than the other, and that strengthens the sense of self. So it needs the idea, the thought of the other, to compare itself to, and then to feel that it is superior in some way to the other. And that's very interesting, that whatever the ego, the egoic sense of self wants to achieve, it defines itself through the other.

For example, wealth. Wealth is what many people look for, because, yes, it can give you, it can satisfy your sensory desire, it can satisfy your senses. If you are wealthy, you can eat whatever you like.

But these are secondary things. Yes, you can eat whatever you like. You can probably buy any sensory experience that you want.

You can probably fly to anywhere on the planet at any given moment to experience something new there. And there are wealthy people who do that. They continue to search for more fulfillment.

Let's look there. No, this isn't good enough. No, let's look there.

I knew somebody who said, whenever I feel a bit depressed, I fly to Paris and go to the best restaurant there, and it helps for a couple of days. And then it wears off. Oh, then you're again with the unhappy sense of self.

So the wealth is really there in order to feel I am more myself, more than the other. Imagine the world where everybody is equally wealthy. And then the entire term wealthy would disappear.

There wouldn't be anything. The word wealthy would not even exist. And you could not define your identity through being wealthy because everybody is equally wealthy.

So it means nothing anymore. So it would be totally meaningless to the ego.

Eckhart Tolle The Crack Is How The Light Gets In [c1acc120-f099-4682-86a6-17e707f876a8]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:01)

The crack is how the light gets in. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about suffering and how to transcend it. He says suffering is everyone's spiritual teacher because it drives us to a kind of willingness.

He believes it cracks open the hard shell of the ego, suddenly allowing the light to shine through. Eckhart mentions the legendary singer Leonard Cohen, who wrote a song about this universal experience. He sings, there's a crack, a crack in everything, that's how the light gets in.

Eckhart also uses the example of Buddha, who suffered by becoming obsessed with doing and attaining enlightenment. Eckhart explains how Buddha put himself through extreme practices and nearly died until one day he decided he'd suffered enough. This is the moment, Eckhart says, the Buddha's ego cracked open and fulfilling enlightenment poured in.

Eckhart says we all will suffer until we realize we don't need to anymore to grow spiritually.

[Speaker 1] (1:03 - 41:07)

I won't talk tonight about the general situation of the world. Maybe we'll talk about it one of these days. More importantly is your state of consciousness.

And so don't be afraid of being. And in fact acknowledge being. I believe the French philosopher Pascal, I believe it was Pascal, said all the ills or the troubles of humanity are derived from the inability to sit quietly in a room.

All the problems of humanity can be traced back to their inability to sit quietly in a room. So he's talking about the loss of the being dimension. And that explains all the turmoil in the world.

Disconnectedness from the transcendent. And so here then practice sitting quietly in a room too. But not by saying okay now I'm going to sit quietly for 15 minutes.

This is the trouble with sometimes people who meditate. I'm doing a meditation. Let's do a meditation and then immediately people go okay.

I'm doing it. Why are you doing it? I want to arrive at well enlightenment or at least some bit of peace.

Well ultimately you're doing a meditation for the realization of being. So you're doing something in order to realize the absence of doing. The true meditation is just is the realization of being.

And time does not help with that. However, now this is a little paradox. You may need time to finally arrive at the realization that you don't need time to awaken.

Some people need time. And finally after years they go oh I didn't need all that. That was what happened to the Buddha.

That was his life. He saw the unsatisfactoriness of human existence even as a young man. Although he was wealthy.

He saw the unsatisfactoriness. He saw that every human life is short. It ends in illness and death.

What's the point of it all? He said as a human. So he went out.

He had lots of spiritual teachers and all kinds of extreme spiritual practices for years. Practiced with many teachers. And the awakening didn't happen.

But he already had even had some disciples already. He hadn't quite awakened himself yet. And one day he said this is my simplification of the story of the Buddha.

One day he said I've had enough. And then he stopped all spiritual practices and he sat under a tree not seeking anything anymore. He had been seeking for years.

Doing them, doing the practices. And then all seeking came to an end. And his disciples when they saw him sit under a tree they left him and said oh he's lost it.

Yeah he did lose. But what he lost was good. He lost the doing.

The obsession with doing. And so under that tree the awakening happened. And so you could say well couldn't he have done that years before the very beginning?

Theoretically yes. But like many humans they need time to arrive at the realization that it is the time does not awaken you. But paradoxically you may need time to realize that.

And also related to that you may need suffering to realize that there is a suffering can be transcended. Suffering can end. I'm talking about psychological suffering.

The suffering entity. And you may need to suffer until you realize that suffering is no longer necessary for you. I've had many accounts of people they've told me that they were given the power of now as a gift from a relative or friend.

And they opened it and they read a page or half a page and they said what is this nonsense? And then they put it away and said why did you give me that book? It makes no sense at all they said to their friend or relative.

Oh and by the way as you might know that also when Time magazine reviewed The Power of Now the reviewer came to the same conclusion. I think the term was mumbo-jumbo. And strangely the magazine went downhill after that.

And now it's no longer in print. And so they put the book aside and then years later several people told me similar stories. Years later they put the book up again they opened it again and said wow suddenly it all made sense.

Now what happened in these intervening years? They suffered a lot. And so the suffering drove them to a point of readiness.

Suffering tends to crack open the hard egoic shell. And then the light suddenly shines through. Yes I thought it Leonard Cohen says there's a crack in everything that's how the light shines through.

A crack in everything whatever you do wherever you go this crack will appear somehow in a wider sense. Something goes wrong. So here you practice being and one of the very helpful practices here in order to avoid adding to the clutter of your mind and in fact letting go of the clutter is practice awareness of the simplicity of the present moment the sense perceptions of the present moment acknowledge the ism of all things give that give it attention and refrain as much as possible from labeling your sense perceptions. That is not impossible. Impossible.

It is of course a deep-seated habit to continuously have to label your sense perception what you're seeing. Oh look at that isn't that nice. Oh I would this was something I saw this last year my aunt had that.

Oh I wish I had that in my book. Where can you buy that? I wonder.

Oh isn't this interesting. I wonder what the tree is called. There's nothing wrong with finding the names of trees but don't lose yourself in that.

There is another way of being in the world that is non-conceptual that awakens the non-conceptual dimension the non-conceptual intelligence in you because there is a vast intelligence waiting to be awakened and I call it non-conceptual intelligence. It cannot be measured in IQ tests. So you might have a high IQ doesn't mean you're closer to awakening.

In fact if you're identified with all the knowledge then you're further away from awakening if you're identified with it. Practicing sense perception without labeling mentally and that's a beautiful and this is part of the beingness of the practice being. Sense perception is visual auditory the birds visual sky amazing things to see vegetation plants even feeling the breeze on your skin the warm air you sometimes the wind gets can we get quite strong here it's a first day I was came here there's a trade winds that sometimes blow across the ocean that can last for hours and days and it's a continuous and you can feel it on your skin it's not unpleasant and so you can feel that and breathe whatever sense there may be in the air all senses and experience that be there as the awareness for the sense perceptions and that is that awareness is the space so you are the space for whatever arises but knowingly right now here we can practice that we sit here aware of the room the totality of it look around ceiling there's a man sitting on the chair up here who is that the body okay quite pleasant but I'm already labeling it but it's you don't this don't need to label it just let it be so in this moment there are your sense perceptions mostly visual probably because and auditory because this is my voice sense perceptions and yes of course you might feel the weight of your body on the chair all that yes and what else is there that which enables the sense perceptions to be we could call that consciousness but that is the essence of you that is a deep eye so can you be aware of that deep eye at the same time as you perceive through your senses whatever is there so you have there are two dimensions here now one dimension is the world whatever it contains and you take that in through sensory perception and then you're aware of the awareness that makes sensory perception possible you can you feel that you are you can sense the I am and here things happen but in the depths of your being nothing is happening it's beyond any happening because there's no time there there's time here everywhere time is the thing that enables you to do everything that you do time does that and then it takes everything away time gives you all kinds of stuff and it makes you grow and they get stronger and then it starts eroding you and then in the end it kills you oh my god time is killing me some people I already realized that a long time ago that time is killing but the older one gets the more you realize that time is has engaged in killing you and that's scary if all that you know of yourself is the physical body and the personality then that's that's there's great fear that's all you know you've never gone any deeper so the timeless dimension present moment present moment is the portal into that dimension transcendent dimension now this is a beautiful practice sense perceptions without let go of labels when they arise just don't become too interested in the labels they are thoughts just let let go and then you are while you're here especially the practice is to be as present moment centered as possible otherwise your life is usually consists of your past the present moment and your future now for most people either future or past almost completely occupy their attention until you get old it's usually future when you reach a certain age and you realize if you don't have much future left then you become more interested in the past and you start thinking about it oh that was then there oh I remember that yeah but the present moment is rarely fully acknowledged it's always it's just a stepping stone to the next moment which is a future or you actively hate it that's not uncommon too there are people who who live in an antagonistic relationship with the present moment most of their lives and sometimes older some older people they get the cantankerous old man don't talk to me about that I know it all it's all rubbish nonsense so here you practice living in the two dimensions the deep eye and the surface eyes fine it has its place you acknowledge it but practice present moment living the future and the past obviously everybody knows that that they actually don't exist as such don't you know that well they don't exist present and past and future don't actually exist if anybody can prove to me that they exist then they must have experienced them future for example does it exist yes in my mind as a thought but nobody has ever tasted it touched it been there experienced in the future I'm a would be great explorer I'm going to find the future and when you find it it's the present moment and again the past when it happened it was the present moment and I'm thinking about it now which is the present moment so the past exists still as a thought but we don't need to go there it sounds like philosophy it's more simple all there ever is in your life I think everybody must admit be able to admit that all there ever is is the present moment that's that's how you experience life as the present moment and if you disregard that and reduce it to a means to an end or actively dislike it then your life is dysfunctional and extremely unconscious and you are trouble to yourself you create problems you create conflict continuously it's insane so the the acknowledgement of the the of the present moment is absolutely vital so it begins with acknowledging whatever arises in the present moment not internally resisting whatever arises in the present moment and that's another practice here as you let go of the habits of your personality they gradually recede subside and you no longer argue with the present moment because for many people there's a habit of discontent they're not rooted in being so they're discontent there's a always a discontent somewhere floating around and then they seek explanations for the underlying feeling of discontent easy to find explanations why you're why you're not happy in the external even here various obstacles can arise here to your the deepening of your consciousness one of the obstacle is the patterns of your mind that travel with you that are part of your personality they create a reactivity to things or to people but another obstacle is it's too nice here it's too pleasant how can you awaken in paradise nobody would awaken in paradise you're much more likely to awaken in hell but don't worry even here you will be challenged either by external events seen significant things but they'll bring up some kind of complaint i'm not talking about complaint when something needs to be rectified something can be done about it but the other kind of complaining so watch your mind observe patterns of reactivity and and useless complaining if they arise because complaining is an important part of many egos for many egos complaining is a very important part of their sustenance they thrive on it criticizing complaining finding fault here and there it's all part of the underlying discontent of something always a sense of something not something not being right something not right something is missing don't know what something missing sense of in not enough even this is not enough this wasn't what i was expecting i was expecting something else there are too many people here i was expecting something smaller no i i can't do it here it's just too many like this isn't right it's too touristy i don't like it here it's just the tourists around tourists um but according to the latest research tourists are actually human beings so if you come to a place of living aligned with the isness of the moment this is a beautiful spiritual practice until it becomes second nature being in alignment with the isness of now and that means also the thinking mind slows down the more you are aligned with the isness of now and you acknowledge the now and whatever arises in the now including and especially the small things in the present moment you begin to enjoy just walking from here to there a few steps conscious of taking one step at a time handling an object putting on your shoes or your sandals making a cup of tea you come to acknowledge the aliveness of everything even so-called inanimate objects because ultimately nothing is inanimate i want to go more deeply into that during this retreat all the ancient cultures ancient civilizations including the polynesian civilization here but going back everywhere they all had the primordial spirituality of all ancient cultures was what is called animism animism means not just the belief but the feeling or the sensing that everything in this world has a spirit is has a soul anima from a soul that internal soul animism underlies all ancient spirituality in everywhere the sensing that the world is intensely alive there is a hidden presence in all things not just alive things but also so-called inanimate things there is a hidden presence and that is we we can we are returning to that realization now at a deeper level sometimes in ancient civilizations interpreted as everything has a little spirit there's this little spirit here and a spirit there but of course this is it's deeper than that everything is a manifestation of consciousness it's all the consciousness is the intelligence that underlies the universe there is a vast intelligence that is the organizing principle behind the manifestation of all life forms there's a vast intelligence at work beyond sense perceptions the romans believed it polynesians believed it every the ancient europeans leave it in africa in everywhere in china in in daoism from all that the in in roman times every house they believed had a they had an energy field that they called this the spirit of the house and of course in china in japan you have feng shui a similar thing you are you still have survived from those times since there is an there's an energy field whereas for contemporary humans the advanced humans the world has become lifeless that started with scientific materialism in the 19th century the world has become it's not really perceived as being alive and even the natural world was regarded as a they began to regard the natural world as a commodity so they lost that i think that sense of the aliveness and ultimately the sacredness of all things that is hiding beyond the appearance and that is a terrible loss and this is why we arrived at such a crisis point now but that is a loss in the within the human because they've through excessive conceptualization the ego has grown and grown and grown and this excessive conceptualization deadens the world around you because everything is filtered through concepts every human that you meet is is called something it's filtered through conceptualization no longer there's no longer the the sense of connectedness neither from young human to another nor from human to nature and even the connectedness within with an object i've had for many years i've had this when i'm mentioning people uh think i'm a little weird well i suppose i am a little weird but um always that sense of that certain objects that i live with they're kind of my friends it's not an attached not an egoic attachment just an acknowledgement i've had a car i bought a car for 16 years ago i still have it it's my friend yes i'd rather get an electric car now but my car can't leave my friend behind when i lived in england it's a funny story but when i lived in england i had a car i didn't have much money so i bought the cheapest car i could find it was a russian made car called lada and i loved it it was wonderful but people laughed at it because oh lada because it's very slow and they said it often breaks down it never broke down and i loved it only embarrassing thing was going up a hill you have to because very slowly we're holding up all the traffic behind you but other than that so to have a lada you either needed to be very poor or egoless in my case both applied and finally i left i decided to leave england and a friend of mine said oh i'll buy your lada i need a car and said okay can't remember for how much it wasn't too much and two weeks later i had left england i don't know if i received a letter there were no text messages then what they called i received a letter two weeks later the car broke down and never recovered couldn't even get repaired anymore it was terrible much later i gave him back his money but at the time i couldn't but late i did that's a little aside but everything is alive it is quite important to reverse what has happened to us the last few generations and also the the sense of nihilism nihilism or nihilism that afflicts many humans these days young humans perhaps even more so and and sometimes they find the the weirdest causes and things because combat their nihilism but the purposelessness of of well it's a huge disease it's a collective disease afflicting millions of humans a sense of purposelessness of existence it's a it's a terrible thing and uh again i want to go into that more deeply in the next few days point of the purpose of your life beyond the personal purpose which may or may not be present another practical advice is not to indulge in excessive intake of sustenance physical food in other words not eat too much rather words so that um you don't get a sense of heaviness also refrain from alcohol but i'm not not as a if you cannot enjoy a meal without a glass of wine or a beer by all means go ahead it's perfectly fine but if you know that once you've had your first glass you cannot stop if you know that then it's better not to have the first glass if the first glass is never the last then it would be better here to stop because the it could cloud your mind and become a hindrance to the arising of presence the awakening it can cloud your mind or any other kind of drug could do that also one last thing i already mentioned perceiving without labeling as a practice a large sense perception nature especially natural things and they're everywhere here nature is extremely helpful especially in this the world that we live in for sanity even not just here where you go back into your everyday life sanity can easily be found in nature if you go because you can divide the world into the human made world and the natural world and some people live almost exclusively in the human made world especially if you live in a big city but there is always this vision that when i was a child i would i was not happy a lot of the time when i was a child because of dysfunctional family background they couldn't help it they were just in the grip of their ego but i when i was given a bicycle i was able to leave the city and cycle to the outskirts where there was some nature not magnificent nature just ordinary trees in some fields and trees and and there i experienced my moments of happiness and relief in nature and already there i knew the difference between the human made world that was the world of unhappiness for me and the natural world which was the world where i experienced a sense of freedom and the strangest thoughts that always went through my mind when i was on my bicycle cycling in nature and then i sometimes would get off my bike and just sit there and look around and always i had this thought in my head which said this will always be here this will always be here and i was only 10 11 12 years old that this will always be here this will always be here and i didn't even fully understand what what this meant i could feel but i realized later this is nature and this is the man and the man made the human made world is not actually going to last the natural world is relative to the human made world is almost eternal and the the planet has unbelievable ability for regeneration which we may talk about some other time so that the humans will not destroy they should do all they can to refrain from causing harm to the planet obviously but even if they go totally insane and they don't manage they will not be able to destroy the i will i will talk about that some other time you don't need to believe me now and especially as you go to sleep make sure that the last thing that you are aware of before entering sleep make sure that the last thing is not your device or the tv is still running a good practice is you lie in bed on your back and place attention into the body the inner energy field of your body so you feel the body many times written and spoken about it as a important practice inner body awareness what you're aware of is not the physical body is that which animates the physical body and so it takes your attention away from thinking it's a very easy quick way of stopping your mind without exerting some willpower and saying stop stop stop that won't work anyway but there's attention into your body abdomen hands feet feel them from within feel the liveness that pervades the the the physical body and from there you gradually go to sleep that's a beautiful completely different way of entering sleep and and if you wake at night with certain thoughts fearful thoughts or many people as they awaken at night oh what's going to happen nothing this is the present moment and there's nothing happening yeah but what's going when i get back home but my life is just this all shambles where oh my god where we're going there's nothing there is no crisis now this this is the present moment the present moment and they see you in a in bed it's warm and comfortable so go into the into the body take attention away from that and you can feel if you feel the inner body there's no attention left for thinking and it's beautiful so whenever you have a sleepless night you begin to be plagued by thoughts direct your energy you start with the abdomen breathe into it for example it rises and you feel that as you breathe in for follow the attention with your breath the abdomen rises and falls rises and falls and then you feel the energy spreading out from there or you can start with your hands until you get a sense of global aliveness pervading the body beautiful and when you wake and just one last thing when you wake up and these thoughts begin to tell you how critical your life is and then you say okay i'm going to go into the body and then the thought that will arise most likely is no i can't do it now no this is not the time i can't this i cannot i can't do it i can't i can't are you going to believe that thought or not because don't believe every thought that comes into your head so and if the thought is i can't yes i can here you look i'm doing it so don't get persuaded by a thought that tells you no you can't do it now many people don't say i can't i'm interested in spiritual things but i've there's too much happening in my life now i have to sort that out first and maybe i need less problems in my life so i can dedicate my life to spiritual awakening not with these these people around me i can't do it but that's not actually how it works your present situation is the most helpful one for spiritual practice whatever your life situation is use that that's the entry point use that no matter how difficult it seems to be use that that's your portal thank you

Eckhart Tolle The Creative Impulse and The Ego [c74c8ea7-bc7a-4e8f-becf-7e17e07db867]

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:38)

The creative impulse and the ego. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions on several topics, including how to differentiate between a true creative impulse and the ego. Eckhart refers to his own experience of writing The Power of Now.

While living in England, he says he felt called to move to Canada. He says he had to discern if the impulse was coming from a deeper place or just a passing whim. He also cautions against listening to the mind and its toxic narrative.

After waiting several months, Eckhart realized the feeling was not fleeting, but solid intuition. He eventually made the move and his writing began to flow.

[Speaker 2] (0:42 - 0:45)

I'm really glad for being here. Thanks for everything.

[Speaker 1] (0:46 - 0:48)

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (0:48 - 1:59)

I've been confusing with identifying creative impulses that comes from the inner being. And differentiating them from ego impulses. Sometimes I have an impulse to do something and I feel a great vibration of peace, love and joy in the background or in the foreground.

And I think, well, this is an impulse that is coming from my inner being. But this impulse is also accompanied by feelings of great enthusiasm and excitement. Then I think, well, maybe this great enthusiasm and excitement come from my ego.

Then I get stuck analyzing from where does such impulse come from. And I don't take any action. So my question is, what is an inner being impulse like?

[Speaker 1] (2:00 - 13:48)

Right. Good question. If there's a kind of excitement that comes with that, you feel excited about something, then you have to be very careful because that may be a temporary, egoic thing and that could disappear very quickly again.

So be very careful of that level of excitement. Enthusiasm, of course, can easily be mistaken, confused with excitement. But enthusiasm is something deeper and it lasts for much longer.

So there's a difference between the power that comes with enthusiasm when you feel that you want to do something or something wants to happen through you and you feel a strong energy flow. It's often good to give yourself a little bit of time. Don't act immediately on something and see if the same impulse is still there tomorrow, if it's still there next week, if it's still there three weeks later, two months later, and still feel that it remains.

It comes from a deeper place. It's not just a little wave on the surface. So if it's persistent, then it's something that you should really listen to and then take action.

For example, I was living in England for many years. I was living in the countryside and one day I had this strong feeling that I had to leave England and I had to move to the west coast of North America, but I didn't know why. I didn't immediately get on the phone and say, okay, book me a ticket to fly to California or wherever on the west coast of North America.

I wasn't sure why. I had no answer. I just had the impulse.

So I gave it time. So I waited and a few weeks later, it was still there, just as strong as before. And two months later, it was still there, very strong.

And then I said, this comes from a deeper place. And then I took some action. Trust was involved because I could feel that it was coming.

It was not a temporary excitement or it came from a deeper place. Another thing you need to be careful of is things that arise out of irritation or anger with a person or with a situation. You're irritated with a situation.

I can't take any more of this. I'm going to, this may not come from a deeper place either. So you have to be careful and just give it a little bit of time and then see if it's still there to continue my story without, if it's not too boring.

After a few months, I finally said, okay, I have to do it because if I don't obey this impulse, which is not going away, then I'm not obeying the higher purpose. I knew I had spiritual work to do there. I finally got rid of everything and I moved, still not knowing why.

And only after I arrived a few weeks, the power of now started to come through me. And I realized I needed to be in that energy field there, which is very different from European energy field. I realized when I had to come back to England, temporarily, the writing stopped.

So I had to go back to the West Coast. The writing continued. So this is just one example of listening to an impulse that doesn't go away.

So don't obey a temporary sense of excitement. Be careful with that. But if it remains, then the mind might still come in and doubt you and might still say, well, it may be a mistake.

Maybe it's a mistake. The mind can always come in with doubts and then you become paralyzed. You can't do anything because whatever you feel you could do or you want to do, the mind will doubt it and will react, oh no, this could go wrong or this could happen.

And then you don't do anything. So you need to be careful also with your mind, not to overanalyze and realize one of the most important things in life is making mistakes. It's even more important than succeeding because you learn through making mistakes.

You deepen through making mistakes. And sometimes what you're really meant to do can only arise after you've tried five, six or ten things that you were not meant to do. And suddenly out of one thing, the real thing arises.

But if you had taken no action, nothing would have happened. So don't be afraid that it could be a mistake because if it is a mistake, then you will learn through it and it won't be a mistake. If you learn through something and you deepen as a human being, the deeper dimension arises through mistakes, then it's not a mistake.

Retrospectively, if I look back at my life, I could say all many things that I did were mistakes. But they were not things that I was ultimately meant to do. Why was I at university and trying to do a PhD?

It was totally wrong. I was not meant to do a PhD and eventually I gave it up. So you could say to be engaged in academic work for me was a mistake.

I wasn't meant to do that and yet I had to go through it and I learned what is not in order to know my true path. Usually in order to know your true path, you need to recognize the false paths that are not yours. And sometimes you have to go there to know it.

So you find out more and more about yourself. Don't be afraid of making mistakes. Don't be afraid of failing because the important thing is the doing.

It's never the ultimate outcome. The important thing is the consciousness that you bring to the doing. So don't be afraid of mistakes.

Don't be afraid of failing. But don't act on a form of excitement that suddenly comes into your head. Give it some time.

A different thing would be if there's a situation that requires immediate action, then you need to be present and intuitively you will know what it is you need to do. If you're in an emergency situation, then you need to be very, very alert, very present and then right action arises. And then there isn't even time for the mind to question you.

Well, should I do this or not? Let's say the ship you're on is sinking. Should I get out of my cabin or not?

You would just take right action. Or a wild animal comes in running into this room, you would take action, whatever action is needed, you take. The mind doesn't have time to question it.

So these things happen when you are in an emergency situation. But here we're talking about something else, which is what to do in your life, what path or action to take in your life. So it's the art of living.

It's not difficult. Once you recognize how things work, then they become easier, then there's a flow to things. Oh, one more thing.

Once you have embarked on a course of action, especially spiritual people, they sometimes, when an obstacle arises, the first obstacle arises, they say, oh, maybe I wasn't meant to do that. Because I say, well, because if I was meant to do that, everything would unfold without any obstacles. But that's not true.

When you create something new, whether it is, no matter what it is, whether you want to build up a business or create something or write a book or do a work of art or learn something, learn something totally new, whatever course of action you embark on, obstacles will arise. It does not mean when you experience the first obstacle, oh, I wasn't meant to do that. But you don't react against the obstacles.

You see how you can either circumvent the obstacle or use the very energy of the obstacle in your favor so that you always cooperate with whatever situation arises. You don't make it into an enemy. So whenever you create something new, whatever it may be, obstacles will arise.

That doesn't mean that you were not meant to do it if the first obstacles come. However, it's possible that after doing something for a year or something or two years, and then you realize, well, maybe it's just not working. But you carry on trying.

It doesn't matter if you enjoy the process. It's vital. It's a mistake to think I need to arrive at this particular point.

The question is, are you enjoying the journey? Let's say you think you might become a great writer. And so you write.

And you spend five years writing. And then you offer it to some publishers and they don't want it. And then you self-publish it.

And that's fine. And maybe suddenly you're very successful. Or you self-publish it and nobody wants to read it.

We don't know what the outcome will be. When I wrote The Power of Now, I said, I don't know how many people will read it. And it doesn't matter.

Perhaps 10 people will read it and their life will change through it. And if it doesn't work out, it doesn't matter. Because I enjoy this process so much that the outcome doesn't matter so much.

And if it doesn't work and I can't earn any money through it either, then I'll go and sell tomatoes. I said that in my mind. I don't know why I said that.

I'll make a living by selling tomatoes and I'll be happy doing that. Enjoy the process. And that's what success is all about.

Success is to be aligned with the present moment. It's not the last thing that you arrive at. It's already an end.

The ultimate point of success is already an end. I could talk about this for another two hours. But hopefully, the essence of what I've been saying hopefully will help you a little bit.

[Speaker 2] (13:49 - 13:52)

Thank you. Thanks a lot. Very, very helpful.

[Speaker 1] (13:53 - 13:53)

Thank you.

[Speaker 5] (13:54 - 14:14)

Our participant writes in, Can I still completely awaken if I'm on an antidepressant? I'm on the lowest possible dose and I feel much better when I take it. Isn't God in science as well?

Isn't God in everything?

[Speaker 1] (14:16 - 21:17)

Well, the answer to this question is that I don't know. In order to give a truthful answer whether what you're taking is a hindrance, only you can know whether you're still able to be present with that. In order to give an informed answer, I would have to take whatever substance it is that you are taking and experience it for myself.

And then I could give you perhaps an answer as to whether it obscures presence or not. I know that once you have a certain degree of presence, then substances don't really influence your degree of presence that much anymore. Once you have a certain degree of presence, then you could take alcohol.

I know alcohol, I've taken that. I've also tried once to take LSD. I took it once because I wanted to know.

People ask me that question, Can LSD be helpful for awakening? And finally, I thought I have to try one because I won't be able to answer the question otherwise. So I took LSD and I observed myself during the three or four hours.

And there was no loss of presence. So the presence was I experienced certain things in the field of my consciousness. I experienced certain changes in sensory perception.

I experienced like the walls of the room seemed to be pulsating with life. They seemed to everything was kind of going. And there was a continuing witnessing presence there that was not affected by it at all.

I don't recommend, by the way, that you take any kind of drug. But for some people who are very much identified with their mind, it can be a liberating experience to very briefly experience the world around them without interference of continuous excessive thinking. There was a teacher, a spiritual teacher in the early part of the 20th century.

And he would often encourage his students to indulge in excessive intake of alcohol. In other words, encourage his students to get drunk. So that they could find out whether they were able to stay conscious even while their mind was clouded, whether the consciousness behind the mind was still able to be there as a witnessing presence even when the mind was clouded by alcohol.

This is not something that I would recommend. I'm just mentioning it as an interesting true anecdote. So the question is, when the mind is affected by something, can presence remain unaffected?

So as I said before, to really answer your question, I would have to try that substance. But from my own experience with taking only once LSD and I'll give you another very funny anecdote that's similar to this. Ram Dass, the spiritual teacher, when he wrote a famous book in the 60s, he went to India as a young man and he experienced a spiritual awakening in India.

And he found a guru in India, his spiritual teacher. And at that time, he was experimenting. In the 60s, many people began taking LSD and he was experimenting with that himself.

And one day, he gave his teacher in India a dose of LSD. He said, why don't you try this? You might have interesting experiences.

And he gave him about 10 times the normal dosage because he said, okay, I'll have another one, the spiritual teacher, give me one more. So he took, I think they call it hits. He took, normally you would take one or two.

And he took 10, this spiritual teacher, and then Ram Dass sat there watching him to see what was going to happen to him. And absolutely nothing happened to him. He just sat there for a few hours.

Nothing, completely unaffected. He did not say this, I forgot his name, the spiritual teacher did not say whether he experienced any strange things. He probably did.

But it didn't affect his base, his foundational presence. That's a very interesting fact. But this only is the case if a certain degree of presence is reached.

If presence is only just beginning to emerge, then any substance like that can very easily obscure your presence. I know that for a fact, I've seen people to whom this happened. So if presence, if you're not fully established yet in presence, and the substances can easily obscure presence, but maybe not all substances.

So to some extent, the answer will depend on how much presence or the intensity of the presence that is already arising in you. So I cannot give a conclusive answer to this. I just hope that what I'm saying is a little bit helpful.

But I do suspect that at the moment, with a small dosage that you are taking that you will be fine. And observe your life, observe how you whether you're in situations, are you able to be present? Are you reactive?

Has there been a change in your life? Life gives you always, how you deal with people in situations is the best feedback of how present you are. If there has been a change in how you deal with people in situations, if you're no longer as reactive as you used to be, if you're able to be aligned with the present moment, and so on, then presence is obviously working in you, despite the fact that you are taking a daily dosage of this.

So that's, so you can find out yourself by observing yourself and seeing how you deal with people in situations. That's always reflects your degree of consciousness.

[Speaker 3] (21:17 - 21:54)

Thank you. My question relates to the pain body. And over the last while, I've noticed my anxiety or discomfort within the body increase significantly, sometimes.

And my question is, is that pain increasing? Or is my awareness to it increasing? And if so, was it always that discomforting inside without me being aware?

[Speaker 1] (21:55 - 22:07)

Right? What you describe as discomfort? Is that triggered by certain situations?

Or is it triggered by certain thoughts in your mind?

[Speaker 3] (22:08 - 22:23)

Definitely thoughts in my mind, and definitely around starting the workday, being in certain work situations. But it can come, you know, out of nowhere from a thought in my mind as well.

[Speaker 1] (22:23 - 22:30)

Right. And that discomfort, would you describe it as an emotional discomfort?

[Speaker 3] (22:31 - 22:46)

It's not a lot in my, like in my stomach or my gut. I almost feel it in my organs. And yeah, I don't know if that's emotional, or physical or because of the emotion.

[Speaker 1] (22:47 - 22:56)

Do you sometimes practice in a body awareness the way I don't know if you practice in a in a body awareness? You know what I mean by that?

[Speaker 3] (22:56 - 23:05)

Yeah. And I mean, the more the discomfort or pain comes, the more I practice it. So it's having that positive effect.

[Speaker 1] (23:06 - 23:06)

Right?

[Speaker 3] (23:06 - 23:06)

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (23:07 - 31:31)

Okay. It seems more than likely that it's because there's much more awareness now in your inner energy fields more than before, that you're becoming aware of certain blockages of one could call it in the in your that are partly emotional and partly physical, they have a they have a physical aspect, and they have an emotional aspect. And they're probably part of the pain body.

And they were there before, but you didn't know it. The light of consciousness is now going into your directed into your inner energy field. And then you become aware of something that has always been there, but you didn't know it.

It just manifested in certain situations as perhaps as a pain body attack, or as obsessive kinds of thinking. And now you're able to just be with it and observe it. So it's not a bad thing at all.

It's actually, it means that whatever it is that you're observing, that the observation itself is a process of gradual dissolution of it, it gradually, it could take time, but it gradually dissolves because you're shining the light of consciousness on it. If you don't react to it, you realize what it is. And then these emotional, physical energy fields blocked energy, that's what it is, can then no longer use your mind, your thought processes, so that your thought processes, you can stay much more present in your thinking, rather than being taken over by emotional thinking by pain, body thinking, negative thinking, and so on.

So it's a good thing. The inner body awareness is such a vital, vital practice. Did you come to our retreat?

Did you come to the last awakening retreat? I watched it. I've been to one, but not the last one.

Yeah, I've spent quite a bit of time with inner body awareness, because it's so important. And even Jesus talked about it. People don't realize that he talked about that your whole body will be full of light.

If your eye is sound or single, your whole body will be full of light. Jesus must have taught inner body awareness, but nobody in the churches realized that. So it's a very vital practice.

Buddhists also have vipassana and so on, inner body awareness practices. So it's all good. Don't be concerned.

It does not mean that these things were not there before. You're just becoming aware of what was living in your energy field. And by becoming aware of it, this is a process of transmutation.

Gradually, the energy becomes freed, because the whole pain body is stuck energy. It can't flow anymore. It's a stuck emotion, which manifests also on the physical level.

And then, as it becomes transmuted, the energy of that becomes part of your presence. So it's like the light or the fire of presence is fueled by the energy that was trapped in the pain body. It assumes a higher vibrational frequency.

And so this is why people often with heavy pain bodies find it almost easier to become present and become more intensely present, and certainly are more motivated to awaken into presence than people with a relatively weak pain body. So also be aware in your dealings with people and so on. And in your mind, do you still experience pain body attacks, when you get suddenly taken over by a very negative energy field?

Yes, that still happens. Right. So there you have to be very, very careful so that you don't suppress it, but know what's happening.

Be there, see awareness, know, oh, there's the pain body, so that it observes you directly, so that it cannot rise into your mind and use your thinking. Because then it renews itself through your thinking. It can also renew itself through other people's reactions.

So there are two ways in which the pain body can acquire new energy fuel, so to speak. It can do it through negative thought processes. It loves negative thinking.

This is emotional negative thinking about yourself, about your life, about other people, no matter what it is about, it doesn't matter. Or it can take fuel through drama in relationships. It loves to trigger somebody else's pain body, whether it's a personal relationship, close relationship, family members, or at work.

So also be careful that other people's pain bodies may want to trigger yours. So you have to be very alert. Alertness is key.

There's nothing wrong with pain. As long as you know it's there, and you're able to observe it, that means you're awakening. So the more you can observe it, the more awake you are.

So it's all wonderful, wonderful practice. And you can actually enjoy it. And then gradually the transmutation happens.

It's just wonderful. Thank you. Thanks.

Thank you. I'm not here as a person, although my mind is being used, obviously, in the service of consciousness and awakening. But I mentioned before gazing, not in this session, but in other sessions.

Gazing is the practice of looking into somebody's eyes, two people gazing into each other's eyes for maybe a minute, two minutes, or three minutes. Ask permission first. And we can do it here now.

Although I'm not here physically, it's still very much the same. Because when you look into my eyes, and you let go of thinking, and just sense your own presence, which isn't your own, but we just call it that, you can sense your presence. And you look into my eyes, and you can sense that your presence and my presence are the same presence.

And while I look at you, I'm not thinking. And so it may be easier for you to also step out of thinking, because when you're looking at me, you're not looking at a thinking person right now. It's a bit like looking at your dog, except that the dog exists below thinking, and I'm above thinking.

So the being that you can sense in yourself is a being that is in me. And as such, we are connected, and we are incarnations of the one being, the one universal consciousness. Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle The Danger of Deferring Satisfaction [01c913f1-f215-461f-b813-4c1727ad1529]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:51)

The danger of deferring satisfaction. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about setting goals and deferring satisfaction. He says for many people, the activities they're engaged in are just a means to an end.

He believes they're not present in what they're doing now because they're projecting where they want to be in the future. Eckhart explains this is a self-defeating way to live because while we may need to defer satisfaction to reach a goal, there's also an inherent danger to it. He says after years, the pattern may become so ingrained, we no longer find satisfaction in anything we do because we're so used to deferring it.

Eckhart says we must honor whatever we are doing in the present moment. And if we give it our full attention, then it is possible to feel clarity and joy.

[Speaker 1] (0:53 - 35:46)

As we sit here, check in with yourself. See what is your consciousness as you as we sit here in silence. What is your mind doing?

What is the voice in the head saying or doing, if anything? And perhaps there is stillness, which is wonderful. As you might have guessed, when I sit here, I'm not thinking.

And the invitation is for you to share the space of presence and as much as possible be in that state of awareness instead of absorbed in thought. And thoughts may arise occasionally as we sit here. But you don't have to follow them with your attention.

Just let them go past like a cloud. The essence of all spirituality is this, to realize that inner spaciousness or stillness. In Hindu spiritual philosophy, there's a term called Turiya, which means the fourth.

First, second, third, fourth. A state of consciousness, Turiya, the fourth. It divides human consciousness into dreamless sleep, the dream state, the second, the wakeful state, the third.

And Turiya is the fourth state of consciousness, which is this. And compared to the so-called wakeful state, it's like if you compare the conventional wakeful state to the dream state at night when you're dreaming, then you wake up out of the dream into the ordinary wakefulness, which is usually identification with the stream of thinking. That's the normal state.

So there's a huge shift. You wake up out of the dream state, and then you wake up and say, ah. And the same thing happens again when you wake up out of the normal wakefulness state, the third, into the fourth, that it is a kind of waking up again.

This is why the term awake and waking up, awaken, has been used in various spiritual traditions for thousands of years. Because you wake up in the same way that you wake up out of the dream state at night into the normal wakefulness state. You wake up out of the normal state of wakefulness into the fourth state of awareness, pure awareness.

And compared to the fourth Turiya, the normal state of wakefulness is also a kind of dream. So you can wake up twice out of it. First you wake up out of the conventional dream state at night into normal wakefulness, which means identification with the stream of thinking.

And then there's the possibility of waking up out of that into the fourth state of presence. And that is, in essence, that's what it's all about. And the fourth state is something that we, once you have had glimpses of it, you know it is very real, not just something to speculate about or hoping that in some other lifetime you will reach the fourth state of consciousness.

If you've had a glimpse of it or at first hand, then it's important to invite it into your life, so to speak, to remember to invite that into your life in ordinary daily existence. And in the same way that there is such a thing as lucid dreaming, which means when you are asleep at night and you're dreaming, lucid dreaming means you suddenly become aware that you are dreaming. So there is an awareness of the fact that you are dreaming, and that's called lucid dreaming.

Sometimes it can happen just accidentally. Suddenly in the middle of the dream you realize, oh, this is a dream. And then you're no longer really trapped in the dream and the thought may come to you, oh, I could make anything happen because it's just a dream.

Usually you wake up very soon after the awareness comes in the not really compatible, the dream state and the state of awareness are not really compatible. So you only have a very short space where occasionally it could happen that lucid dreaming occurs. The awareness, if it appears in the middle of the dream, frees you from being completely trapped in the dream and believing that everything on the dream is absolutely real.

So even if you're dreaming of an unpleasant place that you're trapped in, if suddenly you realize it's a dream, okay, well, it's not that bad. It's just a dream. And then you wake up.

In the same way, in ordinary wakeful state, as awareness comes in, because they're not to be treated separately, when you first experience the state of presence, awareness, for example, as we sit here in stillness and you realize that your mind also becomes still and all that's left is a sense of beingness or presence. It's quite beautiful. At first it may be very subtle and light and then it deepens and becomes more powerful or you realize it more deeply.

It itself doesn't, but you realize it more deeply. And that's fine. Those are glimpses and they're good.

They're important. This can happen in meditation. If you meditate rightly, then that state of presence, awareness arises and that is good.

But the task is not to lose it in everyday life. That's the real task. Otherwise you might become a good meditator, which is fine.

But the moment you move back into your ordinary life, daily life, it's gone. And you're just as unconscious as everybody else. And then after a few hours of stress and suffering, you say, oh, I need to meditate again.

They need to come together, daily life and the awareness, they need to come together so that you are able to experience not lucid dreaming, but lucid living. And that is conscious living. When there is an awareness always in the background as you do things, you're engaged in activities.

You can practice being present in what you do, which means you're conscious of whatever movement is happening. But you're also conscious of yourself as the underlying awareness. There's a presence.

It's easier to practice when you're alone, not being stimulated by other people's minds. You're alone with yourself and you're not engaged with your devices that stimulates the thinking mind. But you're alone and perhaps you're sitting or you're walking.

Then it's, this is a good place to start to bring in and presence through movement that you practice also is an important teaching that shows you that to incorporate the presence into the movement. So, and then you practice that. And then you move in your daily life.

You're constantly on the go. You're moving from here to there and you bring in that awareness as while the movement happens. And a key thing here is to be present in that movement rather than make that movement into a means to an end.

And that applies to any activity that you're engaged in from the simplest thing, like making a cup of tea or washing your hands or walking across the room or up the stairs and down the stairs. In ordinary non-lucid consciousness, ordinary waking state, most of the movements that people are engaged in are a means to an end. They are not present in the step they are taking now because they are mentally projecting themselves to where they want to get to.

And then movement can become or easily becomes stressful and not enjoyable. And it diminishes the quality of the movement. There's no quality in what you do because it's only you want to get it out of the way as quickly as possible.

Many people spend their whole days wanting to get whatever they are doing out of the way as quickly as possible so that they can get to the next thing. It's a horrible way to live, but it's quite normal. Always, where's the next?

Okay, still doing this. I don't want to be doing it, but I have to. I really want to get there.

And once you're there, then you want to get that out of the way. Often, the stress is connected with that, not being able to enjoy life because life largely consists of doing and movement. And you might have heard the expression to defer satisfaction.

Now, that expression refers to a person who has a goal that the person wants to achieve, which is good. It's good to have goals unless you're 99 years old. It's good to have goals not always in your life.

There may be periods in your life, not just when you're 99. There may be periods in your life when you don't have any particular goal because life is just flowing and unfolding as it is. I don't have any goals anymore.

I haven't had any goals in a long time. It's just unfolding, and that's fine. I'm happy with that.

So there are time periods when goals are something that is an important part of your life as a human. And at other times, you may not need goals. So if you're a young person or relatively young, it's more likely that goals will be an important part of your life.

And I don't know where young finishes these days. I don't know. You can decide for yourself if you're young or not.

So there is the expression to defer satisfaction or to postpone satisfaction, which means you have a goal and you're working hard to achieve your goal. And so according to this recipe for success, you do not demand satisfaction immediately. You can defer satisfaction until you reach your goal, which let's say you are studying to become this or that.

It would take several years. And your friend next door is not practicing to defer satisfaction. He or she is sitting at home drinking, having a good time, going out to bars while you are at your desk studying for your exams.

That is to defer satisfaction. The other guy is continuously being kind of satisfied, being unconscious probably through drinking and having sex and great hedonistic, hedonistic pleasures and not really satisfied for long either because these hedonistic satisfactions are quite short-lived and there's always discontent arises and then they need another fix to feel satisfied again. And the other guy is working hard to defer satisfaction.

So there is a lot of truth in that. In order to succeed at something, they say, I'm not totally advocating for this. We'll transcend wisdom.

It's conventional wisdom is to say you need to learn to practice to defer satisfaction. Otherwise, you cannot be successful in this life. A musician, for example, a long time ago, I lived in a house in London and two floors down there was a pianist, professional pianist, young woman, and she would practice four to five hours every day.

I could hear the piano. Fortunately, it was quite beautiful, so it didn't bother me. So perhaps that would be called to defer satisfaction.

Eventually, years later, I heard her name came up and she's very well known now. I don't know if she's still active now. She must be old like myself too, but she became quite well-known, famous pianist.

So was she deferring satisfaction? I don't know. We'll come back there in a minute.

There seems to be some truth in this, that you need to defer satisfaction to reach a goal. However, there is a huge danger associated with it. And the danger is that to defer satisfaction becomes a mental habit.

And after several years of deferring satisfaction, a mental habit becomes established in your mind that makes it impossible for you to find satisfaction in anything because for years you have practiced deferring satisfaction. That has become a deep-seated mental habit. And then even when you reach a goal, satisfaction may be there very briefly, but you are now trapped in the mental habit of always looking for satisfaction in the next thing.

And then that is the danger of deferring satisfaction. You may succeed, but the success won't make you happy and will not bring lasting satisfaction. So that is conventional wisdom.

And now transcendent wisdom is you can learn to enjoy what you are doing in the moment without reducing it to a means to an end. You know what the end, the end that you want to achieve is. Yes, you know that is the end.

You want to pass your exam or get good at this or that. Fine. But in the meantime, you honor whatever it is that you engaged in in the present moment and you give it your fullest attention so that you don't reduce it to a means to an end.

In the case of the pianist, for example, I don't know what her inner state was as she was practicing four or five hours every day. Was it a stressful exercise? Because was she desperately wanting to become a great pianist?

And then I have to get there, just have to. Or perhaps, I don't know, perhaps she was able to enjoy every note, every moment of her practice just as much as performing in the Royal Albert Hall in London. So I don't know what her state was, but it applies to any person who is working towards a goal.

I would say that to defer satisfaction is not the best recipe for success, but to find satisfaction in the doing now rather than reduce it to a means to an end. To honor whatever you're engaged in now, to honor it. And if you absolutely, absolutely cannot enjoy it, then it is very probable that this is not for you.

Let's say you're studying some subject because your parents told you that you have to do that because your dad had the same profession. Now you have to go into it too, whatever it may be. I don't want to mention anything because it could be anything.

Myself, for example, once I was so not in touch yet with my ultimate mission and purpose in life, there was a time when I said, I have to find a job. I have to find, I need an income. I have to find a job.

What can I do? And then I tried several things. One of them was I was beginning to fill in an application form.

You won't believe this. I was beginning to fill in application form to study, to become a chartered accountant. No, there's nothing wrong with being a chartered accountant.

There's some wonderful people who are chartered accountant, but I would have been the worst chartered accountant. I'm almost number dyslexic. Fortunately, for some reason, I didn't fill in the entire form.

It was getting too complicated. But if, let's just imagine if I had filled in this form and submitted it, if they had accepted me, that would have been a huge mistake on their part. If they had accepted me, then I would have been studying this, and I would have found it impossible to enjoy the present moment.

Numbers everywhere. And I can't even, it took me years to even remember my telephone number. And so that would be a clear sign.

After a few days or so, I would know this is not for me. This is impossible. So there I would recommend you to recognize that is something that is not compatible with your inner being or your true life purpose.

And then I applied. Then I applied to become a university lecturer at a university in northern England. They invited me to an interview.

And again, I didn't know that that was not my path at all, at all. There were five or six professors interviewing me. And I talked, they asked questions, I answered.

I don't, my answers probably were not very good. And at the very last, an old professor asked me a question that brought about a small awakening as my life purpose is concerned. The last question that this professor asked me in this interview was, and what do you really want to do?

So, oh. And I suddenly realized this is not what I really want to do at all. So I was lucky that even before I made these mistakes, I was prevented from making these mistakes at this very early stage, accountancy, university teaching.

And then I had a third interview, and that was before the interview to become a university lecturer. That was a similar mistake to being a chartered accountant. I applied to become a merchant banker in the city of London.

If they had accepted me, the bank would not have done very well. But surprisingly, they invited me for an interview. I had no banking background, but I had to, well, I was from a prestigious university, so they said, okay, we'll interview you.

This is where, at the time, many of these bankers were these bowler hats. This is how I would have ended up. About 10 days before the interview, I started reading the Financial Times to prepare myself, but could not retain much information.

My mind just didn't go that way. And the people were not very impressed by my performance at the interview, and they said, I'm sorry, we don't have a place for you. Oh, thank God for that.

So if you're able to enjoy the doing, then that is the way to achieve your goal, is not to postpone satisfaction, to defer satisfaction. Find satisfaction in the doing. That is also one of the main teachings in the Bhagavad Gita, the ancient Indian scripture, one of the great books of the world.

The teaching is, instead, do not look to the fruit of the action. The fruit of the action is the outcome, the desired outcome. Do not look to the fruit of the action.

But practice is called karma yoga. Karma actually literally means action. Yoga means, yoga here is not meant in the Western sense of yoga.

Something else I wouldn't be good at. The term yoga here is used meaning spiritual practice. So karma yoga is the spiritual practice of action.

And karma yoga is, sometimes it's translated, various translation into English, as consecrated action. You consecrate this action to the divinity or whatever, you give it your complete attention. This is, instead of looking to the fruit of the action, you give your complete attention to the action.

You don't reduce it to a means to an end. You honor it completely, totally. And that is karma yoga.

And then the fruit will look after itself. It's very likely that the fruit will be good, because the journey towards it was good. If the journey towards your goal is stressful and unpleasant, it is very unlikely that the goal will satisfy you.

And so the end does not justify the means if the means is unpleasant. So it is very important to realize that the whatever outcome you wish to achieve depends on your state of consciousness in this moment. That if in this moment you act unconsciously, then it is unlikely that the outcome will be good or enjoyable or make you happy or make other people happy.

We'll have some questions. By the way, there are quite a few people joining us from other parts of the planet. I'm going to say hello to them.

Nice to have you here or there. Wherever you are, whatever time it is, it's the present moment. I know that.

And a few people have already submitted some questions. I'm just going to read two or three questions and then perhaps some questions from you, just in case there are any questions left at this point. We don't know.

Beate from Germany is asking, what reason should there be for the survival of the human race? Oh, let me think. Isn't that emoji for that?

If humanity is aligned with universal purpose, which is the evolution of consciousness, universal consciousness in this dimension, consciousness evolves, then the species will survive. If humanity is an expression, a manifestation of the evolving consciousness, if consciousness is able to use, so to speak, the human form as a vehicle to manifest through, then human life is aligned with the purpose of the universe, which is the entire universe is in the process of awakening, where it's all going. Don't even attempt to understand with the human mind the vastness that is involved here and where it actually is going.

The universe is evolving. Consciousness is growing. We live in an awakening universe.

And if humans are aligned with that and become vehicles for that, then what is the question? Then this will be, oh yes, survival. And then the human race will survive if it's aligned with the transcendent purpose of the universe.

If not, then it would simply collapse and some other form will consciousness, universal consciousness, the countless forms through which it can blossom and express itself. So that's as simple as that. And perhaps this is a critical point in the evolution of humans.

Are we able to reach the next stage in the evolution of human consciousness, which is what this is all about? Is a sufficient number of humans able to reach the next stage of the consciousness? Or are we getting trapped in egoic consciousness, unable to break out of it?

In which case we would destroy ourselves through the unconsciousness that is in the egoic unconsciousness. There's a self-destruct mechanism in the ego. So that's as simple as that.

I still have intuitively a sense that humanity will survive as a species, but even that is not entirely true because everything will evolve even as consciousness continues to flow through us. Even what we now perceive as a physical body is going to go through a metamorphosis. And so eventually you can't even imagine where humans are going as they continue to be aligned with the awakening consciousness.

So it's all good, I feel. Our chances are still good, long term. Short term is a different matter.

Because evolution happens not in a straight upward line. Evolution happens through disruption of order, chaos. Things break down, chaos happens.

Out of the chaos a new higher order arises. And then that prevails for a while. And then a time comes when that higher order also dissolves into chaos.

And out of chaos something new arises on every level that applies. And so we are now moving into a period of disorder and breakdown, which is a great thing. From a transcendent point of view.

And our destiny is to reach the next stage. Humanity as it is now is not as a whole, it seems to me, is not ready to enter as a collective to the other fourth state of consciousness. There are too many humans that are still totally trapped in ego.

Including humans that are running this world. Or especially those, I don't know whether they become especially unconscious when they go into become part of these structures that run the world. Or whether it attracts people who are already unconscious in that way.

Or when they reach their position they become unconscious perhaps. All this is suffering provides the impulse for the awakening of consciousness. Obstacles, suffering, difficulties.

All these things are necessary for the evolution of consciousness. All the things that seem to block the evolution of consciousness are actually necessary.

Eckhart Tolle The Deep I Is Pure Light [15fe52c1-c225-4d88-ab1b-748aa496e491]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 1:03)

The deep eye is pure light. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions from a live audience, including a father who says he wants to help bring presence into the lives of his active and unconscious teenagers who spend too much time on their devices, computers, and cell phones. A woman in the audience says she's interested in manifesting her purpose, but also wonders if it's necessary to be very specific in the process of manifesting her goals.

Another woman asks about identity at what Eckhart calls the deep eye level, and asks if we are all really the same. Eckhart uses a movie metaphor to explain the deep eye by saying in a movie, as individual images appear on a screen, they all come from the same light pouring through the projector. He says the essence of the deep eye is like that.

It's pure light. With his wisdom and also his humor, Eckhart brings his unique perspective to these questions and many others. Enjoy.

Hi, Eckhart.

[Speaker 5] (1:03 - 1:03)

Hi.

[Speaker 6] (1:04 - 1:05)

Hi, everyone.

[Speaker 5] (1:07 - 1:39)

I want to make sure I'm understanding tonight's teaching correctly. So this was my interpretation. Beyond our form, beyond our thought and our emotions, beyond our past experiences, is the deep eye.

Does that mean at the level of the deep eye, we are all the same? We are all identical? We are all the same light?

And therefore, we're not individual?

[Speaker 1] (1:41 - 11:22)

At the deepest level, you're not an individual. The individuality goes beyond the physical form. It goes a bit deeper than that.

Even beyond your physical form, you're still an individual. Quite a way down, you're still an individual. Then gradually, as you go deeper, the individuality merges with something vast and all-encompassing.

And this vastness that is the universal consciousness that pervades the universe. So at the deepest level, there is no individuality. What people are afraid of is they say, what does it help me if the consciousness that animates this body survives after my death, but I won't be there anymore?

It's a misunderstanding. Let's say, if I asked you a weird question, what does it feel like to be you? What does it feel like?

And the answer doesn't come through thinking about it. And it doesn't require a verbal answer. What does it feel like to be you?

You have to kind of go within, what does it, without looking to memory to tell you who or what you are, without going to your memory banks, without the memory, let's say you have no past, what does it feel like to be you without the past? Are you still there? I don't want an answer.

It's a pointer. Are you still there? Without remembering anything about you, that feeling of beingness, that's still there.

That's very interesting. That becomes mixed up with form identity. It becomes diluted, so to speak, and it becomes forms.

But when you identify with something at the root of the feeling of individuality, there's actually at the root of it, that's not individuality. That's the transpersonal, the deepest, the essence is there. What looks to you like individuality, the feeling of being you is actually derived from that deeper place and not from the history.

It gets confused with the history of you with thought. Consciousness in its pure form, which is in the deep eye, that's the pure light, you could say, the pure light. Then the light becomes, let's use an analogy of a movie.

If you watch a movie, there's a projector. I suppose that still exists. If you go to a cinema, technologies change, but at least it used to be like that.

I think it still is. There's a screen, and there's a projector, and there's a film that runs through the projector, and there's a powerful light behind that. The light shines through the film, and it animates the figures in the film, the movie.

There's only one light, but this light gets broken up into characters and events and things happening, and that's projected onto the screen. But the essence of every character is the light. The character kind of temporarily obscures some of the light, so that's why he or she appears as a character.

Now imagine to take this analogy almost to a point of absurdity, but it's interesting. What if, let's say, these movie characters on the screen, let's say they have a little bit of beginning of self-awareness, but they're acting out the script, of course. They can't help it.

They have to act out the script, but at some point in the middle of acting out the script, they're questioning something. Who am I, actually? What is the essence of me?

And then if they begin to realize there's a light that shines, and that light animates me, and then perhaps, to take the analogy even further, then the attention, the light is then recognized as the essence, and then they follow the light back to the source. The attention moves back as they connect with the original source of the powerful light in the projector, and suddenly they realize who they are beyond the character, and they continue to act out the script, and this is a good analogy in that sense, because every human being is conditioned by the past, and this conditioning in the absence of awakening determines how they behave, and what they do, and what they think, so there are conditioned entities programmed to behave in certain ways, forced to act out the script that everybody grows up with. They absorb a script, which is a conditioning of their life, and then there's a possibility of awakening in the midst of all that drama, the movie.

Most movies are interesting because things go wrong to the characters experience problems. If the characters don't experience problems, the movie is extremely boring. Imagine a movie where nothing goes wrong.

You fall asleep, and this applies to real life also. When people go to a movie, and nothing happens, or everything functions beautifully, there was a beautiful movie called Titanic. Now, everybody already knew what was going to happen there, unless the director managed to make it so interesting.

Everybody knew it was going to go down, but things go wrong even before the ship sinks. There's already conflict between the characters that makes it. It's not that they have a wonderful time, and then the ship sinks.

There's already conflict between the characters. Now, imagine a movie that's called Titanic, where everything works beautifully, and they arrive in New York, and the boat doesn't sink. Extremely uninteresting.

So, we want to see every movie. We can reduce every script, movie script. Soon after the movie starts, something goes wrong.

It has to. Otherwise, there is no movie, and the same in life. As soon as you come into this life, things start going wrong.

They go right too, but also wrong. The proportion of right and wrong varies from person to person. If you have bad karma, you're already born into dreadful situation, whatever it may be, either poverty, or it could be wealth, but absolute dysfunction, totally crazy parents.

All these things are possible. Some humans, every human is born into a situation, but even in the best of cases, there will be things that go wrong, and that is how consciousness evolves. Consciousness does not evolve if humans remain in their comfort zone.

There's no awakening in your comfort zone. If there is an awakening, it won't be very deep. It'll be a very pleasant feeling, but the moment you're confronted with a challenging situation, it'll be gone, like a plant that grows in a greenhouse, protected from the environment, from the weather, but the moment you plant it outside, it cannot survive because it has not developed the strength, which only comes when you encounter obstacles.

So the question, and yes, the individuality is there and disappears into the realization of oneness when you go deep enough, but the consciousness from the deep transcendent place, the light of consciousness shines into even your so-called individuality, that which gives life to your so-called, your personal history, the memory of your history, that which gives light to it is the light of consciousness too, but it's not recognized as the light of consciousness.

You don't recognize that not only the pure consciousness, there's also the consciousness that takes on forms, it becomes forms, and that is the dream state where you experience, as a character in the movie, you're acting out the script of your life. Many humans, till the end of their lives, act out the script, they never become free of their conditioning, that's a pity, but hopefully they'll come again and have another go at it. Yes, so that's really how it is.

[Speaker 5] (11:22 - 11:23)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (11:23 - 11:23)

Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (11:32 - 12:47)

Hello, Eckhart. Hello. Thanks for your teachings.

The question is on kids. I have a teenager at home, and like many, most teenagers, they tend to get unconscious. So I think what I've seen is when they are small, I mean, they are the most present, right?

They are in the present and doing everything with the joy. As they grow up, middle school, high school, some stage we give them a cell phone, they have computers to work on homeworks and everything, and obviously they're trying to identify themselves, and they become unconscious. So the question is, and it is a good spiritual practice, even for me, sometimes I can be conscious when they are unconscious, and sometimes you're drawn into the unconsciousness.

So the question is, what can we do to bring in that presence into their lives, or what are, if there's anything that, you know, you are doing or Eckhart's teachings is doing with the schools, in middle schools or high schools, where we can have a course or something where, you know, as a group, they can get some kind of presence teachings.

Yes, thank you. That's very important. Thank you.

And the question could also refer to parents, how to approach teenage years, typically are difficult. So the human ego has to, at that point, the human ego has to develop and grow. Unfortunately, the way it is, it is for most humans on the planet so far is the human ego should be a limited time period when it grows in a human being, let's say up to the age of 25, at the most 30, let's say mid-20s.

You cannot prevent the arising of ego in a child and an adolescent, nor should you want to prevent it, it's not possible. They need to develop a sense of separate identity that is part of the evolution. The tragedy is, unfortunately, if people get stuck with that ego for the rest of their lives, they never go beyond it.

So for a parent, to begin with parent, it's to observe the growth of the ego in the child, which already starts with, may start at the age of two or three, when the child begins to, well, the child learns his or her name, and then the child learns that it is possible to possess something. It learns the concept of mine fairly early. And so it possesses a toy, and it learns the concept of my toy, that's the beginning of ego.

Also the beginning of the suffering that comes with ego identification, because if the toy is lost or disappears, or somebody takes it, enormous suffering arises. Oh, oh, my toy, mine. This is the early suffering of egoic consciousness.

The next step would be for the child to assert that it is better in some ways than another. I can jump higher than you. Can you jump this high?

No, you can't, look at me. I can do it. And parents say, you're great, you're doing it.

And that's fine. If you don't overdo the praise, give praise when praise is deserved, but don't just praise anything, because then there comes an inflation of praise, and that can create a narcissistic personality, which is an overblown ego. Many parents these days do that.

They say, everything you do is so great, you're the greatest, you're wonderful. It feels good for the child, but when you print money, it loses its value. It's called inflation.

I know that, but many politicians these days don't seem to know it. And they probably have degree in economics, but that's on the side. So you are there to gently guide them.

You observe the growth of their ego as it has to gently guide them. And school ideally should prepare children for adulthood, and should also prepare them perhaps for the transcendence of ego. Perhaps they can even, just when I said 25 years old, just a number came to me.

It could already be a 21. Ego is something that needs to be overcome, but something that is necessary for a certain stage of human development. So schools should encourage children not to excessively identify with concepts.

And there are a few alternative schools, I believe, that already to some extent do that. There are perhaps, I don't know, Montessori schools or Rudolf Steiner schools and so on. To some extent, they encourage children not to be excessively drawn into conceptualization at an early age.

That is very dangerous. Also, to be given the devices at a very early age has a very detrimental effect on their development. I know it's an easy thing to do for parents to keep them quiet, but it is not good for the growth of their consciousness.

Children need to remain in touch for as long as possible with nature. Some way, they need to be taken out into nature, even if it's just a park, but preferably out of the city periodically, where they are encouraged to interact with nature, leave all the devices behind. Every school should do that, take them out in groups where they spend time connecting with nature without their devices.

These are all important things. Also, to teach even abstract subjects like mathematics and so on at too early an age is also detrimental for their development. So there are many things that I know.

I have met quite a few teachers over the years who are already bringing that into their classrooms, but so far mostly on an individual basis. It's rare for it to become an already part of the official curriculum. That's still relatively rare, although there are some schools now also, I don't know what schools they are, whether they may be private schools, that teach mindfulness.

I don't often use that term, but basically mindful is to be present in what you do. I don't use that term because it implies that your mind is full, so I'd rather not use that, but they teach mindfulness. So for a parent to encourage the child not to get lost in conceptualization, to encourage the child to continue to interact with nature.

If you can't have an animal in the house, that is nature too, a cat or a dog. Encourage the child to look after the animal, to relate to the animal. Very important.

Animal presence can be very important in a home, especially for children. So it requires teachers to finally establish the teaching of presence as part of the curriculum, and that implies also, it signifies, help children to become aware of their emotions. That's one of the most vital things.

And if it's not taught at school, the parents have to do it, or the parents will do it anyway. Help the children to become aware of their emotions, because the emotions can wreak havoc with a child's life, and sometimes they get amplified in the teenage years when many adolescents become very hostile, and they're consumed by negative emotions, by self-hatred, by hatred of others, by hatred of everything, very destructive emotions. So the most vital thing that a child already at an age of four or five needs to begin to be taught to observe his or her emotional field, rather than be always taken over by it.

Many children, almost all children, already have pain bodies, some stronger than others, and that's another important point here, where when you observe the tantrum earlier in the previous session today, somebody said their mind sometimes feels like a toddler's tantrum taking place in their mind. Yes, the tantrums of toddlers can be quite violent. They may throw themselves on the floor and scream or throw...

And that is the pain body. So I would highly recommend, and this should be done at schools as part of the curriculum, and there should be children, there are a few children's books that teach that also, teach the child to be aware of their pain body, not while it happens, because nobody will be listening to you. You cannot make even an adult, you cannot make them aware of their pain body in the middle of a pain body attack.

That does not work, because the only person you'll be speaking to is the pain body and the pain body won't like it. But afterwards, the next day, you talk to the child, what happened yesterday when you threw yourself on the floor? What was that?

What was that thing that got into you? Do you remember that? What was that thing?

What did that feel like? If you had to make a drawing of it, what would it look like, that thing that got into you? What would that look like?

What color is it? Encourage the child to place attention on the emotion. In other words, there's a presence there.

Instead of being the emotion, the child can begin to become aware of the emotion. This does not necessarily prevent the next pain body attack, but then you do it again. Next day, you say, that happened again.

Was it the same thing? Did it feel the same as before? Was it the same little grumbling there, if it's child?

But let the child use the terms. And then, yes, it was the same. Okay.

Encourage, perhaps, the child to make a little painting of it. And the next time it happens, then you can say, well, in the middle of it, or at the beginning of it, then you can say, ah, there it is again, isn't it? And that can bring in awareness, even while it's happening.

But you need to prepare the child first, otherwise it won't work. And that may not necessarily stop it. It will probably continue.

But at least a little bit of awareness will have come in. There it is again, isn't it? Yeah.

No, it isn't. It's not. I also remember as a child, there was a time in my early teens, I had very negative emotions, very self-destructive, violent emotions.

I didn't act them out, unfortunately. But they were, I was almost consumed by very destructive emotions. And of course, nobody had any idea of presence or mindfulness at that time, anywhere, would have been unheard of.

And virtually all parents were very unconscious. At least nowadays, there's a certain percentage of parents that are relatively conscious and bring up their children consciously, as much as possible. But even then, you will find the difficulty of dealing with the child's emotions.

So very important at an early age, begin to teach the child to be conscious of their emotions rather than being taken over by the emotions. The worst thing you can do is when the child has a pain body attack, allow it to trigger your pain body, which unfortunately happens quite a lot too. Because the energy of this, of the pain body is so raw and so, there's such aggression in it, that an unconscious parent will be drawn into deeper unconsciousness and then react and start shouting, stop it, stop it.

Of course, it won't stop it. So the pain body has spread even to the parent. So that's, these are all important things to bring presence so that the teenage years and become a little easier.

Another important thing that also should be practiced at school, but it's a home environment is very important. How do the parents live? When you bring up children, the greatest teaching is how the family relates to how the parents relate to each other and so on.

That is, that's what the children absorb rather than what they are being told. There should be presence in the household, in the family environment. And a very important aspect of that is to listen to the child.

It's amazing that this should be practiced also at schools, but more importantly at home for the parent to listen to the child. And you would be amazed how many cases that doesn't happen at all, because the parents are so lost in doing, they have a busy life, they are lost in doing. And the only way they interact with a child is either telling their child what to do or what not to do.

Don't do that. Have you done this? Now you need to do that.

Have you done your homework? Okay. And they mean well, they want to do the best for their child and to encourage the child to do the right thing.

Don't do that. Have you brushed your teeth? Don't go brush your teeth.

Okay, good night. When I say listen, I mean to give the child attention beyond any doing or not doing. Give the child attention.

What happened today? How are you feeling? What do you have to tell me?

It doesn't matter what the child says, but you direct attention, not attention that involves doing, pure attention. The child wants to be recognized by the parent in its being. And if the parent does not recognize the child in its being, the child can feel unconsciously that there's something missing.

It wants to be recognized in its beingness, not just do the right thing. It's not the doing. And then that is perhaps the main factor that makes teenagers so angry because they know there's something important missing.

And often they're angry at their parents and their parents have done all they thought they could do, all the best. They brushed their teeth every night and make sure that they do their homework. And now have you done that?

And you said, no, it wasn't enough. Doing your best is not enough because what's missing is being. So no matter how much you do, it's not enough.

You have to bring in the dimension of being in the interaction with your child. So give them attention. That means you too have to refrain from doing for a moment and be with the child.

First you have to be with yourself. You have to go deep enough so that you can be present. And then you look at the child and you don't want anything from him or her.

You just look. And then perhaps words happen. You talk a bit.

What did you do today? It doesn't matter what the child says, the attention that you give, that's what the child longs for. It wants to be recognized by the parent in its being.

And so that in this world that is still relatively rare, unfortunately, that's one of the biggest mistakes parents make, but they can't help it because they haven't recognized it in themselves. So in order to live this, you need to recognize it in yourself and then you can live it. So there's a lot there that is possible and necessary in the upbringing of a child.

And I know that more and more teachers are becoming interested in this and more and more teachers are bringing it into their classroom, not officially yet in many cases, but they introduce some elements of presence or mindfulness into their classroom. But it needs to be practiced on a much larger scale because the world is going to, what's that weird expression, to hell in a hand basket. I don't know where that comes from, but it's not moving in the right direction, you might have noticed.

And there is a lot of unhappiness in children and a lot of their prescribed mind-altering drugs at an early age when that is not necessary. In fact, it's bad just because the parents are not present, they don't even know what presence is. They don't know any better.

So all this is, these are very important changes that need to happen. And thank you for asking that important question.

[Speaker 2] (31:35 - 31:35)

Hello.

[Speaker 6] (31:36 - 31:36)

Hello.

[Speaker 2] (31:37 - 31:50)

So unlike you with Oprah, I am bursting with excitement right now. So thank you so much for having me. And I also just want to give you a giant virtual hug.

[Speaker 1] (31:50 - 31:50)

Oh, thank you.

[Speaker 2] (31:50 - 31:53)

As I'm sure so many in the room would like to do as well.

[Speaker 1] (31:53 - 31:53)

Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (31:54 - 33:04)

And my question is around manifesting. I get twisted in my head about that because all my life I have felt I have a purpose. And the purpose is connected with joining and being of service and support and expansion of consciousness.

And I know it's out there. I know that that's going to be something I'm very involved with at some point. And I am familiar with manifesting and the deep knowing of what that is.

And at the same time, there are a lot of spiritual teachers that talk about being very specific when you manifest something. And I have no idea what it's going to look like. And most of the time when there is something related to my deeper purpose, if I try to go left and make that happen, usually I go right.

Like it's the invisible hand guiding me right. And I feel like, well, I'm not. And you know what I mean?

So I don't really feel like I know I'm the right one to manifest my purpose because I don't know as high as my deepest self.

[Speaker 1] (33:05 - 33:13)

Yes. So are you manifesting your purpose in your life?

[Speaker 2] (33:13 - 33:45)

Well, I know that it's going to be there. I in the sense that I've always had the sense, you know, once I retire in five or 10 years or something, that I'll be doing something else that has to do with that. And but I don't know if it's here.

I don't know if it's there. I don't know what it looks like. I don't know if it's working for Eckhart teachings or whether it's, you know, working at a wellness center or participating in I have no idea what it looks like.

I just know that that is my purpose.

[Speaker 1] (33:45 - 33:48)

Yes. Can you summarize?

[Speaker 2] (33:49 - 34:02)

My question is, do I need to be specific? Because that's so much of what the spiritual teachers that I was just listening to one recently, be specific when you manifest your purpose.

[Speaker 1] (34:02 - 41:39)

Yes, for some people that works, but it can also limit it. If, if I had been specific, I would probably have limited it. Sometimes the universe has bigger plans than you have.

And so my first experience of manifestation, which is a, it's a form of spirituality to to manifest, it's important. It's not the deepest. The deepest is to realize the essence of who you are, then you can still manifest if you want to, and you'll be quite good at it, but it's secondary.

So for me, there was a kind of spiritual awakening when I was 17 years old, in the sense that I'd always been very, very negative. And always one of the mind patterns, thoughts that could go through my head was bad things always happen to me. Of course, they always do.

They always, and they did. And then I accidentally came across some books that at the time I was living in Spain with my dad. And a German woman had gone back to Germany and left some books with us.

They were spiritual teacher was not well known anymore. German spiritual teacher with a Chinese name. And I started reading these books and they were about the, there's a relationship between your external life and your inner state.

And if you change your inner state, you change your external life. That was such a revelation to me. I'd never heard that before.

And at the time I was learning to type, teaching myself on a typewriter, they don't exist anymore, to type. And I remember I copied, practicing typing, I copied many pages of those books. And then I started practicing changing my thoughts and becoming, feeling good things were going to happen to me.

I was not very specific because I didn't know what exactly would happen. I attract good things into my life. I attract whatever.

And then a few months later, shift happened. I was longing to get away from the way I was living with my dad and his second wife that was as dysfunctional as his first wife, my mother, the living together. I need to get out of here.

Please take me out of here. And finally, I got a job offer in England without an interview. It was a miracle and it was a good job and had virtually no qualifications.

It was an absolute miracle. And I knew that I had created, I had manifested that, just amazing. And one of the happiest moments of my early life was saying goodbye.

I'm off. That was so wonderful. And in England, things, many things developed, miraculous things that could never have expected.

So if I don't think you need to be too specific, unless there's something that you desperately want or need, but hopefully since you've gone deep enough into yourself, there's nothing that you desperately want or need, because whatever happens on the horizontal dimension is an adding on. As Jesus said, whatever you manifest in this external life is lovely, but seek first the kingdom of heaven, that all the things that that you think that you need will be added on to you. So what he's saying is the world of external manifestation, yes, you have to deal with this world and it can be a lovely practice, but it's an adding on and there may come a time when you don't need to manifest anything anymore.

Things think I've acquired a certain momentum and it's growing. I've asked some successful people, did you practice manifestation before you achieved your sex? And one or two said, yes, yes, I did.

One specifically said, I think he's probably told about it publicly, so I probably don't need to keep his name a secret, but I'll do it anyway, just in case. Well, he said he had wrote himself a check for, I think it was, I can't remember how much it was, $10 million, something, and put it in his wallet and he always poked at it. And three years later, he got a check for $10 million for a movie role and he got it.

Then I asked Oprah, did you ever practice, did you, but he said, no, it just, it just came. What she does practice is a gratitude book. Every day she writes something to be grateful for, or several things to be grateful.

It's a very powerful tool to help you be present. To be grateful means an appreciation, an alignment with what is. So that's a powerful thing that is non-specific, but the more grateful you are for what is, the more things will come to you.

If you honor this moment, what is this moment, then the future, the so-called future, which never comes except as the present moment, will reflect that mindset. So there are others. Sometimes people just start an activity which they enjoy and then enthusiasm comes in and they do more of it and more of it, first on a small scale and they continue.

Perhaps they're musicians like the Beatles. They, I don't think they ever thought we are going to be the greatest in the world, the greatest group that ever lived. They just enjoyed the music and then they played and played and played.

And then that's the famous, the famous 10,000 hours of practice that somebody wrote about in a book that he observed that people, many people who achieve mastery in one field, they have 10,000 hours of practice. And then at that point, an additional element comes in that energizes and amplifies what they do and enormous inspiration can suddenly flow in. So that is a good preparation to enjoy what you do is in itself a tool for manifesting good things.

And even if the whatever you do is not what you really have chosen for yourself as your life purpose, perhaps it's not even that great a job, but nevertheless you honor it in this moment. You give it attention, you do your best, and then it will evolve into something else. But just so the gratitude journal is another thing that I would recommend to everybody.

Do you do that or have you done that?

[Speaker 2] (41:39 - 41:44)

I've done it, but I haven't been doing it lately, but I feel grateful. Right.

[Speaker 1] (41:44 - 43:41)

It's good. Yes. It doesn't have to be a journal, but it's helpful.

However, gratitude can also be misunderstood. People say, okay, I'm grateful because my life is, I have so much that other people don't have, and I should really be, look at other people and I have so much more in whatever better looks or more things, or look at these poor people, I really should be grateful for what I have. That's not it.

If you're only grateful when you compare yourself to others who have less one way or another, that's not real gratitude. It's not really even gratitude for some life situation. The more powerful thing is gratitude for whatever is this moment, the little things of this moment, for this beautiful flower.

You appreciate it, you give it attention, that's all gratitude. An appreciation of the aliveness of the world around you in the present moment. On the whole, I would advocate for less, not necessarily too specific in most cases, it would limit you.

There may be exceptions to that, but non-specific does work very well. And often the, as you know, the camel driver has his plants, the camel has, so the camel might have much bigger plants than you. And I have had the same, I could not quite have imagined the growth of the teaching.

I had some vision it would grow, but not that much. So don't limit yourself and you're doing fine.

[Speaker 2] (43:42 - 43:42)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (43:42 - 43:52)

Thank you. Thank you. So a moment of stillness.

[Speaker 3] (44:04 - 44:29)

Eckhart Tolle The Deep I [e5c513c6-3fa1-420d-b7de-10ace5c41129]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:40)

The Deep Eye. In this podcast, Eckhart takes us through a live meditation inspired by a quote from Ralph Waldo Emerson, the wick of individual life runs deep into the oil of pure being. Eckhart says we have great depth within.

He encourages listeners to reach beyond the of the personality to find what he calls the deep eye. He describes it as that aspect of ourselves which transcends the ego and is connected to the ultimate source of universal consciousness.

[Speaker 1] (0:43 - 41:37)

So here we are again in the present moment, being aware of the weather, the various ways in which the weather manifests in the present moment. It's also a way of bringing you into the now to feel the breeze of the air on your skin, for example. Listen to the sounds of rain or the wind in the trees.

And one of my favorites is watching the sky, the continuously changing paintings, abstract paintings that appear in the sky, the air, breathing in the air, the scents, the smells of nature, and taking in the entire energy field that surrounds you. If you go within, you encounter your own nature, your own essential nature. I believe it was Ralph Waldo Emerson, the American writer, spiritual writer, 19th century, who said something like, the wick of individual life runs deep into the oil of pure being.

That's an interesting analogy and quite a powerful one. The wick, if English is not your native language and you happen not to know what wick is, wick is the string that is in the candle that you light that draws up the wax. So it's a string in an oil lamp and you light the wick that sticks out of the oil and you light it, then it's a flame.

The wick draws up the oil, that oil is then consumed by the flame. So that's the wick. And in this analogy, he said, the wick of individual life, your individual life, runs deep into the oil of pure being.

So that means there is a great depth within you and your individual consciousness derives its sustenance from the greater universal consciousness. It's only a manifestation or an emanation of the greater one consciousness that you also are, that you are more fundamentally than the individual, the wick that's burning on the surface. You are a surface phenomenon on the level of your physical body and the sense-perceived, all the sense-perceived aspects of yourself and even your thinking, although your thinking already exists in the realm of invisibility, nobody has ever seen a thought, you cannot see a thought, you cannot perceive it with your senses.

And yet even thinking is a relatively superficial or surface phenomenon, it belongs to the dimension of your individual form. But there could be no thinking and there could be no sense-perception if you were not connected to something deeper, which is consciousness. So you are an emanation of something very profound, very deep, that connects you with the totality of the universe.

Now the important thing is to realize the truth of this directly, which means to sense that depth in you here and now, so that in addition to knowing yourself as an individual person, in the analogy that Emerson used, that's the wick, in addition to knowing yourself as an individual person surrounded by many other individual persons and life forms, in addition to that you are aware of a deeper dimension within yourself. And when I say you are aware of it, it may not be totally correct, because the awareness, when you become aware of your own awareness, when you become aware of the fact that you are conscious right now, and you can only become aware of that if for a moment there's no thinking and yet you have not fallen asleep, for a moment there's a cessation of thinking, like now.

What do you need to think about now? Nothing. For a moment there's no thinking.

In that moment there's a stillness, an alert stillness. That is the awareness of who you are beyond your individual form. That is the beginning of the pure being that Emerson speaks of.

It's not that difficult, especially here, right here and now, where you're not being disturbed, hopefully, by all the demands that the world normally places upon you. It's not that difficult here and now to have these brief moments, and perhaps even longer moments, when you are aware of an inner alert stillness. Cessation of thinking.

What remains is consciousness prior to thought. Consciousness before it becomes a thought. And that I sometimes describe as the deep I, as opposed to the surface.

I'm not talking about this I, because that's also interesting analogy, but I'm talking about the first person singular I pronoun. The deep I is that being, the I am, awareness of the I am-ness, being-ness. The surface I that you normally identify with, and that normally when you use the word I in everyday usage, you refer to the surface I.

Your personality, your person that you are. The bundle of thoughts and emotions that form make up the personality. That's the surface I.

And in the absence of thought activity, the surface I subsides. And if you have not fallen below thought and towards sleep, but have risen above thought, then there is an alert stillness, not a tired stillness. That is the essence of who you are, as that is the unconditioned consciousness.

And it's so close, it's not that difficult to experience, to realize, this alive depth in you, where the personality is transcended. Although you still have, or you still are for a while, of course, also the surface self is still there. And most likely you will again and again become completely identified with the surface self, which is a normal human consciousness, the normal unawakened consciousness, the normal fairly dysfunctional consciousness.

Dysfunctional because it doesn't know its own depth. It doesn't know the root. You're, in other words, dysfunctional because you're out of touch with yourself.

Yourself meaning the deep I, the unconditioned consciousness. You cannot sense that in the background, even while you are acting in this world as a person. This is the aim of awakening means, if you are awakened, first you have glimpses of awakening, where you can sense yourself as this deep I.

That's fine. And then the glimpses are a little longer. And then you may find gradually, in your everyday life, you can live from that deeper place that changes the way in which you think.

Habitual thoughts are still there, but a greater, a deeper intelligence flows into your mind. Your thinking becomes creative, more creative, more alive, less dysfunctional. Doesn't create suffering anymore for yourself and others, because otherwise your thinking creates an enormous amount of suffering, unhappiness.

This is still the case for millions of humans on the planet. So the deepest meaning of Shakespeare's words, to your own self be true, the deepest meaning of that is to be in touch with that pure being, which is the unconditioned consciousness, which is your true being, your true self. It's no longer a separate self.

It connects you to the totality. So this frees you from the prison of your personality. If you are not aware of that deeper dimension to who you are, you are trapped on the surface level of who you are, constantly looking for an enhanced sense of identity on the surface level, where no true and ultimately satisfying sense of identity can ever be found.

And that's the search of the ego, which is the surface self that you are completely identified with. There's complete absence of the realization of who you are beyond that. So the ego is searching, but never finds.

The dictum of the ego says the cause in miracles. The dictum of the ego is seek, but do not find. So you're seeking the enhanced sense of self in many things.

And of course, the ego, usually when people speak of ego, they imagine it's somebody who thinks that he or she is the greatest, a very high opinion of yourself, that you are better than others or have achieved more. That indeed can be one version of the ego. But an equally powerful ego is one that, perhaps even more powerful ego, powerful only in a very relative sense, ultimately there is no power in the ego.

Strong ego might be a better word. An even stronger ego is, and this is a very popular one, especially these days, ego assumes different forms in different historical time periods. Victim, seeing itself, seeing yourself as a victim, very seductive.

You may have heard the expression identity politics, and a lot of that is to do with feeling that you belong to a certain group that has or is continuously being victimized. And of course, yes, there have been obviously groups of people who have been discriminated against and so on. But you as the individual, if you derive the main part of your identity from a sense of victimhood, then you are seriously trapped in an egoic sense of self that is very limiting.

But people look, they look for an identity somewhere. The ego always looks for a bigger sense of identity. And if you or your group can be more of a victim than some other group, then that amplifies your ego.

And then you cannot, you're so trapped, you cannot find your true power. You basically declare yourself to be powerless. And the ego gets amplified by having enemies.

There's a growing number of people, for example, who declare that 50% of humanity is basically their enemy. There are men now who refuse to get involved with women. There's an expression for it, M-G-T-O-W, men going their own way.

They say, well, women don't want to have anything to do with women. They're out to exploit you. And that's already very satisfying.

If you declare already, you have a whole group of people who are basically your enemies, enormously satisfying to the ego. Of course, you have a form identity. You belong to a particular group of people, ethnic, racial, you have a gender, or maybe you're not certain if you have a pure gender anymore, who knows.

But there is obviously a form identity. You are here in a particular form, and you don't need to deny that particular form, whether it's racial or gender or political. You can acknowledge it, honor it also, without mistaking it for your true identity.

So the form, whether it's to do with your race or your national identity, it's all fine. You can honor that, but there's no ultimate self in there. So I speak of form identity and essence identity, the two dimensions.

Form identity becomes ego when that is all you know, and then it becomes very limiting and leads to a lot of dysfunction in the world, collectively and in individual lives. But if, in addition to your form identity, which you clearly recognize and you honor it, form identity includes the body. So you don't say, oh, it's just illusion.

No, you look after the body, exercise, nutrition. It's like a house you inhabit temporarily, that's all. So you don't need to deny completely your form identity, but don't look for yourself in it.

And then comes enormously liberating realization that there's more to you than anything on the level of form. And that's the true meaning of knowing yourself. Knowing yourself is knowing yourself as consciousness, right here and now.

In consciousness, you are not a man, you are not a woman, you're not even young or old, you are not successful or failure. So a great spiritual practice is, as much as possible, to refrain from applying labels to yourself, either when you speak or when you think about yourself. To refrain from applying conceptual labels to yourself, to refrain from identifying yourself through conceptual labels, I am this, I am that, in your thinking or in your speaking.

Now, you may encounter some resistance to this practice, which is the ego. But as you practice that, you'll find it's very liberating not to describe yourself to yourself or to others through any conceptual terminology. Even things like, I'm unhappy, no, let go of that too.

I'm happy, let go of that too. So when you don't apply labels, what's left of you? Well, what's left is the unconditioned consciousness of being.

So on a conceptual level, you don't know who you are anymore, and that's a wonderful state. If conceptually, you don't name any aspect of yourself, and then it was left. Am I nobody?

That's another concept. So I can't describe to you, I don't need to, just try it out. And even while I speak to you here and now, perhaps you're already doing it, especially letting go of the labels that you are really fond of, that you've been identified with for a long time.

You can always pick them up again for practical purposes, it's fine. You might need to describe yourself in certain terms in practical situations. What do you do for a living?

Well, I'm an engineer, or well, I'm this or I'm that. Okay, that's fine. If it's practical, it's good.

And then let go. And then you'll find more and more in daily life, you actually, you go, you walk into a room, you walk along the street, you sit somewhere, and you're there in that state of alert presence, because you've let go of labels. There's much less thinking in your mind now, because there's big spaces, where before there was a clutter of thoughts, bigger and bigger spaces arise within your inner spaces, because a lot of the thinking that you do, the compulsive, addictive thinking is to do with yourself, strengthening these labels.

And your practice is not labeling yourself. You're not a success. You're not a failure.

You're not old. You're not young. You're not happy.

You're not unhappy. You're not ill. It's not a denial.

It's just not living through concepts. So we transcend living through conceptual thinking. And the more you let go of this compulsive, conceptual thinking that strengthens the form identity, then the deeper dimension arises.

It arises because you have not limited yourself anymore through concepts. And then that greater intelligence can inspire you, speak through you, and use you, so to speak, as an instrument or a tool for acting upon this world. It's not just a passive thing.

It has both polarities. It can be active. Then you become truly intelligent.

Not the IQ sense of intelligence, which is a very limited thing. Creative intelligence, which can manifest in many different ways. You lead your life intelligently.

That's perhaps enough for today. I highly recommend that you practice this. And you'll be amazed how wonderful it is to be nobody in particular, just to be a conscious presence.

And then still refer to your form identity. Yes, in practical life it's fine. But not be consumed by it.

And then you can say, I don't know who I am anymore. And that will be a positive statement. I don't know who I am anymore.

Congratulations. We'll have some questions that people have been sending in. So you talk about the importance of choiceless awareness, directly confronting what is without judgment.

You also talk about the primacy of presence as the way to transcend thought, the improper use of which is the cause of our suffering. Another teaching, respected by many, celebrates thought and desire as being responsible for our evolution and the expansion of the universe. While both teachings have much in common, this appears to be an important point of departure that I cannot reconcile.

Can you help clarify? So there seems to be basically two teachings. One is accept what is choiceless awareness, presence.

The other one is using thought to create, to manifest, to transform. Are they separate? Can they be reconciled?

The two represent the two movements of the universe. One is into creation, multiplicity, increasing complexity of life forms. It experienced itself as that.

It loves to create. That's for sure. Because if you look around, even on this planet alone, how many life forms there are, one consciousness perceiving itself through all these different forms in different ways.

And then the universe also wants to know its own source. And that's the return movement. First is the outbound movement.

And then there's the return movement. This might correspond to the Big Bang, what scientists call, which the universe came out of nothing. And suddenly it expanded and went into creativity.

And life forms began to multiply over billions of years. And then the story goes that eventually it will come together again and return to the one. In that case, that would be like the in-breath and the out-breath of God, the entire universe.

God breathes out and then it all returns back to the source for some reason that we could not even fathom. But that seems to correspond to what we do because we have a heart that also goes, and we also breathe in and breathe out. And we also wake up in the morning and do all our activities.

And at nighttime, we go, and then we go, ah. Now everything is reflected on every level. You are a microcosm of the entire universe.

So if you observe yourself, you observe how the heart works, how the breathing operates, how the sleep and wakefulness, dreamless sleep, dream state, the so-called wakeful state, which is not that wakeful for most people, but then certainly is a similar pattern everywhere. So the universe has the both movements, the creative and the return to stillness, the return to source. Every human has that incredible, the irresistible impulse every night to return to source.

If you can't resist it, it's called tiredness. And if you try to keep your eyes open, you can for a while, but you would go insane if you didn't sleep. We regard it as normal that people just drop unconscious every 15 hours or whatever.

Everybody drops unconscious. Isn't that weird? But it's so normal that nobody questions it.

You will also notice when you get really tired or how irresistible the pull is towards sleep. There's a sweetness to sleep. The more tired you get, the more you feel I need to get something.

The pull is so irresistible that people give up their life to sleep. People have been lost in the wilderness, out in the cold, in the snow, can't walk anymore. And they know if I fall asleep, I'm never going to wake up again.

And yet at some point they do it because it feels so good. They have to go there. Oh, it doesn't matter if I don't wake up again.

I want to go back to the source. So every human goes back to oneness, but doesn't know it unknowingly and then comes back out. So here we have, if you really look at yourself, that will tell you many secrets about the universe.

I'm talking about this because this is how the two movements are reconciled. The universe needs both. It needs the creativity.

It needs also the stillness. And for humans, it's not enough to go unconsciously to the source. It's our destiny because it's the destiny of the universe for us to consciously unite with source, source consciousness.

And that's why we are here. So your life needs to be a balance, a dance between creating and not getting lost in your creations, which means not getting lost in the mind, being able to use the mind to create, but for conscious creation, because for a long, long time, the humans created their lives, but unconsciously they lost themselves in their creation. They lost themselves in the mind.

Whenever you get stressed, you are lost in your creation. You are lost in your activity. So allowing the unconditioned consciousness, which is the universe to create through you, rather than being a little ego that says, I need to be happy.

I need this and this and this and this in my life. The course in miracle says, how do I know when something is ego motivated, something has been ego motivated? Well, it's easy to know.

It says when you achieve it, it doesn't satisfy you. Maybe for a little while, but not for long, very briefly. So no egoic achievement satisfies you.

What is the motivation for creation? If you're already accepting of the present moment, if you feel completely at one with the isness of the present moment, there are two reasons why you take action here. One may be as a response to a situation that requires action.

You may be stranded somewhere without food. So you need to walk somewhere to get food and shelter. In the meantime, you can internally accept where you are.

You are right here. And then you see what this present moment requires. It requires you to take a step and then another step and another step until the situation is resolved.

So certain situations, somebody may need help. You can sit at ease contemplating nature and suddenly there's a human being who says, oh, help me. Do you sit there and say, no, I'm too at ease in the present moment.

So a situation you respond to whatever the situation, the present moment requires you to do, you respond from within. That's a natural thing. A teenager, I lived with my dad in Spain for a few years and he had gone to Spain to drop out and lead an alternative life.

And then he ran out of money. And then when I was there, we had so little money, we had not even a fridge. I mean, almost everybody had a fridge, but there in the hot summer in Spain, no fridge, no radio, no television.

Of course, I don't even think of it. So basically just the minimum. And I wasn't dreadfully unhappy because of that.

I should, to some extent, I accepted it because I was still young enough. Children find it perhaps easier to accept situations that they go into. But normally if I lived in a place like that now, I have no fridge, only basic things to live with.

Things get, I can't buy anything in advance. I have to go shopping every day because everything goes off immediately. And if you leave anything on the kitchen counter, immediately armies of ants come in and eat it.

I'd rather move than be here. You can accept that this is where I am right now. It can still be fine, but you would start looking, I'd like to live somewhere else.

Everybody has a preference. Some Buddhists might talk to you about, or some masters say, I have no preference whatsoever, but they live in an ashram. So they'd rather be in an ashram than be on Wall Street and work there.

So there must be some preference. There's nothing wrong with having a preference. I'd rather have a comfortable place than an uncomfortable place.

But if I cannot have a comfortable place, I will be perfectly okay with an uncomfortable place. If it's not possible, one thing is responding to situation and having preferences and then taking action. Another one is bringing about something entirely new into this world.

That comes when you are able to become still enough so that you know what the universe or the one consciousness wants you to do, if it wants you to do something. It may take a while before you know that. I lived for years doing relatively little, except doing occasional counseling sessions, sometimes only two a week.

And the years passed and I was just continuously just in presence on my bicycle, chopping wood, carrying water, and the years passed. I spent hours in thoughtless awareness in London, sitting on the Hampstead Heath. Three hours later, I go home having a little salad and then having a counseling session at five.

And I wondered, there must be something else that I'm supposed to do. And there was even slight moments of, what am I doing here? But there was nothing else to do than be present, just go back to Hampstead Heath, sit there again.

There were long periods also of incredibly blissful states that people noticed, even people who are not tuned into spirituality particularly say, I can feel something. What is that? There were great states of emanation of peace, but I wasn't doing anything.

It was just that emanation, sometimes waiters or waitresses, occasionally I went to little restaurants, they felt something, but still nothing. The universe still wasn't telling me what I was supposed to do. And I believe the decisive change came, perhaps I should have thought of that earlier.

I had moved out of London to Somerset and lived in Glastonbury, the spiritual Mecca that attracts all kinds of weird people, including myself. There was a village just a few miles out of there, so I would sometimes go there and there's an ancient, like the English villages, they have their ancient church, sometimes a thousand years old, a few houses around it. There was an oak tree, I would go to an ancient oak tree in the middle of the field, magnificent, and I had a wonderful relationship with that tree.

But that church that was always empty, I went into that church and one day I went in and suddenly I had this impulse to say, I want acceleration now. I knew there was something for me to do. I clearly demanded acceleration of my life purpose.

And then I went home again and for maybe three months, two or three months, nothing happened. I'd forgotten about it already. And then one day it came.

It came when I woke up and I suddenly, I knew as a thought and a deeper knowing, I have to move to the West Coast of North America. Why? I don't know.

It wasn't just one day it stayed, the next day it was still there, the next week it was still there, the week is still there. And then finally I had to leave, couldn't not leave. If I had not left, I would have died.

So that was the first step in writing The Power of Now, because I needed to be in the energy field of the West Coast for some reason to write it. And that's how the book started when a few weeks after arriving on the West Coast, it started. And then it accelerated from there.

It slowly, it went, just the book took three years with on and off because I had to go back to England several times. And then the acceleration, it came more and more, but after The Power of Now came out more and then it'd be so much that I almost wanted to put the brake on. The power just grew and grew, but it came because for years I went so deep within that eventually the outer movement into creation, the outward creation reflected the depths of years of going within into just into stillness and deep into stillness.

So the outward creation reflected the inward movement. It was as powerful out there as it was the power that was in the inward movement. So you too will find that the more you align yourself with the essence, the stillness within the unconditioned consciousness, there might be a time gap, but hopefully not as many years as in my case, there may be a time gap, but that the power that is within you, that you sense when you become aware of yourself as the consciousness then flows through you.

And that is what creates through you, not the little ego anymore. So you don't create because you think when I achieve this or that, I'm going to be happy and fulfilled, something deeper than happiness. The fulfillment is already here now.

The true creation cannot come out of a neediness. That's egoic creation. It doesn't make you happy.

The non-egoic creation that consciousness uses you as an instrument, uses this form as an instrument, comes out of the inner fullness. So the creation comes from within to without. It creates the outward from within rather than needing to attract something from the outside.

You can only create out of this fullness that you sense when you're in touch with presence and only for those people who are meant to create. As I said before, there are certain others who will not be drawn towards that. In them, consciousness will express itself in different ways that will not be creating something new out there.

It will just be bringing this new consciousness into this world, wherever they are and contributing to the new consciousness simply by embodying it. So it is not the case that the two seemingly incompatible camps, those who say the important thing is to use thought to create and the others say, no, just be with what is. The two actually need to be together.

You need to be deeply aligned with the present moment before you can be a real creator. And you are not the creator, the consciousness creates through you. If you are not fully aligned with the present moment, you are not fully aligned with the unconditioned consciousness.

And then it can only come through in little trickles through you because any resistance of any kind closes the channel or narrows it. So the very little can come through creativity, aliveness, and even knowing what it is that wants to be created through you. That is the question.

The question is not what do I want to create? What is it that wants to be created through me? And that answer, for those of you who are meant to manifest new things in this world, the answer may already be there in you.

You may already be engaged in creating that. You may already be engaged in a small way, doing something that you love. One important thing that you recognize when you create, when you manifest, the enjoyment that is in the activity.

That is a clear sign that it is not an egoic activity. The egoic activity very quickly gets stressed and anxious. And when little obstacles arise or big obstacles, it gets, and then it starts fighting with others and you make yourself unhappy while you're trying to create something and make others unhappy who come into contact with you.

But the creativity is joyful. It was a great joy for me to write when the first book, The Power of Now, was incredibly joyful every morning. Occasionally a block came and I just had to sit there and it was still fine.

And then the flow comes again. It is high energy flows through you. It's a beautiful thing when it comes, this incredibly high energy.

And you know very well, this goes far beyond your little person. Anything that little me could do, you're just receptive for it. And then the flow comes.

What form it takes varies from person to person. The ego always tries to get in there somehow. If you get stressed, it's ego.

If you're enjoying what you're doing, then you are connected with the deeper level within yourself. And the joy itself is a great power. The joy that comes in the doing.

It also means you don't need the outcome to be fulfilled or happy. If you need the outcome hoping that finally you will reach that and then it'll make you happy and fulfilled, that will be egoic. And when you achieve it, it won't satisfy you.

Or you will already have destroyed your health through stress for several years and when you finally get there, you die. Unsatisfied. But joyful creation actually reconciles the two.

Joyful creation reconciles being in the present moment and having a goal. You know what you want to create, but the important thing is the action that you take at this moment. That's joyful creation.

So it's so simple. Joyful creation reconciles the seemingly incompatible camps of being in the present moment and going somewhere, trying to achieve something. It's an art also that the foundation for it is stillness.

So before you go into creation, the two can be reconciled. Yes, they perfectly reconciled. The foundation is the yes to the present moment.

Eckhart Tolle The Deep Mystery Of Existence [2aadea8c-4717-47a9-bd6e-70f25f16e784]

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 1:02)

The deep mystery of existence. In this episode, Eckhart answers questions from a live audience. A mother asks what to do for her 13-year-old son who's already struggling with difficult behaviors.

A man asks how to bring the wisdom from Eckhart's retreats into his daily life. And a woman ponders the difference between a creative impulse and the ego. She asks Eckhart about his decision to move from England to the Pacific Northwest.

And Eckhart explains when the impulse continued for quite some time, he knew he had to follow it. But that's not always the case. Eckhart urges everyone to stay connected to their deepest awareness, especially when life's challenges arise and things don't go our way.

He explains why instead of reacting with irritation, anger and fear towards a situation, we should instead surrender. He says, obstacles are not enemies. They are here to help us awaken.

[Speaker 2] (1:05 - 2:16)

Hello, Eckhart, hello everyone. Thank you for the opportunity. So I've been struggling a little with the discernment of my ego wanting to contribute to the world or it being a true energy impulse.

I'm at a grateful practice and I'm very grateful for life in general and for all the blessings and challenges. And it's thanks to your practice, your teaching. But I find myself at a point where there is space for more inspired doing.

But depending on the day, the energy comes and goes, it waxes and wanes. And I enjoy the being part more than the doing. So I would love to ask you, Eckhart, about your impulse to move to the West Coast of North America.

And specifically, what did that energy feel like? And did you ever doubt it, the impulse to move or to write that book? Or how much was it about your discipline and work ethic as opposed to flow?

[Speaker 1] (2:17 - 6:59)

Right, thank you, thank you. Sometimes an impulse comes to initiate a change in your life, as it did in my case. It's good to wait if the impulse comes and see if it stays with you for a while.

It comes back down, it doesn't go away after a few days. The impulse comes and it's still there, it might even grow. And it became very strong.

And I didn't doubt it anymore, because I knew if I had not obeyed this impulse, I probably would have fallen ill or something bad would have happened. I knew I had to follow this impulse and didn't know for what reason yet. When finally I started writing The Path Now, suddenly when I was on the West Coast, I had moved there without knowing why.

And only much, much, much later, I realized that this energy field on the West Coast of North America, I needed that for some reason so that to give birth to The Path Now. I didn't realize it until I went back to England a couple of times and the writing flow stopped. Now, another question of yours is, does it, is it discipline that's required or is it hard work or that kind of thing?

That's, there is an intensity there, an intensity of energy. And that is the flow. Let's talk about writing, for example.

The flow of writing was strong, but it wasn't automatic there every day because it takes time to write a book, especially if you write slowly. I'm a very slow writer, but I had great respect for what I knew needed to happen. I knew that this book needed to be written.

From the first line, I knew that that was a book that needed to be written. And I made room for it in my life every day, every morning I would sit at the desk, even if, because the impulse wasn't necessarily there every day. Sometimes there just wasn't space there.

And so I honored it. And occasionally there was just a trickle that came. And then on other days, there was a huge flow.

And then another day, there were days when nothing came. And I wasn't unhappy about that. I knew my task is to be here, receptive for it to happen and to use my mind.

And it's, when the flow was there, it was extremely joyful and energizing, not only in the moment of writing, but the whole days went by, when the entire day felt energized. There was an energy stream, high intensity of energy. They could even be mistaken perhaps by an outside observer as stressful, but there was no stress in it.

When you are not connected to the deeper being, the deeper, when high energy comes, it can easily degenerate into stress. And people get, they have a big task to do, a big job to do. And they think, well, or even I have to write this book.

I have to, fortunately, I didn't have a deadline. Many writers have deadlines. The publisher gave them deadlines.

So there was no deadline. Many people, when they are in the act of creation, they easily lose connectedness with the deeper level of their being, the being ultimately. They lose themselves in the doing, and they think obstacles become enemies.

When things don't go right in the act of creation, they get stressed and annoyed and reactive and angry. So this did not happen. I wasn't even particularly concerned with whether the book would be successful or not.

I just knew it had to be, I had to give birth to it. So in your case, I understand from your question that you need to, you feel you want to do more to bring consciousness, but you're already doing certain things by being conscious and interacting with people around you in a conscious manner. That is already a contribution, but you believe, and I can understand that, there's more than you could do, that you could do, is that right?

[Speaker 2] (7:00 - 7:25)

Yeah, I do feel that there's some more space for the doing. I just naturally like to be more in the being part. And so for me, the doing is a little more challenging, but it hasn't really left me because I have been watching it.

So I don't know if it's about courage and being more brave, or I should just wait until I'm really sure. I mean, you know.

[Speaker 1] (7:25 - 18:08)

But there was a time before I moved to the West Coast, before the impulse came, for quite a few years, I had been doing counseling sessions with people, spiritual sessions with people, and small workshops with people, weekend workshops. I was not very well known. I'm just very small scale workshops, but very enjoyable.

Often, maybe once a month, I would do a weekend workshop. Sometimes 10 people came, sometimes five. There was one workshop that I had announced, one, only one person turned up for a weekend workshop in England.

And I said, do you want to do it? Yes, okay, let's do it. So I did the workshop with one person.

That was an important learning process because the teaching began to be formulated through the counseling sessions and workshops. And I would take notes after sessions quite often of what I had said in response to questions, because I often said things that I didn't know before. They came out of presence.

I was just, my main job was to be present with sitting with one person. My main job was to be present, open, receptive, and then often answers came, sometimes through me, sometimes through the other person, or sometimes the question dissolved because it became irrelevant. So that was a wonderful thing that went on for a few years.

And then I contemplated this and I felt something extremely valuable that is on offer here, but I'm not reaching more people after several years. And the moment came when I was visiting in Somerset, England, a small village. I went into a village church, very ancient, one of these wonderful ancient churches that every English village has.

Nine, eight, 900 years old, nobody in there, and they sat there. It was interesting altar with interesting symbols. And then I was contemplating all this, and suddenly I had this impulse to say, I want acceleration, please.

I said, please give me acceleration in the work that I do. And that was a meditation on acceleration. And then for a few weeks, nothing happened.

And then after, I don't know, four or five weeks, the impulse came, I need to move. I didn't know that that was the acceleration I had asked for. I'd almost forgotten about it.

But I believe now there's a connection between asking for acceleration and suddenly feeling I'm going to change my life, totally move, leave the country, get rid of everything, go into a complete unknown with a limited amount of money and just do it. And that was part of the acceleration. I didn't realize it much later and retrospectively, oh, that's where it started.

So this is one way of asking for it. Sometimes you may get some kind of impulse to see what it is that you might want to do to contribute to the awakening of consciousness. And our contemporary world offers many possibilities.

As you know, for example, every human being, although there's a lot of negativity happening on the internet and all that, but on the other hand, every human being can reach millions of humans. You no longer need intermediaries to reach other humans. And you don't have gatekeepers unless you become political.

You don't have gatekeepers anymore. You can put out anything you like. And a lot of it, of course, is human unconsciousness that being disseminated through the internet.

But potentially you can also, as we are doing here now, it can also be used for the awakening of consciousness. And this is not only to you, but to anybody who don't know, who have already had a certain degree of awakening within themselves. The first step you could take is to post a little meditation on YouTube or whatever it is you want to post.

Some people may find it helpful. Or talk about yourself and what has been helpful for you. This is just one example.

You could do, countless possibilities are there. And then a few humans, you may reach a few. And if they are helped by this, then it'll spread more to others.

And this is just one way you can reach many, many humans. And we need more consciousness in the whole, the internet phenomenon, because at the moment it is largely dominated by unconsciousness and dysfunction. It amplifies egoic dysfunction.

Facebook, Instagram, et cetera, where people create images of who they are, project them into the outside world, where for many young people, the virtual world is more real than nature and the real world and real human interactions. There's very harmful things. It can affect human consciousness in a very detrimental and destructive way.

It's in itself, it may be neutral, but it's already affecting many youngsters in a very harmful way, amplifying the human ego, amplifying reactivity and so on. So we need to counteract that and use it for good, for consciousness. So it needs people to do that, quite a few are doing it already.

And this could just be a starting point, whether, or even some people even, occasionally I look, some people even post just good, wonderful quotes from others. So some people are quite popular. They just, every other day, they post a spiritual quote, an uplifting or something that takes it deeper.

All kinds of possibilities are there already, if you want to start reaching people and see where it goes from there. So I've said to quite a few people, well, go start there, get a camera. And even if you don't know what to say, that's a good starting point, not knowing what to say and being comfortable with not knowing what to say.

So you start with a moment of just being, and then perhaps a few words will come. If you're not comfortable with that, then you might prepare a few points. I would advise against reading a script because the power will be lost if you just read a script, there will be a loss of power in your transmission.

If you have a few points that you need to mention, that may be fine. So many things are possible. There are also people who produce, there's a lot of, quite a lot of creativity online also, apart from the dysfunction.

Some people produce wonderful things on nature, making viewers more conscious of nature. Some humans produce little works of art, just every day looking at trees and flowers and so on. Many, many things are possible.

If you start with one, even that one thing may not lead to anything, but that may take you somewhere else, perhaps where you meet someone and then someone presents another opportunity to you, but it's good to start somewhere, whatever it may be, take a fast step and then go from there. In the meantime, don't overlook the fact that your state of consciousness is already important, even if you don't reach anybody, because you're connected to the totality of consciousness and one human being awakening affects the totality of the human collective of consciousness, even if you don't physically interact with other people. So even though, don't overlook that you're already contributing significantly, even though on a physical level, you may not be reaching anybody or many people.

Also, your human interactions, if you are present with other humans, that there is an outflow from you of goodwill, of benevolence, of loving kindness to the humans you come into contact with. That's already a very important contribution to a change in consciousness. So if you are present, you affect every human that you come into contact with also with that presence, because when you are present, your interactions are not dominated by the human ego, but loving kindness.

Loving kindness is a nice word. Empathy with other humans, feel a sense of connectedness or oneness, because you can sense the being of the other beyond the personality. In that way, you're already changing the world too.

So you're, and I believe you're already, your state of consciousness is always reflected in your interactions with other human beings. And there already, you're making an important contribution, even though you may only reach 20 people on a regular basis or whatever it may be, don't underestimate the importance of that also.

[Speaker 2] (18:09 - 18:13)

Thank you. Thank you. Appreciate it.

[Speaker 1] (18:13 - 18:14)

Thank you.

[Speaker 5] (18:16 - 19:09)

Hi, I'll read you my question. My 13 year old son has built such a thick shell of ego around himself that he's been suffering for years. And he's completely identified with his quite nasty mind, and he has no way of getting out.

It's hard to know how to help him. I have in my head that someone said that a child builds their ego, and as an adult, we dismantle it. But he's suffering, he's only 13.

And I wonder if he's too young to start to learn to die to self. Is he formed enough for that? We've talked a little bit about this.

He's not sure he has an essence because he's never felt it. So he thinks all he is is his mind. And so I don't know where to start.

[Speaker 1] (19:10 - 26:36)

Great, thank you. Thank you. Well, it is not uncommon for adolescents particularly to develop, not everybody does, but it's not uncommon for a less to develop a very strong, very strong ego.

He started when he was three. Yeah, well, egos start to redevelop at an early age. In some cases, quite a few cases, but not necessarily so.

In some cases, it is due to overindulgent parenting can contribute to that. Overindulgent parenting where nothing the child does is ever wrong. They never have any, well, whatever they do, they never experience any consequences for their actions because the parents want to give them total freedom.

It's an interesting idea. They want the child to develop totally freely. So give them immediately what they want.

They want the child to be happy. Give them what they need immediately. They want the child to feel good about themselves.

So they get a lot of praise. You are the greatest. You are wonderful.

And even at schools these days, sometimes you get trophies just for participating, not for winning anymore. There's a good side and a bad side to that. On the good side, it's yes, it's great.

It makes them feel good. I wish they'd had participation trophies when I was at school because I never got a trophy because I didn't win in sports events and so on. So I didn't get them.

But there's a negative side to these things, to saying, child, you are so wonderful. Because then they develop a delusional idea about who they are, about themselves. Now, there's not much you can do right now.

He is certainly not ready at this point. The fact is that if this ego is now going to control him and as he begins to go into life, begins to have relationships and so on, it is inevitable that he will experience suffering, mostly self-generated. Suffering generated in relationships that he enters, whether by suffering, other situations, whether job situations, whatever it may be.

If he has a strong ego, a very strong ego, it is virtually inevitable that he will generate a lot of conflict and suffering for himself, for others too, which is what egos do. They don't know that they're doing it. And the suffering potentially and eventually will bring about a crack in the egoic cell.

It'll crack it open at some point. That's the moment to wait for. And then when that happens, now, when this will happen, we don't know whether it'll happen five years from now, 10, 15, 20 years from now, we don't know when that will happen.

But the humans with very, very strong egos produce a lot of suffering for themselves and others. And for a long time, they will perceive all their problems as coming from other people. That's the normal thing, how an ego operates.

All that's wrong with the world, all that's wrong with their lives is blamed on others and other situations. And then they suffer more and more. And then a moment may come, in some people it never comes, but I believe because your presence is probably helpful, although there's not much you can do right now, but when the suffering really starts, then your presence may be helpful and perhaps accelerate a transcendence of ego.

Sometimes not necessarily by saying anything, but just by being there or saying something when the right moment arises. At this moment, all you can do is compassionate, realize that's not who he ultimately is. It is something that has come into him.

It's part of the evolution of humanity. And so he's a manifestation of the evolution of the human ego. And not confuse, important for you, not to confuse this egoic almost entity, although it's not an entity, but one can look at it as an entity, with who he is, because there is an essence there.

He hasn't found it. And it's maybe hard to see, but at some point when it happens, when the marriage breaks down or his second marriage breaks down or he has other relationship that create havoc, all we can hope for is that the consequences that come from egoic unconsciousness are not going to be too destructive and overwhelming as for example, it happens if youngsters sometimes, sometimes parents, they give them when they're 17 or 18, they love their child so much that on their birthday, they give them a sports car, Porsche, whatever.

Oh, there, I want to make my child happy. And then the child's ego gets even bigger because the Porsche becomes part of their ego. And then they have a few weeks later, they have a disaster, cause a disaster accident.

This many, many cases like that everywhere. Let's hope that this is not the suffering that he finds will not be of that kind, but it will be suffering. And ultimately that is the path of awakening for humans.

The stronger the ego, the stronger the suffering, but that ultimately is how it's meant to be because that is how humans evolve. He is lucky that he has you in his life because when the moment comes and he's ready, you will be there to help him. In the meantime, all you can do is observe compassionately, do what you can.

Don't try to get rid of his ego. It's not going to work. You may not even succeed in trying to find his, the being, the presence.

He's not quite right. It seems he's not ready for that, but that's fine. Now, important that when the suffering begins for him, it's important that you're not too reactive, that you recognize it for what it is because otherwise you get drawn into the suffering.

So it's empathy, yes, compassion, yes, but also wisdom to see why it is happening.

[Speaker 5] (26:37 - 26:48)

Okay, so as a parent, if he were your son, you wouldn't even talk with him about the difference between an ego and an essence and you would leave that?

[Speaker 1] (26:48 - 27:40)

I would leave that. Okay. What I might do is take my child into nature because nature can temporarily free you from some ego, especially also interacting with nature, doing something in nature.

Okay. That I would do as much as possible to take him out of, he probably also uses these devices, whatever they use, screens. Also take some time off, take him out into nature.

That is, can be very healing and temporarily alleviate the burden of ego as much as possible, nature. That would probably be my main strategy. Thank you.

Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (27:40 - 29:07)

Thank you so much for everything, taking the time tonight, but just being on this journey with me. And it's just been, I had to say that this evening. So it wasn't part of the question, but I had to say it, Dr. Thank you so much. My question is when I'm watching your videos or reading your books, listening to audio, I am overcome with this feeling of peace, almost like a love, something that I've never felt before that I can't even describe. How do I take that feeling? This is a two-parter.

How do I take that feeling, Eckhart, into the world with me? Because it's there, I'm feeling it now, and maybe I'll feel it a little later on, but I find it starts to dissipate. The second thing, and if you can answer both, great.

When you were speaking or when I'm reading your work, there's an understanding and a realization of how things are, but I tend to forget them. And I have to go back and it's, why do I understand when I'm with you right now? And I'm like, ah, yes, that makes sense.

And then I'm in reality and I'm like, what was that again? And why doesn't that make sense anymore?

[Speaker 1] (29:08 - 42:00)

Right, thank you. Now, it's probably not necessary to remember that much from what is being said. The essence of our being together is not really a conceptual.

It's more to participate, to join in the arising presence. And what I offer you for the time being is a reflection of the presence in you. Not your presence, but the presence that is driving through what looks like you.

And it recognizes itself. So when you, what you sense in me, you sense it in yourself. So it is yourself that you are sensing, not me.

So I give you that reflection of yourself. So it's not me. And so when you're not with me, which means the reflection isn't there, then you cannot that easily find that connection because it can, the world comes back in and you lose that connection.

And so my advice would be to create openings in your daily life for this to arise again, but not look for it. That feeling of whatever you want to use to describe it, that connectedness, the aliveness, peace, joy, whatever it is that you sense being really more fully yourself, not the person self, but not trying to regain that, but create a space for it to happen. And you create a space for it to happen.

Again, I'll mention again, what I just said to the previous questioner. One example we can do this is by giving attention to nature, going out into nature and connect with it by giving it your fullest attention, sensory attention. And once you've given it sensory attention fully, which means thinking subsides because you're just perceiving, then you become aware of two things, but it's ultimately one thing, but it looks like two things.

One thing you become aware of is yourself as the underlying awareness when you look at this tree or the flower, or just a meadow or blade of grass, or flowing river, or the sky, whatever it may be, or bird, or cat, or dog. You become aware of yourself as the awareness. And that is, you're regaining that now by becoming aware of yourself.

Nature is more helpful than the man-made, the human-made world, because in the human-made world, everything is done through the human mind. So it's not as easy to take you out of your mind when you're surrounded by mind-made things. So in the middle of a city, you're surrounded by mind-made things, or there may be a tree here and there, that's good.

Sky will still be there, that's good. But you will be surrounded by mind-made things. When you're really very present, even that is fine.

And when you're really very present already and deeply rooted in presence, you can find the consciousness even in mind-made things. But in the meantime, nature is easier. Use nature as a portal to find yourself.

Now, I mentioned two things. The one thing was when you contemplate nature, sometimes you may contemplate just one thing in nature, like a tree or a flower. At other times, you may contemplate a totality of a landscape or maybe a park, and you see the totality of the park.

Or you see the sky, you might look at one cloud, or you see the totality of the sky. Nature can be either one thing or it can be many things, a field, a meadow, whatever it may be. That's all fine.

Doesn't matter whether it's a more expansive thing or one thing. And then you become aware of yourself, as I said, as the underlying awareness. And so there's perception and there's presence.

In other words, you're very still while you're perceiving. And then the next thing was not really the next thing because they come together. And I also talked about that earlier on at the beginning of our session.

You can then also sense that there's more to the tree or to the meadow or the sky than meets the eye. You can then also sense that there's an inherent aliveness in that tree that transcends what you see with your senses. You can also realize that what you call tree is really a mystery.

By calling it tree, you create the illusion that you know what it is. And if you completely believe in every label that the mind creates, you begin to inhabit a dead universe and the mystery is gone. And you believe that you know, but all you do, and I'm not doing just to you personally, but to all humans, all you've done is created mental labels and mistake that as an explanation for the deep mystery of existence and of every being.

In other words, when you're relating through mental labels, you cannot sense the depth in anything. Nothing has any depth anymore. There's a philosopher who used the term, it was Ken Wilber, spiritual philosopher.

I don't know if he used it with reference to what I'm talking about, but I think in some way he did. He has the term flat land. You inhabit a flat land.

It has no depth to it whatsoever. And this is how many humans perceive reality. Nothing has any depth.

There's no soul in it. They can't perceive the soul in the tree, the inherent aliveness and the mystery of it and the beauty of it that's hiding there beyond sensory. So then the two things, which are not ultimately two, you can sense the awareness that is the light in which these things appear.

And you can also sense that which is beyond sensory perception in that which you are perceiving. It's no longer flat land. There is a depth to it.

There's a mystery to it. And you then realize that what you call it a tree or dismissed as an oak tree, it's a nice oak tree. How old is it?

Okay, now I know. That's why Krishnamurti, the spiritual teacher said, when you teach a child the name of the bird, the child will never see that bird again. In other words, the concept has replaced the realization of the actuality of that mystery.

So don't inhabit a world of labels. Remove labels, use labels when you need them, but not become captivated by concepts and mental labels. Experience the world beyond that and know yourself who you are yourself beyond any mental label, any conceptual reality.

So nature is helpful. Create that. One other thing I'd like to recommend is moments in your daily life of awareness.

Invite awareness into brief moments when you're just, I sometimes say, take a conscious breath, one conscious breath. One conscious breath is you give fullest attention to the act of breathing. Not particularly feeling that I'm now doing a conscious breath, but simply loving the breath that's happening anyway.

So to feel the in-breath and the out-breath, give it your fullest attention. Maybe even two conscious breaths, three perhaps, but even one is a good thing because one creates a moment of inner spaciousness because while you're giving your fullest attention to the breath, you cannot be thinking. You're thinking, you're no longer giving your attention to the breathing.

You can either give your attention to the breathing or you can be thinking. So a good way to step out of thinking when you don't want it is breath awareness. Of course, it's even been developed into a whole meditation method.

So some people sit for half an hour, one hour observing their breath. That's fine too. But I believe that these mini meditations are extremely helpful because each time they create an inner space, they reduce the mental clutter.

And it's like clouds parting, cloudy sky. And suddenly as you take one or two conscious breaths, the clouds part and then you see the blue vastness beyond the clouds. And that's in you.

So many moments during the day, some breath awareness that is a very helpful tool. Last thing, again, it's an invitation of presence. Choose every day one or two activities.

They could be routine activities that you do and do them consciously. Not nothing that takes too long. Do them consciously without looking for the end result.

Making a cup of coffee, a cup of tea. Preparing some breakfast. If you use an elevator every day, very helpful.

You press the button to call the elevator and instead of looking at your phone, as many people do, just be there consciously. You may want to take a conscious breath or not, or just be there. And then you step into the elevator and then even there, you can still be there while the elevator travels.

So every time you use it, it's a practice of presence every time. Or if you use stairs where you work or at home, as much as possible, every time you go up or down, be conscious of every step. So you break the momentum of the mind that always drags you along to the next thing and the next thing and the next thing.

So it's a very different way of going up or down the stairs, whether you're conscious of every step or whether you just want to get to the top or the bottom of the staircase. Very different way of going up or down the stairs. One last, you can come up with your own practices.

One last one that I like is if you use a car, when you get into your car, you put on the seatbelt and then you wait 30 seconds before you start the car. But don't count the seconds, just approximately 30 seconds. And if your mind tells you, I don't have time for this, it's a lie, there's nobody who doesn't have time for 30 seconds, unless it's a complete emergency.

Your wife is pregnant and you need to get her, give birth, that's different. But otherwise it's 30 seconds, it's very little. And so every time you sit there, but you're not sitting there waiting for the 30 seconds to pass, you sit there just present and contemplate.

Or if you like, one more thing.

[Speaker 6] (42:01 - 42:02)

Please, that's great.

[Speaker 1] (42:03 - 44:31)

There's a traffic light and it's red. Why not make that into every time you wait at a red light, be present. And you may want to look around, but don't lose sight completely of the light because it'll change to green.

But you may look around a bit, peripherally you can still see the red. There's other cars, there may be people. Just be there as an innocent observer of what's going on in your field of vision.

Some people have worked out, and unfortunately I don't remember how much, if a person reaches the age of 70 and since the age of 20, he drives every day to or from work or something. They've worked out how much time they spend waiting at traffic lights in their lifetime. It's an enormous amount of time.

Unfortunately I've forgotten the figure. It's like many months or almost a year, something like that, waiting it. So why not use this as a wonderful opportunity?

In fact, every kind of waiting is an opportunity for practicing. Most people these days, the moment they start waiting for something, they get out their phone. It's an automatic thing.

Most of them don't have anything particular to look at. They're not getting it out because they heard a text message. They're just getting it out because there's nothing else to do.

They have to fill this moment with something, which means mental clutter. I need more mental clutter. And if you're not doing it, somebody next to you is doing it, and then you go, okay, I better do it too.

And so they go like, they're all like this. But if somebody from the past has come, time traveler had come from Roman or Middle Ages or even 100 years ago, you would say these people are crazy. They're in some kind of state of hypnosis.

What has happened to them? They're all like this. And say, oh, the world has gone completely crazy, they would say, the time traveler.

And in some way it has. So obviously there are times when you, when the reason for using these things, maybe there is a message coming in and you want to see what it is, fine. But just at random getting it out because you just can't stand being with yourself, that's crazy.

[Speaker 3] (44:34 - 44:42)

Wonderful information. Thank you so much. Blessings to you and to your team.

Thank you. And to all of you.

[Speaker 1] (44:42 - 44:49)

Thanks. Right. Well, this is our session for today.

[Speaker 4] (44:50 - 45:13)

Thank you. I'm Oprah Winfrey, and you've been listening to Eckhart Tolle, Essential Teachings, the podcast. You can follow these essential teachings on Spotify or wherever you listen to podcasts.

If you haven't yet, go to Spotify and follow this podcast. Join us next week for more enlightened teachings from Eckhart Tolle. Thank you for listening.

Eckhart Tolle The Ego Loves Its Problems [0780472e-2bdc-42b0-9b28-1b645a1ac832]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:56)

The ego loves its problems. In this podcast, Eckhart says one of the hurdles we must confront regularly is our unconscious thinking. He says our relentless self-centered thoughts actually feed the ego and keep us mired in a fictitious sense of self.

He explains the ego loves problems and strengthens its grip by creating suffering for ourselves and others. Eckhart says if we're not growing spiritually when crises strike, they will make us even more unconscious. Eckhart explains there is a paradox.

Suffering can actually push us to awaken because when we can't take the pain anymore, we finally surrender. He says most unhappiness is not the result of life's difficulties. It's our reactions to them.

Eckhart says when we have a foot on the right path, misfortune is no longer an obstacle. Instead, it becomes an opportunity for spiritual growth.

[Speaker 1] (0:58 - 6:39)

This is your continuous practice. Are you able to, as much as possible, let go of habitual, especially habitual, useless, self-serving thinking? Thinking that only feeds the fictitious self, the ego, the entity that loves, actually loves, its problems.

Well, it says, no, I don't love my problems. Yes, you do because you talk and think about them continuously. In fact, you create them continuously.

Through unconscious thinking, you create them. No, no, I don't. Yes, you do.

This entity then becomes, at first you have glimpses, sometimes accidental. They may only be a few seconds, and then perhaps a little bit longer, and then the two gradually, the being and the human, kind of merge. The being seeps into the human, and so the human, the conditioned entity, the human, becomes less and less obnoxious, and less and less dysfunctional, and less and less creating completely unnecessary and absurd suffering for yourself and others, completely unnecessary and absurd suffering created unconsciously by the ego, this entity, in its attempt to strengthen itself.

It loves its problems and its enemies. Oh, I feel much bigger. Anger is great, and really, and you can revive, talk about it all the time.

This is completely asleep, completely asleep. And so, as the awakening happens, presence begins to sometimes completely replace the person, and at other times, it kind of shines through the person, in the same way that a light shines through the lampshade. The light shines through the lampshade, and the person still, yes, the person still has its conditioning, to some extent, and can never be totally free of the conditioning.

There's always certain ways in which you behave that's part to do with how you were brought up, your environment, all the conditioning, the country, even the language that you speak is form of mental conditioning. All those things, they are still there, but the most dysfunctional and unhappiness-creating patterns, they subside more and more. Certain patterns remain, as long as you are a person, a human.

Certain patterns remain, but not the heavy, deeply unhappy and obnoxious patterns, they gradually dissolve, and all is left with certain idiosyncrasies in your personality, and so on. That's okay. So, the person remains, but it undergoes a substantial transformation.

It no longer creates suffering. Even in the face of challenges, because they continue to happen, even as you awaken, the universe will continue to present you with challenges, new ones. No matter what situation you go into, at first you go, oh, this is great, I'm in a new situation, and before you know it, oh, it comes up from behind, another challenge.

The universe won't leave you alone, but if you're not undergoing the awakening process, every challenge that arises will make you more unconscious. It will strengthen the self, the self that is reacting, is reactive, and complaining all the time, and reacting. So, the challenge will make you more unconscious, if you are not awakening yet, and that is, you can verify that, perhaps in your own experience, when things go wrong, there is a reactive entity there, that works itself up.

Either you become angry, or despondent, or whatever the reactivity is. People like, in professions such as lawyers, often encounter people in their most unconscious states, because they tend to go to lawyers when things go wrong, they're being sued, or the divorce is happening. Divorce lawyers, to be a divorce lawyer, potentially, could be a very enlightening job, because you encounter deep human unconsciousness, which most people in a conflict situation like that, become more unconscious than they are normally, deeply unconscious.

[Speaker 3] (6:39 - 7:09)

[Speaker 1] (7:11 - 38:09)

So, when you're being challenged by life, the challenge will create a reaction, and the reaction will, you become completely identified with the reaction, and you become even more unconscious than your normal state, which is unconscious enough, but it's now, it's more unconscious. Can't stop thinking about it. Now, as you're awakening, challenge comes again, and then you suddenly see the possibility of actually being more intensely present when a challenge comes.

It's like, you know what a dimmer switch is on an electrical switch? You can turn up the light, dimmer switch, so when a challenge comes, something goes wrong, so to speak, a difficult person arises, a difficult situation arises, some kind of loss arises, whatever kind of loss it may be. Instead of reacting and becoming more unconscious, you suddenly sense you're becoming more present in the face of a challenge.

And that is when the challenges of the world are becoming helpful to you, rather than make you unconscious. They can intensify the awakening process, and that is the ultimate purpose, really, of all the challenges that humans encounter here. There is a fundamental misconception, an unconscious misconception in human beings, and that misconception is this.

They believe that the world has the ability to make them happy, but this is being withheld from them, and they regard that as a personal insult by life. It's doing, why is life withholding happiness from me? Why all the things always happen to me?

Because it's not happening to others. You read their Facebook posts, and they're all happy. They're eating meals, you see pictures of meals.

Look, I'm eating this, oh okay. And then you see their happy faces. And not only are they happy, they're also so good-looking.

Everybody's good-looking. That's the technology of filters and stuff. Everyone can look beautiful, even I do.

They did it to me, too. So people watch that and say, wow, these people's lives are so great. And then you maybe, then you also pretend, because everybody else is pretending, okay, let's go to a restaurant, take a picture of a meal.

This is what I'm eating right now. So the misconception is, the world is here to make me happy, but it's not doing it. This is a very serious misconception, because it makes your whole life miserable, because that really means that something that should be happening is not happening in my life.

Something is just not happening. But of course, that misconception is that the world is here to make you happy, and it can't do that. It's not here to make you happy.

It's here to make you conscious, to awaken you. Oh, I see. I was wrong all along.

I've been complaining uselessly for 40 years, or whatever your age is. I've been complaining uselessly for 40 years that there's something wrong with the world and my so-called life, but there wasn't anything wrong at all, because the world is here to awaken me. If humans are not challenged, or not just humans, any life form only grows through being challenged, which means encounter obstacles and difficulties.

Even plants and animals, every life form is precarious. Its existence is precarious, and it encounters obstacles to its unfoldment. And that ultimately is how evolution happens, through encountering difficulties, obstacles, challenges.

Because as you encounter the obstacles and challenges, they seem to block you, and you think, life would be much better if I did not have these challenges. But it wouldn't, because you would go to sleep even more. So you have the challenges, and that brings about an influx of energy on whatever level, even if it's physical.

Every organism already encounters challenges on a physical level, and then it grows, it gains new strengths by attempting to overcome these limitations. I sometimes mention example, because it operates on every level. If you want to become physically stronger, you have to exercise, unless you have a job that is already physically, forces you to exert yourself physically.

Otherwise, you have to exercise, and you have to start doing, if you want to grow stronger, you have to lift weights. I'm not doing it anymore, but I'm just demonstrating. Now, how does that feel at first?

What are you doing? The way I put it is this, you are making life difficult for your body, because your body is not going to grow stronger unless you make the body's life difficult. The same with jogging.

The body doesn't really want to do it, but says, no, no, you have to do it. Why are you making life difficult for your body? Your body would be so relaxed sitting on the sofa and watching Netflix.

But it's not growing stronger, it's actually getting weaker, because it's not being challenged. But challenge it, and then there is a demand for added energy. And this just operates on the physical level.

In this demand for added, there's a moment when there's a gap. You're exerting yourself, and the energy isn't there yet, so it's very hard. But at some point, the energy comes flooding in, because there was a demand for it.

And in that point, you may actually begin to enjoy the physical movement, because there's added energy. And suddenly, strength is increasing. And this is just on the physical level.

There's a demand, and it comes also on a psychological level, it can operate. And on a spiritual level, when you become very unhappy in your life, then there is a possibility that the unhappiness causes you to awaken. Because at some point, you realize, either because you've had a spiritual teacher, or teaching, or even to some people, it happens spontaneously.

The psychological suffering that humans undergo can, at some point, when you just can't stand it anymore, and something snaps, and suddenly you, it dissolves, and you're, oh, suddenly an awakening has happened. But it would not have happened if you hadn't gone through those sometimes years of suffering. Quite often, I have encountered people who tell me, I would never have come to you, or understood the books, or been open to anything spiritual, if I had not experienced, in some cases, it's a serious, very serious illness, or an accident, or some deep loss in their personal lives.

And they come, and perhaps some of you, with some of you, that is also the case. There would not have been an opening, if you had not gone through that suffering. And at some point, the suffering awakens you.

And that is really the ultimate purpose of suffering, is to awaken. And then you realize that most suffering is actually unnecessary. It's actually created by the conditioned entity.

Suffering is a psychological phenomenon, and this can be transcended. If you awaken, you transcend that suffering. In other words, you transcend unhappiness.

You are no longer unhappy. The mind loses its power to make you unhappy, because most of your unhappiness is created by unconscious thought processes, not situations. Most of unhappiness is created not by situations, difficult situations that you encounter, but what your mind is telling you about the difficult situations.

The situation itself is as it is. Then you impose an interpretation on it. The interpretation says, this should not be happening.

This is awful. Why? Always to me.

Why did he do that? Etc., etc., etc. Interpretations.

What causes the unhappiness, and strengthens the fictitious self, is the commentary, the interpretation. That is an amazing realization, that most of your unhappiness is created by your mind. And that's an amazing thing.

And then, as you become more present, unhappiness disappears from your life. Now, am I saying that you will then always be happy? No.

Happiness is a little bit superficial to the way I use the term happiness, because it usually means, yeah, ah, it's so great, it's wonderful. It's a bit superficial, although there are some spiritual teachers who use the term happiness pointing to something deeper. For example, Ramana Maharshi says, happiness is your true nature.

But he's using it in a different sense. Obviously, there are situations, even as your unhappiness leaves you, and you become more present, situations arise where you cannot say that you're happy. Somebody close to you dies.

Your father, your mother, or even a child, or somebody, or something very bad, an accident happens to someone, and you can't say, oh, I'm still happy, I'm so happy, he died. No. Sadness will come, if that happens, because that's the human on you, still, the sadness comes.

And yet, you are not consumed by the sadness when it comes. You are not consumed by it. It comes as a wave, and you may weep, because your father died, your mother died, your child died, or some recourse is going through suffering, and you may weep.

And yet, underneath that, there is still a substratum, this is a geological term, there's a substratum of peace underneath it. I don't call that happiness, but it's deeper than that. There is an all-abiding peace underneath it, although there may be tears on the surface, but then they disappear, and you don't, you don't perpetuate emotional pain by continuously thinking about it for months and years, and years pass, and you're still unhappy for years.

No, it comes as a wave, and then it subsides, and even when it's there, there is still a presence that you can sense underneath it. There's a quote that I always remember from the French writer Albert Camus, who got a Nobel Prize for literature a long time ago, and he said, I'm sure what he said reflects an experience that he had when he was alive, he said, in the midst of winter, I found that in myself, there lives an invincible summer. In the midst of winter, I found that within myself, there lives an invincible summer.

He uses winter as an analogy, winter meaning something not good on the outside, bad situation, bad circumstances, loss, whatever it may be. In the midst of winter, I found within myself, there is an invincible summer. And this, in this analogy, of course, summer refers to that state of consciousness that is beyond, that transcends circumstances.

The human still has a relationship with circumstances, and that's fine. But there's something within you that transcends circumstances of your life. And that's the ultimate freedom, the ultimate freedom, you are no longer at the mercy of what happens or doesn't happen around you.

And that is real, wonderful liberation, when your state of consciousness is no longer determined, ultimately, by what's going on around you by circumstances, and other people, and so on. So that's the liberation that is here for you to realize. And a very helpful thing, then, if you just remember that the next challenge that you encounter, or the challenge that you're encountering right now in your life, use it and allow it to make you more present, be present with it, instead of rejecting, or instead of saying, this shouldn't be happening, or, or something is missing, then why don't I have that?

Allow the challenge to be there and work with it. The challenge appears in the present moment. If it's real, there's something here that either you need to deal with, take action, or leave alone if there's nothing you can do.

The ultimate real challenge is always manifest in the present moment. Then there's a mental challenge. And most people are challenged more by their minds than by the actual situations.

So all the, the, whatever your mind is saying, for many people, represents the greatest challenge. The greatest challenge is their own mind, not the circumstances of their life. But they cannot differentiate between the circumstances of their life and their mind, because their mind continuously interprets the circumstances, and they cannot see the difference between what is, and how the mind interprets what is.

Their experience is a single phenomenon, and that's part of the unconsciousness. You can practice self-observation even with simple things, like, let's say, you wake up in the morning, and you open the curtains, let's say it's winter time, or it's November, and you open the curtains, and it's raining, and that's, oh my god, not another rainy day, another miserable day. And so here you have mixed up what is with interpretation without knowing it.

So you, it's a miserable day. No, there's water falling from the sky, that's the reality. The miserable is supplied by your mind.

And that's just a small, very small example of what happens continuously. This, the misinterpretation of what is, and unfortunately, the human ego loves to misinterpret in that way, because the more it can complain about something that is, the stronger the fictitious self feels. And this, for some of you, that might also still be helpful, because it may still happen occasionally to some of you.

A lot of the unconscious thought processes, for many people, has to do with complaining about things and people. They don't know it, because it becomes second nature to them. A lot of what, in their minds, what they think about, and talk about to others, is complaining either about other people, or situations, or what they call my life.

Whatever it is, I'm not happy with it. And I'll tell you about it, why I'm not happy with it.

You know what he did then, and what he failed to do then, what should have done, but he didn't do it.

And then he said this, when I said this, and, and of course, you are always right, and the other is always wrong, that's understood. So the complaining entity, it makes up a lot of the unconscious thinking, for most humans. So be very much aware of the tendency to complain about people, and situations, or your life.

And you can see, that is the essence of unconsciousness, and that keeps the ego alive. And if you have that, you can make it a spiritual practice. Self-observation is not easy.

It's easier to observe the unconsciousness in others, than it is to observe it in yourself. Much easier to see it in others. So it requires a bit more alertness, to see it in yourself, and say, hmm, I've been complaining for the past two hours, either mentally, or out loud.

I'm not saying to point out something that is wrong, and it can be rectified. I'm talking about useless complaining. It has no purpose, except to strengthen the ego.

So if you observe that, you can make it a spiritual practice. Let's say, I'm going to spend the next hour or two, without complaining about anything. Okay, well, for some people, it would be very hard.

Okay, I'm not complaining about the traffic, other drivers, my wife, my ex-husband, what he said, and what situation that I'm in right now. I'm not complaining about anything. I just let it be.

You can still deal, you still deal with it. Your ability to deal with situations does not diminish, if you stop complaining about situations. It's, you can only deal with situations, when you're not complaining.

You face the fact. You don't deny the fact, and then act upon it, which is complaining. You face the fact, this is what is, and this is what I can do.

Or this is what is, and there's nothing I can do about it right now. So it's fine, I'll leave it alone. That's conscious living.

The other is unconscious living, which are, most humans still live in that way. So you spend a couple of hours practicing, not complaining about anything, no matter what you're doing, or where you are. And obviously, if it's out allowed, you can catch that more easily, or you say, you can catch yourself that, I'm not saying anything.

But of course, then it's still in your mind. So there you also have to identify the thought, and say, let go of it. It's another complaining thought, drop it.

Another complaining thought, drop it. And that is, again, an essential part of the awakening process, is to become aware of what your mind is saying. Become aware of your thought processes.

That's, that's part of the awakening. And as you know, most humans are still completely identified with that stream of unconscious thinking. You don't know what's the real thing.

You are the thought, you are at the mercy of your thoughts. Horrible way to live. Be aware of your mind, of your thoughts.

Many years ago, I spent occasionally time in Buddhist monasteries. And the monks are trying very hard, and nuns, they're trying very hard with their spiritual practice. But then they get, I've observed, they get periodically, not all, but I saw one or two highly conscious ones, one or two.

But the others are, then get taken over suddenly, they start complaining about the monastery, but this shouldn't be happening. Why do we have to get up at 4.30? It just doesn't make sense.

And the water, why don't we have to, why is the water so cold? It freezes my hands off. And, and why can't we wear something a bit warmer?

This is hard, this long, but you can't stand it anymore. So I've watched quite a bit of complaining there too. And then now, Buddhist monks have to be very polite.

So they cannot say when you observe another person's unconsciousness, you can't say, shut up. You can't do that. But what they replace it with, when they want to say, shut up, they say, watch your mind.

And sometimes it helped the other person suddenly wakes up. Oh, okay. And then becomes present again.

But that's a very powerful pointer. Watch your mind, so that you are not, it doesn't take you over this unconscious thinking. The more presence you are able to bring in, the better your mind will actually function when it's needed.

Instead of having a function that is purely self-serving, that purely strengthens the ego, which is what for many people, that's 80% of their thinking or 90% of their thinking is self-serving and problem making and not problem solving. It's problem making, not problem solving. The practice then is, important part of the practice is be aware, not only of your, what your thoughts creating, also the emotional field that is there.

Be aware of the emotions that arise, because that can, emotion coupled with thought can have you in its grasp and you can't get out. You're completely, you all have experienced anger. What that is like when it's, it's an emotion and it's usually accompanied by a story.

Emotion that energizes the story and the story gives more energy to the emotion and the vicious circle happens. And you talk about it and think about it, this situation that makes you so angry and you get even more angry. It's horrible.

You've all experienced how unpleasant that is, but you don't know when you're in the grip of it, you love it. Not you, but the ego, which you mistake for who you are. The ego loves it.

When you're in the grip of anger, you don't want to let go. You don't want to let go. You cannot, you cannot awaken a person, even a person who is, let's say you live with somebody.

And if that person is being taken over by an emotion, like especially the pain body, as I call it, perhaps most of you know what I mean by pain body. Pain body is an old emotion that lives, still lives in you. A painful emotion that subsides, that's in you.

And sometimes it's dormant. Sometimes it comes active in order to feed on more drama and more pain. So periodically the pain body, which is accumulated, trapped, negative emotion often goes back to childhood and perhaps past lifetimes.

If you want to go there, you don't have to believe in it, but the pain body in some humans can be very, very heavy, which is accumulation of painful emotion that lives in them. Not always active. Sometimes it's dormant.

You hardly feel it. And then suddenly something triggers it and it wakes up. And if you have lived with somebody, perhaps the first time that you have observed it, let's say you, you fall in love and then you start living together, or you even sign a contract that you're going to start living together.

Okay. Can't get out of this now that you live together. And then suddenly on a week or a couple of months after you're living together, the other, your partner suddenly goes through some weird transformation.

It's not the same person anymore. It's some little monster that suddenly is, who is this? Who is this?

Suddenly very aggressive or awfully angry and goes to complete transformation of their personality and like a monstrous transformation. Oh my God. I signed a contract to be with this person forever.

So what all it means, you first encountered their pain body. They were taken over by this emotional field and the pain body attempts to feed on other people's reactions. It presses the buttons that it most will provoke a negative reaction in the other.

It'll say just the right thing that is hurtful to get the negative reaction. And so in other words, the pain body in you will attempt to awaken the other person's pain body, who presumably also has one, maybe not as strong, but probably has one. And it attempts to get the real.

And this is how drama in relationships periodically happens. And the two that were in love yesterday, the next day they are mortal enemies, at least for a few hours or a couple of days or three. They are suddenly mortal.

They hate each other deeply. It's in the grip of their pain body. And then sometimes it happens then a little bit of time subsides and then gradually they both wake up again, not into enlightened consciousness, but into normal unconsciousness, not deep unconsciousness, which is the pain body.

And so they wake up and say, oh, and then they make up. Oh, it's all as well. You can't even remember why they, what you were fighting about.

Can't even remember it. Okay. All is well.

We are fine again. Okay. And then two or three weeks pass.

And again, happening again. Oh my God. And again, and again, I can't take any more of this.

And sometimes the intervals between pain body episodes get shorter. And then this beginning of the end, and unfortunately they don't recognize it for what it is. There's not enough, not enough presence to have at least some degree of disidentification from that entity, which is the pain body.

I suggest that you look upon it almost as if it were a little entity that lives in you, a little, little monster or gremlin or something that lives in you.

Eckhart Tolle The Ego and the Need to Be Right [b4681a88-a4a3-4645-b737-aee7f7f6fd61]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:42)

The ego and the need to be right. In this episode, Eckhart gives a brief talk about the difference between being versus becoming. He says, when we focus on becoming, we look to the future for our fulfillment.

He believes this is when we lose sight of our being, which is connected to the now. Eckhart then answers a question about the need to be right and winning an argument at all costs, which he explains is a common form of ego. Eckhart believes as we grow in presence, the drive to be right diminishes.

The ego loosens its grip, and we discover we might even be willing to admit we're wrong. He says this is a sure sign of spiritual growth.

[Speaker 1] (0:45 - 26:35)

Hello, everybody. Here we are, here and now, not trying to get anywhere, become anything, not even enlightened. There's nothing wrong with becoming.

But here, our attention is on being. You have the two dimensions, become being and becoming. Coming involves time, past, future, towards the future.

In some way, of course, you're aware of the future, and you need to give it some attention in your practical daily life. The becoming dimension, you want to become better at this, that or the other, learn, acquire, experience new things. It's all fine.

And it all happens on the level of becoming. So becoming is an inescapable and necessary part of being human. The only question is, is that all you know?

Are you being absorbed by the movement of becoming, dragged along by this stream of becoming? The universe is, of course, the manifested universe. It's a universe's developing, evolving life forms, new life forms arise.

Things happen continuously, new things happen. But that's only the surface level of reality, which undoubtedly exists, has a certain reality. But it's also a dreamlike thing.

The dreams evaporate fairly quickly. And in this world of becoming, things also become and then they cease to become. They become and then they dissolve, and then become and dissolve.

So when you're only moving towards becoming, you're moving towards growth, but you're also moving towards death. The future holds the promise of fulfillment, but it also holds the threat of the end, death. The future is a two-edged sword.

It says, I put everything you want, I can give you, and then it takes it away. And sometimes when the movement of when the taking away part starts, and it could start at any stage in your life, definitely it starts when you get older, you become more aware of mortality. But it could start at an earlier point too, when suddenly something goes wrong in your life, a big upset, disruption, big loss, death, somebody close to you, collapse of something that was important to you.

And whenever that happens, there's an opportunity. At first, it's a very unpleasant thing, suffering arises, of course. And then suddenly, there's a possibility for you to become aware of the being dimension, when the becoming dimension is no longer satisfying.

When the becoming dimension becomes unsatisfying, as it will, it must eventually, for quite a while, it's satisfying, and then it's no longer satisfying. So when the becoming dimension becomes unsatisfying, suffering arises, but also the possibility of being forced almost to go deeper and suddenly become aware of the depth dimension, which is the being dimension within yourself and within the universe, same thing. So you suddenly become aware that there is another dimension, you stop running towards the next thing.

And you become aware of yourself at a deeper level than the becoming level. At the deeper level, I call it the deep eye, you are already complete, there's no time involved in any kind of improvement. It's not necessary because of the level of being, nothing could be added to you.

And that is why it's often described as by those who have realized it or have had a glimpse of it, a place of intense joy and aliveness, but also deep peace. Sat Chit Ananda, being, the realization of being, Chit, consciousness, pure consciousness, Ananda, joy, bliss, it's one single realization. It is good not to wait for things to collapse in your life.

Perhaps in some ways you have already experienced collapse in various areas of your life, because as you grow older, you cannot go through life without experiencing things from time to time, loss, calamity, disaster, deep disappointment, whatever you want to call it. Of course, everybody does. And if you go through life believing that something is fundamentally wrong with your life when these things happen to you, then you're deluded.

There's nothing fundamentally wrong with you when you experience disaster or deep loss, collapse, whatever it may be. It's inevitable that there are, that is inseparable from the becoming. So the, being aware of what opens up when things collapse is death in one way or another, death.

It's some form of death. Even if you go through a divorce, a longstanding relationship breaks up. It's a kind of death you're experiencing.

And when death is faced without resistance, you see it, it's an opening. It leaves an emptiness. Death, when something dissolves, obviously, that was there in the world of form, it leaves an emptiness.

And that emptiness, people don't want to look at it. And that's why they don't want to look at death. Death is dreadful, especially the Western world.

And a lot of the planet has become kind of Westernized. Western means focused intensely on becoming. And they're very good at it.

So the Western approach to death is virtually a taboo. Let's not talk about it. So when it comes, it's a terrible shock.

But death is, leaves this an emptiness there that you want, oh, I don't want to look at it. But if you don't resist, if you realize that this empty space that's left when something that was important to you has dissolved, that's an entry point portal into the being dimension. And when you realize that, you see how on the other side of death, which looks like a terrible calamity, especially if you've never given it any attention and pretended that death doesn't exist, or is a travesty that should never happen.

And then you see, there's this, there's an opening, an empty space. And what shines through that empty space is being. And so you, a portal into being is whenever something collapses in your life or dies, potentially, it's a portal into the realization of the dimension of being.

And then you become aware of yourself as the deep I, which is the being that you are, that is fullness, life in its fullness already is there as you, in you and as you. That's why Jesus said, I want you to have the fullness of life. That's the promise.

That's the teaching. I want you to have the fullness of life and the fullness of life. The Buddha calls emptiness.

It seems the opposite of what Jesus said, but it's the same thing. It's still, if you approach it from a different direction, fullness is not to be understood as containing many things. The fullness that Jesus speaks of is prior to all things or content.

It's not to do with content. It's a primordial fullness, the deep sense of aliveness and peace that needs nothing because everything is already contained there and prior to form. It's the formless dimension, another way of putting it.

Now the wonderful thing is we are here and now because we've realized the possibility of this and in most of you, the being dimension is already arising. You already have some access to it. This is what has drawn you here.

Ultimately not here, although we call it school, it's not a school in the sense that you learn things, that you add things to your mind, concepts and all that. It's not that. You realize who you are at this level is totally complete and there's no time in it.

It's not the person anymore. And you get it when you see a moment of stillness, like now, when you listen attentively to these words. Of course, the words are just signposts.

They're not it. But behind the words, there is the dimension to which these words point. It is within you and it is possible.

And I hope it is the case that as you listen to these signposts, at the same time, you have at least some realization of what it is that these words point to within yourself. An inner space of stillness, for example, could call it that. The deep eye, free of concepts, free of past and future.

So, your sense of who you are, your sense of identity has shifted from the personal sense of self, determined by the past, looking towards the future. The personal sense of self, it has shifted. And by the way, the personal sense of self is a story.

Ultimately, it's a collection of thoughts that you identify with as yourself and as your life. And you tell yourself the story again and again, looking for some solution because the story is not yet satisfying enough. And some areas of the story are very unsatisfying.

But you have to think about it. Can't stop thinking about it. So, your sense of identity is no longer derived from the content of your mind, but it goes, it shifts.

It goes to a deeper level. We could use either deeper or higher. I prefer the word deeper because higher could create the impression that who you essentially are is up there somewhere.

Where is my real self? Well, it's up there. It's easier to find if you go within.

It's not up there. So, it's the deep eye. And that gives you your sense of who you are.

Identity, but very different from the self identity, the personal identity. It's an identity that is very powerful. The power of the universe itself is there, but it doesn't have concepts in it.

So, on that level, conceptually, you no longer know who you are conceptually. Because how could you? If you have no concepts about who you are, who are you?

And your past becomes irrelevant because your past is an accumulation of thoughts. You have to think about your past for the past to exist. So, all that becomes irrelevant to who you are.

So, another question I could ask, who are you without your past right now? Don't remember your past. Let go of it.

There's no need to remind yourself of who you are. Just let go of any concepts that tell you who you are. Now, what's left of who you are when you have let go of all concepts of who you are that tell you who you are?

Now, you won't be able to answer that because any answer would be another concept. But you can sense the beingness of you. That's one way of putting it.

No concepts. A presence or the presence. And that's your true identity is there.

Your true beingness is there. Who you essentially are, the essence of who you are is there. That's it.

The challenge now is when you get involved in becoming again, as you have to, because you're a person here, not to completely lose yourself in the stream of becoming so that you can deal with the becoming dimension where you do things, think about things, interact with other people, learn new skills, have new experiences, and so on. Not to be totally absorbed by the stream of becoming, because all the challenges exist there too as you move in the stream of becoming. It's like a river.

You're a current of a river. You're in this river and it's dragging you along. And then you see these big boulders sticking out of the river here and there.

So dangerous. These are the big challenges of life. And sometimes the river drags you and you hit one of these huge boulders.

Oh, that was painful. And that's inevitable that from time to time you hit these boulders in the river of becoming. So the skill then is have some awareness left, awareness of the being dimension, which is a wrong way of saying it, because when I use words, I have a subject and an object in a sentence, grammatical structure of a sentence.

So when I say awareness of being, it sounds like two things. I am aware of being, but it's not two things. It's one.

It's a self-awareness. So when I say you are aware of yourself, that again is wrong, but language forces us to use these words. And then we have a grammatical structure in a sentence that immediately creates a duality.

Whenever you open your mouth and form a sentence, which has a subject and an object, most sentences have, duality immediately arises. And so you think of yourself on a conceptual level. You think about your life, my life, even the words my life, as it's already a duality that the mind has created, because it implies that you and life are two things, different things.

My life, there's me and there's life, but you are life. And then people say, I have a good life. I have a bad life.

Well, who are you without life? What is life? And even things like I love myself, which is better than I hate myself, but it's still not the absolute truth because there's a duality there.

Who are you and what it is that you love? What is it that you love? Who are you?

And then the fear comes that you could lose your life. He lost his life. Okay.

So there's he, and there's a life that he lost, two entities. So who is he without life? So you can't lose your life and you don't have a life.

You are life, a manifestation of the one life, the one consciousness that expresses itself in in countless forms throughout the universe. The one life, the one consciousness that underlies all phenomenal, phenomenal existence, phenomena, which means the manifested world, that all the, what there is underneath the world of phenomena is that birth and death, birth and death, things arise and subside, arising and subsiding. Underneath this continuous movement of becoming and dying and becoming and dying lies a vast intelligence, a vast consciousness.

It expresses itself as a tree, a blade of grass, a bird, or you, yourself or me, a human. And it expresses itself undoubtedly in many other forms, life forms. And of course, what our senses give us access to is a very limited range of reality.

And of course, there are other dimensions, but they're all, all this is the manifested world. There's nothing beyond the one. I have some awareness and that's continuous alertness is required.

So the stream of becoming does not completely take you over. And so you have some awareness left in that field of awareness. You're aware of yourself as the presence.

In other words, you know, there's a stillness in you that you can sense in the background, even while you do things in the foreground, foreground and background. The background is the consciousness and you can't see it. It's the unseen and who you are is mostly unseen.

The body itself is a tiny fragment of who you, but you, who you essentially are is not something that could be perceived with senses, the five senses. No surgeon, if they open up your body or your brain would find you there. They cannot find you there because you are essentially invisible because you belong to that realm.

So our challenge is as you go through life, realize, don't forget to realize the most important thing in any situation or whatever you're doing is where, whether you are still aware of yourself in the background, the invisible self, the invisible being, the alive stillness, the presence in the background of what you do, even while you go about your business doing this and that, walking somewhere, driving somewhere, using your devices.

Are you still aware of the background? So foreground, background. The background is the essence of who you are.

That's where you're complete already. The foreground is where things, you need to do things, the realm of doing. Then you are a two-dimensional being, one foot in one world, the transcendent dimension, and one foot in the phenomenal dimension of the manifested world, the world of becoming, being, becoming.

Bring these two together and then you fulfill the purpose of your life by accepting the challenge and the task of bringing the two dimensions together within yourself in your daily life. That is, are you able to succeed in that? Of course, you may not succeed immediately, but that is your main reason for being here is to embody both dimensions, bring the dimension of being into this world of becoming.

Your personal circumstances don't matter. You can do it whether you are living in a mansion, or in a prison. You can do it regardless of your life situation.

And in fact, it's probably more likely for you to realize this in a prison cell than in a mansion, until a moment comes when the mansion collapses in an earthquake, then perhaps something opens up. Or perhaps you are so detached that the mansion, although you're still there, is not important to you. It's there, it's fine, but you won't know that for sure, because it's easy to say, I've often met people who say, I'm no longer attached to these things.

But you won't know that for sure until the thing disappears or leaves you, or is destroyed. Then you'll know whether you were right or wrong when you said, I'm not attached to it. And attachment is something that means you derive part of your identity from it, ultimately a superficial and ultimately fictitious sense of self.

So perhaps we'll go to a question after this introduction. Let's see what they are.

[Speaker 2] (26:37 - 26:39)

Hi. Hello, Eckhart.

[Speaker 1] (26:40 - 26:41)

Hello, how are you?

[Speaker 2] (26:42 - 26:48)

I'm very well, thank you very much. And I'm just very happy to be able to be talking to you.

[Speaker 1] (26:48 - 26:49)

Yes, yes.

[Speaker 2] (26:50 - 28:40)

I've read some of your books, and a lot of the things you were talking about just now hit home with the death piece of it, because that's when I ran into your book, Power of Now. And it was the perfect time for that, because I was at that place where everything had sort of, with the death of my husband, everything else didn't matter, nothing mattered. And I was at that open place, as you talk about, and I didn't know I was at that place until later.

My question, you've answered it actually today with the becoming and the being, working together. But it's still, it's a question for me as I use these practices, is how can I stay conscious when I'm in a really intense kind of communication situation or discussion when I really want to make my point? Because I know it's the point that needs to be made, right?

I notice that I become unconscious then, and I'm really involved in that discussion. But how do I stay present in that when I really feel like I need to make that point? And then the other part of it is I practice the, okay, the breathing and being still, and then I don't even enter the discussion, really.

I just am there being still and present and not making my point. And I've tried it, but I do know that when I'm not conscious, or I watch myself being that way, so that I really, I pat myself on the back when I'm at least watching myself be unconscious, if that makes sense.

[Speaker 1] (28:40 - 28:42)

Oh yes, just makes sense.

[Speaker 2] (28:42 - 29:02)

But how can I get to that place where both, as you just said, the being and the becoming are together? Because I feel like I'm on a seesaw kind of thing, where I'm present, but I'm not really involved in the discussion, or I'm really totally in it, and I'm not really present. How do I get together?

[Speaker 1] (29:02 - 37:56)

Very good point. Very good question. Many people experience that, I'm sure.

I know that many people have the same challenge. People who become aware of the depth dimension of being, for some time, for quite some time, it may happen that they can either be still and present, or they can be involved in the world and then lose the stillness. So are they in either one or the other?

But at least you already have access to the other. So that's a huge, a wonderful progress in your evolution, that at least you're aware of that dimension, or you're not yet able to bring the two together, which is the big challenge. So in a discussion, it's very, very easy to get completely drawn into the stream of self-identified thinking.

So there's not only, you have a mental position, that means an opinion, or viewpoint, or perspective on something, something you believe this is how it is, and it's important that the other person should also believe that. That's why the discussion arises. You want to show the other person that you are right.

So the need to be right is a very, and it's good to observe it in yourself as it arises. The need to be right is a very strong egoic need. It's part of the ego survives by being right.

It needs to be right. It cannot be wrong because it considers being wrong to be a small death. It dies when it's shown to be wrong.

It's virtually intolerable to the egoic sense of self to be wrong. So it needs to show that it's right. So it's to the desire, the compulsion to be right is a very, very common form of ego.

And now you already may, as I believe you mentioned just now, sometimes you are perhaps in the middle of being involved in a discussion, you become aware that you are in the grip of this strong movement. And that's an enormous gain in consciousness to be aware because most people are not aware. Perhaps if they're lucky, they wake up afterwards and say, oh, and then perhaps retrospectively, they say, I got so upset, but it was completely pointless.

Because very often it is pointless. No change will come of it. And the more you are identified with your mental position, which is ego, mental position is a group of thoughts or one thought.

To be identified means, as you probably know, is you derive your sense of self from certain thoughts. So these thoughts are imbued with a sense of self, very different from just ordinary thoughts. These are egoic thoughts.

And this is quite normal for most people to have to be in the grip of that, to be in the grip of mental, these mental positions. Now, if you can be aware, while it happens, you're already beginning to step out of it. You may not be able to stop yourself at that point.

Right, right. But there is an observing presence in the background. It cannot yet change the situation.

It's not strong enough to, because you're so involved in the identification with your mental position at that point, that you cannot step out of it, but you can know already that you are in it. That is an important step because most people are so identified in those moments, they do not know what's happening to them. Because ultimately, something is happening to you in these situations, you're not doing it, it's happening to you.

So, because there's virtually no choice involved, because once this is something triggers, you have a discussion, something is triggered in you, and then the mind comes up and speaks through you, and it's the egoic mind. It is helpful so that there's more presence in you to practice presence, to become aware of presence when you're not being challenged. Because, for example, situations that are conducive to being present are being out in nature.

These are situations when you're really there, absorb, look at the sky, the ocean, and to give your fullest attention, say, oh, it's so wonderful, but not just give attention to that, at the same time, feel the presence that you are as you observe that. So, you have that which you observe, and you can sense that presence. So, nature can make you still.

If you give attention to nature, any natural phenomenon, it can help you to become still because nature is not mind, it's prior to mind. So, nature can help you to use nature a lot and practice stillness when you're not being challenged. And gradually, the power of stillness grows in you, and stillness itself doesn't grow, but the ability of stillness to come through you grows.

It's like, let's say, having a light in you. The light in you ultimately does not grow because it's timeless, the light of consciousness, the light that you are, that in itself, the light does not grow. But to use an analogy, a very weird analogy, let's say, you or any human being, you are like a lamp.

The person is the lampshade, and the light behind is the light of consciousness of who you are. Now, the lampshade varies from person to person, it consists of all kinds of forms of conditioning, and some lampshades are very dense. They let very little light through.

You can still see light through, otherwise there would be nothing there, but there's a density in this lampshade. So, when I say the power of presence grows in you, it doesn't mean that the consciousness itself grows because that would imply time, and consciousness is timeless. So, the essence of who you are is timeless.

But when we look at this from this dimension, it seems that gradually you become more conscious, you become more present. What that means is that the lampshade gradually loses its density, less resistance, less ego. So, this is what I mean when I say the presence power, gradually it grows in you, which means gradually the light of presence becomes brighter.

It shines through you more easily because the lampshade, which is a person or the personality, becomes less dense. And this is what's happening to you. So, do not demand that immediately you should be free of all identification with thinking.

There's still a lampshade there, that's perfectly fine. Gradually, though, the presence in you grows. And you already, quite often, as you say, the witnessing presence is there in the background.

And that witnessing presence is that this presence grows in you and then gets stronger. And then a point may come when in the middle of a heated discussion, let's say, you suddenly become aware and say, you see, it's actually pointless. The only point it is, it strengthens your sense of self.

And then you may be able to just drop it.

[Speaker 2] (37:56 - 38:01)

Oh, that would be nice. That would be nice. I would like that.

[Speaker 1] (38:01 - 50:25)

I recommend that you, whenever it happens, that you regard it as an experiment. Next time you are involved in some kind of discussion, whatever the topic may be, be that you feel strongly about, regard it as an experiment in consciousness and see, okay, now what happens if I drop it in the middle of it or at the beginning? It doesn't matter at what point it drops.

And am I able to do it? Am I able to really let go? Especially if you see the point, because many discussions are actually pointless.

They do not bring about any change. They only reinforce your sense of self, especially if you win the discussion. But very often there is no winner because when you are involved in an egoic position, it's very unlikely that you convince anybody else because they are involved in their egoic position.

You just strengthen, you mutually strengthen your ego. Now, there are other situations where perhaps something, you're having a discussion with somebody because some change needs to happen. For example, let's say you bought something and it's defective and then you bring it back to the store and then the shopkeeper refuses to give you your money back or whatever the situation be.

Now, here this would be a situation where you want to initiate a change in the situation and there too, it is quite often more effective to let go of the egoic involvement. It doesn't mean that you cannot pursue the discussion. And that's an interesting point.

Yes, quite often discussions are totally pointless. And the more conscious you become, the more you realize which discussions are actually completely pointless and what discussions may have some purpose. Some discussion may have some purpose, especially those discussions.

Is that question, is that an alternative to becoming so identified with your position, your viewpoint that you lose yourself in it and you become very emotional. And some people even start shouting or not you, but in some unconscious people, it even can reach a point of violence, physical violence. The ego, I'm sure you don't beat people up, but the ego in people who are very unconscious, when the ego feels it's being threatened, it's losing the argument, it can resort in very unconscious people.

It can often resort to physical violence. So often people come to physical violence happens as a result of a heated discussion. It's not uncommon in this world.

Now, is there an alternative to, is it still possible to put forward in situations where it is really necessary because a change to bring about a change in a situation, is it possible to express yourself firmly and clearly without ego? And again, that's a practice. Can you explain the situation in clear, straightforward language, perhaps even forceful because some situations may require it without anger, without negativity.

This is especially important, for example, with children. Sometimes they do silly things and you need to be very strongly say, this is wrong, which may be very dangerous, what they may be doing something to climb on a high wall and might fall off. You need to sometimes very forcefully say this.

And it's important to be able to do that, perhaps a little easier with children, your children, because perhaps you can be free of ego with your children more easily than with other people. I don't know, I'm just talking generally. To be forceful without negativity, which means without ego in situations that actually require it.

Or you have an animal, you have a dog. Some people get angry with their animals. I knew some people, they would have angry discussions with their cat.

Why did you do that? You shouldn't have done that. And there are two kinds of no.

There is a no that is toxic and negative. And there's another no that has no negativity, but it's just strong energy. And that's something you can practice.

If there's enough awareness in you, you can tell the difference between forcefully say something and to know whether there is toxic negativity in it or whether it's a clear power that speaks through you because you recognize the situation requires it. And that also means that once the situation has been dealt with, you're able to immediately let go of it. You don't need to revive it in your head because you might have noticed when you lose yourself in a discussion, a heated argument discussion, sometimes for a long time afterwards, you replay it in your head.

It's not uncommon. And often people in their head when they replay an argument, they find better things to say that they should have said, but why didn't I think of that? I should have said that.

So they keep it alive. They keep it alive in the head. And some people then go back to that person and want to revive the discussion because they found better counter arguments in the meantime, because they, and so they go back to this person, you know, another thing I should, I want to tell you, and it starts all over again.

And you're also familiar with people having a heated discussion. One person walks out of the room in anger, and one minute later, the door opens and he or she comes back in and says, oh, and I thought of something else. It's all a little crazy and dysfunctional.

The main thing has already happened to you, which is there is an observing presence when these things arise. And as this observing presence grows, then you will be able to tell the difference between a discussion that is pointless, that only strengthens your ego, and then you practice letting go. It's a wonderful practice.

It's easier probably to let go at the beginning when you can feel the compulsion arising to say something here. And at that point, it's, you see how futile it is, and you let go of it. Oh, you drop it.

It's very liberating to let go of something like that. At first you feel the ego feels diminished when you do that. Oh, yes.

One more thing. When you are involved in a discussion, when you let go of something, the ego feels it's a little death that the ego dies when you see the futility of a counter argument, of even getting involved in it, and you let go of it. At first, it feels very strange.

You're not fueling the other person's position because when you contradict, you give fuel to the other person's ego when you come from your ego. So that's when you recognize that, you let go of that. And sometimes, you may find you want to put forward your opinion when, let's say, there's a group of people, they're discussing this or that, and suddenly you feel the need arise to various, you have a very strong need to say, no, no, no, that's not how it is, I'll tell you.

And then that is, again, is an egoic need to assert yourself. The ego wants to assert itself and grow through the situation. And when you see it's actually pointless to give your contribution here to this, and you said, okay, I'll just drop it.

This urge to insert yourself in the conversation and give your viewpoint, and you just as an experiment, let's drop it. This can be quite pleasant. At first, it feels very strange because the ego shrinks then.

But the more the ego shrinks, the more power comes through you, true power, the more presence power comes through you. And that's a wonderful thing. So it's practice presence when you're not being challenged in these situations so that when the situations arise, you can regard them every time you're involved in some kind of discussion, which is you notice it's beginning to become a heated discussion.

See, okay, here's my experiment in consciousness, then you have, instead of your purpose, then your main purpose is no longer to, to convince the other person that you're right, or whatever it may be, your main purpose is to conduct this experiment in consciousness. So your purpose shifts in the situation. And that'll be very interesting.

So you do it next time, whenever, sometimes you can see, oh, it's beginning to happen when you're, oh, there it is. And that's where your presence needs to come in. So okay, here, let's experiment with this.

The first thing is, is there any point at all in arguing? And if you say yes, there still is a point, because this person might be convinced by what I say, it's possible, especially if you don't say it with ego, it's possible that you can convince a person, the more ego is in your argument, the less likely it is that you will convince or persuade anybody. So you only strengthen the other person's ego.

But if you put forward your position, clearly, and concisely, so there's no ego in it, you don't have the need to be right. And it could be that you're wrong. That is a wonderful thing for a person to be able to say, oh, you're right, I was wrong.

The ego can't do that. The ego would rather create some kind of lie. Because it's more important for the ego to be right than to find the truth.

And so if the ego cannot be right, it would rather lie than find the truth. So probably you are beyond that stage already. I don't think you would, from what I can sense or feel, you would resort to falsehood or lying just to be continue to be right.

But I'm just saying this for other people might be helpful for other people to know that often, the ego will be very happy to lie in order, it will create any kind of total, factual untruth, just to continue to be right. It's quite amazing to watch the ego how it operates.

[Speaker 2] (50:27 - 50:35)

So as you're talking, I can see many scenarios. And so I have many opportunities to experiment.

[Speaker 1] (50:35 - 50:48)

Right. Wonderful. Great.

Well, I wish you success in this. And I feel confident that you will succeed, perhaps not every time, but you will succeed.

[Speaker 2] (50:49 - 51:06)

Yes. And thank you very much. I thank you for the explanation and the conversation.

I appreciate it. And very much thank you personally for bringing all of this out, your books, everything, because you're right on. I mean, you really are.

Eckhart Tolle The End of Suffering [69299037-bd7d-439b-9ae9-99aff2d42df2]

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:45)

The end of suffering. In this episode, Eckhart answers questions about suffering as part of the human condition. He says many spiritual traditions focus on awakening as the end of suffering.

Paradoxically, Eckhart says we need to go through a certain amount of suffering in order to realize we don't want it anymore. He says oftentimes our suffering is caused not by our life situation but our reaction to it. He believes much of our pain is generated by the mind.

And it's toxic narrative. Eckhart says we can move beyond suffering by embracing life's challenges. He says they are a doorway into the transcendent realm and that when we step into the light of consciousness, we are free from suffering at last.

[Speaker 1] (0:47 - 2:38)

Hello, everybody. Here we are again. Let's acknowledge the present moment, which means becoming aware, not only of your sense perceptions, but also becoming aware of yourself.

Not of yourself as a person, not the historical self, but being aware of yourself as the awareness. And so you don't need to remember who you are or who you will be. Just be aware of being, of being aware.

A silent space of presence. And that transcends who you are as a person. It transcends your life situation, whatever is happening in your life situation.

So this is the transcendent dimension of consciousness. That's the essence of all spiritual teachings. And this will always be challenged by the things of this world.

And your work, so to speak, is to embody this deeper dimension of consciousness, even while engaged in the affairs of everyday life. And even when confronted with problems.

[Speaker 3] (2:42 - 3:11)

We'll begin now with the first question, written question that we've received. This participant writes in, I do not believe that we need challenges to make presence grow. I don't believe that presence shrinks when there are no challenges.

You make it sound almost like you want bad things to keep happening so people can grow. How would you respond to this, Eckhart? ECKHART.

[Speaker 1] (3:13 - 17:55)

All spiritual teachings, or every path of awakening, if you want to call it that, is concerned with the end of suffering. Although it might not, not every teaching puts it that way, although the Buddha did. The Buddha characterized his teaching in the following words.

I teach suffering and the end of suffering. So the spiritual teaching is there to liberate you from suffering. And the strange paradox is, and this applies not to everybody, but to the majority of humans, you need to go through a certain amount of suffering before you realize that you don't want it anymore and there is a way beyond suffering.

So that's a little paradox almost. So generally speaking, the human condition is, as the Buddha characterized it, is one of suffering. He called it dukkha, translated as suffering, unhappiness, unsatisfactoriness, misery.

There are many ways you can translate it, but it all comes down to that thing. And if you look closely, you find that an enormous amount of suffering and ultimately all suffering arises through a dysfunction in the human mind. So a moment comes in a person's awakening when he or she realizes that unhappiness that they are experiencing is not derived primarily from the situation that the person finds himself in, but from the narrative of the mind that comments on the situation.

Most of your suffering, and ultimately all your suffering arises in your own mind, that's the beginning of an awakening. It could start with a simple thing like realizing when you get anxious about something, when you get irritated with something, realizing in that moment that this irritation, which is a minor form of suffering, anger is a form of suffering not usually recognized as such. So, slight irritation, you may realize that it does not, although there seems to be an external cause to it, but it does not arise ultimately from the external cause, it arises from the mental commentary about the external cause.

So, there's an awakening there when you realize that suffering is self-creating. Until you reach that point, suffering has a purpose. Suffering has a purpose because ultimately it awakens you so that you are ready, you reach that point where you realize the possibility of going beyond suffering.

Once you've reached that point, you begin to experience what presence is in your life. You begin to experience, you may have glimpses of presence, of awareness, and once you have that, you can choose to live in awareness, you can choose a moment of presence, and you don't need to be forced into it anymore by suffering. So, there comes a point where you can consciously cooperate, so to speak, with the arising of presence instead of having to be forced into presence through intense suffering.

Spiritual teachings and spiritual teachers are helpful if they are genuine because they can accelerate the awakening process. So, it does not apply, there are exceptions to every rule, so there are some humans who awaken with little or no suffering also. I have known of some cases where humans did not need to go through an enormous amount of suffering.

It's always best if you look at your own life, if you want to know whether suffering is needed or not, did you need suffering before coming here? Did the suffering that arose in your past bring you to this point when you're here now, where you realize the possibility of, and not only realize the possibility of, where you actually are becoming more and more present, where presence deepens continuously. So, there's a reason why you have reached this point, and for most of you, it's a suffering of one kind or another, but perhaps not for all.

There are exceptions, and perhaps those people have suffered enough in past lifetimes. There are certain exceptions, for example, in the case of Ramana Maharshi, the famous sage from India. He experienced an awakening at a very early age of 17 with little or no suffering.

He had a very deep death experience at the age of, I think it was 16 or 17, a very deep experience of dying. He didn't have any illness. It was just a spontaneous death experience.

And in that moment, his ego, his egoic sense of self died, and he became awakened. That's fairly rare, but it can happen. So, the questioner says, I don't believe we need challenges to end there.

Well, whether you believe it or not doesn't really matter, but look at your own life. Is there evidence in your own life that you've gone through suffering, and the suffering has triggered an awakening, or perhaps you haven't? The important thing is the challenges that are inevitable in life, we are being challenged continuously in life.

The question is, and this is a deciding factor in finding out how conscious you are, whether you are awakening, if not awakened. The question is, do the challenges that are continuous in life, one after another, with little intervals sometimes, yes, are they transformed into suffering and unhappiness? Is there an egoic self there that experiences this as suffering, or are you able to face the challenges of life without converting them unconsciously into suffering?

And when that happens, then every challenge that comes into your life will make you more present. Until that happens, challenges that come into your life for a long time make you more reactive, more unconscious, and you suffer even more and more until finally there is an awakening. Some people awaken because they know they're going to die soon, or they have been told that they're going to die soon, which normally would create an enormous amount of suffering created by the mind.

And some people experience a spontaneous awakening when that happens, perhaps after a period of intense suffering, there's suddenly a liberation. So, generally speaking, you need to suffer until you realize you don't need to suffer anymore. Or another way of putting it is when somebody asks you, do I need time to awaken spiritually, to awaken?

You need time until you realize that you don't need time. So, time and suffering go together. So, the suffering has a purpose up to a certain point, and that's the point of the awakening of consciousness.

Then suffering can still happen, but gradually the suffering is transcended more and more and is replaced with presence. And then as the challenges arise in your life, and they may change too, they may become less. They may not be as extreme as they were before.

They may be smaller challenges. But whatever challenge happens in your life, once the awakening process has started, there's a good likelihood that the challenge will deepen you, whether it's a challenge of a relationship challenge, a health challenge, a financial challenge, it doesn't matter, challenge of what kind. And only you can know whether, when you're not being challenged, whether there's a decrease in your sense of presence, or whether you're able to sustain your presence, even when everything is going fine, everything, are you still able to embody that presence, even when you're not being challenged?

If that's the case, then you do not need the suffering anymore, the challenge anymore, to force you into presence. So, only you have to know in your own life whether you're able to sustain presence, even without, and this, many of you have reached that point, I know that, where suffering, you don't need to be forced into presence anymore, you can choose presence, this is the huge difference. But if a huge challenge should arise, then presence will intensify.

Everybody will be challenged by old age, unless you die young. As somebody once said, old age isn't so bad if you consider the alternative. So, you will be challenged by old age, you will be challenged by certain, perhaps certain bodily functions that are no longer performing as they used to.

All those things, approaching death, can be a wonderful way of being more and more present. I've experienced, I've seen people in the face of death going through a very rapid transformation, so that there was virtually no person left anymore, there was just a luminous sense of intensely alive presence, which is wonderful to see, this is a possibility. Even if you haven't practiced presence in your life, there's always a last chance, and that is as death approaches.

But if you have been consumed with the affairs of day-to-day living, and the drama of human affairs for 85 years, and then perhaps it's not so easy to become present, just as death approaches. So, the important thing to remember is, am I still converting the challenges of life into suffering, which implies a suffering entity, a suffering me, an egoic sense of self, that actually becomes stronger when it suffers, because there's an identification with the suffering, the suffering strengthens the egoic sense of self, for quite a long time. Until a point is reached where it becomes so much that this cannot be sustained anymore, and then the opposite happens.

First suffering strengthens the ego for a long time, and then the point is reached where suffering begins to erode the ego. Sometimes it can happen very quickly, sometimes it happens gradually, developing a physical disability, or whatever, and I've seen people with physical disabilities whose ego has been gradually eroded through suffering. So, that's a very, very interesting point.

Suffering for a long time strengthens the ego until this point of a limit is reached where you can't take any more suffering, and then suddenly, the same suffering that before strengthens the ego now begins to erode the ego. It's a wonderful, wonderful process. It's also embodied in the image of the Christian cross.

The Christian cross is the torture instrument, which is a symbol for human suffering, and the Jesus on the cross is the archetypal human, and the cross is both the torture instrument, it's symbolized as suffering, but the cross is also a symbol for the divine at the same time, and that shows you that suffering, the torture, is a doorway into the transcendent dimension, and once you've taken a step into the transcendent dimension, then you leave that torture instrument behind, and the cross is the divine.

[Speaker 2] (17:58 - 18:32)

Hello. Hello, Eckhart. This is amazing.

Thank you. My question is, I had a decision to stop drinking alcohol. It had become an addiction to sort of numb myself from my emotions, and I also have been an emotional eater as well, and I'm concerned that once the course has ended that it might not be as easy.

I have so many tools with the meditations and all, but I was wondering if there is more to help me through this transition.

[Speaker 1] (18:33 - 19:19)

Right, so you were able to give up the drinking alcohol, and also eating, you say, was a problem for a while, but your eating is more, it's normal now, you eat no more than the body needs, so how did you develop the ability to stop drinking, because I know there's an urge once a certain addictive pattern that has established itself, then there's the addiction itself has a gravitational pull, and was it through presence that you were able to observe this gravitational pull and then go beyond it?

[Speaker 2] (19:20 - 19:30)

Absolutely. The teachings and listening to all the callers, it's been so helpful, and it's made me so much more aware.

[Speaker 1] (19:31 - 24:42)

Yes, so it seems to be working, and you're not the only one for whom an addiction and the need to go beyond addiction, and again, this links into the first question and answer that we had today, the addiction, which is also a form of suffering, ultimately forced you to become more present so that you could go beyond it, and again, you can see that retrospectively, you can even be thankful for having gone through that. We cannot know beforehand whether the question itself, you don't even need to ask yourself the question whether you will be able to sustain it, because for presence, all you need is to be present in this moment.

If you start thinking of whether you will be able to sustain presence when this course comes to an end, for example, you don't know the answer, but there's a good chance that this course and what preceded it, you're already reading the books and doing spiritual practice. During this time, the power of presence has been growing in you, and it's unlikely that it will now dissipate again, although setbacks can happen and have happened to people. It's true that sometimes setbacks happen, but once a certain degree of presence is reached, then the power is there against which these addictive patterns are relatively helpless.

You need to be careful, though, when some kind of challenge or problem comes into your life in whatever form, and eventually something will come again, things, they always come, that you need to be very careful at that point of when a challenge or problem arises in your life. There's the point where you can, there's a moment of, or a decision of becoming more intensely present or falling back into a pattern of numbing yourself to the emotion. You need to be very careful, be aware that no matter what problem may arise in the future, whether it's to do with the relationship, or finances, or your living situation, or your health, or somebody close to you, it doesn't matter what it is, but as a problem arises, always be very immediately identified as there's a challenge, and now you have a choice.

You can either go into numbing yourself so that you don't want to experience the pain of the challenge, and then you go to drinking or eating, or you can become more intensely present, and that you can, you look the challenge in the face, you face it completely, and then the power actually grows with every challenge, then the power in you grows. There may be certain thought patterns associated with the addiction that you need to be aware of, for example, in the case of overeating, or also in the case of drinking, there's a certain narrative that can easily arise, perhaps this happened to you before, that can easily arise in your mind, a little thing that tells you something in your mind, for example, if it's, let's say it's overeating, you come home in the evening, you had a stressful day, you come home and there you sit, and then the thought comes in, you can feel the addiction, the certain gravitational pull towards going to the fridge and taking out something, incarnating into a chocolate cake or whatever it is, then the thought comes in, oh, I've had a rough day, I deserve a treat. I've had a really rough day, whether you say I or you talk, some people talk to themselves in this, they say you, you've had a rough day, you deserve a treat, you should, don't deprive yourself of everything, you really deserve a treat. And if you're not careful enough, this thought, which is linked to the addictive pattern, will take you to the fridge, and then you will, you'll find a justification for going along with the addiction.

So, be careful if that ever arises again, so you can identify a certain thought that seems to justify the addiction and don't believe, that's why sometimes we say, don't believe in every thought that comes into your mind. So, when there's a self-talk, be careful with any thought that seeks to justify the addiction, it's a thought that's actually been created by the energy of the addiction. Does that make sense?

[Speaker 2] (24:43 - 25:04)

It does, very much. I would say the only fear that I have is probably, you know, after the course ends, I don't know, I just feel like going out socially, that I think is where the temptation might come in, but I just believe that my path is to not, not drink.

[Speaker 1] (25:04 - 26:38)

Yes, yes, there too, observe your mind to see what it says, because your mind might say, oh, just this once, there may even come a time when you can enjoy a glass of wine or something without the danger that it will pull you into unconsciousness, but that's probably not, unless you haven't reached that point, you may not reach that point, it doesn't really matter. I drink a glass or two of wine, usually with dinner, and I cannot drink more, so there's never a desire to go beyond that, and so it's not a problem, and if I had to give it up, that would be okay too, but that's fine, and I tell people on retreats and so on, avoid alcoholic beverages if you possibly can, even people who don't have a problem with drinking, who just are casual drinkers, they should also avoid, especially when they're engaged in intensive spiritual practice, because it can easily pull the, pull you out of presence, so use this challenge that you have, and you're doing it already, so that through it, you grow in presence, and then all will be well, continue to observe your mind, so that you don't believe in a thought that seeks to justify indulging in addiction again, so that'll be your practice.

[Speaker 2] (26:39 - 26:44)

Thank you so very much, thank you very much everybody, it's been amazing.

[Speaker 3] (26:45 - 27:21)

Thank you, you're very welcome. Thank you. Our next question, Eckhart, comes from someone who wrote in, as I observe the presence capabilities of those I'm close to in my family, the question arises as to whether senility, dementia, or even full-fledged Alzheimer's will wipe away all my conscious practice in being present.

Do you think we will revert to an unconscious state if our minds regress through senility, dementia, or Alzheimer's?

[Speaker 1] (27:22 - 36:29)

Now, of course, it's good to remember that you are not your mind, your mind is an instrument through which consciousness expresses itself. Consciousness, the mind, is a kind of focal point for consciousness, so what happens then when the mind deteriorates, to find an analogy, it's a little bit like you're watching a television broadcast, and the picture is suddenly not very good anymore, and it begins to flicker, and then it fades out, and then it comes back, and then it's not sharply defined anymore, and so there's obviously something wrong. It doesn't mean that something is wrong beyond this television, it could, but in this case, the television, the machine, has developed a dysfunction. Perhaps it's old, or perhaps some water got in there, or something.

It's not able to act any longer as fully as a transmitter of whatever the signals are that are flowing into the television. So, we are consciousness, and the consciousness that you are, the consciousness that I am, is a manifestation of the one consciousness that pervades the entire universe. One could say that the mind, or to talk in physical terms, the human brain, which undoubtedly there's an association with consciousness and the human brain.

The human brain acts a little bit like, yes, television or radio or a lens through which consciousness becomes focalized, through which consciousness manifests, and then it creates this world, because this world without your mind doesn't really exist as a world. So, consciousness creates this world, and it needs your mind, it needs the physical brain, in order to express itself through that. So, when the mind begins to fail, all it means is consciousness begins to withdraw, because it cannot express itself fully anymore.

So, basically, it's the beginning of dying, and some people die on the mental realm before they die physically, that in the case of Alzheimer's becomes more and more acute, then you can see then that the person basically isn't there anymore. Occasionally, you still see glimpses of the person that was there once, but it gradually is basically dissolving, and consciousness, the brain is no longer capable of acting as a transmitter of consciousness, and no gain in consciousness is left. There's an awakening process in the entire universe that is happening.

The universe is engaged in awakening, and you are only a small but important aspect of the awakening of consciousness in this dimension. And so, if consciousness awakens through you, this is not lost, this is part of the awakening of the totality of consciousness. So, no consciousness, no gain in consciousness is ever lost, and you are not your mind.

So, that perhaps is helpful to know if you, especially for perhaps if you are with somebody close to you or a loved one who is suffering from Alzheimer, or you begin to suffer from memory loss, and then perhaps more severe. So, as you practice presence, I would, I don't have any scientific evidence for this, and I don't think it exists, but I would suggest that if you live in presence, it's less likely that you will develop Alzheimer in old age. Perhaps it could still happen, but I would suggest that it is less, much less likely.

So, you are not your mind. The mind is an instrument for consciousness, and when the mind fails, it does not affect the underlying consciousness. Underlying the entire universe, the sense-perceived universe, is a field of intelligence that is the organizing principle behind form.

And so, no matter what happens on the surface level of form, it does not affect the underlying consciousness. And so, that also implies that no matter what drama happens in this dimension, and it is, it may well be a tragedy and very dramatic and very dreadful in this dimension. There's always another perspective and another level of truth, which does not invalidate the lower level of truth.

So, it does not say that a dreadful event like genocide or something like that, that it doesn't matter. No, it is true that this is a dreadful event on this level of truth from a higher, deeper or higher perspective. That consciousness that gave life to all these suffering forms still continues to exist and has not been affected by what happens on the level of physical reality.

It's an underlying, deeper reality. So, ultimately, another way of putting it, there's only one being, there's only one I am, that is the one consciousness. There's one being that incarnates through countless billions and billions of forms.

And in this continuous process of death and becoming and birth and death, birth, becoming, dying, being born, becoming, dying, there's a gradual process of awakening in this dimension. But it emanates from a deeper dimension or higher dimension. And so, whatever happens in this dimension is almost a little bit like a symbol for something deeper.

It's not the ultimate reality. Nothing that happens here is the ultimate reality. And there's a wonderful line which I can quote to you from the book called The Course in Miracles.

And that is a little, this little quote is at the very beginning of The Course in Miracles, which is a huge book, the same length approximately as the Bible. It's a book of psychological teaching. For some people it's very helpful, for others it's not.

But anyway, the entire course is summarized in the following words, and this is at the very beginning of the book. If you understand that, you understand the entire Course in Miracles and you understand every spiritual teaching in existence. Herein lies the peace of God, means in understanding, in experiencing the truth of this, that nothing real can be threatened, that nothing unreal ultimately exists.

In understanding this, as the Bible says, you are, your inner condition is called the peace of God that arises. And that's a very deep saying. You understand that, that's all you ever need of a level of context.

Eckhart Tolle The Everyday and the Transcendent [cad778c9-b066-466d-8aee-ad2f000b8c2d]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:03)

The Every Day and the Transcendent. In this podcast, Eckhart elaborates on two of his key concepts, which he calls the horizontal and the vertical dimensions. Another way to put it is the every day and the transcendent.

The horizontal, he defines as the place of everyday life, our egos, identification with our thoughts and our personalities. He says the vertical is connected to the source of all life, which some call God. It's also where the transcendent dimension of ourself lives beyond space and time.

Eckhart says the primary purpose of our lives is to become aware of the vertical. Eckhart explains it's our destiny to live with a foot in both worlds. When we embrace the vertical, that transforms the horizontal.

He describes it like a cross, where the horizontal and vertical come together.

[Speaker 1] (1:06 - 47:20)

So here we are again in the present moment. What is that? It's not what you perceive with your senses, that's the content of the present moment.

What happens in the present moment. But become aware of that field of alive presence that underlies all your sense perceptions. In other words, to become deeply aware of the present moment goes beyond becoming aware of your sense perceptions, although quite often that's the first very useful step.

So to become aware of the present moment, first step, sense perceptions, you look around the room or wherever you are, perhaps you hear things, even some other senses may be involved, but probably mainly visual and auditory sense perception. So it takes you out of conceptual thinking and just pure perception, sense perception. That's number one.

And the next step is you go a bit deeper and become aware of something that you cannot see, can't really talk about, but an undeniable field of energy, consciousness that makes all sense perceptions possible, and that's always the same. The content of the present moment changes when you move from where you are now to somewhere else, different sense perceptions. Underlying all that is always the presence, without no sense perception would be possible, that presence is inseparable from who you are in your essence.

So you sense yourself as the underlying presence in which the world appears. Would there be a room if you were not there to perceive it? That's a philosophical question.

Does it need a perceiving consciousness for the world to exist? Would there be a table without the perceiving consciousness that sees it as a table? What ultimately is just atoms and molecules in rapid motion in vast spaces in between, 99.99% empty space, and atoms and molecules swirling around continuously, it's not a table yet. But then a human sensory organ comes in and a consciousness behind it, and suddenly these swirling atoms and molecules become a table, or appear to be a table. Two very limited sensory organs, you can touch or you can see, but let's not go too far. You become aware of the present moment as that which underlies it all, and that is inseparable from who you are, the essence of who you are.

Sometimes I call it the vertical dimension because the rest of life is a horizontal dimension. The primary purpose of your life is, first of all, to become aware of the vertical dimension. Most humans are completely unaware.

For them, only the horizontal dimension exists, which is the world, and, of course, their mind. They're inseparable. Without mind, there's no world.

So your mind, your thought processes, your memories, mental images, ultimately all sense perceptions, if they're visual or auditory, they're all mental images. So the entire world that you perceive as out there happens, one could say, inside you. So one could say the world is in you.

It's an interesting way of, just for a little while, just to say there's nothing ultimately outside of me. The world happens in you. So some great philosophers have asked, what is there actually out there?

The thing in itself, is there anything out there, or what is it? We don't know. Is the entire world a mental creation, a mental projection, a little bit like the Matrix, the movie?

You can take the blue pill, then you stay confined in what I call the horizontal dimension of life. Or you can take the red pill, then you go deeper. So horizontal dimension, most humans are only aware of that.

So there's always, what now, what's the next thing, and the world is often a threatening place and never a very fulfilling place, although sometimes you achieve a bit of fulfillment here and there, or it comes to you, and then it's, ah, life is good, and it is good. But it's the goodness of life when you're only on the horizontal dimension is very limited, doesn't last long. There is a deeper goodness, but that's connected with the vertical dimension.

So the goodness you find on the surface of things is fleeting, nothing wrong with it, whatever it may be. You go on vacation, you go take a cruise, hopefully nothing happens, so you don't get suddenly the goodness of this woman gets marred, spoiled by something happening, a virus, oh my God. And then other things happen, often it happens, your purpose of life, the purpose of your life is to become aware of the vertical dimension.

Many humans do not go there until the horizontal dimension becomes an increasingly unsatisfying place. As long as the horizontal dimension of life is relatively okay, it's okay, yeah, I've got a job, I'm doing okay, you're not really, but you can live with the worries that you have and all the things that you live on, the relationship problems and so on, okay, but it's not so much of a problem that you can't stand it anymore or that you're forced into extreme anxiety or fear, but that at some point it happens to many people.

Through adversity, the term we used, some form of suffering in their personal lives increases, great loss, or you achieve great things and the achievement of the great things are no longer satisfying, so despite your achievements, you experience again extreme anxiety and fear or depression, and that's a bad place to be, and I've met people who have achieved what the world would call great things, fame, wealth, and they've said they, after an initial high when they felt, oh, I've made it, they came down.

It's an almost common theme when you look at rock stars and some actors and their fame makes them unhappy after an initial period of elation. So the world can become an unsatisfying place not only because you lose something, it can also become an unsatisfying place because you have gained something and you've gained so much and that which you gained hasn't made you happy. Not only that, it's in some cases, in many cases of lottery winners who became more unhappy than they were before.

So whatever you do, sooner or later, the horizontal dimension where things happen, where you obtain things and look for things and experiences and people, it's all fine, there's nothing wrong with it. Achieve things in your life on this dimension, I want to build up a business, yes, why not? I want to write a book, I want to paint, become good at this or that, all wonderful, but not satisfying for very long, and wherever you go, you find something's creeping in to spoil your enjoyment of it for some reason.

We've talked about it before. So it looks as if somebody were sabotaging your life, some little demon somewhere saying, okay, you get married, you fall in love, it's so wonderful, and then the person that makes you happy today and in a year's time, the very same person makes you unhappy, or two years or a couple of months. So a human being reaches a kind of point, not every human, but you reach a point where you become dissatisfied, you see, you begin to doubt that you will ever, the world will ever make you happy, or you experience extreme forms of suffering, what in biblical word is calamity, you don't hear that word very often in the media, but you experience some form of calamity, either personal or you participate in a collective calamity that arises, a collective challenge as the virus, for example, and many other things are possible, and you can't foresee what the next one is going to be, and then suddenly millions of humans are faced with perhaps extreme fear. They were in fear before, fear is very normal, when you only move on the horizontal dimension, then there's always an underlying fear, but you may not be very much aware of it, and sometimes it surfaces when you wake up at night, but when something happens on a collective scale, vast scale, then millions are suddenly pushed into extreme fear, anxiety, and that's the opportunity that arises when there's an extreme form of adversity for them, either in your personal life or the collective, then you become more ready to go beyond, to encounter something else that's always been there, but you ignored it completely, and that's the vertical dimension.

And the purpose of your life is to find it and then be rooted in it. Now what is the vertical dimension? It is the present moment, you could say the entry point or the portal into the vertical dimension is becoming aware of the present moment or beginning, and then, so your alertness goes up a bit when you become aware of the present moment, and you should do this particularly at the present times when you're watching the news or you're reading something on the, whatever they're posting about what's all the stuff that's extremely problematic in the world, oh my God, what's going to happen?

And of course the energy that comes through the media is high anxiety, sometimes almost hysteria, and it's very easy to be seduced by that, and then you become part of the collective fear that is there when you listen to commentators, all the stuff they talk about, so the energy that underlies it is, oh my God, and they love it because the media, the more negative emotion there is, the more people will watch it because it's kind of addictive, give me more, oh my God, so very important then when you watch these things, don't be hypnotically drawn into it, and then it takes over your mind, they're fearful, so your mind gets taken over by these thought forms, because that's what, you absorb the thought forms from the media, and then they become yours, so to speak, so what you have absorbed are energy fields that amplify what was already in you, because there was already in you throughout your life an underlying fear, an underlying sense of something is missing here, something is wrong, an unease in the background, most people have that, they don't even know it, because it's always there, like the humming noise that you hear in a room, the longer it goes on, the less you become aware of it, and if it goes on for a long time, you don't even know it's there, but when it suddenly stops, then you say, oh, what was that, there was this humming noise going on for hours, must have been going on for days or weeks, and that's the unease that is in your mental-emotional field, it's a bit like that, but it's a minor manifestation of fear, it's just an underlying sense of something not right here, yes, and there is something not right, and what's not right is ignoring the dimension of depth, the vertical dimension, that's the cross, another meaning of the cross points to the intersection of the two dimensions, the horizontal and the vertical, you need both, so then the media amplifies what was already in you, those patterns, and you absorb them, and then you can't think of anything else, so before you were thinking about your personal problems at night, you went, oh, this and that, and now your mind gets taken over by this big one or several collective huge problems that are even bigger, they fuse with your personal problems, and so this whole thing is in your mind, it has taken you over, you don't know that that's what's happening, you don't know that what's happening is you're at the mercy of energy movements that live in you, and that's ultimately not you, there's a particular frequency to these thought forms, and the frequencies, they live in you, you don't know it because you're identified with them, so it's good to become aware that you're continuously thinking about these things and the thoughts fuel the fear in the emotional field, and say, okay, this is suffering, obviously it's a form of suffering, what is making you suffer?

Well, if you look deeply, it's the thought forms, because you haven't even caught this virus yet, if you should catch it, then it's not a problem, then you face that, we may talk about that in a minute, so you're in suffering almost worse than you were if you had caught the virus. So, realize this is not a pleasant place to be, it is destructive, it fulfills no useful purpose, and then see, could it be different? Am I at the mercy of all this, or could it be different?

You turn off the devices, doesn't mean you can't listen to the news, but not for too long, not for hours on end, you turn off the devices, and then you sit there, in your room or outside, wherever it may be, and this is the present moment, and then you become aware of your surroundings, become aware of yourself, your consciousness, and you stop thinking, what happens then, for a moment you stop thinking, but you're conscious, and that's the, there's the vertical dimension opening up, you're conscious, but not thinking, or thinking very little, there's a deepening of who you are, suddenly you discover a depth that you hadn't known before, it was there, but you didn't know it, and so a very quick way to get, if you don't know what vertical dimension is, it's just an abstract thing, to have a taste of it, is, if you stop thinking for a moment, now you might say, I can't do that, but that's just another thought that denies the fact that you can stop thinking for a moment, so you don't ask your mind whether you can stop thinking, because obviously it'll say, no, you can't, of course you can't, so you stop thinking for a moment, just like this, like now, now this is not a memorable thing, because it's not even an experience, because it doesn't have any content, if you stop thinking, there's something there, but you can't define it, just as a beingness or presence, that is your essence identity, which is connected to the vertical dimension, your form identity is the horizontal dimension, and I will now begin to look at some questions, what I've just said is virtually the answer to virtually every question, by the way, as we will see, the answer to virtually every question is that, I hear what you're saying, but when I get really afraid of losing all my money in the stock market, of getting sick, or losing a loved one, how do I handle that? Fear again, the question is about fear, how do I handle the fear of catching a disease, of losing many things, many people are experiencing not only the fear now of the virus, they're also experiencing the fear of the repercussions of what's happening, businesses are closing down, everything is closing down, it's a very strange thing, that this is happening, it's like an enforced closing down of the busyness, not just the business, but the busyness of the world, an enforced sudden ending of all that, many planes are not flying anymore, some cities are empty of people, until this happened, the world was absurdly busy, noisy, busy, everything was in movement, everything was lost in the world, lost in the mind, and suddenly, as if somebody said, let's turn it off for a while, enforced stillness almost, exactly what millions of humans actually need to experience, it doesn't mean that they will automatically also experience the inner stillness, but there is a possibility of an awakening for many, if they can go beyond the fear, the fearful thoughts, but how do you go beyond the fearful thoughts? Well, it requires a little bit of awareness, but if you are here with us, you probably have that awareness, what I mean by that is, the awareness of what's going on in your mind, to recognize, rather than total identification with what's going on in your mind, you have in the background an awareness of what's going on in your mind, very different, because it's a different dimension of consciousness, the awareness, it's not the same as a thought, the awareness can recognize what thoughts go on in your mind, and you realize, I'm thinking all these useless thoughts, but that realization, I'm verbalizing it now, but because we are communicating through language, but that realization that all these useless and destructive thoughts are going through my head, that is a realization that is not verbal, it's pre- or post-verbal, because it comes through the awareness, and there's a simple recognition that what's going on in your mind is not helpful, it's making you fearful and unhappy, so it is to be tackled there, all these problems that he mentions, or he or she mentions three, fear of losing all my money or my savings, my investments, what I've been saving, of getting sick, or something bad could happen to a loved one, so you have fear for yourself, you have fear for others, and of course, all these things are not happening now, the things that you fear, but they could happen, says the mind, so I better think about it now, because in case it does, of course, if they did happen, you would face the situation with the power of your conscious awareness, you would face the sickness, you would face the loss of money, and you would even face the loss of a loved one, or the suffering of a loved one, with the power of your presence, you can face that, but what you cannot do, you cannot overcome these problems, or face them, because they only exist in your imagination, they haven't even happened yet, therefore, there's absolutely nothing you can do about them, in fact, they will simply be amplified, the more you think about them, the more they become amplified, it's a totally illusory realm that is making you suffer, and so if there's a minimum of awareness, you can suddenly become aware of what it is that you are doing to yourself, well, it's not that you are voluntarily doing it to yourself, but one could say, it is happening to you, so you become aware of what is happening to you, because the thoughts in your mind, virtually all the thoughts in the absence of awareness, happen to you, they are not voluntary, so people say, I think this, I think, you don't think, the thinking happens to you, when you're not aware, you are at the mercy of thought, you are at the mercy of the energy field, that is what we call thought, it lives in you, you are possessed, you don't know it, the moment you realize it, that this is not the fearful thinking, isn't something that you do, you do it, you say, yeah, I'm doing it, but I can't stop it, no, you are not doing it, it happens to you, so some people perceive it as, well, why am I doing this to myself, well, that's already, it's a good first step, why am I making myself suffer by thinking all that, and then the next step is you realize, well, it's not really me doing it, it's the self-serving thought forms that are swirling around in my mind continuously, that are making me unhappy, that have no useful purpose, I'm not helping myself or anybody by thinking these things, by projecting bad things that could happen, and so with the awareness of what's going on in your mind, comes the first time a moment of freedom, because before you had no free will, without awareness, you have no free will, you are at the mercy of a conditioned mind, and when the conditioned mind becomes particularly amplified, for example, now by these collective events that are happening around us, that amplifies the patterns that were already there in your mind, and it amplifies the fear that was already there in your mind, and the useful thing is by becoming amplified, the opportunity becoming aware of what's happening is greater now, because it's so obvious that the suffering in you is increasing, from the normal suffering, everyday suffering, the suffering in you is increasing, that's true, that's the bad news, but the good news is the fact that the suffering is increasing makes it also more obvious, the process behind it becomes more obvious, it becomes so much louder, that the suffering starts streaming, therefore, the suffering can be an awakening for you, it awakens that suffering that is ultimately produced by your mind, by the thoughts in your mind, can awaken you, and you suddenly become, you can't stand it anymore, and then you begin to examine, how does this all happen, and the awareness grows, oh, and then you try out something, I have another question here, this person asks, what do I do after I wake up, because I've been laid off from work, and I'm petrified of what to do next, what are the practical steps I can do in that moment, so you wake up, you may notice when you wake up in the morning, there is a brief moment when the movement of thought hasn't started yet, how long, I don't know, it varies from person to person, it could be a few seconds, it could even be a minute, but that's rare, so there's a moment when you look around, oh, you've just woken up, and then you begin to remember your problems, and then the thoughts go, if you had a mirror, you could see the first moment you look quite peaceful, the eyes open, maybe you can look out of the window, there's a sky, and then you start, oh, oh, oh, and you begin to suffer already, the moment you start thinking, and if that doesn't happen, it happens in another way, you wake up, and then you're either your left or your right hand, reach for the phone, before you even look out of the window, and you go, oh, my God, what's going on, it's worse than yesterday, and immediately, it takes over your mind, you absorb immediately from the collective mind, and you don't know you're amplifying again what was already there, and you're even more possessed, every morning, you're even more possessed, so what can you do, if you wake up in the morning, don't reach for the phone, or you wake up in the night, could happen too, and that's a very fearful place for many people, because the night is a dark place, it's where many people experience despair that is greater than what they experience during the daytime, and there's light, so you wake up in the night, I remember how that was for me, it's a long time ago, waking up in the middle of the night, and the despair that you feel, and the alien nature of the world, how awful it all is, oh, I can't stand it, everything is threatening and strange, and there's an emptiness, not in a good sense, but there's a nothingness there, and it's dark, and then the mind starts operating, oh, how awful it all is. I was suffering at that time, throughout my twenties, there wasn't enough awareness, I was identified with the thoughts, and so the questioner asks, what can I do when I wake up, and well, the prerequisite for doing anything is that you know that this is happening to you, that's the first step.

If you don't know that this is happening to you, then you are completely identified with it. So let's assume that you, almost, perhaps almost everybody who is with us, just as the questioner, has the ability, he has enough awareness to know that when you're in a state of suffering, of anxiety, fear, panic even, then you know that this is happening to you. You know there's a subtle difference between it happening to you, and knowing that this is happening to you.

It almost seems the same thing. So, when you know that you are in a state of fear, there is a witnessing consciousness that, no, there's a fear in me. It means you are not the fear, you have stepped out a little bit of it from there, you can see that there is fear.

Without the knowing, you are the fear, you become the fear. So it takes you over completely. And this knowing is the awareness of the presence.

And this awareness of the presence is the awakened consciousness. It's the beginning of it. It's the first appearance of a deeper, we could either say deeper or higher dimension of consciousness in you that is beyond thought.

And that is the purpose of your life, beyond what you do, the horizontal dimension, is this awakening. And not only briefly and then go to sleep again, become unconscious again, but to stay awake. And so that you can live in these two dimensions, the vertical and the horizontal.

You don't deny the horizontal, but you're rooted in the vertical, or the rock you built your houses. You dig deep, as Jesus said, until you find the foundation, and then you build the house, and then the house is not swept away when the floods and the storms come. So that's what we are talking about.

So let's then assume the ability for you is there to have the awareness that you are in a state of fear. That's already a great thing. And then from there you say, I'm verbalizing it now, but a lot of that is beyond conceptualization.

There's a knowing there. You can know things without spelling them out. There's a deeper knowing.

So you know all these thoughts. Ultimately you realize, the thoughts I've been thinking make me unhappy. You know that beyond thought.

Now how do I get out of this momentum that is in me that wants to continue thinking those thoughts? The fearful thoughts, they have a momentum. They don't want to end.

They will make it hard for you to say, stop. You can't. You cannot say, okay, stop.

I want to stop. Maybe if you hold your breath for a minute, you can stop thinking fearful thoughts, but then they accumulate and then even more fearful thoughts come because you can't hold the lid on a boiling kettle for too long and then it goes off. So what do you do?

So you have recognized that what's been happening to you fulfills no useful purpose. That's an important realization because before there is an assumption in the unconscious mind that unless you worry a lot, then you're not controlling your life. There is the delusion that the more you think about, but when you don't know, it's useless.

The more you think about the problems of your life, then you need to continue thinking in order to hold it all together. You need to really worry all the problems of the world. If you don't worry, then your life will fall to pieces.

It's the underlying assumption. Of course, it's a delusion. So the worrying, the fearful thinking does not want to end.

You need to know that, that it has a momentum. And you cannot fight it. If you fight it, you make it stronger.

You give it added energy. So it's not by willpower that you can stop it. Or as I just said, you can stop it briefly, but not for long through exercising willpower.

So you stop it simply by first recognizing not only the futility, but also the destructive nature of that type of thinking. And then you begin to see that a lot of the unhappiness is produced by the narratives in your mind. At that moment, you have a choice.

You can continue being dragged along in the stream of fearful thinking. Or you can say, my choice is now to take my attention away from fearful thinking. I'm verbalizing it, but where does it go?

The fearful thinking, it wants all their consciousness continuously. It says, no, I'm letting go. I want it.

And then you say, no, I don't want to go that way anymore. It's very simple. You bring your attention somewhere else.

You need something at first. My recommendation is, feel your inner body. Direct your attention.

Let's say you wake up in the night or in the morning. Direct your attention, instead of thinking, direct your attention into the inner energy field of your hands. And then you hold it there.

It doesn't require willpower. It's just a simple decision. And you hold it.

You feel the inner aliveness in your hands. It becomes an anchor for stepping out of mind, being present. Can you feel the energy in your hands?

I can. And it's always wonderful. I've been feeling the energy in my hands for many years.

It's always fresh and new. And I don't tire speaking of it. Of course, it's not just the hands.

If you can't feel the energy in your hands, close your eyes and ask yourself if you're, let's say, your right hand, or if you're left-handed, your left hand. Ask yourself if your left or right hand is still there or not. Is it still there?

How do I know it's there? How can I know it's there right now? Now, you can't know it because you remember it was there when you saw it a few seconds ago.

You close your eyes. You're not moving your hand. How can you know it's there?

You can know it's there, but how does it happen? What is it? How do you know it?

You can feel it, but what is it that you feel? You feel the energy within the hand. It's very subtle at first, so you need to be alert to feel it.

But that alertness that then goes in the body is taken away from thinking. And you suddenly, your hand feels more alive than it was before. And that's only the beginning.

You can feel both hands simultaneously. You become aware of all pervasive sense of aliveness in the entire body, energy field. And the amazing thing is, oh, by the way, you may also become aware that you're breathing, because that's connected with the body.

You're breathing into the body. The breath flows in and it flows out. And the more you become aware of your body, the more you become aware of your breathing.

The more you become aware of your breathing, the more you become aware of the body. The wonderful aliveness there. And what happened to your mind activity?

It subsided almost completely or completely, because you cannot be aware of inner body and at the same time think. A few fragments may be there, thoughts, but not a sustained stream of thinking. It's not possible, because all your attention, your consciousness has gone away from the conceptualizing mind into the inner body.

I would suggest the more you practice, the longer you can stay there. But you need to be careful, because the mind is basically the ego that the mind that you had identified with, the mind will very soon tell you that thoughts will want to come in, because the mind will want control back. It realizes it has lost control, this energy field, and it will say something like, what do you think you're doing?

This is completely useless. That doesn't solve anything. Think about what's happening tomorrow.

You might lose your job in a day or two. What are you going to do then? You better think about that.

What are you doing with this nonsense feeling body? It's not helping you at all. And so the mind will come up with a very seductive, it says very seductive things of why this is completely pointless.

And now the question is, do you believe in every thought that comes into your head? Most people do. Whatever thought comes, they get taken over by it.

Do you believe in every thought that comes into your head? And thought says, all this meditative rubbish, just that's not helping the world or you. Of course, the opposite is true.

So the mind will use strategies to get control back. And then you need to know that when that's happening. I highly recommend if you should wake up, as many people do in the middle of the night and start worrying, it's very unpleasant.

So feel the inner body. Now, it's possible that when you feel the inner body, there may still be some fear inside you. And often it's experienced in the chest area or stomach area.

The fearful energy may still be there when you begin to feel even though you might no longer be thinking fearful thoughts when you feel your inner body. But it doesn't necessarily mean that the emotional field, which is another energy field that lives in you, it may not completely disappear the moment you stop fueling the emotion with your fearful thinking. Because you have already given so much fuel to the emotion of fear that it has a surplus of fuel in you.

So even when you're no longer fueling it with your thinking, it can survive for quite a long time without feeding it with your thinking. So it still lives in you. But it probably won't be in your hands or your arms.

It's probably around here. So as you feel the inner body, then you come to accept what you still feel is inner. And you don't say, I shouldn't be feeling that.

No, all you need to do is to recognize that it's there. And you also understand why it's there. Because you have given it so much energy through your thinking, not voluntarily, through unconscious thinking.

You've given it so much energy over the past few days, weeks, months, and years, especially here in this collective calamity that we're finding ourselves in. And so you can be aware of the inner body. And at the same time, be aware of the energy field of fear that you may still be carrying here.

And that's how it is. It's not a problem. You know where it came from, why it's there.

It becomes part of the present moment. And it's always say yes to whatever the present moment manifests within or without. Right now, it manifests the fear.

But the fear is surrounded by the sense of aliveness that you can feel in your body. So it's contained. There's a space around it.

There's an alive space around it. And I have a word, the pain body, the fear that I've just described, in the terms that I use, as you probably know, old emotion that lives in you, I call the pain body. And for many people, the predominant emotion of the pain body is fear.

For others, the predominant emotion that lives in them, fueled by years of dysfunctional thinking, egoic thinking. For others, the predominant emotion will be anger. Or for others, the predominant emotion that's in the pain body may be a deep sadness.

There is a reciprocal relationship between the thinking in your mind and the emotion. The emotion, let's say you're just practicing what I described. You're still in bed.

You're lying and you feel the aliveness in the inner body. You feel yourself breathing, present. You feel the presence that you are that's inseparable from the entire energy field of the body.

And there's a fear, still there, probably. And it's not just the mind that wants to start up again. The fearful energy has also a kind of, doesn't have a life of its own.

It's a psychic parasite living in you. And it wants more fuel after a while. So the fear will attempt to get back into your mind and force your mind to continue thinking fearful thoughts.

So the fear will go up. And then, if you're not careful, the fear will take over your mind again and you will start thinking fearful thoughts. And every fearful thought, thought being energy like everything else, every thought is an energy formation that arises in the consciousness that you are.

And this energy of fear is the same frequency as the emotional fearful pain body. The fearful thought feeds, gives energy to the pain body. And the pain body wants more of it.

And then there come moments when it doesn't need any more energy. And then you have moments of, you can relax a bit, but it never lasts for very long. So this is a way of using the situation for spiritual awakening and for realizing the vertical dimension, which is present moment.

The portal is the present moment. And another portal, mostly related to it, or another aspect of it, is the inner body. The inner body is also the entry point, which is inseparable from the present moment.

That's the point into the vertical dimension. It goes beyond the physical body. There's more there.

And so, the vertical opens up as you go within. And when you're rooted within, and then you open your eyes, and then you look around, and you still feel the inner body, then you can deal with the horizontal in a much more effective way, a much more powerful way. Because you may need to take some action.

This person says, the questioner, I have just been laid off. I'm petrified. But he's asking, very wisely, what do I do after I wake up?

Because I've been laid off and I'm petrified. What do I do next? What are the practical steps I can do in that moment?

That's a very wise question. He's not asking, what are the practical steps that I can take in order to find a new job or make a living? He realizes that a more vital question is, what can I do in that moment to become free of the fear?

As much as possible, at least the fearful thinking. You may not immediately become free of the fear that still lives in you as the emotional pain body. That's fine.

But become free of fearful thinking. And then you become more present. The vertical dimension opens up.

Then the next step, of course, this person will have to take some action. And action happens here in the horizontal dimension. The likelihood that the questioner, or you, if you are listening and you are the questioner, the likelihood that you will take effective and wise and focused action in your search for an alternative living, job, or business, or whatever it may be, is far greater when you are not trapped in fearful thinking.

When you are trapped in fearful thinking, your ability to arrive at wise decisions and take a wise action and effective action, this ability is greatly diminished when you're in fear. Let's say you're looking for another job. If you should go for an interview and you're emanating this fearful energy, you're less likely, even if you're well-qualified, you're much less likely to be attractive to a prospective employer.

Nobody wants to be with the energy field. Unless the employer has a strong pain body and your pain body of fear and the employer's complement each other, but that's usually the case with couples who meet. Some couples will feel very much drawn to each other.

In quite a few cases, their pain bodies complement each other, and some couples are drawn to each other because they mutually fuel their pain bodies.

Eckhart Tolle The Evolutionary Journey Still Ahead [fe4aaafe-4a4e-4d8d-87c8-5f58667eb0ff]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:54)

The evolutionary journey still ahead. In this episode, Eckhart talks about how far we have yet to go in our spiritual growth. He says, what's critical is that we transcend our thinking because not only is it possible, it's absolutely necessary for our survival.

He says, the dysfunction of the ego dates back thousands of years. Eckhart explains we need only look at history for evidence, creating enemies, war, and endless cycles of violence. Eckhart believes that we are in crisis, a turning point.

He believes we must evolve beyond our current state of consciousness. He says, when a critical number of people connect more consistently with their transcendent selves, an entirely new world will be born. Eckhart calls it a new earth.

He says, that is our destiny and the secret to all life.

[Speaker 1] (0:56 - 44:38)

You can transcend the thinking mind. Transcend doesn't mean exclude. It means you go beyond, but you are able to use it.

I'm telling you now the secret of life for humans at this stage of evolution. In 20,000 years, it may be a different thing because there's still a huge evolutionary journey ahead of us. The secret of life at this time for humans is that not only is it possible for us to transcend thinking, it is necessary to transcend thinking because the egoic mind that is now amplified by science and technology, enormously amplified by science and technology, which means that its function of the human mind is also enormously amplified by science and technology.

So if we could create havoc 200 years ago, 500 years ago, 1,000 years ago, with swords and clubs and bows and arrows, couldn't kill that many people. But now the same dysfunction still operates and now technology creates all kinds of problems that are a manifestation of the underlying dysfunction in the human mind. We have reached the point of crisis now.

Yes, we can do all kinds of things to, there are some temporary solutions on an external level, and it's fine if you feel called upon to work for certain causes and help the world in that way. It's a wonderful thing to do. But the causal level, most of these problems exist on the level of effect, the effect of an underlying dysfunction.

So the most important thing is to address the underlying dysfunction in the human mind, and then an entirely new world will arise when there's a sufficiently large number of humans in whom the dysfunction no longer operates. So how do we then step out of this identification with thinking? It's quite simple.

It is possible for you, and we need to find out here and now, right now, is it possible for you to sit here and be fully conscious, alert, present, with little or no thought right now, without remembering your past or your problems or thinking about future, pretending for a moment that past and future don't exist? They actually don't, but just let's say pretend. Otherwise, I don't want to create a resistance in you.

I say, past and future don't exist. Well, but they do. I had to cough coffee this morning.

That was the past. Let's pretend past and future don't exist. And of course, they don't, because they only exist as a thought in your mind.

The past is a thought in your mind, and you're having this thought now. The future is a thought in your mind, and you're having this thought now. If the future existed, some intrepid explorer would have found it and say, I have arrived at the future.

Everybody is looking for it, and I have found it. And then you ask, well, where is it? It's here now.

So no explorer has ever found the future because it does not exist except as a mental function. Of course, we need it. I'm wearing a watch because it's good we can arrange to mediate a particular time.

It's a good thing. Can't say one day we'll all come together here in the present moment. It could take a million years before we just happen to be in the same place.

So on a practical level, we need past and future. On a deeper level, in order to find who we are, in order to be deeply connected to the being of you, past and future is a great hindrance. So let's for a moment then say no past, no future, just this moment, this moment here, which consists of sense perceptions.

And you don't even need to interpret the sense perceptions. You can just be aware of the sense perceptions. So you don't need to say, oh, there's a strong light and there's a lovely flower.

You don't need to attach any labels. Practice not attaching labels, but being simply aware. So you're looking at something, or you can take in the totality of this room.

You take in the totality of this room and you're aware of it, but do you need to interpret it? Do you need to label it? It's a habit.

It's a habit that's been there for thousands of years, but it doesn't mean that you can't step out of this habit and you can, and this is why you're here. So this is vitally important to realize that you are able to perceive, in this case, this room and the sounds that you hear and what you see, and perhaps even feel the air or whatever it is, other sense perceptions. This is the present moment perceived through your senses, but who is perceiving it when you're not labeling it mentally?

But for before we go there, just see first if you can just for a few seconds, start with three seconds, four seconds, five seconds. Be present here in this room. Be aware and alert.

Take it all in, but don't need to call it anything. It just, it is. Well, now, thought may come in again quickly, but that's okay.

Then you invite a new present moment in, and it always, the first step is always become aware of sense perceptions because if you're completely absorbed in the stream of thinking, you're hardly aware of your surroundings. You live in this hypnotic state, which is a conditioned mind in your head, and you hardly know what's around you. And you can see it when you look at a person who is completely identified with thinking.

They're not there. They're somewhere else. All their consciousness is being absorbed by thinking.

Thinking devours, gobbles up all your consciousness like a little monster that lives in your head. God must think, think. No, you don't have to think.

You can step out of thinking and be present. That's perhaps the key to all spiritual practices, meditation, and so on, to be present with what is. And of course, you start with always sense perceptions, but sense perceptions is not the ultimate of what we mean when we speak of the now, when we speak of the dimension of presence, but it's a starting point.

You're aware of sense perceptions, and you're not labeling them. What is left of you right now, or let's say, are you still there right now, when you don't remember the past and you don't think about the future, and you're just aware of this moment? What's left of you when you don't even think about who you are in mental terms, no conceptual reality anymore, just the alive reality of this moment, sense perception?

But what is underneath the sense perceptions? Underneath the sense perception is you, but not the historical you, not the narrative of you, that is the ego, a deeper dimension of you, and that deeper dimension of you is awareness, or we could say consciousness. So what's left of you when you don't label things and you just perceive, yes, one could say the surface reality is sense perceptions, and then underneath it, there is the awareness that makes sense perception possible, and that is the essence of who you are.

The essence of who you are is consciousness, and so you become aware right now, not only of sense perceptions, but underlying sense perceptions, you're becoming aware that you are aware. You can sense that you are aware. You can know without any doubt that you are conscious here.

You may even be dreaming this room, who knows? Perhaps you're dreaming that you're sitting in a room and a man is saying that you may be dreaming, it's possible, but there's still an awareness without which there would be no dream. The awareness or the consciousness makes the dream possible.

So the essence of who you are is consciousness or conscious presence. Oh, and this is not something that you can describe. It doesn't have a history, and it isn't my consciousness and your consciousness.

There's only one consciousness. We are all expressions of the one consciousness disguised temporarily as people, but we are disguised consciousness appearing as a human being, a human being. The human is your form identity, which is the body and the psychological mind, your personality, and the physical body.

That's the human you, and that undoubtedly exists. But the being, you're not just human, you're a human being. The being, the way I use the term, the being points to the deeper dimension of who you are as consciousness, the conscious being, the one being, the one consciousness that incarnates through billions of life forms continuously.

There's only one of us ultimately here. There's only one of us. There's only one universal consciousness that becomes a flower, becomes a blade of grass, becomes a dog, becomes a human.

It becomes the moon, the star, a galaxy, one consciousness assuming and manifesting through forms, born into form, incarnating. But very briefly, every human life, at the human level, your life is very short. It goes like, you're born, and then you die.

My mother was not philosophically or spiritually inclined, but one day she visited me a few years just before she passed away. She was in her early 80s. She visited me, and usually my mother would always talk a lot because it's the human mind, nothing personal.

She would talk and talk and talk because she lived alone when she was with me. Great opportunity to not just think, but actually talk. And so we went for hours and hours, and I was just present.

And for a moment, this presence transmitted itself to her for a moment, and she stopped talking, and she looked around, and then she said, what she said is the very beginning of all philosophy and spiritual search. She said, isn't it strange? We are born, and then we die.

I was amazed. This is how all philosophy starts, the strangeness, the wonder of life, how brief life is, and you look at how weird. We are born, and then we die.

So that was a temporary spiritual awakening in my mother, and then she started talking again. But there was a spark there that goes, wow. It's a very profound statement.

So the human form, physical form, and the personality, psychological form, is short-lived, and it's good to be aware of that because you attach an excessive importance to your form identity, which is the personality and the body. You attach an excessive importance to the form identity if you're unaware of how brief this form identity actually is, the lifespan of this form identity. So the awareness of mortality can be a profoundly liberating thing.

This was practiced in medieval times. Often, people had a skull on their desk. You can see it in old paintings to be reminded of mortality.

Even to this day in some Buddhist countries, the Buddhist monks in some Buddhist traditions, the monks visit the morgue where the dead bodies are kept regularly and sit among the dead bodies and meditate there. And a Western person who has no idea what's going on, they might say, this is so weird. What are they?

This is morbid and dreadful. What are they doing? Well, they're becoming aware of mortality.

They're becoming aware of the short-lived nature of the human form, of the human part of the human being. And by becoming aware of the fleetingness of the human part of the human being, strangely, the awareness of the being, which is the awareness itself, can grow in you when you become aware of mortality. It looks negative to become aware of the short-lived nature of the human form, but when you don't run away from it, when you face it completely, when you go to India and you see that there the dead bodies are not hidden as in the West.

In the West, mortality is still changing a little bit now, but it's still a taboo because the West has kind of lost the transcendent dimension of life, which is the being dimension, the evanescent dimension. So it needs to deny mortality, and so it's dreadful, don't talk about it. Even to this day in hospitals, the doctors cannot teach you how to die.

You need to survive at all costs, even if it's only a few more days and involves enormous suffering. So you contemplate impermanence, and in a strange way, by contemplating impermanence in various ways, something arises in you that feels deeply peaceful. You can't describe what exactly that is.

Well, I can tell you what it is, but it's hard to describe in words. You become aware of that which is not impermanent, but it doesn't become aware of itself. It is the awareness.

It is the one consciousness. It is the timeless dimension of who you are. It is the being of you rather than the human.

So when the being emerges more strongly, when you become aware of the fleetingness of the human form, it is, wow, so short. And then you feel, ah, and then your mind stops because your mind is all part of the personality. Your mind is the doing, doing and being.

In our civilization, most humans are lost in doing, and they're lost in just the human dimension, completely unaware of the dimension of being. This is why my main teaching is the teaching of being. The doing, you've got that already.

You're probably doing too much already. You're good at doing. Almost everybody's good at doing, but awareness of being needs to underlie the doing.

If awareness of being, which is awareness itself, being and awareness are one. Without that, the doing becomes self-serving and ultimately pointless and ultimately destructive. The doing only makes sense if it arises from the deeper level of being, and rather than ego-motivated doing.

And so you know, can always know whether you are connected with being when you do something, when you are active, because you don't want to have two compartments in your life because that's not quite right either. You can't say, okay, I've got a full schedule for today, and from six to 6.30, being, I practice being. Okay, then you do, oh, it's six.

Okay, time to practice being. I'm trying. I think I only need 15 minutes today.

I could do my 30-minute meditation in 15, but let's assume that you're actually good at being, so you have time for meditation, and you go, oh, it's wonderful, wonderful, wonderful. And then it's time to finish. The question is, what happens now?

Is the being still with you or is it quickly disappearing and get taken over completely again by thinking and doing, thinking and doing? Okay, let's have to get on with life now. Leave me alone.

Can't you see I'm meditating on being? Go away. It's good if you can address it, maybe that when you're not disturbed, when you're out in nature, or when you're alone in your room, you're able to become aware of being, becoming aware of being aware, or here, become aware of being aware.

Stillness arises. Not a sleepy stillness, a live stillness arises. That's consciousness, that's presence, and that's beautiful.

And initially, you may need periods of time when you're not being disturbed, and you can be aware of, out in nature perhaps, sitting under a tree, contemplating the sky, become aware of being. But it's not enough because ultimately, being and doing need to become together so that when you do, you don't lose yourself in the doing, which means you become stressed, and you're so focused on where you want to get to that the journey is not at all enjoyable. Then you know that the doing arises out of the egoic consciousness.

If you cannot enjoy the journey, I'm stressed while you're doing because you need to arrive at this point, you achieve this or that, but every step is stressful on the way there. Every step, then you know this is egoically motivated and you've lost yourself in doing, complete unawareness of being. But if you can be engaged in action, any activity, and actually be so fully present in the doing that the doing itself is fulfilling, then you have a connectedness with being.

The moment stress arises means something else has come in, you've lost awareness of being, you get lost in doing. And then you make yourself unhappy and you make everybody around you unhappy. The entire whole business structures in this world, there are big companies exclusively focused on doing.

They can say from one day to another, okay, we'll have to let you go. Yes, you've worked for us for 30 years, but we are reorganizing, so goodbye, we'll have to let you go. And everybody's stressed and everybody's fighting everybody else.

Some companies are so dysfunctional, you're amazed that they're actually still operating at all. And all geared to just the outcome. We need to make the profit, we need to achieve this, we need to get there.

Nobody's enjoying themselves. Nobody's enjoying the doing. But then there may be some companies, businesses that are relatively enlightened or conscious, where the humans actually enjoy what they do.

They enjoy the present moment. The present moment is no longer just a means to an end, which is the egoic consciousness, which is the unconsciousness. In your unconscious state, the present moment is always regarded as inferior, unconsciously, except for brief moments when you are having a few drinks, or you have a good meal, or you're having sex.

Then for a little while, the present moment is good. And then, oh, what now? The present moment is reduced to a stepping stone to some mentally projected future moment that unconsciously is considered superior to this one.

I really need to go there. I don't really want to be here, but I'm just on my way there. Just need to get there, always.

So the moment it becomes a means to an end, always. They don't know it. It's an unconscious way of living.

When the present moment is no more than a means to an end, and sometimes it's even worse than that. Sometimes the present moment is actively regarded as an enemy. You don't want to be where you are.

You don't want to be doing what you're doing, but you're doing it anyway. You don't want to be with who you are. You don't want to be where you are, but you are there, but you don't want to be there.

You're doing it, but I don't want to be doing it. I'm just doing it, but I have to do it. So this means the present moment is regarded as an enemy, which is even more insane than regarding the present moment as a stepping stone to another mentally projected moment.

Of course, you need a goal in life. It's good to have the goal. I want to get there.

And for every goal that you have, you need time. For everything that you want to achieve, even making a cup of tea, you need a bit of time to make even a cup of tea, let alone learn a new skill, learn a craft, build something, build a house, build whatever you do, learn to dance, whatever it is. You need time to do it.

There's no doubt about that. But the question is, while you're engaged in the doing, are you able to be present in the doing so that you are not consumed by time, which ultimately doesn't exist. It's a mental thing.

You're not consumed by time. You can use time, but you are rooted in the timeless dimension of being. Then you become a very powerful creator.

The most powerful creators are able to be totally present in their doing, whatever that may be. And some of those creators, many probably, certainly, they're able to be present when they're engaged in their activity and they're very effective and very powerful because they completely enjoy the doing. It's fulfilling.

They're present. So they're connected to be... And because they're connected to being, there's an enormous influx of energy.

When you're connected to being, you're connected to the totality of consciousness. So helpful things can happen very easily. Obstacles that arise are not regarded as enemies.

Obstacles, you look at the obstacle and see, okay, what can we do here? Maybe we can use the obstacle and turn it around. Maybe we can walk around it.

But the obstacle does not create a sense of antagonism. So you're always aligned with the present moment. And those people who are very powerful creators, no matter in what field, but it often is the case that is only in the area of the activity that they can be that present and conscious.

And then they go home and go to their wife or husband, totally unconscious like everybody else. For us, it's not just being present in an activity that you do, but being present throughout your life, not just at work or whatever work you do, but make your whole life into a work of art because that's what it is. Your purpose is to bring the being and doing together in your life and embody that.

Stress arises, that's a good sign that you've lost the present moment. Anxiety arises, you've lost the present moment. So many of the things, unhappiness arises.

Okay, where's the present moment? If you begin to inhabit a world of problems, oh, the heaviness of my life, oh, my life, that's not your life. Your life situation may be challenging, that's good, but it's not your life.

Your life is now, now. Life situation exists in time. Life is now.

Where's your problem now? Well, tomorrow I have to, no, no. My problem, I don't see it.

It could be a, maybe there's a challenge right now, then you deal with it. If it's not a challenge right now, it's not a problem. When the time comes, you will face it.

You will face the situation. So you don't dwell anymore mentally on your problems. You set aside a time when you say, okay, let's see what can I do in this situation?

Focused application. Then you walk away after 15 minutes, walk away present, present. The whole purpose of your life is to become present in what you do.

That is, the human and the being come together. The being emerges more and more. And then you are no longer really operating as a person or personality, although the personality still exists here, but you become empowered by a deeper or higher intelligence.

There's a higher intelligence that then begins to operate through you. And not only operates through you, you will also find that once, when you're engaged in an activity, you're very present in what you do, helpful factors are more likely to suddenly appear than unhelpful factors. So often coincidences happen.

Just the right thing happens at the right moment. Or you just meet the right person who offers the solution to this particular situation that you're engaged in. So these things happen, but obstacles can also still happen.

Some spiritual people say, okay, I'm going to try this now. And the moment they face the first obstacle, they say, oh, maybe I'm not meant to do that. I'm not sure anymore there's an obstacle.

Whenever you create something new, you will experience when you are present, both many helpful factors coming in, but also occasionally obstacles arise on your path. And this is good. The obstacles arise, and it does not mean that you're on the wrong path necessarily, but at least you're learning something.

And at least you enjoyed the journey. You enjoyed the doing. Even if it didn't take you anywhere, let's say you want to become famous.

I want to become in Hollywood. I want to, if you go to Los Angeles, it's full of people who want to become famous. And so in the meantime, they have to, they work in restaurants.

There are lots of very good looking people in Los Angeles restaurants, and they're all waiting for the next acting job. Want to be famous. Okay, and some of them are unhappy doing what they're doing, and others are actually quite present in what they do.

Stay enjoying the doing. They enjoy meeting you. They enjoy talking to you.

And helpful things are more likely to happen if you're aligned with the present moment than if you're out of alignment with the present moment. And being aligned with the present moment is to enjoy the doing. So you could be a waiter.

Do you enjoy whoever you're serving? It can be a wonderful thing. Occasionally, I've met people working in restaurants who are very, very present, and they're extremely good at what they do.

They spread consciousness, and they get huge tips. And so suddenly, you may find life is taking you somewhere else, or you're very present with somebody, and he says, okay, give me a call if you want to become an actor. My name is Steven Spielberg, and I want you to have in my next movie.

Okay, but then you become famous, and then you're faced with the fact that this achievement does not satisfy you if you haven't learned to be present in the now. In fact, you may find that your fame, instead of making you happy, is making you unhappy. I've met people like that.

They thought when I become famous, they were happier when they were working in restaurants than when they were famous. No external situation is a solution. So if you cannot acknowledge the present moment, if you cannot become friendly with the present moment, if you cannot be present, then the Buddha's teaching applies.

No matter where you go, no matter what you do, who you are with, you will encounter dukkha, which is unhappiness, misery, unsatisfactoriness, or suffering. The solution is never on the external level. The solution to life lies in this moment.

Once you treat this moment in the right way, when you have a right relationship to this moment, and whatever, which means whatever arises in this moment, and the essence of this moment, which is the timeless consciousness, that is ultimately what the now is. This realization, in words, came to me after I had written The Power of Now, so it isn't in the book. What is the now?

Ultimately, you are the now, because the now is that which underlies everything. The now is the timeless one consciousness, and you are that, and you become aware of that, of yourself as that. Then you are rooted in the now.

Real change only happens here and now. The so-called future then unfolds, and you will find that even on the surface level of the human dimension, life unfolds with greater ease than before when you are present. It's not free of challenges.

There will still be challenges, and that is good, because humans would not deepen, and they would first not awaken, and they would not deepen without the challenges. Challenges come, but there's a huge difference from then on. The challenges of life are no longer converted into suffering or unhappiness.

They are faced, and you say, oh, there's another one. Okay, what can I do in the present? Focus attention, become still, focus attention.

When you become still, focus attention on the situation. You're aware of yourself as the awareness, and then enormous intelligence is activated in you. This could be called, there's a book by Krishnamurti with that title.

It could be called the awakening of intelligence, and it's not the intelligence that you can measure in IQ tests, because IQ test intelligence is analytical intelligence, which is the human mind being able to accumulate information and analyze data. To accumulate information and analyze data is a certain level of intelligence necessary in this world, but it's not creative intelligence. It's not creative intelligence.

Creative intelligence comes from a deeper place, and creative intelligence comes from a place that is not conceptual. It does not come through thinking. It can inspire thinking, but it arises from a dimension that is transcendent to thinking.

All the great creators, the great composers and artists, many of them have literally said, some of the great musical pieces, it came from a realm, a very deep realm, almost ready-made, and they just wrote it down. Connected with being, with a deeper intelligence of the being, which transcends what your personal mind is able to do, although the mind can become an instrument for that. This is an amazing thing when you connect with a deeper intelligence, but it's not just intelligence.

It's also something that changes the way in which you interact with other humans, because that is vitally important when you are present and no longer trapped in the conceptual mind and no longer derive your identity from the conceptual mind, so you no longer inhabit a conceptual reality, you're present, and you meet another human being, and you talk to them, you look them in the eyes. Whatever it is you talk about is secondary. You're meeting them, you talk to them, and there's a human, you see the human, there's a body, and there's a personality speaking and acting through the body, that's fine, but within yourself, you feel the alert stillness, you feel the aware presence in the background of your being, and as you look at them and listen, they might say something, you can sense beyond the personality in the other human being, you can sense that they, too, are, in essence, consciousness. You can sense their consciousness that is deeper than the conditioned entity, which is the surface of consciousness, like a little ripple on the surface of the ocean, is the person. The ripple on the surface of the ocean is the person, but the deeper being is the ocean, so then, to use this analogy, you can sense the ocean in the other person, the being, beyond their personality, because it's one with yours, and that's a wonderful realization, because then the other is no longer totally other.

You begin to sense a oneness with the other, and that oneness is empathy, that oneness is compassion, and that oneness is ultimately, in spiritual terms, love, because love is the realization of that oneness. Unless you realize that oneness directly, you cannot really love your neighbor as yourself, no matter how hard you try. First, you have to realize who or what you are in the essence of your being, and then you can realize who or what the other is in the essence of their being, and then, once you realize the other in the essence of their being, the sense of separation disappears, and you feel a connectedness, and more than a connectedness, you feel a sense of oneness, which is, when you're totally interpreting everything conceptually, there is never a sense of oneness, and that realization of oneness is love, not egoic love, but transcendent love. The Dalai Lama calls it kindness, but what he really is talking about is love.

The Dalai Lama said, he didn't say, my religion is Buddhism. He actually said, my religion is kindness, and kindness is, of course, is the love. Kindness is what emerges when you access, when you realize that which transcends you as a person, and realize that that transcendent dimension far transcends who you are, but at the same time is the essence of who you are, and when you find that, I mean, discover it, it's not so much find it because it's already there, realize it, that is virtually, it is like the universe, which is evolving in this dimension.

We live in an evolving universe. It's becoming more conscious gradually, but the consciousness emanates from a transcendent dimension, like light emanates from the sun. Transcendent dimension means the source of all life, which is traditionally called God, but misunderstood.

The source of all life does not exist in space or time. You can't say, oh, God must be somewhere there. It's totally transcendent.

From the transcendent dimension, something emanates into this dimension, just like light emanates from the sun, and that which emanates into this dimension is the light of consciousness, and the light of consciousness is the essence of who you are, and the light of consciousness is also the essence of the entire universe, so when you realize that, it's amazing, and you realize your connectedness with source, the source of life, and that's enormously freeing, just, ah, and the little person then continues to operate for a few more years, and it's fine, it's not a problem anymore, then you truly know who you are, or you know what you are, that is knowing yourself, the ancient dictum, know thyself, and that knowing is not a conceptual knowing because this deeper intelligence is not a conceptual intelligence. It transcends that, so it's the very heart of the universe, it's very core, and it's your destiny to realize that, no matter what you do in your personal life, it's all secondary.

Your destiny is to discover who you are and to realize it and to live it. Your destiny is to become fully a human being, the human you have already, and now the being is shining through the human form more and more, and that is your destiny, and that is the secret of life. Thank you.

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle The Fullness of Life [3c3f68cc-e5f5-44cf-a7bd-498fb3f94e8c]

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:39)

The fullness of life. In this episode, Eckhart answers questions about conscious manifesting. He says, it's part of our heritage.

We have abundance in our lives. Eckhart describes what he calls the fullness of life. He believes the source for fullness is the vast underlying consciousness that is the foundation for everything, which he calls the being dimension.

Eckhart says, when we are being consciously, we are connected to a source greater than ourselves. He explains, when we are freed from the neediness of the ego, we are seeking the light of consciousness, and that's when we let go of the struggle.

[Speaker 1] (0:41 - 21:08)

Thank you, everybody. Nice to be with you. Be is the key word.

Of course, you cannot not be, but usually you're not aware of being. Usually you're not aware that you are because you're concerned with other things. But the foundation for everything, including, of course, being engaged in creating, manifesting, doing, and so on, the foundation for all that is to be rooted in the being dimension.

That's not to be forgotten. It's primary. Being is primary.

So to consciously be frees you from the neediness of the ego. It also frees you from fear, the fear that you may not arrive, or the fear that something you have achieved or that you have will be taken away from you because you identified with it. The fear of not making it.

Am I going to make it? Make what? I don't know.

It's an English expression, making it. Now, as you may remember, I assume I mentioned when we started the Conscious Manifestation course, I mentioned that a few words by Jesus encapsulate the secret of successful manifestation. And he said, when you pray for anything, believe that you have received it and it will be given to you.

That's it. So that already contains the secret of manifestation. The key being belief that you have received it, not that you will receive it.

So on the inner plane, it's already a reality. And you feel what otherwise you would look to that thing that you want to achieve, whatever it may be, you look to that as the, that which will give you an enhanced sense of identity, an enhanced sense of being. And of course, nothing that you achieve in this world or attain can for very long satisfy you on that level.

So the mistake you make is you look to the world, the world, the world of things, the world of attainment of doing. You look to the world seeking for something that only the dimension of being can give you. That's why being is primary.

And of course, being is inseparable from who you are. So when we talk about it, it sounds as if there's being and you, or the essence of who you are, your essential identity is to be the being, the consciousness. So Jesus said, yes, he said, when you pray for anything, believe that you have received it, and then it will be given to you.

Okay, that's vitally important. It contains the secret of manifestation, but it's not, that is another statement he made that is actually primary to that, more important even than that. And that is, seek only the kingdom of heaven and all the other things that you need will be added onto you, added onto you.

So that's the absolutely primary statement. And what is the kingdom of heaven is exactly what I've just been pointing to, the realization of the essence of who you are, which is the unconditioned light of consciousness. The spaciousness, I sometimes call it space consciousness, and the other is the object consciousness.

Two dimensions operate, need to operate in your life. Space consciousness happens when the mind becomes still, but you don't lose consciousness. In fact, you're more conscious than before, but you're not conscious of anything.

You're only conscious of the fact that you are conscious. You're conscious of being conscious, not any object. The light of consciousness shines back upon itself.

At this moment, are you able to be conscious that you are conscious, to sense the fact that you are conscious, to sense the presence that you are, that is prior to the person that you are. More fundamental than the person is the consciousness, the light of consciousness, without which there would be no person, there would be no thought, there would be no emotion, there would be no sense perception. All these things are possible for a person to exist, and a person consists of sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions.

Every human being, every person, the human part of the being consists of a mixture of sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions. Sense perceptions, where you are right now, thoughts, accumulated memories, conditioning of your mind, and so on, and certain feelings associated usually with the thoughts or with what's happening around you, emotions. So how these things are mixed up varies from person to person, but everybody, every human, consists of a mixture of sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions that make up you, make you as a person.

You can change things there, of course, but more fundamental than that is the being prior to the human, because you're a human being, you're not just human, you're a human being. So the human level is the level of doing, experiencing, attaining, achieving, becoming, better at this, becoming good at that, becoming stronger, but also becoming also is not just a positive thing. For a while becoming, you become better at this, more capable, stronger, more knowledgeable until there's a decline in the becoming, and then you become older, then you become less capable, you can no longer run as fast as you could before, then you become less physically strong.

So there's the becoming goes in one direction of unfolding like a flower, beautiful, and then the becoming turns into the wilting of a flower, and suddenly it dissolves. But there was an animating presence that manifested as the flower briefly, that manifested presence is not subject to time or decay, it is timeless because it emanates from the timeless source of all life. That presence that inhabits what we see as the flower briefly, then reappears in another form, another flower appears, another human being.

So on the level of becoming, you have the growth, and then you have the opposite of growth. Usually growth is associated with something positive, and the opposite is seen as very extremely undesirable and a kind of disaster, because you're moving towards losing everything, including the body. And of course, anybody who is not connected to that which is beyond the level of manifestation of forms will regard the inevitable decline, the so-called negative side of becoming when you become old and weak, would regard that as a travesty, the most terrible, terrible disaster, death.

Let's not talk about it, they say, let's not, we must, it's too horrible to talk about, says our contemporary world, says don't mention death, it's a kind of taboo, because they don't know what to do with it. It's so horrible. It is so horrible because you're not, you haven't found the being within yourself.

You have not become conscious of it. It is not awakened in you, so to speak. It's always there, but you always overlooked it.

So to not overlook it, even in this very moment, in this very moment, if I stop speaking for a few seconds, and you're not thinking about anything, as I stop speaking for a few seconds, you're simply alert and present. Well, that wasn't so difficult. One more time, I stopped speaking for a moment, and you don't need to figure out what I've just said, you can't think about it, it's not necessary, it's too simple to even think about it.

So there's nothing to think about, and you don't need to think about what I'm going to say next, what for? You don't know, I don't know what I'm going to say next. So there's a cessation of movement of the mind.

And the strange thing is you're fully conscious without remembering who you are as a person, without thinking, you don't remember who you are, but you know very deeply, directly that you are, you know it more strongly than when you're thinking about your past and your problems. One more time, so you are more vitally yourself when you are not engaged in thinking about yourself, which is the human level, which is the person. So to be able to step out of being a person and step into the being of you is the point of power because you are then connected to the very power of the universe.

It's not just in you, you're connected to something vast and immeasurable. You are an emanation of that. And that's why that is a foundation for everything you may want to do on this plane here is very little compared to the depth of who you are, the essence of who you are.

Isn't that amazing? Right now, again, you can even look around, you're fully conscious, but you can feel yourself as even as you look around, you can feel the presence without which you wouldn't be any looking. The light of consciousness that makes the looking possible.

So what emerges is a very powerful, very alive stillness, I would say, because stillness means the absence of inner planes, the absence of thinking. And you are yourself, but not the memorable self, not the person, something much deeper. That self is one with the self of the universe, what in India is called the Brahman.

You are this, what you sense is the Atman, which is the inner aspect of the divine. Brahman is the transcendent, but they are one. So you can sense in mystical Christianity, it is the Christ in you.

In Buddhism, it is your Buddha nature. It doesn't matter what term you give it. It is beyond terms, beyond concepts.

That's the foundation. That is why Jesus said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of heaven." Or everything else is an adding onto. So all manifestation is an adding onto.

And it's actually quite, can be quite enjoyable to be in this world where things come to you or you create things or you manifest things in your life is quite enjoyable. But only if you do not depend on them for your deep fulfillment and lasting happiness and knowing who you are. If you depend on that, then no matter what you achieve, you are still frustrated and ultimately not happy for very long.

So there's nothing wrong with doing things in this world. You are here for a reason. One reason is to engage in this world, to participate in the creativity of the universe, because you are an essential part of the universe.

The universe delights in creating continuously. It creates life forms continuously. They have become increasingly complex and gradually more conscious.

Can see the history of this planet, how gradually more and more complex life forms developed. The universe delights in creating. So you also can delight in creating and manifesting, but only if you are rooted in the being dimension.

If you lose that connectedness, you can never really lose it, but if you don't realize it, it's almost as if you had lost it. So if you lose it, so to speak, then you are lost in the world of doing and becoming. Scary place, because nothing lasts for that long and you can achieve all kinds of things, even without having that connectedness.

Certain things can be achieved, yes, but they won't make you happy. In fact, many things you achieve will probably make you unhappy. So what you don't want is a terrible fate is to lose yourself in this world and to lose yourself in this world, you must first lose yourself in your mind.

When thinking takes over completely, conditioned thinking, conditioned by your past and the thinking that then you take, you absorb thoughts from all kinds of places, the media, social media, tweets, postings, whatever, and your mind continuously absorbs thoughts and it takes some thoughts, get in there and refuse to go away. And some get stuck there like a virus and proliferate and take over other thoughts in your mind. And you're lost.

You're lost in the world, you're lost in your mind because ultimately the world and your mind are inseparable. And that's a terrible fate to be lost. Even if you have achieved fame and fortune in this world, you're lost there.

And then you need something to alleviate the suffering that you feel, so you can take drugs or whatever they do, try another relationship, another marriage, third marriage, fourth marriage, fifth marriage. Some wealthy, famous people have done that. Then you get on your private jet, you're unhappy here, maybe you'll be happy on another continent, let's fly there.

Let's have a dinner in Paris. Oh, great, yeah. And then you have the dinner in Paris and then what now?

And you wake up the next morning feeling miserable again. And you need some other fix. Always looking, where is it?

Where am I? Who am I? And so now the foundation is the kingdom of heaven, which is the unconditioned consciousness, which is within you.

And then the rest, you can deal with the rest. So never losing sight of this, never as we continue to talk about manifestation, realizing the primary importance of being, of presence, of I am. I am is the first person singular of the word to be.

Strangely enough, you don't say I be, you say I am. Why don't you say I be? Would make more sense.

I don't know, it just happened. English language developed in that way. But the I am is to realize the being because you don't add anything to the fundamental realization that you are.

If you add something, then again, that's a lot of, that's the human level. I am old, middle-aged, young, good looking, not great looking, too thin, too fat, knowledgeable, educated, highly successful, wealthy, poor, Republican, Democrat. Let's see some questions.

[Speaker 3] (21:10 - 22:00)

Hello? Hi, Eckhart. I think my question was about language, about sometimes we talk about how we're going to suffer and suffering will come.

And I resist this a bit and I'm not sure why I'm resisting it. Some of it is that I know how important language is. And when we hear these things over and over, then I sort of expect them, like, okay, then I'm gonna suffer.

But also, of course, I don't want to deny reality of like you were saying the flower blossoms and then it goes back. So I think my question is just how do you deal with this? And do you still think of suffering as suffering when it comes or is it just a challenge?

And sort of how do you negotiate that in terms of language? That's my question.

[Speaker 1] (22:00 - 39:10)

Thank you. Good question. I would certainly not recommend that you expect to suffer.

I don't believe I ever said it. I hope not. I wouldn't recommend that you expect to suffer or that you think, oh, it's going to come soon.

It's going to come soon. What I may have been talking about is not necessarily that you are going to suffer because that depends on your level of consciousness. Whether a challenge that you meet, you transform it into suffering depends on your level of consciousness.

I'll come back to that in a minute. It's almost a paradox. It is advisable to focus on the good in this world.

The good, and then that part of that, for example, is to live in as much as possible in a state of appreciation of the good things in this world. Every moment, sometimes called gratitude. And that could be just gratitude for the beauty of the sky, gratitude for the breeze that you feel on your skin, gratitude for a flower that you look at, gratitude for every manifestation of life, to see the goodness in other humans, even though on the surface, they may be difficult in some ways.

Most humans are difficult. That's just so. But there's always something beyond.

So it's always to focus on the good, to see the good, the very fact that you're breathing, and not so much to seek the good in a narrative that you have in your mind. And for example, to say, well, my life is actually not that bad. I should be happy because there are millions of people who have less than I have, and they are more miserable.

No, that's not how you seek the good. To create a narrative about your life to make you feel better, and compare this narrative that you call my life to millions of others whose lives are less happy than yours is not the best way of discovering the goodness, because then your fragile happiness then depends on others being more miserable than you. So the goodness is found in the immediacy of your experience of the present moment, that you acknowledge all the goodness that's around you at any time.

Just gratitude for the aliveness of the world. So that's to look for, that's all great. Positive thinking is a good thing.

Ultimately, the best is to transcend thinking, but in the meantime, positive thinking is more powerful and fulfilling than negative thinking. However, no matter how much gratitude you have for the good things, how much you create and manifest, and that's all beautiful, all I'm saying is you need to know that we live in the world of polarities, and it is inevitable that at some point in your life or various points in your life, you will experience some kind of disruption or loss or limitation, for suddenly something will happen to disrupt what your life was going well, and suddenly something comes in to disrupt this lovely flow of your life, either on a small scale.

On a small scale, a disruption would be you get held up on your way to the airport, you lose your flight, can't get another flight, small disruption. Life is full of little things that go wrong, so to speak, and then other things that go right, and then inevitably big disruptions will sometimes come into your life, great loss, loss of possessions, loss of your social function in this world, your job, loss of a loved one, loss of an animal that you lived with, or loss will come in also, and it is inevitable. Now, you can know that without expecting it to happen, you know it's bound to happen at some point, nevertheless, you focus on the good, but when it happens, it's your recognition that this is part of the polarities of life is very important, because otherwise your reaction to the disruption or the loss or the sudden limitation that has come into your life, your reaction is what creates the suffering, and your reaction is based on the unconscious assumption that there's something drastically wrong, that these things should never have happened, that you have done something wrong or the world has done something wrong to you, so the assumption that there's something fundamentally wrong when you experience loss, disruption, or whatever it may be, like I often hear stories of people who are, let's say they're Christians and they go to church on Sundays and they are believers, and then something suddenly happens in their life, a loved one suddenly dies, or they're in a serious accident, and often some of these people, some are fine, they may have gone deeper, but some suddenly doubt, their whole face is suddenly in doubt, they thought they had some kind of contract with God, if I go to church and I observe all these, the prayers and rituals, then that's our contract is that you God, it's your responsibility God to protect me and to make my life safe, the key word these days, people are very much concerned with safe, even before the virus, there was a very much a growing concern with safe, behind that of course is hiding fear and anxiety, because if you put a lot of emphasis on feeling safe, hiding behind that need to be safe is fear obviously, and why is there fear? Because you're not connected with the depths of who you are, so you don't expect to suffer, you don't expect that something should go wrong, it comes at some point, you know at some point it'll come, it's inevitable, and not only one thing, probably a few, but then once it arises, a limitation suddenly arises, disruption arises as with the virus, millions of people suddenly experience a disruption of their normal everyday life, just as often these things happen to one person, but sometimes they happen to millions of people at the same time, very interesting, and some people went into deep suffering, of course also depended on whether they experienced a loss of livelihood and income as many people did, others didn't, but that's another story, when it comes to recognize it as the inevitable polarities of life, and you no longer believe this should not be happening, it should not have happened, so there's this resentment that people otherwise have when things go wrong, so to speak in their lives, they have this resentment, they have this anger, or they have a feeling of guilt, resentment towards life, anger, why should this happen to me, me of all people, or guilt, I've done something wrong, I'm spiritual, and now this has happened to me, I've done something very wrong, so these are normal reactions, because you don't know that every human has to experience these from time to time, and not only that, for many humans, all humans I would say, if they did not experience disruption, loss or limitation in their lives, there would be no evolution of their consciousness, they would remain static, not only would they remain static, they would actually regress, if you could imagine a person going through life, never experiencing any particular limitation, disruption or loss, everything is given to him or her, it's all fine, it's protected, it's really safe, and no real challenge, how this person is going to not only remain static, this person will gradually go to sleep, level of consciousness will go lower and lower, until he just, if he lives, he might live in a beautiful place, on beautiful island with palm trees, everything is there, and goes to the beach every day, and then after a few years, it's all there is, is the beach every day, drinking, eating, sex, sensory pleasures, everything beautiful, are always healthy, no evolutionary growth, because evolutionary growth happens as a response to a challenge, and a challenge usually means something must go wrong, to use conventional terms, so it's not only, it's something that is inevitable, it is something that is absolutely necessary for human evolution, this what I now call here disruption, loss, limitation, is not only inevitable from time to time, the other is also there, the other polarity, yes, it is inevitable, and it is absolutely necessary for evolution, and once you recognize that, there's no longer anger, resentment or guilt, when these things do appear in your life, you can immediately come to an acceptance of this, and recognize it for what it is, and you say, ah, there it is, and it may be an opportunity for becoming more conscious, because you have to, because if you don't become more conscious in a challenge, more present, you suffer, you become very unhappy, when you experience disruption, loss or limitation, the normal reaction is you suffer, you become very unhappy, that's what I said is resentment, anger, guilt, they're all forms of unhappiness, when, and so then these things, this is what suffering is, this is when these things make you suffer, when you have an antagonistic relationship, with, when it comes to you, loss, limitation or disruption, you have an antagonist, you're fighting it, you're, and you beat yourself up, or you complain, can't stop complaining in your mind, all that is suffering, it's called suffering, suffering is a psychological thing that happens, when certain things take place in your life, and sometimes not only, not just things that happen externally, many people suffer, because they have scenarios only in their mind, in their mind, at four o'clock in the morning, in bed, they wake up, and in their mind, they experience a scenario of loss, they experience limit, sudden limitation, they experience a disruption of their life, that could happen, or probably will happen next year, or the next week, this will happen, so the suffering is not only when things, you experience things externally, some suffering arises, when you experience things in your mind, very often things that are not actually happening now, but your mind is creating a scenario, and that makes you suffer, and ultimately it's all, your mind is the key, even as far as external things are concerned, because in any situation, when you feel unhappy about something, or you feel angry, or you feel irritated, or whatever it may be, in any situation, I often recommend that as a spiritual practice, start with little things, not so much with big things, little loss, little disruption, and little limitation, and you feel irritated, angry, resentful, you have self-talk, how awful this is, how these people are awful, they aren't, little spiritual practice is, ask yourself, how would I experience this moment, or this situation, how would I experience this, if I did not add any thought to it, if I did not add any mental interpretation, good or bad, how would I experience this, without the adding of thoughts to it, and this is a wonderful spiritual practice, it's good to do it with little things first, so suddenly, let's say you lose something, or something goes wrong, you had made plans, but then everything gets disrupted, because there's another lockdown, whatever, how would, and you get frustrated and angry, and how would I experience this situation, if I didn't add any thought to it, if I just let it be as it is, let's assume there's nothing you can do right now, if you could take action to remedy something, that's fine, but in many situations, there's nothing you can do right now, now I'm just not adding any thought, just as an experiment, how would I experience this moment, without the addition of thought, and then you'd suddenly, for a moment thought becomes removed, and there's the bare situation there, well, it's just, that's what is right now, that's the isness of this moment, and then you see that, suffering arises, when you cannot accept the isness of this moment, whatever it is here, and that's an enormous insight, the acceptance of the isness of this, is the end of suffering, and the acceptance of the isness, brings about the arising of presence, intense presence, shh, and this is how a challenge, can make you more conscious, if approached rightly, if approached rightly, a challenge will awaken you, and another challenge will awaken you even more, and that's the, so challenges continue to come, but now, when you realize this secret, you don't suffer anymore, that's the end of suffering, as the Buddha called it, and that's the beauty of it, so it makes sense to you?

[Speaker 3] (39:12 - 39:28)

Yeah, this, thank you, that was, I had an aha moment, I think the resistance is that, yeah, I'm not in the being, so when you're in the being, it doesn't matter what you call any of it, yeah, I mean, so yes, thank you, I mean, thank you for many things, but thank you for that too.

[Speaker 2] (39:29 - 40:51)

Thank you, thank you. It's an honor to talk to you, since the moment of my surrender, I was able to feel a peace and unhappiness that I never have in my life, I feel the joy of being, but not in an enthusiastic way, no, in an exuberant way, very peaceful, very soft, so at the moment, I'm doing the manifestation, I'm trying to manifest something that I want in my life, but my question is, is it possible, when I'm doing the manifestation, I feel that it's coming, but anyway, my question is, all that I feel is so soft and subtle, is it possible that I am, actually doing it, that is coming, and then I want to ask you, if it is coming, it's a bit difficult, not to be waiting for it to manifest, so I would like, if you can expand a little bit about that, how to manage, not to be thinking all the time, when this happen, I'm going to do this, and I'm going to do that.

[Speaker 1] (40:52 - 53:23)

Yes, yes. It's good to not involve too much future thinking, when you are in the process of manifesting, if possible, remove future, or as much as possible, remove future, in other words, you are not looking forward to something, because, the thing that you want to manifest, is already here, now that requires, as Jesus said, believe that you have received it, that means, that is already reality now, so the power of manifestation arises from the now, the point of power, is the now, it arises from that point of power, now, the question of course is, how can you believe, that you have received it, when obviously, you haven't, and that is connected with the, realization of being, because, when you become still, and present, for example, now, still, present, you can sense, that you are, the beings of you, the consciousness, you can sense that, and as you go into it more deeply, it is timeless, but it emerges in the dimension of time, so it's a little bit paradoxical, the presence grows in you, the realization of presence, it deepens, it grows on this level, in itself, it's timeless, but it gradually, manifests more fully in this dimension, comes more fully into this dimension, through you, that's where you find, what again, coming back to Jesus, he said so many good things, the fullness of life, you use those terms, he said, I want you, to have the fullness of life, in some translations of the Bible, it's translated as, I want you to have abundant life, I would say fullness is probably, would be a better translation, I want you to, he said, I want you to have the fullness of life, so that he was there, to point people to the realization, of the fullness of life, which is, the realization of being, anything that you may want to achieve, on this, outer level here, manifestation in this dimension, the enjoyment, that it would give you, the sense of satisfaction, that it would give you, when you achieve it, it can only really arise from the, the fullness of life, that is already within you now, and it is probably, true to say that, when you achieve something, like, let's just say, a nicer home, or a nice house to live in, or whatever it may be, and you, and suddenly it comes, suddenly there it is, and at first you feel, ah, you can actually feel, the fullness of life in that moment, and you think it's because of that house, but really you feel, the fullness of life in that moment, because, a, mind form, that was the desire that told you, that I need that thing, to be happy, the desire, for it, which prevented you from being, from feeling the fullness of life, suddenly the desire is fulfilled, suddenly there is an absence of that big desire, that you have the reaching out, the longing, I must have that, I want that, that suddenly, because suddenly you have it, suddenly it's there, and you feel at first, ah, some people get, oh, such joy, yeah, there's that house, is that, does that house cause, that it seems to be the case, that the house is the cause of your joy, but I would suggest to you, that the true cause of that joy, is the collapse of the, wanting and needing, that collapsed, and suddenly you don't want and need it anymore, because it's there, and as the wanting and needing collapses, you can sense, what was always already there, the fullness of life, that is within you now, your mind deceived you, it said, you will get it through this, that or the other, and this is why sometimes, just when people first obtain something, they feel so happy, oh, such joy, oh, no, not because of that thing, because of the collapse of the wanting, and needing, and grasping, so you need to go there directly, instead of continuously experiencing, because that house is not the end of it, because the structure in your mind, your egoic mind, that says, now what's the next thing that I need, will come back in very quickly, even after you get that big, nice house, the mind structure, that prevents you from enjoying this for very long, that state of no desire, the egoic mind, lives through desires, through wanting, through needing, wanting, needing more, because you haven't found yourself, you are somehow, ultimately you're looking for yourself, which is the fullness of life, is the fullness of realizing who you are, beyond the person, and then the whole story, the whole thing starts again, the game starts again, first it was a house, and then it's something else, that suddenly comes in, now you need a spouse to go with it, needs to be just right for that house, whatever the ego tells you, and the soap opera continues, indefinitely, with brief interludes, of joy and happiness, when you obtain something, and then, oh, that wasn't it, so to not to look to the future, but to be rooted in the present, nothing that you achieve, can actually provide you, with that deep sense of, with that fullness of life, that you can already feel, when you become still and present enough, and you become conscious of yourself as consciousness, that's the fullness of life, this thing can, if you bring an image, of something that you want to achieve, so to speak a mental image, let's say it's a house, you bring the mental image, into that sense of full, the fullness of life, now the kind of the two come together, then you can continue to feel, the fullness of life, and then you feel the house, is actually already had there, because the house is the fullness of life in my mind, that's a very powerful manifestation, this is what Jesus meant, believe that you have, you already have it, that you have received it already, but you can only do that, when you know the kingdom of heaven within you, from there you can, that's where the belief of faith arises, belief is, you don't, that you don't need the house for your fulfillment, it's an adding on, that's the most powerful place for manifestation, is to realize whatever you manifest is a, the game of creation, the game of form, the universe delights in creating, and so do you, and so you delight in that, but you don't need it, for your fulfillment, you don't need it, for your happiness, your sense of being fully yourself, people want a completion, many people are looking for an identity, a stronger sense of identity through achieving this, they think when I get recognition, other people recognize my worth or worthiness, then I will feel fulfilled, many people, and some people believe youngsters, especially growing up with social media and so on, they find their fulfillment in how many likes they get on their posts, people would, and then you project an artificial image, searching for more likes, and you get totally alienated from yourself, because you're projecting some kind of image onto the screen, and you send it out into the world, and you think that's you, and then you get thousands of likes, and then the ego feels better, but underneath it, you feel worse, because more and more, you project yourself into this, it's all, it's nothing to do with who you are, in many cases, even the photos that you post, are so heavily photoshopped, and so much filter use, you become almost unrecognizable, the people who sent you all their likes, they wouldn't even recognize you in the street, this is just a little aside, how crazy this world is, so the fullness of life, does not come in time, in the future, and the fullness of life, is what for to be a powerful manifestor, is only be when you manifest, from the feeling of fullness, you bring a mental image into it, and then it's quite likely that it will manifest, so you, because the fullness of life, is associated then with that mental image, and when it happens, and you get it, you say, oh, very nice, but you no longer go, yeah, I've got it, so it's, you say, it's nice, it's great, yeah, but basically, it hasn't made you happy, because you've already had something, that was actually deeper than happiness, I am already happy, right, exactly, yes, so that's the secret, remove future of looking to when to change something, also, when, if you use affirmations, or visualizations, as many people do, you use it for a certain period of time every day, maybe twice a day, for 10 minutes, and then let it go, let, but you're not using, let it go, and after you use it for a week or so, let it go for a little while, let it go for a few days, so that you get rid of the notion, that you are doing it, you're not doing it, the universe can make it happen, but you are not doing it, as such, so you, it's the sense of surrender, and it's easier to do, when you're no longer dominated by the egoic mind, that says, I need this, I need it to be happy, I need it to be fulfilled, so it's, I wish you well, thank you, thank you,

Eckhart Tolle The Future is Just a Thought [49829d1d-420a-43f2-a299-51b3f16ec8f3]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:32)

The future is just a thought. In this episode, Eckhart talks with a live audience about our obsession with the future. He says, if we're always living for the future, we never get to experience the present because the future is only a thought.

We spend our time waiting for a life that never arrives, full of missed opportunities now. Eckhart reminds us the only moment we ever truly have is the here and now.

Just checking if everybody's present. Especially important as you begin to move around again, leaving here, many of you. One little thing, if you remember to live this little thing, that would already significantly change your state of consciousness.

And that little thing to remember, not as a memory, as a concept that you remember, but to remember to apply every moment is, or concerns the value that you attribute to the present moment, whatever may be happening in the present moment. And the usual mistake or dysfunctional way of living, unconscious way, is, as I've mentioned before, is devaluing the present moment and overvaluing the next moment. That's so unconscious that most people have no idea that that's how they live because everybody lives like that and everybody has been conditioned to live like that.

But that is a significant factor in unskillful living, unconscious living, and it strengthens the ego enormously. Ego lives always with reference to past and future. For example, I come here, I emerge from behind the curtain, and then I walk to the chair.

Walking to the chair has as much value as arriving at the chair. So by giving your complete attention to every step, you actually honor this moment fully instead of unconsciously devaluing it because you believe you need to arrive somewhere else, which promises some measure of fulfillment, no matter how small, or sometimes some big fulfillment, but no matter how small. So if I walked in here in that dysfunctional and unconscious way, the steps that I'm taking towards this chair would be devalued in my mind as being less significant than arriving at this chair or starting to speak.

And the arriving is always very short. You arrive and then it's over. So now if you begin to travel again from here to home or from here to somewhere else, if you can remember that the present moment is all you ever have and carrying your suitcase from here, or people don't carry, they've got wheels these days.

So wheeling your suitcase from here to there or wherever it is, to the bus, to the car, to the airport, to the train station, all those moments are not inferior to any next moment, because then what? And then you arrive at the train and then you look for something else to, now I need to get, need to get. Mentally, you're always somewhere else instead of giving fullest attention to this because this is the most valuable moment.

Why? Because it's the only one, the present moment. So to live as if the next moment were more significant, more important, is a very unconscious way to live.

And the strange thing is you never really ultimately arrive anywhere because the arriving is never enough. The arriving is immediately replaced by some new mental projection, some next moment. Even on a big scale, often people experience that, some huge success that they've been striving for, for years, and finally it comes and then they sit there in their big house.

Often that goes with success, but, or whatever, their private jet and it feels good for a while, especially if you invite other people who don't have private jets. Then it feels even better because it enhances your fictitious sense of self. But after a while, even that wears off.

So you have arrived, you've made it, that's the English expression. I made it. Made what?

In case you don't know that English expression, it means I have succeeded in my endeavors. I made it. Idiomatic expression, strange one.

So the world is full of people who want to make it and when they make it, there's a brief moment of satisfaction, that's the arriving. Then they go, okay, now what? The same dissatisfaction arises again and then you have to, the making it is not enough, you have to make more.

So small scale and large scale, just this little thing, give your fullest attention to this moment because it's not true that the next moment is more significant because it never comes. So it's a way of living absorbed in thought. If you always live for the future, you're absorbed in thought because future is a thought.

It's never experienced as an actuality. So essential part of being lost in your mind is to be lost in the future because to be lost in the future, always looking to the next thing is to be lost in your mind because that's where the future is, not here and now. This does not mean you will no longer make any plans.

It doesn't mean that. On a practical level, you can plan and say, okay, at such and such a time, I need to be there. Whatever you use for your planning, probably a device.

And then if you're old generation like me, you go like, I need to be there and you tap in where you need to be in your diary. Or if you are with younger generation, your fingers move in a different way. They go like that.

All the old ones, they go. And still get it wrong. Every third one is wrong.

So there is a way of being totally present in the planning for the next, for the future. So this is actually, you're very focused in planning your next destination. What time do I arrive there?

What do I need to do? When do I need to be ready? And you can write it down and you're fully present in that.

And once you've done that, your attention is again here and now. It was even here and now when you were planning it because you were not mentally devaluing this moment of planning. And the strange thing is you begin to enjoy now all the small things in life that before you had overlooked or neglected because the mind projects the bigger thing.

And even on a small scale, it's the bigger thing. Like I need to pack my suitcase and I need to get the bus. That is on a very small scale, the next big thing that I need to get to.

So in the meantime, you devalue the moment between now and getting the bus or the train. And then once you're on the bus, you think, okay, now I need to get off the bus and then where do I need to go? I need to go now.

And then you arrive there. But of course, that's only a temporary relief because now you need to go somewhere else. And when you're sitting on the plane or wherever or in the car, you mentally project yourself to tomorrow morning.

There's always a more important moment and it's in the future. Now what you neglect then and what you continuously overlook is all the small things that actually make up a vast percentage of your life. It's all the little things that before are relegated to the periphery of your life.

What are those little things? Well, for example, things that you handle in your life, things that you pick up and put there and objects around you, the world around you, walking, breathing, looking at the sky, looking at a tree, seeing, breathing in the air, looking at another human being, sensing their deeper aliveness, all the little things that constitute life. Even if you are a so-called VIP in the eyes of the world, which is pretty meaningless, it's just a narrative.

And you go from one significant thing to another, but all the steps that you take, even if you get picked up in a limo, as I sometimes do when I go for a talk, the organizers send a limo. Well, a big car with plenty of room in the back, that's a limo, and you can stretch your legs. So then it's just very little things.

You walk to the car, and you breathe, and then you get in and you sit. Okay, well, it's just, you're sitting somewhere and breathing and looking, you're looking out of the window, and then you arrive at a venue and you take a few steps into the car and you sit again. And then you walk onto the stage.

It's all little things. And even if you're the pope or the president of a huge corporation or the president of a country, it's still the same. Life consists of small things.

All the things that, look at just your relationship with objects. This is usually overlooked because every object is treated as a means to an end. But if you live in a way that is more present, then the objects may still be a means to an end, but they are also giving just short attention, just picking up a glass.

There is pleasure in enjoyment in even just looking at a glass and the water and drinking. And to realize that, most people realize that for the first time, if ever, when they take certain types of drug, like acid, because it amplifies your sense perceptions and it shuts off your thinking mind. And then for the first time, you pick up a glass of water and you go, oh, wow.

So amazing. So amazing. I can't believe it.

And it is. And then you drink and the taste is so incredible. It's water.

It's amazing. It's liquid, alive. It's alive.

It's liquid. No, I haven't taken acid before coming here. It's just giving it your fullest attention without interference of thinking, just awareness.

And the background then to that state of inner peace or contentment is all the aliveness of everything around you. When you pick up something, put it in your suitcase, pick up something else, unfold it. That's a nice thing to do.

Taking a fruit, maybe peeling it or biting into it. The present moment in its richness that is usually overlooked because you're looking for something more significant. But even the most significant thing, let's say you got the Nobel Prize, can come to Oslo.

I think there's one Nobel Prize that people come to Norway for, that's peace. And then you stand on the balcony of that hotel that overlooks the square where the parliament is, I think. Apparently that's where they go.

And there you are. I have made it. You're just standing on a balcony, looking and breathing.

Unless you live through and for a narrative in your mind that you completely believe in, that becomes a conceptual sense of identity. I am such and such a person who has achieved this and that, and this is all the story, and that's me. And big narrative that gives you your sense of identity, thought movement.

And then you feel bigger while you stand on this balcony. And then you feel deflated when you step off the balcony. Or let's say you're a pop star.

What's the word that you use? A rock star. That's millions of people say, wow, wouldn't it be great, especially youngsters, wouldn't it be great to be a rock star?

You can do anything. And of course they experience this in a magnified way. They are on stage and energy moves through them.

And then they walk off stage and they are regarded as gods by all these, by the audience. And they go, let me only touch you. I hope nobody does that to me.

But let me only, may I just touch you, they say to the rock star. And the rock star then having, in most cases, not that much awareness. They feel they are more and more like a god because they believe in the narrative that all these unconscious people have mentally manufactured for them.

And then they begin to believe in it. And then there comes to the huge conflict or discrepancy when they go off the stage and they sit in the green room or somewhere. Where am I now?

And then they have to take drugs because what happens, there's a sense of a lack returns much more strongly than ever before, a sense of lack and insufficiency. So I need another fix, a drug, or I need to smash up my hotel suite. That's what they do, rock stars apparently.

And that enhances their sense of self a little bit more. So many people live for something that's going to happen in the future. And of course, of course you may succeed in your endeavors.

This is a nice thing, but it's not going to give you long lasting and ultimate fulfillment or tell you who you actually are. It's fine to achieve things, especially if they are beneficial, but for humanity and the totality on the planet, it's lovely to have that, but even that doesn't make up your identity. So not to live for the big thing, but to honor the small things.

The more you honor the small things, the more likely it is that you'll experience more good things in the so-called future, because you have such a good relationship with the present. The better your relationship with the present, the better your prospects are for the future, which doesn't exist. If that makes sense, it probably doesn't.

Not if you think about it, it's a paradox. The so-called future is an extension of the present. So if you want to invest in the non-existent future, invest awareness into the present moment, and the more you honor the present moment, and now we come to a related word, and that is honoring or giving attention to the small things is gratitude, is the word of thankfulness.

Now you can be thankful even if you don't, people sometimes ask me, well, somebody says, I'm a Buddhist, I don't believe in God, and the Buddha was a spiritual teacher who was awakened, but so who am I thankful to? You don't need to be thankful to anybody in particular. Gratitude is an underlying state of consciousness, which is giving your fullest attention and honoring what is.

Gratitude is not having a certain narrative in your mind that tells you that you should be grateful because other people are worse off than you. I really should be grateful because all these people are so much worse off than me. Then you feel good because other people are bad, so that doesn't really work.

Well, it works temporarily, but it's not the true, it's not real. That is not gratitude. Gratitude is not to do with a narrative in your mind that tells you something about my life because the entire thing that you call my life consists of thoughts.

What you call my life is a bundle of thoughts that you derive your sense of identity from, and you call it my life. It's a conceptual sense of self. It's abstract, it's mental, it's fictitious ultimately.

It's not who you are. It's not yourself, as the Buddha would put it. It is no self.

There is no self in it. It's just thoughts, memories, thoughts. So thankfulness or gratitude is just giving your attention to a flower or a glass of water or the stillness in this room, the lights, even if they are artificial lights, the aliveness in your body, and then a contentment arises, an inner peace arises because you're honoring the present moment.

And less and less do you then feel that you need to get to some other moment to get away from this one or just reduce this moment to a means to an end. So gratitude is something very powerful. It does not even have to be in words.

You can add some words to it if you'd like, but gratitude is just giving your fullest attention to something and experiencing it and realizing its presence, its aliveness, even if it's an object. Now, if you want to create something that is not an egoic thing, but is something you realize from the depth of your being that something wants to be created through you, whatever it may be. Maybe you want to, you're writing a, write a book, open a hairdressing salon, create a retreat center, or a conscious business or whatever you want to create, and the vision comes to you, or you may want to create, it's not necessarily selfish, a better place to live, a place that is externally more peaceful than where you are now or warmer.

You may have a vision of what it is that you want to achieve, and then you focus on that vision and the most powerful way to manifest, as you probably know, I don't usually talk about that too much because other things are more important. I talk about the foundation for your life, but manifesting is a secondary thing that can be significant in your life, and to manifest the most important secret, to use that word, I'm not specifically referring to a book called The Secret, but there's helpful things in there too, as long as you don't believe that certain things that you want to manifest are going to make you happy. The power to manifest is in experiencing the fullness of the present moment, the undifferentiated fullness, what Jesus called life in its fullness in one of the translations.

I want you to have life in its fullness, he said, and that is not stuff. He's not referring to things. Life in its fullness is an inner state of being.

It is to experience, to know, to realize the beingness within you, the I am, which is consciousness itself. That is the fullness of life in the words of Jesus. The fullness of life is to realize that so that once you realize that and it is consciousness, you know yourself as consciousness.

Once you know that, then no future moment can possibly be better. Anything that can happen in the future isn't adding on to. So if you bring together, if you have a vision in your mind of what it is you want to achieve or create or manifest, and you bring this vision into this sense of still fullness that you sense now, and you bring that together, that is the most powerful creative tool.

The way that it's usually expressed, Jesus expressed it too. He said, when you pray for something, believe that you already have it. But I think he probably used actually slightly different words, but that's how it was written down.

He's probably said, feel that you already have it. Whatever it is that you want to have that you think is going to be, you need to feel already the feeling that you are now. How do you do that?

By feeling that which is beyond the world of phenomena out of which everything arises, which is consciousness. So when you know yourself as consciousness, that's already the fulfillment. Let's say even an insignificant thing.

Let's say you want to have a nice house. Let's just say, if I had a nice house out in nature, then I would be really happy. I want to have a nice house in nature next to a little forest.

And then there's a lake there and I can walk to the lake. And then how would you feel? Okay.

I would feel exactly the way I'm feeling now. I want to live in Hawaii and have a deck behind my house with a very comfortable chair. And then I would sit in there every day and contemplate the ocean.

Well, good luck. How would you feel? What would you feel?

I would feel the fullness of life. Okay. And you can't feel it now.

No. Why can't you feel it now? Because I'm not sitting in this deck chair.

And I'm not looking at the ocean. And it's not sunny. That's why I can't feel the full.

And I don't have a house behind me that I say is mine. So I can't feel the fullness of life now. Okay.

Then do you think you're going to feel it when you finally sit in the deck chair? No. If you can't feel it now, you can't feel it then.

Because you will be again dissatisfied in your deck chair behind the house because you will get very bored and stung by mosquitoes. And it's too hot anyway. I should have gotten a house higher up because down here by the beach, it's just too hot.

Why didn't I get a house higher up? Because there's a mountain just behind me. It would be cooler when you sell your house.

Get one higher up. But then the nights are too cold. You can't sit outside anymore.

If you cannot feel the fullness of life on your bicycle and enjoy that moment tremendously of being on your bicycle, you will not feel the fullness of life when you're sitting in your Rolls Royce or Bentley or Ferrari, Tester, Testeron, Testerosa. There's an overvaluing of things around you that I need things to be in a certain way around me to be happy and content. And that doesn't mean that you cannot change the environment around you.

You can take steps towards changing it because you may have certain preferences. That's fine. Everybody has a preference.

There's some spiritual teachers who say, or I don't know who, I can't remember, but there are some who say, I have no preference. Well, they live somewhere, but not somewhere else. So you must have a preference for being there unless somebody picks them up and puts them somewhere.

So you can have a preference for living here rather than there. Yes, this country rather than that country. But while you're not there, you can be in touch with the fullness of life within yourself now.

And then it's much more likely that your external surroundings will reflect your state of consciousness. Now it goes so far in some spiritual traditions, also in ancient Christian practices, that the thankfulness is applied not only to the seemingly good things in life, nice things, little things, but nice things, but the thankfulness is also applied to the seemingly negative things in life. That seems a little strange.

So when something so-called bad happens to you, you say, thank you. And that of course implies that you accept this moment completely as it is. And then internally, you rise above the external circumstances of your life by being in a position of non-reactivity towards the external circumstances of your life.

And this is the spiritual practice that one teacher recommended to his disciples. It's a simple saying, which consists of two sentences. And it says, thanks for everything.

I have no complaint whatsoever. That's a spiritual practice. It's not just the words, so you have to actually feel what the words are saying.

Now this is to be applied in any circumstance in your life, so-called good or so-called bad. Whatever you meet in your life, which will be in the present moment, of course, you would apply this thanks for everything either verbally or just as an attitude, an inner underlying attitude towards what happens. Thanks for everything.

I have no complaint whatsoever. No complaint is an important part too, because if you don't complain anymore, the ego will have quite a struggle to continue to survive in you. It may find a few other things, but it will be struggling to survive without any mental complaint.

You can't complain about people anymore in your mind, what they should have done but didn't do, how unconscious they are, what a jerk he is, what he said to me, what he didn't do when he should have done it long ago, why couldn't he, and so on. And you complain about situations and groups of people, entire collective groups, millions of all those, whatever label you attach to them, complain, complain. I have no complaint whatsoever.

Well, that stops a lot of the activity of your mind. What can I think about now? I'm not complaining.

I can't complain about my life anymore. If I have no complaint whatsoever, I can't complain about my so-called life. Now that's a big one.

How many people complain about their lives, either out loud or in their mind? My life, I need to sort it out somehow, but it's just, why is it always things go wrong? Why did it all, why didn't I make it?

I didn't make it. Or I made it and then I lost it. Or I made it and then it became meaningless.

Or I made it and then it made me sick because it was so much stress, making it required so much stress I became sick. My life, as long as you believe in a narrative called my life, you experience your so-called life as a burden that you carry around with you. And this burden that you carry around with you is your sense of identity.

And your sense of identity is a bundle of recurring thoughts. But you don't know that. And if you don't know that, you are so identified with it that this burden you have to carry around with wherever you go.

You carry the self, as the Buddhists call it, the self. And without knowing it, no matter where you go, Hawaii, Bali, the Himalayas, India, New York, Detroit, you always carry the burden of yourself around, the unhappy me with brief interludes of illusory happiness. Meeting someone in a bar or it's exciting, a new person.

And a few days later or weeks later, he didn't make me happy. So when you don't complain about not only other people, but also about your life, then you can't be a victim anymore. And there are quite a few people who have a huge investment in their victim identity, which can be either personal or collective.

Now you may indeed belong to a collective, racial or otherwise, that traditionally and historically has been disadvantaged. You may indeed be part or have come out of a so-called marginalized group that has experienced discrimination in the past and may even be still experience discrimination in the present. And so you may be part of that.

And undeniably, certain historical things happened. It is very seductive to the ego and ego strengthening to seek a sense of identity in feeling that you belong to this group of people. And this is very seductive and seems to make sense, but you will be trapped.

You're walking into a prison. You're walking into a mental prison by deriving a sense of identity from being a victim in your mind. Whether it's on a personal level, things might have happened to you as a person in your childhood.

Somebody treated you very badly, a father, a mother, a caregiver, somebody else. So that you still carry the scars or wounds of your childhood with you. Undoubtedly, these things happen quite frequently to human beings.

And yet, if the narrative that you form in your mind and that becomes the basis for your sense of self is one of victimhood, then you are imprisoned in a conceptual, deeply entrenched sense of identity that is also ultimately fictitious. Because whatever happened to you is not who you are now. It is not your true nature.

Yes, the emotional scars may be there, and you can still feel them. But who is it that feels the emotional scars and the emotional wounds at this moment? Who is it that feels these things?

I feel them. Well, who is I? I is not what you feel.

That's an emotion. It's not a thought. I is the light of consciousness in which these feelings are being experienced right now.

So undoubtedly, you may still experience scars or wounds from past pain. You may experience it as the pain body inside you. But the pain body is not who you are.

It is an accumulation of past emotional pain. To make it into who you are and then forming a narrative on the basis of the pain body is a very seductive thing, can happen very easily, seems to make a lot of sense because millions of other people are doing the same thing. And you can even, if it's collective rather than personal, you can even get a great sense of belonging.

But you are condemned to living through and in the conceptual prison in your mind. Not only that, you're also condemned, especially if it's a collective victim identity, in making other groups of people, no longer looking at the individual, but making an entire group of people into your enemy. Of course, and as you know, the ego loves its enemies.

It strengthens itself enormously through creating the conceptual idea of your enemies. And so there are millions of people who still fall into this trap, egoic trap, where they, so this can happen as I said, either on a personal level, things that happen to you in your background, or the collective that you belong to have come out of. And then you have a huge group of enemies and you will never be able to, if you meet anybody who belongs to that group of people, it could even be such a huge group as, let's say it's 50% of humanity, and that 50% of humanity is called men.

I hate men, what they did to me. And then we're all victims of the patriarchy. We're all victims.

Of course, there has been a patriarchy. Of course, there has been extreme forms of yang that created havoc on the planet. And so we have shifted more towards yang now, which is a good thing.

Hopefully we're not going to an extreme of yang because that will also create havoc, but let's not go there. Nothing in excess. Victim is a huge, a huge present.

It is not who you are and make it impossible for you to find your own, your true power, because it would block access to your true nature, your deep identity. Any big egoic structure blocks access to who you are in your essence. So you don't even know what you're doing to yourself.

It's comforting to the ego, to the fictitious sense of self, but it is ultimately a mental disability. You can still look back at history. You can recognize things that happened, whether it's your personal history or a collective history.

And yet, of course, the pain was inflicted on you or your ancestors by human unconsciousness. If it's your parents, you can blame them. You can transform the unconsciousness that they manifested into their identity, or you can recognize that they could not act beyond their level of consciousness at the time.

Nobody can. I did that with my parents. And it was wonderful to realize that my father, for example, had accumulated enormous amount of emotional pain in childhood and felt neglected, not given love and attention because he was the seventh child.

Nobody wanted another child. He just happened. And he had many sisters.

They all were older than him. And he was just the last one, or not another one. The mother was very tired after giving birth to seven children, just tired.

So there he was, neglected, never hugged. And it was enormous. I only realized it much later, enormous amount of pain in his childhood.

And that pain manifested as anger, anger towards human beings, and latent, that was the pain body, anger towards women too, because the women neglected him. The mother neglected him. The sisters neglected him.

And yet there was this anger towards women and there was this enormous longing to have the attention of a woman, which he didn't get as a child. So there was a resentment that he didn't get the attention and there was a longing for the attention. Now, this is a pattern that he grew up with and became an adult.

How did it manifest in his life? I only understood that much later. It manifested in his life as needing an unconscious, powerful urge to gain the attention of as many women as possible, seducing them, he called it, to seduce women and get them.

And he became a master at seducing women. He was good looking, unlike me. And so he was a master.

He could get any, when he was young, any woman would fall for him. He could play this role of being, you are the most important person I've ever seen, the most, oh yeah. And the women got, oh.

And the moment they started a relationship, very quickly, he suddenly got very angry with her. And that was the end of the relationship. Start another one and another.

Then unfortunately, he got married. So it took a few years before it ended, but one good thing came out of it. And I know there was a being underneath those patterns that occasionally surfaced.

And it was wonderful to see that occasionally from beyond those heavy egoic and pain body patterns, occasionally a being emerged that was able, for example, to respect and recognize the work that I do. He read The Power of Now and not fully realizing the meaning at the deepest level, but he got, he said, what you are doing is the most important thing in the world. I know that, but I can't live it, but I know it's the most important thing he said.

So there's something in him that recognized it. There was a little bit, especially as he grew older, small cracks appeared in the egoic shell and there was occasionally the light came through. And that's wonderful.

I'm grateful for that also. My mother has another story, which we'll leave for some other day. It's strange how destiny and fate works.

Just one more thing about how it's all connected. Both my mother and father were a little bit eccentric. And when my mother fitted in more easily in contemporary world, when, but national socialism in Germany, my father was so angry with it that he started talking against it when he was a soldier and they put him in prison.

And that was in North Africa. He was a soldier in North Africa and he escaped from the prison. So he trekked through the desert.

It's a huge story. And ended up living underground with a woman that he found in Tripoli. And my mother escaped from this kind of military service in a factory where she was supposed to work to manufacture weapons when she was 19.

After the second day, she escaped on a truck, jumped in the back of the truck and escaped from there. And then the police were looking for her and she lived underground with an aunt for two years. That factory got bombed only a few months later where the people who worked there also lived and she would have died if she hadn't escaped.

So this impulsive 19 year old who jumped on the back of a truck to escape from the weapons factory had a significant impact on the consciousness of humanity. It's amazing how it's all connected. So the important thing now is that you honor the present moment as you move away from here and realize the real retreat is within you.

It's not the externals of this retreat. So you are not going to leave the retreat. The retreat means being in touch with the transcendent dimension within you.

So the retreat can now become permanent and you don't need to come back if you are in touch with the transcendent dimension within you. If you have problems and you lose it again, you could come back to another, but I hope you don't have to. Remember, thanks for everything.

I have no complaint whatsoever. And after you've said that and you truly live it, the mind is actually still for a moment because without a complaint, there isn't that much to think about right now. And without devaluing the present moment, there isn't that much to think about.

Just giving your attention to this moment. So don't reduce this precious moment to a means to an end. Take one step at a time and honor every step.

Then wonderful contentment arises. It seems to come out of the little things that you do, the little movements. You enjoy them.

There's an enjoyment in what you do. And if something so-called bad happens, a big challenge could happen sooner or later. There are always two things a human can go when being challenged by something seemingly very negative.

There are two things you can go. It can pull you into unconscious reactivity, make you unconscious, or it can intensify the presence within you. It's more likely in your case that it will intensify now that there's already significant field of presence arising in you.

It's more likely that the next challenge, bigger challenge that comes into your life will intensify your presence. But don't wait for it to become more present because then you would certainly get it. It'll come anyway.

Life won't leave you alone. Please just leave me alone. Let me just have a peaceful life without all those things going wrong and difficult situations and difficult people.

No. Life says, no, you need the challenges. So there's this wonderful stillness here, and let's acknowledge it.

Let's notice it. Be aware of it, the stillness in this room. And while you're aware of it, almost one could say listen to it, observe that your mind is also still.

So the external silence is perceived through inner stillness, and it can deepen the inner stillness. And once it's there, then even when you're at a noisy airport or in a noisy traffic, you no longer depend on external silence. But while it's there, it can be very helpful.

So let's be aware of it now, even as I'm still speaking. I'll stop speaking in a moment. I'm still speaking, but there is this background here to the words, the sounds, that actually has power to it.

The power is not just in you. It's all around you. Ultimately, there's no division between within and without.

There is power in the space itself. There is consciousness that pervades the space here, and the human brain is like a lens or a focalization of that consciousness, a particular way in which it focuses, a prism, but it's diffused everywhere. You don't have to believe me, but it just comes, it's an intuitive realization, which you may also share.

So that's all around you. The most significant thing in this room is not what you see. The most significant thing in this room is actually not a thing.

The most significant thing in this room is the space. And the most significant thing in you is not a thing either. It's the space of consciousness.

And this outer space is just an externalization of inner space, of consciousness. The vastness of outer space is an externalization of the depths of who you are internally. And ultimately, you are it.

You are the universe, which at this very moment is becoming conscious of itself. So let's tune into this stillness, the silence in this room. Listen to it.

Eckhart Tolle The Greatest Mystery Is the Mystery Of the Universe [b7af39e0-d183-4578-afbd-138c0c88b814]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:57)

The greatest mystery is the mystery of the universe. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about the awakening universe. He says the great miracle and the mystery is that the universe is conscious.

In fact, Eckhart explains that it is a manifestation of consciousness itself, and we are part of that. He explains there are millions and billions of other life forms across the galaxies, but here on Earth, the universe expresses consciousness through us. He believes as we grow in awareness, we let go of the limitations of the ego.

We discover we are more than a person with a personality. Ultimately, we learn to see others just as ourselves. In Eastern traditions, this is called metta.

In the West, it's called love. Eckhart believes by acknowledging our shared humanity, we discover all our expressions are part of the one great consciousness.

[Speaker 1] (0:59 - 37:06)

My digital timer here is at zero. That's good. Time has stopped.

It's still at zero. Oh, it just turned to one. To get out of time, all you have to do is stop thinking and just being present.

And that's the vertical dimension then opens up, and there is no time. In the external, time still happens, but you no longer have any internal time. So time doesn't really exist outside of the human mind.

That seems perhaps hard to believe, but even some philosophers already came to that conclusion. So as a practice, as you know, I recommend practicing the cessation of thought. For example, when you're walking from A to B, that maybe start with a very short distance, like from here to that wall.

Make that as a practice. Obviously, you're walking for some reason. You want to get somewhere, probably, or maybe you're just taking a walk.

It doesn't matter, but you're making it a practice. This space, the space between here and there, let's see if I can be just present with every step and be free of thought until I reach that spot there. And so you walk.

You know, you see everything, perceive everything. You're breathing, of course, hopefully. You're not walking as a person then, because there's nothing that makes you a person that is to do with the personality that you have during that space.

Of not thinking, you don't have a personality. There's no person walking. There is a conscious presence walking if you're able to be free of thinking.

And that is very helpful practice. You can do it anywhere, whether you're in nature or in a city. In a city, you can say between here and the next lamp post, I will be just present.

Then you walk. You may not succeed every time, but it's an easy, relatively easy practice, can be incorporated into your everyday life. Even a simple thing like walking across the room, you can make that into a conscious action, a conscious action.

And then you can sense there's a just incredible difference between walking as a person and walking as presence. Often, of course, we speak of presence, we point to presence. Presence is not just the absence of sound.

It's also the presence of presence. There's a silent power in that presence. The more you go there, the more you can sense it.

And that silent power has nothing to do with any achievement in your life of achievement of the person. And you cannot say that it's yours. It would be misguided to say, this is my power.

There is a silent power. It's not yours because nothing is yours. And perhaps you can even feel it at this moment here now.

Maybe it's very, just very subtle. When you are rooted in that, you are it, basically. That's, of course, the end of all fear or anxiety.

And you will no longer have a problem with self-worth or self-esteem. No need to compare yourself anymore to anyone else. Potentially, every human could have access to that consciously.

They all have a trickle. That's why they're still alive. They have a trickle of that, but the ego stands in the way, the pseudo power of the ego, which is a dreamlike state.

When you go into not thinking, you are above thought. You are alert. There's an alert state of being above thought.

But it can happen that you slip, so to speak, and from the state of being above thought for too long, more than you can stand, you fall below thought. This happens to people in meditation everywhere. It happens in Zen monasteries.

It happens everywhere. All the professional meditators have a problem with that. That's why the Zen master goes around and hits you when he feels you're nodding off.

He has a stick, and he hits you on the back. So you go, it's an early morning meditation, so obviously you didn't get enough sleep. So you're present for a few minutes, and then, heck, it works.

It works. This is a microcosm of the macrocosm in everyday life. When you become unconscious, life will challenge you again and hit you with something.

When your life turns unconscious, life will hit you with a metaphorical stick, or worse. So walking, and then you can extend it a little bit. Instead of the next lamppost, make it two lampposts.

You're walking from here to the second lamppost. You're less likely to fall asleep when you're walking. So presence practice is very helpful when there's some movement, and this is an amazing shift to be walking as a presence rather than as a person.

If I were here as a person, primarily, I mean, obviously there is a little bit of a person still here, but it's not a big thing, just a little person. For a person, it would be stressful, and it would produce anxiety to know that now I'm going to give another talk. Is it going to work, says the person?

Am I going to be able to talk, or what's going to happen? Or let's say I give a talk in a big city, there may be 4,000 people, and there I am sitting in my hotel room waiting to be picked up to give a talk. This could be stressful.

If I had the idea in my head, now I'm going to give a talk. I am a spiritual teacher, and I am about to give a talk to 4,000 people, and it has to go well, it has to succeed. I have to make an effort to make, whatever the mind might be saying, very stressful.

If I go from the hotel to the venue, and I sit in the car thinking about, is it going to work, what am I going to say? Oh, how can I fill two or three hours? No, that doesn't work.

But if I am just a presence, I'm sitting in the car as a presence looking out of the window without thought, and I can sense the power that is going to give the talk. I know that the silent power will flow into the mind and the talk will happen. I don't need to know how it's going to unfold or what exactly is going to be said.

So you're kind of, you rest in that silent power that is there beyond thought. And then I sit in the so-called green room, which is a waiting room behind stages. They call it green, but most of them are not green.

I don't know. And then I sit there in the state of no thought. It's beautiful.

And sometimes I walk up and down. It might look as if I'm nervous, but I'm walking because I don't want to sit for that long. So walk up and down the room.

And then I walk on stage. There's some steps here, one step at a time. And then there's a moment of silence.

And then words come. That is everybody's destiny, is to get in touch with that silent power and realize that that silent power is the essence of who or what you are. It is the Tao or whatever you want to call it.

And it can only be felt, sensed, if the ego gets out of the way. And the ego is mind activity and is particularly identification with mind activity. So we have to make room for the silent power and to let go of thought is making room for that to arise.

So that's a practice, whether you're walking, also lovely if you're in the car driving, you can also practice. You'll actually be quite present. Many people drive, they're thinking about something totally different.

And only if there's a critical situation, they suddenly become aware that they're driving. But driving is also a way of practice. Every traffic light when the car stops, just being present.

And more and more you can, in many, many situations, people are asking often how to incorporate this into everyday life. In as many situations as possible, practice the cessation of thinking so that you are able to rise above thinking and the person temporarily subsides. Then you can experience the world also as a perceiving consciousness instead of perceiving the world through the veil of your conditioned mind.

And that's a wonderful way you can actually enjoy what you perceive through visually or other senses. You can enjoy that very much. And you find aliveness and beauty in the smallest things that before you could never have noticed.

Because if you relate to reality through the veil of your conditioned thinking, it kind of deadens the world because it becomes conceptualized through excessive naming. For example, you no longer can sense the reality of that thing that you are naming. But if you drop the naming, then you can connect with it.

The naming, the constant naming, which is thought, creates a sense of separation between everything that is named and you. You drop the naming and the sense of separation, of separateness goes. And there is a connection with whatever it is that you are contemplating or looking at or sensing or touching or hearing.

There's no longer a sense of the other. I call it sometimes this, this is the non-conceptual intelligence, the non-conceptual way of knowing, as I call it sometimes. You can know something conceptually or you can know it in a deeper way, non-conceptually.

And this deeper knowing is a very different kind of knowing. To some extent, you become one with that thing, whatever it may be, or it could be a being or a human. In the case of human beings, when you are present with another human being, and let go of the naming, you connect with the human being at a deeper level.

And that deep connectedness is actually what in some, like in Buddhism, they call it loving kindness or kindness or metta. That's, it's love, but not in the conventional sense, in a deeper sense. Love is the recognition of the other as ultimately not other.

The recognition of the other as ultimately yourself, because everything is a manifestation of the one consciousness. That is the Tao or Brahman. Everything is a manifestation of that.

And even the table here is a material object, is consciousness at a lower frequency, frozen consciousness, one could say, that's matter. Or you could say consciousness that's totally asleep. And then you have life, plant life.

You have minerals and rocks and minerals that is frozen consciousness or consciousness asleep. And then you have the next stage, the evolutionary stage, is plant life. That's a different state.

You can also compare it with water. You can have, water can be solid, frozen, and then water can be liquid. And then water again can undergo another metamorphosis and become vapor.

So consciousness, various frequencies as matter, solid matter or plant life. That's another step. And then the next evolutionary step is animal life.

One could say consciousness is a deeper sleep in matter. Consciousness is dreaming in the plant, trees, flowers, et cetera. Consciousness then is animal life, perhaps a greater awakening of another vibrational frequency of consciousness.

Perhaps the early beginnings of an awakening. And then there's a transition to the humans. And the humans are still half asleep and partly in the dream state.

The humans are transitional entities, transitional beings between where they are supposed to go and the evolutionary, the evolution of consciousness and where they are now. As Nietzsche said, they're like a walker on a tightrope. And so there's, the animal is there and the, that's hard to translate, the future human, that's why we're the superhuman or whatever, the overhuman is the goal where halfway between animal and a conscious, fully conscious human being.

We're like a walker on the tightrope and it's quite dangerous, he says, because we could fall off and then not make it. So then the, it's unitive consciousness, you know things and you don't sense, have that sense that here's you and there's the rest of the universe. You feel a connectedness with all things and all beings, a oneness with all things and all beings through letting go of thought processes.

When needed, thought can operate beautifully, especially when you have access to that deeper dimension. Then thought can be inspired by that deeper dimension and it can use your mind instead of your mind pretending to be you and using you, this silent power can use your mind because it has created it. And this silent power, which is consciousness itself, the unconditioned consciousness, you might ask, well, the human mind never stops asking and then it asks, so where does that come from?

Is that God? I will offering to you now my intuitive perception of this. It is something that emanates from the source of all life, which is not part of this dimension at all.

It does not exist in space and time. It emanates as the sun emanates light, the source emanates what we call consciousness into this dimension. So it is like the light of the sun.

The consciousness is the light of the source. It's metaphorical light, but it's often compared to light in various traditions. So this is the emanation of the one, which traditionally is called God.

But I don't like to use that word because it's been misunderstood for so long. God has been made into an entity that is somewhere traditionally up there until the first astronaut who went up into space, Russian astronaut. Of course, he came from an atheist country at the time.

And he said, I didn't see God anywhere up there. Oh, OK, that proves it. There is no God.

So the consciousness, the silent power that is that unconditioned consciousness, one could say it is the emanation of, let's use that word for a moment. I hope we don't mind, of God in you. It is the light of God in you.

And Jesus actually said it. He said, you are the light of the world. What could that mean?

What is that light of the world? It is the light in which the world appears, which is consciousness. Would there even be a world without that consciousness that perceives this?

That's an interesting question. You probably know the question. It's sometimes regarded as a Zen question.

The Zen question has no answer. For example, the Zen question is, what is the sound of one hand clapping? So that you cannot answer that because it doesn't make sense.

It is the Zen questions, which are called koans. They are supposed to drive your mind to its limit so that the mind finally surrenders. And when the mind finally surrenders, then you can hear the sound of one hand clapping because it's the silence.

I've given an explanation now. One shouldn't do that. But that's how it is.

There's another question which is regarded sometimes as a Zen question, but it's not because it has an answer. If a tree falls in the forest and there's nobody around to hear it, does it make a sound? Now the answer is, of course, it does not make a sound.

When there's nobody there to hear it. Because for a sound to happen, it requires a sensory organ and a consciousness behind it. Without the sensory organ, which we call the ear, there may be a vibration when the tree falls, but the vibration does not become sound because there's no organ to perceive it.

So the tree does not make a sound when it falls in the forest and there's nobody there to hear it. Next question would be, interesting question, there's a rainbow, a beautiful rainbow. Would this rainbow be there if there were nobody there to see it?

No, of course not. Because the rainbow isn't even something. It's something that the light does.

And if nobody perceives it, then it's not happening. Is that confusing? And what is this table without the human organs of perception and the consciousness behind it?

What is left if there's no entity perceiving this? Of course, obviously, then there wouldn't be a table anymore. All that's left is perhaps atoms and molecules in rapid motion, because that's what the table consists of.

Molecules, atoms in vast motion. An energy field, that's all. An energy field with vast spaces in between that 99.999% of this table is empty space. It's nothingness, basically. Because even within the atoms, there's empty space. So all this is just, it's space.

It's all that. There's no table or room here or bodies in the room, just consciousness. Atoms are perhaps the most rudimentary form of consciousness.

Some scientists have written about the, speculated about the consciousness of the atom. But I don't want to go too far with this. Let's leave it at a practical level.

Your consciousness is an essential part of what you perceive as the world. You cannot separate them. There isn't the world and your consciousness.

The two form a unity. So without your consciousness, there isn't really a world. You are an essential part of what you perceive as the external world.

Is it really external? Isn't everything experienced within you? Everything that looks like the external world is experienced in your consciousness, in your mind.

There are sensory perception. Sensory perception sends signals to the brain which are then decoded by the brain. And then the brain recreates, or the mind, brain is the physical aspect of mind, which is non-physical.

They hang together. The brain or the mind then decodes the signal that it receives and then reconstructs something of those signals. And then it becomes suddenly a room and a table.

And philosophers have speculated whether there's anything there at all outside or are we making it all up? Is life a dream? That consciousness is dreaming in a way it is.

Because everything, just like a dream, it comes and goes. It arises and subsides. Everything evaporates fairly quickly from this world.

Like a dream, a dream evaporates when you wake up. It's gone. It dissolves.

And everybody that's in this room is destined to dissolve within a few years. By a few, I mean, well, there's no little children here. So let's say, uh, 80 years at the most.

Within 80 years, I believe everybody here will be gone. And for many, including myself, much less than that. And so, if you could see a speeded up version of human life, you would see the human being born and growing and maturing maturity like a flower that comes out of the ground.

Opens up. It's beautiful. And then it begins to wilt.

But there is something, in essence, what you are, what you can see is a tiny fraction of what you are. You are, even as a person, which is not the essence of who you are, it's a temporal coming together. But you're essentially invisible.

Every thought you have exists in an invisible dimension. It is related to the human brain, yes. But thought itself, you cannot find it by opening up the brain and examining it.

Any thought, you have millions of thoughts and memories in your mind or in your brain. But no surgeon would ever be able to find a single memory by opening up your brain and looking with a microscope to find where is the memory of your grandmother? Where does it live?

Is it material or is it somehow related to the actual physical brain in the same way that when a radio plays a piece of music, there's a relationship between the radio, the receiver, and the music that it transmits. The music needs the radio to come into this dimension. But the music itself is not created by the radio.

In the same way that consciousness, it obviously is related to the physical brain in the same way that the music that is played by the radio is related to the radio in some way. And if something goes wrong with the radio, the music, either it will stop completely or will become distorted. So if something goes wrong with the human brain, obviously, then you can see that consciousness becomes distorted.

For example, when brain damage happens and even through certain drugs, it can happen. In the same way, if you put liquid or something into a radio receiver, the music would become distorted or it would stop completely after a while. Does that mean that the music is produced by the radio?

It looks like it, but everybody knows it isn't. In the same way, I would suggest to you that consciousness has a relationship, of course, with the physical brain, but is not produced by the physical brain. It acts as a receiver.

It focalizes consciousness into this dimension. And so you can see then that all your thoughts are essentially invisible, even on the level of thought and your entire sense of who you are. Yes, the physical body that you can see, but even on the level of the personality, not to mention the deeper level of the essence of who or what you are, you are invisible and you don't actually exist in this dimension as this invisible entity.

You are multidimensional. In this dimension, you are a physical being, but even on the level of thought, you're already in another dimension. Thought exists in another dimension.

You cannot find it here. So all these memories that you have, nobody really knows in what form these memories live in you. I can say now, can do you remember the first teacher you had at school?

And immediately you go, yeah, there he or she, there she is. You remember? I do.

I remember what she looked like. I remember her name. And would anybody be able to find it by opening up my brain?

Would a surgeon be able to find my first teacher? No, can't find anything. You cannot find you at all because you exist in a dimension that is non-physical essentially.

And the essence of where you are, even more so, exists in an even deeper or higher dimension than that. But it's an amazing realization, isn't it? That you are essentially invisible on a material level.

Nobody could find you. They can find your body, but not you. That's quite an amazing thing.

There are enormous mysteries in this universe. There's the mystery of the microcosm of the subatomic realm that we do not understand. It's totally mysterious what happens there.

And then there's a mystery of the macrocosm, the mystery of outer space of billions of galaxies, inconceivable vastness of it. Does it ever end? The mystery of space itself.

Does it go on and on? When I was, I don't know how old, 11 or 12, I asked my dad, what is there? Does it go on and on or does it have an end?

Because I always loved looking at the night sky. Of course, nobody knows. It's inconceivable.

It is both inconceivable that space has an end somewhere and it is equally inconceivable that space has no end. Because if it has an end, what's beyond it? And if it has no end, it's totally impossible to imagine that.

So there's a huge mystery there and there's a huge mystery in the smallest and in the largest. But the greatest mystery of all is the mystery of consciousness. The greatest mystery and the greatest miracle is that the universe is conscious and consciousness is the essence of the universe.

And you are that. The universe is conscious through you and most likely conscious through millions of other, billions other life forms everywhere. But here, the universe is conscious through you.

And as you awaken out of the egoic state, it is part of the awakening universe. And if it's happening here, we can assume, almost with certainty, that it is happening in countless other places in this universe. It is awakening.

You are not in the universe as some entity that has come into this universe, this alien universe. That's how the ego perceives it. There's me and there's this alien world.

You are an essential part of it. You have come out of this universe, which is a manifestation of consciousness itself. So you are the consciousness of the universe, obviously.

Not the, it expresses itself in countless other forms too. But so you're not just a person. You are the temporary manifestation of the consciousness of the universe.

And then it withdraws. This little manifestation withdraws. Then the body dies.

But something of that entity still remains of that. The invisible you does not immediately dissolve. The invisible you is still there without the body.

And I don't want to go into this in too much detail because you'll find this out for yourself soon enough. So we don't need to talk about it because it's everybody's destiny to find out what happens.

[Speaker 1] (0:10 - 57:18)

I finally made it to Winnipeg and it's wonderful to see so many of you here and of course the reason why you're here is, although you may not call it that, but the reason why you're here is that you're experiencing a kind of awakening, awakening of consciousness, although you may not call it that, and you're here because you recognize the possibility that this awakening may deepen by being here. And if your mind right now is puzzled and saying, can you please define awakening of consciousness, I'll say by the end of this evening you will know, if you don't know already what it is, you will understand to the degree to which it can be understood what awakening of consciousness or spiritual awakening means. But more importantly, the awakening of consciousness is not a heightened conceptual understanding of what consciousness is, or even a heightened conceptual understanding of who you are, although it may be that also, but primarily it is the ability in you to become aware of a deeper dimension to who you are.

So ultimately it's a deepening of your sense of identity. And I assume this is what our evening here is going to be about. I'm saying, I assume, because I don't prepare anything beforehand.

So I never know what's going to come out of this mouth next. Living in the present moment. So if this is not a lecture in a conventional terms, and although of course I speak, which means I use concepts, which are thoughts, I use concepts here.

There is another dimension to this gathering, which is beyond conceptual understanding. It's a kind of, I could say, experiencing a deeper reality to life, a deeper reality to who you are. And this requires you to have, even if it's just a little, some access in yourself to this, so that you can go a little bit beyond conceptual understanding to a deeper realization that is beyond words and concepts.

So I would even go so far as to say that the essence of this gathering is not to be found on a conceptual level. So I'm not one to discourage anybody from taking notes, but you will probably derive greater benefit from this if you don't take notes, or if you feel compelled to do so, that's fine. And it is quite possible that after leaving here, you go back home and somebody says, well, what did he talk about for two hours?

And it's quite possible that you might say, I don't know. It seems very deeply meaningful, and yet, I remember a few bits and pieces, and that there's nothing wrong with that. It doesn't mean that you've missed the whole evening.

It may very well mean that you have gone deeper to a, what I sometimes call it, transcendent dimension within yourself, the spiritual dimension, whatever you want to call it. These are just concepts, words. So the essence of this gathering is beyond conceptual understanding, or the conceptual understanding has two purposes here.

One purpose is mentioning what stands in the way of a deeper realization of who you are, what stands in the way to a deeper awakening to who you are. So there are certain obstacles that tend to be common to all humans, and they are to be found in the mental, emotional field of every human being. So it's helpful, and I will be talking about this probably, to mention certain obstacles to the full awakening, the next, as I sometimes call it, the next stage in human evolution seen from a larger perspective.

So the other way we use words or concepts is as signposts. Signposts, I call them signposts, they are concepts that point you in a certain direction, and usually the direction is within. Traditionally in spiritual discourse, very often you see that in ancient old paintings, religious paintings, and so on.

Very often the spiritual dimension is given a certain location, and often you see saints and others, they have got their finger raised like this, because we had a limited understanding. There was up and there was down. Now, of course, we know the moment you leave this planet, there's no up and down anymore.

So traditionally you looked upwards for something higher, but I would suggest a more reliable pathway towards the essence of who you are is this way. It goes within. So the words that I use very often are signposts.

For example, many of you are familiar with this terminology. When I say be present, to be present, of course we'll be going deeply into this. To be present is something that you cannot ultimately understand.

But if you don't know what I'm talking about, it's fine. Just wait. Just be here.

Be here non-present until you're present. So ultimately being present, being conscious in spiritual terminology, you cannot understand conceptually what presence is. You can only experientially know what is meant by presence.

And so right now I'm using certain concepts as signposts towards presence. But you may notice, especially if, and many of you are already going through this awakening process, you may notice in a way that you cannot explain. As I mentioned these words, there is a kind of recognition in you of what I'm talking about, but you would not be able to perhaps explain it.

Because as I talk about presence as a state of consciousness, as I talk about it, there's not only the words which are signposts that are pointing towards it, there's also underlying the words, and in between the words, there is already that state of presence. And this is then the hidden dimension of our gathering here. The hidden dimension of this gathering is deeper than words.

And this is why sometimes I slow down a bit, it just happens, so that you don't attach excessive importance or give excessive attention to the words. They are helpful, but don't be like somebody who collects signposts and has a wonderful collection. Let's say the signposts say Rome or Mecca, and they point that way and say, oh, this is a beautiful signpost, I'm going to keep this and talk about it.

Then after a while, you confuse the signpost with the destination. So you don't become a collector of signposts, because then you become intellectually very knowledgeable, perhaps about spirituality, but you're like the proverbial person who writes a PhD about honey without ever having tasted honey. So there is a knowing, the possibility in you of accessing a knowing that is non-conceptual.

And this is completely overlooked in our civilization, almost completely, because our civilization encourages the ability, even already in young children, to conceptualize and to analyze and to think. And the teacher asked a question, and the best students, according to the educational system, are those that immediately go, huh, I know, that's it. And then you begin to mistake names for the deeper reality of things.

It starts with something like when the child learns language, and the child asks the parent, what's that? The child is looking at a big something, doesn't know what it is, what's that? And the dad or mom says, that's an oak tree.

Oh, oak tree. Okay, thanks, dad. And from then on, whenever the child looks at that kind of tree, he says, oh, that's an oak tree.

And you confuse the naming with what it is. In many, many cases, when you think you know, it's only the illusion of knowledge, because you've attached labels to things. And the moment the mind attaches a label to a thing, the mind says, oh, now I know.

Dad, how do birds find their way when they migrate every year from here to South America? And how do they find their way back to their nesting grounds the following year? How is that possible?

Dad, please tell me. And the dad says, oh, that's easy. It's instinct.

Oh, okay. You've attached a label, now you think you know how it works. Oh, it's by instinct, they find, then the exam comes, and right, by instinct, if birds find, oh, great, give it an A plus.

So part of this awakening of consciousness is to realize that there is a whole hidden, until now, or until recently, there is a whole dimension of consciousness in you that you had been unaware of, that you had always overlooked. The whole dimension that actually our whole civilization is continuously encouraging you to overlook. Just don't look there.

And there are many ways in which we can approach talking about it. But more importantly, of course, here, we are here to deepen our experience of that dimension. And that dimension of consciousness, which in spiritual traditions, all the ancient teachers have pointed to it, using different kinds of signposts, which of course, the collectors of signposts say, no, this signpost is totally different from that one.

Look, they're totally different writing on it, and let's analyze it even more, not realizing they're pointing exactly the same way. So the ancient teachings and teachers have spoken about it in various ways, whether they talk about liberation, awakening, salvation, or the Buddha, in negative terms, the end of suffering, or another term the Buddha used is emptiness, which is not very inspiring, as you might have noticed, but it's very deep. If the Buddha says emptiness, he's giving you a signpost that is very hard to take and say, I believe in this signpost, because it's a negative term.

But he's pointing to a certain state of consciousness to is pointing to a certain realization. And he calls it emptiness. Very wise, because this discourages people from worshipping the signpost.

You can worship the kingdom of heaven. It's a term that Jesus used, by the way, they talk about exactly the same thing, as you would see in about two minutes. They talk about exactly the same thing, but the Buddha's one of the key terms in Buddhism is sunyata, which means empty, translated as emptiness.

That's an interesting choice of signposts, because you cannot worship or make an idol out of emptiness, but you can make an idol out of the kingdom of heaven, because then you can say, oh, where is it? It is somewhere, probably up there. And when am I going to get there?

So you create space and time, and then the kingdom of heaven is a certain location. And you can even, it becomes part of your thought structure, and you begin to worship the kingdom of heaven, not realizing that it's a signpost. So emptiness, the Buddhist term emptiness, is closely related to the kingdom of heaven of Jesus.

In churches, they won't explain it to you, of course. It's closely related. My translation of emptiness is spaciousness.

And my translation of the kingdom of heaven is kingdom, in modern terminology, is dimension. Heaven is this vastness of the sky. This vastness of the sky, the sky stands for spaciousness.

The dimension of spaciousness is the kingdom of heaven, which is Buddha's emptiness or spaciousness. Same thing or the same? No thing.

And what is this thing? What is this dimension of spaciousness? It is a dimension within you.

It is a dimension of consciousness that is possible for humans to access. Although in most humans, it only exists in seed form as a potential. Not that many humans have actually even begun to realize that that dimension exists in them, except you.

And that's why you're here. But even you might only have had an inkling. An inkling is enough to bring you here.

And you don't know quite, may not even know why you've come here. But this thing, you know there is something here that is extraordinarily important. Because if there was not something here that is extraordinarily important, how could you possibly listen to a man talking, sitting on a chair for two hours?

It would be excruciating. Usually this is a stage when things happen. Dramatic things happen and your attention gets captured by that.

But how can your attention be captured by a little man sitting on a chair? So if you do not find this gathering here absolutely excruciating, and you will perhaps if you were forced to come here by a friend or relative, then it is possible that you, because you couldn't say no, you could always take a workshop on how to say no, but I don't do that. You couldn't say no, and now you're sitting there in this theater where it's not even a central aisle where you can get out.

So if it's so excruciating you have to disrupt the entire audience to leave here. But don't be concerned. If you cannot stand it, then please feel free to remove yourself.

And you will not be judged because all the others here are spiritually advanced and they don't judge you. So a little bit of humor is good because it opens us up. And while we laugh, the ego is not operating.

That's a good thing, unless we laugh at somebody. So the spaciousness that the Buddha refers to, the dimension of spaciousness that Jesus refers to, which other traditions use different terminology, is a dimension of consciousness that is in you. And it already is in you, but it's concealed in many, not in you, but in most humans.

Although there is a growing number of humans who are awakening to that dimension within themselves. But an awakening to that dimension within you is also a deepening of your sense of identity. And that's why it's so important.

It is not something other from you. This dimension of spaciousness, the spiritual dimension, is not something that is separate from who you are in the depths of your being. So the most vital thing is to realize who you are beyond the personality, beyond the person, beyond the historical person.

For most people, the historical person or personality is the basis for their sense of self, for their sense of identity. And that's a very limited sense of self, a very limited sense of identity. The very essence of all spirituality, if you go to the very essence of it, is it points to the possibility of realizing the transcendent dimension of who you are, which is also the transcendent dimension of life itself.

So it is a transcendent dimension of the universe, and it is a transcendent dimension of who you are. They're not separate. So that then is the awakening of consciousness.

You awaken to that deeper dimension. In ancient Hindu spiritual philosophy, they have the term Turiya, which means the fourth. They divide consciousness into the state of being asleep, the state of dreaming, the state of ordinary wakefulness.

And then the Turiya, the fourth, points to the possibility of living, being rooted in a deeper state of consciousness than the normal waking state. And that's what it is. Now, I don't want to delay the secret of our gathering and the essence of this to the last minute of our gathering.

I want to continuously have the essence already here, even as I talk more about it. So I'm inviting you now for the first time to, and then I'll carry on with other things, inviting you here to deepen your realization of that. So what is this inner spaciousness?

What is this inner, the kingdom of heaven that is within you? What is the transcendent dimension to who I am? What is it that in ancient Greek philosophy, the most important dictum was, know thyself, know thyself.

The ancient Greek philosophers, probably this phrase, know thyself, is probably uttered by Pythagoras, one of the very first philosophers, the very person who created the term philosophy, which means lover of wisdom. Philosopher is a lover of wisdom, and wisdom is another name for that dimension, or rather, wisdom comes out of that dimension. Now, you may not necessarily be aware that, well, you probably are because you're here.

There's a lot of thinking that goes on in your mind. It goes on and on, it goes on and on, and it doesn't stop. And even if you wanted to stop, it says, why can't you stop?

Why can't you stop? Well, I can't, I can't help it. And that's it again.

So even if you say, please stop, it's part of the thinking process. The voice appears in different disguises. And some people have a monologue that goes on, that comments on what is going on around you, or is totally unaware of what goes on around you, just a little bit, so you don't stumble, but is totally somewhere else in thought processes about the possible future, or the heaviness of the past.

There's completely somewhere else, and it's there, there's a voice going inside of you. Sometimes it's a dialogue, because one, the voice takes on just one disguise, and then another aspect of the voice takes on another disguise. And, and then there's another aspect of the voice that is your mother, who passed away 10 years ago.

And then there's your dad, and then your mom says, why do, why can't you ever succeed at this? What do you, what do you, can't you do it, please? That's why, please shut up, mom, I don't want to hear this.

We can have different voices in your head. You can have an argument with yourself, which is not uncommon. It sounds quite insane, but you can argue with yourself.

In, in Gestalt therapy, it's called the top dog and the underdog. So one person, why do I always fail at these things? Why am I not good enough?

Well, you should try harder. Well, I'm trying hard, but I just can't. So the, this is the voice in the head.

This, these are compulsive, incessant thought processes. So whether you are completely absorbed in that, and not even know what your surroundings are, you just know enough to know where you're going, but 90% of your attention is absorbed in thinking. And so you're not, you're obviously not present.

You're somewhere, but you're not present because your entire consciousness is absorbed by thought. And that's normal state of being. And you might have noticed a lot of that compulsive thinking is not even pleasant.

If it were pleasant, perhaps it wouldn't be so bad. It's, it says nice things about people and remembering nice things and thinking about the wonderful things that are going to happen to me. That would be a beautiful, pleasant dream.

And you can, but so then perhaps it wouldn't be so bad. It would still be a weird dream, but perhaps not so bad. But the strange thing is for many people, this voice in the head is a kind of torture.

It, because it is very critical of yourself or others or places or it's, it complains a lot. It is, it seeks to be right all the time. It seeks and it loves arguments.

Whether you're out aloud or you're arguing in your mind with an imaginary opponent, especially after something has just happened. Somebody has been rude and you said, and then you start, the mind starts up thinking what you could have said. And then, then you replay it and it becomes a huge little play where you say the most clever heart and heart hitting things to this person.

And 20 minutes later, you say, Oh, where am I? And then it goes on with something else. And then it goes on.

It creates a lot of thought about next moments, future moments, what's going to happen. And a lot of that is not pleasant because it imagines scenarios of losing something you have, not getting what you want, something you think will make you happy. You might never get it, or it's something you have, you may lose it or all kinds of things gone.

This voice in the head is often very negative, more freak, more, much more negative for most people than positive. Strangely enough, you might notice that if, for example, a pleasant thing that you, let's say yesterday, you witnessed a beautiful sunset. And for a moment, you felt so good and happy watching the sun go down and it was so beautiful.

And then the next day, yes, you remember it. And all the mind can do with that, it says, that was a beautiful sunset. Okay.

But if something unpleasant happened yesterday, the mind can get in there and create a whole train of associated negative thoughts about how unpleasant people are, or how things are, how dreadful your life is. And anyway, it's all completely pointless, obviously. And why am I even here?

Now, what, what then happens is gradually you form a, an identity that is based on the bundles of thoughts that you think most frequently. These bundles of thoughts arise and they become who you think you are. So when people say my life, and often they think about, you think about my life or you talk about my life.

And what that is, if you look more closely, what my life is, it's a certain narrative in your mind that you need to revive by thinking about it. It is thought. So it's your past.

It's the things that have happened to you, the things that you did. And very importantly, it's the things that you identify with. You identify with certain things.

And these things that you identify with become thoughts. So as we know, people identify with possessions. Identify means there's a thought that arises that says my car, for example, this is my car.

This thought from my car gives you an enhanced sense of self. If it's a car that's better than other people's cars or a diminished sense of self, it's an old rusty car or a bicycle. And so if you have a bicycle and you identify with the bicycle in this, this we're talking now, beginning to talk about the ego, this is the ego.

This is a mind made sense of self that is based on a narrative of me, me and my life. You call it me and my life. It's the ego.

It identifies with things. Primarily what it identifies with is thought because everything that becomes a thought, the car becomes the thought of my car. The body is the very first thing probably that you identify with.

And many people go through their lives continuously carrying a very strong body identification. But the body, of course, becomes a mental image of my body. And it's a possession.

People don't say, I am a beautiful body. That would sound very strange because they say I have a beauty or I am an ugly body. No, that sounds very weird.

You have an ugly, in the same way that you have a car, you have a body. You have an ugly or beautiful body or in between. So very strange.

So there's gradually a construct arises in your mind and that is the conditioned sense of self. It is conditioned by the past. When the voice in the head thinks, a lot of the thinking it does is about my life, your life.

My life is very important. My life is the most important thing to me. It's my life.

Of course, I have to think about it. It is problematic, that's for sure. And probably more problematic than anybody else's life.

Because everybody else is fine. I see in their Facebook pages, they are all fine. They are all enjoying the best meals all the time they go.

So the mental image that they have, they've had it for thousands of years. You live in the mental image of me. Now, through the miracle, miraculous powers of technology, you can actually amplify through technology.

You can amplify the mental image of you and send it out into the world. And you can polish it so that it looks better before you send it out. Before you send it out, you say, oh, this looks great.

Do I look happy enough? Yes. And so Facebook is full of happy, happy entities.

But if you look, it's all a phantom. It's a phantom created by the mind, but the egoic sense of self. Amazing.

The very first time this happened is in Greek mythology. It goes back, whether this person ever existed, we don't know, probably not. But there's deep truth in this mythological figure.

A very ancient Greek myth is this young man who was incredibly beautiful apparently. And of course, at the time they had no mirrors and he couldn't take any selfies. One day he happened to see his image in a pool of water.

And so the first time he saw his image, oh, by the way, his name was Narcissus. And so he looked into this pool of water and the story goes that he fell in love with himself. But I think a better translation would be, he became obsessed with himself.

In other words, what this mythological story points to, oh, by the way, he did not end well after that thing sprang downhill, but we don't need to go there. He looked into this pool of water and there was suddenly something arose within him, which was a mental image of who he is. And this mythological story shows the beginning of the egoic sense of self, because the ego is a mind created phantom self that people carry around with them, but they don't know that they carry this phantom self because they are so identified with this phantom self, they become it.

And that is identification, ego identification. And that is what in many spiritual traditions is called a false self. I don't call it a false self because it has its place.

I call it your, it is your form identity. The form that you are, the form is the physical form of your body and the form is the psychological form, it's thought forms, emotional and mental forms of who you are. So every human being has a form identity, the body and the mind, they together are the form identity.

And that is fine, but if that's all you know of yourself, then your life is very, very limited. And not only is it very limited, it also is very frustrating because if you are looking for some kind of ultimate fulfillment or ultimate happiness, whatever you want to call it, or ultimately finding a complete and satisfying sense of self, if you're looking for that on that level of your form identity, you will never find it. That's everybody who reaches a certain age begins to realize, almost everybody, and sooner or later everybody, my life isn't working quite out the way it was supposed to work out.

What's happening? Something's gone wrong. And then you look, I need something to enhance this deficient sense of who I am, this deficient sense of self.

There's always an underlying, always some underlying discontent, always something, a sense of not having arrived yet, a sense of not being at, not really being at home where you are, not, not being comfortable in your own skin, as the expression goes, it's always something missing. And, and a few times you think I found it now it's there, whether it's a possession, you suddenly you buy something and for a few days or a few hours, it enhances your sense of self because you have superiority. This is a big thing about the egoic sense of self.

It always compares itself to others in, am I inferior or superior to this? Okay. I have, if I buy this, I'm superior because as you know, some people are addicted to shopping so they, you can buy an expensive designer thing and immediately it becomes a mental image.

It's incorporated into your sense of self. I'm wearing Prada. Well, I'm not, but I think the devil wears Prada.

Isn't that a movie? So for a moment, it gives you an enhanced sense of self, but it doesn't last too very long and then dissatisfaction creeps in again. And so you have the, the story of me is not that happy.

And for many people, now this is very important. Many people walk around with a very unhappy narrative and this unhappy narrative gives them their sense of self. So they are an unhappy person like walking around with a burden and they have a narrative.

If you talk to them, you say, what about your life? They might say, oh, let me tell you about my life. Oh, it started going wrong when I was two.

Dreadful childhood. Never had a chance after that. Then my wife, she, she was just completely betrayed me, complete betrayal.

Just everybody I've ever known, let me down. The universe is against me. And I now realize that the world is an awful place and my life is dreadful.

You don't realize that there's a narrative in your mind that is making you unhappy, but you believe you're so identified with this stream of thinking that that becomes you. So, so people walk around with an unhappy identity, not realizing that it is created by the storytelling in their minds. This is the story of me and it's an unhappy one.

Wow. That's quite a realization. But then of course, this is, could be the beginning of an awakening of consciousness when you realize, what is it that makes me so unhappy?

And then you need to kind of begin to wake up a little bit and you begin to wake up a little bit out of the complete identification with thinking. And this waking up a little bit out of the complete identification with thinking, we could call that the arising of awareness, or we could call it the arising of presence. And that is that deeper or higher could call it, but I call it deeper, the deeper dimension of consciousness that is not thought, that exists transcendent to thought activity.

So it begins when you have the suspicion, beginning suspicion that your unhappy self could possibly be a mental phantom. And you begin to see that the emotions that you continuously go through are actually not created to a large extent by circumstances, although it very certainly looks like it. But if you look more closely, the unhappy emotions that become your unhappy self are ultimately not created by the circumstances of your life, but are created by what this voice in the head has to say about the circumstances of your life.

It is the narrative in your mind ultimately that creates the unhappiness, the unhappy self. And that's an amazing realization. That happened to me one night when I was 29, I was very much identified with the unhappy self in my mind.

And then this thought arose, as I described briefly in the Power of Now at Interaction, I cannot live with myself any longer. And that's a wonderful point to reach, but also a dangerous point. Because if you cannot live with yourself any longer, you become so unhappy, so depressed, or so anxious that you experience your whole life as just a burden.

You become a burden to yourself. You experience yourself as this heaviness, this heavy burden. It's potentially the most wonderful place to reach and a very dangerous place.

The danger is that you commit suicide. But the potential is that you disidentify from the narrative in your mind, and suddenly something arises within you that is able to see this narrative that's been going on for years, to see it for what it is, a story that you're telling yourself. And it's the unhappy story of me.

Oh, now to see that, there needs to have been this awakening of awareness. Awareness is that space that the Buddha talks about that is the spaciousness, traditionally translated as emptiness, not a good translation, spaciousness, that Jesus talks about as the dimension of spaciousness, kingdom of heaven, which is within you. All teachings point to ultimately the arising of that consciousness that is unconditioned.

Because the conditioned consciousness is your thought processes. And all your thought processes are conditioned by the past. They are conditioned by your personal past, plus conditioned by the past of the collective in which you grew up.

They're conditioned by your surrounding culture. They're conditioned by certain religious beliefs. They're conditioned by political beliefs.

They're conditioned by even the language that you grow up with is already a form of conditioning. So that is all part of your form identity that everybody has. You have a past, and I have a past, and you can't deny that.

It has its place, and you have a future. Well, so-called. But of course, you don't really, because I don't know if you've noticed that the future doesn't actually exist.

Because if it did, you would have gotten there at some point. Now, for many people, the unhappy self in their mind often looks to the future, and it is a sword with two double-edged swords, or whatever the expression is. On the one hand, you look to future, which, what do you mean you look to the future?

What is it then if it doesn't exist? Well, obviously, the only way you can experience the future is by thinking about the future. So the future consists of thought.

It's the thought of future that creates future. On a practical level, I cannot deny that future is helpful. This is why we were able to meet here at a certain time on a certain day.

Otherwise, it would have been difficult. Just let's see. It probably would have taken several million years for us accidentally coming together here.

So obviously, on a practical level, it works, and it has to work. You need it. You can't live without future.

But on a deeper level, where you are, it's concerning your identity, concerning who you are, concerning what it is that really fulfills you in life. There is no future except as a thought form, obviously. And there is no past, even, because for anything to happen, it can only be now.

Happen and now, you can't separate them. Happen and past is not... Whatever happened to you in the past, it's paradoxical when one talks about it.

Obviously, when it happened, it was the now. And when you remember it, it's still the now. But what the now is, we will see.

The now is the essence of who you are. The now is that space of consciousness in which everything happens that is transcendent to everything but contains everything. And that is the essence of who you are.

And you cannot know that until you become dissatisfied with your life. You need to have some degree of dissatisfaction with your life is a necessary and wonderful thing. Because otherwise, you will never awaken spiritually.

As long as you have, let's say, what do people imagine? What would my best life be? I would have a trust fund.

Never have to worry about earning money so I can pursue all my wonderful interests. I can go anywhere, satisfy any desire immediately. And anything, I can have anybody because I can buy my trophy wife, a trophy husband.

I can have anything, private jet even, everything. And then that person, this trust fund person, first of all, would not be sitting here. He or she would be just absorbed in some drug or sensual pleasure and being moving towards unconsciousness, not being challenged by life whatsoever.

And then after a while, he or she would realize that the absence of challenges in everyday life becomes the greatest challenge. And huge unhappiness would overtake him or her after a few years because there's nothing to live for anymore. Then all the little challenges that normal human beings face become one big challenge of somebody who is becoming very, very unhappy.

And there's nowhere to look because normal people, they look to things, okay, when I get that, I'll be okay. When I get that, I'll be good. Nothing to look forward anymore.

I've had it. I've seen it all. Dreadful.

So that becomes the biggest challenge. No human being escapes the challenges of life. And this is a necessary part of living.

And this is what awakens you. The becoming frustrated with this level of what I call your form identity operates on a surface level of reality. I call this form identity the surface I.

This is the surface I, which is the personality, the historical person with its story. And it has its place. The surface I looks to the future for either great sum fulfillment, or it looks to the future in dread because the future is so threatening.

The future is always the two edged sword. It promises more fulfillment, or it represents the threat of loss. So the future is a very weird place to go to, and the ego doesn't know what to do with it, but it goes there all the time.

Okay. People look to the future for completion, a sense of self. Now the future is good for when you learn things on the level of your form identity, you need future even to learn to play the piano.

You need future. You can't learn the piano in one moment, even to make a cup of tea. You need future.

Anything you do, you learn another language. You learn, you have new experiences. You need future for all these things.

You need future, which doesn't exist, but it unfolds in time. These things unfold in time. That's where future comes in.

So you look, the ego looks to the future for fulfillment, but it never really comes because the future doesn't come. It's always the present moment. And it's always the ultimately dissatisfying present moment.

Sometimes giving the deceptive appearance that it is satisfying. I've fallen in love with this wonderful, wonderful person. Oh, and this law has a certain lifespan, that state of unconsciousness.

And then the strange paradoxical thing is as if there were some malevolent entity trying to sabotage your life, the very person that you fell in love that made you so happy for six months. Two or three years later, this person makes you dreadfully unhappy. It's called the divorce proceedings.

Or you live together, but hate each other. How could I ever have fallen in love with this jerk? Now I'm stuck.

And then you carry the narrative of this unhappy story, me. And everything you experience is seen through this veil of your conditioned mind. And of course, the future is terribly dangerous too, because although the ego doesn't want to admit it, the future obviously, eventually kills you.

So the ego feels drawn to the future for fulfillment, but deep down it knows actually, it's going to kill me. So not a pleasant place to be, but it's trapped in an egoic consciousness. And the egoic consciousness continuously is frustrated.

Always a sense of unease that is covered up often by smiles, or you can cover it up with taking alcohol or certain drugs that free you a little bit from this torture, daily torture of your mind. It slows down the mind. If you drink enough, the mind slows down and it's for a little while you feel liberated until you take three or four more, and then you become unconscious completely.

Of course, at least you're not thinking about your problems anymore. So it's a kind of liberation. And then this surface identity is then looking for some kind of solution on the surface level of reality.

And this is where the ego tries to satisfy itself, its sense of self. It does that by creating antagonism. The ego loves to be hostile towards people and situations because then it grows through that.

So whenever you have an argument with somebody, the need to be right arises and that requires the other person to be wrong. It's very unconscious.

Eckhart Tolle The Individual and Collective Pain Body [0721cb60-3021-4310-bdb9-9bd74ef0e64c]

[Speaker 1] (0:10 - 9:15)

Hello, everybody. Wonderful to share this moment with you, this moment. And perhaps we can start with the foundation for your entire life, which is always the present moment.

And that's also the foundation for manifestation. Manifesting things externally requires time, but the foundation for all manifestation is in the present moment and lies in the power of the present moment. So let's begin with acknowledging the present moment.

Now, you might think that's a normal thing to do, but it's not for most people. So acknowledging the present moment is to become aware of your sense perceptions at this moment, visual, let's bring up for a moment the people who are here with us, a number of human beings, many humans. I'm going to use the words in a strange way now, not many human beings, just many humans, but one being.

That's a incredible realization. It changes the way in which you perceive others, also changes the way in which you perceive yourself. You are human, the conditioned entity, the person which has a body, a name, a race, a gender, other things that make up the identity of the person, that's the human.

Beyond that, at a deeper level is the consciousness, not the conditioned consciousness, which is the mind and the emotional field, but the unconditioned, the light of consciousness that emanates from the source of all life and can be sensed or realized within here and now, only here in this moment. So in this moment, we see the humans, you yourself are one of them, I am one of them, and if you go deeply into the now, that is inseparable from going deeply within, beyond the conditioned entity. And if you go deep within, thinking subsides, but you stay conscious.

You continue to perceive this world. You perceive other so-called humans. You perceive yourself, your body, but you become aware of, one could say, that without which no perception would be possible.

What is it that makes it possible for you to perceive this world, including the humans that you see? That doesn't have an answer on a conceptual level, but only on an experiential level. For this world to be perceived, what is indispensable, an indispensable prerequisite is you.

You as the consciousness, without which you couldn't perceive anything. So you are both, on the one hand, you are the human, and at a deeper level, you are the being. Many humans, one being.

That's the amazing realization that takes you to sensing. As thinking subsides, awareness remains, presence remains, and you can't define it, it doesn't have an age or gender or race or anything. You just know that you are conscious.

It is indisputable. Not only are you conscious, you are consciousness. If you say, I am conscious, it's not entirely correct because there's a duality, there's I who has something that's consciousness, but I, the fundamental I and consciousness are one.

So I am conscious is a conventional way of putting it, but the truth is I am consciousness. You can even drop the consciousness, I am, and that is the deepest meditation, and that's the foundation for everything. If you lose that, if you don't know yourself as the being, if you only know yourself as the human, no manifestation will be of much use.

You might succeed here and there, but no manifestation will be of very much use, and the world is going to be very frustrating if you miss the foundation, which is inseparable from who you are in your essence, and that essentially is also the essence of what we call the now or the present moment, because the now or the present moment is actually the space for everything, and that is the, for lack of a better word, the unconditioned consciousness. So that's the foundation.

Once you know that, manifestation is a secondary thing that you, from time to time, practice or engaged in, but to put it differently, one could say that when you are in touch with that deeper dimension, then you are manifesting, even when you're not explicitly manifesting something specifically in this world, you manifest a different reality. So this manifestation is, sometimes you may want to manifest specifically, not in order to achieve something that will eventually bring you to some kind of ultimate fulfillment, because it won't, if you have missed the depth dimension, the being, but because that's part of being here in this world, because the universe delights in manifesting, in creating forms. So you might as well participate.

In fact, you're meant to participate in it, the process of creation, but be conscious in it. Otherwise there's a dream, that you live in a dream-like world, oftentimes into a nightmare. So you're manifesting, the reality that you manifest is different when you know yourself as a being, primarily, and then you can accept what you are, who you are as a human, and you accept other humans, humanness, which is always imperfect and limited, but your humanness is no longer a huge troublemaker, when you are connected with a depth dimension of who you are, the being that you are, the awareness. Then the human is no longer crazy.

Okay, let's go on to the first question.

[Speaker 2] (9:17 - 10:32)

It's nice to speak with you, and it's an honor to be here to ask my question. So the question I wrote a few weeks ago was about a human being who manifests as a person of color. So I self-identify as a woman of color.

So in spiritual teachings that use some of the language you use, that includes stories and thoughts, in quotation marks, cause suffering. When someone who identifies as a minority or person of color, and if you're in a predominantly white, middle-class spiritual community, that particular phrase can feel more like spiritually bypassing a human existence that includes race and gender. And so sometimes as a human, a body, I struggle with those phrases.

So I'm just, when I wrote to you, I was really desperate to understand how the teachings that come through you help with that experience of being a human body that has identified with a race and a gender, but also here's your teachings or the things that you can say, but not sure how to reconcile that in our communities that might not look like us. So that was my question.

[Speaker 1] (10:33 - 34:52)

Thank you, thank you. So bypassing, that's an interesting term that you used, and it is something that can easily happen. It can happen externally.

I'll give you one or two examples in a second. It can happen externally, it can happen internally. There's an external bypassing and an internal bypassing.

The external bypassing would be your encounter situation that is damaging, harmful. It could be that you are living with somebody who is abusive, just an example, and it continues, the behavior of that person continues towards you. And this example can stand for many other things, collective things, other things of a personal nature.

You continue to live with this person and you meditate. Instead of taking action in order to change the situation, now, in this particular example, it's not likely that you will change the abuser, but you can change the situation, for example, by removing yourself from that situation. That's one way.

But if you are so spiritual that you practice external spiritual bypassing, then you meditate, all you do is meditate every day and kind of denying that the person you are living with is deeply unconscious. And it's actually, the behavior is actually harmful. It might hurt you or kill you eventually, but you're not taking action because you believe that perhaps it's unspiritual to take action or whatever, you don't want to hurt him or whatever justification you may have for that.

A completely different thing would be, before I go on to talk about internal bypassing, if you were trapped in a prison cell with a person who is maybe abusive or extremely obnoxious, whatever it may be, and there's absolutely no way of getting out, then you would have to go into a state of complete surrender. And that is, there's nothing you can do unless there's something you can do, but in that moment, there's nothing you can do. There are certain situations where action is not possible, at least not right now.

Those situations require complete surrender, but many other situations can be changed by taking action. So bypassing is to avoid taking action for whatever reason the mind comes up with. And that is the external bypassing, but even more importantly than that, internal bypassing is not to acknowledge the emotions that you feel, to deny the emotions that you feel, that emotional pain, for example, not to look at emotional pain.

Spiritual people and religious people have been doing it for a very long time. The internal bypassing is to deny the reality of what you're feeling. Traditionally, if you're a religious person, you may deny certain destructive emotions, extreme anger within yourself.

You cannot admit to yourself that you are angry because it would conflict with a mental image that you have of who you are. Most people live through a mental image of who they are. And if there's an inner, an emotion, certain emotions that conflict with the mental image, the emotions are denied.

So that's internal bypassing. And you continue to be a highly spiritual person who does not have these painful emotions, but of course they will come out and you will be taken over by them periodically. That's how a person in the past, often who were unconscious, had this image.

And then they were very cruel to their spouses or their children and could not admit that the cruelty came from their anger, never acknowledged. So the trauma happens in many humans, both on a personal level and on a collective level. And the trauma can be of a personal kind and let something very bad happens to you.

Your pain is inflicted on you by other humans, often in childhood, but also later on us. And that leaves behind emotional pain. So you live with emotional pain.

This can be collective also. It could be the emotional pain of, it could be, there could be a racial foundation to the emotional pain. In other words, the collective of an entire race could, in their collective energy field, they could have the accumulation of pain that goes back centuries sometimes.

This I call, as you probably know, I call the pain body, which has a personal aspect, but things you experience in your personal life that leaves that pain, but also a collective aspect. Here we are talking about, relevant to your question, there is a, for obvious reasons, collective pain that is of a racial kind in the United States, because it all started with slavery, the fact of slavery, that leaves behind this energy field of pain that primarily black people have to recognize within themselves. Some have already transcended it, you can transcend it, but it's not fooling yourself and bypassing and saying you have transcended when you haven't.

So that is, it was also there in the Native American energy field, that they experience another kind of pain. It's, by the way, it's also there in entire nations in the world where huge suffering happened on a very large scale, such as Germany and Russia, enormous suffering, and that left behind a collective, remnant of collective pain in the entire energy field, and virtually every human who lives there has some share in that collective pain body. So then every human has partly a personal pain body and partly a collective pain body, and sometimes one is stronger than the other.

So it's very important to recognize that. Even white Americans, to some extent, share in that pain body. They have the collective pain body that is generated through the suffering because both the victim and the perpetrator have a share.

This is how the collective pain arises. So, but how do you deal with it? You have to deal with it.

Every individual has to deal with it within themselves. That's where it is recognized. To recognize that it's there, the more to recognize it directly so that, let's say it is, it could be anger.

It could be things that are related to anger. It could be resentment. It could even be rage, but at least this, that's fine as long as you recognize it within yourself for what it is, and then you can begin to use it and transmute it into awareness.

And that is why humans who have a strong pain body, whether it's personal or collective, actually, the strange thing is, are more likely to awaken spiritually than those who have a weaker pain body. So that's very important to recognize. If you don't recognize the accumulated suffering within yourself for what it is, then it becomes unconscious.

When it's unconscious, it can easily rise up into your mind and create certain thoughts. Then your thinking becomes controlled almost by the pain body, and then your thinking becomes emotionally controlled thinking, and it can no longer be rational. And you would then, the ego would be there without awareness.

The ego is there. The great danger is to any human who has suffered, who has a strong pain body, the danger is that you develop an image, which is a mental creation of yourself as a victim. And that is a pitfall.

It's a danger to be aware of any, whether it's a personal or collective, when you, there's a huge difference between recognizing the pain within yourself and realize, know what it is. If it's of a personal kind, you know that it's your dad who did that to you and that to you, and your unconscious parents or somebody else did this or that to you, and you recognize that it's there. If it's collective, you recognize that you not only carry suffering from your personal life, you also carry the suffering of your ancestors.

And there it is. If you don't recognize it, the suffering becomes incorporated into a mental image. Then your identity, which means your sense of self, becomes predominantly that of a victim.

And that's very dangerous. To not see yourself as a victim is not a denial that something bad happened to you. It's not transforming something bad that happened to you in the past, transforming it into an identity.

That's the trap, because then you completely, you become completely disempowered. But for the ego, the seductive thing is the ego likes it. The stronger, it is always looking for a strong sense of identity.

It's looking for a stronger, it always needs enemies. It needs the other. And so when you see us, it's very, to the ego, it's a wonderful thing to see itself as a victim.

It gives you a very strong ego identity. And that is the case with anybody who has a pain body. A great danger is that you see yourself as a victim.

This is not to deny that you actually, you or your ancestors were a victim of others. But does that become your identity in the present? The huge difference is to acknowledge that, yes, you or your aunt or your ancestors were victims.

Yes, an undeniable fact. The danger is, is that becoming the main part of your sense of self? That's where you would go astray.

And that's where, then you're not really, all the suffering of your ancestors would be in vain, one could say, because it has not brought you then to a point of consciousness. It has brought you to further unconsciousness. In Eastern terms, it's called perpetuating karma.

Because then you're a victim, then you have enemies. And of course, as a victim, you have the ego always wants to be superior to others. It seeks superiority, it lives on, it thrives on superiority.

Now, a victim has enormous superiority towards others. It's moral superiority, of course. So there's a lot of that these days in the energy field.

And that's the ego is manifest in that way. It's highly important for people to be aware of that. And to remember, we are not denying that people were victimized and even are victimized still.

On the one hand, that's a fact. Not denying what you feel in your energy field, but then realize that is what happened or that is to do with a human. That's how it is.

But not to derive your sense of who you are from it. So, highly important to be aware of that so that you don't perpetuate human unconsciousness so that you can use the suffering in your own life and the suffering of your ancestors so that the transmutation needs to happen in you. I know it's already happening in you.

I can see that. And perhaps you can help many others also to awaken to that. But you have to be very careful because when you question anything that is ego, the ego can easily hit back at you if you don't explain it carefully and point it out.

And if anybody who's not ready to hear it, you will get a reaction. If you question people's victim identity, you will get an enormous reaction. If they don't understand what you mean by that, because the ego will immediately defend itself, you will immediately become the enemy.

They haven't understood the difference between having been a victim or even to some extent still experiencing discrimination and so on, that those are facts. On the other hand, basing your sense of who you are on that, because then the opening into presence or awareness is then completely shut to you when you have a strong egoic identity, or in this case, victim identity, then awareness doesn't rise, which means the power that is there accessible to humans potentially, then you would have no access to it. But the ego feels enormously strengthened and satisfied in its, so that's a, it's a very subtle thing that needs to be recognized.

So that bypassing then is avoided by becoming aware of what it is that you're feeling so that there's an awareness and you allow yourself to feel and recognize it for what it is. It's accumulated emotional suffering from the past, personal as well as collective. And then as you recognize it, it cannot use your mind anymore and it doesn't become an identity, but it's acknowledged, but doesn't become an identity.

So you become, now what happens if you acknowledge the pain body within yourself, it means you're conscious of it, there it is. And a very subtle thing happens when you become conscious of it, there's this, suddenly you are not it anymore, you are the one who is conscious, you are the awareness for that, you are the space for it. Let's say, here's the accumulated pain and here's the awareness around it, you're aware of it.

And as you continue to be aware of it, whenever it arises, one could say that space around it grows, gets bigger. And that space is the space of awareness or presence. And that space is inseparable from who you are as a being.

What you are observing there is the human part, the conditioned, the suffering entity, the human. So you have the being and the human. And then this, as the, what I sometimes call it the light of consciousness, as the light of consciousness shines on it, it becomes transmuted into more consciousness.

So the suffering is like something that you put like a, I think in the power of now, I wrote about it. It's like a log you put into the fire and the fire, it becomes, whatever you put into the fire becomes fire, it consumes it. So the suffering is transmuted into awareness.

And that is part of the awakening. And that's a wonderful process. And all those who have achieved great things to bring mankind, humankind, a little bit further in the evolutionary process, which means awakening, none of these people had a victim identity.

You cannot make a useful contribution to this world if you have a victim identity. So also the great, let's look at the great black teachers who made a huge difference. Martin Luther King, when you read the writings, there is no victim identity there.

You look at Nelson Mandela in South Africa. Now he was for many, many years in prison. When he came out of prison, he was not the same person as the person who went into prison.

He went through a transformation in prison. And when in prison, he no longer had a victim identity. So he was, power was suddenly came through him.

And what he said was very wise. What he did was very wise. He also, I mean, he could have had enormous justification for making all white people into enemies, but he had already, he had transcended that.

And those are the people who can make a wonderful, the only people who can make a contribution to true change is not the people who demonize others or who make others into enemies, because that's always a sign of consciousness. Sometimes, yes, you have to defend yourself when you're being attacked. You have to defend yourself.

But to transform others into enemies is thereby strengthening your righteous, egoic victim identity is unconscious. So if anybody, you look at the Gandhi, how he brought about the independence of India. Again, not coming from a victim identity, they all had found that those humans were able to transcend that within themselves and then became enormous power came through them.

That is the teaching for, and that's the promise and the incredible opportunity in, let's say in America for black people to use the suffering and transmute it and it's been happening. And then experience the power that comes through and they can play an enormous part in the awakening of the country as a whole. There's enormous potential for the transmutation of all that into consciousness, enormous possibilities.

So this is a possibility that's opening up now as a growing awareness of race and so on in the United States, a growing awareness. So that is a possibility. It can go that way.

It can also go, can draw the country by further back into unconsciousness. It could be a regressive step too. It can go either way.

In the long term, even it's a regressive step in the most extreme scenario, it could lead to civil war or whatever. If that were to happen, even that in the long term would lead to an awakening, but it's long and painful. Or the awareness that's arising now could lead to a very positive change when increasing number of humans transcend the suffering within themselves, not by ignoring it, but by acknowledging it and not transforming it into an identity and then becoming aware of the power that lies within them.

So that's the promise and the possibility of the present age.

Eckhart Tolle The Joy of Being [d5920c0b-ce87-431d-bd94-7e5c1e7abceb]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:34)

The joy of being. In this episode, Eckhart talks to a live audience about discovering the joy of being. He says in any given moment we have the chance to remain open to life, align with what is, and experience a natural sense of peace and aliveness.

Eckhart helps us release past conditioning to experience ourselves and our lives with a fresh perspective and sense of vibrancy and delight.

[Speaker 1] (0:36 - 34:05)

The joy of being. My suggestion is that you don't actually try to find or look for the joy of being. Right now, let's just, let's forget about the joy and just focus on the being.

Otherwise, well, you'll be looking for happiness. And if you're looking for happiness, it's unlikely that you'll find it. And if you're looking for joy, equally unlikely.

Because looking for it implies it's not here, or you believe it's not here. So being, that's a strange thing. Could be, to some people, it's a very abstract term, like something you would read in existentialist philosophy or in some incomprehensible works by Jean-Paul Sartre or Heidegger.

But being is actually very easy to realize. And humans don't know, most of them, how easy it is or even that it exists. If I had to write a philosophical work, I won't, but I would probably call it, maybe it exists already, I don't know, but I would probably call it being and existence, or existence and being, not sure which.

Being and existence. Existence is whatever you perceive with your senses and also whatever arises in your outer or inner perception. Outer perception would involve the senses.

So you have all this beauty here. And if you are listening to this and you're not here because this is being streamed, I forgot to say hello to you. Even if you're sitting in a, well, we are in a room here, the landscape outside your place may not be spectacular.

That doesn't matter. Existence is whatever you perceive with your senses, seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, touching. And also whatever arises in your mind, a thought exists for a while until it doesn't exist.

An emotion exists for a while until it no longer exists. And then it exists again. The physical body exists for a while until it pops like a soap bubble and ceases to exist.

All the bodies in this room are destined sooner or later to pop like soap bubbles. And one day you're here, and the next day you're gone. Everybody's just waiting to pop.

That's existence. The body exists. Whatever you perceive exists.

Thoughts exist. Emotions exist. Ex, the exist comes from Latin.

So ex means out. Whatever stands out, which means whatever is manifested. To stand, exist, stand out.

So it manifests. And ultimately, of course, even all those things that you perceive with your senses, you perceive them in the inner space of your mind. So they all manifest in your mind, even your body.

You look at it, you touch it, and you have certain relationship with it, good or bad. All that manifests in your mind as thought, or in your mental emotional field as an emotion into thought. Look at my great body.

Oh, I'm so unhappy with my body. Those thoughts exist. Existence.

That's existence. To most people, their life consists of existence. That's the dimension.

One could say that's the so-called external dimension, that things exist there. And then there's the inner dimension, that things exist as thought and emotions, feelings. Ultimately, it's all inner.

Of course, in miracles, there's nothing outside of you. I have to think about that. And then there's another dimension to life that to most humans doesn't exist.

In fact, that dimension doesn't exist. But most humans are completely unaware of that dimension. And that is being.

Being does not stand out, does not exist. Now, being is a noun. Let's talk about rudimentary English grammar for a minute.

Being is a noun. The being. The verb is to be.

It's an irregular verb, which means the first person singular of to be, for some strange reason, is not IB. Although in German, you still have that form. Ich bin is related to the B of being, which means I am.

But in English, for some reason, it switched to I am. I don't know what am is. It's a strange sound.

Am. But it refers to being. So to become aware of being, you become aware of I am, because that's being.

Now, when we say become aware right now, here and now, that you exist, that's not quite correct. Because yes, of course, you can become aware that you exist, in which case you would become aware of your physical body. You become aware of your thoughts.

You become aware of your personal history, your historical person. You exist as an historical person in the realm of the mind. And then that means you become aware of yourself as existing.

But now we want something else. We are looking for the I am that does not exist. That is.

Is is the third person singular of that strange to be. Changes with each one. The second person is you are.

It's weird. It's all the same thing. The same verb.

To be. Am is are. Strange.

So is it possible to go deeper and instead of becoming aware of yourself as existing here as of what I sometimes call a form identity, physical and mental form identity, there's a physical form to who you are, the body. And there's a mental form to who you are, which is the mental image that you have of yourself that consists of conditioning from your so-called past. So there's certain mental accumulations, thought movements, narratives that you think about, repeat in your mind, compulsively for many people.

Think about compulsively about me and my life. And it's very problematic, of course. That's why I have to think a bit more about me and my life, because perhaps if I think enough about me and my life, perhaps at some point I will be able to solve the riddle and the problem of me.

Give me just a few more years and another thousand sleepless nights. And perhaps if I really think I can solve this problem and arrive at a place where I no longer regard myself or no longer derive my sense of identity from this problematic image, and when I no longer consider myself a problem that needs to be solved unconsciously, never at ease, always a slight sense of lack in the background and sometimes in the foreground, discontent in the background, always a sense of not having arrived yet, except for brief moments that always turn out to be illusory. No, oh, I have arrived.

I've made it. Little bit later, oh no, that wasn't it. So you cannot solve the problem of you by thinking, although there may be certain practical problems in your life that can be solved by applying focused thought, of course.

So instead of becoming aware that you exist as a physical visible form and as an invisible entity that is made up of mind and emotion, and that's a greater part of you is just that invisible entity made up of mind and emotion, can you become aware of a deeper dimension, not by becoming aware that you exist, but by becoming aware that you are. And it's not just playing with words. You become aware, not that I am such and such a person, such and such an age, such and such a gender and so on, but go a little deeper and become aware that you are the pure beingness of you without the addition of thought.

I am. And that is another way of putting it is to say that you become aware that you are conscious prior to any content that may arise in consciousness. And that content would be sensory perception, thoughts, and emotions prior to any content that arises in consciousness.

You're aware of that, which is prior to and underlies all content that may arise and then disappear and then something else arises and disappears. Prior to that, the very foundation, the very space, it's perhaps a good word to use, the space within which all that exists exists is the space of consciousness. It arises in consciousness and that's you.

What I'm talking about now, you cannot understand conceptually, even if you have three PhDs and a genius level IQ, in fact, might even be less likely that you'll understand. You cannot understand this conceptually. You can only understand it at a different level.

It's a different level of knowing, not conceptual. You have to abandon, to realize the I am, the beingness of you, the consciousness that you are. You need to be prepared temporarily to let go of all knowing, conceptual knowing, knowing through thought, through memory, through analysis, labeling, judgments, opinions.

And then, of course, what happens is you become suddenly very still. In that stillness, you're not moving towards sleep unless you're suffering. And some of you, I'm sure, are from severe jet lag right now.

So if somebody close to you is falling asleep, it does not mean that they are too unconscious to stay awake here. It probably means they're suffering from severe jet lag. So you can't understand it through thinking about it.

And the very thinking is the obstacle. The entire essence of our retreat, spiritual awakening, is this. I'm telling you now, in case you want to leave early, then at least you haven't wasted your time.

You go away with the secret of the universe. The entire essence of the retreat is this. For some of you, realize that the possibility exists, and it's not all that difficult, of accessing that state of consciousness that is the I am, that is the unconditioned consciousness, that is pure awareness or presence.

And for many of you, it already is operating in your life, perhaps not all the time. Perhaps you still occasionally get drawn into complete identification with the mind. And so then it becomes a deepening here.

And there may be some of you who are still puzzled right now and thinking, I don't understand when I can only say, neither do I. But that is the most vital thing in your entire existence here, which is a relatively short one, even if you live to a hundred, is to awaken to that. And it's not just you who is awakening, it's the universe is awakening through you.

Universal consciousness is awakening to that. And so there are two modalities or two dimensions. You exist as a person with your history, your past and your future, which all exist as thought, with your kind of identity, that is the identity of the historical person, that's a relatively fragile identity.

And then you are, the surface is, you exist here as a person, there's no doubt about that. And that I call sometimes the surface I, the pronoun I, when you use the word I, and it's a word that's used very frequently in the English language. Perhaps it's the word that is most frequently, I, I, I, usually refers to the surface self, the historical person.

In other languages, I is used a little less frequently because in many Latin based languages, it's built into the ending of the verb. You don't always have to say I in Spanish, for example, but you're still identified with a surface I. And then there's the deep I, and that is the most vital realization in your lifetime, is to realize that in addition to being a historical person and having this surface I, and more fundamentally, you are the deep I, that frees you from looking to the surface I for your ultimate sense of identity and never finding it and always being frustrated and always feeling there's something not right, there's something missing. And so how do you realize it? In the gap between two thoughts, for example, now, in which the historical person or the surface I momentarily subsides and disappears.

And what's left of you is not anything that you could talk about or even understand. All you know is there is a, there's an underlying sense of presence or beingness. It's still, but it's alive.

There's an alertness to it. And that, then you become aware of that dimension. But of course, that dimension is awareness, so it's not totally correct to say that you become aware of that dimension.

You become aware of awareness. You become aware that you are aware. That's what it is.

More and more in your life, your ordinary day-to-day life, you actually invite these moments of presence in so that you don't spend the whole day and every day in the stream of mind that drags you along. And so there's always that pull. Well, I need to think about this.

I need to deal with this. And there's no gap, never a gap, except when you begin to fall asleep, then you have a gap. Oh, you're moving.

You're falling below thought. That's liberating, kind of. And then you lose consciousness.

Consciousness withdraws. So you begin to realize your essence identity. Brief moments at first where you become present, which means thinking subsides, but you're not moving towards sleep.

You're alert. You just are. I am.

And then you realize that when this arises in your daily life, you begin to realize that what is called intelligence also exists in two dimensions. One is the intelligence of the thinking mind. This is the kind of thing that perhaps they measure with IQ tests.

But even that, even the intelligence of the thinking mind, IQ tests are only even a short aspect or fragment of that. That's the intelligence, the analytical intelligence, memory, being able to analyze, to think, accumulated knowledge, education. So that is one type of intelligence.

And to the world, the unawakened world, that's all there is to intelligence. What's your IQ? That determines everything.

I don't know what my IQ is. I think it's low because whenever I look at an IQ test, I think, what is this? And after a minute or two, I lose interest.

Why do I have to solve this puzzle? Now, what's not realized is that is intelligence. Yes, it operates, but it's relatively limited.

And it's not even creative. It can only memorize and analyze. And then there's another type of intelligence that is connected with the deep eye.

And that is non-conceptual intelligence. So there are two ways of knowing anything in this world. One is through conceptualization, judgments of the mind, and one is through pure awareness.

But the second type, which is the deeper, which is also the dimension where creativity arises in order to be able to think, to have any creative thoughts, anything new, no matter what it is, anything that's new, you need to have at least a little bit of access to the deeper level of non-conceptual. For example, two seconds of no thought. There are people who are creative who don't even know that this is how it happens.

Two seconds of no thought. And out of these two seconds of no thought, this creative new thought arises. And then they, for example, it could be even a simple thing like a stand-up comedian.

If he hasn't, some of the things they prepare, but they also interact with the audience sometimes. And then they suddenly something creative, they say creative. Any joke that you make, if it comes to you, suddenly it comes from, unless it's a stupid joke, it comes from some deeper place.

Anything you say that is, if you write a poem or whatever it is, a new way of putting words together that nobody's done before, a new way of looking at something, or suddenly all that comes from a moment of connectedness with, and then it disappears again. But here we want more than that. Our task is to be rooted in that dimension so that, and this is so important, the fact that you become more creative is a secondary thing.

It's an adding on. But more important is that as you're rooted in that deeper dimension of being, more and more you realize that your essential identity is not the historical person. So you no longer derive your sense of who you are from your personal history.

Victories, defeats, successes, failures, dreadful mistakes, wonderful things that you achieved and then they passed, relationships that worked and then didn't work, mistakes made, wonderful things happened, and now they're gone. That's where most people derive their sense of identity from. It's the me, the person, and that's what they defend.

They're always careful. You have to defend that mental self, that mind-made self. Not only defend it, you have to look for things to strengthen it.

What can I add to me, to the image of who I am? It could be a simple thing like a possession. If I buy this, as all the advertisers, people want to sell things, most of them work with your sense of identity.

They promise, again, an enhancement of your sense of identity by buying this particular product. Well, not all products, but many. So in a subtle way, they imply, even just simply putting good-looking people, they're using the product.

So they are not telling you that if you buy this product, unconsciously you will believe that you are somehow also associated with these good-looking people and you become one of them. You can be one of these great, these wonderful-looking people. They're using the product.

I'm going to use it too. And then you buy it. I remember it.

When I was in my early 20s, I was still smoking. And I always carefully looked on what brand am I going to buy that, well, I didn't consciously verbalize it in that way, that I want a brand that enhances my sense of self. And so I looked out for the best one and I looked at the ads.

And then for a while I chose, I don't know if it still exists. I stopped smoking a long, long, long time ago. I chose for my favorite brand became, I tried others for masculine image.

I tried Lucky Strike, but they made me feel sick. And then some other brands and finally a hit on Benson and Hedges. And it comes in a gold, the good packet it comes in looks like a gold bar.

Wow. So you buy it, you take off the cellophane, makes a sound, and then you pull it out and you light it. You are smoking Benson and Hedges.

And for a while that fed the ego until it didn't anymore. And then looked for something else. Then for a while I became an intellectual.

I added knowledge to myself. I could then be more knowledgeable than somebody else. So much better than having Benson and Hedges.

I can show you that I'm actually highly knowledgeable. Just ask me. So you identify with all kinds of things.

You identify with knowledge, you identify with possessions, you identify with anything, achievements, or you identify negatively with things. You failed so badly. And this image of being such a failure is in your mind.

And perhaps your parents were so stupid that they called you stupid, which happens to children. Any parents who call their young children stupid are obviously very stupid, to use a generic term. Unconscious might be more charitable.

And of course that can get stuck in a person's mind and becomes an image of who they are, of being part of the mind-made sense of self. Very hard to get rid of it. There are many people who carry their mother's or father's voice, although they might have passed away a long time ago.

The mother and father lives in your mind and still talks. Not good enough. I'm doing my best.

No, not good enough. You have a dialogue in your mind. It's all thought.

It all becomes part of your sense of self. Many people don't have a very happy sense of self, but the unhappy sense of self is equally egoic. Where do you derive it?

That is so important because that determines everything. Your sense of who you are determines how you relate to the world, how you relate to other human beings, how you perceive things. That's all to do with your sense of identity.

Identity after shelter and enough to eat. What's the most important thing that humans look for is identity. Even already children, they need an identity.

Youngsters, if they can't have anything, if they're not, have no recognized role in this world, then they go to gangs. They become, in a desperate search for identity, they become a gang member. And then that helps for a while until somebody shoots them and that's that.

And they kill people for their identity. And that's not uncommon. That happens.

One could talk about this for a long time, but this is the historical self that is the mind-made self that is a foundation for people's sense of who they are. The victim is a big one for many people. Of course, people did bad things to you.

Yes, probably. And sometimes very bad things, either to you or to your ancestors or to your family or your religious group or your political, whatever. And of course you have to, yes, undoubtedly, yes, terrible.

The question is, do you begin to derive your sense of who you are mainly from being a victim of certain other people or groups? Very seductive and dangerous because you get trapped in a fictitious sense of self that even prevents you from taking positive action. But because what action can you take?

Your life is effed up because of what these people did to you or to us. No point in doing anything now, but you can complain. And with every complaint, your sense of identity grows.

So you don't want to be trapped there on that level. Now, as the deep eye, you become aware of the deep eye, you become aware of awareness. Increasingly, your sense of who you are is derived from there.

And then your secondary identity is your historical identity and whatever it is in your mind, the story of your life. Of course, you remember it. And yes, you still have a sense of who you are in this world relative to others, but it's no longer the basis.

It's no longer the foundation for who you are. The need to add more things to enhance your sense of self goes away because that is no longer the foundation for your sense of self. The defensiveness goes away because you begin to realize that whatever you're defending is ultimately an illusion, an illusory self.

And the more you defend the illusory self, the more you are trapped in the illusory self. Even in a simple thing like a discussion, your point of view, somebody questions it. Somebody disagrees with it.

Somebody says, no, you're completely wrong. What do you mean? And then you notice an enormous influx of emotion, a threat.

You're being threatened. Your life is being threatened. It's the unconscious belief because your very sense of identity is being threatened.

When you're completely identified with mind and mental positions, that becomes who, this is who you are or think you are. Somebody questions it. They question your very life, your very sense of self.

And you become, of course, very defensive. And very quickly, the emotion comes and you get involved in a heated argument. And nobody's more unconscious than somebody involved in a heated argument.

There are people who, whenever they hear they're with somebody who expresses a very different opinion or opposite opinion from the one they hold, they go into emotional meltdown. It happens on the internet a lot. Somebody has a different opinion.

The internet is a wonderful thing where the false sense of self can continuously be enhanced and strengthened. All you have to do is sit on your keyboard and... So wonderful advance, you don't even have to go out anymore.

You can strengthen your ego in your room or your mother's basement.

[Speaker 2] (34:26 - 34:27)

Thank you for listening.

Eckhart Tolle The Kingdom of Heaven Is A State of Consciousness [7c665530-2c30-4661-9337-5f8952b4818b]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:56)

The kingdom of heaven is a state of consciousness. In this episode, Eckhart talks about how we define success. He asks, do we look to the world to determine that for us?

If yes, we may be heading down the wrong path because to a large extent, Eckhart says the world is insane. He explains money, property, prestige and power do not signify we've reached the pinnacle. He says for the people who strive to attain these things.

Many say after the initial high comes a very emotional low. Eckhart reveals the greatest source of riches is within. And the real indicator of success is our state of consciousness.

He asks, do we bring light to this world? In the Bible, Jesus described it as the kingdom of heaven. In present day terms, Eckhart explains the kingdom of heaven is a state of consciousness.

[Speaker 1] (0:59 - 53:22)

Thank you. Thank you. Wonderful to be here.

Thank you for waiting patiently. But in fact, most of you are enlightened or close to enlightenment. So you actually haven't been waiting for anything because you've given up waiting.

Waiting is part of the old state of consciousness. And you are all here because in you, there's something new arising. We could call it presence, a dimension of consciousness that is, one could say, deeper or higher than the thinking function, which is fine.

But in itself, in the absence of the transcendent dimension, which is presence, the thinking function can be pretty crazy, but it can also do wonderful things. It can be destructive and it can be wonderful, like fire, an enormous energy for the sun, the energy of the sun. It's life giving.

It can also kill you. And thinking can do the same. You can create through thought or you can destroy through thought.

Destroy your others and yourself and the planet through dysfunctional thinking. We may be talking about that, as you might have guessed. I have no plan as such for this evening.

In other words, I don't know what I am going to say exactly. And that's fine. Almost all of you are here because you are awakening or awakened.

Something is arising in you that is, as I said, deeper or higher than the thinking function. In some of you, it started as a slight shift in consciousness, perhaps an increasing ability to be more present, less absorbed in the voice in the head, less reactive in certain situations, more peaceful. Not all the time, perhaps, that's fine.

But you are here because you are awakening beings. And the context for our gathering is the awakening of human consciousness. There may be one or two here, possibly, that are not yet awakening, which means still very much identified with the continuous stream of thinking.

And this identification with the continuous stream of thinking we call that the egoic state of consciousness. That's how the ego arises through complete identification with thought. That is ego.

So there may be some of you who are here and still not, have not yet been able to step out of this complete identification with thinking and the emotions that go with thinking. The entire entity that makes up the personality in the absence of transcendence. And so, those few of you are probably here because a friend or family member said, you must come and listen to this guy.

You really need it. And I would like to suggest that they are probably right. So the question is whether this gathering here is going to make sense to you if you're not awakening yet.

It could be a revelation. You suddenly go, oh wow, oh yeah, something in you recognizes the truth. Or it could be that you find it increasingly irritating and ultimately unbearable to be sitting here.

And you start fidgeting and your mind goes, what's he talking about? I don't understand anything. He's been talking for 10 minutes and he hasn't said anything.

So the gathering is, and the context for this gathering, is the awakening of human consciousness, awakening. You awaken into presence, which is the, I sometimes call it, the transcendent state of consciousness. There are many other words you can use.

The portal into that state of consciousness is, of course, the now. The now that is usually overlooked by most people who are still trapped completely in their minds. The now that is most of the time devalued, ignored.

You want to get it out of the way as quickly as possible because you want to get to somewhere that's not the now. It's called the future, some future moment. In the meantime, at best, the now is a stepping stone towards the future moment that you're longing for.

Small scale or big scale? Small scale, it's an hour from now I need to be there waiting for this evening to do... Or big scale, next year when this happens, then I'll be just looking forward.

In the meantime, this moment is just an irritation. Shouldn't really be here. As I said, at best, a stepping stone to some future moment that is imagined as promising fulfillment in some way.

But somehow, you'd rather be there than here. That's the underlying. I'd rather be there than here.

That's a very strange thing. But it's quite normal, very normal. And then, of course, many other millions of humans, they don't just devalue the now or make it devalued into a stepping stone to the next moment and the next and the next.

Many other millions of humans live in continuously almost, and this is really, really weird and insane, they live in an antagonistic relationship with the present moment. Which means most of the time they don't like it. And they'd rather be somewhere else or rather be doing something else.

They're doing it now, but I don't really want to be doing this. When you're stressed, that's a sign that you don't really want to be doing it. You'd rather be at the end of it.

Stress means it's a tension between now and then. Tension between now and then is a mental projection. The now is this.

So it's a very dysfunctional state because after all, and one cannot emphasize this enough, the now is all there ever is. You cannot experience, feel, do, whatever, anything that's other than in the space of now. Everything is experienced in now.

This is potentially a life-transforming truth. If you can feel the reality of it rather than use it as a mental concept, because if it's just a mental concept then you start questioning it, of course, whether the now is really the most important thing. And then I go so far as to say past and future actually don't exist as such.

Now, the mind says, that's not true, I'm going to have dinner when I get home, so obviously it exists. Or it said, what do you mean the past doesn't exist? I was stuck in a traffic jam an hour ago and it exists.

Well, where and how does it exist? It exists as a thought. This is difficult to question.

When you start thinking about it you can't really find an answer. It sounds very strange, paradoxical. I could say, for example, we are going to be here for an hour and a half to two hours.

Who knows? It could be three, four, five, I don't know. We are going to be here for, let's say, one and a half to two hours.

True, on one level. But do you ever actually experience this gathering as one and a half or two hours? No.

Only when you start thinking about it. When you start thinking, how much longer is this person going to talk? Then you look at your, oh no, another hour to go.

You can always pretend that you urgently need to go to the bathroom. You will not be judged. Most of us are close to enlightenment, so we are not judging anybody.

So, the strange thing, nobody has ever experienced the future except as a thought in your mind. Isn't that strange? Because when it comes, it's now.

So, if we could realize the absolute importance of presence, of the now, the realization of that is not an intellectual thing. It's not an opinion or belief that you need to agree with or you disagree with it to actually experientially verify the truth of this statement that your entire life is inseparable from the present moment or from presence of the now. It unfolds in the space of now.

The rest is thought, memories of, one could say, previous nows. Because when whatever happened, it could only have happened in the now. And when you remember it, you remember it now.

So, outside of the now, nothing is, except as a thought form. We are talking about time because past and future are time. We cannot deny the reality of time on this level of existence, on this practical level of existence where we move from day to day, where we do things, we meet at a particular time.

We could not have met here without the help of time because if I had said, announced on the Internet, at some point in the now, we are going to meet, we are going to all come together in Oakland in the present moment. But since there is no time, I will not specify when. Now, if given unlimited time, perhaps within one or two billion years, we could accidentally have come together here, but that would not have worked very well.

So we use time, the existence of which you cannot deny on this level of existence. I call it the horizontal level. On this level, time is everywhere and it's all-consuming.

So when I talk about the transcendence of time, I'm talking about a different state of consciousness that we could call the vertical state as opposed to the horizontal state and the vertical state of consciousness is realized, for example, when the stream of thinking subsides for a moment and there's a gap. One thought has come to an end. The other thought has not arisen yet and there's a gap.

Was that it? Sesame? You don't mind?

Yeah. There is no was in it. There is no will be in it.

So the secret to the realization of the awakened state is to find the gap between thoughts, the cessation of the otherwise compulsive, involuntary, even obsessive movement of thought. Always somewhere else. And then, presence, suddenly you become aware of the now.

The vertical dimension opens up. The stream of thinking subsides. It doesn't matter for how long.

You don't need to measure it. But even to have a glimpse of the possibility of being conscious without the interference of thought, that is an amazing realization. Even if it's just three seconds, five seconds, don't count it.

Just the gap. Now, what is that? First, it seems to be just an absence.

An absence of thought. A kind of, some people might say, a blank state or something like that. But it's better not to attach labels to it, but to verify for yourself what that is and who or what you are, because most humans, when they're still unawakened, we call it unconscious, by the way.

The world is still full of unconscious humans. It doesn't mean they're all asleep. It means they are totally identified with the mind.

They derive their sense of self from the narratives. They continuously occur in the thinking mind. An entire story builds up over the years, starting in early childhood.

And this narrative in the mind, certain repetitive thought patterns, those become the core of the egoic state of consciousness, the personality. So that's what many people call it, my life. They refer to something they call my life.

And for most people, my life is problematic and not all that pleasant. When I look back on my life, there are many things that I should have done differently or shouldn't have happened or were done to me by other unconscious people. But I probably don't call them unconscious.

I call them horrible beings. Ex-husbands and ex-wives. Horrible, horrible.

And they did something to me. And there's a story. You remember that story.

You tell yourself and others. And you identify with all kinds of things in your life. Identifying means you derive your sense of self from them.

But all that is, these are mental representations of things. Let's say if your egoic sense of self is derived to a large extent, as it is for many people, derived from things that you possess. Maybe it means you possess more things than other people.

Then you derive your sense of self from things. Cars, houses, maybe private jets. And then your ego has that.

That's great. But what does it really mean? You identify with things, but it's not really the things.

It's the mental representation of the thing. Because you can only experience things in your consciousness. So even the car that you identify with is ultimately a thought form that you identify with.

So when people identify with possessions, it looks like external things, but the external things are represented in your mind as thought forms. So you're still identified with thought. No matter what you identify with, another very common identification that virtually everybody has, to some extent, is your physical body.

That's the most obvious thing that you derive your sense of self from, which means identify. So this is the physical body. And for many people, physical body is a more important source of their sense of self than possessions.

So it varies, or it's a mixture of things. But physical body obviously is important for most people. And identification with the body is always a form of ego.

In conventional terms, you think of ego as something that says, I am the greatest. And of course, that can also happen if your body is better looking than most other bodies. Most obviously, especially if you're young, the ego uses that in order to feed on that image.

It's ultimately, again, it's not the body. It's the mental image of body. Everything that you experience, you experience as a mental image.

Philosophers have discussed whether there's actually anything out there at all. Let's not go too far into that matrix. But it's undeniable that you experience everything as a mental image.

And even your body, you experience your body as a mental representation that you call my body. And then you mentally compare your body in order to use it in the service of your self-image. You have to compare it to others.

And then if you're lucky, your body is stronger or better looking than most other bodies. And then your ego uses that. It doesn't have to look so much for possessions.

We do like possessions too. But it can focus a lot on the superiority of a body that's stronger or better looking than others. The ego loves that.

But there are many people who don't have that because their body isn't stronger or better looking than others. And then you get the opposite. On the one hand, the body is a source of pride or the body is a source of shame.

The body is weaker, not as good looking as, you're not happy with it at all. And that becomes a source of suffering. And then you have a body image that is a negative kind.

It becomes a source of suffering. And for many people, there are probably more people for whom their body image creates suffering than for whom their body image creates pride. If your body is so great, then it's really, as you grow older and your sense of self was derived from body identification, there's a lot of suffering that's going to happen to you because the body is not going to last.

And gradually, it is attacked by something very dreadful. The dreadful disease, it's called time. And time is going to gradually do something to your body.

And if you were identified for the first 30 years of your life, for whatever years, with your body, then the body is no longer that great because it begins to develop imperfections. Time does that. So we cannot deny the existence of time on the horizontal level.

Time is not only, it's not only promises fulfillment on the level of the person. That's all fine, time. You need time to do things, everything.

You need time to even make a cup of tea. It takes time, time. And you look to time for some kind of liberation from a state of dissatisfaction in the present moment that you don't like.

So you look to time, one day I'm going to make it. One day I'm going to start living. And that's a weird idea that actually many people have, not perhaps consciously verbalized, but underlying that feeling, one day I'm going to start living.

And then finally you reach retirement. And you thought retirement was going to be it because you realized nothing much is happening. But retirement, then I'll be free.

No, you won't. You will still be trapped in your mind because the only freedom is the disidentification from the thinking mind. So identification with body leads to ultimately suffering.

Either you suffer even when you're young because your body is not as great as other people's or not as good looking. I had that when I was young. I wasn't happy with my body.

But what can you do? So I had an unhappy identification with the body. So I had to look for other things, for my ego.

Well, there was some ego in the dissatisfaction with the body. I have a body that's not great. Oh, I don't like it.

And then some people, I don't like myself. They're so identified. They call the body myself.

I don't like myself. But I looked then for other things, happier identifications. And eventually I found things like sexual pursuits.

I realized I'm not stronger than other people. I don't have more possessions than other people. I don't have more past identity in the sense of belonging to some aristocratic lineage family that goes back 500 years that I can say, I am the descendant of the Earl of so-and-so and my family goes back 600 years or 1,000 years and that gives you a wonderful sense of...

It's fiction in your mind. But it can sustain the ego. In some countries that is still important.

I lived in England for many years so that kind of thing still kind of exists not as much as before. But again, I was in England. I have nothing in my family past to be particularly proud of.

All I can remember is my grandmother but nothing beyond that. They have all disappeared into nothingness. My ancestors.

I didn't have pictures of my ancestors on my walls. Just one or two fading photographs. So that didn't work either.

But finally my ego found something. Intellectual pursuits. I was reading books and beginning to talk knowledgeably about things and finally I could identify with me as knowing more than other people as an intellectual.

And that provided some food for the ego for some years but the ego became increasingly unhappy even with that as it usually does. So the ego usually identifies the things you have, the things you can do or things you know but whatever you do it's not going to be satisfying for very long. In the case of body it could be satisfying for a few decades and then you suffer.

Unless you find something beyond that limited sense of self. Body identification, possessions all kinds of other things that are what other people think of you you take that on starting childhood your parents, what your parents tell you about yourself you absorb that what society tells you about who you are whether you are a success or failure again it's narratives in your mind that tell you something so what is a success in life how do you determine whether your life is a success or not are you looking to the world to tell you whether you are a success or not that's very misleading because to a large extent the world is insane and so if you're looking to the world to tell you whether your life is a success it's probably not correct because all the things that the world says are the marks of success are actually not and many of these people if not most of these people who have achieved the things that the world tells you are worth striving for fame, wealth, power all those things do not fulfill you for long in fact they can make you even more unhappy that's not it that is not it the only success is conscious whether you are conscious or not at least is consciousness emerging in or through you that's why you are here you are the bringer of consciousness into this dimension it's not your consciousness something that comes through you it wants to come through you you are not doing it you just have to allow it to come through you it's not a doing the awakening is something that is better it's better to define it as to allow the awakening to happen through you rather than to want to make it happen or regarding it as an achievement an achievement because that could happen the ego is very never and subtle as you awaken spiritually it can at any stage almost still come in through the back door and claim credit and it does that by creating another mental concept of who or what you are and it then says I am awakened I am I am enlightened me I have achieved it and you can see how it's a concept perhaps there has been some change in you but then the mind gets in there and misinterprets it and it claims credit me and so before you know it another conceptual identity has arisen in your mind and you are trapped in ego again and there are some people who are stuck somewhere on the trajectory of spiritual awakening they are trapped somewhere along the way and at that point the ego came in and at that point the ego claimed credit and a big spiritual ego developed but if you have enough discernment you can kind of see it somehow detect it usually they will tell you what's wrong with you immediately they'll tell you what you need to do I'm going to heal you now I'll heal you you know all the answers but it's very subtle you need to be very careful that you do not get trapped in another conceptual identity and again a conceptual identity is based on thought it's a narrative in your mind a story that you tell yourself and this is very subtle you begin to realize that there is a consciousness that is arising in you that is deeper or higher than the thinking mind and that's wonderful so need to be very alert that the thinking mind doesn't come in and says that's me so spiritual egos are sometimes more difficult to detect than the more obvious forms of ego the more obvious form of ego is the person who is driving his Ferrari and Ferrari is very noisy it's supposed to be noisy because it's supposed to draw attention to me so you drive the Ferrari it's red too it's red and a very noisy engine and you're looking around are they looking at me yes they are that is a very obvious ego and then let's say the Ferrari driver goes to some talks by Eckhart Tolle and then he suddenly realizes that he was completely identified with his possessions oh my god completely I was so unconscious and then he sells his Ferrari and he gets a bicycle and that sounds great so that's at least not making that much noise anymore or pollution too then suddenly this ex-Ferrari owner finds himself on the bicycle and then next to him some other Ferrari draws up and he says oh look at this unconscious person completely in his ego god whereas I am I have transcended all that so if you identified again with that you haven't transcended if you no longer have a mental conceptual image of me as being superior in some way to somebody to others the ego needs superiority even the most miserable ego is miserable because through its misery it achieves some kind of superiority it's an imagined superiority it's all imagined so even a very miserable ego will say for example I have been treated unfairly more unfairly than any other human by god the universe whatever been treated so unfairly that I'm more miserable than you I'm certainly more miserable than you you should just listen to me I'll tell you my story always my dad who had a big ego for a long time until he reached old age in his old age my dad's big tongues broke off his ego but other tongues didn't break off so whenever somebody said he was still trapped in his ego completely it would take for weeks and they don't even talk about it the ego needs superiority victim identity is something that needs to be mentioned here it's another form of ego I am not implying that certain people have not been treated well by other people in this world because the world is full of unconscious people unconscious people are very dysfunctional and they create suffering for themselves and others the world is full parents certain social groups many people have been treated well virtually everybody in some way or another has been treated badly by one person or group of people some much more than others there's no denying that you were a child there's no denying that you were a victim of a very deeply unconscious person the problem arises if your sense of identity continues to be derived from the mental image of you as the victim it's not that you deny that the bad things happen of course they happen you see it clearly but do you use your memory or the imprint of that and derive your sense of self from that this is what we call victim identity and it is a trap it is a terrible trap to find yourself in and it has its attraction because it can give you a very strong sense of self but it's ego too that also is a form of ego of egoic identity so there's a huge difference between recognizing that these things happened to you in the past but at the same time be present enough so that you are not forced to derive your identity from the idea of you as a victim which is a mental concept so that's very important now some people even who imagine themselves to be victims yes there are many who actually were victims in actuality but because it's such a wonderful source of ego enhancement victim identity you even come up with the ego can come up with fictional stories and call yourself a victim so be careful if there's anybody here who feels angry about what I've said then that's something for you to look at but I'm not a victim how dare you suggest that I haven't said that bad things did not necessarily happen to you it's your sense of self do you derive your sense of self from that and it's ego so conceptual identities transcending that conceptual identities they all operate on the horizontal dimension of life and obviously you continue to have some identification with your form I use the expression form identity your form identity is your body your function in this world you have a particular function social function in this world your form identity has to do with your relationships your form identity is here it's a psychological form of you the personality the conditioned personality the conditioning of your mind from the past so it's a physical form and psychological form everybody has one that's undeniable to some extent that continues you have a form identity but the question is is that all there is to who you are are you existing exclusively on that level which is the horizontal level or are you able to go deeper and discover a deeper identity or sense of self that is beyond the form the psychological forms and the physical forms that is I call that your essence identity so it is your most vital the most vital task in this lifetime for you is the discovery or we could say realization of your essence identity beyond the form identity the form identity then although it remains there is still some identification but it is not your main source of identity we begin to have somewhat detached even playful relationship with all the stuff in your life including your personality you are no longer trapped you still have a personality but there is something beyond that and you are rooted in that then the personality happens still on the surface level of your being it still does its things has certain idiosyncrasies and characteristics it's been conditioned by the past that's fine but there is something else the transcendent consciousness has arisen that is beyond the personality and that is the liberation from the personality this means liberation from the personality so the personality remains but there is no longer identification with it it's just things the way in which you operate in this world and the essence identity it arises out of the vertical dimension and the portal into the vertical dimension is always the present moment and the vertical dimension is there subsides conscious presence remains stream of thinking subsides conscious presence remains and this conscious presence may at first be perceived as just an absence of something this kind of nothing there sometimes a word that I use to point to it I use many different words to point to it but the point to that dimension is stillness stillness refers to an inner state silence externally is the absence of noise stillness is an internal state of absence of thought silence absence of noise stillness absence of mental noise which is thought and this is a great experiment if I invite you to come into the present moment and when you are fully in the present moment what does that even mean you might say some of you who are not yet quite awakening come into the present moment coming to the present moment is for most people it's initially a heightened awareness of the world around you through sensory perception so to come into the present moment is a stepping out of the stream of thinking and be more conscious of sensory perception so one could say you come to your senses there's a huge difference between being absorbed in the stream of thinking all your consciousness is continuously gobbled up by thought one thought after another and people walk through well there are many people in this world who are almost continuously in that mind absorbed self absorbed state they're not really here because they're always labeling what they're perceiving now some kind of judgment and usually it's negative more than positive because that feeds the ego much more if you dislike somebody it feeds the ego much more than liking somebody or remembering an unpleasant event that memory you can dwell on that for hours somebody was rude to you yesterday you can dwell on that for hours but if you saw a beautiful sunset yesterday it's unlikely that you would think about that for hours on end it was such a beautiful sunset but somebody was rude to you and you think okay I should have said that that would have been great and you can dwell on that and again and again play out alternative scenarios and feel more and more worked up about it emotionally and that imagine accumulation of that kind of that state of consciousness things accumulate over the years and then you have a personality that is predominantly unhappy a grievance looking for a cause and so you look at the whole of the world through the veil of your conditioned mind not there and then you come to your senses and you're suddenly in awareness and now you notice when you become aware of your surroundings through sensory perception you cannot really be aware of it fully if you're continuously interpreting what you're perceiving this is habitual for most people they have to attach labels to their sense perceptions they hear something I wonder what kind of a bird what does that sound like oh that's a nice flower I wonder what that's called I wish I had that in my garden I want to see where they sell these flowers that reminds me of the flower that last year somebody gave me oh isn't that beautiful it looks like a painting by so and so you're not really there's still a veil of continuous interpretation which is a conditioned mind for full sensory perception the thinking mind needs to step aside and then the two ingredients for sensory perception whether it's visual, auditory, tactile whatever the two ingredients are that which is being perceived and the awareness that makes the perception possible which is consciousness so when you look at a flower I'm mentioning natural things somehow easier with natural things but anything could be used for that, the entirety of this room for example there's this room and you're aware there's this man sitting on a chair talking, the lights and you're conscious you're aware of that but not labeling it you're aware and there's perception happening so you're not perceiving anymore as a person you're perceiving as consciousness as presence and that's an amazing shift to the ego it doesn't seem anything to do with that the thinking mind but it's an amazing shift it's very subtle but it's very important and quite profound when suddenly you're able to perceive without compulsive interpretation or labeling try it out in nature wherever you may be in nature look at a tree and look at it let go of thought if it wants to come in that you're not interested and then just sounds, hear sounds whatever sounds arise at night perhaps you're awake in bed and there's certain sounds it doesn't matter what don't label don't even differentiate between good and bad sounds that's just that is that's the beginning of being present for many people starts with heightened sensory perception so sensory perception can help you come into the present moment be present but then the next step one could say is very important when you perceive in that way and that's kind of innocent perception like it's a how a one year old child would perceive something because the child doesn't have the concepts yet to label things unless you become like little children you cannot enter the kingdom of heaven kingdom of heaven is a state of consciousness but you're not regressing to the pre conceptual state that a child is in the pre egoic state that a one year old is in you are arising above the egoic state you rise above the thinking child instead of being pre egoic and pre thought you are now post egoic or post thought but there are certain similarities in the pre and the post and in both cases the conceptual mind is not operating but in the post egoic post thought state the thinking mind can and will operate but it is no longer dysfunctional and it is no longer self serving you don't derive your sense of self it becomes just a tool through which consciousness can express itself as a tool it becomes a servant it's not a master anymore when you're trapped in it

Eckhart Tolle The Light of Being Shines Through Our Humanness [5ba9f1e3-e07d-4288-835c-0b2137969c9d]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:58)

The light of being shines through our humanness. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about bringing together the human and the being aspects of ourselves. He says we would be consigned to a miserable fate if all we were was human, trapped by a limited identity, there would be no possibility of self-transcendence.

Eckhart points out even big egos have little selves and their achievements, even if considerable, often make people so unhappy and don't help transform the world. Eckhart explains when the human and the being come together, the being shines through our humanness, reflecting the light of consciousness. He says the greatest miracle of all is that the universe is conscious and we are a part of that.

He quotes Alan Watts, the famous writer and spiritual teacher who said, you are a function universe is doing in the same way that a wave is a function of what the whole ocean is doing.

[Speaker 1] (1:01 - 26:00)

So when you bring together the human and the being, instead of just being a human, it's not enough being a human. It's a terrible fate if you only know yourself as a human. You have, in other words, zero self-transcendence.

You are trapped in this limited little self. And even the big egos, the little, little selves, there are some people who seem to have achieved much in this world only through having a huge ego. That is possible.

But the achievements are really not achievements at all because they make countless people unhappy. So there's no point in building up some huge enterprise. And while you're doing it, you're not only unhappy yourself, you make everybody else unhappy too.

That does not transform this world. So the human and the being coming together, then the being shines through the human. The light of being shines through the human.

And the light of being is the light of consciousness. Now, what is that? Nobody has been able to define consciousness because in order, a scientist trying to figure out what consciousness is, nobody has figured out what consciousness is because, and it's the greatest mystery in the universe, the greatest miracle and the greatest mystery in the universe is the fact that the universe is conscious.

How do you know that the universe is? Well, I'm conscious and I am the universe. I'm an aspect of the universe.

I haven't been put into this universe. I have come out of this universe. I am this universe.

This universe is conscious, but what is conscious? This light of consciousness. Now, scientists haven't found an answer because if you're trying to figure out what consciousness is, let's say it's a bit like you have a flashlight or torch, as it's called in England.

You have a flashlight and you're looking for the light of the flashlight. So you're using the torch or the flashlight and you're trying to find the light. You can never find it because you think the light is an object of your consciousness, but it's not.

You can only find the light by being aware that you are the light, but it's not an object in consciousness. It's consciousness without an object. So looking for yourself or looking for God is the same thing.

It's like using a flashlight and trying to find or understand this light. So you cannot know conceptually what consciousness is, but you can know it experientially as a realization, but that knowing is not conceptual knowing. Mainstream science still believes that consciousness is a by-product of the physical brain, but of course, that is a very limiting belief and there are many things that discrepancies that you come up with when you believe that the miracle of this world, even the miracle of human creation is produced by the chemical soup in your brain on the level of chemistry, or if you go more deeply, the atoms and molecules that make up your brain and what is the relationship between the brain and consciousness if consciousness is not the product of the physical brain. It is the same relationship as a television set and that which the television set transmits and shows you on the screen.

What the television set shows you on the screen is not produced by the television, but it's necessary for it to appear. It's a receiver. It gives form to something or it transforms form, electrical impulses.

It is a conduit that gives form to something that was formless before. So the human brain is like a receiver. It focalizes consciousness and by focalizing consciousness into this dimension, it creates this dimension.

You can ask yourself an interesting question. You can take any object. I'm sitting in a room here.

If you were not perceiving consciously these things that surround you here and now, what would there be without a conscious perceiver of these surroundings? The desk I'm sitting in front of here, the screen behind me, let's say without a conscious perceiver, would there still be a desk and the screen behind me and whatever else is in this room? Conventionally, you would say, yes, of course it would still be there.

There would still be a desk. What I see as this desk and as this screen and as this little tree, et cetera, what I perceive as solid physical objects, physicists, they have figured out and they are right. These things are actually molecules, atoms and molecules in continuous incessant motion with vast spaces in between, 99.99% empty space. My consciousness transforms this process of molecules, atoms and molecules in incessant rapid motion with 99.9% empty spaces in between to virtually nothing. This heavy desk is virtually nothing, just a few movements of molecules and empty spaces. It's a process.

But my perception transforms it, it creates the desk. Out of it, every moment, I create this desk. Remove the organ of perception, sight and touch, remove that, and then the consciousness that's behind the organ of perception, is there still a desk?

Of course not. At the most, there's molecules and atoms in motion, but there's no desk anymore. And this applies to the entire world.

The moment you perceive this world, you create it. And perhaps a different consciousness could create a very different world in the same space. And there would be different dimensions that can co-exist in the same space.

Your consciousness is inseparable from the world. You cannot have a world without consciousness. Your consciousness creates the world every moment.

It's amazing, quite amazing. So there are no, ultimately, there are only, the entire world is, there are processes that happen. The perception that there are physical, solid physical things in this world is an act of creation that's ultimately not true.

You're creating this dreamlike world through consciousness. And in this dream, there seems to be a solid object. Very solid.

My God. But it's not, it just seems to be. So everything is just an energy, fluctuating energy, that's the entire universe.

What you make of this fluctuating energy depends on the makeup of your consciousness. And here the brain comes in, the particular way the brain makes it possible for consciousness to create this particular world. And probably many other worlds can be created in different ways by different entities who have embodied different consciousness.

There are ultimately no separate objects in this world. Everything is an interconnected energy field. And that's why somebody said, I think it was Alan Watts said about humans, you are something that the whole universe is doing in the same way that the wave is something that the whole ocean is doing.

We say, oh, there's a wave. It doesn't have any separate existence. The wave in itself is nothing.

It's something that the ocean is doing. Like you, in yourself, you are nothing as a separate, you're not a separate entity. You are something that the whole universe is doing.

You are consciousness that has taken on temporarily this particular form and this particular brain and is creating this particular world. There's no ultimate reality to it. But all this comes back to the source, go back to the source, conscious connection with source.

So the consciousness that pervades this universe, that is this universe, it becomes focalized through this particular form, this consciousness that you can know in yourself consciously as a presence, and you are that presence, you don't have it, you don't have consciousness, you are consciousness. And even to say, I am conscious is not quite correct. I am consciousness is more correct.

So you are consciousness. Now, if the brain just is a transformer of consciousness, a receiver of consciousness, a channel of consciousness, where does this consciousness come from? Where does it emanate from?

The consciousness does not exist in this dimension. That's important, very important to realize. This dimension is the physical dimension.

The physical dimension is where your physical body is and the physical objects of the senses. Then underneath the physical begins already that which is not part of the physical dimension. And that already begins with your thoughts.

Even your thoughts are not part of this physical dimension anymore. They live in another, they exist in another dimension. And this is, you're going below the surface of, this is the surface world of physical things, and your physical body.

You go by being aware of your thoughts already not part of the physical dimension. They already exist in a deeper dimension. How do we know that?

Because you cannot find a thought in the physical realm. A surgeon could open your brain, looking for your thoughts. He would not be able to find a single thought.

Because we don't know, nobody knows what a thought is and where thought lives. Where does it live in you? Does every atom represent a thought?

Do some molecules represent the memory of what happened to you on that day when you were 10 years old and millions of other memories? Where do they live? All languages, apart from English, I know two other languages.

Well, they're getting a little rusty. But somewhere, those two languages that I know, they live somewhere. But where?

Where do they live? At the moment, I'm not conscious of them. Say something in German or Spanish, suddenly something would come.

I could say it, but where? Does this whole thing live? Emotion, you cannot find, emotion has certain, correlates with certain physical processes, just as thought does.

You can imagine something and then the body reacts to it. Imagine you're drinking lemon juice right now. Immediately saliva would start accumulating in your mouth because your body thinks it's real.

And if you get angry, your stomach lining, the inside will become red and many other things will happen in your body as you become angry. But the anger itself does not exist in the physical realm. Then you go further down and into the unseen.

So in other words, consciousness is not of this dimension. Consciousness represents another dimension, the transcendent dimension. So the consciousness that you are emanates from another dimension and comes then into this and an awakening happens.

My suggestion to you is to consider the possibility, this is my intuitive realization. I don't want to convince you that it is correct, but it is my intuitive realization. The consciousness emanates from the source of all life, which of course does not exist here.

It is, but it doesn't exist. Consciousness is the emanation of God. In the same way that light is the emanation of the sun, consciousness is the emanation of God into this dimension.

And it seems that gradually the light of consciousness increases in this dimension. Gradually. You can see it in yourself, how gradually you grow in consciousness.

You seem to grow in consciousness. And you are only a microcosm of the macrocosm. Whatever happens in you can tell you a lot about the universe.

If you could understand yourself, you understand the universe. So consciousness comes into this dimension more and more. Consciousness itself is timeless.

And then it enters this dimension where there is time. And there you experience it as an intensification of consciousness. You become more conscious.

A human can become more conscious. The entire planet gradually is becoming more conscious. If you go back millions and millions and millions of years, life on the planet was less conscious than it is now.

Even animal life and plant life was less developed, less differentiated, less complex. Gradually the world is being created still. The creation of the world is still happening.

The entire process, we have no idea why this is happening, what the purpose of it is. You cannot understand it conceptually. It's such a vast, vast process.

But all you need to know is what you sense in yourself as consciousness, the presence, emanates from the source of all life, which we can call God. So you are an emanation of God. And this is why sometimes this realization is called God realization.

God in you, God as you. Then the question arises, does that mean that you are God? Well, yes and no.

I wouldn't go so far because the ray of sunlight is an intrinsic part of the sun, undoubtedly. But if the ray of sunlight could speak and the ray of sunlight said, I am the sun. Well, in one sense, yes.

In another sense, no. The sun is, the power of the sun is so infinite. How can a ray of sunlight compare to, and yet it is one with the sun.

So there's a little paradox here. The essence of who you are is eternally connected to the essence of all life. You are an emanation of the one, appearing as many.

That's wonderful to realize that who you truly are, your home is there. You are that. The sense of being a disconnected fragment in this universe, in a hostile universe, that disappears.

That is a delusion. The delusion of the ego is that you are a disconnected fragment in a hostile universe. That's how egos perceive themselves.

And that illusion dissolves. As you become more rooted in that presence that you are, a very powerful sense of peace is there then always in the background of your life, because you have that sense of connectedness to the transcendent, to God, that sense of connectedness to God. That is the end of living in a state of fear, fear, anxiety, et cetera, et cetera.

That is the state of connectedness. Ah, that means you're already home. I always think that the famous ohm sound and the English word home are related.

It's not by accident that they are so similar. I am home. Home.

Home. Ah. So that is through self-transcendence, you realize the one self that you are an expression of.

And for many people, self-transcendence does not come until the dream of a separate self becomes unbearably difficult and painful. For many people, I'll repeat it, self-transcendence does not come until your so-called life gets very unpleasant and very difficult and you experience all kinds of loss and limitation. And then something can happen that suddenly when the self becomes very unsatisfying and limiting and painful, something opens up.

Then the self gives way and you transcend it and you realize the essence of who you are beyond the person, the being. But you don't have to wait for that. And many of you have already been through the painful, the experience of suffering, which is inseparable from considering yourself to be a separate entity.

Suffering. Suffering is that which leads you to awakening. That's a miracle.

Ultimately, suffering is transcended, but it is not transcended until the self is transcended, the limited egoic self. But until that happens, suffering is the most important thing in your life. The most indispensable thing in your life is suffering.

It's the way. Suffering is the way until it's not needed anymore, but it leads potentially to self-transcendence. When the self becomes too unpleasant, you can't stand it anymore.

The pain is too much. So when it happens in your life, welcome it. Suffering happens when loss happens on whatever level, loss of possessions, loss of status, loss of certain physical abilities, loss of loved ones.

That brings about a lot of suffering. Many other forms of suffering are only created by the human mind, like many forms of anxiety and fear created almost exclusively, but just by the mind. I teach suffering, said the Buddha.

I teach suffering. And the end of suffering. And the same message is symbolic form in Jesus on the cross is the archetypal image of suffering.

Jesus is the archetypal human, represents every human. And this is the image of ultimate suffering. This is a death on the cross and resurrection, self-transcendence.

That's a beautiful teaching contained in an image so people can intuitively understand it without having the ability to understand it conceptually. Even a very simple person could intuitively get this message.

Eckhart Tolle The Most Difficult People In Your Life Are Your Greatest Teachers [827bffff-8baf-4ecb-9587-a25269568c89]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:01)

The most difficult people in your life are your greatest teachers. In this episode, Eckhart says no one person can make us happy because the demand is not only too much, but also an impossible task. He explains falling in love may feel wonderful.

The honeymoon starts and everything is beautiful until the day comes when we discover our partner has issues or even worse, a very active pain body. He says we might panic thinking I made a terrible mistake. With his humor, Eckhart explains what's really happening is the relationship no longer masks the real problem, our underlying anxiety and disconnection.

He says as long as we look for gratification outside ourselves in people, places and things or what he calls a horizontal dimension, we will always feel like something is missing. He shares that the most difficult people in our lives can become our greatest teachers because they push us to awaken to step into the vertical or transcendent dimension.

[Speaker 1] (1:03 - 37:41)

You will be challenged by the things of the world and that could be other people. The most difficult people in your life are your teachers. When you suddenly realize the world is here to challenge me so that I awaken to the deeper dimension of who I am, then you can recognize that especially the difficult people in your life and the biggest challenges which could be of other kinds too.

There can be physical challenges, the body, there can be financial challenges, challenges of relationships, challenges of great loss, upheavals on a personal level, upheavals on a collective level that you are part of. We had this pandemic that affected millions and millions of people in different ways, some more severely than others, but challenged everybody and there are more challenges coming towards us. We are moving into turbulent waters collectively so in addition to your personal challenges we will have collective challenges.

The purpose is the world is here to awaken us and we awaken us by taking us out of our comfort zone because in your comfort zone which is fine when sometimes you have periods of in your life when you are in your comfort zone and enjoy it while it lasts, it's not going to last that long. I mean you have honeymoons and stuff like that, it's great and the first year or two may also be great and then you realize that your partner has a pain body. I married the wrong person.

Somebody wrote an article a few years ago and it might have been in the New York Times why you will marry the wrong person. You always marry the wrong person. Well the thought comes in I made a mistake and sometimes you did make a mistake that's possible.

I'm not denying that these mistakes do happen, but in every situation no human being can really make you happy. So all that these relationships do when they in the initial stages of falling in love and the initial stages they cover up the residual discontent that you live with when you only exist on the horizontal dimension of life. There's always in the background there's an anxiety, there's a discontent, there's a sense of something missing, something important missing and temporarily a relationship can cover that up.

I'm okay now. No you're not. And this is a wonderful realization.

The world is here to challenge you and it does that all the time. So you can verify in your own experience that that is true and that's how we awaken to the vertical dimension if you want to call it that symbolized one of the meanings of the cross which is a christian symbol but it already existed before even before christianity the symbol of the cross the intersection of the vertical and the horizontal dimension that is the path that is human destiny is to live in both dimensions here so that you can exist and function on this level here but are not trapped on this level. There is more to you. You're no longer acting as an egoic entity.

So the transcendence of the ego happens with the discovery with the realization of the vertical dimension when the experience a moment of pure presence thinking subsides and what remains is pure presence then there's not the ego isn't there without thinking the ego isn't there so you're free you've transcended the ego then it comes back usually now it does not mean that all thinking is ego thinking turns into ego in the complete absence of awareness when there's only the stream of thinking and you're not even aware of the kinds of thoughts you're thinking because you're so identified with every thought that there's no space beyond the movement of thought that is the unconscious state and that is the egoic state so you are in you are trapped in the stream of thinking and confuse it with who you are spiritually speaking you are completely unconscious in that state you are possessed by thought and you derive your sense of identity from that stream of thinking and it is always a problematic identity it makes life difficult for yourself and for others you become a problem to yourself and by becoming a problem to yourself you automatically become a problem to others around you and not only around you nowadays the problematic egos can spread their unconsciousness through technology into the world you just go on your thing and and thousands of people will respond and say yes yes you are right and before a very unconscious person couldn't do much he could stand you could what in london you could go to a hyper corner stand on a box and and shout and that's how i used to sometimes go there when i lived in london every sunday people at hyper corner speak this is old tradition i don't know if they still do it in a problem but nowadays they probably sit at home on their keyboard to reach many more people but no matter how crazy you are you will reach many people who will like your craziness and so the craziness spreads it's amplified through technology and that is the egoic state of consciousness that humans are trapped in when they're completely identified with the stream of thinking and then it often happens that certain thoughts can play the same role on the mental level as a virus plays on the physical level there are certain thoughts that can occupy your mind and proliferate and affect other thoughts so that your entire mind becomes possessed by one particular stream of thought one fixed idea for example you see if french idee fixe you have a fixed idea or some obsessive way of looking at the world it's the viral thoughts and become and you don't know it then you look at the world through these viral thoughts on an individual level this is easily recognized as a mental illness for example let's say paranoia or paranoid schizophrenia i had a family member who suffered from that and i was able to a long time ago was able to observe it how it gradually developed what it does to the mind that certain thoughts take over or take over your mind and this you have no immunity the immunity is the awareness of your thoughts without awareness you have no immunity against viral thoughts infectious thoughts that can possess your mind so this family member then developed certain thoughts about the world they were totally delusional that certain groups of people were continuously spying on her that all people who looked in a certain way were part of this group of people and there must have been according to this paranoid thought pattern there must have been several hundred people in this world in this city whose sole occupation was to spy to spy on her and to follow her not realizing the absurdity of those thoughts because being completely trapped in those thoughts and again it happens when there's not sufficient awareness to be aware of what kind of thoughts are arising in your mind the awareness is that there's a freedom complete identification with thought is ego ego and it's always dysfunctional and sometimes it's so dysfunctional it is then recognized as a mental illness but the dysfunction is always there when you're trapped in thought people say i think but most people don't think thinking happens to them so you need some awareness in order to even change your thinking to some extent awareness is required or to step out of thinking altogether even more awareness is required so you don't think thinking happens to you in the same way that your heart is beating you don't beat your heart your heart is doing it it's something that just happens by itself it seems so that's the movement of thought and then the great danger is the infection of the human mind by collective viral thoughts that can arise in the in a collective then millions of human minds are possessed and taken over by certain thoughts this for example happens when the entire collective is taken over by a certain ideology which is a way of looking at the world and you get disastrous regimes or an entire country you can get phenomena like national socialism you get phenomena like communism and i don't know if you're familiar with Mao Zedong what happened in china during the cultural revolution when millions of people got taken over by one type of thought for example Mao Zedong the thought was the world is divided into oppressor and oppressed Mao Zedong had learned that from reading western thinkers like Marx so the entire history of the world is interpreted through these this one thought oppressor and oppressed and the thought takes over their minds not realizing yes oppression oppressor and oppressed does exist and has existed but it's only one facet of a very complex way in which societies develop and exist there there are many other factors but these the ego identifies with one thought and once it has identified with one this thought grows and takes over your mind you can be very intelligent and it can happen to you intelligence does not mean that there's awareness there it can happen to a very intelligent person and the result of that was for example in under Mao Zedong in china just to give one example of millions of people being infected by one viral thought since he had interpreted society in that way yes there was a partial truth but that partial truth was very far from being the whole truth of how a society functions it is far more dangerous to elevate a partial truth which is a thought to the whole truth than a lie it's it's easier to recognize a lie thought is a complete lie it's easy to recognize but a partial truth pretending to be the whole truth is more difficult to recognize in the absence of awareness it cannot be recognized it just takes over your mind so Mao Zedong had to recognize that and said all the history of china was completely wrong it was all evil oppressor against the oppressed we need to do away with all the old things the old ideas the old habits the old things do away so they started to destroy temples buddhist temples taoist temples statues everything destroyed they they ripped flowers out of the parts because beauty was associated with the oppressors millions died massacres happened teachers and university professors were murdered by their steward to the thousands the worst probably the worst history and the worst period in chinese history so he had recognized yes absence of wisdom which comes through awareness he had recognized that there was something that was holding china back because china had fallen behind in technology and and science which had developed quickly in the west through industrial revolution and so on so he saw there were old patterns that people were still the partial truth but then the partial truth was assumed to be the whole truth and then you know the famous saying throwing out the baby with the bath water that's what he did it's a weird saying it means you want to get rid of what needs to be gotten rid of with the dirty bath water but the precious thing that's there the baby you don't want to throw that out uh so he destructed chinese highly developed civilization buddhism taoism confucianism highly developed spiritual civilization let's destroy it so millions died a period of complete collective insanity so this is um what can happen when viral thought infects the human mind and so we need to have immunity otherwise it could happen to you it can happen even more easily nowadays because everybody is connected to the to the internet and social media devices where things can spread much more quickly like real like like a virus mental viruses be careful with what whenever you interact be aware be aware of thoughts don't identify with the movement of thought and i can only tell you that because you're already at a point where you don't have to identify there are still millions of people when i say to them don't identify with thought they would think are you crazy what are you talking about identify with thought what the world needs therefore is not more knowledge in the convention in conventional terms the world does not need more knowledge it does not need more intelligence that's the iq kind of intelligence conceptual intelligence the world needs something deeper to be saved and we could call that wisdom wisdom arises from the non-conceptual intelligence that's where wisdom arises then we can we are able to use our minds without the mind becoming destructive and without the mind taking us over so it is vital for us now to develop wisdom and the wisdom is inseparable from awareness the awareness the presence that is non-conceptual knowing so that you have the two you are able to use concepts and thoughts but you are not used by concepts and thoughts that's the vital difference and it's an enormous difference you are not used anymore by thoughts because everything is energy every thought is a thought form in your consciousness it arises it's a little it's a little entity every thought is and it wants to grow in your mind says okay i'm not going anywhere and then you have another thought that says go away i don't want you all right it's all the that's thought these are thought forms that that in the absence of awareness they begin to use you they're like parasites psychic parasites in the absence of awareness thought can become have the function of a psychic parasite that just uses you to grow and then you and then then it can make you do crazy things and and you can induce the craziest beliefs that has nothing to do with reality anymore but it's the thought is that's how it is two and two is five i saw someone who was a few weeks ago who had a t-shirt said two plus two equals four and i was told when i asked him he said it's a revolutionary statement in other words in a crazy world reality is a revolutionary statement so the danger then being used by thought and then moving into complete irrationality complete craziness that creates havoc in your personal life if it's a personal thought or collectively happening to millions of people the only thing that provides immunity against that is awareness presence so that you can be you can know what's going on in your mind and you do not need to believe in every thought that comes into your head you can be there as the observer of your mind as the witness like a guardian you say oh yeah that's a weird thought so what happens then in a deeper sense the in the unconscious state there's complete identification of consciousness with thought thought is a form that consciousness takes so here you have the complete identification your consciousness is continuously being transformed into thoughts and then the awakening happens when there's a realization that you are not your thoughts you begin to realize that essentially you are the awareness behind your thoughts you are the consciousness so here the thoughts and then you there's a stepping back one could say you awaken there's a presence and here your thought and then from here the thoughts can be observed if they they still use consciousness but not all of it you reclaim consciousness from thought that is the process of evolution of human consciousness at this present time you need to reclaim consciousness from thought because conscience has been trapped in thought for a long long long time that has led to the development of the human ego content has been trapped in thought for a long time now you realize that it is possible to reclaim consciousness from thought and then you realize yes consciousness this is the I am the beingness the presence the vertical dimension and here's the thoughts that are happening in your mind again they are not separate because the thoughts still use consciousness but not all of it anymore they don't use all of it anymore some of it remains in its unconditioned state there it is so you have reclaimed you are reclaiming consciousness from thought that is the awakening then you begin to live in such a way that you're never completely trapped in the movement of thought again or perhaps initially it can still happen occasionally you revert back into it but then quickly you come back out of it again then you are conscious and you can use thought but no longer used by it and then thought is actually a good thing there's no longer self-seeking in thought you're not seeking yourself in thought but thought can be used as a wonderful tool for creating things it's very powerful but when there's complete identification it's egoic thought and then it still can create things but most of the things it creates are lead to suffering not good and there you have this is the arising of wisdom wisdom is when some of your consciousness is no longer trapped in thought and then thought can function beautifully and that is the arising of wisdom and that is what's happening to us here it's vitally important it's an enormous thing it's an enormous evolutionary step in human consciousness this this separation of thought and consciousness and again i'm not talking about a duality there's no duality because there's still only the one consciousness and some of it is transformed into thought and also sense perceptions and some of it is realized in its unconditioned state and there you are and that is also can be described as the balance between being and doing that is also another way of putting it the primordial doing is the doing of thinking that's thinking is a continuous doing so you're able to think this is the doing but you you're aware of being self-awareness being being and doing are in then in balance and that is of vital importance in your life you are here in order to go through this transition where being and doing we come into balance and that is an evolutionary step in human consciousness that is enormous and it's enormous that that awakening that's why we're here balance between being and doing not and now not everybody is totally balanced between being and doing nobody is you can't be well very few we are totally in the middle where you have you you're good at doing but yeah you never lose your rootedness in being i'm not perfectly balanced i must admit you might guess where i'm more in the being or doing as far as that that the spiritual teaching goes i'm good at doing if you can call it doing but that doing is in the service of being so i don't know if that counts so when doing is in the service of being i'm good at doing but otherwise i must admit i'm not that great at doing and many things in my daily life that should be i should be doing i don't do them because i'm i'm more in the being dimension than the doing dimension much much more but not i'm not totally incapable of doing not totally no no i can't and there may be others who are much more in the doing dimension they're always active creating something new without losing their connectedness with the being dimension so they still have this in the background they have this sense of connectedness with being and again there is a danger in this dance between being and doing there is a danger that you could go one extreme or the other and lose yourself again in doing most of the world that we know here is obviously lost in the doing dimension with no awareness of the other dimension so it would probably be easier for contemporary humans to get lost again even as you are awakening there is a danger as you go back into your daily life there's a danger that you could lose yourself again in the in the doing and everything you get completely uprooted again into reactive and anxious and stressed and what's the next thing i have to do now oh god i can't stand that could happen but then when you begin to suffer and then oh okay let's come back to the present moment and then the thought comes no i can't do it now but then you remember that you can because it's easy you're breathing no not now i don't have time and you do it anyway because you're not you're observing the thought that says you can't do it so awareness has returned you're observing the thought that tells you there's no point in being spiritual you've too much on your plate now and then you look at the thought okay there's this thought but it's not a correct thought it's a lie but that's fine it's thought does that sometimes oh and then of course another is you could lose yourself in being too that's possible i was there for a little while into early a long time ago almost lost in being not totally i could still get up and feed myself and even look for a job here and there during that time period i had weird temporary jobs here and there lasting a few days at a time so the being lost in being would be it can be very beautiful going to what's the point in doing anything at all the entire world is illusory anyway i have transcended all doing can you give me some food please the world challenges you it's not the way to completely deny the world the world has a function and an important purpose if you completely deny the world and there's a heavy price to pay to the and the world won't even allow you to do that it will challenge you and the charge could be hunger now i have to do something because we're we're not in india they're not feeding me they don't recognize that i'm a holy man they're not feeding me there's a real possibility if you were in india in totally immersed in being people would come and feed you because it is a long tradition of holy men and women who are completely immersed in being that is a tradition going back thousands of years they've always been there and many by the way pretend to be immersed in they just don't they just don't want to do any work but that's another that's another story but there are real ones and they are immersed in being and people come and offer food but go to new york or wherever won't happen they won't offer you any food probably not so the the dance between these two dimensions and again vitally important the disidentification from the stream of thinking reclaiming consciousness from the mind the thinking mind but the thinking mind there's still more than enough left for the thinking mind to operate and not only that the thinking mind is then can derive intelligence inspiration from the unconditioned consciousness the awareness and this can flow into thinking and transform the way in which the thinking mind functions it then functions in a more effective way sometimes called higher intelligence i don't like the word higher so much because then you have to go i prefer to call it deeper the deeper or greater intelligence can then the thinking mind can do inspired and inspiring and very creative things when you have there's the unconditioned consciousness and the thinking mind then the thinking mind can derive inspiration and creative power from the unconditioned conscious which is a much higher intelligence than the thinking mind itself the thinking mind is a borrowed intelligence from the they're not separate but just talking about as if it were they were separate it's a borrowed intelligence from unconditioned consciousness and that's how creativity can happen you can have creative thoughts you can have creative insights intuitions inspiration to suddenly you know what you want to do and it comes from there because you have now accessed the place where inspiration arises and wisdom to be able to think clearly without being taken over by one or two viral thoughts so to continue to have the ability to think clearly and rationally without your thought processes being infected by the ego the human ego so all this happens as this as the separation happens you become a more effective and powerful human being it affects even how you conduct your life on the horizontal level of existence it changes that also so incredibly important and amazing that we live in this age where this has become possible for fairly large numbers of people this shift in consciousness yes statistically or whatever speaking it's a still a small percentage of the totality of humanity but that doesn't matter it's it is happening and it coincides as these decisive transitional periods always coincide with moments of critical time periods dangerous and critical time periods that we live in collectively there they go together on a smaller scale in the 60s and 70s you know on a much smaller scale it was like a preliminary awakening it started in the united states especially california and it coincided with the craziness of the vietnam war so you had the two coming together there was a there's a movement of awakening that's where ram das started and suddenly wisdom teachings were coming in from the east there was a rediscovery of spirituality and so on those amazing times and then of course the ego reasserted itself after a while but there may be some of you left who were already part of that i was alive already at that time but i was too much of an outsider i wasn't even part of the outsider group of the hippies that were even i was so much outside i didn't fit in with any group so would have been nice to have been a hippie hippie for a while and hanging out i greet and salute all former hippies who are present here today you did a great job and you survived because the hippie movement went through some deterioration towards the end unfortunately maybe too many drugs i don't know but it had an important function it had an important function in the evolution of consciousness but what's happening now is even deeper although it may not be apparent on the surface especially if you watch mainstream sources of information then everything looks pretty bleak but that's that's not the whole story at all not at all

Eckhart Tolle The Most Fundamental Thing In Human Life [21ae89e2-d041-435a-ad10-e0d5aed59eb3]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:09)

The most fundamental thing in human life. In this podcast, Eckhart talks to a live audience in Arizona. He emphasizes the importance of stillness and says through stillness, we will reach the next step in human development, the evolution of our consciousness.

He explains that for thousands of years, we've been trapped in complete identification with the ego, a thought cluttered entity called me. We feel anxious and ill at ease in the world because we're cut off from our deeper spiritual roots. We may seek escape in alcohol, in drugs, food, sex and other addictions, but Eckhart says we cannot continue along this path.

Eckhart believes humanity has reached a crisis point. Not only are millions of people on the planet suffering the delusion of self-centeredness, the dysfunction of the ego is further amplified on a mass scale through technology. Eckhart says we must evolve beyond our current state of awareness through stillness.

He says transcending self-centered thought is the most fundamental thing in human life.

[Speaker 1] (1:12 - 39:58)

Welcome to a live event. Also welcome to other people joining us in different parts of the world. It's good to start with stillness and it's even better not to lose stillness even when speaking happens so that stillness remains in the background.

And when there's no speaking, stillness can be in the foreground. Another reason why it's good to start with stillness is that usually I haven't prepared anything and I don't know what to say. I don't know what to say.

Which could be a very uncomfortable thing if I thought that I needed to know what I'm going to say. If I'm comfortable, however, with not knowing what to say, it's quite a pleasant state. But it implies a trust, a trust in something deeper than the personal mind and the trust that the words will come from that deeper dimension out of the present moment.

So we are here to access or deepen that transcendent dimension of consciousness. It begins when the mind ceases to create thought if only for a moment and yet you haven't fallen asleep. I will make allowances for people who have only just got here from other parts of the planet and are suffering from jet lag.

The mind stops just for a moment, but there's no decrease in consciousness. In fact, there's an increase in consciousness. A certain alertness, a gentle, alert presence.

And one could say you sense that presence both within and without. Although ultimately, although I'm not going to go into that right now, I'll just throw it out there. Ultimately, there isn't within and without, there's only within.

It's all within. This entire space is within you. Now, let's try to work that out by thinking about it.

And of course, you'll notice the moment you start trying to figure it out by thinking about it, it's gone. So the essence of our retreat is no different from the essence of your life, your so-called life. There is no your life, we just use those words.

Until you awaken to this dimension or into this dimension, which we may call stillness, your mind is full of clutter. Some of it may be useful, a lot of it is useless. And a lot of it is actually harmful, destroys your happiness.

A lot of what goes on in your mind, the mind is full of clutter, the clutter of one thought after another, plus the emotions that reflect thoughts and also amplify the thoughts. Most people only know their whole life consists of that clutter of thought. Their entire sense of identity is derived from the clutter of thought, me.

Not a pleasant sense of identity. And everybody's looking, everybody feels in the background or sometimes in the foreground, a sense of insufficiency or dissatisfaction with who they are. No matter what they have achieved, there's always in the back of a sense of something missing, a dissatisfaction, an unease, sometimes more pronounced than it's not just unease, anxieties, heaviness of regrets and feelings of guilt and undoubtedly the person.

And if you derive your sense of identity from the continuous movement of thought, and then some kind of narrative emerges out of that continuous movement of thought and this narrative that emerges, the repetitive narrative that emerges out of this movement of thought, thoughts which consist of memories and so on, reactions to past events and so on. Out of this clutter emerges a more, a persistent, repetitive narrative. And this becomes the core of the person or personality, the narrative of me.

So people call it me and my life, my life. And of course, I don't know any life that's not problematic. You're not the only one.

That can may come as a surprise if you spend a lot of time on Facebook because everybody else's life seems to be so perfect. They even look perfect. Through the infinite power of technology, they all look perfect.

Even I, they did it to me a few times. Even I can look perfect. If you apply the right filters.

But every person is a problem, a walking problem. Seeking for a solution. But of course, as every therapist knows, there is an identification with the mind-created entity, the self, the problematic self.

Yes, I want to be free of it, but also there's a feeling that's me. I don't want to let go of that. It's an unconscious reluctance to let go of this thing that is so problematic that is me.

And then when moments arrive when you, there's a possibility of transcendence appears suddenly on the horizon, so to speak, and immediately say, oh no, I don't want to go there. I want to hang on to this because what is too uncertain. I don't want to step into the unknown.

I'd rather be with my problematic self. And so every therapist has experienced that many times that people, there's a point where people don't want to, they want to hang on to that problematic identity. And then, okay, then you suffer a bit more.

And perhaps a few years pass, and then perhaps you just can't stand it anymore. And then finally there's a readiness. Now, since we are talking about the clutter of thought, this may be a good moment to just introduce very briefly a few things that may be helpful while you're here.

It's mostly about things that I recommend that you refrain from doing rather than recommend that you do something. First of all, there's a television in your room. Please don't turn it on because the moment you turn it on, it amplifies and adds to the clutter of your mind.

It is very unlikely that you will miss anything important. It's very unlikely. Okay, it's a recommendation.

There's no built-in camera in your room just to control that you actually don't. Now, the next recommendation may be a little bit more problematic for some people. Because of the addictive nature of this thing you hold in your hand, my recommendation is to use it as little as possible while you're here and only use it if there's a specific purpose.

Perhaps there is an important message, but not to randomly go there as that's very normal. Whenever there's a moment of you're waiting for something, automatically the hand goes into your pocket or your handbag. Everybody seems to be doing that and you get that thing out.

You don't know why, but everybody else is doing it. And then it appears that you're engaged in some important activity. And you feel that it's clutter.

What it prevents is the arising of even the slightest glimpse of inner spaciousness. At least before the clever human mind invented these things, when you were waiting for something, there was nothing to do. And you just had to stand or sit there, unless that's, well, if you were in a waiting room somewhere they had magazines.

But in other cases, you were waiting somewhere, there wasn't much to do if you didn't have any book or magazine. And so you were just left with yourself. And there was a possibility of at least having a glimpse of briefly emerging out of this sea of thought and briefly coming into the present moment.

And you go, oh. That happens very rarely though, because the moment you stop, you get this thing out. So it's addictive.

My recommendation is then to, if you can, not use it at all while you're here. It's not that long. But if you have to, once a day or twice a day, if you have to check it, okay.

Therefore, because we are here in order to access, this is another way of putting it, we called it stillness, to access the dimension of inner spaciousness, which is an enormous step forward in the evolution of human consciousness, the transcendent dimension. This is why we're here. So it's good to refrain from doing things that prevent that.

Another thing that is to be recommended is not to indulge in the consumption of substances. Okay, if you cannot enjoy your dinner without a glass of wine, that's fine. But if you know yourself and you know that if you drink one glass of wine, your determination to only drink one glass of wine after you're finished drinking that one glass of wine, the original determination to only have one glass of wine goes out of the window.

And then it's in a second and a third and a fourth. Alcohol can lower your consciousness and prevent the rising of presence. Although I myself enjoy a glass of wine occasionally or a nice cool beer in this hot weather is actually quite nice.

But beyond that, you have to be careful, especially if you know yourself. If you can refrain altogether, that's great. While you're here.

Okay, and one last thing, not to indulge in excessive intake of food, especially before our sessions. So eat in moderation. So these are just some very basic practical, but they are important.

Oh, another one is wear a hat if you go out during the daytime. And because through excessive heat, you could suddenly become unconscious, not just in a spiritual sense. And oh, and now I will add something else to this.

And this is a wonderful spiritual practice, especially while you're here and you might even want to extend it when you leave here, you might want to also practice that in your daily life. Self-observation is very important, which requires some awareness and awareness is presence. And presence is the dimension of stillness that arises.

Awareness, stillness, presence, it's all different pointers pointing to the one reality. So a certain amount of awareness is needed for self-observation. Self-observation means to know what's going on in your mind and in your emotional field, rather than being what's going on in your mind and your emotional field.

Rather than being the thought and the emotion that takes a hold of you, being able to be the presence behind it, whether it's anxiety, anger, whatever it may be, be the presence behind the emotion rather than being totally in the grip of the emotion or the narrative, the story that you're telling yourself in any particular moment. And so my recommendation is that while you're here, to be so aligned with the present moment that you don't complain about it. Of course, if there's something wrong, really wrong, not just in your mind, if something is wrong and you need to tell somebody about it because this person may be able to rectify it, it's not complaining, it's you're conveying information.

But I'm talking about one of the favorite activities of the ego for many, many people, but they don't even know it, is to argue, continuously argue with reality, with what is. Some people are so deeply trapped in this mind pattern that they could be described as grievances, looking for a cause and of course, easy to find. So if you refrain from complaining internally, first of all, you become more aligned with the present moment, the isness of whatever is.

And the mind might say, it's so hot here, why, I just can't stand it anymore. I can't stand, it's awful. How can we do a retreat here in this heat?

Don't you agree? The more people you can talk to, the better about it. And if you're lucky, you find one or two that totally agree and then the thing gets amplified.

Right? Now, of course, there's always something wrong wherever you go. You will find certain things that are not right according to what the mind expects.

Only in your imagination could you think of a retreat place where there's absolutely nothing wrong, nothing. Everything is perfect for your spiritual practice. 100% perfect.

Even if that existed, it would not be very helpful. The strange thing is the potential for spiritual awakening arises the moment something goes wrong. Of course, it's not wrong at all, but it's just a mental interpretation.

This shouldn't be happening, but it is, but it shouldn't. They shouldn't do that, but they do. They should have done that, but they didn't.

But you can have continuous narratives running through your mind of that kind. And the more you can argue with reality, the stronger the egoic sense of self, the delusion, the delusional self, the fiction, the fictional entity, the stronger it gets. So the letting go of any kind of complaining, unless something can be done and you talk to somebody about it, and again, then not in a complaining way, but in a factual way, that's already a huge shift.

And then continuous self-observation is part of that also. What are the thoughts that go through your mind? And be the awareness of what is happening in your emotional field.

Are you, as you're sitting here, are you carrying something in your emotional field that is a residue of something that happened an hour ago, this morning, or while you were traveling here, yesterday? Some imaginary situation your mind is creating, and the emotion reflects that as if it were reality. And again, without the awareness, it takes you over.

You don't need to get rid of anything. You don't need to get rid of the emotion. Without the awareness, you don't have an emotion.

The emotion has you. And the emotion is an energy form, an energy field. A thought is an energy formation.

Everything is energy, and this is emotion and thought are non-physical energy formations. So the thought then has you. You don't have it.

You're not even there. You are, spiritually speaking, asleep, and you're being run by the mental-emotional conditioning. The mental-emotional conditioning says, I, and it refers to all that stuff, that accumulated stuff.

I, everybody says I continuously. Everybody's favorite pronoun is I. And what they refer to usually is that entity.

The problematic entity, the ego. That's the word, the egoic self, I. There's a deeper I that is not the egoic self.

And that deeper I, this is why we're here, to access that, to deepen that. Most of you already have access to it, but it may periodically become obscured. In this world, not surprisingly, when things go wrong, that's a moment of becoming more conscious.

It's every, even the smallest things. If you don't react out of the conditioning, the mental-emotional conditioning, but be the awareness, and then, oh, and you observe. If emotions arise, you are there, and you can say, oh, there's the anxiety again.
