Eckhart Tolle A Peace That Surpasses All Understanding [e965a134-ce0a-4137-ae5f-74ff87177557]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 1:00)

A piece that surpasses all understanding. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about the deep eye and the surface eye, two ideas he uses to teach spiritual development. He says the surface eye is our personality and is connected to the horizontal dimension, the realm of our everyday lives.

And he explains when things start to break down, we see how unstable life can be, that all that looks solid one day can begin to crumble, like losing a job, going through a divorce, getting older, or losing a loved one. Eckhart says in those moments, our lives are suddenly full of loss and suffering. He explains why this is the perfect opportunity to get in touch with the aspect of ourselves that he calls the deep eye or the vertical dimension.

He says life's crises are meant to push us towards transcendence, where he says we will find a peace that surpasses all understanding.

I mentioned earlier the term the deep eye contrasting with the surface eye, the surface eye, the deep eye. The deep eye is what in traditional Hindu teachings, we call the self or the Atman. And what in Buddhist teachings is called spaciousness, the no self, basically, it's called the no self.

So that can lead to confusion. One tradition called it the self, and the other called it the no self. But the self, of course, is different, it's not the surface self.

The surface self in itself is not the ego necessarily, only in the absence of awareness of the deep eye, which is the awareness, the surface eye becomes the ego, because in consciousness identifies with the surface eye, then through this complete identification, it becomes the ego. When you realize the deep eye, the surface eye is still there. But it's no longer egoic.

So there's no longer identification with it. Although for many humans for quite a while, they go back and forth between reverting to identification, the loss of awareness of the deep eye, which is loss of awareness. But basically, important thing to realize is there are, one could say there are two of you, not in ultimate terms.

But only in the same way that there's the ripple and there's the ocean. So the ripple exists on the surface of the ocean. In that sense, there's two.

But of course, ultimately, there's not two because ripple and ocean are one. So one could also say the surface eye, which is a conditioned mind, the mental emotional entity conditioned by the past, the surface eye is a personality. That is what people refer to usually when they use the pronoun I, me and my story.

And there's two of you, there's also you as the transcendent consciousness. And that discovery is wonderful. And that can then be in the background of your life at all times, if it's possible, sometimes perhaps very much in the background, and then more in the foreground, fluctuations, but it's always there.

Awareness remains. I am, you see, that realization that refers to the deep eye, not to the egoic eye. Ramana Maharshi, the great Indian sage and spiritual teacher, he said that the best definition of God that he had come across anywhere, and he was a teacher obviously of Hinduism, the particular branch of Advaita Vedanta, the teaching of non-duality.

And he said the best definition in words or concepts that he had come across anywhere appeared in the Bible, in the Old Testament, with God's self-definition of I am that I am. It can be translated slightly differently too. My favorite one would be I am the I am.

Moses in the book of Exodus in the Old Testament meets God, whatever that means, and asks, who are you? And the answer is, oh, what's your name? Who are you?

And the answer is, I am the I am. And then he said, Moses said something like so, but he was on top of the mountain, whether it could be a metaphorical mountain or an actual mountain. And he said, what shall I tell my people when I go down to them?

What shall I tell them? Who sent me to them? And God says, tell them the I am sent you.

And then we have a very interesting and profound references to the I am also in the New Testament, more particularly the Gospel of John. For example, the profound statement of Jesus, before Abraham was, I am. In other words, I am is timeless.

He's not saying I'm older than Abraham, or I was already before Abraham, I was already there. No, there is no past in the I am, and there is no future. Before Abraham was, I am.

The innermost identity, that which is beyond form, but is indwelling, so to speak, in the form. It's the space at the center of your being. And then we have another interesting statement, I believe, again, in the Gospel of John, I am the way, the truth, and the life.

I am is the only way. In my view, you may not agree, but that's okay. There's only one very small word missing.

Maybe it got lost in translation. I am the way, the truth, and the life. The little word missing would be is.

I am is. The way, the truth, and the life. So I am is the realization of who you are prior to anything else, nothing beyond the form as which you appear.

And it's a sensing within, particularly it's accessible when the mind stops, because that obscures it. And it's the remaining awareness. And in that awareness, you know that you are.

In other words, I am. But that's all you know, but that's very profound. It's not knowing in the conceptual sense.

It's a direct knowing. That's the source of all knowing. It connects you with that which is not part of this dimension.

It's transcendent to this dimension. So you are a multidimensional being. Even your thoughts and emotions already exist in a non-physical dimension.

Yes, there are reflections of them. There's a correlation between thoughts and emotions and the physical form. But in themselves, thoughts and emotions, you cannot find them in the realm of physicality, no matter how hard you look.

Where is he? Let's cut open his brain. Where are the emotions?

So even there already, the level of mind is already not this dimension. And then it goes deeper. So the personal still persists even beyond the physical form.

So let's just imagine it's a sphere and you exist on the surface. Exist means stand out. So you stand on the surface.

And just underneath the surface is the thoughts and emotions and there's the unconscious stuff that's happening in you. And then in that sense, you as a personality kind of continues even there. And if you choose to believe in reincarnation, that part that is still the personality unaware of ultimately a deluded form of delusion, a dream entity, it still continues to exist.

The dream self is still a surface self, although it's a little bit below the surface. It continues to exist and seeks another life to experience further thirst for sensory experience. And even the need to suffer and have drama.

And eventually at some point, there is an awakening. And the awakening is you realize the depths of you because who you are goes to the very center. And let's use this analogy of the sphere.

The depths of who you are, your identity, your deep eye goes very deep. It's not in space and time. It's trans-dimensional.

It goes to the very center of the sphere. That's where your essence identity originates and is. And that is one with the essence of the universe too.

So it's the realization of the center of it all. So one could say, yes, reincarnation exists. But ultimately, it's just a continuation of the same dream that you're dreaming now.

In the absence of awakening. In that sense, it's an illusion. And it exists as a kind of illusion.

And even this existence here is somewhat illusory. But as you begin to awaken, lucid living happens. Not lucid dreaming, lucid living.

Because this is a bit like we've been speaking about it. And as awareness comes in, there's another dimension that you can stand back and observe. But not only observe through awareness.

Awareness can also flow into the mind and use it as an instrument in this dimension. But it originates in another dimension. That may sound a little complicated, but it's not at all.

Only when you start to think about it. One of the favorite questions of the human mind is why. So but why is this happening?

And then if you give an answer to that, there will be another why. And another. And another.

But the true answer is we don't know why. You can glimpse, have glimpses of it, but it's beyond conceptualization. Impossible to understand through the intellect, the human mind, completely impossible.

And of course, if the I am is refers to the being of you, the being of you. To be and I am is the same word, basically, for some weird reason. It's the first person singular and the others are all different from the infinitive.

With most other words, you have to speak is the infinitive. I speak is the first person singular. But to be is the infinitive and I am is the first person singular of the word to be.

So it's about being. The being of you. I don't know why we don't say I be.

It really should be I be. That perhaps still persists in German, where the I am is Ich bin, the bin, B-I-N, is probably etymologically related to the word be, to be. The being of you.

So there is being, which is found in the vertical dimension, the depth of you. And there is the existence, which is the horizontal dimension, where things exist. Ex means out.

They are manifested in this physical dimension. They stand out, exist. In that sense, of course, one could say that God does not exist, because that would imply if God exists, God would have be manifested in space and time somewhere.

Where is God? Traditionally, people point that way. So for hundreds of years, they've always looked upwards, looking for God there.

And then we learned a bit more about the earth and space. And then we began to realize that ultimately, there is no up and down. If you leave this planet, you go into space, you suddenly realize up and down have disappeared.

There is no up and no down. And there was even a Russian astronaut, still at the time of the Soviet Union, which tried to eliminate all religious beliefs and so on. So the astronaut, perhaps the first one that went out in space, then he got back and said, I didn't see God anywhere up there.

Okay, now we have the proof that God does not exist. And so all we can say then is the consciousness that is the essence of who you are, that you can be aware of as the awareness. When you don't add anything to the statement I am, but be happy with a silent space after you've said I am, there's a silent space where you're not trying to figure out who or what you are.

That silent space, there's the entry point, that's the beginning of the answer. When things break down in your life, which is the horizontal dimension, when you see how unstable ultimately everything is in the horizontal dimension, things collapse, break down, the physical body too. And as your life is crumbling, that is often a great opportunity for realizing the deep I, when the surface I becomes extremely unsatisfying or a source of suffering.

And traditionally, it's been often the case that humans who experienced great loss on the horizontal dimension, often after enormous, almost unbearable suffering, were able to suddenly realize the vertical dimension, the deep I. And that is what is called in the Bible, the peace that passes all understanding. You suddenly enter a realm of deep peace in the midst of all the turmoil and collapse.

Suddenly you go, wow. You can't figure out why you feel peace. This is why it's called the peace that passes all understanding.

Except that I'm explaining it. So now you can actually understand it. So the loss and collapse of forms around you provide a potential opening into the depths dimension, potentially.

There's no guarantee that it'll happen to a human being because in quite a few, many cases, when there is great loss and collapse all around you, it can actually have the opposite effect too. It can strengthen the egoic self that becomes very bitter and resentful or dreadful that everything is in blames and accuses and feels deeply unhappy. And that could be the opposite of the opening.

The opening is then missed, unfortunately. However, you don't need to wait for that anymore. Many of you have probably already had experiences of great loss.

Have become aware of the insubstantiality of the seemingly solid things around you, including the body. So you already have had perhaps your experience of loss or suffering of one kind or another. And that's without that, you wouldn't be here.

That has driven you deeper. Will you have it again? It's possible.

There's no guarantee that you will not have it, but it won't be that bad anymore because it will not reactivate the ego in you. It could, but it's unlikely because there's already, you already have now voluntarily gone deeper. So life doesn't have to necessarily push you into it.

But although the deepening will also happen through encountering. If you encounter it again, some kind of loss. And you will, of course, obviously, because at some point death will be approaching.

It's coming, it's coming. And then the deepening happens. But you don't need the disaster necessarily anymore to take you there.

I had an interesting brush with death three months ago. I've never seen a doctor. I have very rarely seen a doctor in my life.

Never been to a hospital as a patient in 73 years. This is my 74th in 73 years. And there was an irregularity in my intestinal bowel stuff, whatever the words are, for two years already, but I didn't want to see a doctor.

I said, it'll go away. That was a mistake. It didn't go away.

And finally it was getting worse and there was some blockage and I saw a doctor and he said, you must immediately have a colonoscopy. That was in January. And I went, had a colonoscopy.

Not pleasant, but not that bad. And I expected him to say, well, you have, I suspect it might be colitis or this or that. Or he might say, we need to take some tissue samples, just we'll make sure that you don't.

But immediately after a colonoscopy, he said, you have cancer. Oh, interesting. Kim was there and I told her and she tells me that I'd looked a bit shocked.

But by the time we reached the car, she said, we observed I was totally at peace. And that is true. My mind was even more silent than it normally is in the following weeks or days.

Just intense gaps of eye, beautiful. Maybe I'll be dead in a few months, I thought. That's okay.

I don't mind. And then strangely, sometimes people complain about Canadian health care, that you have to wait a long time for operations. But in my case, after the diagnosis, 10 days later, I was already undergoing the operation where they removed a section of the colon and then was examined again, whatever the machine is called.

And they said, fine, there's no metastasizing has happened, or maybe it did happen and it disappeared. I don't know. But anyway, that was, they said, you're okay.

That was a good experience of depth. It can come at any time. There's no necessary correlation between spiritual realization and things going wrong in the body.

Ultimately, things will go wrong somewhere because you'll die of something. Some organ will fail, whatever, something will happen. And great teachers have died of cancer.

Ramana Maharshi died of cancer and so on. It is true that in many cases, dysfunctional mental emotional states can lead to many, many illnesses. Because it reduces the immunity and even mainstream medicine accepts that fact, stress and so on.

But there are many other factors that we don't know of. Perhaps when I was poor for many years, had perhaps certainly not excellent nutrition during those times, lived on baked beans and toast for years in England. So who knows?

But when the thinking mind stops, and there's just the depth of presence, basically you've died already. There's nothing to fear because the person has already receded. So there's just intense presence, but death really becomes insignificant.

But for all of you, there may be some of you who also have that similar illness. On the one hand, you accept that death may come, it's fine. But on the other hand, you can also be as present as possible during the day.

We are absolutely and intensely present. Particularly helpful have consciousness in the inner energy field of the body as much as possible. Another very interesting statement by Jesus that nobody understands from the Bible.

The translation is also a little questionable. If your eye is single, or if your eye is sound, or if your eye is one pointed, I referring to this eye, but it's a metaphorical eye, then your body will be filled with light. He says, your body will be filled with light.

If your attention is one pointed on the body, I suppose that's what he was talking about. Nobody in the church, they don't know what to do with that statement. Your body will be filled with light.

But that is inner body awareness. There's great healing there. It may not necessarily heal everything, but if it heals the physical body, fine.

If it doesn't, it's still the most wonderful thing to be realizing that intense aliveness that's there, that is beyond physicality, but sustains the physical. So I told you that I have, or I already have many identities, and after the encounter with this young man and his girlfriend, who told his girlfriend that I was a famous YouTuber, so that's, I have acquired that identity, and now I have another one. I'm a cancer survivor.

And so that's another nice conceptual identity, can feel good about myself. Until the next thing happens. They're all surface identities, but that's okay.

You can play around with surface identities. They're not, of course, who you are, but some sort of purpose in this world, to simplify communication, and so on. Especially when you sometimes, when you go into another country, and they say, why are you coming to our country at the immigration control?

Well, I'm a writer, and I am delivering a lecture. Oh, okay. That still works better than I teach the essence of self-realization, and that, oh, we need to question you a bit further.

You seem to, you seem mentally unstable. There was actually a Canadian spiritual teacher I heard of. Years ago, he was traveling, attempting to enter the United States for talks, and he was stopped by immigration, questioned, and he was not familiar with simplicity of conventional identities.

So when they asked, what are you here for? He said, I'm a teacher of truth. He was not admitted.

And he hasn't been able to come back since. Let's see if there are any questions left. I am not allowed to choose the questioners, because it wouldn't work, unfortunately.

I can point who I'm appointing, and you wouldn't know. But here we have, maybe I'll get out my glasses.

[Speaker 2] (30:27 - 30:28)

Hello, Eckhart.

[Speaker 1] (30:28 - 30:28)

Hello.

[Speaker 2] (30:31 - 32:41)

Okay. Thank you for all that you do. My question is, aren't there times when you have to say no?

I have two examples, brief. I am a writer. A man asked me to write a script for his spiritual film.

I agreed to this. Subsequent to this, I visited his Facebook page. I discovered that it is likely that this man was at the Capitol on January 6th.

I told him that I had changed my mind, and why. And he explained that he didn't like what was happening in the world, and wanted to learn more about the left from me. At the time, I was listening to Michael Singer's lecture on surrender, a subject that you have spoken much about.

I did not want to do it, and would have been embarrassed, really, in front of everyone that I know. Not only that, but it was a dangerous proposition for me, given that I am Black. Briefly, the second example is that I have two grown daughters, and my neighbor has five very young children.

She is married, but her husband is, euphemistically speaking, not helpful. I helped her when I could, voluntarily. But most of the time, I was being requested to help, as she was becoming dependent on me.

But I was not interested in being a second mom. So those are the two examples. But finally, in a semi-related question, how can Black people not identify as Black, when the world around them tells them that they don't matter, because they are Black?

And did you know Stuart Wilde? I've been wanting to ask you that for a long time. Stuart Wilde.

[Speaker 1] (32:41 - 32:43)

What was the last bit you had?

[Speaker 2] (32:43 - 32:46)

I said, did you know Stuart Wilde?

[Speaker 1] (32:46 - 32:48)

Oh, not personally.

[Speaker 2] (32:49 - 32:51)

Oh, okay. He's one of my other favorite teachers.

[Speaker 1] (32:51 - 33:32)

Ah, yes. He passed away a few years ago. Yes, yes.

Well, thank you. You're very welcome. Thank you.

I love you. Oh, thank you. I don't want to keep you necessarily standing for too long.

The answer might be a bit long or not. We don't know. We'll see.

So you have, there are basically two questions. One is a question about the no, and the other is a question about identity, identifying with your race, racial identity, and how can you not, and so on. So I'll answer both.

[Speaker 2] (33:32 - 33:34)

Okay. Thank you.

Without my glasses. So I often say, say yes to the present moment. Or I say, make the present moment your friend, not your enemy.

So to say yes to the present moment is a powerful teaching, but it can be misunderstood and has been misunderstood. Sometimes it needs to be explained what that actually means. So to say yes to the present moment does not mean that you accept everything that people ask of you.

In some cases, you have to use the no, but not in an angry way that denies the present moment. I call that a high quality no. So let's say in your case, can you look after my children?

Because I need you. You're so good with children. They feel flatter.

You feel obliged. You're such a wonderful person. I love you.

Can you do it again, please? And at some point, you have to, I'm sorry, I can't do it anymore. But without any negativity, a simple statement, it is not a reactive statement.

You don't make her into a bad person. You want to take advantage of me. I'm not doing it anymore.

That is a low quality no. Even if perhaps she was trying to take advantage of you, but that is not, that may be then a dysfunction in her egoic self. Many humans do that.

The world is full of people who perhaps are trying to take advantage of you. That's what the egos do. And so it is not who she truly is.

But you do not speak to the ego in her. You simply say, I love your children. They're just wonderful and I enjoyed my time, but I can't do it anymore.

I'm sorry about that. High quality, no, no, no, I can't do that. A person says, can you lend me another thousand dollars?

And he's, well, I've already lent you 2,000 three months ago. And last year I lent you 5,000. I haven't got anything back yet.

And then he's, I'm sorry, I have to say no. But you don't say, you're just trying to use me.

And I'm not going to do that anymore.

I'm not going to be used anymore by you. This is it. That's it.

I'm no more. That's another kind of no, but it's a low quality no. And the high quality, no, I'm sorry.

That's it. I can't do that anymore. It implies there's a presence behind what you say.

It's not reactive. And with the same, the person who asked you to write something, you say, I've seen the background. I'm not in agreement with that.

Therefore, I'm sorry. I need to say no to this. I can't do this.

Thank you. High quality. No, it's beautiful.

And quite often you may have to use that, make sure that it's not reactive and then becomes low quality. So that's the answer to the no question. The next question is, how can I not identify with being Black?

Of course, being Black is part of your form identity. So you do identify to some extent with being Black, but it is not the main ingredient of your identity. It is part of your form identity and you accept it as your form identity and you come, you honor it as your form identity.

There are other form identities. It could be your nationality, your gender, many types of form identity. You honor the form also.

You honor that and accept that. So you have both. You exist as this form, which also needs to be honored, not denied, but to be rooted in something that is far deeper than anything that makes up your form identity.

To be rooted in the being of you. There, you are neither Black nor White, nor are you man or woman, nor are you young or old. Those no longer apply in the depths of your being, the consciousness that you are.

The deep eye has no time to it, has no form to it. So you are rooted in the deep eye, then you can honor your form also, but you're rooted in something more essential and more real than that.

[Speaker 2] (38:36 - 38:38)

Thank you. Appreciate it.

[Speaker 1] (38:38 - 38:38)

Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (38:47 - 39:06)

Eckhart Tolle Accept Each Moment as if You Had Chosen It [3f0b72f5-8293-41a9-9d67-7308a7a2fe29]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:20)

Accept each moment as if you had chosen it. In this episode, Eckhart talks with a live audience about the process of becoming aware. When challenges arise, he says, go with it, learn to accept each moment as if we had chosen it.

Then, what looks like an obstacle becomes an opening into transcendence.

So, first of all, I'd like to ask you, as you sit there, to become aware of yourself. Now, what does that mean? Usually, to become aware of yourself, you would go into thought, because what you usually identify with as yourself consists of thought, plus some emotions that accompany the thoughts.

So, usually, when people refer to themselves, myself, they're talking about the me that consists of thought and emotion, mental, emotional entity. And so, when I ask you to become aware of yourself, you would usually make reference to your name and your history, your general life situation. But if you look at it more closely, your name, your history, and your general life situations, right here and now, only exist as thought.

Your entire life situation, which includes your relationships, all the things from your past that have brought you into your present situation, your health situation, or other aspects of your life situation, whether it's great at the moment or dreadful at the moment, whether you've lost your job and your money and your home, and here you are, or you've just bought a mansion and just got your new private jet, and you have a trophy wife or trophy husband, identify to feed your ego. So, whether in the eyes of the world or your own eyes, you're at a wonderful point in your life situation or a dreadful point in your life situation, it's still thought, because right here and now, then now here we come to what I'm talking about when I say, become aware of yourself. I'd ask you to become aware of yourself without reference to thought, without referring to your name or your history.

You don't need to remember right now what you did in the past, what happened to you in the past, or what might happen in the future, which, again, does not exist except as thought. Isn't that a weird thing? The future, what you call future, you can only experience it as thought.

Otherwise, the future has no reality. Isn't that weird? Is that true?

Yeah, well, if it were not true, one of us at least would have experienced the future at some point, but nobody has ever, because as such, it doesn't exist as a thought, yes. But when the so-called future comes, of course, it can only be experienced as the present moment. So, become aware of yourself now without reference to thinking, which means let's just let go of looking for ourselves, or I'm talking to you, let go of looking for yourself in thought.

Okay, let's let go of that. Is there anything that remains or what remains? What is it that remains if you don't go into thinking in order to become aware of yourself?

And now, don't answer that question by saying anything, because that's thought. So, when I ask, is there anything left of you, if you don't go into thought to find yourself, say anything left of yourself? And of course, resist the temptation of going, let me think.

No, don't go there. Are you even still there without thought? Are you still there?

Okay, I'll do it for myself now. Let's see, I'll tell you in a minute if I'm still here. You have to do it for yourself.

I'm still here, I don't know about you, but what it is or who it is that's still here, I can't say, but there's certainly a presence, a consciousness. If there were not a consciousness, this entire room wouldn't even be here, it wouldn't be perceived as a room. Maybe there would still be molecules and atoms floating around that make up those bodies, but there wouldn't be a room and there wouldn't even be people.

There's a consciousness, there's an organizing principle. Without the consciousness, there would be no perception of this room. So, definitely, what you know for sure, but not just knowing, but sensing yourself as a conscious presence.

You can only sense yourself as a conscious presence if you are not thinking, just aware, just present. Another pointer, stillness. You have to become still inside.

Maybe that's not the right way of putting it. You have to discover or find the stillness that's in you as the presence. And that's amazing.

In a way, you could say there's nothing there, and yet there is a presence that has no form. And then you can still perceive everything, but instead of perceiving it as a person, which is when you label things with thoughts, instead of perceiving things as a person, you perceive things as a conscious presence or an awareness in the background of your sense perceptions. And the analogy I sometimes use for this is a canvas.

All the things you experience through your senses are a continuously changing painting on this canvas. That's the life that you, the sensory perception that is your life. And there's a canvas, and there's a sensory perception.

And mostly you would be so in it that you don't realize that there must be a canvas, otherwise there could be no sensory perception, no painting. So if you were this painting, you could suddenly become aware of yourself as more essentially the canvas that makes the painting possible. So you can sense yourself as the awareness behind the sense perception.

And you can walk around and look around, listen, look, touch whatever sensory perception there is, move the body, and just be the presence for the sense perception. And at that moment, the person isn't really there. Something more vital is there, something deeper than the person is there, consciousness itself.

And it doesn't mean you don't go back to being a person, but you no longer go back and completely identify with a person. Of course, you go back into thinking after a while, you go back into thinking, but less and less do you identify with the thinker as yourself. That's an enormous liberation.

And then another version of what we just did is the Indian, especially practiced by Ramana Maharshi in the middle of the 20th century, first half of the 20th century, spiritual teacher. The question, who am I, is the same thing. He recommended this as a meditation to ask yourself, who am I in your mind?

You ask yourself in your mind, who am I? Eyes open or closed, doesn't matter. Who am I?

And of course, any answer that you can think or speak is not it. So one could say there is no answer, but that's not entirely true either. There is an answer, but the answer is not in thought or word.

It's not a thought, it's not a word. It's what's left when you let go of looking for yourself in thought. That's an incredible liberation.

The liberation of your identity from being trapped in thought to suddenly realizing that beyond thought, there is a depth to who you are where you merge with something very deep and vast and you realize you're only the outermost manifestation of that which you truly are, which is deep and vast. And then that depth and that vastness can actually, through you, come into this world, shine into this world, can use your mind, can look around and say, wow, I created all this and I'm creating all this. Isn't that great?

And then what happens to you as a person in your life, your so-called life, it's not your life, it's just life. You don't have a life, you are life. If I say my life or I have a life or my life is no good or my life, you create a duality, you say, my life.

Here I am and there's a life that I have, but who am I without the life? So it's a mind-created duality. Are you happy with your life?

No, I don't have a life. So what happens to you as a person is still has a certain importance. You would probably rather be healthy than sick.

You would probably rather have a nice place to live than a dirty place to live or whatever, noisy, dirty. Maybe you would rather have a vigorous body than a body that's not doing so well anymore. You'd rather have a live with or work, live with nice people, but it doesn't happen all the time.

These things shift. What happens to you as a person, you still can be pleased when so-called good things happen and so-called bad things happen. You might be, oh, that's a bummer, but it doesn't go that deep anymore.

Although it may still be important what happens to you, it's no longer absolutely important. So there's a certain detachment from the person, which is very pleasant. Also, your mind, your thinking mind, no longer has the ability to make you unhappy by thinking unhappy thoughts that you completely believe in, saying, my life is awful.

It's a thought. Where is your life? Show it to me.

What's awful? You're sitting there breathing, looking. Isn't that your life?

No, no, my life is that. Let me tell you about it. And then that, what's going to come, and that, and all that.

I'm on my way to see the lawyer because my business has gone bankrupt. My wife has left me, has taken the children too. The house has just been repossessed, couldn't pay the mortgage anymore.

And I have a health problem. I'm going to see the doctor about it. But right now I'm going to see the lawyer for bankruptcy and divorce proceedings.

Awful, awful, dreadful, dreadful. Okay. Sometimes I ask people, I say, if you think you have problems, where's the problem now?

What problem do you have now? And then sometimes the first answer you get is, well, I just told you I've gone bankrupt. My wife has left me.

And then after, no, no. Now, you're sitting on this bus and you're going to see a lawyer for the divorce proceedings and then you're going to see another lawyer for bankruptcy. But right now I'm asking, what do you have a problem now?

Now. And sometimes that can bring about an awakening. And that same person who carried this enormous burden of undeniably very challenging situations, no one is denying that these are challenging situations, but a person who was so burdened with a life situation that he or she could not look beyond the burden they carry, this enormous burden of their life situation in their mind, that's where it lives, because it's not here now.

It's in the mind and carrying this enormous burden. Say, what's your problem now?

Sometimes you have to hit the people, hit them to bring them into the now.

What's the problem now? Now. That would be, I don't do that, but the Zen master sometimes does that.

And then say, okay, this moment, and this is the power of the present moment. This moment, tell me what is the problem? And then they look for it.

Are you breathing? Yes. Are you still alive?

Can you sense the life energy in the body? Yeah. If I get it out of my thinking enough, I can feel it some.

Can you see the flower? Yeah. Well then look more closely.

Okay. Wow. For a moment, you say, wow, it's amazing.

So beautiful. Oops, I forgot to think about my problems. Can you see the, if you're outside, can you see the sky?

Look at the sky. And are you still breathing? Yes.

Look around. This moment, that's now, it's alive. You are alive.

Can you feel that you're alive in your body? Yeah. That you're present and breathing?

Yes. The underlying consciousness? Now?

Just now? Yeah. So where's your problem?

Don't have one. Wow. Of course, it may not last very long because then the mind will come in.

Yes, but, and of course, life can be lived in that way because then when the moment comes, you enter the office of your attorney in order to initiate whatever the attorney has to do. That's still the present moment. And you're walking there as that presence into that situation.

What can we do? And you look at the situation and you're still present. And the whole complaining entity, thought-generated complaining victim, victimized entity, mental entity, is recognized as ultimately illusory.

So you can still deal with situations without the illusory self, which would fuck things up anyway. Sorry. But that's how it is.

The illusory entity, when it deals with things, it creates more of a mess. I mean, you can see how sometimes how certain divorce proceedings are just absurd. The conflict, it grows and grows and grows and grows on both sides.

Crazy. So there's an enormous power in continuously bringing your attention back to the present moment. And ultimately, all you ever have to deal with and all you ever can deal with is whatever arises right here and now.

And that's, you certainly have the capacity to deal with whatever so-called problem, challenge arises in the here and now. But you cannot deal with, and you do not have the capacity, nobody could have the capacity to deal with problems that are entirely mind-generated. And then deriving an identity from that whole set of problems, and it's not a pleasant identity, it's a terrible identity, but a very heavy me suffering identity.

So to get out of suffering, to use that term that comes from Buddhism, it's just the Buddha said, wherever you go, whatever you do, you will find dukkha. Translated as dukkha, the term is translated as suffering, but it means unhappiness, it means misery, it means unsatisfactoriness, and just generic unhappiness. So that doesn't sound like good news.

And so the academics who study Buddhism say Buddhism is a nihilistic or life-denying religion or creed. Why do they say that? Because they don't understand it.

Why don't they understand it? Because all they do is trying to understand it through mental concepts. So when the Buddha says, whatever you do, wherever you go, sooner or later, and usually sooner, you'll find dukkha, which means you'll find certain unsatisfactory elements at the very least.

Whoever you are with, you will find certain unsatisfactory elements in that person. Wherever you go to live, any place, you will find certain, at the very least, certain unsatisfactory elements in that place. Whatever work situation you find, whatever new job or career you find, you will find that the greatest career has unsatisfactory elements at the very least.

If not, it causes you a heart attack and kills you because it's so stressful, because your job is so important. You're stressed out because of the importance of this great job and can't enjoy life anymore for 10 years and finally collapse and die. Joe, that was a great thing.

Great job. I made it. So the Buddha said, what they don't see is, if you look for yourself in situations, if you look for ultimate satisfaction in places, in situation, in people, then you will find unsatisfactoriness and suffering.

But if you don't look for satisfaction, ultimate satisfaction or happiness in a place, in a situation, or in another person, if you don't look for it, if you don't demand that a situation, a place, or another person should make you happy and fulfilled, then things suddenly are very different. So if you're not looking for yourself anymore in all those things, then you can become aware of yourself directly as presence, and that's the source of all satisfaction. And then even in the time when you lose everything, you can suddenly go even more deeply into that place of pure presence or beingness and then deal with it.

But you can go more deeply into that. And this is why people, this always happened throughout history, people who lost everything, I described this imaginary or hypothetical case just now of the man who went bankrupt, the wife left him, he lost his home and all that thing. But these things do happen to people.

They're probably happening to a certain number of people in this country and other countries, and in some places collectively to groups of people. Suddenly 100,000 become refugees, have to leave home and country. This is happening and has happened throughout history.

Huge challenge. There's no denying that this is a huge challenge for every person, but it is also potentially a huge opportunity for discovering that dimension within yourself. And there have always been many reports throughout history of people who have gone through great loss, not due to any spiritual teaching, simply by experiencing great loss in their lives, which at first, my whole life has gone to pieces.

It's all gone. It's all been taken away from me. And first I became unhappy.

And then at some point, some realization arose and they were forced into the present moment. And there they sat and said, wow, that is incredible. Suddenly everything that they had identified with was taken away.

So what do you do then? Who are you if all the things that you thought you were, all the things that you derived your identity from, of course, it's not the things, it's the thoughts about these things, taken away. Who are you?

So life sometimes forces you into asking this question. I have nothing that I can identify with anymore. Who am I?

And so what is left when these things are taken away from you? And many people are not, nobody has shown them or taught them the possibility of that situation, but potentially it's an opening into transcendence. It potentially, any great loss is an opening into transcendence.

You have to accept the loss. So it's like a chunk of you has been removed. And then another chunk and another chunk.

And then you don't know who you are anymore because you can't identify with stuff anymore. You can't say I'm a husband because the wife has left you. You can't say I'm a business entrepreneur because the company has collapsed.

You can't say I'm a homeowner because that's gone. Now, what the ego can do, however, in that situation, it can strengthen itself enormously by saying, I am a victim of other people, of life. So the victim identity can replace, and often it does, it replaces in many cases, the ego identity that no longer works because you've lost it all, but that can be replaced because the ego is very resourceful and can then say, okay, I'll identify with something else.

What's that? Well, I'm certainly been victimized by life, certainly been treated unfairly by life, by the goddess of fortune. If you were a Roman, you called it the goddess of fortune, fortuna, or you can say God.

God, you've gone too far this time. God, why are you against me? Why do you treat me like this?

I hate you. Or you can say, I believed in God, but when this thing's happened, now I don't believe anymore, okay? Victim identities can often replace any other kind of identity, and the ego can remain in place that way, but it doesn't have to be like that.

And you don't have to wait for loss either because here we are voluntarily, without life forcing us into it. Well, some of you are here because life kind of forced you here. One way or another, discover who you are beyond all the identifications as pure presence.

Now, you may have heard the term God realization, which is used sometimes in various spiritual traditions. God realizations, what does that mean? God realization is quite simple.

It's realizing who you are beyond the person, consciousness. Now, does it mean consciousness is God? Does it mean you are God?

This is dangerous territory. Yes and no. If God is the source that emanates the consciousness and then shines into this dimension, like the ray of sunlight, the ray of sunlight that touches your skin, is that the sun or is it a ray of the sun?

It's just how you use language. Of course, it's connected to the sun. It emanates from the sun.

You can't say there's no point that you reach when you go back, if you were able to travel back to the sun on this ray, there isn't a place where you say, here's the sun and here's the ray. They merge. Here's the sun and then it becomes the rays of the sun.

And in the same way, the consciousness emanates from the source of all life and then manifests as beings. And when the consciousness becomes conscious of itself, that is the awakening of consciousness in this dimension. So God in you is consciousness.

identifying with form is spaciousness, what the Buddha called spaciousness, translated as emptiness, but spaciousness, presence, stillness. The kingdom of heaven, somebody used that expression. My translation is kingdom is dimension, heaven, sky is spaciousness.

So when Jesus talked about the kingdom of heaven, he's pointing to something in the sense-perceived world in order to get people to sense what he's talking about on the inner level. So he shows the sky or heaven because it's the most spacious thing there is. And it is not, the sky is perhaps the only thing in this dimension of sensory perception.

The only thing that you can see that's not a thing because the sky doesn't exist as a sky. There is no such thing as sky. You can never touch it or be in it.

Or if you're going up in a rocket, you go through a cloud, but you can never say I'm now in the sky because there is no sky. It's just a way in which we perceive spaciousness. And so he used that analogy in order to point to something within you, the dimension of spaciousness, the kingdom of heaven, the dimension of spaciousness that is within you, that is consciousness, pure consciousness.

That is the only thing, the most important thing, he said, the most important thing for you to be concerned about. Find that within you. Everything else will fall into place.

It's a free translation of what he said. Everything else will fall into place. Just your primary task as a human being here is to find that dimension of consciousness in you.

Then you have fulfilled your task as a human being. Not that necessarily your life will then come to an end because you can then be here in a much more beneficent capacity because something else expresses itself through you, no longer the egoic, the limited ego identity, and it can speak and act and do or just emanate through you into this world. You become an expression of the transcendent dimension.

I don't use the word God very often because it's misleading. First of all, it's because it's been misunderstood and misused over so many centuries. And also because the term itself seems to encapsulate it as if it were something that is a finite thing, God.

Almost everybody imagines some kind of entity when you say God. Where, where is he? Oh, he, you see, most people still call him he.

A slightly better pointer would be to say, for example, well, what I said just now, the dimension of the transcendent. And even what they used in Star Wars that became so popular, again, is a term they used that is not as encapsulated as the word God. The force, may the force be with you.

Okay, where's the force? It's everywhere. There was a slight spiritual message in that.

And this is why so many people loved, because they're all looking for it somewhere. They loved it. May the force be with you.

The divine, you could even say, this is less enclosed than the term God. The divine is more of an open concept. God is more of a closed concept.

And inevitably, because of misuse, people inevitably imagine some kind of male entity still. You can't get away from that. And a controlling one, a patriarch.

Or somebody who has not done a good job. I could have done better than God. Therefore, God does not exist.

You hear that sometimes. Of course, it's all based on a complete misperception of what God is. God is, one could say, the divine is incarnating into form continuously.

And no form is autonomous. You are not an autonomous being that is separate from the totality of consciousness. You're an expression of the one consciousness manifesting temporarily as a person.

And then it's another, and another, and another, and another, continuously changing, shifting. But it's always the one appearing as the many. And it's a strange image in Christianity.

You have the image of a man nailed to a cross, which is a central image of Christianity, which to Christians is deeply meaningful, and to non-Christians does not make any sense at all. But there is a transcendent meaning to it, which you can understand if you're a Christian or not a Christian. And that is that the divine is incarnating in form, fallen into form, one could say, almost.

And it points to the figure of Jesus is an archetype of the human archetype. It points to the purpose of suffering as suffering as an opening into the transcendent dimension. And every human suffers, every life form suffers because life is hard and challenging and precarious for every life form.

From the moment life comes into being, life is challenging and precarious for humans, for animals, for plants. Every life form encounters obstacles in its attempt to grow and expand. And it continuously encounters obstacles to its expansion.

Every human in one form or another, if you come into this world, very quickly you'll find obstacles, seeming obstacles to your expansion and growth and wellbeing and flowering. I think you can all, if you think about your so-called life, how many obstacles life seems to have put in your path towards happiness. And some people perceive life as life continuously is sabotaging my attempts to find happiness.

Why is that? And then they have these strange theories that God is against me or whatever the theory is. But it does seem like, and this is related to the Buddhist term dukkha or suffering, wherever you go, you will find life is sometimes helpful and then obstacles again.

Some people believe if you only practice positive thinking continuously, you will no longer encounter obstacles. But that unfortunately is not the case. Positive thinking is a great thing, can be extremely helpful and bring about certain shifts in you, but it does not free you from experiencing the obstacles that life will put in your path and the challenges that come.

So those obstacles, whether they come in the form of loss or illness or relationship problems, many of them arise from their own mind because your mind creates an enormous amount of problems that are quite unnecessary, but the mind doesn't know that. So the mind creates an enormous amount of conflict that is unnecessary in your life. That's one kind of obstacle is your own mind.

And again, you need to experience the consequences of the obstacles that your own mind creates, the conflicts and the unnecessary problems that your own mind, because you're identified with the mind, creates. You need to experience the suffering that you create for yourself out of that unconsciousness. Unconsciousness means completely identifying with the mind, the egoic mind, which in many cases transforms challenges, which could be solved easily into much bigger problems.

So you have your mind created obstacles that you ultimately create yourself because you're not conscious enough, and then you encounter suffering. This is one level of suffering. And you need to experience the suffering that comes through unconscious use of the mind in order to awaken.

It's only through the suffering that eventually you go, I can't take anymore. As it happened to me when I was in bed one night and said, I can't live with myself anymore. And then somehow I realized this myself that I couldn't live with anymore was an illusion, an illusory entity, and very unhappy mind created entity.

But before I realized that, I had to go through this suffering for years and years. So the suffering worked. It fulfilled its purpose.

And then you have another level of suffering or obstacles. Obstacles come to you seemingly from the outside that suddenly you have an accident, an illness that's a kind of outside. Something seems to happen to you that you have not contributed to.

Something happens, somebody close to you dies as an accident. Many things can happen, but you see, I haven't created that, of course. In new age, it's very normal to say when things go wrong in your life, the typical new age person will say, how did you create that?

You slipped on a banana skin and broke your leg. Why did you create that? How did you create that?

It's an interesting question. I don't want to go into this, whether even those obstacles or challenges that come to you, not seemingly, not from your own mind, but from the outside. Did you still create that or not?

Let's leave that aside. I don't want to convince anybody one way or another. I have a much more simple recipe here, which goes like this.

Instead of telling people, you better look at your life and see why you created that or how you created that. I say, accept each moment as if you had created it. Accept each moment as if you had wanted it or caused it, wanted it to happen.

I can't remember my own writings. It's always not good to go into memory. Don't quote, just present moment.

But if you live, whatever happens, you accept this moment as if you had chosen. That's the one I wrote. Accept each moment as if you had chosen it.

That's a good recipe for working because if it already is the case, you might as well accept whatever is as if you had chosen it because it's already here. So I'm not telling people you chose it. Maybe you did, maybe you didn't, doesn't matter.

It's still accepted as if you had chosen it. That shifts things, that your whole attitude to it shifts and it dissolves more quickly than whatever the obstacle is. But let's go back to the suffering.

First, the suffering that arises from your own mind creates conflict and all those things that create suffering. And then at some point you awaken. And then what remains is the suffering that comes with having a body, for example, because eventually the body gets older, no matter how much you go to the gym every day, no matter how fantastic your nutrition is, no matter how many pills for longer life you take, which is all fine and good.

But of course, every form eventually dissolves and a time comes when the body can be perceived as a burden almost. The older you get, the more likely it is to happen. And so, of course, you might then say old age isn't so bad if you consider the alternative, which is you die younger and then you don't have to experience the body getting fragile and old.

But if you get old, the body can become problematic, a source of suffering potentially. But those challenges, if approached correctly, don't have to turn into suffering. Accept each moment as if you had chosen it.

If you can go with the isness of things, there's no complaining entity that says something about being a victim and complaining how dreadful things are now. I wish my mother had learned that lesson when she suffered in that way, because she had always identified very much with her body, good looking, always nicely dressed going out and liked to be looked at, very normal thing for many people. And then the body got older and older and then hip problems and other fractures and this and got worse and worse and the unhappiness grew and grew.

Not so much limited movement, but the identity. So much was in the body that those tremendous suffering, I tried to free her. And occasionally there were moments when she could disidentify from body, but very, very brief.

And that is the destiny of many humans. But the suffering is really that every life form encounters, the obstacles that every life form encounters, whether they come in at a younger age, older age, middle age, in whatever form, these things are absolutely necessary without which there would be no human evolution whatsoever. And no life form would ever evolve if the life form did not encounter obstacles.

So that which looks like an obstacle is actually or potentially an opening. Potentially it, that seems to stop your progress in life always potentially can make you more conscious. So you can use every obstacle that arises in your life, works especially quickly if you accept each moment as if you had chosen it.

And when it looks, this moment is an obstacle, you go with it instead of complaining or running away from it and then accept and then act if action is possible or don't act if no action is possible. The image of the man on the cross is the archetype of the tells is a teaching about the role of suffering for humanity. It shows that the cross, the torture instrument, which the cross is, it's a weird thing.

The torture instrument is also a symbol for the divine. Isn't that weird? The cross, which is a torture instrument at the same time is a symbol for the divine.

And that's the essential teaching of Christianity that is teaching in images, myth in the deepest sense, that the teaching of myth is a deeper truth that otherwise perhaps humans would not have understood over the centuries. So everybody, one could say, and this is a medieval way of speaking, everybody has their cross in life. That's what they used to say in medieval times.

So there was some wisdom there. Everybody carries their cross in one way or another. If you don't have a cross right now, just wait a little, then you'll have another one.

Everybody carries their cross, but the cross is not only a torture instrument. The cross is that which seems to obstruct you, but it's not only a torture instrument. It's also potentially an opening into transcendence.

It can make you more conscious if approached correctly. So you can be grateful for all the things that look like impediments, obstacles, and difficult challenges in your life, whether it's of a physical nature, a relationship nature. Relationship, many people through experiencing conflict in relationships have eventually become more conscious of their own minds and their own contribution to the conflict and unconscious mind activity and ego and so on.

In every area of your life, use the obstacles and the challenges of life and realize you would not evolve without, there would be no growth of consciousness. So your comfort zone, which is not a bad thing, I mean, to be in a comfort zone from time to time, I must admit, is quite nice, but to look for a comfort zone and believe that your ultimate purpose in life is to find a comfort zone for yourself, the bad news is your comfort zone is not the most likely place where you will find spiritual awakening at all. Oh, that's a pity.

That wasn't supposed to be like that, comfort. And there are people who don't want to leave their comfort zone, so they are in a relatively small niche of relative security and they don't want to step out because they would step out of their comfort zone. And unfortunately, life eventually will rip you out of your comfort zone.

If you don't voluntarily step out of your comfort zone and accept the challenges of life, life will destroy your comfort zone. And, oh my God. So work with, remember the cross, whatever your cross is, you don't have to be a Christian to understand the symbolism, the deep symbolism of the cross and see that the torture instrument, that which is in the way is the way.

That's amazing.

Eckhart Tolle Acceptance Is the Way To Transcendence [086883ea-9811-40be-985b-33dd5c4e7b87]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 1:00)

Acceptance is the way to transcendence. In this podcast, Eckhart answers a variety of questions. A woman asks about identity at the soul level.

She asks, do we in our most transcendent form retain some aspect of individuality, even though we all emanate from the one universal consciousness? Another woman shares a story of her granddaughter who has a life-threatening illness. She requests a few moments of presence with Eckhart to bring her joy.

A wife shares heartbreaking details about her husband who's dying of cancer. She questions if it's possible to remain conscious with compassion and care. Eckhart explains that even though it may seem strange, being in the presence of death is actually an opportunity.

He says we learn to suffer consciously and surrender completely. Eckhart says that even in the midst of life's most painful challenges, acceptance is the way to transcendence.

[Speaker 5] (1:03 - 1:58)

Thank you for taking my question. It's about my husband is severely ill with brain cancer and I'm struggling to stay conscious because of all the needs around me and we are struggling with the communication. So I spend a lot of the day guessing what he's saying and trying to meet his needs and I feel like I'm almost getting more and more unconscious perhaps because I'm tired.

I get very little time by myself which I need. So a lot of grief because we have been married for 36 years. He is my best friend and I'm losing him and he's losing himself every day.

Yes well thank you. On a practical level that's a secondary of course but let's start with that. I don't know if it's possible for you to get some help so that you don't have to do it all by yourself so that you have some little bit of time left that would be a desirable thing to do to try and get some help or some of the time at least.

But that's secondary what you can do. There's something one can do on a practical level that can be helpful but that's not the ultimate answer of course. It's still the suffering is still there and it is very painful to see that this human being seems to gradually be disappearing.

A similar thing by the way can happen if somebody suffers from Alzheimer that is a similar thing happens. The person that you knew suddenly seems to go away. It is very painful to witness that unless you can totally surrender and begin to understand what is happening to some extent.

The way I see it is that the consciousness that this human being is can no longer express can no longer manifest through this brain because the brain is damaged. So the consciousness which is the essence which is not the physical, the consciousness is not physical. The consciousness can no longer use the brain to express itself through that.

So it is a slow process what is normally called death. It's a slower death. It's a slow process of withdrawing because it doesn't work anymore.

It's like if a computer, a little analogy, if a computer becomes defective because something happened to it, it no longer works well. It gets harder and harder to download something. Let's say you can download things from the cloud into your computer.

There's a cloud where data is kept. And then at some point, what you download is hardly recognizable anymore because there's something wrong with the computer. But everything is actually still there, but it can no longer express itself through this form because the form has become, the form is dying, it's beginning to dissolve.

In this case, the brain is dying before the body dies. So if you can see that it's a withdrawing rather than the essence of that human being withdraws from this dimension. It's a slow death that you witness.

And the only answer is you recognize this process and the death will come to, for most people, the death comes in a different way. For most people, the brain and the rest of the body simultaneously come to an end when you die. But for some people, the brain begins to go first and then the body then follows and then finally death happens.

So it is an opportunity, it sounds very strange when I say opportunity, to witness, to be in the presence of death because it is a long, long death. And your practice needs to be one of complete surrender, complete surrender every moment. And then there's an expression that is very helpful by belief in spirituality.

I don't know who first used it. Maybe it was me or somebody else, it's all the same anyway. Conscious suffering, conscious suffering, when you suffer, it is almost inevitable that when you witness what is happening to your husband, that you suffer.

And then there's the possibility, instead of feeling I have to go beyond this suffering, stay with the suffering, but suffer consciously, accept the suffering completely. As if the suffering were something that's completely, if you accept the suffering completely, it actually burns up your ego very rapidly. One of the most powerful practices is to suffer consciously.

Not to say you're unhappy, it's so hard to suffer consciously to completely accept that this is what it is. In that suffering consciously, there's no longer anything saying in your mind, this should be different. You're completely accepting the suffering.

In that, the ego cannot survive in that state in you. So you would, the ego will die, you will die with your husband, so to speak. But in you, the ego will die.

And then through conscious suffering, it's a very powerful process of transcending the ego. In Christianity, not so much these days anymore, because most of Christianity these days has also become very superficial, if it still has meaning at all. But in medieval times and before, there was an identification with the archetype of, you know, the word archetype.

There was an identification with the archetype of suffering, which is Jesus on the cross. Jesus on the cross is the human, stands for all humans and stands and represents all suffering. Jesus on the cross is the archetype of human and it shows the way of suffering and the way of rebirth also.

But humans in medieval times and so on who identified completely with Jesus, it's also spoken about by the way in St. Paul and so on in the New Testament, you identify with Jesus and your suffering is the suffering of Jesus. Your and Jesus' suffering become one. It's voluntarily you're undergoing the same suffering as Jesus.

And then this can actually work beautifully for, I'm not saying that in your case, you may not need that, but it helped people in the past. Maybe it still helps some people these days. It helped people in the past to suffer consciously by going, this is the same, the death that you die is the same death that Jesus died.

You and Jesus become kind of one in that death. And then through that surrender to suffering, as shown visually in the figure on the cross, the surrender to suffering, that leads to death and then it leads to resurrection. It's all archetypal wisdom expressed there.

So that's only an example of how in the past it helped people. There's still some lovely books. I don't know whether Christianity is meaningful to you, but you can actually see what I'm talking about, the significance of that.

You don't have to be a Christian to see how this works, what I'm just describing, how the archetypal image can work for certain people. And even if you're not a Christian, you could look at the cross and suddenly understand it on a deeper level without being a conventional Christian. And suddenly see that is the path for humans is suffering.

And then the transcendence of suffering, but the transcendence of suffering does not come until suffering is totally accepted. The suffering that is, you cannot help it, it's nothing, you can't escape this, the suffering, you have to go into it. There are other types of suffering that are self-generated by the human mind.

There are other types of suffering that are self-generated by dysfunctional reactions to people and situations. Those are types of suffering that they are different. You need to recognize that you yourself create dysfunctional reactions, you create reactivity, you amplify challenges so that they become huge problems.

So a lot of suffering is through dysfunctional use of the mind, and that has to be tackled and recognized there. Then there is deeper suffering such as in your situation. And when this deeper suffering comes, that's where you suffer consciously.

So there's no longer any resistance. So the deeper suffering is that can transform you. It can become an opening, an opening into transcendence.

So the deeper suffering is the situation that you are in now. Similar situations might be somebody who lost, I recently, I met somebody who lost his wife and two children in an accident, all gone all at once. Deep, deep suffering.

Now there you cannot say, okay, there's, you know, there's a dysfunction in your mind, you just have to, you just have to accept it. If you cannot accept what is because it's too hard to accept what is, you accept your suffering. So that's very, very powerful when it arises in your life.

Some of you that may never come such, you may die before that deep suffering comes. But so there are other ways of awakening also, of course. So conscious suffering.

There's a lovely book talking about medieval Christianity and so on, written in medieval times, a book of Christian spirituality. It's called The Imitation of Christ, written by Thomas R. Kempis, who was a monk.

Well, in those times, those were the only people who could read and write. So they're all monks or nuns. The Imitation of Christ by Thomas R.

Kempis, it is very deep. It's medieval Christian spirituality. So to some extent, you have to look beyond the form, but there's a very powerful Imitation of Christ, you become one with Christ.

Thomas R. Kempis goes back, I think it was written in the 13th century or so. Make sure you get a good translation, not the more recent translations, get an older translation, because there are quite a few more recent than that are not very deep.

It's just something came to me. It's one of my favorite books. So when deep suffering comes, suffering that is not produced by a dysfunction in the egoic mind, but comes from a deeper place, then conscious suffering is the answer.

So until you reach a point where you even welcome that, it seems impossible, but when you even welcome it, you burn, your ego burns up in this through conscious suffering, your ego gets consumed in that, and what's left is then you, beyond ego, the transcendent being. That is the opportunity, if you're able to use it. I hope this makes sense to you.

You have to, every moment needs to be a surrendered moment. There's no longer desire to get rid of suffering, suffer, you surrender to the suffering as it arises. Every moment, surrender, surrender, surrender.

That is also the best, most wonderful thing you can do for him, because that part of him that's no longer here will still know that. You may not realize it, but as you become transformed through this, it will reach him too, because he's already disappearing from this dimension, but it will reach him where he is, which is not in this dimension anymore. It will reach him, and so that is my advice to you, and I hope it makes sense, and I wish you well, and your husband.

Thank you. Hi Eckhart, I'm wondering, is there something personal or individual about a human's spirit or their soul, like something that's not form, it's not conditioning, it's not unhealthy identity, but a part of someone's essence that's more individual, unique, something that's different than the common source that we all share and emanate from, because I sense that there's to each person something truthful and innate that's not conditioning or not ego, but I question attributing it to universal source, because it feels different in every person, so I wonder if there's an intermediary level that's not source, but not form, but that's a person's essence, and I recognize this might be the ego trying to hold on to identity somehow, like a little bit of it, and I'm just not sure, and I'm confused, and I just hope you can talk about it.

Oh, thank you, thank you. The surface of reality that most people live on, which is where the physical body exists, the physical body is on the sense-perceived, this is part of the sense-perceived world, your thoughts and emotions already are not, they do not exist in the sense-perceived realm, the sense-perceived dimension, because nobody could find a thought in your brain. There is a correlation between brain activity and thinking, obviously, in the same way there's a correlation between the computer and something that you download from the cloud into your computer, so there is a correlation, but the physical being is very, very little, it's less than the tip of the iceberg, so to speak, you know, with an iceberg you see 10% on the surface, and 90% you don't see, it's under the water, but with humans, the physical is even, it's less than 10%, so to speak, so most of you exist in the realm of, one could say, invisibility, most of you is invisible, that begins with your thoughts, thoughts are not visible, no scientist has ever found a thought, and you're, I mentioned before in previous sessions, probably, there are countless things in your, accumulated in your mind, countless memories, probably millions of things that are accumulated, you're not aware of any of these things, most of these things at any given moment, because they exist, where are they stored, all the memories of your grandparents, let's say, people who know who passed away, where's your memory of the house you lived in when you were seven years old, you still remember, although suddenly, now that I mention it, suddenly you remember, I can think back, and I can think back when I was 10 years old, we moved into a new apartment and got some new furniture, and that I can still, I can still, tactile memories of opening a cupboard of an armoire, there was a little key, I still have the tactile memory of how it opened, what it looks like, sliding door, a glass door, there were some books behind it, where are these stored for over half a century, and this is just countless, countless, countless things, are they all stored in the, well, they talk of neurons, which are electrical impurities, are they stored in the atoms and molecules in your brain, how is that possible, are there some atoms in your brain where your grandmother is, memory of your grandmother is stored, no, I don't think so, all those things already exist in a different realm of non-local consciousness, but they can be accessed through the brain when they are needed, in the same way that the computer can access things from the cloud when they're needed, so in other words, the most significant part of you is invisible, but that's still form, it's still form, so when I say you have a form identity, and then there is an essence identity, the form identity is not just the visible form, part of your form identity is also all the accumulated thoughts in your mind, and the emotions that go with the thoughts, all that is part of your form identity, and there is a person there that even if the physical body dissolves, there is a form identity that still continues underneath the surface, so to speak, underneath the surface in the realm of the invisible, a form identity continues, not forever, because nothing continues forever, everything is subject to change and metamorphosis, but for a while, there's an accumulation of thoughts and emotions that still is there as a person, and this accumulation of thoughts and emotions can resurface as another person, and then disappears again, withdraws, what it does while it disappears is another story, we can talk about another time where it goes and what it does, now to what extent that being that disappears, the form, if you are, if you awaken here in this lifetime, at least to some extent to your essence identity, then that remains with you, that you are not completely unconscious as you, and just the process of reincarnation is then not a completely unconscious one, because you're becoming aware of something that is deeper than the form, imagine a sphere, like a globe, you exist, we all exist as physical beings on the surface of this sphere of this globe, then that's the visible part of you, underneath the visible, just below the surface, there is you as the karmic entity consisting of thoughts, accumulated thoughts and emotions, the person, the question is to what extent in this lifetime, while you're still here as a physical body, to what extent I have been able to become aware of something that is deeper than, not only deeper than the body, but also deeper than thoughts and emotions, now you have to go back to the image of the sphere, so you are on the surface, underneath the surface, there are thoughts and emotions, that's you still as form, but no longer the visible form, but then you can go deeper towards the, you're traveling towards the core of this sphere, the inner center of the sphere, now what I'm saying now, what I'm representing here now visually, and what we're really talking about is other dimensions, deeper dimensions, so underneath the surface, there's other dimensions, you go very, very deep where the personal disappears and you become aware of the light of consciousness itself, this your awareness then moves towards the center of the sphere, then if your awareness goes there and remains in the center or close to the center of the sphere, then you have transcended identification with the form, both physical form or the other form, the karmic form, that is non-physical, whatever shines through the form emanates from the center, which is the core, which is the one God, whatever you want to call it, the form however, is not separate or different from the light of consciousness, one could say it's frozen light, let's use those words, you are frozen light as form, as a physical form you're really frozen, and as a non-physical, you're still frozen, but maybe a little bit less, but still it's frozen consciousness, so to speak, now if you look at water, a piece of ice looks something very different from water, but basically it is water, and you can have different pieces of ice with different appearances and say, oh, you can have actually beautiful things, snowflakes, every snowflake, as you know, every snowflake is different, there are never two identical snowflakes, and they are all beautiful formations if you look at them under a microscope, so you can honor these beautiful manifestations, what are they manifestations of?

They're manifestations of the one, the one in this case, in this analogy is water, so the essence is still water, but you can still appreciate and honor the beautiful form that it can take, it doesn't last forever, the snowflake of course is fairly short-lived, except in Canadian winters where it stays for a long time, but the forms are short-lived, that's fine, and they are, again, they are, they change according to the evolution of consciousness, to what extent they are aware of the deeper essence, so let's come back to human beings, if you then look at human beings as frozen consciousness, assuming lovely forms, like beautiful snowflakes, but infinitely more complex, of course, than snowflakes, so you don't, you don't need to say this snowflake is really just water, but it is, but it's also a beautiful form, and you can acknowledge both, you can acknowledge the beauty of this form, knowing and sensing at the same time the essence beyond it, which is beyond the form, because the form, no matter how beautiful, is not going to last as this form, it is subject to impermanence, it's subject to metamorphosis, to change, every human being, we can't even imagine what the destiny is, the evolution of every human being has an infinite destiny in this universe, and so you have an infinite destiny in this universe, in the evolutionary process, at some point, the physical bodies will no longer be there, even, and so on, we will move beyond the physical, of course, but your question then is really to honor both, yes, there is something beyond the physical body, every human being that is particular to that form, like snowflakes, all different, and you can, you can love that, you can love the snowflake, which is a human being, and you can, at the same time, love that which is the essence of the snowflake, which is, in that case, it's water, simultaneously, so that, I believe, could be the answer to your question, is it?

[Speaker 4] (29:33 - 29:39)

I, I think it is, so there is something, yes, there is something, okay,

[Speaker 1] (29:40 - 34:37)

but it's not separate from consciousness, it is, this is why the Buddha said, form is emptiness, and emptiness is form, emptiness meaning the unconditioned consciousness, form is emptiness, emptiness is form, they are ultimately one, but it's perfectly fine that they exist here as, as form also, this is the ability to honor all life forms, not only the physical aspect of all life forms, but the deeper aspect of all life forms, because beyond the physical, form continues, form is still there, now, at some point in the evolutionary process, there comes a realization, and the form then dissolves as form, becomes part of God, it always was part of God, but it's a process in which the universe, the entire universe, is becoming conscious, it's, we are part of that process, in this dimension, where this universe exists, the universe is moving towards greater consciousness, it is an awakening universe, there is a transcendent dimension, where there's no time, so that there's no awakening, but there's a connection between this universe, and the transcendent, this universe is an emanation of the transcendent, now, I cannot go any further, because language fails, and nobody could understand, because you can ask the question, why did the universe emanate from the one, why did the one create this world, there's a very deep answer to that, but all I can say is, it is an awakening process, the universe is awakening, and for some reason, the one wants that, anything else we can say is just, we can't go there, because we are moving to something that is totally impossible to comprehend through the human mind, especially conceptually, non-conceptually, there can be very deep realizations, but you can't talk about them, after all, talking is sounds, your vocal cords produce sounds, the other part of words is, I don't know what the expression is, there's vowels, and there's, the vowels are the a, i, e, o, u, these are vocal, they're made with your vocal cords, the others are, are they called diphthongs, I don't know, consonants, consonants, yeah, okay, so they are produced through air pressure, so a combination of sounds produced by your vocal cords, and sounds produced by air pressure, how can that explain the nature of the universe, it's impossible, how can you produce a few sounds, interspersed with a little bit of air pressure here and there, and you think you can explain the universe with that, no, so we have to recognize the limitations, the limitations of language, the limitations of conceptual thinking, which is basically words in their mind, still language, conceptual thinking, very, very limited, it's a miracle that I can even talk about these things using language, it's just a miracle, so we have to recognize the limitations of that, but other than conceptual thinking, there is a deeper consciousness that is non-conceptual, and that's where true intelligence originates, and on that level, beyond conceptualization, there is a lot that you can realize, but not understand, because understand means through concepts, there can be very deep realizations about the essence of the universe, because you've gone deeply into yourself, and you've discovered the essence of yourself, which is no different from the essence of the universe, so you discover self-discovery, which you cannot put into words, which you can't talk about, so there's a deep knowing that is possible, but it is always, it is non-conceptual, and it cannot translate into concepts, as concepts, you're very, very limited, so that's how it is.

Thank you, thank you very much, thanks.

[Speaker 2] (34:44 - 37:17)

Thank you. Hi Eckhart, it's such a pleasure to meet you, I've been following you for, since about 2006, and I'll ask my question in a minute, but it rang a bell on me on suffering, because of course, that's what brought me to you, and of course, it was a lifetime of suffering, you know, from abusive childhood, but what really pushed me over the edge was a granddaughter with Rett syndrome, I don't know whether you've ever heard of Rett, R-E-T-T, but it happens mainly in girls, and it's really just a spontaneous genetic, but they're about a year and a half old, they just start losing everything, and I mean everything, and I went in, of course, pure hell, where my mind, you know, went 24-7, I'd wake up in the middle of the night, you know, thinking I couldn't get out of that, and so you were the one that held my hand, and finally walked me through it, to the point where now, you know, she's out of it most of the time, she only weighs about 70 pounds, and she's 27 years old, and I help out with her a lot, and a lot of times she's really spacey, and seizures, but when she's not, sometimes she has excellent eye contact, and a beautiful smile, and a laugh, and I mean, it's just like my consciousness meets with her, is where I really find, you know, tremendous joy, you know, from the biggest pain, that you know, of course, I wish that wasn't like this, but as far as where she is now, and you know, I never thought people could be happy with a handicapped granddaughter, but there's no bigger thrill than sitting with her, and just being present, gazing at each other's eyes, and like I said, I still, I carry your book around, I have to carry it to bed at night, I don't read it, I just set it there, because I know, you know, when I run into a problem, I've read so much about you, that I, you can hear your answers, and I thought, you know, when I have this just moment, I would just like to spend a moment of silence, or not even a full minute, really, just 15 to 20 seconds, of just being present with you, is what would be my joy.

Oh, thank you, that's a wonderful non-question, and it's quite appropriate, as we're approaching the end of this session, so it comes at the right time, and again, as I want to remind everybody, that when you join with somebody in the act of looking, sometimes called gazing, as much as possible, be free of thinking, if thoughts come, dismiss them, they're not important, and don't get the sense that, let's say, when you're looking at me, or you do it with a partner or friend, you're not looking at another person, because the other person only arises when there's some conceptualization, if there's no thought, the sense of a separate other isn't really there either, because it's thought that separates, conceptualization separates everything in this world, the moment you let go of that, where do I end, and where does the other begin? There's no longer a sense of separateness. I'm reminded of the book of Genesis, at the beginning of the Bible, there was a tree, and these first humans, as they are called, this tree is called the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and the first humans ate of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and that is regarded as something bad, because in this mythology, God had said, don't do that, because if you do that, you will get very unhappy and you will die, and of course that's what happened, they ate of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, the way I interpret that is, it points to the beginning of thinking in humans, the beginning of differentiating between this and this, and instead of seeing life in its totality, like an animal still does, you see life in its totality, this is good, this is bad, differentiate, intelligence is defined as the ability to differentiate, so it speaks of a beginning of a new evolutionary stage for humans, the beginning of thinking, and then strangely, it says in there, don't go there, says God, because it's a very strange mythological story, don't do that, because you will become like one of us, that means nobody knows, you will become like one of us if you go there, and you will become unhappy and you will die, and that was paradise, the end of paradise, beginning of thinking, the beginning of persons arising, and an amazing evolutionary journey started, and then another strange thing God said about the garden of Eden, Eden I believe, etymologically the word goes back to the root is joy, the garden of Eden has another tree that's called the tree of life, and God said you have to go out, you can't come back in, because then you will eat of the tree of life, and you can't do that, so through eating of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, it became impossible for humans to eat of the tree of life, the tree of life became something inaccessible to them, the tree of life is, the way I interpret it, is the tree of life is the next stage in human evolution after the transcendence of thinking, which was the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and it's mentioned again at the very end of the Bible in the apocalypse, that humans are then able to, after the terrible destruction, humans are able to have access to the tree of life, so wonderful, wonderful images, but the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, that was the evolutionary, this new evolutionary stage, we are coming to the end of this huge evolutionary development of where thinking is paramount, where we become completely identified and completely possessed by thinking, the next stage is transcending thinking, which doesn't mean we can never think again, transcending means it still operates, but you're no longer trapped in it, something else has arisen, the tree of life, the awakening beyond thinking, so I'm just, this just came to me, because the important thing when you look at another, to be in that state of not thinking, and in the state of not thinking, there is no other anymore, you're just, it's just consciousness joining, and that's really consequences of the eating of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, thinking, it was a necessary stage to go through, and then the next one is transcendence, then we have access to the tree of life, which is awakening, access to source, who you are, the essence, tree of life is an image for source, the essence of all life, so when you look as we're doing now, you're looking at me in this case, but if you're not thinking, just be present and aware, then there is not you and me, you're not looking at another person, it's just the looking, and it's just the consciousness behind the looking, and in that we are one.

Thank you, thank you, thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Accessing the Dimension Beyond Thought [57e9df3c-8c52-4553-a422-1584e7e90b72]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:31)

Accessing the dimension beyond thought. In this episode, Eckhart talks with a live audience. He explains their goal is to learn to access the deeper part of themselves, beyond thinking.

Most people have no connection to that until some crisis pushes them to dig deeper. Eckhart says we must find spaces of awareness between thoughts. Eventually, we reach a state of being that is connected to the soul of the universe.

[Speaker 1] (0:34 - 34:29)

The essence of our retreat is accessing the dimension that is beyond thought. That's the most important thing here, to learn that it is possible, that it is not all that difficult, although the mind may tell you that it's difficult. And so one way of putting it, and that may be helpful to have that perspective for a while, although it's not the ultimate truth, is to say that there's two of you.

It's not the ultimate truth. It's a way of looking that is temporarily helpful. There's two of you, the person and the unconditioned transcendent being.

And that being is inseparable from the being that inhabits all life forms, that is basically, one could say, the soul of the universe. So if you can sense that within yourself that there's these dimensions, this dimension of, one could say there are many dimensions, but it's all how one looks at things. All divisions are ultimately only arbitrary, not arbitrary, but temporary.

Not the ultimate truth, it's just the truth of oneness. But I'm talking now to the ripple on the surface of the ocean, and that's you. If you are VIP, you are a wave.

But it's basically the same, doesn't make much difference, ripple or wave or tsunami. So I'm talking to the ripple and saying, that's how it is, basically. There's two of you.

There's you as a ripple, and there's you, the ocean. And that's in your life, so-called your life. There's no your life.

Anything one says, the moment you start to speak, you're wrong. So, obviously, I sometimes say, your life, that's how one speaks. There's no such thing as your life, unfortunately, but why not?

Because if you say, my life, you have already created a division. There's you and there's your life. Obviously, you are life.

So you can actually learn to sense which dimension is uppermost at any given moment, the unconditioned, which is there when you are present, alert, still, or the conditioned, the personality, the mind. So when you express an opinion, then already you can know whether you are completely identified with the opinion and then become defensive and angry when somebody has a different opinion. Or if you are completely identified, you get very emotional when somebody puts forward a different viewpoint or opinion.

So they are totally in the personality, the person. Or you may be able to discuss something that is the art of living in a conscious way, living consciously. I highly recommend this practice whenever there's a discussion about whatever it may be.

In a discussion, the tendency to be drawn into mind identification is huge. So there's a gravitational pull that immediately exerts itself and it draws you into mind completely. But if you are present enough, you're able to discuss whatever it may be without self-identification with your opinion.

So here's the, this is what I think, but that's not what I am. That is a mind formation. I think it's important that I state that this is the reason why I think this is this and this and this.

Another important thing is when you have a self-identified, it creates a lot of emotion, egoic emotion, and the emotion actually rises into your mind and makes you confused. Then you get emotional thinking, which very often is irrational. That's not uncommon.

And once you're trapped in that gravitational pull of emotional thinking, you're basically, it always means you're defending yourself in this, that, trying to enhance yourself, diminish the other. Then once you're in it, it's not easy to get out. You may have to wait until the momentum exhausts itself.

So then you will compulsively and emotionally talk about something, in many cases, totally insignificant, and it becomes important to you because your sense of self is in it, and it can lead to a breakdown in relationship, a different opinion. Somebody has a different opinion becomes your enemy because he or she has a different opinion. And as you're present, you practice with, but so you need to be able to sense this, the deeper dimension still present within yourself, the deep I, and then the surface I can discuss things.

So there's an alertness in the background while you're speaking. That means there's a spaciousness even while you're discussing something, and you don't confuse the mental position of the other person with who the other person essentially is. That's a continuous practice, everyday life, almost any situation that arises can become part of your spiritual practice so that whatever you do in your life, any activity, anything you do, if you can realize from now on, the rest of your so-called life, there's always something that is of primary importance, although you may easily forget that for a while.

Your primary importance is the state of consciousness, your state of consciousness at this moment, not whatever it is you're dealing with at this moment. Now, it's very seductive, the world will try to tell you, and your mind, which is inseparable from the world, will try to tell you that this is of primary importance. Now, it could be that there's an emergency, somebody has fallen into the water, and you're going to jump in to save him or her.

Hopefully, you can swim. There may not be time to sense the unconditioned within yourself, but what actually often happens in situations when people do courageous things, where people afterwards say, oh, you're so, you're a hero, and the person says, well, I just did it. So, if there's a real emergency, it often happens that the thinking faculty is totally switched off, and you may find yourself taking right action.

You may not sense the spaciousness, but it does come. In a true emergency, the thinking function stops, and you go, oh, you cannot think about, hmm, what am I going to do? This really is a problem, because then you become paralyzed.

If a wild animal comes through this door, running towards me, let's say it's a bear, because they are around here somewhere. It's a grizzly bear, they're huge. Then it's coming towards me.

Is that a problem? I really have a problem. I wonder what I should do.

It's too late. So, in such situations, you don't think. Thinking stops, and then nobody can predict what you will do.

You can't predict what you will do. I can only guess that I might run away, or I might try and make myself bigger than I am, and make threatening sounds in the hope that it will think I'm stronger than it. Don't know if that will work.

That's what is sometimes recommended when you come across a bear while you're out hiking. Make yourself bigger than you are, and then you go, ah, ah, ah. They say, however, it works with brown bears or black bears, but it doesn't work with grizzlies.

The other option is you play dead. That's highly recommended, and that might be what I would do. And we could all do that.

I don't know how I got to the bears, but... So, if it's not an emergency, and most things are not an emergency situation, then the two dimensions, this is something you learn gradually. Many times you will forget.

That's fine. Some spaciousness remains in you while you're dealing with the things of this world. When you are sitting quietly in your room or out in nature, then the spaciousness, the stillness, the presence emerges a bit more fully, and the personality recedes.

When you go back into the world and deal with things, you need the personality. Sometimes people ask me, don't you need the ego to deal with things in this world? Well, you need your form identity, which is the person or the personality to deal with things in this world, because otherwise you couldn't...

It's very hard if you didn't have a form identity, then you would just be the... You would become like the moth, the God-intoxicated people in certain parts of the world, that they have a deep connection with source, probably, but totally unable to deal with the things of this world. So, you don't want to go that way.

And in the West, they won't think that you are a holy man or woman. They will put you away. So, if you have to go there, move to India somewhere first.

So, you need not your ego. There's a difference between your form identity and your ego. The difference is complete identification with your form identity, which is the body and the psychological form of you, complete identification with the form identity is ego.

But when you're no longer completely identified with your form identity, you still have a form identity, but it's no longer ego. That's the difference. So, you still, you have a person, a personality with opinions and viewpoints and abilities and certain flaws, some of which, as presence becomes more integrated with the personality, and that takes time, some of those flaws will dissolve, especially serious flaws that cause you and other humans suffering.

And there may be a few other idiosyncrasies in your personality that may remain, but most likely, they would be things that are not huge things that cause suffering to yourself or others. So, there's the difference between form identity and ego. You don't need your ego to function in this world, but you need your form identity to function in this world.

But the only way you prevent your form identity from becoming ego is to be present while the form identity operates in this world. And it operates in this world not only when you are actively doing something, your form identity is also your mind, or actually, fundamentally your mind, even when you're just sitting somewhere, then your form identity is probably still operating when you're thinking about something, it's there. And so, a very subtle art then is to be able to think, but not be a hundred percent drawn into this movement of the mind.

And this is something that is practice, perhaps having been here for several days is helpful. So, there's a remnant of the other you, the deep I, as I sometimes call it, that's the other half of you. So, one could say there's the two halves, there's a form, form half, and there is the formless deep half, so to speak, you are both.

So, you don't want one to take over completely, probably not, but most humans, of course, in this world, for most of them, only one half exists, and that's the surface dimension of them, and that's a great pity that they have missed the very purpose of human life. It's a little bit like a seed that never sprouts, because in a way, every human is a seed, a potential for the flowering of consciousness. But if you look in nature, nature is infinitely abundant.

One tree may shed thousands and thousands of seeds, and out of those, maybe one or two grow into another tree, if that. So, while you are acting, or even just thinking, practice having some spaciousness in the background. And another thing that helps is not to get drawn into an uninterrupted stream of thought.

This also applies when you're having a conversation with someone. We all have met people that talk uninterruptedly, one thing leading to another, and it's like having a passage in a book without any punctuation. Such writings actually exist.

I personally am not very fond of those writings. It's called stream of consciousness writing, like James Joyce and others. I could never get into that.

By the way, it should not be called stream of consciousness, it should be called stream of unconsciousness. So, you've all met people who, it never ends, this one subject, and it emerges with another subject, and then they get off in that direction, in that direction, and you sit there, and it's time to leave, but you cannot say, I need to go now, because you're waiting for the gap that never comes. And you don't want to be rude, so, but at some point, you may have to be rude.

Oh, oh, oh, that may help. So, there's an element of surprise when you suddenly go, oh, I have to go. But this could happen in your own mind, even when you're alone, it could happen that your thoughts go in the same way, and there's no gap.

It just goes on and on, when people worry and have this fear. Worry is also a, I mentioned just now, emotion contaminating your thought. The emotion rises into your thinking, and tends to make your thinking irrational, and not very intelligent, dysfunctional kind of thinking.

So, when fear rises into your mind, fearful thoughts arise, which fuel the emotion of fear even more, and that emotion comes back into your mind, and you get into this vicious circle, and your mind talks and talks, it becomes like that person that you couldn't get away from, but there you can't even say, I need to get away, because it's, you're there, and you may not even know, you may be so identified that you don't know that there's a possibility, in fact, you have lost, you're lost in your mind, you don't, you're not even there, you're asleep somewhere in the background, who you are is actually somewhere asleep, and in the foreground you're dreaming the dream of unconscious thinking. And there are humans who spend their whole life in that state, dreadful fate, dreadful.

So there, a very helpful thing, when you are thinking or speaking, let's say just a normal conversation, when you have said something, you come to the end of a statement, and go back for a few seconds into alert stillness, and then either the other person will say something, or you will just start another sentence, but there's a small gap, always come to the end of a statement, so that you prevent a stream of unconscious thinking from taking you over, this happens to humans continuously, so you don't want to be taken over by your mind, kidnapped, possessed, mind possessed. So the practice is, find little spaces, always spaces, spaces, spaces of awareness, even if it's just three seconds. For example, looking at something, and you may notice, it's not actually that you have to create awareness, you just have to be alert, and then the awareness is there.

Now, if you're very alert, you may notice something very interesting, and that is, whenever your sensory perception, which is mainly visual and auditory, but it could also involve other senses, whenever they register something new, so it could be that you're walking out of a door in a building, you open the door, and then a totally different vista is there, just a moment ago you saw a room and a door, now you open a door, you take one step out, and then the first thing you look at, whatever is there, it could be a beautiful mountain landscape, like here, or it could be a city street, but then you may notice, if you're really alert, for two seconds or three, you're not labeling mentally what you're seeing, you're just perceiving it, and there's always a little, very small gap between the act of perception and the mental labeling of your perception, but if you can catch that little gap and become aware of it, because usually people are not aware, they just, they look at something, and then the mind interprets it, and says something about it, usually, if you can catch the gap and become conscious of it, you prolong it, it prolongs itself, and then you may be able to take several steps out, without any interference of thinking, you're just present, there are also strange things you can do, you may sometimes find that you can know what you have to do next, for example, or know what you have to do next, without any verbalization in your mind, so you can look at a situation, and then the situation requires some kind of action, but you develop the ability of looking, and then knowing what you have to do, without mentally formulating anything that says, oh, no, you should be doing that, I need to do that, what can I do here, especially if it's problematic, what action can I take here, then if you can face a situation in alert stillness, then it's much more likely that your action will be intelligent, and will be just right for that situation, that's a response, the other is a reaction, which relies on the conditioning of your mind, and so we all know people who, you know exactly how they're going to react when you say a certain thing, if you've lived with somebody, you know when you say this, they're going to react that way, or when that situation arises, they're going to react that way, this may happen to you too, if you can isolate certain pockets in your life, it's very important, certain pockets in your life where you tend to become unconscious, there may be certain situations, whenever that situation arises, it tends to draw you into unconsciousness, it could even be certain people, whenever you meet that particular person, you act more unconsciously, you get drawn into an old reactive pattern of the ego, this could be, for example, if you're an adult, you're going back to visit your parents, and some people experience it like that, whenever they visit their parents, they're drawn into old reactive patterns, and the parents probably too, and that becomes their relationship, and it doesn't work very well, and therefore of course, it's highly recommended as a reflection to see how far you've come spiritually to visit your parents, famous statement by Ram Dass, if you think you're so enlightened, go and spend a week with your parents, but it doesn't have to be parents, it could be other people, often it's people with whom you share a lot of past, or it could be other people who trigger you, maybe at work, just looking at them triggers you, and if somebody triggers you, means he or she makes you unconscious, you become reactive, so if you know that in your life, so either people or situations, or it could be, sometimes it happens when money is involved, people become very unconscious, then let's say you're trying to sell your condo, or your house, and then you're talking to the realtor, and these difficulties are arising, and suddenly the spiritual person who has been to 10 retreats with Eckhart, gets very angry and upset with you, what happened? It's often people like realtors or lawyers, they often meet people at their most unconscious, so those professions could potentially be extremely enlightening, because you really need to be present to deal with all those people you meet in unconscious states, all the people who go to court, observe yourself, see where are the situations where I tend to become very reactive, and then when you go into those situations, or meet those people, you need to know before, okay, here we go, and then stay very, very present, turn up the light, the dimmer switch, it's a bit like that, how do you do that?

How do you turn up the light, the dimmer switch, feeling intensely the energy field of your inner body helps to anchor you in presence, so when you go into situations like that, okay, now I'm going to talk to my stockbroker, if you have one, I don't, but you know from past experience that every time you talk to your stockbroker, you become reactive, because you have in your mind, fear is associated with money, and money is associated with the idea of scarcity, and scarcity from your, perhaps from your childhood is associated with the idea of survival, and all kinds of things are unconscious thoughts that still live in you, and so before you go into that situation, okay, I'm now calling rest, this is my spiritual practice, the primary goal then in that, in any situation, is to stay present, but when you go into a situation where you're most likely to become unconscious, then turn up the light of presence just before you go in, and while you're in it, and as I just said, it is very helpful to be intensely present within your inner energy field while you're talking, and then you realize there's a spaciousness, because that is the doorway, a very good doorway into presence is the inner body, is the doorway into presence, can be a very helpful doorway into presence, there's also the doorway into presence, of course, of totally accepting your experience of this moment, so if you can talk to your, with whoever it is you're talking to, and just totally accept whatever he or she says in this moment, that's fine too, there are various doorways into presence, but it's presence, or you meet your ex, as they call them, I'm meeting my ex about something, so all the stuff that happened, that accumulated before the divorce happened, all those years, it's back in your mind, and there's your ex, and you have a very clear image of who he or she is, and it's not pleasant, you're a very unconscious ex, and then you have to be really, really present so that you don't go into the old reactive mode, and then you're meeting this person, it's almost without the past, that's an amazing thing, yes, you know the past, but in the moment of meeting that person, there's only you, there's not you as the personality, when you become really present, what emerges is the other half of you emerges more, the personality becomes relatively unimportant, the other half, the unconditioned presence shines through, and then you're able to meet another human being, even you might have shared a lot of unpleasant pasts with him or her, but you can meet this person when the other, the deep eye shines through you, you meet the person through the deep eye, which means you meet this person without reference to the past, you have that ability, well, not you as a person, but that ability is in you of meeting a human being, even a human being with whom you share a lot of unpleasant past, without reference to the past, so there's, you're meeting that person in the present, fully in the present, that's an enormous thing, I know people who have practiced it, and many of them have reported back and said that sometimes, not always, and you're not doing it in order to achieve something else through it, it is sufficient unto itself, however, almost miraculous transformations have happened in the other person, when you met the other person without reference to the past, so it's not that you want the other person to change, all that falls away, you're just not bringing the past into this encounter, and then it is not uncommon for the other person also, without them realizing what's happening, becoming freed, at this moment at least, from their heavy personality, and something beyond the personality in them also shines through, and that's a miracle of transformation, that's why sometimes people, when one of the two who share a lot of unpleasant past, one of them becomes conscious, it can lead also to the transformation of the other, not necessarily, if it doesn't, it's fine too, at least you are free, and you don't need the other to be free too, to be feeling that you are free, and so it can also happen with your parents, that suddenly the way in which your parents relate to your changes, when you meet your parents without reference to the past, and in absolute presence, that's an amazing experience, so I suggest you try it out, you have quite a bit of time to practice, and then Thanksgiving is still a long way in the future, and that's where to try it out, when you sit around the big table, well that's for North Americans who celebrate Thanksgiving, you sit around the table and there's the, you basically, this is the past, the past sitting around the table, some people dreading it, Christmas too, oh no, because you're facing the living past, so it's a miraculous thing, and again, one could say that is the real meaning of forgiveness, it's not so much a mental act, mental acrobatics, they'd say, okay, you've done dreadful things, but I'm so spiritual that I forgive you, I forgive you, at least I'm trying to, at least I'm trying, you're not even trying, why do I always have to be the first, it's always the same, you're lost again, so forgive you is not so much a mental, to formulate certain things in your mind, and then trying to live up to a certain thought in your mind, which is very difficult, if not impossible, but the real forgiveness is to enter that state of presence, so that you're not the personality that's conditioned by the past, and then you can meet the person, even the person who did something to you, if you choose to meet them, you don't have to meet a person who did bad things to you, but the question is, does that person still exist in you as a mind form, as a thought form, as a mental emotional entity, does this person who did bad things to you still live in you, they might even have passed away already, but they live in you as a mental emotional entity that you carry, it's actually like a little gremlin that lives in you, and it's not pleasant, and so forgiveness means to recognize that for what it is, it's not really the other person anymore, the person maybe passed away 10 years ago, it's not the other person anymore, it's something you carry still in your mental emotional field that lives there, and so that is, again, something to recognize, and if you recognize it as something that lives in your mental emotional field, then it's much easier to step back from it, and by no longer getting drawn into it, so that's something to do with something that lives in you, and you recognize it as something that you no longer want or need, and then it gradually dissolves as you're no longer reacting against it, so you have one, you have a split in you, as long as it's there, there's that mental emotional entity, and then there's you, there's another pattern in their mind that reacts against it, it's a bit crazy, but forgiveness then is really meeting the other, if the other is still there, and you're actually now meeting them in person without reference to the past.

Eckhart Tolle Addiction to Thinking [19e7b057-0539-4f6a-8d99-8e78aa87a2ef]

Addiction to thinking. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions on several topics including one about addiction. He says people are addicted to many substances but the greatest addiction of all is thinking.

It's like a drug and people cannot stop. They resist letting go because it shields them from the painful part of their lives. Eckhart says the solution is presence.

Becoming aware slows down an overactive mind. Our confusion dissipates and thinking loses its ability to wreak havoc in our lives.

[Speaker 4] (0:42 - 1:00)

When I try to become present using one of the portals like following the breath, I very quickly fall below the level of thought and I either fall asleep or I kind of fall into a dull calm that doesn't have any alertness. Do you have any suggestions?

[Speaker 1] (1:00 - 11:03)

Thank you. Thank you. That is the case with many people.

When you step out of thought, here's, let's say, here's the level of thinking and then you have a vastness below thinking, so to speak, and a vastness above thinking. And when you rise above thinking, it can happen that suddenly you plunge back into thinking and then through thinking and end up below thinking. So this is a case with even many Buddhist monks who meditate.

Many years ago, I occasionally visited Buddhist monasteries and I saw the monks who meditate early in the morning. Of course, it's five o'clock in the morning. They sit very present and then after 15-20 minutes, as you can see some of them, I must have probably wasn't meditating because I was watching them.

And so some go, they never actually fall, but they have fallen below thinking. Your practice then should be not so much practicing when you are sitting still, but to incorporate the practice of presence into activities rather than like this. And that can be done in many, many ways.

You can make a conscious choice to use a certain activity and make them short at first. If it's too long, you won't keep it up probably. But begin with short activities and use the activity as a vehicle for presence.

So the activity becomes an excuse, one could almost say, for being present in the doing.

And that means the doing is not primarily any longer a means to an end. It is an end in itself.

And so that could be a simple thing like walking across the room from here to the door and being just present with every step. And it doesn't need to look funny, like walking on eggs, not like that, just a normal walk, perhaps a little slower than usual, maybe, or maybe not even that. And they simply, you're present each step, you're present in each step.

And that means in that space, you can use an activity and regard it as a temporal space in which you're not thinking. You can go for a walk, you see a lamppost, well, not in LA, because nobody walks, but if you're somewhere else, don't walk here, you get arrested. But if you walk, unless you're jogging, or you have a dog, that's okay.

But if you're just walking, you're not jogging and you don't have a dog. I did that with a friend in Santa Monica, we walked around some blocks and a police car followed us at night. You're walking, and there's a lamppost a few yards away.

And between here and this lamppost, you practice presence. And that becomes a space of not thinking, just alert presence. And then you reach the lamppost and then you're free to think again, or to look at the next lamppost and see if they another space of not thinking.

Beautiful practice. And before, if you'd gone for a walk, it might have been a purely physical thing. I want to exercise, I need to go for a walk.

That's good, that's helpful. But your mind would have been somewhere else. Which is the case for most people who are either walking or jogging, their mind is somewhere else.

And I often walk in the forest and occasionally meet people, and very few are actually present where they are. Some actually carry things in their ears, noise-making machines, as if the noise-making machine in their head wasn't enough. They carry an electronic device that puts noises into their ears, or they're talking to a friend while they walk about their problems.

With occasional brief glimpses of, oh, that's a beautiful tree. And then he said to me, then any activity that you start with something very simple, like wiping a table with a cloth, which you have to do occasionally, like dusting. And as you wipe the table, you're wiping your mind.

Beautiful thing. Or I also recommend, I believe I said it somewhere in a book, waiting. Whenever you're waiting, you're standing in line somewhere, at a store, at the airport.

Use that time, rather than to indulge in useless thinking, to be present. You can use your breathing, feeling the inner body, or being acutely aware of sense perceptions, without judgment, just looking around while you wait at the supermarket. Not complaining, just you look at the cashier doing her work or his work, or the other customers looking around.

Acutely aware of sense perceptions. Like a little child hasn't been here for very long, so the little child looks like everything is new. You don't have to just, nobody will notice, you're just there.

In fact, the most likely thing is, I call that practicing being invisible. I often practice that, but less successfully these days, unfortunately. Going into a public place, in the state of presence, no thought, no judgment of anything or anybody, and then it is quite likely that nobody will look at you.

In other words, you become semi-invisible. You attract no attention whatsoever. So I use the example of being a valley as opposed to being a mountain.

So if you go into a place not as a mountain, looking around, noticing people, thinking about, are they noticing me? That's a mountain. Either or being afraid of feeling self-conscious.

You're still a mountain, but you're feeling you don't want to be seen, but they are all looking at me. You're still, you're a mountain. But do that, can you go into a public place being a valley, which means no thought, just presence, simple, alert presence, no judgments, and then people don't see you.

It's beautiful, and you become invisible. Now, to the ego, that's not necessarily pleasant, because the ego wants some recognition, at least recognize that I'm here. And if you can't say something good about me, say something bad, at least somebody acknowledges my existence.

The ego wants to be acknowledged, but that's a very powerful, extremely peaceful way of being there in a place is to be there in an invisible entity. That reminds me of the time when I was with Kim in Miami Beach in a cafe, and perhaps we must have been quite present there because, and of course, surrounded by people with wonderful bodies. And we sat and sat, and the waiter just did not see us.

And after a while, I said, let's just stay and see how for how long we are invisible. And there was no end to it, didn't see us. Now, you might say, well, perhaps we look too puny in that place, but surrounded by people with beautiful bodies, but I believe it also has something to do with just being still.

So that is a beautiful practice, public places, being still in public places, if you want to practice with that. And all kinds of activities that are short that you would do anyway, cooking a meal may be a long thing. If I say be present while you, depends how long you're cooking, the cooking time is.

If it's two hours, then you might lose it. But you still could start with boiling an egg, which takes maybe three minutes, and see if you can be present as you put it in the pan, fill it with water, switch on, and watch it as it comes to the boil. Or anything to do with movement, any movement.

I often give this example, probably because I have a glass of water next to me when I talk. Picking something up and putting it somewhere else, or as I pick up this glass. Now, this can be a presence practice, and this is then when you couple it with movement, you're not going to fall below thinking, because if you fall below thinking, the glass will drop out of your hand, perhaps.

While the glass travels from the table to the mouse, can you be present, so that it's not a means to an end, but just a movement. And then the glass travels back to the table, and while it travels back to the table, can you be just alert, no thought. So you use that movement to create a space of no thought.

So this is a space of no thought here. This is the movement, and then because it's so beautiful, you do it again. And then the thought comes and says, I can do it.

I've read all your books, and I listen to your recordings pretty much on a daily basis, and I don't say that to build up an ego that doesn't exist. It leads into my question. What I find in trying to practice the power of now, trying to be conscious without thought, is a very heavy inner dialogue of all the principles and things that I've read.

How should I do this? What would Eckhart say? And actually my thought process starts getting more active, and I think I'm losing the presence by that thought process.

And then I think of your latest book with the cartoons, which I love, which I think there's one with a little bird in the tree. He's talking to the dog, and he's very upset, and the dog says, what's wrong? And the bird says, well, you know, I'm thinking about yesterday, and this and that, and I'm worried about what's going to happen in a week, two weeks, about the future.

What do I do? What do I do? And the dog just looks at him and says, stop thinking.

So it seems you try to stop thinking, and you read all this, and you try to practice it, but yet in any given situation, I find that in order to get closer to practicing it, or even practice it, it's causing a lot of thoughts to happen. So it's that different kind of thoughts, or those thoughts that I should break that kind of habit, and if so, how? Okay.

[Speaker 1] (12:34 - 43:38)

Thank you. Thank you. There's a lot of talk these days about, not just talk, actually, it's happening, addictions.

Many people are addicted to all kinds of things, substances, but one of the greatest addictions, or one of the greatest addiction, never actually, you never read about it in the papers, because the people who are addicted to it don't know it, it's the addiction to thinking. It's actually addictive. Can't stop thinking, it's like, can't stop drinking, can't stop smoking, can't stop eating, can't stop thinking.

Thinking is the greater addiction than any of these, and it's an addiction because it's, first, it's been a drug, or it's just been around for so long, and it's a pseudo sense of self. So it's a great reluctance on the part of most people to let go of thinking, which is equated with the state of sleep, to let go of thinking. There isn't that much to understand in this teaching.

There's a little bit to understand about how the ego works, but even that is just mainly a self-observation. The main thing about it is presence, presence, and presence is a space of no thought, but presence can also be there in the background, even when thinking is happening. You can still be not completely involved in the thinking.

Thinking loses the ability to create havoc in your life and confuse you. So your choice, then, is not to understand more or to bring some intellectual analysis to the practice, but to practice the state of not thinking, which can be arrived at by various ways, as you probably know. If you don't think about it, just do it.

Becoming more aware of the present moment and accept it as it is slows down the overactive mind, is one thing, because a lot of the overactivity of the mind is an attempt to get away from the is-ness, the simplicity of the present moment. So to become more aware of the present moment as a practice, have perhaps little pointers in your office, at home, in your car, let's say, present moment or whatever, or a symbol for it. And there are different entry points into the present moment.

Present moment awareness means thinking subsides, may not disappear completely, but something else arises that is primary. We call it presence or awareness. Buddhists call it mindfulness, which I don't use because it implies your mind is full of things, but it isn't, of course.

It's just a mistranslation. To be present, first of all, use the present moment. But how do you become conscious of the present moment?

Now, when you get it, after a while, you can actually sense the presence of the present, so to speak, directly, and there it is. But helpful things are sense perceptions, take you out of thinking, if you're not judging the sense perceptions, labeling, naming, looking around. Anywhere, wherever you are, look around.

Practice sense perceptions without this compulsive interference of naming what you're perceiving. Oh, that's a beautiful flow. I wonder what it's called.

I don't know what it's called. Oh, that helps. I can be free of thinking.

If I know what it's called, I can say, oh, that's such and such, and then drop that and see what it means to perceive without the interference of concepts, words. At this moment, for example, you're looking at me now. Let's say, between now and now, were you thinking?

No. Okay, and again, between now and now, were you thinking or present? No thought.

And while I speak, do you need to think to understand what I'm saying, or can you just listen and understand it? And this is what you're doing. And so that's part of the teaching and the function of the spiritual teacher.

Imparting information is secondary. What I'm telling you now is secondary. What is primary is the underlying state of consciousness, which is presence.

That's the teaching. But you can't talk about that. It's underlying.

But a sign that it's working is that while you listen, there's no thought. There's just an alert presence. And when the so-called teacher stops speaking for a moment, the alert presence remains.

It does not need to be filled with anything, like now. What is there to think about? Nothing.

Now, if we do this for longer, at some point, your mind will probably start up and think, how much longer is he going to sit there? And when that happens, you can allow your mind to say, how much longer is he going to sit there and say nothing? And then come back to presence.

And then some other thought will come. What's this all about? And then you can allow that thought to arise and then be present again, which means you're not really, your priority is no longer to follow the thought where it wants to take you, because the thought has a magnetic pull.

It wants more of your consciousness. It wants to grow, because it's a little entity. It wants to grow.

So it wants your attention. And in subtle ways, it tries to get your attention. It might even use a bodily feeling.

It says, gosh, I'm hungry suddenly. Why didn't I need to eat something? And then you think what restaurant am I going to afterwards?

And so the presence is gone. You are gone. You are looking for a restaurant in your mind, which means the thought used as some bodily thing to make thoughts out of it, completely pointless, because you can't find a restaurant because you're standing here.

But it can use all kinds of things to manufacture more, to get your attention. And if you're not careful, if you don't know the mechanism, it's not so much an intellectual understanding, but a simple realization that this is what the mind does. It tries to pull you in.

It's fine. That's what it does. Once you know that, you can allow a thought to arise without following it where it wants you to go, which is into another bigger thought and a bigger one.

So then you become like my dog when it finds a scent. And then suddenly, even when the dog is off leash, usually she's fine. She just runs around you.

But suddenly she picks up a scent and then she goes off completely unaware of surroundings or anything. She just follows it. And she could get lost.

She goes off to the horizon sometimes, just disappears. And that's when you follow a thought, it goes like that. You can wake up 20 minutes later.

And it started with her sleeping a little bit hungry and thinking of a restaurant. And it ends up with thinking about how dreadful your life is. So you don't follow the thought.

You'd say, oh, there's a thought. You don't actually say it. You recognize it as a thought that arises.

And then the difference is the thought arises in the space of your consciousness. It no longer absorbs your whole consciousness. And you're back to presence like now.

And that's the practice. So the spiritual teacher primarily teaches presence. The words are pointers to it.

The more important teaching comes through the space out of which the words come, this formless space of consciousness. This is why it's good to sit here, because somehow we can then share here this beautiful spaciousness that the majority of humans on the planet still don't know about. More and more people are beginning to realize this, but still a minority.

Most humans are still completely trapped in non-spacious, content-obsessed consciousness, completely dominated by every thought that comes in content. No space, only content. One thing after another.

What do I have to think about now? Dreadful state. So the practice is presence.

And then thought gradually loses its power to take you over completely. But choose presence. Sense perceptions.

Become aware of sense perceptions. Listen wherever you are. Watch what sounds.

Don't judge them. Listen. Look.

Touch even. Feel the air on your skin. That's that sense perception.

Acute awareness of sense perceptions takes you out of thinking and makes you more alive, makes you enjoy the aliveness of life much more. Whereas before you were trapped in a dead conceptual world in the head, walking along a beautiful beach. Couldn't see anything, couldn't feel anything.

Not there. But sense perception is not all there is. They're beautiful as they are.

But what is it that underlies all the sense perception? A field of alert stillness. This is why the sense perceptions become so beautiful, because they arise in that field of alert stillness, presence.

That's you. And then you're awake. No thought.

So in nature, every time your car stops at a traffic light, look at the beautiful red light. It's a form of life too. It's light.

It's beautiful. And that can stop your mind. Why not if it can stop your car?

Why can't it stop your mind? Well, that's a new practice. And if it works, if the red light at the traffic light stops your mind, you might want to install some red lights at home.

Everywhere. What do you make of people who walk out on relationships, their families or jobs to sit on the proverbial park bench so that they can wait to awaken? In most cases, I would say to walk out of whatever your situation is in order to awaken doesn't work.

Awakening is usually within where you are right now. If you can't awaken there, it's unlikely that a change of environment will do it. However, for most people to stay where they are and bring presence into where they are, it's a good thing.

It's a good thing for them. Where they are and what they are doing is the right path. There's no general rule, however, for these things.

There are isolated cases. I've known of one or two people who actually left their families. There was such a strong draw or inner impulse and they had to obey that impulse.

They couldn't say no to that and they actually awakened somewhere else. It can happen. It's rare.

Whenever people say, I can't do it where I am now, usually that's not the case. But there are always exceptions to every rule. And in some rare cases, it happens that people do walk out something that even Christ, Jesus acknowledged.

He said, I don't know if he actually said that or whether somebody wrote it down incorrectly. He even talked about hating your family. I doubt that he said hating for your family, but he said, what is absolutely important is your spiritual awakening.

Nothing else is more important than that. But you can't usually separate it out from your usual surroundings. You don't need to remove yourself, usually, unless you're one of the rare ones who do have to do that.

But then it's not a question of deciding. The impulse will be so strong, it won't be a decision-making process. It won't be coming from your mind saying, should I stay or should I leave?

If you can't help it, then it just happens. Do people start becoming nicer as you become more aware or is it just that you no longer get consumed by the anger that arises when in the company of not so nice people? Well, I would say both.

When you become more aware, you're not reactive anymore towards people. You don't personalize things anymore, make everything personal and are always looking out for some kind of hidden insult or look at what's his real intention behind what he's saying, what does he really want. There's an openness and a non-judgmental attitude towards others.

Non-reactive relationships then generate already more consciousness in the other, because two unconscious people strengthen each other's unconsciousness. So if somebody says or does something that may be unconscious and I don't react to it, it does not become amplified through my reaction. If somebody says or does something unconscious and I react to it, condemn it, even if it's just in my mind, I actually amplify it and I myself become part of that unconsciousness through my judgment.

If I can be non-reactive, I can allow other humans their behavior because that's present stage of consciousness. They behave as they have to behave at this moment. So I allow them to behave, to do what they do, I accept it, and then suddenly there is a different energy there.

So I don't amplify that and those people then, I don't condemn them. I don't equate their unconscious behavior with who they are. That's why it's so important not to judge others.

It doesn't mean you kind of go through life saying, oh, they're all, everything is fine, that you don't see unconscious behavior. You see what they do, you know what they do, but you don't equate that with who they are. You know it is an overlay on, it is human unconsciousness they're expressing that.

It's not who they are in their essence. If you confuse the unconscious behavior with who they are in their essence, then that's called judgment. If you see that somebody is doing something extremely unconscious, that's not judgment because you don't equate it with who that person is.

And so you don't say he is evil. That statement would be wrong of anybody because in essence, nobody is evil, but they manifest extreme unconsciousness, which we can call in many cases evil. So that's important then not to strengthen that and to get trapped in illusion because when we believe in our own judgments, it's not only we trap others in the judgments, we ourselves get trapped in the judgments.

Also people become nicer, which is true what the questioner says. People become nicer when you're present and aware because they can feel the absence of judgment in you. Even if they don't, they can't, they may not be able to tell you, but I can feel the absence of judgment.

They only feel it as a certain goodwill flowing out from you towards them or an acceptance flowing out from you towards them. And humans can feel that. Even unconscious humans unconsciously can feel that.

And everybody's grateful for that. Underneath all their madness, they feel grateful because somehow in that acceptance, in that goodwill that kind of flows out in that space, through that space of acceptance, they feel a little bit more themselves than they usually are. And when a human feels a little bit more at ease in themselves, when they come to you, they like you and they are very nice to you.

They don't know why. And their usual ego patterns, not all of them are operating anymore. Some may still come up, of course.

So the ego is less, the ego doesn't feel threatened. It feels, oh, there's no need to be that defensive here. The ego feels it can kind of relax a little bit.

It's still there in the background, just like a little, like a dog. But it's not in its usual state, like the rottweiler. So you just, okay, can relax a little now.

And then they, they like you. So you become a nice person to them. That's perhaps all they know.

When they ask him, oh, he's such a nice guy. Like to see him, like to go to him and that's a nice, okay. So yes, you do experience that.

So partly simply because presence, acceptance is there and is recognized. And partly because there's the absence of reaction. When somebody suddenly blames you, for example, says, you left that door open.

You shouldn't. And say, oh, I did? Yeah.

The usual ego thing, of course, is to say, no, I didn't. Whether you did or not, because it's regarded as the ego feels diminished when somebody blames you. You did that.

No, I didn't do that. You did. And it starts from there and then escalates.

Why do you always blame me? Look what you did yesterday. That's called reaction.

Defensiveness. And that's not there. So then it's just you're stating the facts.

You left that door open again. No, I didn't. And then there's no further arguing.

Yes, you did. Well, maybe that's what you believe. Or say, yes, you're right.

I did that again. Sorry. You don't feel diminished when you were wrong.

The ego feels diminished. Just to admit that you've been wrong is a dreadful thing. So the ego can't do that.

It's like a little desk to say that you've been wrong. And if somebody proves to you that you've been wrong, it's even worse. And then some people will start hitting you.

That's how an ego can easily do. If it's so obvious that you've been wrong and somebody proves it, then you start hitting them. That's the big argument.

And if you knock him out, the ego still wins. Yes, there is a general improvement in relationships, of course, with presence. Another question here about daily life.

Those are very useful questions to everybody. They're basically everybody's question. How do you balance just being on a moment-to-moment basis all the time with having to make a living and paying bills?

That has been the only difficult part for me. How do you balance just being on a moment-to-moment basis all the time, all the time, with having to make a living and paying bills? That has been the only difficult part for me.

Yes, in other words, how do you balance or bring together being and doing? Otherwise, you can only experience presence and being when you're sitting absolutely still or you're not being disturbed by anything. That's fine, too.

At least you have it then. But it's not enough. So as you rightly say, the question is a good one.

How do you balance that with paying bills and so on, in other words, activity in daily life? How can you have that awareness in your daily activities rather than lose yourself in the doing? Well, as a practice, any practice that we now talk about presupposes that there is a minimum of presence in you, because without that, you can't practice.

If there's a minimum of presence in you in any situation, then there's something that you can do. And a minimum of presence or awareness means you're not totally lost, but you can be aware at the beginning of an activity so that you don't get drawn into it so totally that you lose yourself in it. And usually, it means the future becomes more important than the present moment.

That means you're becoming lost in doing. That's a good indicator. The future moment becomes more important than this moment, and you need to deal with that.

So as a conscious practice, you can do, what do I need to do now? Okay. Well, you mentioned paying bills and having to make a living, whatever it is that you do.

The present moment, is it a means to an end for you, or are you honoring the doing in this moment so that it is not primarily a means to an end? Are you trying to get to the future moment more than you want to be in the present moment? That's usually the case with unconscious living.

And usually, people are stressed because of that continuous movement of the pull of future, which is no more than the pull of a thought of future, because there is no future out there. I've never seen it. So the future is the thought of future.

So the balance between being and doing is done by being present in the doing, by giving your fullest attention to the doing, rather than believing that you need to get to the end of the doing. Give your fullest attention to whatever your activity is in your daily activities. Don't make it a means to an end that includes any human interaction.

Low quality human interaction, we've all experienced that. Low quality human interaction is when you meet a human being who is treating you as a means to an end. And so you become reduced to, if you see somebody in a restaurant, you become reduced to a customer.

And so he's not a human being. If you see a doctor, you become reduced to a patient. He doesn't see you, unless he's aware, or she doesn't see you, you become a patient.

You become reduced and only wants to get it over and done with. The person who's trying to sell you something, to this person, you are a means to an end. He wants to, he or she wants to get to the future moment where the sale is completed.

If you refuse to go along with it, and you're not going to buy what he's offering, he's going to be in a negative state. And the negative state in him is already present, even while he's talking to you and still wanting you to sell something, because there's a strong desire for you to finally come to the end of it already. He is using you as a means to an end so that he can get to the future moment where he thinks he needs to be.

And you can feel that, and you can feel that this is not a high quality human interaction. And a lot of interaction between humans in our society is of that kind, because they're all just wanting to use the other in their desire, compulsion, compulsive desire to arrive at the future point where they need to be. So life gets reduced to something unpleasant, superficial.

Nobody's here, they're not there. So instead of demanding that these people should change, of course it needs to start with you. Don't make this moment into a means to an end, because it's precious.

It's all you ever have. And whatever appears in this moment is precious. It's the form that this moment takes.

So if you're with another human being, it's a precious moment. It's the form that this moment takes. Don't make it into a means to an end.

Honor the form of this moment. Honor this moment. If you're dealing with another human being, let's say in business, you're honoring this moment.

You're honoring this human being. You give, in other words, you give this moment your fullest attention. You give the other human being who happens to be there at this moment your fullest attention.

Your attention isn't 50, 60, 70 percent in the future where you want to be. No, it's here completely. And then if you are a waiter, you will see that your tips increase a hundredfold if you give every guest your fullest attention and not treat them as a means to an end.

If you're a salesman, you'll be extremely successful because the people will love you because everybody loves to be given fullest attention. So you realize the second, it's second the situation that every life situation is secondary. Whatever it consists of is secondary.

Primary is your practice of presence, of attention, of awareness. So you use whatever life gives you to do, bring that element of attention to it, of aware presence, and do it with infused. The doing becomes infused with presence and it shifts.

If you thought your job was boring, well, there was most likely not enough presence in the doing. Even menial jobs, you can become transformed through presence. I have occasionally witnessed, not very often, people at a toll booth where cars stop every few seconds.

A car stops and they say, two dollars please. Now, one would think that's not an interesting job where you can be present, but very rarely, once or twice in my life, I have seen somebody there who emanated awareness or presence and everybody who stopped there, every driver, was given fullest attention in that moment. The words didn't matter, thank you, two dollars, thank you, have a nice day.

But the energy behind it, again, what we said earlier, situations are secondary, whatever happens. So treat your whole life as an excuse, whatever situation arises, it's an opportunity for bringing the dimension of presence or awareness in. Don't believe that the situation is what absolutely matters.

What absolutely matters is your state of consciousness. Secondary is what you do. In other words, who you are, or what you are, your state of consciousness is primary.

The doing flows out of the being. It's a practice. Daily life is spiritual practice.

One way of talking about what is Zen, one Zen master, simply defined Zen as doing one thing at a time. That's Zen. No, you can't get a more simpler definition than that.

People spend years trying to figure what Zen is all about in monasteries and still can't figure it out. And this Zen master says, doing one thing at a time. Is that it?

Yes. Well, that stops your mind. And then what's left?

What's left for you to do is doing one thing at a time. Not be over there, but be here, be present in the doing. And already you are practicing presence one thing at a time.

This fullest attention to this one thing is only this moment. And this moment then becomes different. It changes.

Its quality changes from low quality to high quality. The doing changes. The relationship changes to high quality.

What I call high quality implies there is the awareness becomes part of the situation. You bring in a new dimension.

Eckhart Tolle Alchemy : Transforming Our Difficulties into Spiritual Gold [6cf11acc-3cff-4fa8-bdef-70b5b5eabfec]

Alchemy, transforming our difficulties into spiritual gold. In this podcast, Eckhart answers a variety of questions from a live audience, including a man who says he's legally blind from drug use and wants to know how to manage his fearful thoughts. Another audience member reveals he's made great strides in his spiritual development, but his 25 year marriage is ending as a result.

The man asks, how do you know when it's time to leave a relationship? Also, a woman in the audience explains to Eckhart that she wants to stop sabotaging herself with her addiction to technology. Eckhart explains to her how practicing presence can aid in recovery.

He reveals in this podcast how our partners and our friends who are stuck in unconsciousness can often be our greatest teachers because oftentimes they point to the places in us that still need to be healed.

[Speaker 1] (0:59 - 1:11)

We have two people who are the omnipotent ones who select the questioners. We are not in a hurry.

[Speaker 3] (1:21 - 1:37)

It's an honor listening to you for over a decade and, you know, dream realized here right now. So thank you so much. Thank you.

I am legally blind. So if it looks like I'm not looking at you, I am just in my own way.

[Speaker 1] (1:37 - 1:52)

Well, I use this occasion to tell you that I'm also suffering from a dysfunction in my eyes, right? It's deterioration. So I'm not blind yet, but it's far worse than it has been before.

[Speaker 3] (1:52 - 1:53)

I see.

[Speaker 1] (1:53 - 2:10)

If I put on my glasses, I can see more of you. Let's try this. I'm getting old.

Ah, slightly better. Okay.

[Speaker 3] (2:11 - 4:04)

Thank you. Maybe I can get a few things into a single question of sorts. For me, this process of awakening is very physical and that I feel energies very strongly and viscerally in my body.

I guess I've kind of had this for a while, but there's like a fear that comes that I'm going to like lose control or, and a lot of this is honestly stems back from drug use many years ago, but just sometimes listen to things or, you know, to talks or I get into this place where there's just as such a strong fear that comes and it feels very much like an obstacle. And I kind of have to, you know, just find some way of moving my attention into my breath or whatever else. And it kind of just passes over time.

But I was wondering if you could comment on that and kind of another thing I experienced, if I could add to it, I have a very difficult time sometimes trusting my own experience or the way I frame things. And if I could give an example of this, just often you say about meditation that don't fall into the trap of seeing it as something that you're doing. But for me and my experience, it very much feels like I am doing a meditation and it doesn't necessarily seem like an obstacle and it can be peaceful.

And I understand it may just be a word thing, but it's a pattern that comes up a lot. So I was wondering if you can comment on any of those things.

[Speaker 1] (4:04 - 13:30)

Thank you. Thank you. Thank you.

I don't like wearing these glasses, but it's when you feel relatively undisturbed by inner phenomena that arise, whatever they may be in your head or in the emotional field or physical phenomena. I'm sure there are times when you feel relatively periods when you're relatively undisturbed by otherwise sometimes disturbing phenomena. Use those times to establish a deeper connection with the awareness that is behind all phenomena is not part of the arising phenomena.

The awareness is the ability to contain and to accept whatever phenomena arise instead of being drawn into a reactive mode towards whatever phenomena arise in your body or in your mind or your emotional field to be able to step back, so to speak. This stepping back into the field of awareness, do it in good times because when the disturbances arise, because they arise and then they pass away I believe that's usually the case. As the Buddhists say, all that arises passes away.

I talked to a Buddhist monk once and he said, all I've learned in my 35 years as a Buddhist monk is this, all that arises passes away. Not bad. It's a good learning.

That is not an intellectual knowledge. It points to a deeper place of connectedness where you can allow what arises to arise without having to adopt an attitude towards it or wanting to get rid of it. You have to be deep enough.

You have to be the space for it so that it does not control you. You needing to be in control probably does not work, the desire to be in control. If you go deep enough inside and practice in good times to go into your body, to become still as much as you can, so that presence, power, so to speak, grows in you more and more.

And then when the disturbances arrive, as they will still will, the disturbances arrive, then they are met in that space, that aware space. They're still, they may not be pleasant, but they are met in the space of awareness. Presence, power, you need to cultivate this.

Cultivate is a term that also Buddhists use a lot. So you cultivate presence, power in the good times. Don't wait for the bad times.

By the way, this is a useful lesson for everybody because many people only become interested in spirituality when things are going wrong in their life. Oh, I need to do something. When things are going well, the stock market is doing well, my shares are doing well, and then the next week there's a crash and the whole thing is probably collapsing anyway.

Oh my God, I'll better meditate now. It might be a bit late, too late, especially if you're getting older. Cultivate presence, power, go to that place so that it grows, so that you can meet the disturbances from a place of power, not personal power, but from the place of the power of awareness or consciousness, because that is beyond.

Consciousness itself is not a phenomenon that arises and passes away. Everything arises and passes away within the space of consciousness, within that, that you are the space for it all. Another way of putting it, you are not what happens, but you are the space for what happens.

You are the space for it. So increasingly then become familiar with what that means, to be the space for it, so that when disturbances arise, they don't overpower you anymore, and you don't even need to necessarily do anything. You meet them, they arise in the light of awareness.

The light of awareness tends to dissolve things that if presence power is not strong enough, the phenomena will obscure the light of awareness because it's not strong enough. Then you have a reactive mode then towards the phenomena. But if the light of awareness is strong enough, phenomena rise, including, for example, the pain body, which, and part of it may be the pain body, part of the things that arise in you.

The pain body, which means the accumulation of old emotion from your past, residues of old emotion going back to childhood, and perhaps even beyond, but we don't need to go there. The accumulation of old emotion that still lives in you as an energy field that one could virtually say has a life of its own, and sometimes it needs to come up and move into your mind. The pain body is an emotional field of a negative emotion.

It feeds on your mind. It rises up into your mind. It has dormant periods, as you know.

Sometimes you don't feel it much. Then it rises up into your mind. It makes you think certain things.

It then controls your thinking. A person is deeply involved in negative thinking. The thinking is being done by the emotional field of the pain body.

It's rising up into the mind. Then every thought you have is of a negative kind. It's horrible.

I'm losing control. These are all thoughts that arise that are not true. But if there's not enough awareness, then you believe in those thoughts that arise.

So the pain body also needs reactions from other people. It wants an emotional reaction from your partner. That's a favorite person.

Give me some unhappiness. I'm unhappy, and I'm going to make you unhappy too, says the pain body. Not you.

The pain body in you is speaking. I'm going to say and do exactly the things that I know are going to make you unhappy. I'm going to push those buttons.

And usually it works. That's how drama in relationship happens. Then the other person's pain body responds.

Complete unconsciousness. And so there was not enough presence there. Build up the presence in the good times.

And so that there's enough presence that you can contain the disturbing phenomena and just allow them to be in the light of consciousness. And then the light of consciousness does something. It tends to dissolve, not immediately.

It could happen immediately, but mostly not. Gradually it dissolves the disturbances that are there. If you continue to shine the light, so yeah, be the presence for what arises instead of having a reactive relationship with what arises.

There it is. It's like whatever. You can look at it like weather.

Whatever happens in you, let's say there are meteorological, if that's the word, phenomena. It's an analogy. Let's say, okay, there comes a strong wind suddenly.

And dark clouds suddenly appear. And suddenly you see flashes of lightning and thunder. So the weather is changing.

Now the weather is trying to do this. I'm using weather as an analogy here, but by the way, I love observing weather phenomena. They're just wonderful.

And so thunder comes, lightning comes, a tornado may come. Yes, you may have to seek shelter, but it's still, these are, they come and then they pass. And then suddenly there's the sun again.

So you have inner weather phenomena happening. Don't personalize too much. So that is the key, is not to personalize the emotions, just to see there is an, it's an energy field, not to personalize even a thought, not to personalize anything that arises.

It's an energy field that arises in you. It's not you, but you are the space for it. And so that is the answer.

And the practice is use the good times in order to grow in presence power, so to speak. Thank you so much. Thank you.

Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (13:40 - 13:41)

Hello, Eckhart.

[Speaker 6] (13:41 - 13:41)

Hello.

[Speaker 2] (13:43 - 13:50)

First I wanted to say how grateful I am. I had read the Power Now, something like, when it first came out, maybe 20 years ago?

[Speaker 1] (13:50 - 13:51)

Yes, something a bit more, yes.

[Speaker 2] (13:51 - 16:00)

And then this time around, maybe three years ago, after having that meditation, that time period of meditation experience, it had a totally different effect. And I say that I went from being 90% in my head to now living 90% of my body. And the question I have is, along that process over the last couple of years, almost every one of my relationships is God, including my relationship, my marriage of 25 years.

It's like hanging by a thread at the moment. And I can't tell if it's judgment or it's discernment, because it feels like I can no longer engage in some of the behavior. And so I'm with a crowd of people that I no longer relate to.

And so what has happened is my partners, our friends have become my partner's friends, where I no longer kind of engage. And so it's caused a lot of distance. And early on in my personal growth, somewhere along the line, I had heard the line, only someone with low self-esteem stays in a relationship that doesn't meet their needs.

But it's now come to the point where it feels like any need that I think this egoic identity has is going to cause suffering if I try to, even as something simple as, what you're saying is offensive, it's hurting, can you please rephrase it? Even something like that seems like it's going to be misinterpreted. It's going to feel like an attack.

And maybe it's riding on judgment that's just slightly beneath my consciousness. I suspect that's probably true. Like there's some, whenever you speak about spiritual superiority, it brings some kind of, it's like, oh, you better pay attention there.

So I don't know how much of that over the course of our lifetime, trying to get my partner to do some kind of spiritual growth work has had the exact opposite effect or, anyway, that's where I'm at. She actually was coming. I finally got her to come and it didn't happen.

It blew up before. Yeah. So.

[Speaker 1] (16:01 - 16:03)

But you are still together.

[Speaker 2] (16:04 - 16:19)

We're, in the last year, we had a big windfall. I did some, one of your manifestation processes, a big house just showed up and we're in two different houses now. I'm in a big house by myself.

I don't want to, I don't want the house. I bought the house for her, basically. Anyway.

[Speaker 1] (16:21 - 16:23)

Well, yes, that's an interesting story.

[Speaker 2] (16:25 - 16:27)

The emphasis on the word story though.

[Speaker 1] (16:32 - 16:38)

So could you, before I speak, have you already asked a question or not yet?

[Speaker 2] (16:39 - 17:02)

I think the question is, well, number one, how do I know when it's time? If it was up to me, I would never throw in the towel. For me, what's coming up is supposed to come up.

It's an opportunity to plant my feet, but the other person doesn't seem like that's their agenda. So when do you say it's time to let go? I guess is the question.

[Speaker 1] (17:03 - 17:07)

And other relationships have already come to an end.

[Speaker 2] (17:08 - 17:30)

There's no formal end, just growing away, like not a draw or a lack of connection, lack of ground to connect on, I guess. And at the same time, I feel more connected to everything. So it's like the forms are going away, but the connection to energy, it's like I just see waves of energy.

[Speaker 1] (17:30 - 19:48)

Right, right. Thank you. Often that question is, one form or another is often asked, when is it time to let go of a relationship?

Or is it possible to continue in a relationship, even if there's a huge gap in the level of awareness, for example, in the two partners, if there's a huge gap, usually the best answer comes not through the decision-making process of the mind, trying to figure out what's the best thing to do. The best answer comes as a sudden realization that this is the thing to do. Either you leave or you stay.

If you live in two separate houses, of course, then it makes it a little easier to be in a relationship because you have a lot of space to yourself. And she has a lot of, he or she has a lot of space also. So it often happens that one person, let's say two people meet, they come together, married or not married, they'll start living together.

And at some point, one of them begins to grow spiritually. For some reason, there's this spiritual growth happening, the arising of awareness, some transcendence of ego. And the other person, let's say, is staying behind.

So the communication becomes a little bit more difficult. And also as far as pain body is concerned, because the pain body in couples, for example, pain body needs the other person's pain body in order for the dysfunctional relationship to work. The other already has gone beyond the pain body.

I don't know whether you are still engaged in emotional.

[Speaker 2] (19:48 - 19:57)

I get hooked after if I feel like I'm verbally attacked. If you keep misinterpreting, I'll get hooked. So there's still places where I need to work.

[Speaker 1] (19:58 - 21:33)

So it could be that the other person can provide the training ground for you to be non-reactive. In other words, the unenlightened, so to speak, partner becomes your teacher. That is sometimes the case.

And surprisingly, often assessor does exactly what you need to become conscious in yourself. So there's a reflection. And this can be highly, very useful.

Ultimately, at some point, the other person may experience also the beginning of an awakening, but not necessarily. But in the meantime, a relatively unconscious partner can teach you a lot about yourself when you observe the reactivity within yourself. So unless something else comes to you that is beyond any doubt, and I very rarely make recommendations as far as people's personal lives are concerned, but I'll make one now.

I would continue for a while and allow the person to reflect back to you the things that you need to still become conscious of by provoking you. And often that is the case. And you have some space.

If you can't take anymore, you go to your house.

Hi, Eckhart. It's an honor to be here. So earlier when you were talking about the stillness, a question came to me.

How can I stop self-sabotaging and wake up in the parts of my life where the momentum of energy to distract and dissociate from being still feels the strongest?

[Speaker 1] (22:13 - 22:25)

Okay, that's an interesting question. But could you give maybe one example of how or when that happens? Then it's easier to relate to.

[Speaker 4] (22:26 - 23:28)

Like yesterday, when you told us not to engage in our phones and stuff like that, I went back to my Airbnb and noticed very strong impulses to turn on a show while I had dinner or whatever. And I was watching myself. The energy to do that was so strong.

And I did it. And then, yeah, I did it. And then this morning, I was watching that same impulse.

And it's like so strong. And I just told myself, okay, like, just don't do it for two minutes. And there's many things.

That's just one example. But how do you, it doesn't feel like willpower is enough, like that momentum. I think it's from the pain body.

There's something that I, it's too strong, probably past trauma, I don't want to feel or whatever. Like, what do I do with that?

[Speaker 1] (23:29 - 38:29)

Right. Interesting. So it's like there's certain, certain actions take place, you do things, you know, they're not the optimal things to do, but you can't help it.

It's something acts through you, there seems to be some power there that makes you do things that you know are not right, or not good for you. And yet you can't stop it. That seems to be the case.

And that, of course, is often the case with people, with you, it might be many different areas of your life. But this is also the case with addictions, for example, people who are addicted to a certain substance, or who are addicted to eating too much or drinking, there's something that overpowers them in you that seems to obscure the awareness, or the awareness is pushed to the side. And this thing, this powerful thing does it anyway.

And again, my answer is a little bit similar to what I said to the first questioner tonight, the power of presence needs to grow in you so that it is strong enough not to, it's not willpower, because willpower is not the best way of dealing with these things. But it's what I'm talking about could sometimes be confused with willpower, but willpower includes the application of a force to hold something down. Let's say, if your addiction is to indulge in intoxicating beverages, in other words, booze is the British word.

And you can feel it, it comes on, there it comes, you know, the bottles are there, there they are. And you feel you have to go there and you have to reach out and you have to pour yourself a drink. Now, when you're not aware at all, you don't even know what you're doing, you're so unconscious that you're already holding the drink.

And at that point, you even know that you're drinking. The same with food. I've spoken to people who have had addictions to food.

They often say, they wake up in the middle of the night, they've already unconsciously gone to the fridge, taken out the chocolate cake. And they're already halfway through the chocolate cake when suddenly they're like, what am I doing? So awareness comes in at a very late point.

Willpower would be to hold an urge down. Let's say, the example you gave, you want to turn on the TV and you know it's not right because I'm not here for that. And he actually told us not to do it.

But I can't help it. I have to go. Now, willpower, you would say, I'm going to hold this down.

I'm not going to do it. I can feel the urge, but you're holding it down. And when you hold things down, often after a while, an explosion happens.

It's like a boiling kettle. Can't hold it for that long. And then you have some kind of rationalization in your mind.

You'll do it anyway. The mind will give you a reason. I spoke to a man who was addicted to food and his body was very unhealthy.

He was extremely dangerously overweight. Unfortunately, he's passed away. But he was a wonderful man.

And he talked to me. And often, before he goes to indulge in excessive eating, his mind would say something like, you've had a rough day. You really deserve a treat.

It explains why it's the right thing. I'm not going to do it for much longer. But just today, I really need a treat.

Life hasn't been treating me. But it's the only pleasure I have. What should I do?

It's all I have. There's no other pleasure in my life. Okay.

I attempted to show him that this thought is a deception. And I had a little bit of success. But unfortunately, it was too late to save him.

Well, he is no longer in the body, but that's okay. He's probably reincarnates now into the opposite, perhaps, in order to learn a lesson. Again, what I said to the first questioner, to practice presence power when you're not particularly tempted by anything, and you're just in your room, there's no particular temptation, go into the body, feel the inner body, be aware, be present.

Sense perception, I recommended that practice. Sense perception, feel the presence pervading every cell in your body, the inner body awareness, so that there's enough presence for when this impulse comes, don't say go away or something like that, because it won't go away. It'll do it anyway.

If the impulse comes, whatever it may be, and you observe, you realize it's not a good thing that it wants you to do. And if there's enough awareness, use it every time an impulse of that kind comes. This is your special spiritual practice.

So instead of wanting to get rid of it, welcome when an impulse of that kind comes and see that this is a spiritual practice, specially designed for you. It is. And so how do you transform this into spiritual practice?

First, you realize this is an opportunity for practicing. And the first thing you could do is you practice delaying, obeying the impulse, not obeying it immediately, but delaying it. And you observe then, let's say when you wanted to go to the TV and turn this thing on, or you feel the impulse, or say, okay, here's my next spiritual practice.

I'm now going to delay the turning on of this show on TV for three minutes. And during those three minutes, you observe this, the impulse in you, you observe, it's an energy form and you observe it. Oh, there you are.

There you are. And you feel it. It's like a little gremlin or something.

So this time gap can be a very useful first practice that you introduce a time gap before you give in. You're not saying I'm not going to give in. No, you say, three minutes.

During those three minutes, I'm going to observe you. And you shine the light of consciousness, the light of awareness on this impulse, which is an energy form. It can be an energy form that is in you as a kind of emotion.

It can also dangerously invade your mind. And the explanation I gave just now with this friend of mine, the thought comes into your head that explains why you should give in to this impulse that can happen easily. And there too, you need to be present enough, sufficiently aware, so that you do not believe in every thought, especially those kinds of thoughts.

You don't believe in every thought that comes into your head. You observe the thought because the thought is part of it. And even to the thought, you say, oh, there you are.

There's a thought, and there's a feeling behind the thought. And you set aside three minutes. During those three minutes, you observe that.

Isn't that interesting? Wonderful spiritual practice. But while you observe, you grow in consciousness, you apply consciousness to it.

Only three minutes, three minutes. And then after the three minutes, see how you feel. It may not, it may have dissolved, but probably not yet.

It's still there. And then you can see, can I do another two or three minutes? Am I strong enough for that?

Is my awareness strong enough? And yes, it is. Don't believe your mind.

Stop this nonsense, do it anyway. And then you achieve five or six minutes of, and then what happens after that, we don't know. It is possible that the impulse has receded, gone back to a dormant state, and you're suddenly, you don't have to do it.

It's also possible that the impulse is still there, and you cannot, after five minutes, there's not enough awareness left, and you have to go and do it. But at least the five minute interval, the time gap was very important. And when anything like that happens, you always introduce a time gap for your spiritual practice, during which you do not hold it down but you observe it.

So you don't push it down, you observe. Oh, there you are. So if it's a gremlin, you don't hold you down.

You look at it. There it is. Oh.

Now the interesting thing, when you apply awareness to something, you shine the light of consciousness on it, the possibility of transformation is also there. It arises as you shine the light of consciousness on it. This is the famous example from fairy stories and so on.

The frog, you don't kill the frog or do something with it. You kiss the frog. And the moment you kiss the frog, it turns into the prince.

So the frog stands for, this is like mythology. There's some wisdom embedded in these fairy stories, which by the way, many of them were not created by the people who wrote them. They were already orally transmitted over long periods of time.

So they are mythologies that often contain a lot of wisdom and certainly a lot of wisdom in kissing the frog, which then turns into something beautiful. So there's something ugly, but you give it an acceptance and love. You look at it and then transformation happens.

So that is the spiritual practice. And after a while you will find that initially, perhaps after the time gap, you still do it. But then gradually this time gap gets longer.

And then you may observe that the energy behind the impulse weakens and it subsides until next time, but gradually it weakens. And all these self-sabotage mechanisms then begin to gradually disappear. If you apply the awareness to it, observe them, there it is.

So think of the frog. These are all the frogs and whatever they are, gremlins, frogs that live in U.S. energy fields. The energies are trapped there.

They are not in themselves bad. They are trapped, like the pain body is an energy that is emotional energy that's trapped. When the pain body dissolves, it's transformed into presence.

It's like a fire. You put a log into a fire or it's consumed and transmuted, perhaps is the word, it's transmuted into presence. And here we have, again, the famous example.

In middle ages, certain philosophers were very interested in alchemy. Alchemy was supposed to be the transformation of base metal into gold through a chemical process of transformation. But the true meaning behind alchemy was the transformation of human consciousness.

They have many images and so on. They could not speak and write about this openly because they would have been executed by the church at the time. So they had to hide all these symbols as if it were to do the transformation of base metal into gold, of something that is, first of all, not very desirable into something wonderful.

And that's the alchemical process of transmutation, which really is something in the human psyche. There's an entire long treatise written by Carl Jung, the psychologist, on alchemy with countless illustrations and just fascinating things. But it's the transformation of something undesirable initially into awareness or into consciousness.

You're lucky to have that. Taylor designed spiritual practice for you. Thank you.

So let's finish with a moment of stillness. I will use the ceremonial bell to finish the session. Beautiful sound.

Amor fati, loving what is. In this episode, Eckhart talks about the process of writing his first book, The Power of Now. He says he surrendered to the idea that the book wanted to be written.

He explains he had a vision which inspired him long before he wrote the first word. He shares that he encountered naysayers, people who tried to discourage his pursuits. And he says when an individual or group tries to bring new knowledge to the world, they often encounter resistance.

The book eventually became a number one New York Times bestseller, and I believe one of the most influential spiritual books of our time. And he says that the ancient Romans had an expression for surrendering to something greater than ourselves, which is amor fati. In Latin, it means loving one's fate.

Eckhart believes the true meaning is loving what is. He says when we align ourselves with the isness of the present moment, enormous power is released, connecting us with an intelligence which permeates the entire universe.

I was beginning to write The Power of Now many years ago, and people asked me, what are you doing? I said, I'm writing a book. I knew it had, it wanted to be written.

That was the, I had to write it. This often comes to people in the state of presence. You realize what it is that wants to be created, rather than what is it that I want to create?

What is it that wants to be created in the totality of things? And I knew that this book wanted to be created, and it was a powerful impulse came. And I worked quite hard.

I was, there's a high intensity of energy, but it was enjoyable. That kind of, and people asked me, the environment always wants to, or it often wants to discourage you. People ask, what are you working on?

I said, I'm writing a book. What about the present, living in the present moment? People said, I wouldn't do that.

It's been done so many times. Can't you think of something else? So that could easily detract you if people question your vision, because this is a kind of vision that suddenly arises, and that's a beautiful way of creating.

So it's not just what I want to create. No, what is it that wants to be created? What is it that the universe wants?

And then you are in the service of that. And then people, I thought, I had no idea how many people would eventually read that book. I was still writing it.

And then I talked to somebody else who also, again, somebody who said, well, there's already, there's Ram Dass, he already said it all in this book, Be Here Now. Everybody has read that, so why write another book like that? Makes no sense.

Okay. And I said to this man, it doesn't matter. Even if only a few people read it, it's fine.

And if it sells very few copies, that's fine. Then I'll just go and sell tomatoes. I don't know, I don't know why I said, why selling tomatoes came to me.

And after that, I said it several times to people who questioned what I was doing, and I became sure that perhaps I would have had a market stall somewhere, and would have been happy selling tomatoes in the present moment. And so that means my, the intensity that was there was so different from the intensity that I experienced when I was a student working hard. That intensity was a stressful intensity.

It was an unhappy intensity. It was basically the ego trying to achieve something. And when the ego tries to achieve something, you can always tell the difference.

When you're engaged in pursuing a particular goal, inevitably, certain obstacles will arise on your path, even if it's the totality wants it, even if it is aligned with what the universe wants, so to speak. It does not mean that automatically there will be no obstacle in your path whatsoever. There probably will be obstacles, especially if you bring something new into this world.

There is also a force of a cutting of the word right now that wants to prevent new things from arising. There's a heaviness in sometimes, people don't like it if you bring something new in. And if you put yourself out, let's say you open a YouTube channel to spread spiritual teaching.

Great thing to do. I mean, there are incredible possibilities these days for reaching people through these channels that normally spread unconsciousness, but potentially could, and sometimes do, also spread consciousness. So there are incredible possibilities there for you.

But of course, the moment you do, the obstacles will arise. For example, in the form of comments that people leave about your YouTube channel, there will be 90% of people will probably love it, and 10% of people will try to pull you down. And they say, what a dreadful person and a fraud you are, and you should be doing this.

How dare you talk about happiness when all these people are unhappy. You're so selfish.

Whatever they say.

I stopped reading comments several decades ago. Because the strange thing is, the human mind, you read comments, the positive ones you can read, oh, nice, nice. And then you come after reading 10 positive ones, you read one spiteful comment about you.

Now the strange thing about the human mind is the negative things have a stickiness to them, and they tend to stick in your mind for several days. You've forgotten all the positive ones, but you remember the spiteful ones. So obviously, to totally disregard comments may not be right for everybody, but not to have an ego that feels offended when you read negative comments about the wonderful work that you're doing on YouTube or wherever you're doing it.

As you know, I have become a famous YouTuber. And my next ambition, obviously, is to become an Instagram influencer. You might think I'm too old for that, but there are lots of filters you can use.

And even I will look good with these filters. So whatever you do, obstacles will arise on your path. And again, when it's ego-motivated, when you encounter an obstacle, you react to it, and you become either angry or stressed or fearful, antagonistic.

Sometimes often the obstacle appears in the form of people not wanting you to do what you're doing, or whatever it may be. Obstacles will appear. In the new way of doing things, you look at an obstacle, don't complain about it, you just you face it, and you become still.

And then you either circumvent it, or you turn it around and it becomes something helpful. In the same way that a martial arts, in certain martial arts, you use the force of your opponent and transform it into something that is no longer attacks you, but it's turned around. So the force of your opponent throws him, and not you.

So the way in which you approach difficulties and obstacles changes, you don't get discouraged, you don't complain about obstacles, about these delightful people that are preventing you from achieving whatever it is you want to achieve. So there's a different way in which you approach these hindrances, obstacles, and so on. This is part of acceptance of the present moment.

This is an essential part of living, aligned with, because often in the present moment something appears that does not look optimum, not the best thing, and there you come to, all is the acceptance of the is-ness. You will notice that then you stop complaining about people, because in the other, if you're egoically possessed, then you will continuously be complaining about other people, how they are, they're not doing what they should be doing, or they're doing the wrong thing. And that goes, and then you tell the stories of, you're supposed to do that, but did he do it?

No, and then you do it totally wrong. You have stories, after story, after story, to strengthen your ego. That goes away, the complaining drops away.

There's just the is-ness of the present moment. Talking about ancient Romans, there was quite a bit of wisdom in antiquity. The Romans and the Greeks, the Romans adopted many things from the Greeks.

There's a famous saying, again in Latin, which is, well it's just two words, Amor Fati, which means the love of, Fati could be translated as fate, but really it is the love of what is. Amor Fati, F-A-T-I, the love of what is. That is again inspired by stoic teachings, to love the is-ness of the present moment, no matter in which form it manifests.

And with that comes enormous power. The ego thinks that by fighting against something, that is power, but that is pseudo-power. The true power comes when you're aligned with whatever is arising in the present moment, because that is an important aspect of what we call the power of now, or the Tao Te Ching, which is the same thing, to be aligned with the Tao.

Tao is the intelligence that pervades the universe and also dwells within you. So, intensity arises, but not stress. And I believe there are some people who have great enterprises, who are somehow able to conduct their business in that way.

I haven't met them personally, I think. And also you don't know, just by meeting people, you still don't know how they actually conduct their enterprises. Are they aligned?

I don't want to mention any names. Some names come to me. Maybe they act in that way, but I'm not sure if they do.

You don't really know until you observe a person in action. Then you can learn a lot about their state of consciousness. You can also learn a lot about their state of consciousness when you observe a person being confronted with a challenge.

What then? The person, a moment ago, was so spiritual. And then the challenge comes.

Sometimes people can be effective spiritual teachers, relatively effective, can give good talks. And yet in their private life, it's not happening. Still unconscious.

So, the good test, how do you, if you want to learn about your state of consciousness and not deceive yourself, it's not to do with how good a meditator you are. The real test is, how do you face challenges? And another test is, how do you act when you are given power in an organization or whatever it may be?

How do you act when you are given power over other people through rising in an organization or whatever it may be? Again, the ego comes most strongly through facing challenges or through giving power. There can be a very seemingly egoless person, and suddenly this person is given power.

It could be within a spiritual organization to a disciple of a great master, seemingly no ego whatsoever. And then the master gives him or her a powerful position. And suddenly this meek person, the ego blows up and you see total transformation.

This happened to, I don't know if you are familiar with Osho Ashram, it goes back a few decades. There was a woman in his ashram and he gave her power over the organization. And she was wonderfully spiritual before she got power.

And she went crazy when she was given power. The overblown ego doing the most absurd things and eventually the whole organization dissolved through madness. This implies to be very careful then even in yourself.

It's always easier to recognize the ego in others. A bit more difficult to recognize the ego in yourself. But self-observation is vital.

So self-observation is when how do you face challenges. By this the world can give you continuous feedback about your state of consciousness, how you face challenges. Or if you have power, how you use power over other humans, what does that do to your ego.

So that's a similar example one can give concerning power. In certain parts of the world, it is almost customary for periodically the government to be overthrown in a coup d'etat because people become so unhappy with the corruption of their government that finally they overthrow the government and some idealistic, perhaps idealistic new person comes in and takes over with their followers. And often the person who had the best intentions of creating a better place, the moment they achieve power, suddenly they turn again into the same person that they've just overthrown.

The moment they achieve power, all these things come in. So that's vital for self-observation. How do you conduct yourself in the face of challenges?

How do you conduct yourself when you have power in any capacity? So the coming back to the example of writing the book, then the book got written and it was satisfying that the book got written. I was satisfied that it was.

A few thousand copies were printed and then I spent several months putting always a few books in my plastic carrier going from bookstore to bookstore and saying, would you like to take two or three copies of this book that I wrote The Power of Now? If you don't sell them, I'll take them back. And some said yes, great, and others said no, not interested.

Okay, it's fine. I wasn't attached to the outcome and then something happened and it grew and grew and first slowly and then as everybody knows, then Oprah came in. But if I honestly compare my state of consciousness and my state of happiness or satisfaction when the so-called success was achieved, the worldly success, and before when I was just writing the book, there's no difference.

I wasn't any happier. It was satisfying to have the success, but basically I was not any happier having been successful in this endeavor than when I was engaged in creating it. It was just as beautiful, one could almost say, more beautiful, the act of creation, even more joyful than tasting the fruit, the final outcome.

In fact, probably even more joyful. If it had not achieved much, maybe only had had 10 readers or something, that's fine, 10 people, maybe one of the 10 had experienced a change in consciousness through it. That's good.

Would I really have sold tomatoes? I don't know. And the outcome always brings up a new situation.

When everything grew fairly quickly, it doesn't mean suddenly life doesn't challenge you anymore. The other big challenges suddenly come in. So, and limitations too.

Every situation has its opposite. You gain something here, you lose something there. The first few retreats I had were great.

I could hug everybody after the retreat. We had hugging sessions. It was wonderful.

If I do that with you, I'll be here for several days probably. So, the intimate interaction with people as the groups grew and grew was no longer possible. That is a limitation.

I always enjoyed that so deeply. And yet, far more people were being reached. So, you gain something here, you lose something there.

So, with any success you ever achieve, you will find the polarities. So, there is in this world no absolutely satisfying situation on this horizontal dimension. There cannot be an absolutely satisfying situation.

There's always gain and loss, gain and loss. The true satisfaction is derived only from the vertical dimension, only there. And if that is your point of departure, then whatever is created out of that is enjoyable, particularly because you no longer demand situations or achievements to provide you with absolute satisfaction.

You no longer demand that you enjoy, yes, but you don't place a demand on them that they cannot meet. So, whatever you achieve is maybe enjoyable, but it will always have another side to it. And sometimes the very thing that people achieve gives them satisfaction for a while and then it turns into its opposite.

The very thing that makes you happy then makes you unhappy. So, knowing that, make the primary focus of your life the now. Be rooted in the vertical and then the purpose of your life, then there are two purposes in your life.

Your personal purpose, whatever you want to achieve as a person here, and your deeper purpose, which is the alignment with consciousness. The deeper purpose is the fundamental one. The deeper purpose is whatever you do to be conscious in anything, whatever you do, to be aligned with only universal consciousness, whatever term you want to use for it, the deep eye, as I call it often, to act from the deep eye.

Your primary purpose is to be aligned with that, to embody that. The rest is secondary purpose. So, it's all bearing in mind primary purpose and secondary purpose.

Primary purpose is your state of consciousness in this moment, no matter what you're doing or even if you're not doing anything. Primary purpose continues to be there until you leave this body. So, if you are 95 years old, there's still the primary purpose of your life.

It is less likely that age of 95 you will still have other purposes on the horizontal dimension. Probably not, but who knows, maybe at 95 you can take up some new, learn something new, but it becomes less and less important as you grow older. Primary purpose, secondary purpose is to do with you as this form identity here on this horizontal plane, which is not to be disregarded.

It has its place. It also has a certain importance, you as a person, it has a certain importance. It is not primary though, it's secondary.

The two need to come together. So, whatever your purpose is on the horizontal plane, the primary purpose must flow into it, so that are not separate. It's not enough to be a good meditator and then the rest of your life conduct as unconscious everybody else.

They have to come together. Now you know what your primary purpose is. If you don't know what your secondary purpose is yet, because I know there are some people here who don't know what the question they often ask, what am I supposed to do in life?

I want to find my purpose. Not everybody has found it already and perhaps not even everybody has some big purpose that they need to pursue. Not necessary for many to embody the primary purpose in whatever activity you engaged in, even if it is seemingly insignificant, may well be enough.

Although it is totally possible that a seemingly insignificant activity could grow into something bigger, but it doesn't really matter. For some people, whatever they are doing is fine. It's not for everybody to create something big and new.

Maybe you do, maybe you don't. The volume, so to speak, of whatever your personal purpose is doesn't matter that much. If you don't know, if you feel there is something for me to do but I don't know what it is, then I suggest you meditate on it.

You become still and don't ask yourself what is it that I really want to do, but ask yourself what is it that the universe wants me to do that could point you in the right direction. And then you might get a vision of what may be helpful to the totality of life and other people. Your secondary purpose almost inevitably has something to do with other people.

It will connect you with people, and so your primary purpose flows into that and changes the way in which you deal with with other people. All your interactions change. What is my purpose?

What is it that the universe wants me to achieve, to create? Is there anything? And nothing may come immediately.

If you feel strongly there is something, you could use an affirmation. I used an affirmation after awakening. I was beginning to counsel people, spiritual counseling individuals for several years, and I knew I had an important truth that was coming through.

It grew and grew through the counseling sessions. It developed more and more. But I was only reaching a few people and then I was beginning to do workshops, occasional weekend workshops.

Sometimes ten people came. Once I had a workshop when one person turned up. I did it anyway.

It was good. But I felt this is moving very slowly and I'm not very reaching. It was enjoyable to do the sessions, but I could see I wasn't reaching many people.

So I found myself in a church in a village in Somerset where I was living at the time, and so an ancient village church, and I was alone in their 1,000-year-old church. I loved those. Every village had one, beautiful.

So I sat in the church and I was contemplating the situation, and then I said, suddenly it came to me, I want acceleration. I visualized acceleration for my work. My work is becoming accelerated.

Please give me acceleration. And then I could feel that it had already been granted in that moment. Yes, I want acceleration for my work, and I'm getting acceleration for my work.

It was a strange feeling it was already happening. And then I left. I went back home.

Nothing much changed. Weeks passed, and three or four months passed, and then suddenly one morning I woke up and I knew I had to leave England and move to the west coast of North America. I didn't know what the purpose was, and I didn't know that was part of that purpose, the acceleration.

Later I realized I needed the energy field of the west coast to even be able to write that book. The energy was necessary for me, but I didn't know that consciously. It came just, I knew I had to do it.

Later, much later, I realized that was part of the acceleration that was beginning to happen at that point. So sometimes an affirmation can also point you in the right direction. For example, you could affirm all the things that I need for my work and fulfillment are coming to me.

All the things I need for my work and fulfillment are coming to me. The things that I'm meant to do in this world, the service that I'm providing in this world, it's coming to me now. Whatever the realization, what I need to do is coming.

Or you affirm that it is already happening, that's the most powerful type of affirmation. Then you may find after a time gap, things begin to move. You have to find your own affirmation, what works best.

Use it in the present tense. It's just a thought form that you put out into universal intelligence. These things work especially, they're much more likely to work if they're not egoically dominated.

So it's not, you're not asking for something to satisfy your ego or to remove your sense of lack or not being enough. It needs to come out of a sense of fullness, not a sense of lack. Many people want to attract something into their lives to fill a sense of lack that they feel.

That is not an efficient way of manifesting circumstances. They need to come out of the sense of fullness of life. There's an expression that Jesus used.

Jesus said, I want you to have the fullness of life. What is the fullness of life? It's the realization of your essence identity in the now.

That is the fullness of life. It's amazing that he said that. In some translations it says, I want you to have abundant life.

In other translations it says, I want you to have the fullness of life. Fullness is better than abundant, because abundant could mean many, many things, but it's not to do with many, many things. The fullness is the one thing, the one thing that is of absolute importance, and it's not a thing.

So the fullness of life is to already, the experience of that is the satisfaction that is inherent in the essence of your being. This is the eternal, the invincible summer in you, Connie, to have that. And that is the departure point for manifesting.

Then whatever vision you bring into the fullness of life is then empowered by the fullness of life. And this sense of fullness, of deep satisfaction that is in the present moment, they come together. And then the vision is empowered by this.

So you feel that not only do you already have, you feel as if you already had it. It's not going to make you any happier, really, if you do attain it. Jesus said it all in just one sentence, the entire secret of manifestation.

You don't need any more books. Just that one sentence, Jesus said, all the things that you pray for, believe that you already have them, and they will be given to you. Believe that they're already yours, and then they come.

So he never said believe that you will get them. Believe, but what is this belief? This belief is not a thought.

It is also a thought, but fundamentally it is the faith behind the belief. There are these two words. Faith is a thought thing that has its place too, but the faith is the power behind the thought that comes from the realization of your essence identity.

Your essence identity is the power that then empowers the thought, which is the thought is the belief. Faith is something deeper. Faith is immediate power.

Faith is what in the Tao Te Ching is mistranslated as virtue, is faith. Faith is the internal power that is inherent in your being, the essence of your being. So belief is the thought structure.

Faith is that which empowers that particular thought, and then you experience that as a reality already here and now. I kind of, I had that vision even before I wrote The Power of Now. The vision came to me what it was that wanted to be created, and I even wrote it down.

It was not so much an attempt to manifest as almost a realization that that was going to be manifested. There was already that certainty it was going to be manifested. So that is the, play around with that.

It's not, nothing is deadly serious. You play around with forms, creating new forms and so on here in this dimension. It's not the seriousness.

I must have that. I must, and I'll be unhappy if I don't get it. I must have it.

No, you play the lila, the divine play. You play around with forms. You enjoy the play of forms.

There can be an intensity behind it, but not stress. And enjoyment, there is that. Sometimes the intensity comes when you touch upon something that's now being created.

Power, you can feel how power flows into your action and even into your mind, and that's beautiful, but it's not serious. Don't take anything too seriously in this dimension. It's a play, and it dissolves after a while, whatever you create, except the growth in consciousness.

Behind it is consciousness. Consciousness evolves and grows, and that remains, the forms dissolve otherwise, that everything has a certain lifespan, everything is fleeting. Eventually, of course, things leave you, or you leave them, and then it's fine.

Oh, that's, it's quite an adventure. But once you know the secret, which this is what it is, it becomes enjoyable. The journey becomes enjoyable, and gradually the world gets better, too, after it goes through a period of a little bit of chaos where we're going now.

And that's fine, too, because that will add to the driving force behind the awakening. As things begin to dissolve collectively, the awakening intensifies the awakening of consciousness, and that's a beauty of it. There's nothing to fear at all.

Well, the end of our retreat has come, but the essence of the retreat is within you, so you carry it with you, and then the scenery around you changes as you move away, and you're always, consciousness is the space for whatever happens, the space of consciousness. It's been wonderful to share the presence with you. It's not my presence, it's not your presence, it is divine presence manifesting through each of us.

And now comes the rest of your life, and I predict that for the rest of your life, the person that you are, also the person, the personality, recedes a bit more and more, and becomes a bit more, more and more transparent. For the the personality I call the surface eye, the surface eye begins to gradually recede more and become almost transparent for the light of the deep eye to shine through the surface eye, and that is the process of transformation. The personality is still there, it'll be there until you die, there is a personality there, but the surface eye, but more and more the deep eye shines through, and when you reach the end of your life, the so-called your life, yes, there's no your life, but because you are life, you don't have it, you reach the end, and then there's the deep eye manifesting powerfully, and the personality begins to and as death approaches, just the light of consciousness of the deep eye shines through you, shines through the personality and through the physical form, and that's beautiful, and that is you have fulfilled the purpose of human existence, the flowering of human consciousness, it doesn't matter when death comes, whether it comes next year or in 50 years time, when it comes it'll be the present moment.

So I thank you, and I'd like to say goodbye to you, and also I believe and hope Kim is waiting backstage to also say goodbye to you, and I love you all.

Ask for inner peace. In this podcast, Eckhart takes the audience through his renowned inner body awareness meditation, encouraging everyone to sense the aliveness in every cell. He believes that this is one of the tools which can free us from the ego.

He also discusses asking for guidance during meditation. He says, we may be asking for material possessions or the solution to a difficult life situation. And he says, the important thing to notice is what comes after we ask, we become still and surrender to receive wisdom.

He believes only then the answer will arise from a place of alert stillness and inner peace.

[Speaker 1] (0:45 - 10:53)

Thank you. Welcome, everybody. It's wonderful to be back with you all.

I'm looking forward to the next hour. So looking forward to it. In the present moment, of course.

I suggest that you close your eyes. I may do the same. And get in touch with the sense of aliveness that pervades your inner energy field.

If you can't get there immediately, feel the aliveness in your hands, a sense of animating presence, one could almost say. So you suddenly realize that your hands are there without looking at them or touching them. There's a feeling of hand, but there's no visual image attached to it.

And before we go into the rest of the body, I can already show you by showing you the example of hands, how to let go of a visual image. Because as we go into this meditation, in a couple of minutes or so, I'll be asking you to let go of the image of inner body. And let's just do it with the hands to start with.

So you can feel the energy field in your hands, but your hands are resting on the table on your lap or wherever they are. And you can sense the aliveness. And at this moment, you may still have a mental visual image of hands.

And let's just see if you can just let go of that mental image and focus attention entirely on just that sense of aliveness. So it's hardly almost not hands anymore. It's just somewhere in the in your inner space.

There is that sense of aliveness. And now we go to other parts of the body. Can you feel your feet?

Perhaps not as strongly as the hands, but they are alive to the legs. Take two or three conscious breaths. Breathe into the abdomen.

So as you breathe in, the abdomen expands slightly. At the end of the in-breath, there's a very brief pause where you can sense the energy field in the abdominal area of the body. And then you breathe out.

And at the end of the out-breath, there's a brief, very brief pause before you start breathing in again. Feel the abdomen and then hold the, as if the abdomen were filled with air almost, it feels. So you're holding it for two or three seconds.

And then you can feel this energy expanding into other parts of the body from there. And we'll do it another two or three times, a conscious breath into the abdomen. Feel the energy expanding from there and spreading into the rest of the body.

And now you can sense the entire body as a single field of energy, a single field of aliveness, and your attention is there. And you're holding your attention on it. It's actually a very pleasant feeling, the feeling that you are alive, that there is an animating presence in every cell of the body, an energy field that is the organizing principle behind the physical form.

So you're becoming aware of this invisible you or the invisible eye. There's ultimately only one eye. And now, let's see if you can let go of the mental image of body and not even think of in terms of legs and so on.

Just give your attention to the sense of aliveness. And as the next step, realize that there is no longer two of you, there is no longer the one that is observing that aliveness, but the observing presence and the aliveness that it seems to observe is a single, a single phenomenon and single energy field. So it's not no longer that you are observing internally, that sense of aliveness.

But you are that sense of aliveness. So the observer and the observed merge and become one. And that's a beautiful realization.

Once you get there, that sense there's no longer two of you, there's just one presence. And it's not that you know that presence, that presence knows itself, that presence is essentially you. That presence is the being beyond the human.

That presence is the ocean. The human is the wave. And that presence is your true self, your true identity.

It's not a form identity, it's essence identity, it's one with everything. It's not a separate self. That is your connection to source, your, the source awareness, the source of all life.

You are an emanation of that source and one with the source. You can call it God if you like. It's so wonderful.

I'd love to spend the next hour with you in this meditation, but you can do it for yourself. At least once a day. It doesn't have to be long, twice a day might be better.

And so that awareness, that power of presence grows in you, so that when you're facing life situations and challenges, then it doesn't leave you. You won't feel it as strongly perhaps as you do now, but it'll always be there in the background. And that is the awakening.

Let's just stay there just a little bit longer and then we will open our eyes. And again, suddenly the sense-perceived, visually perceived world is there. And yet, you haven't lost touch completely with this unmanifested dimension.

So you are present, you're able to perceive without losing a sense of being or beingness, the sense of the I, the I am, that's there. And yet you're able to perceive you're present within and present without. And you know who you are now, you are not essentially the person, you are essentially the presence.

And once you know that, there's nothing wrong with the person, you can continue to be a person for a while without being a troublemaker to yourself and others, which is the case for every person who is not in touch with the deeper dimension. So that's a wonderful meditation that is so easy that becomes second nature to you. And you may even find that in certain situations, you may spontaneously slip into that meditation.

You might be sitting waiting for something in a waiting room or wherever it may be, and you might just go in there just for a little while. And it may even be quite strong, even if you keep your eyes open. That's important to go into that pure awareness dimension so that you don't lose it when you go about your life.

So you don't lose the being when you are engaged in doing, which is, and the doing is important, because the doing challenges you. There are problems in this world, one after another challenges, and then you need to do to overcome or transcend the challenges, but without loss of presence, otherwise, you contribute to further challenges. So but let's not go there now.

Now Eckhart, we had one question that was specifically about this meditation. The person wrote in, I'm able to feel my inner body as a field of energy and aliveness. However, I'm having difficulty merging with it as awareness.

Are there any more pointers that you can give to help through this next step?

Well, it's, you have to just practice. The one point I gave at the beginning of this meditation, when I said even when you just begin to feel your hands, and your eyes are closed, that sense of aliveness, just practice letting go of the image, mental image of hand. And then all that's left is a sense of aliveness, which still you might feel, it has a certain location still in space, but it's not not a very precise location anymore, it's just in your energy field, there is that space of that feeling of hand.

And then, once you're in touch with the entire body, then that is the entire consciousness that you are pervading the body, and dismissing the to let go of the image of body just requires a little bit of practice, there isn't much that I can say now, in addition to what I've said, except that practice it and I believe you will quite easily be able to become free of the mental image of body. We are talking about things we're using language for something that one cannot really talk about, because all language is derived from the sense perceived world. So when we talk about these inner realms, it's very hard to use language, one can use analogies and so on.

So just practice and as long as there's any kind of thought in the background, then you will still be there as a separate observer, because the moment there's a thought, then you are a separate entity. It's when when you're able to arrive at this point of cessation of thinking, then the merging is easy. What really most likely keeps you from being able to merge is there's still a certain thought activity there.

So as we focus on the sense of aliveness, so completely that you cannot think anymore, you're just giving your complete attention to that, which is also deep stillness and deep alive stillness. And the moment you are in that state of no thought, then the merging almost happens automatically. Because thought creates a sense of separation, thought is needed, of course, to function in this world.

And for many things, but thought is a great hindrance for knowing who you are. It's the greatest hindrance for knowing who you are is the conceptual thinking mind. So if you're able to let go of all thoughts, then the merging happens almost automatically.

It's a practicing it's one can, it's almost as if one were asking me to describe how to ride a bicycle, how do you keep yourself from falling off the bicycle? I cannot quite I can give a few hints. But ultimately, it's only by doing it that you suddenly there's a knowing there that is beyond the conceptual mind.

Nobody could understand to ride a bicycle by reading a manual about it. Or any kind of guidance is ultimately you have to get on it. And then you may fail a few times.

And then suddenly, there is a suddenly it becomes second nature and you never lose it again. It's a it's a shift into the depths of who you are. So that and many people are disconnected completely from who they are.

So it's not why are they disconnected? Because all their life they've been identified with the conceptual mind, or that they've derived a sense of self from the conceptual mind from the narrative in their mind. So they are disconnected from their essence.

And so as long as the conceptual mind is still operating, even just little sentences, you, you cannot merge. So, but the body awareness is very helpful, because it's a wonderful tool for becoming free of the conceptually, it becomes an I call it, I believe in the power of now I called it an anchor for presence. So it's the best place, the best entry point into that transcendent dimension.

[Speaker 4] (16:11 - 16:29)

We have a question here, Eckhart from someone who wrote in, when one asks for inner guidance or help, who's asking? Is it the ego that's asking for guidance or help? If this is the case, is it better just to observe what is going on inside?

Well, the, let's say you're asking, I don't know what you're asking for, you might be asking for awakening, or you might be asking for some material possession. But let's assume you're asking for inner peace, or you're asking, or maybe you're faced with a problem, and it is no solution to a difficult life situation, you're asking for help. This is a pointer, the asking is like sending a little, it's a conceptual pointer.

It's a thought, the asking is still a thought. But what is important is what comes after the thought. When the, when you're asking for guidance, let's say in your life situation, that is means I am ready to step into spacious awareness.

So the asking is the signpost. It is a sign that you are ready to become still, because only there can the answer arise, can only arise from stillness. So I'm asking for guidance.

And the moment you've asked for guidance, if it works as it is meant to, then you are still, there's an open spacious presence, guidance. And suddenly there's a stillness, there's an alert stillness that is, you may immediately sense the entire energy field of your body, and all the things that we have done in this just practice in this meditation, may happen in one moment, when entire sense of physical self, separate self collapses, and all that remains is an alert stillness. So the entire thing that we did step by step just now, as you become more attuned to the transcendent dimension within yourself, this can happen in an instant, and can happen in an instant after you ask for guidance.

And after asking for guidance, there's no longer any thought. It's just spacious awareness. There's no longer any you, you are not there anymore.

There's nobody left to ask for anything. And suddenly you realize the fullness of life that is already there. And that sense of completeness that is inseparable from who you are in your essence.

And then at some point, it could be maybe just a minute, it could be five minutes, we don't know. You start thinking again, you're back. And it is possible that then an answer suddenly arises in your mind, as a thought, yes, but it didn't come before.

Or guidance may come in another way, because by going deep within, you found your connectedness with all life, with your sense of oneness with all the connectedness with all life. So the answer could come seemingly from without. Suddenly your phone, the phone could ring, and something has arisen, and the answer is there.

And you said, well, this person has perhaps who now offers me the solution to the problems had been planning to call me for two hours. Although I only did my meditation 10 minutes ago, seemingly miraculous things like that can happen where you could explain away why this helpful thing has suddenly come into your life, but it is connected, even time is no longer operating in the normal way. Often when you when synchronistic events happen, they almost sometimes happen can happen as regressively, so to speak.

And many strange things can happen when you connect with the with source. So the essential thing when you ask is, the asking is simply an expression that you are ready to enter that state of spacious awareness, and you're ready to let go of your individualized sense of self, you're not a person anymore. And then the person can receive the answer.

Suddenly, it can also come as an event, something that happens, and it may not come immediately. And it may be that the answer that the problem is not solved. This is another possibility that the problem, whatever it may be, is not solved on the external level.

It could be that you just internally transcend the problem where it no longer matters to you that there's another way that which has guidance can happen in various ways. Sometimes the situation becomes resolved. Sometimes you suddenly have inner resources that you didn't have before, so that you can do something to resolve the situation.

So that's possibility one. You suddenly have inner resources, especially creative ideas, a sudden realization or a strength that wasn't there before, so that you're able to deal with the situation and change it. Or it could happen that something happens almost by itself, so that the situation resolves itself, or somebody does it for you, or it evaporates into nothingness.

That's another possibility. The third possibility is, and these are all things that happen when you contact your essence, your essential self. The third possibility is that the external situation does not change.

The situation that before presented an enormous amount of pain to you, or an enormous amount of upset, or conflict, or whatever it may be, suddenly you find internally you have transcended that situation. It is no longer causing you suffering, because you have connected with the transcendent dimension within you. So the very same situation remains, and yet inside you, you have transcended it, and you're totally at peace.

They're all miraculous things. We don't acknowledge these things as miracles, but these are miraculous things. So you can overcome a situation through increased consciousness, inner strength, or you can bring about a seemingly synchronistic or coincidental event that changes the situation, or you just simply internally transcend the situation.

So for example, as physical healing is concerned, it could be that physical healing actually happens spontaneously. It could be that you take the right steps to make the healing happen by changing your life habits, and your diets, and everything else, and the ways in which you think. Or it could be that healing does not happen, but the physical condition that you're faced with has brought about a very deep awakening of who you are, in which case how much longer you live no longer matters.

You have transcended the situation. So all these things are possible.

Hello Eckhart. Hello. Here's my question.

I have a relationship for almost two years. I love her, and she loves me, I think so, but she's not interested in meditation, presence, or any other related areas. So it's hard for me to share my experiences or my state of consciousness, what I go through in this process.

I mean, sometimes I tell her, like, she's asking me, how do you get so calm when we argue, or after our discussions? And I told her that I'm not my mind, and I tell her about pain, but she looks at me, is it Eckhart's stuff, or it doesn't make any sense to me, or etc. So it's very challenging for me to share this journey with her.

And I don't know how to balance my relationship, and my question is, is it possible to maintain such a relationship, or how I can, how can I balance my relationship if it is a situation? Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (25:20 - 25:35)

Right, thank you. You are not the only person who is experiencing that challenge. What are your feelings towards her?

Are they deep, or do you feel love towards her?

[Speaker 2] (25:36 - 25:36)

Yes, I love her.

[Speaker 1] (25:37 - 29:47)

Right. You have not, you don't live together, do you? No.

Well, only, you have to allow a little bit of time to see whether there's any opening in her, and it is not likely that if there is an opening in her towards spiritual awakening, it is not likely that it will come through your words. And I would give up trying to explain to her what it is that we're engaged in, and then being disappointed when she doesn't get it. Instead of trying to explain anything, just live it, live the teaching, be as present as you can when you are with her.

If a pain-body episode should arise between you, if you observe it in her, don't even try to explain, don't use any of these terms like pain-body, she's not ready to hear it on that level. But just practice not getting yourself being drawn into it, so that you don't feed it. It's your presence practice.

And it's just as an unconscious person can pull somebody else into unconsciousness, and it often happens, the reverse is also possible. A conscious, a present person can pull the other into presence without talking about it at all. It is actually counterproductive for you to try to explain what you're engaged in.

So just live it, be as present as you can when you are together. And it is possible that at some point in the relationship, you will ask a question, it will arise out of a practical situation, perhaps living together, it'll be a true question. And then you will answer the question not by repeating something that you've read in my books or anything like that, but you answer from your own realization.

It could be a simple question, but this could be a slight opening shows itself to you. So I don't know what that is going to be. It is also possible there are some humans who are absolutely not ready for any kind of spiritual awakening.

Now, they may need to suffer much more. I have had many accounts of people who were given one of my books, giving to a friend or relative, and the friend or relative said, I don't understand a word. Why did you give me this book?

It's completely meaningless. And then they put the book on the shelf. And this story was told to me by those people who were given those books.

They put the book on the shelf. 10 years later, they had gone through a certain amount of suffering in their life. They picked up the book again, and suddenly, it made sense.

And suddenly, it became extremely helpful. So I don't know what stage she's at. Only you can know by spending more time together.

I don't know. Are you able to go on vacation together? Or in your country, probably it's not common to live together before you're married.

Is that right? Yes, that is right. That makes marriage a little bit more risky.

Because you don't really know the person until you start living together in daily life. They say so. So I would give it a little bit more time before you make that final decision.

But realize that any kind of explanation is not helpful with her. But you practicing presence may be helpful.

[Speaker 2] (29:48 - 30:08)

Actually, I tried it many times. When we are spending time together, I practice presence, I get interested. And she's like, it's like you are not there, she says, when I practice presence.

What does she say? It feels like you are not there, she says. Okay.

[Speaker 1] (30:10 - 31:42)

Okay. Well, then you have to practice presence in a more natural way. You can practice presence just by engaged in normal conversation.

And yet you're this, the presence is in the background. You don't have to show that you're that you're present by any kind of visual, facial expression or eyes or when you whenever you look at her, let's say she will be talking. See if you can be free of thinking.

You look at her and you're free of thinking, but she it's better if she does not notice it, not on a conscious level. So you don't intensify your look, you don't, you don't look, you don't stare at her. So she doesn't notice that.

But you are not thinking while she is talking to you. And it's beautiful, because then you can sense her, her deeper being. And the more you can sense her deeper being beyond the person, the more the opportunity is there for her to realize that within herself.

And suddenly she feels it can often manifest simply as her loving to be in your presence. She doesn't know she because she just loves you. She doesn't know she doesn't realize that there's something in you that is deeper than the person.

But that's fine. She doesn't you don't need to explain anything, but give it a little bit more time before you make a final commitment. And give up your explanations.

Don't talk about Eckhart Tolle again to her.

Eckhart Tolle Awakening From The Dream State : Finding Balance Between Being And Doing [ca016b80-f2c2-41f4-b16e-3c64f8a1d185]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:11)

Awakening from the dream state, finding balance between being and doing. In this episode, Eckhart talks about the importance of finding balance between being and doing. He explains, so many of us get lost in the doing because we're so focused on external achievements, getting ahead, chasing after what we think constitutes the perfect life.

Eckhart adds that when we get lost in doing, we're also propelled by thinking. He teaches us that thinking is not voluntary. Instead, he says, thinking is something that actually happens to us and the movement of thought quickly takes on a life of its own.

Eckhart says, the unfortunate result is that we're rendered semi-conscious and living a half-life, as if in a dream. Eckhart reveals there is a deeper part of us beyond the dream and also an alert, brilliant state of consciousness just waiting to be realized. Miraculously, he says that the consciousness that is you is the same consciousness that underlies the entire universe.

So the vital thing is to find the balance in your life between being and doing. Here, we focus on being because most humans are suffering from the dreadful affliction, which we may call forgetfulness of being. And because there's forgetfulness of being, they are lost in doing.

They lose themselves in their doing. Or if they're not doing anything, maybe they're hanging around at street corners, then they are lost in semi-consciousness. They have moving below thinking, or they're trapped in very dysfunctional mind patterns.

And even the thinking, we could even categorize as, that's also a kind of doing. Doing is not just activities that you're engaged in in daily life, but underlying this external doing, there's the doing of thinking. The thinking is happening and that belongs to the realm of doing.

And although in most cases, it's not you who does the thinking, you are not doing it. It is a doing, but really, thinking is something that happens to most people. It's not something they do voluntarily as a choice.

So thinking happens to you, one could say. So I sometimes say, you don't think, you are being thought. You're being created by the involuntary and compulsive movement of thought that is conditioned by the past.

And this involuntary compulsive movement creates a mind-made kind of entity, a sense of self. And this entity is the ego. And for most people, that's who they perceive themselves to be.

And so you live with this entity. There's a good analogy one could use, that is that you, as the deeper consciousness, are asleep, and you're dreaming the dream of your life. Occasionally, you might wake up briefly, and then you fall back into the dream state, which is whatever drama is happening in your life, whatever situations are happening in your life.

So there's a personality or a person that's a dream-like entity. From the point of view of the awakened consciousness, you can clearly see that when you, retrospectively perhaps, as you awaken, you look back on your life, and you can see how many unconscious things happened that you were involved in, that you participate in, and so on. There was a whole drama unfolding, sometimes not so bad, and at other times, really dreadful, and a kind of nightmare in some cases.

And if you go back in all traditions, whether you go to Western philosophy or Eastern spiritual traditions, there's often the comparison of unawakened existence with a dream state. Many Western philosophers also have questioned it, and is life a dream? A famous play by Spanish playwright, Calderón de la Barca is, La Vida es when your life is a dream.

It's an ancient play. So the extent to which you are still identified with you as a person, you may still be trapped in the dream. It is possible that as you sit here, or wherever you sit or stand or lie, the awakened being is emerging, has emerged partially or maybe fully, and so there's a, you might be a hybrid between the dreamt entity and the one who is doing the dream, which is the consciousness.

You've probably heard of lucid dreaming, which means this is actual dreaming when you're asleep and you dream. It can sometimes happen you're in the middle of a dream, you suddenly realize that you're dreaming. It's a very interesting point.

Oh, it's all a dream. And then you might think, okay, I could do anything now. What can I create in this dream?

In most cases, this doesn't last very long because the state of wakefulness in conventional terms is not really compatible with dreams. So it's very brief. If you become aware in the dream, it's most likely that very quickly you'll wake up out of the dream, then it's gone.

And then you wake up into normal wakefulness, which is another, spiritually speaking, another kind of dream. Now, let's assume that this right now, this room here, a man speaking, you sitting there with your history, with your person conditioned, created by your history. And we could perhaps assume, could this be a dream?

Could you be dreaming this? Were you in the middle of the dream? You're dreaming of a man who says you may be dreaming.

Oh, and let's assume for a moment that that is the case, that you're actually dreaming this very place, situation, everything. Is your part of your dream? We don't know.

It could be the case. It depends how you look at it. From a certain perspective, it is.

From another perspective, it's not. Let's assume that it is for a moment. But even if it is a dream, there must be something that is more real than the dream, without which the dream could not be taking place, could not be.

And this prerequisite is, of course, there must be a consciousness in which the dream happens. So it becomes of secondary importance whether you're dreaming this moment or not. Even if you are dreaming this moment, there must be an essence within that dream that is real.

And that essence is the light of consciousness in which the dream images appear. And that light of consciousness is creating the dream. But the moment you realize that light of consciousness within you, that's the same thing as awakening within the conventional dream, the normal kind of dream, which I just talked about right here now.

Let's assume that this is a dream, a dream-like thing. In many ways, it is because dreams evaporate very quickly. They come, and then something else happens.

After this retreat, you might wake up the morning after and say, did I just dream of this retreat? Or did it actually happen? So let's assume it is.

And suddenly, you become aware of something within this dream, if that's what it is, of something beyond that, something that transcends the dream, is not separate from it, but without which the dream could not exist. And that is the sense of beingness or presence of I am, of consciousness, the realization that you are conscious. Or rather, language is very deceptive.

Mistakes can easily creep in the moment you verbalize something. When I say you are conscious, it's not quite right. You are consciousness.

The essence of who you are is consciousness. If I say you are conscious, and there's two of you, the you and the consciousness. So in the dream, if you suddenly realize that which is beyond the dream, by becoming aware, not becoming aware of something that arises, because everything that arises would be part of the dream, not becoming aware of any new form that arises as a thought or sensory perception or an emotion, but becoming aware of awareness, which is not something.

You can't say, there it is, I got the awareness, there it is. Oh no, it's over there. I just had it, but it's gone now.

So awareness or consciousness cannot become an object of consciousness. Everything else is an object that arises in consciousness. But if you attempt to make consciousness into an object, then you're lost again.

You cannot make consciousness into an object because consciousness is the very thing. If you're looking for, let's say you're looking for yourself beyond the person, where's the real me? Where's the real, I want the being behind the person that I'm looking for it.

If you're looking for it, waiting for an experience in which this thing happens, that would be very misleading, because you would be waiting for some experience, fireworks, spiritual fireworks, the ultimate vision, as you see in some ancient paintings of Christian mystics, and they go, and you can't have that for that long. I mean, the vision is there, how long is it going to last? So if you're looking for yourself in the realm of experience, or in the realm of manifestation, phenomena, object of consciousness, you can't find it there, because the very thing or no thing that's looking for yourself is you.

It's like a flashlight, you use a flashlight to find the flashlight. I'm looking for the flashlight. And this would also apply to God.

You have to be careful when you use that word. You're looking for God. Can you find God as an object in consciousness, an object that arises in consciousness?

If God is an object that arises in consciousness, God must have a location in space or time somewhere. It must be, if it's an object, it must arise somewhere at some point. There it is.

He is, she is, whatever. But could it be that you are an emanation, an extension of what is conventionally called God? A bit like a ray of sunlight is an emanation that originates in this unbelievable thing in the sense-perceived world that we call the sun.

There's a ray of sunlight that can reach down here. It's not the sun. It's connected to the sun.

It's part of the sun. Yes, but it's not the sun. How do you describe it?

And that's an analogy here. Could it be that you, the consciousness that you are, is an emanation from a transcendent source into this dimension? And if that's the case, then you can become aware, as you become aware of yourself as the awareness, you become aware of your deeper connectedness.

It extends into infinity, one could almost say. There's a depth to who you are that extends to the very source. And you can sense your connectedness to a vast power that transcends who you are as a person infinitely, and yet is not really separate from you, transcends who you are, but is not separate from who you are.

And there is an evolution of consciousness in this dimension of space and time. What is evolving is the, can observe that the universe that we seem to inhabit is gradually exhibiting increasingly complex manifestations of consciousness. Even on this planet, you can see there is an evolution started from very simple life forms.

And before that, there was just minerals or fire. There was a gradual evolution. Evolution, more consciousness was coming in to this dimension.

And more consciousness is coming in still. Humans are not finished. Humans are not a finished product yet.

Because if human evolution had already come to an end, that would be bad news. Then you could say there's something wrong with the universe. The universe is here to grow in consciousness.

Why? The whole thing nobody knows. You couldn't possibly understand conceptually, but you can only, you can sense that this is the case, especially by looking within yourself.

The most important answers concerning the universe, you can find if you look deeply within yourself, because you are a microcosm of the macrocosm. So in this dream of this room, you become aware suddenly that you're dreaming. Or you become aware that it might be a dream.

That it might all be insubstantial, which kind of it is. It's all insubstantial. There's nothing that lasts very long.

All the bodies here within a few years, by a few I mean, let's give it, there may be some very young people here, but let's be generous and say 80 years. Let's be even more generous and say 90 years. Within 90 years, at the most, definitely less in the case of the man sitting on this chair.

Within that, all the seemingly so real and solid bodies and personalities attached to the bodies, or the bodies attached to the personalities, whatever, will have popped like soap bubbles and dissolved. And this is called in Buddhist terms, impermanence. Important term used by the Buddha.

Everything is subject to impermanence. It's fleeting, very much like a dream. So these seemingly solid bodies and seemingly solid personalities, bodies, and everything seems so solid and important, and suddenly the thing pops.

All the things that were so important. So if we could see a speeded up version on camera, if we could speed up the movement of time and put 90 years into two minutes, and these bodies, you would see one body after another would pop out of existence. And this one gone.

And then after two minutes, which is 90 years compressed, there's nobody left. Nobody. Where are they all?

Where have they gone? So in that sense, everything is insubstantial in this physical universe, the physical part of it. And so you become aware within this dream of yourself, not as the participant in the dream, but as the awareness in which the dream happens.

That means it's a very significant thing of great importance that transcends who you are as a person. When you become aware of that suddenly, you are not separate from the universe. The consciousness of you is the consciousness that underlies the entire universe.

And that suddenly becomes self-aware in you, through you. Suddenly at this point, the universe obtains self-awareness. That's an amazing, amazing thing.

It's nothing to do anymore with you as a person. The person was helpful. The person was the, one could say, if you have a seed, the person was the seed, and then suddenly the seed sprouts.

Or another analogy, the person was the caterpillar, and the caterpillar was attached to its existence as caterpillar for a long time until it got more and more painful. It became more painful because the caterpillar was destined for something beyond, something else. But for the life of the caterpillar, it became really unpleasant.

I can't stand it anymore, the caterpillar said. Oh, I can't even walk anymore, crawl, whatever they do. And there's something very wrong.

And then the caterpillar becomes interested in those last moments of imminent transformation, becomes interested in spirituality. Maybe I'm more than a caterpillar. And then suddenly the transformation happens, and something opens up, and this incredible thing comes out, this beautiful butterfly.

But this analogy is not to be taken literally. It's an inner realization, so that your identity suddenly shifts. You're no longer identified with a dream character, although the dream continues for a while.

But you are rooted in a deeper dimension, which we could call the I am, the being of you, the human being. Remember what I said, the human is the person, the being is the transcendent consciousness that then awakens in the person. So the universe, one could say, has been engaged in this dream, and still is, but its destiny is to awaken.

And that doesn't necessarily mean that it's the end of the world. Eventually, that comes too, but we don't need to go there. In the same way that you can awaken in a conventional dream, as the universe awakens in you, the consciousness of the universe awakens in you, then you can continue in your dream, but no longer totally attached to the dream.

And whatever happens in the dream, the dream no longer determines your identity. That's a liberation. You continue, the dream continues.

It may even continue beyond the death, so-called, of this physical form, because underneath the physical form, you are still there as a thought entity and an emotional entity that is invisible, that is not physical. The thoughts within you are not actually physical. Nobody can find them in the realm of physicality.

No scientist would be able to detect any of your memories, for example. The greatest surgeon could open your brain, looking for you, but wouldn't find. Nothing that makes you you would the surgeon be able to find, including the memory of your grandmother that's been living there, and hundreds of thousands of other memories, that where do they live?

Do they even live in the brain, or do they live in the cloud? And then the brain downloads them when they're needed. That's amazing.

So this entity may well, especially if you've been very much identified with the dream character, then the physical form dissolves, but the psychological form, this mental-emotional conditioning, still has a form, and this form is still there. It hasn't realized anything beyond the dream. It hasn't gone deep enough beyond the conditioned consciousness that makes up the dream character.

And then there would be this entity, according to many ancient teachings, and if you look deeply enough within yourself, you can kind of sense that that is the case. The entity seeks another physical body because it needs more drama. I haven't had enough yet.

I want more sensory experience. There's a thirst, there's a Buddhist term for it, there's a thirst for sensory experience on every level. And so you get involved in another, another dream happens.

Now there are some people, there may be quite a few here, and if you ask, would you like to reincarnate again after, would you want to go through another one, another lifetime? Some people might say, yes, because I don't want to disappear. Well, and others might say, no way.

I can't go through this again. Just imagine another childhood. And so some, I definitely don't want to come back.

I don't want to come back. But is that really, do you really not want to come back?

Because the next day after making that statement, the phone rings and somebody says, there's a problematic situation with your stock investments.

And you get very, very upset. But yesterday, the day before you said, I'm done with this world. It doesn't attract me anymore.

I don't want, I don't need it anymore. I'm done with it. And then the next thing happens the next day, and the world draws you in completely.

You're not done at all. You get very upset about the slightest situations. So it means you want to continue the drama.

You're still attached, attached, attached. So if you awaken in this lifetime, as you are, then the dream continues. Of course, this particular dream, as long as the physical body is here, it continues.

And then there's a consciousness there. The consciousness has awakened in you, through you. And that means the compulsion to reincarnate will not be there.

Now, do you know that? How do you know whether the compulsion to reincarnate will not be there in you after the physical form dissolves? You can know that by self-observation in this lifetime, while you're still here.

Is there in you the compulsion still to identify with every thought that arises? That means you reincarnate. Reincarnate means to take a new form into your identity, reincarnates into each form that arises.

This is a compulsion to identify with rising forms, thought forms and emotional forms. So the Buddhists strive towards the end of the cycle of compulsive reincarnation. And some say, I think I may need another, at least 25 lifetimes.

And then I'll awaken then. Okay. That's, you got plenty of time then.

Perhaps not realizing that the reincarnation happens every moment in your life. Because what is reincarnation? Consciousness identified with form.

So you are born into, every time you are completely identified with the arising thoughts and emotions, your consciousness is asleep and is born into these forms, thought forms. That's the compulsion to reincarnate. So if you're not free of complete identification with thought forms, then there's a guarantee after your body dissolves, that the compulsion to reincarnate will still be there.

And you have to go through it again. Another problematic lifetime of drama and suffering. So the answer, of course, to the end of reincarnation, the compulsion to reincarnate must be here and now.

You cannot find the end to this compulsion at some future point. By observing yourself, are you attached to every thought form that arises, every emotion that arises, or is there an aware space in which they arise? And you are that.

That's the awakening. And then this, according to Buddhist teachings and others, as this physical form dissolves, the compulsion to reincarnate is no longer there. So you don't have to, if you don't want to.

But it could be that, so the story goes, out of compassion for humans, you do reincarnate. You voluntarily accept the sacrifice and you incarnate in order to bring more consciousness to humans, to free them from the dream state, from suffering. Not that you do it, but you bring, you're a bringer of consciousness.

And so you sacrifice yourself. And that would be, I believe the Buddhists have the term bodhisattva, is the term for those who voluntarily reincarnate to help others. And then there are others in Buddhism who are arahants, who say, no, I've had enough.

They are free, but they disappear into other dimensions. They don't want to reincarnate as humans. They are a bit more, they've said, I can't, no, not again.

I can't do it. Don't want to do it. I'm done with that.

I'm done. So that's the, the awakening within the dream. Then your life continues.

But the attachment lessens more and more. The attachment, not just attachment to thoughts and emotions, they're still there. It's fine.

Identification with thoughts and emotion, but also attachment to all the things that arise in life situations and so on. There is a spaciousness that makes your life easier. You relate to things in a more spacious way without the grasping that you don't need really any form in order to make your sense of identity more complete because you're no longer looking for a more complete sense of identity on that level, on the level of form.

And then the world of form becomes a more benign and quite often quite enjoyable place because you don't need to hold on to particular forms, whatever they may be, situations, possessions, achievements, people. You don't need to hang on and incorporate them into your sense of identity. That's me.

You identify with the possessions, you identify with the, whatever it may be. And it's never enough. And things very quickly, you identify with something and suddenly it leaves you and that leaves, brings more suffering.

But primarily what you always identify with, yes, you could say, let's say you identify with a possession. It means you have more than most other people than it works. So depending where you live, if you live in a very wealthy place, then you need more to give you a heightened sense of identity.

Let's say you have a, okay, now you drive your Lamborghini. What's that called? Lamborghini, Ferrari, Ferrari Testosterone, no, Testarossa.

Testarossa, it's called. It's a very powerful Italian car. So you identify with that or you have a private jet, even better.

Or it could be you have a beautiful body, better looking than most, and then you can easily identify with, that's me. And you live with an image in your mind and you call it, that's me. And it's projected outward.

But whatever you, ultimately everything becomes a thought form because even the Lamborghini or the private jet or whatever situations you identify with like social recognition or whatever it is, maybe you get, every time you tweet something, you get thousands of likes and it gives you an enhanced sense of me. You have thousands of Facebook friends. I have some, nobody knows you, but they, and everybody likes you.

You get these likes. But whatever you identify with, you experience them as thought forms. So in ultimate terms, you're not really identified with a car because the car, you experience the car as a thought form, my car.

You don't really know, that's another philosophical question. What is actually out what I experienced as the external world? To what extent does this correspond to the way in which I perceive what's out there?

Is there a thing in itself? We, lots of us ask beyond our interpretation of our perception. So perhaps I'm dreaming up the whole thing.

Perhaps there is no Lamborghini. Maybe I'm dreaming it. It doesn't make any difference.

Even if there is a Lamborghini, it becomes a thought form. And ultimately you don't identify with a possession or anything. They are all experienced in your mind as thought forms.

So the ultimate identification is always thought. And then thought is imbued with a sense of self. And that is the delusion when you're seeking for yourself in and through thought.

Eckhart Tolle Awakening Is Necessary for Our Survival [a8d4f249-7788-4ad9-a50b-728122b7f0e6]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:49)

Awakening is necessary for our survival. In this podcast, Eckhart elaborates further about finding freedom from the bondage of self. He says the first step is to confront our thinking and resist the urge to identify with every thought we have.

Eckhart says rising above thinking paves the way to liberation. He warns that we are quickly moving towards a crisis point for humanity and the planet. Eckhart believes this pivotal moment does not have to spell disaster because it is precisely during a crisis that we have the greatest opportunity to evolve.

He says many people are ready for a shift in consciousness. He says awakening is no longer a luxury. It is a necessity for our survival.

Now at first, this space of pure awareness seems to be nothing. And in a way it is nothing in the sense that it is not a thing, that it is not an object of consciousness. Because everything else is an object of consciousness.

Every sense perception becomes an object of consciousness. Every thought is an object. In other words, you could say it is a form that consciousness temporarily takes.

It incarnates into a form. And that form is a thought. Or it could be a sense perception.

And so that is the incarnation of consciousness into form. Sometimes Buddhists argue, how many more incarnations do I need before I no longer need to incarnate? You can do it right here and now.

Don't incarnate into thoughts. That's the end of incarnation. Which means don't identify with the rising thoughts.

Be the awareness behind the thoughts, which is what you are. And so at first it seems like, let's say, what we call it stillness. By the way, I wrote a little book that some of you might not know.

It's called Stillness Speaks, which is a little paradox, of course. Stillness Speaks, it's a book for meditative reading. You just read a few lines and you kind of become still.

That's what it's for. So the stillness is one way of putting it. But that's just a term, of course.

Stillness is the inner equivalent of silence in the outer world. Silence in the outer world is the absence of noise. Stillness in the inner realm is the absence of thought.

In the absence of thought, what remains is you do not fall asleep. In ordinary existence, when thinking stops, you very quickly fall asleep. So the only way that humans who are not awakened or awakening can experience the cessation of thinking is when they move from the wakeful state into sleep.

Then there comes a moment of you cannot remember your problems anymore because you're so tired. Five minutes before you were thinking about your problems, the problems were your identity. And now you get very tired.

You can't remember your problems anymore. But you're not totally asleep yet. And it feels so good.

You're moving towards sleep, and it feels so good. And temporarily, briefly, you're free of yourself. And then you move into the unconsciousness of sleep.

Ah. Now, most humans, without knowing it, are looking for becoming free of themselves, of themselves. And then again, they look in the wrong places.

Some humans find temporary relief from themselves by taking substances. And for some humans, it can be a good thing to have, especially those who are totally mind-possessed, that can give them a glimpse of something that's beyond their mind. It may temporarily stop their mind.

But don't become dependent on anything. And I don't recommend it. You don't need it.

But if you take humans, they love that smoking these dried leaves that were illegal for many years for some reason, but now you can smoke them. Well, I don't know about here, but it temporarily calms the mind. It's like your mind becomes a bit...

I tried it once when we were visiting Amsterdam. And it kind of dulls your mind a bit. That's how I experienced it.

But I can see what it does to people whose mind is very active. They go temporarily, they become free of themselves, their mind-made self. And they've become, oh, happy, so happy.

I can't stop laughing. That's how happy I am. I'm free of myself.

So the way I put it is, with this, yes, you are becoming free of yourself, but you're falling below thinking. You're going to a state prior to the arising of the ego. You're falling below thinking.

Yes, you are free of the mind that tortures you every day. You're falling below thinking. This is not the awakening path.

Otherwise we would call it the sleeping path or something like that. The awakening path is the ability grows in you to rise above thinking. That's what it is.

You are actually conscious without thought. And that is the simplicity of it. And then you find, at first, it's just an absence of thought, in the same way that externally silence is an absence of noise.

This is the absence of inner noise. And then at first, okay, and then you stay with it, and it comes back again at the end. Once you get a glimpse of that state of pure awareness, you may want to invite it into your life more often.

From the point of view of time, one could say that this power that manifests through you grows stronger. Not that the power itself grows stronger, but this dimension where there's time, it manifests more fully through you, so to speak. So the power, present power, as I sometimes call it, grows in you.

That is the power of life itself. That is the pure, pure intelligence, you could call it, pure consciousness, the very primordial thing that is behind everything. It is, am I talking about God here?

Am I saying that this, the consciousness itself is God? Well, yes and no. The analogy I like to use that is maybe helpful is the sun.

The sun emanates light. The light of the sun is the life-giving thing here that enables life to be. The sun pours out light continuously, energy.

There's the sun. Now this light, of course, is still connected to the sun. It's not separate from the sun.

It emanates from the sun, but it's not the sun. So it is and it isn't the sun. The sun itself is vast and inconceivable form of energy.

This is only an analogy. So what I mean then is God is the source from which consciousness emanates into this dimension. This is the closest, as far as I'm concerned, it's the closest in words to explain that which cannot really be explained.

So it's more like a poetic description of something that ultimately cannot be put into words, which after all are just sounds produced by the vocal chords. I cannot explain the universe by using sounds produced by the vocal chords. There are not that many sounds.

Oh, oh, ee, oh, psh, psh. That's about it. You put them together, and then you expect an explanation of the universe.

But nevertheless, I'm attempting it. So in the same way that the sun emanates into this world and it's the life-giving, the source of all life, this physical realm, God, the transcendent one, the transcendent source that does not exist in space or time, but is transcendent to space and time, you cannot understand it. That emanates what you experience as consciousness into this dimension.

So what you sense, and here we come to a point, realization, when you sense this consciousness in yourself as yourself, that is your connection with the source, which we make on God. And it's not just your connection. It's the realization that there is an ultimate oneness with the source.

That is the realization, and that is total liberation from believing yourself to be this limited little person with its limited and ultimately silly problems that all dissolve the moment the body dissolves. And then you have on your gravestone the date of your birth and the date of your death, and in between there is a little dash, and that was your life. And that's on the level of the person, all the problems, heaviness of problems.

Oh, oh. It's all gone, and that can go before you die. There's the ancient saying, die before you die, and realize that there is no death.

Let's put it like this. It's a misleading question, but I'll tell you in a second why it's misleading, but I'll ask it anyway. Can you be aware right now?

Can you be aware that you are aware? Can you be conscious right now that you are conscious? Now, I'm saying it's a misleading question because the moment I formulate the question, I have created a duality that says, I am aware of being conscious.

That's only because we are using language where every sentence is a subject and an object. But what it really means is the awareness that you are aware of itself. Can you be aware of yourself as the awareness?

So there isn't you and the awareness. There isn't you and consciousness. There isn't you and life.

Because consciousness is life. Primordial life is consciousness itself, and then consciousness manifests in life forms. Everything is a manifestation of it.

One could say that material things are consciousness at a certain frequency of manifestation. Matter is consciousness. One could say consciousness asleep or consciousness frozen consciousness.

You can say the mineral world is consciousness that is asleep. The plant world is consciousness that is dreaming. The animal world is consciousness that's beginning to awaken.

And the human is a potential of consciousness to realize itself that's in this dimension, in this dimension. So consciousness is the essence of it all. Consciousness is who you are.

Consciousness is what you are. Consciousness is life. So people have this strange thing.

I wrote that in, I believe, in Stillness Speaks. People say, he lost his life. Or they say, I don't want to lose my life.

No, of course not. Because you don't have a life. Not in the normal sense of the expression, you don't have a life.

In a deeper meaning, you don't have a life because you are life. So you cannot lose something that you don't have, but that you are. Nobody has a life.

You are life. You don't have it. Because if you have it, who are you and what is life?

This is a duality created by the human mind in this dimension. You can't help it in this dimension. But don't be trapped in that duality.

So can you sense that you are conscious right now? In other words, you are conscious of being conscious. You're conscious of yourself as consciousness.

I mean, it's not complicated. The mind might tell you, no, no, I can't do it. That's a lie.

Because there's nothing to do. There's no doing involved. It's a realization of being.

But the realization of being, the realization of being does not involve any doing. Because any doing would detract from the realization of being. Doing, being.

Doing belongs to the horizontal dimension of life, of course. Being is the vertical. Now, for a fulfilled life in this dimension here, you need to be rooted in the transcendent dimension.

Again, the intersection of horizontal and vertical. So it's the dance between doing and being. Doing, doing, also thinking is doing too.

Doing. But don't lose yourself in the doing. That's important.

To be able to do without self-reference, without seeking yourself in the doing, including the thinking, which is the primordial doing. So at first, for humans in whom this awakening happens, for most, at first they have then two separate compartments in their life. They have them involved in their daily activities, and then they go out into nature, or go into their room, and they sit, and they're able to, whether you call it a meditation or not, it doesn't matter.

The realization of being. In nature, sometimes it's easier than in the city. Cessation of thinking, but not falling asleep.

Very alert. Looking around. Sense perceptions, but no labeling.

No naming, labeling, let go of that. Just the awareness is perceiving this world. The trees, the lights, or if it's man-made, human-made, fine too.

Beautiful flowers, of course. Awareness is perceiving this, but not you as a person. When you are perceiving without naming, the person isn't there.

The person is receded, and consciousness is perceiving. So you're aware of yourself, and you're aware of what's being perceived. But at first, you have the two compartments.

You can become still when you're not being disturbed, and you go, ah, ah. And then you have to go back into daily life. And then your phone makes all these sounds, ping, ping, ping.

Text messages come in, ah, ah. It's being pulled out of you. What's happening now?

Somebody's posted something there. One of your many friends whom you have never even met, Facebook. Posting something, they're having a meal.

Look, oh, what a person. And so this world pulls you out. And then you look at someone who's posted a photo of themselves.

It's almost better looking than me. Not realizing, of course, they just have better filters than you. Filters are great for the externalized ego.

Everybody can look beautiful now, even me. They did it to me, too. So you're back into the world.

There was a famous French philosopher, Pascal, I believe, who lived in the, I think, 17th century. He had an interesting saying. He said, all the ills of humanity are due to a person's inability to sit quietly in a room.

All the problems, all the ills of humanity are due to a person's inability to sit quietly in a room. That at first seems a little strange, but there's a deep meaning behind that. Because to be able to sit quietly in a room, quietly means without being disturbed by your thoughts, because then you're not sitting quietly in a room.

To be sitting quietly in a room implies that you are connected with that transcendent dimension of consciousness. Then you actually love the being itself. You love this realization of being.

And then you sit quietly in a room without needing distractions, without needing to think about this or that, just to be, just to be, to be. That's really what he was talking about. Because everything else, all the troubles of humanity arise from being disconnected, not realizing their connectedness with thoughts.

So then you only have the ego. And the ego creates all the dreadful stuff in this world, both on a personal level and on a collective level. It dislikes, actually it talks about peace, but it dislikes peace.

It loves its enemies because it defines itself through the other. It needs to emphasize the otherness of the other in order to strengthen its own fictitious identity. And that's what's happening on a personal level.

It's happening collectively in the world. Entire nations needing to emphasize the otherness of the other. And then the egoic identity gets strengthened.

The ego loves its enemies. It needs its enemies. Without enemies with the other, its fictitious sense of identity would begin to become loose, begin to dissolve.

I need my enemies. All this is dysfunction that humans have inherited, that we are here to transcend. We need to now.

It's been a relative, one could almost say, a luxury for human beings in the past few thousand years to awaken. Only a few here and there have been able to awaken. Probably more than we realize because many of them you will have never heard of.

They never perhaps said very much. They didn't write anything. But still, relatively few.

We are now moving into a point of crisis for humanity and the planet. And it's at a crisis point where the possibility of awakening is greatest. It's when we really need to awaken.

Then it happens on a larger scale than just a few here and there. So it's no longer a luxury. It's a necessity for survival of the species.

And now we have reached this critical point. And that is not a bad thing. That is a good thing.

And many humans are ready for it. And many humans are already, almost all of you are here, because you are already part of the awakening of human consciousness, which is a next step in the evolution, one could say, in the evolution of humanity. It's one way of looking at it or putting it.

It is a shift in consciousness, the next step. Because humans, I would suggest, are still a work in progress, not a finished product. I mean, humans are a finished product?

That would be a terrible mistake. Somebody made a horrible mistake. If humans are not evolving but they're already finished in their evolutionary path, then God made a big mistake.

But humans on this dimension of time, they are evolving. On the horizontal level, yes, humans can do and achieve and become, becoming, becoming, becoming this, becoming that. But the awakening, it transcends all that.

The awakening is a realization of a dimension within you, but ultimately it's not within, it's also without. But it's a realization of a dimension within you, where you are already absolutely complete. On that level, you're already fully and completely yourself.

Not in a limited sense of self, but you are the self of the universe, which the Buddhists say is a non-self, and Hindus say it's the transcendent self. A little paradox again, the world is full of paradoxes, especially when we talk about these matters that you cannot really talk about. There is an evolutionary process here.

Humans are awakening, but the moment you awaken, the human realizes the timeless dimension of consciousness. And then you can still operate here and achieve and do things, no longer looking for a sense of completion or satisfaction through the doing, simply enjoying the doing, like a dance, a beautiful dance, or whatever analogy you want to use. You're not looking for yourself anymore in this world, because you have already found the transcendent dimension that is inseparable from who you are or what you are.

That is the I am, without adding anything to it. So you're not looking for yourself anymore in the doing. And then even the quality of the doing changes when you are connected with the dimension of depth within you, which is you.

Then the way in which you experience this world changes too. Yes, you as a person, of course, have certain idiosyncrasies and certain limitations. No person can be perfect as a person.

And yet, you realize that the deep I, there's no evolution in the deep I. So you're connected to the timeless dimension, the transcendent dimension. But you continue to operate.

Your ability to operate in this world has not become diminished, and your ability to think has actually not become diminished either, because thinking is no longer self-serving now. You can engage in thinking, but not self-seeking thinking. So thinking can become an inspired tool of the deeper intelligence, that is, the consciousness itself.

It can flow into your mind. It can use your mind. And then you have actually original thoughts, and you have original insights, because you're in touch with the transcendent intelligence itself.

One word you can use, transcendent intelligence, to talk of consciousness. That is another thing that happens as you're connected. The way in which you relate to other humans changes also.

There is a dimension of depth in your relationship with other humans, because you no longer just see the personality, the body and the personality, in the same way that you have transcended body and personality in yourself. When you look at another human, or they are speaking, and you listen to them, you're still, you're alert, and you look. The compulsion to name, to judge, and to label isn't there anymore.

You just, you look at them, you listen to them, and you can sense, beyond their personality, that timeless essence that is one with the essence that you are. Covered by the personality, yes. You accept the limitations of the personality.

Nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness, so that's how it is. Remember that if you have somebody to forgive in the past, nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness, and you can see, perhaps, their limitations, but beyond that, beyond the person, you can sense their consciousness, which is not theirs, of course, not yours, but what you sense is that which, ultimately, what you sense is your oneness with the other. Not as a belief or some concept, but you can sense, and that, you feel that as, what word are we going to use?

Let's use the word that's been misused so much, love. You feel that as love, but not egoic love. Come to me.

Don't you dare leave me. Not that love. Love is the recognition of oneness.

So, ultimately, you see yourself, you sense yourself in the other, and then that is love. So, ultimately, you always love yourself, in a deeper sense, because yourself is no different from the transcendent self in the other. Love is ultimately only one.

It's only one of us. And that recognition, then, you're free of having to react to the personalities, because the personalities, you might have noticed, can be really obnoxious. Oh, my God.

So, you encounter lots of obnoxious personalities in this world, but you're able to transcend that in your perception. And also, the judgments go out where you put people into little mental boxes and conceptualize every human, imposing a conceptual identity on every human being, because if you haven't gone beyond the conceptual identity in yourself, then you automatically impose a conceptual identity on every other human that you meet. And imposing conceptual identity ultimately means you're dehumanizing them.

You're reducing them to mental concepts. And this is how, very easily, violence can happen, when humans do it to other humans. They attach a label to the other human, and instead of sensing the humanity and ultimately the divinity of the other, they can't sense it anymore, because they have deadened themselves to that by imposing a conceptual reality, having some kind of name for the other.

He is, she is, such and such. Or a collective term, whatever you want to. He's, oh, he's a this and that.

So, you are dead now to their deeper, to their reality. And this is how, very often, violence happens, sometimes on a large scale, because you have dehumanized an entire group of humans by imposing labels on them. For example, in communism, it happened, millions of people were killed.

In National Socialism, a similar thing. In communism, for example, you had to, just a certain term. He's a class traitor and a counter-revolutionary.

Okay. Class traitor and counter-revolutionary. He imposed that conceptually, there's nothing left to this human being, but a class traitor and a counter-revolutionary.

Awful. Not a human at all. That's how millions got killed.

My God. One can only say, last words of Jesus on the cross, forgive them, for they know not what they do. In modern terminology, of course, he would have said, forgive them, for they are completely unconscious.

They are completely unconscious. Oh, my God. So, we see how important it is to transcend that dysfunctional state of consciousness that we've arrived at the end of it now.

It all had its place. Humans had to go through the phase of the ego, and now it's time to come out, to transcend it. The ego, strangely, creates so much suffering in this world on every level, but strangely, the ego, it ultimately awakens humans.

At first, it seems to do the opposite, but then the weird thing is the ego has a self-destruct mechanism built into it. It eventually self-destructs, and then the awakening happens. So, the ego can create havoc in your life.

If you're deeply ego-possessed, you create suffering for yourself, everybody around you, and you've probably met humans who are like that. If you create suffering for yourself unconsciously through the mind, if you make yourself unhappy, you make many others around you unhappy. But in the end, unhappiness becomes unbearable.

So, I've seen also egoic structures, sometimes spiritual teachings can become contaminated by the ego. Sometimes it starts as spiritual communities, beautiful at first, there's some arising of consciousness, and yet the ego comes in through the backdoor of spiritual ego. It comes in through the backdoor, and then the ego grows in the spiritual communities.

At some point, the whole thing falls apart, a big drama happens. The ego, again, self-destruct mechanism is built into the ego, and so that's a good thing. So, we have arrived at this point where awakening has become possible for many, many more humans than before because it is necessary, and you are all an essential part of that.

So, in addition of being a person with a limited lifespan, not just in addition, but more fundamentally, you are a manifestation of the awakening consciousness, ultimately of the universe, which is this dimension here. Throughout the universe, the universe is gradually awakening. Don't ask me why and where it's going, that's too much.

But I do know that the universe is gradually awakening. That's in time. Here we have time.

But it all emanates from the timeless dimension, like the sun and the light of the sun. So, you are the universe itself that's awakening in the disguise of a person, a human. And I'm sure the universe is awakening countless other disguises, other temporary forms.

So, you're not just a person, you are the consciousness of the universe, the greatest mystery there is. There's no greater mystery than consciousness itself, no greater miracle than consciousness itself. And you are that.

And you thought you were a little person. Of course, you still are a little person until you finally die, but there's much more than that. And you are free of believing that that's all you are.

It's the realization of the vastness of who or what you are. Amazing, just amazing. But please become more and more familiar with the gap between two thoughts, the awareness itself.

Catch yourself when thinking subsides spontaneously sometimes, when you look at nature. And then you're aware of the consciousness that you are and that which appears in that light of consciousness. And the consciousness that you are remains.

It's timeless. That's why we say, whatever happened in your life, it's always been now. The one thing that never changed is it was always now, it is always now, it will always be now.

And ultimately, that now is a space for what happens. And the space for what happens is consciousness itself. So the now is not what happens in the now.

Sometimes I think when you talk about the present moment, people think the present moment is what happens in the moment. It's not what happens. The reality of the present moment, what we call present moment or the now, is not what happens in the now.

It's the space for it all that is consciousness. It is the light of consciousness. And here, too, it's not two things.

Because what happens is, one could say, if we have to use words, it's a form that consciousness has taken temporarily. This is what happens and then it dissolves. It happens, it dissolves, it takes on a form.

So the now has always been there. This is why when you become aware of the now, you're really aware of yourself as consciousness. That's the deeper meaning of the power of now.

You become aware of the now, it's more than just becoming aware of what's going on. Yeah, that's fine, you're aware of your sense perceptions, that's better than being totally absorbed in silly, problem-making thinking, not constructive thinking, but most of human thinking is problem-making thinking. Yes, to be aware of your surroundings is great, to see the aliveness of it all, that's already a great thing.

But it's not yet the depth of now. It's still the surface of now. And the depth of now is, from there, the next step is being aware of the perceiver of it all, which is the perceiver is the perceiving consciousness, that which makes perception possible.

And that's the essence of who you are. And you can sense that directly. And it's not an object.

The only thing that can never become an object of consciousness is you, because you are consciousness. Consciousness cannot be known as an object. Jesus said it.

You know, he talked about the kingdom of heaven, which in my translation is a dimension of spaciousness, which is an inner dimension of consciousness. Kingdom means dimension. Dimension of spaciousness, vast spaciousness.

The kingdom of heaven is within you. And they ask, when is the kingdom of heaven going to come? Please tell us, where is it and when is it going to come?

And he said, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be perceived. You cannot say, look, it's over here, or look, it's over there. What truly I tell you, the kingdom of heaven is within you.

So what does he mean? You can't say it's over there, it's over there. It cannot become an object of consciousness.

You can never say, there it is. You can't say, I have it. You can't have it, but you are it.

This is the secret of the universe, the timeless truth of it all. Thank you.

Awakening Right Where You Are. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience. He urges participants to wake up from the delusion that the things we think will make us happy won't.

Even if we get everything on our wish list, wealth, fame, a life of ease, we still feel unsatisfied. But Eckhart says the world is not here to make us happy, it's here to help us evolve. He says no matter what our situation is, we can surrender to life's challenges and awaken right where we are.

The narrative in your mind that you call your life might tell you that your life was a failure. It might tell you your life was a great success, but in this case you probably didn't come here because if you were totally satisfied for your life, why would you ever look for anything beyond the material things and the mental things? Nobody can be satisfied for very long.

So you've all tasted failure, so-called, and some of you might think the whole thing didn't work out. I had such great plans when I was 18. I had great plans for my life, and then it didn't work out, but nothing worked out.

My marriage didn't work out, and then the second one didn't work out either, and then I got a job, but then I lost it, and then I made some money, but then it made me unhappy because I bore it so much and became so stressed out that I had to seek psychiatric help, and that didn't help. Oh dear. In other words, your mind is cluttered by stuff.

Your mind is cluttered, and you can't get out of the clutter. It's like a room full of clutter, and these days it's even more cluttered because all the devices that people use clutter your mind even more. Every text message is more cluttered because 99 out of 100 text messages are not important.

They're just cluttered. Facebook, again, there might be occasionally important things, but you can continuously bombard it, but you need to take it all in, and very rarely these days, for people who are not awakening, it's actually getting worse. For people who are not awakening, you can see there's not a moment when they are, in the past, occasionally when you were somewhere waiting for something, there was nothing to do, and you just had to sit there and maybe look around, but nobody does that anymore.

When was the last time you saw somebody just sit there and look around? No, because you have to get out your phone, and of course, what does that phone do? It clutters your mind even more.

If you hadn't, didn't have your phone, there would be a chance of having some spaciousness. You could perhaps look at the sky, and go, ah, and appreciate the beauty of it, and the depth of it, and the spaciousness of it, but no, there's a text message coming in. And what does it say?

It says, what's up? And then, of course, you have to reply, of course. When that goes, that space of the naturally occurring spaciousness, not, I'm not even talking about consciously embracing spaciousness, just the naturally occurring spaciousness in a normal person's life, that rarely happens these days, and that's a great dysfunction, and I don't know what effect that will have on the civilization within two or three generations.

Now, there is, fortunately, there is a segment of the population that is awakening spiritually, perhaps to compensate for the dysfunction that many humans are forced to enact, reenact every day. So, declutter your mind is not a process that takes a long time. To declutter your mind, you don't have to go, okay, I'm now taking out this thought, now what's the next thought that I'm going to take out?

Like, if you declutter your room, you have to say, what is it that I don't need? But to declutter your mind is an instant thing. It's an instant thing of withdrawing from thinking and becoming present.

And you can do it, as I just mentioned, one example, looking at the sky. Because there you have spaciousness. The sky is spacious.

And that is why Jesus used the analogy of kingdom of heaven. Heaven means sky. In most languages, heaven and sky are the same word.

In French, in Spanish, in German, heaven and sky are the same word. So, he's talking about the kingdom of the sky. And he said, that's the most important thing.

Just find the kingdom of the heaven, and everything else will work out in your life. That's what basically his teaching was. Now, I offer a new translation instead of kingdom of heaven.

I've already said sky, but there's an even better translation that I found, and that is spaciousness. Because the essence of the sky is vast spaciousness. Kingdom, my translation for kingdom is dimension.

So, the kingdom of heaven is the dimension of spaciousness. It is a dimension of consciousness in you. So, the kingdom of heaven, again, when they asked him, where is the kingdom of heaven?

Because they hadn't understood what he was talking about. Where is it? When is it going to come?

And he said, and this is, I believe, one of the things that is more or less literally true of what he said, many other things are not literally true that were passed on and written down. But he said, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be perceived. You cannot say, ah, it's over here, or look, it's over there.

But truly, I tell you, the kingdom of heaven is within you. In modern translations, it's in the midst of you. Both are true.

The kingdom of heaven is within you. It is the dimension of spaciousness in you. And if you find that, that solves not every single problem of your life, no.

But it gives you access to a dimension in you from where all the problems of your life and the challenges of your life can be seen in their true perspective and no longer have the ability to draw you in completely and make your life miserable. Your ability to deal with the challenges of life, which are inevitable. Life is not easy for anybody.

It's not even meant to be easy. It's not easy for any life form. Every life form is presented with life challenges, from insects to plants to every little, every life form.

Life is challenging, and human life is particularly challenging. The more evolved, the more problematic things get. The more you can start thinking, the more problematic life gets.

So it does not mean when you find the kingdom of heaven within as the dimension of spaciousness, that you are no longer challenged by life. No. But the way in which you respond to the challenges changes.

You no longer amplify challenges. They are just there, and you either take action or you accept what is for the time being. In other words, the challenges of life, the problems of life, no longer make you unhappy.

And that's a huge evolutionary leap forward. So sometimes spiritual people, who are spiritual seekers, have a misconception that when they awaken spiritually, become enlightened, whatever word you want to use, that then they will no longer experience challenges or problems. That's not true.

Life continues. Every situation that you go into has a new set of challenges. You could become famous and live in Hollywood or whatever, and you would quickly find, before you thought, when I attain this, I'll really be okay.

I'll be wonderfully happy for the rest of my life. Please, God, just make me famous, and I'll be happy for the rest of my life. I just need $10 million, $20 million, make it $20.

I just need that, and then I need to be recognized that I'm great by other people. I really need that also. But then I'll be really happy.

It's not going to happen. Even if you get what you wanted, unhappiness will quickly resurface. This was confirmed to me.

I've met a few people who got what they wanted, and they told me how unhappy they became after a while. After the elation of first having it, I'm the greatest. And then something happened to deeply challenge them.

So the challenges of life remain, and that is a good thing, because by being challenged, when you are awakening spiritually, the problems, the challenges of life no longer pull you into unhappiness and unconsciousness and reactivity and complaining and seeing yourself as a victim, but they force you to be more intensely present. They bring out more spaciousness. When you get challenged by life, you go, oh, there it is, another challenge.

And you look at it, wow, it always comes. The strange thing is, life does not leave you alone. Wherever you go, you could go to a remote cabin, and when I go there, then I'll be free.

You can go to, let's say you have enough money, you can go to the most luxurious resort where you get pampered and treated with massages and the most delicate food every day. And I'll be there for several months, and surely after that, I'll be enlightened. You won't be.

You'll just go to sleep. It's only if you're challenged by life, you go, oh. And the challenges of life, when you are not conscious enough, when you are unconscious, in other words, the challenges of life turn into suffering.

Suffering is a term used by the Buddha. The challenges of life make you unhappy, which means they turn into suffering. Now the big difference, when you have access to the dimension of spaciousness in you, the challenges of life no longer make you unhappy.

All they do is they force you to go deeper into spaciousness, become more present, more intensely present. And then the way in which you deal with challenges, because some things require you to take action, other things just happen and there's nothing you can do, so you can tell the difference. But if you are able to take action, the action will be far more effective and intelligent when you look at a challenge and are present with it, instead of being reactive and complain and or attack something.

So your life does improve, your external life improves, despite the fact that you will not be free of challenges. Nevertheless, the way in which you experience the challenges of life changes. And there comes a time when you can almost or actually welcome the new challenges that come, which they come all the...

every day presents certain things that things happen that the mind might say shouldn't be happening. There's this unpleasant person, this and there's that, and I missed my... then I missed my plane, and then I missed the bus, and then I lost the money, and then...

There's always things, always things that seem to interfere with your happiness. And so you leave, leave me alone. I want to be left alone and be happy.

Doesn't work. The world is not here to make you happy. No, because if the world were here to make you happy, the entire world would be a huge, massive failure of enormous proportions, because it's not making anybody happy.

So the entire world would be at one gigantic failure. It's not meant to be... it's meant to make you conscious.

The world is meant to awaken you. The world... Why?

Because the universe wants to become more conscious. There is an evolution of consciousness throughout the universe. And now let's come back to the essence of who you are.

The essence of who you are cannot be defined in words. The essence of who you are is the spaciousness within you, the presence that you can sense when you say, I am. Or when you ask yourself the question, who am I?

Which is actually a meditation recommended by some spiritual teachers in India. Ramana Maharshi recommended it. A wonderful spiritual teacher lived in the first half of the 20th century.

Who am I? Ask yourself that question, he said. Who am I?

Now, what you need to know is, if you answer that question through a thought or word, you're wrong. So the question who am I does not have an answer. The answer is not to be found as a concept or thought or word.

Who am I? The question is designed to bring you to a state of alert presence. And you come completely comfortable with not knowing who you are on a conceptual level.

There's no thought. In other words, when you use it as a meditative tool and you ask yourself the question, who am I? And after you've asked the question, the mind becomes still and present.

And that's the answer. That's who you are. That's the essence, your essence identity, I call it.

Of course, you still have your personality and your form identity. The form identity is the makeup of your mind, your psychological form, your conditioned mind, your physical body. That's form identity.

And of course, you still have that, but you no longer confuse your form identity with who you truly are. So you can honor your form identity and even accept the limitations of your form identity. On the level of your form identity, you're never going to be perfect.

It's not possible. What you gain here, you lose there. You become good at this and you become bad at that.

You can't be everything. You're limited. Your form identity has limitations.

And you can certainly try to improve your form identity by learning new things, learning new skills, experiencing new things. All those are wonderful things to add to your form. But if that's all you know about yourself is your form identity, which is the conditioned mind and the body, then no matter where you go, no matter who you meet or what situation you go into or what you achieve or attain, you will always very quickly become frustrated and unhappy again.

That's just how it is. Why? Because you have not realized who you are.

Only by realizing who you are can you become free of unhappiness. Not free of challenges, but free of unhappiness, free of suffering. Of course, you can still get a pain.

You can still get a toothache. The pain itself is just, when I use the word suffering, I mean psychological suffering. A me that suffers, an unhappy me.

So who am I is the question that has no answer, and the no answer is the answer. Let's take this interesting room where we are, and you sitting in a chair, and I'm sitting in a chair. Is this really happening?

The other day somebody interviewed me, and there were some prepared questions. And one of the questions the interviewer asked me was, is reality real? Well, nobody had asked exactly that kind of question before.

Is reality real? Now, to answer a question like that, you can't go, let me think. Well, I would say that it's real enough because my unhappiness is so real.

Seems so real. No, of course, the question, is all this real, has been asked by many philosophers and so on, because life has, sometimes it comes to you more than at other times, the life that you experience has a certain dreamlike quality sometimes. Maybe especially if you get older, you can look back and say, is there so much difference between what all the things that I've experienced and that have happened to me, and a dream that I had last night.

And so some philosophers have said, life is really a dream that's happening. Maybe God is having the dream. Maybe you are being dreamt by God.

There's some truth in that. But, of course, we can question whether this moment, you sitting there, me sitting on a chair, is actually happening, or whether maybe you are dreaming that you are sitting in a room, listening to a man who is telling you that maybe you're dreaming. So you can question whether this is actually happening or not.

Is reality real? But, of course, if you start thinking about it, you can think for the next 20 years, and you can write books about it. It won't get you anywhere.

But there's a more immediate realization possible here, and that is to ask yourself, what is absolutely beyond doubt about this moment here and about myself, which maybe I'm dreaming this moment? That is possible. But is there something else that is beyond doubt?

So you can doubt whether this is real. But is there something else that you cannot doubt? Let's see.

And don't start thinking about it. Is there something else that I cannot doubt? Yes.

Of course there is. And what's that? You cannot doubt that at this moment, right now, you are conscious.

There is a consciousness in which whatever you're perceiving is perceived. If you were not conscious, you would not be perceiving this room or anything in it. And if it's a dream, the same thing applies.

Even if it's a dream, there must be a consciousness in which the dream appears. The light of consciousness in which the dream unfolds. So whether or not it's reality or dream makes no difference to the more fundamental question of what is it about myself that is absolutely beyond doubt, that I can know for sure.

And that which you can know for sure is consciousness. And it's not so much that you are conscious, that's using language that creates a delusion of duality again, but you are consciousness. The essence of who you are is consciousness.

The light of consciousness. Now what that is, scientists have no idea. Most scientists don't mention the word because they don't know what to do with it.

But you can verify at this very moment the essence of who you are is consciousness. And that is the I am. That is the spaciousness within.

That is the stillness. That is the formless, the unconditioned consciousness. Your thoughts are also part of our consciousness, but they are the form that consciousness takes.

I compare to the ocean and the surface of the ocean. Your thoughts and emotions are the ripples and waves on the surface of the ocean. And your entire sense of identity, your form identity, me and my life, is a little ripple on the surface of the ocean of being.

Now when you only know yourself as a ripple on the surface of the ocean, then life is very problematic because you are threatened by bigger ripples and there may be even some big waves occasionally threatening you. And all you look is you see separate other ripples. That ripple looks better than me.

What's that ripple going to do with me? Or come I can't live without you and we need to come together and form a bigger ripple. And that doesn't help either.

But if the ripple could realize its essence identity as, oh I'm actually deeper than I realized. I'm not just the surface phenomenon here. With my thoughts and emotions and stuff going on in my life, I'm actually as suddenly the ripple stops thinking.

And suddenly as the ripple stops thinking, it's becoming aware of a deep spaciousness. And that is the ripple is beginning to realize that it is the ocean. The ocean temporarily appearing as a ripple or wave.

Just a short while. And then the way in which the ripple experiences life is going to change. Because the ripple is no longer fearful of other ripples.

It actually loves every other ripple because it can send its oneness with the other ripple. And so that suddenly life becomes more enjoyable. It's not that sometimes it still gets bumped by other ripples.

That's okay. But life is actually becoming enjoyable because the ripple is connected with something that is far, infinitely vaster than the little ripple existence. But the strange thing is when the ripple becomes conscious, and bear with me just one more minute about the ripple analogy.

As you realize that you are the ripple, I'm sure you know that. As the ripple realizes its identity as the ocean, ultimately it's not the ripple that's realizing its identity. Because when the ripple realizes its identity, the ocean also realizes its identity through the ripple.

Now you can perhaps intuitively sense what I mean when I use that analogy. Because when you become conscious of your essence, it goes far beyond a personal realization. It transcends the personal.

When a human being awakens to his or her essence identity, it's not just a human being awakening to his or her essence identity. There's the ocean of being, the universe itself awakening, experiencing awakening. And the universe wants to awaken.

It wants to know itself. And so you are connected to the evolutionary impulse of the universe. And the reason why you've come here tonight, you can explain it on a personal level.

Well, I came because I read the book, and it helped me, and I became interested, and then I've already been to hundreds of retreats, and I hope that this time I'll finally get it, or whatever. You can explain on a personal level why you have come here, but there's a deeper reason why you have come here, because the universe itself wants to experience an awakening. So this is an evolutionary thing that's happening here, and I would suggest this is not the only place where this is taking place here, but this is far more important than anything you're going to see on the news tonight.

I mean, there's no comparison, because almost everything you see in the news, with very rare exceptions, the news is made up of the main manifestations of human unconsciousness on the planet, and that makes up the news. So you get a wrong impression of what's happening on the planet if you think that what you hear or listen to in the news, if you believe it, those are things that really matter. What really matters is that you awaken, and the world changes when enough humans awaken to who they are.

Then the world inevitably is going to change, because you no longer create misery for yourself and others. You no longer create suffering for yourself and others, and you will be able to grow and continue to grow through the never-ending challenges that will continue to come. So be careful when you listen to the news or read on the internet, wherever you take news, so that you have a sense of while you listen, don't get drawn into the unconsciousness of it all.

When you interact on the internet, be careful also with what you put out there. Make sure that what you put out is conscious. Make a conscious contribution, so that if you make statements there, make sure they come out of presence rather than the reactive mind.

Big challenges are approaching for humanity, and well, whether they're going to be bigger than the first half of the 20th century, which was the first half of the 20th century, was absolute insanity. Hundreds of millions killed, genocides, world wars, unbelievable insanity on a collective, massive collective scale. So do we have to go through that again?

Who knows? But don't underestimate how important you are within the totality, how important your state of consciousness is with reference to the totality. It is extraordinarily important.

There was a time in the 19th century when humans were beginning to realize, well already in the 18th century, they're beginning to realize how small we are in relation to the universe, that we are only a tiny speck which is our planet, and then there are billions and billions of, not just billions of other suns, but there are billions of other galaxies, and every galaxy is a huge world to itself. A galaxy is, again at least, of billions of suns, inconceivable vastness, and then the human said, we are so insignificant, our life means absolutely nothing, we are so insignificant, and all is just chance. The entire evolution, everything is totally meaningless chance.

And that's an interesting belief, thoughts in your head, and what they fail to realize is that, yes, on a physical level we are very small, but every human represents a spark of the one universal consciousness, without which there wouldn't even be a universe. For even to be a universe there must be a perceiving consciousness. For this room, there wouldn't even be a room if we were not here to perceive it.

What is this table flower? The atoms and molecules floating around vast space. 99.999% empty space, and a few atoms and molecules floating around empty space. It's not a room yet, but then we come, or you come, and suddenly you interpret the atoms and molecules. So it's a creative, the perception of the universe is a creative act, and it's the one consciousness acting through you, and then experiencing itself as a world. Amazing thing.

So you are, as consciousness, you are of infinite importance. You are an expression of the one universal consciousness that underlies the sense-perceived universe. Now, obviously, the mainstream science will still, well, not that they know very much about the mind yet, don't let them tell you that they know a lot about the mind.

We don't know what a thought is. Nobody knows what a thought is. What is the relationship between the material brain?

The big question, what is the relation between the physical brain and consciousness? Mainstream science will tell you, probably, that consciousness, who doesn't even like to use that word, but if it did, it would say, it's a byproduct of brain chemistry, whatever that means. A byproduct of brain chemistry.

I don't know what that means. Or you can go deeper and say, well, it's the atoms and molecules in your brain that make up your brain, and they produce consciousness. That's the belief in mainstream science, with a few exceptions.

Some scientists are beginning to doubt that consciousness is a byproduct of matter. We don't even know what thought is. What is a thought?

Does a thought have material existence? Nobody knows. Does a thought exist as an atom or molecule in the mind?

Nobody knows. I can ask you, do you remember when you were 10 years old, do you remember the living room of the place where you lived, your house or your apartment? Can you mentally go to the living room, when you were 10 years old, and explore the room in your mind?

And most people can. And I can, although it was a long time ago. I can go there.

Where was that living room, before I suddenly ask the question, did that living room exist in my mind as a collection of certain living room atoms or molecules that were just waiting to be rediscovered? And I'm just, it's just one memory. Where did this living room, where does it, where did it survive all these years in my mind?

And this, I'm just going, this is just one example of millions of memories that you still have. Do they exist, do they have a physical existence somewhere? Or is it something that is, to go far beyond anything physical, is the brain perhaps no more than a transduced receiver of consciousness, like a radio receives, and so the music comes out of the radio, but the radio does not produce the music, and yet the radio is necessary for you to hear the music.

But when you destroy the radio, you haven't destroyed the music, you've just destroyed this particular manifestation of it, in the same way that if a brick falls on my head now, I will stop speaking. And yet the consciousness that produced these words is not really affected by it. Just this brain can no longer work as a receiver of consciousness, and so it stops speaking.

Sometimes one manifests things, but hopefully not in this case. You have to be careful with these things. Talking about manifesting, you become better at manifesting.

That's actually a different story that I don't usually, I don't dwell on it for too much, because the foundation for awakening is more important. But once you are awakening, awakened, awakening, you are connected with an intelligence that is in the unconditioned consciousness, that resides in the stillness, the non-conceptual, pre-conceptual intelligence, and you're connected with that, and that increasingly can create through you. It uses your mind.

It's no longer the ego that says, oh, I need to attain this or that. There's something deeper, and it uses your mind. And you could just, sometimes it's a simple thing like interacting with another human being.

And while you listen and listen to what the other person says, and you look at him or her, you can sense yourself as this stillness, spaciousness, and you're looking at another human being. And the other human being might be saying, okay, so what did you have? You had coffee, and did you have the apple tart?

Yes, okay, that will be. And you look at the other human being for three seconds, and there is a connection, a deeper connection. You can sense the beingness of the other, because you can sense your own beingness.

And so you connect with the other beyond the personality, which may be nice or not nice, or so-so. So you connect with the other at a deeper level. And it might only be a small transaction, just you're paying the bill.

And yet there is a human connection, and that connection is the recognition of the other as essentially the same as you, because you, in essence, are consciousness, and the other, in essence, is consciousness. The ripple is experiencing the other through its realization of being the ocean. So it realizes its connectedness with the other.

And when it does that, then, to use a word that I normally avoid because it's been misused too much, then that really is love. To recognize the essence of another human being is to love the other human being. But you can only love the other human being.

It's not the ego love that says, stay with me. Don't leave me. I want you.

And of course, you know what happens after that. It's a similar story. It goes on.

You love until you hate, and then that's the end. There's the wedding, and there's an interlude, and then the divorce proceedings. And that was the story of the egoic love.

I really can't live without you. Can't live without you is never love. So as Jesus said, of course, you love your neighbor as yourself.

Neighbor means anybody who happens to be there. But there's a slight mistranslation, unfortunately. I know that not because I'm a scholar, but know that through intuition or spiritual discernment, Jesus did not say, you must love your neighbor as yourself, because he would have known that that's not going to work.

And it never worked in the 2000 years for most Christians who tried very hard, and often achieved the opposite. So you cannot tell anybody, you love your neighbor as yourself. You better do that, because otherwise you will be punished.

Of course, it doesn't work. What he said was, find the dimension of spaciousness within you. And when you find this uncluttered space within you, the stillness, the alert stillness, then you will recognize the other as yourself.

And that means you love the other as yourself. That's how it is. So there's not a commandment that says, love the other as yourself would be futile.

First, realize who you are in your essence, and the rest follows. That's obvious. So what we are talking about is awakening out of mind identification with thought.

We transcend thinking. Transcending doesn't mean you now leave it behind, or don't use it. No, transcend means you are no longer trapped in it, that's all.

Now thinking can be used as a wonderful tool. Transcending thinking also does not mean that you go back to the level of your dog, or even the level of a tree, or a blade of grass, or a rock. Because the rock is really peaceful.

More peaceful than the dog. And the rock is just there. Now we are not going back to the mineral realm, because even in the mineral realm, or the vegetative realm, or the animal realm, they're all beautiful.

And what I'm saying now, there's no evidence for it, I believe, yet in scientific research. Even the rock has an infinitesimal degree of consciousness. It is the consciousness, the first primary manifestation of it as form, as matter.

It's asleep. Almost, well, completely asleep. Consciousness is an ancient saying, I don't know where it comes from, but it might be Sufism.

Consciousness is asleep in the rock. It's dreaming in the plant. It's awakening in the animal.

And I don't remember what the rest is, well, I'll fill it in. It's awakening to itself in the human. So consciousness asleep would be the mineral realm.

Then it begins to dream as the plant realm. Then it begins to awaken as the animal realm. And then it begins potentially, potentially, to awaken to its self-realization in the human realm.

But only humans have to awaken first. And then it goes on from there. And then it's not the end.

It's an inconceivable vastness that is still going to happen. So we are not, when I say to go beyond thinking, does not mean to regress in any way. I call that falling below thinking, which happens every night when you get tired and you're halfway towards sleep.

You're falling below thinking. And you might notice that it's a beautiful moment when you're approaching sleep and you can feel the attraction and sweetness of sleep. And you can feel, ah.

And there's still some consciousness there, but not enough to remember your problems. Not even remember, you don't remember your personal history, because if you did, you wouldn't be very happy. So you're approaching sleep, and there's this moment of delightful sweetness you can feel.

And then, so you're moving, you're falling below thought. In your wakeful life, you are in thought. You're in the grip of thought.

You're possessed by thought. You move only in thought when you're not awakened. And so, because humans perhaps instinctively realize how unhappy they are by being trapped in thought, many humans seek to get out of thought.

It's not enough when they go to sleep, because it doesn't last very long, the transitional period. So this is where the reason why they love drugs and things, because many drugs temporarily free the human from their tortured mind. So you have a good smoke, and your mind slows down.

It feels so good. Some people do it with drink, too. Have a drink, and you feel a little bit better than you did before the drink.

Have another. Okay, that must mean I feel even better after two drinks. One more, perhaps.

Yes, I won't say no. And without, of course, again, you can't remember your problems. You might not even remember your address.

So you're definitely falling below thought. But for a little while, that feels good. You feel a little bit better.

You might even sing a song. And then finally, you fall off the chair. So you're falling below thought.

Now, it can give the impression that it's liberating, but not for long. And it's not the way to go for humans. We rise above thought, which means, yes, there's no thinking, in the same way that when you drink enough, you can't think anymore.

But there's a huge difference. And the huge difference is, you are alert, present, awake. You are not...

And yet, there's no tension in it. There's just a relaxed alertness. It almost sounds paradoxical.

A relaxed alertness. Not an alertness that is forced. Not an alertness where you have to hold your breath so that you don't think.

Mustn't think. Mustn't think. I've met some people who were Zen practitioners, Westerners, who got somehow...

Yes, they got it, that Zen ultimately is about transcending thinking. But they applied willpower. So they became very full of willpower, Zen monks, and gone, I am enlightened.

I'm not thinking. But then wait for something to happen. And then they blow up.

Because you put a lid on a boiling kettle. So your practice, your main spiritual practice, I would recommend is that you practice, that you invite spaces of not thinking, rising above thinking, into your daily life. For example, by not always getting your phone out of your pocket when there's a moment of waiting for something.

Just be there. And don't wait. Just be.

Look around. Take in your sense perceptions. And develop the skill, develop the ability of perceiving what's around you through visual perception or auditory perception, maybe some of the others.

Develop the skill, the ability, be alert enough so that you can perceive without the interference of thought, without labeling things, without interpreting, without commenting, just clear perception. So there's the perception, and there's what you're perceiving, and there's the consciousness, the stillness through which the perception happens. One could use an analogy like saying, if you were a painting, what is a strange analogy, but if you were a painting, there's something painted on the, the painting shows a certain something, that's your personality, that's what the painting shows.

But if the painting suddenly became aware that in essence there's a canvas on which these things are being painted, and that canvas is there in the background, and that canvas, in this analogy that I'm using, is the consciousness that you are. And in that consciousness that you are, your life unfolds like a painting, if it, let's say it's a living painting that changes, like a painting on a canvas, and things happen. And yet behind this, there is the perceiving consciousness, the presence, the awareness, and you know that is who you are in your essence.

And then you deal with this other stuff beautifully, it's fine, that's the stuff of your life. And in the stuff of your life, you gain something, and then you lose something. And then you gain something else, and you lose something else.

There's up and down, high and low, good things happen, bad things happen, and yet the mind doesn't actually judge that much anymore. It just accepts what's happening in this moment. It becomes aligned with this moment.

So you become more and more present to this moment, without arguing with what is, being the space for what is. You are not what happens, you are the space for what happens. So you know yourself as that.

Then you're rooted in being, rooted in yourself, rooted in being. So there's the doing, and the being. The doing includes thinking, activity, external activity, and thought activity.

So you do, you participate in life, you think, you do the thinking, without losing yourself in the doing of the thinking. Because you're rooted in being, the being is in the background, and then you can think, without being lost in thought, without being possessed by thought. Because you know yourself to be, in essence, that which is beyond thought, the ocean.

And so the practice then is to invite this thoughtless awareness into your daily life, for example, by looking at things without imposing conceptualization, without labeling it. You can look at a flower, you can look at the sky, even artificial light, anything, even what's here. You can look around the room without interpreting it.

It's beautiful. Now, that's just, before we finish, just one little thing. We are in this room, we are looking, we are aware of the totality of this room, the ceiling, the lights, people, your body on the chair, and you're aware of all that, you can take in the totality of that.

You're also aware that you're breathing, you're aware of all that, and don't need to interpret it, just look, look around. But then be also aware of your own presence. It's not your own, I just call it your own, for a moment.

Be aware of your own presence, the presence that you are. And then there's the sense perception. In the background, there's the presence, and that's a stillness.

So there's a stillness behind your sense perceptions. And you can do the same if you're walking along the beach. You look at, there's the sky, there's the ocean.

And then everything helps you to become still. And when you can do it on the beach, then you go into a little forest or something like that. And once you are more familiar with that state of consciousness, you can go out into the downtown traffic, walk around busy shopping street, and do that's a little bit requires more intense presence to be stay present there.

But it's beautiful. Once you can do that, you can actually enjoy all the manifestations of life around you and can actually enjoy all the dance of life around you, whether it's nature, which is, of course, easier to be in nature and still than it is to be in a city and be still. But ultimately, even in a city, it's more challenging.

But the challenges are good. So don't run away and say, I need to be alone in nature, otherwise I can't do it. Yes, nature is very helpful.

It can put you in touch with that stillness, because nature is still, the trees are still the sky, there are some sounds, but basically there's a vast stillness there. And then you practice in the city, you go into a cafe, and sit there, and there's all bustling or people running around and talking and doing until you practice for 10 minutes instead of looking at your phone, while you're drinking your tea or coffee, or water if you're health conscious. While you sit there, you just be there and watch for 10 minutes, be the presence, then you are like a wonderful thing to be just the awareness in the room, instead of a person, because when you don't remember your personal history and your problems, you're not a person, you're just an awareness.

You're just a presence. So you sit there in that cafe as an aware presence, the person will come back, you haven't lost the person, you're still a person, it'll come back soon enough after you've finished your coffee. But while you're there, you sit there as be the awareness rather, and then you can shift from time to time, you shift in certain situations, you're more of an awareness than a person.

In other situations, you're still much more of a person than the awareness. And gradually the two come together. And then the awareness shines through the person or the personality.

And the being and the doing merge. And then you don't have to separate them and say, Okay, I can be when I meditate for 20 minutes in the morning, I be and the rest of the day I do what there's a separation, you need to bring them together. So in the doing, you're still conscious of being of presence.

That's the art of life of living. And then everything changes, the world changes. And so thank you, that was the secret of the universe.

Eckhart Tolle Awakening Through Illness [3d467ad3-d1f6-4134-9c77-ad8801536d11]

[Speaker 8] (0:00 - 0:35)

Awakening Through Illness. In this episode, Eckhart talks with a live audience filled with either patients or health care professionals about the new consciousness emerging in medicine. Eckhart explains why there's been a lack of compassion, time, and care of patients.

He offers solutions on how doctors can be more fully present with their patients and get to know them on an individual basis. Eckhart also explains how illness can become an awakening, pushing us out of our ego and into a connection with our deeper self.

So just be here in thoughtless awareness, and if thoughts come, just don't follow them. Let them, release them, let them go. If you have a question that you'd like to ask, I believe you come up to the microphone and ask your question.

Hopefully an interesting question. So shall we start?

Hello Eckhart. A year ago at this time, it was discovered that I had stage 3 colon cancer, and they discovered that cancer was throughout my body. I went through extreme chemotherapy treatments for over six months, and during that time I became bedridden, and I was in extreme physical pain.

It was the best time of my life spiritually. During that entire time, I was in a spiritual retreat within myself. It was profound.

My question to you is, now that I'm healthy and going back into the busy life that I had before, what advice you would give to me or someone else in how to maintain that beautiful inner spiritual retreat of oneness while entering back into the world?

[Speaker 1] (2:01 - 8:51)

Well, thank you. That is an amazing example of the potential transformational value, awakening value, that a serious illness can have if you allow it to work in that way. It's just amazing.

And in your case, there has been a kind of healing, perhaps, or probably, because of the shift in consciousness and the deepening. And then an illness like that actually, as it forces you into presence, burns up the ego in you, fuel for consciousness. Now you have to be careful, if you do go back into your busy life, don't allow stress to arise, ever.

It is possible to be busy without stress. If you find it's not possible for you, then it's better not to be busy at all. So being busy without stress means just being totally focused on whatever you happen to be doing right now.

Never focused more on the outcome that you want to achieve through whatever activity you're doing right now, than the activity itself. So they can be high energy in the doing. If there's no stress, there's actually a heightened sense of aliveness as you are active.

That heightened sense of aliveness could be called enjoyment of what you're doing. You enjoy not only the outer doing, you enjoy the energy behind the doing. You might have heard the Zen saying, hurry slowly.

So it doesn't necessarily mean that you need to be slow. You can be fast. The slow is the inner state.

The slowness is the stillness and the peace that is still there, even while externally, you may be very active. But as you are not focused on the outcome, you're focused on the doing, you enjoy not only the external activity, but more importantly, you enjoy the energy that is behind it. The energy movement.

And then you can be working very fast or doing whatever you're doing very fast, and yet in a state of enjoyment rather than stress. So extreme vigilance is required so that you don't fall back into any kind of stress, which always means you're not fully in the doing. You're mentally somewhere else.

So it's fine to be active again, but not if you don't enjoy it. So the enjoyment needs to be there, then you are not going to lose the presence that has already burned up a large part of your ego or the entire ego. Ego simply meaning complete identification with form.

What you just told us is a very inspiring example of what is possible, how an illness can be the great awakener. And it helps, of course, if before somebody becomes ill, he or she has already had some contact with spirituality, but it doesn't, even that's not necessary. I have seen people that had not the slightest glimpse of spirituality, and yet at some point in the illness, the awakening happened.

I've also seen people who shortly before their death through illness became utterly and completely present, so that they actually felt joyful. There was no fear anymore. There might have been fear initially, but fear is when you think about what's going to happen to you or the body.

So anything like that, if you allow it to force you almost into utter and complete presence, then what looks as a terrible curse actually is transformed into a blessing. What I said about stress really applies to everybody, but it's more even more important for you. Stress is not a healthy or even sane state to be in.

I know it's hard to live in this civilization without stress, where almost everybody is stressed, and they might think if you're not stressed, there's something wrong with you, or your boss might think if you're not stressed, you're not doing your work. So if you absolutely cannot function without stress, I would suggest to make some changes in your life. But many things can be done without stress.

You can function without stress and function better, but it requires vigilance. Multitasking is a word that's been very much around these days. Now that in itself is stressful, and by the way, multitasking is actually an impossibility, because even when you think you're multitasking, you can still only do one thing at a time, and that's a state of great mental confusion and stress.

When you're doing something, I really should be doing something else, but I also need to be doing this. The Zen master, I've quoted him a few times, when asked to explain the essence of Zen, as you know, Zen masters never explain anything in a complicated way or through mental concepts. What's the essence of Zen?

And he said, doing one thing at a time. That's Zen. And one more thing for the questioner just now, not just talk about your activity for a moment, wherever you are at any time, don't wait for life to have to force you again into presence.

Choose the presence that is already powerfully in you, and continuously invite that intense presence that you had when you were facing almost, one could say, imminent death. That intense presence that arose there, choose it even when you're not being challenged now, so that even when you go from your home to your workplace or drive or go or walk, there's nothing in particular to do or you're waiting, that intense presence can be there now. You don't have to be forced into it any longer.

So that's a wonderful thing. Okay, let's see if there's any other question.

Thank you very much, Eckhart. Your teaching allows us actually to go into the darker place of this planet and to help. Yes.

As a trauma surgeon, South Africa, working in Somalia, I encounter and help victims of suicide bombings. Now, when, and you tell us, when we are dealing with pain body, when the pain body is too big, we need to retrieve. How can we, as a collective, deal with such severe pain body?

It's really a collective question, because we face it, September 11, Boko Haram, ISIS, and I know consciousness is actually beyond the duality of good and bad, but as a collective, is there something as enlightened military defense, possibly? Because sometimes we need to stop something.

[Speaker 1] (9:48 - 17:32)

Yes. Well, certainly. Thank you.

Thank you. Certainly, there are extreme manifestations of unconsciousness, and it is sometimes necessary to defend yourself against that in the right way. Defense may be necessary sometimes, if it's done wisely, and if it's not reactive, but a response to the situation.

Wisdom is an absolute requirement for taking right decisions, but unfortunately, wisdom is hard to come by in political circles. It seems that, as people go into politics, they might even have gone in with wisdom, but then it grinds you down, and it seems very hard to stay conscious once you are in the political system. Here and there, there are people who realize the importance of wisdom, so any decision one takes of how to defend oneself, wisdom is required so that whatever you do does not make things worse.

So, yes, in the face of extreme unconsciousness, you may need to defend yourself, certainly. Another more general remark about these events, this is only one example of humans creating something that looks actually quite insane, like the suicide bombing and whatever, looks quite insane, but how is it possible for humans to behave in such a way, and is this not evil? Go back to the Europe in the first part of the 20th century, the whole first part of Europe in the 20th century, the first half of the 20th century, was a nightmare.

What humans did to other humans at that time, First World War, Second World War, just unimaginable horrors, so that at every time period, the human collective, the unconsciousness that is embedded in the collective, will manifest through certain groups of people, and if you close one door, another one opens and manifests over there, in the same way that the need for an enemy that is also there manifests.

The Cold War came to an end and said, oh, how wonderful, there's no enemy anymore, and not many years passed, and quickly another big enemy arose somewhere else, and now we need to fight that one. Now, coming back to the atrocities that are perpetrated in different ways, at different time periods, it's certainly the case that we need to recognize that this is insane, it is a form of collective insanity, psychosis, that is a benign way of looking at it, you could call it evil, but I wouldn't, I would say it's just insanity, because it has no, it seems to have no real purpose, they achieve nothing through that, so it's insanity. Now, if we go then to a higher level, a higher perspective, then you see that the entire consciousness of humanity is involved in an evolutionary process, and that evolutionary process, if you look at humanity with one single whole, the consciousness of humanity as a single thing, being just one aspect of universal consciousness, so this consciousness of humanity, and every human being is part of that one consciousness of humanity, which in itself is part of the universal consciousness, and consciousness, this consciousness of humanity, is involved in an awakening process, and you might know from your own life, and I know from my life, that the awakening process, for quite a while, involves intense suffering, so humanity as a whole is going through intense suffering, because we are all going through the awakening process, and the intense suffering that the individual goes through, a lot of that is also self-created, it's created by the delusional identity we call the ego, the suffering in my life was self-created, there are other forms of suffering that may have come to you from the outside, but even then, the suffering is the reaction to the external events, and that is the real suffering, and that's always self-created, so both on a personal level, and in a collective level, a large part of human suffering, the larger part, is self-created by humans, they inflict it on other humans, and of course they suffer themselves, eventually also, so these are what is called the birth pangs of the awakening, these are the pains of the arising of consciousness, and if you stay now on the higher perspective, all humans are temporary expressions of the one awakening consciousness, and all humans suffer and inflict suffering, some more than others, but they are all, all humans are really expressions, or life forms, expressions of the one consciousness, the one consciousness is indestructible, the human bodies die, the essence that is in every human continues to evolve, although we need to realize, we need to see that what's happening is insane, because that's part of the awakening, if nobody sees that what we are doing to each other, to ourselves, and to each other, we don't see that it is insane, then we do not awaken through it, but if we recognize the insanity of it, that is already part of the awakening, and then there's a higher level of a higher perspective, where you can see that actually there is an evolutionary process at work here, and it sometimes seems the two levels are contradictory, but they're both true on their own level, so I can make two statements, which are both true, things are terrible down here, and all is well, ultimately, both are true, you can't ignore one, so you have to live with seemingly contradictory truths, the all is well comes through your own realization of encountering that in you, that's not subject to time, the timeless consciousness in you, and from there you can know that ultimately all is well, and then retrospectively, the entire history of mankind, except the awakening, can be seen as a nightmare preceding an awakening. Okay, let's see if there are any more questions. Dr. Nook?

Hello, I'm a quantum physicist by education, now I work with blind people, and people are losing their sight, to try to preserve the sight, in doing so, I carry a lot of their pain with me, all the time, and wherever I look, I see your teaching, however, I'm in the investment world, so I'm always faced with a lot of resistance, because it's not conducive to good business, to spend too much time being too soft, and I was wondering if you can comment a little bit on how can I help patients, and also help the people who are in the business side of things? Yes.

[Speaker 1] (18:27 - 18:35)

Thank you. So you work in a hospital or clinic that specializes in helping people with their sight?

[Speaker 5] (18:35 - 18:57)

Actually I'm an inventor, and I take my inventions, we have an investment firm, so we work with people, not only in this country, but other countries, to try and find solutions, to restore sight for people who have completely lost their sight, or preserve whatever sight is left for people.

So in addition to treating the eyes, the eyesight of humans, you realize there's more that you are able to do for them, there's an additional dimension there, and there's a little bit of conflict between this, again, we come again to the system that you work in, and what you feel that you need to do to feel fulfilled, and to help others in becoming more conscious, sometimes using their suffering to become more conscious. Yes.

Are you able to still do that within the structure that you work now, or can you change it from within, or do you need to create a new structure? I would not give up, do not compromise on what you feel you are called upon to do with other human beings, so don't compromise and say, okay, I'll just have to drop this and just treat them to like everybody else. But see if you can still function from within the system, and do what you feel you need to do, and if you can't, again, it's a question of doing it in a new way, creating something that makes it possible for you to work on both levels, on the outer level and the inner level with human beings.

And many of you may find, because you represent the arising and the awakening consciousness, many of you will find that the existing structures within which you work are not able to carry the new consciousness anymore. So many of you will find it necessary to step out of, sometimes, as I said, they can, in certain cases, they can be changed from within if there are enough people within who want to change it, but many structures are too rigid for change, so it is up to you to create new structures and come together perhaps with others who are also awakening, so that the new structures will reflect your state of consciousness.

So this is what the world needs, the world cannot continue to function within the old structures that are a product of unenlightened states of consciousness. The economy, the political system, even here in the States, it seems to, compared to some other places, functions quite well, but it's dysfunctional too. All those things, they require new structures to reflect the arising consciousness, so that's your job to create those.

And here we come to that part of manifestation, which the universe also wants. It wants you to manifest, it will use you, it will work through you to manifest new forms, because the old forms don't work anymore. It's a wonderful thing to do that, and you will see how empowered you suddenly become as you go about creating new forms, how powerful your abilities to manifest will be if they are in alignment with what the universe wants, with what the one consciousness wants.

They are not little egos wanting to create something, you are in alignment with what the universe needs right now, what the awakening consciousness wants. If you then start manifesting from that deeper level within yourself, you'll be amazed how empowered you can be in your own manifestation. It is a new way of creating.

If stress comes in, you're falling back into the old consciousness. This is a joyful way of creating new forms and new structures in this world. The old way, while you're creating, you're stressed and angry and you're fighting others.

Of course, you would encounter obstacles to that which you want to create because the old structures, they will regard you as an enemy in some cases. And that's fine, you have no enemies, let them regard you as an enemy, but you don't attack. Another important thing, you don't attack the old structures and say how dreadfully wrong they are, focus on the new.

So the important thing in the new way of creating external forms, if obstacles arise, then the obstacle can be overcome not by attacking it. Some obstacles are overcome by yielding, but yes, you will encounter obstacles. Then that can only help you with deepening your resolve and deepening your connectedness to the consciousness that wants to create through you.

What I sometimes say, it's not a question of asking yourself, what do I want from life? Or what do I want in life? We're asking, what does life want from me?

Life means consciousness. Consciousness is the essence of all life. What does life want me to do?

And many of you know already, it might not come up very clearly yet, but you have an inkling at least of what it is that life wants you to do. And if you don't have it, then just wait a little, become still. It could take a while.

As a transformation of consciousness and an awakening in you, it will affect others. Even if you never meet them, because underneath the surface of things, all humans are connected. So one human being going through an awakening makes it easier for many others to go through an awakening.

Even if that human being never does anything particularly interesting in his or her outer life, others go through an awakening and they will do significant and interesting and meaningful things in their outer life. But even if you don't, it will affect the totality of human consciousness. You could withdraw to an ashram or live as a hermit, you would still affect the totality of human consciousness.

And the danger of the active person who acts from this higher level of consciousness is that he or she may become so focused on the doing, beginning to think that the doing is more important than the being behind it, and then loses touch with the being and therefore also gets lost in doing and falls below thinking and gets trapped what he wanted to avoid in the first place, gets back into the same trap of mind. As you know very well, when you want to create something or something wants to be created through you, the important thing is not to believe that you need to attract something into your life. It doesn't manifest from there, it manifests from within, from within out.

So the feeling that it's already a reality in you, Jesus already said that when you pray for something, believe that you already have it. And of course, all many books that you can read on manifestation, the good ones will also tell you that when you want to create something, you need to feel its reality already as here and now. It is already here.

So you need to manifest out of the fullness of the present moment. If you lose touch with the fullness of the present moment, which means being in touch with being, in touch with the essence of who you are, that's where all fullness arises, the fullness of life, as Jesus called it, the emptiness, as the Buddha called it. And if you're in touch with that, you create from there, then the satisfaction is already here.

It's not postponed to some future moment. And that's when you become a powerful creator or the universe creates powerfully through you. So the manifestation is also a joyful thing.

And it could be that something else wants to manifest. You might've had a vision that wasn't quite correct and something even better comes about. That can happen also.

Okay, let's see if there's any more questions left.

[Speaker 3] (28:16 - 28:49)

Hello. Hi. So first I want to say what an honor it is to be here with you and with everyone else.

So I've been reading your work for 10, 15 years, and I'm an ER physician. And trying to imagine a possibility where an emergency room is not a stressful environment is very difficult for me to envision. Yes.

Now, I enjoy what I do. And I see that it's meaningful, you know, and it makes a difference. And I don't know how long I can keep it up.

[Speaker 1] (28:49 - 28:50)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (28:50 - 29:21)

I just don't know how to bring presence. And then you talk about all the... I mean, I try to make a difference for who I'm dealing with.

And there's people that I deal with that are very easy for me to connect with. And then I'm dealing with people with major psychiatric issues, people with major drug issues, people that are seeking something from me that are not there for anything medical. They want a prescription pain medication.

It's a really challenging environment to bring this kind of work to. And I'm interested in what sort of insights you have into that.

[Speaker 1] (29:21 - 29:27)

So how are you managing as far as your state of consciousness is concerned while you do your work?

[Speaker 3] (29:28 - 30:14)

Well, I think I'm unconscious most of the time. I mean... I mean, I have moments, you know, and what I started to see that I could try to do is...

And some of the psychiatrists are saying they have 15 minutes with a patient. I have sometimes two minutes. If I have five minutes, that's a long time in a room.

I mean, I'll have 10, 12 patients at a time. But then I'm immediately in my head. I'm judging them.

I'm evaluating them. I'm thinking, what kind of person are they? Is their pain real?

Is their pain fake? Do I believe what they're saying? Are they just anxious?

So trying to come from that place of stillness, of quiet, of listening from nothing or help.

[Speaker 1] (30:19 - 30:28)

Well, I'd love to try it out, but I can't take your place because I would need years of training before I could fulfill your function.

[Speaker 3] (30:28 - 30:36)

You're welcome to come follow me anytime. That might be interesting.

[Speaker 1] (30:39 - 33:39)

But nevertheless, I know that there are people within those kinds of environments who are so absorbed by what they do, they are totally in their mind and you are relatively conscious, otherwise you wouldn't be here. Despite that environment, it is possible that you may be more conscious in your environment than you realize. What I would do is be absolutely present.

And you may be doing that already. For example, when you assess or evaluate a person, you ask, is this a fake illness? Is this real pain?

What kind of person is it? What does he need? What does she need?

You may be doing a lot of that already without any words going through your mind. Through looking, you look and you know what the answer is. It seems so far you can function in that environment, but you may not be able to function for many, many years because in that high stress environment like that, nobody should be in there for too long.

So look at yourself and see whether there are areas in your work where you can be more present. But my guess is that you're already more present than you realize. In fact, you're doing a lot of good too within the limitations of the system.

You're doing a lot of good. At the moment, it seems you are actually up to the challenge, but the hours are long and eventually I think you would suffer from stress disorder. No human being, I believe, could function in that for 20 or 30 years without losing presence.

Sustain as much presence as you can. But if you notice a deterioration in your state of consciousness over a period of time, I believe the reading of my books and being in touch with this teaching has probably helped you a lot to sustain presence. Meditation, I think for you particularly, I think would be a very good thing to counteract the work environment.

And perhaps even you have developed more presence because you have to counteract the relatively mad environment of your workplace. So the fact that you are drawn to this and the fact that you have been finding it helpful quite simply means that consciousness is awakening in you despite all that, your work environment. How?

I don't know. It's a miracle. Thank you.

[Speaker 6] (33:40 - 33:59)

I'm a physician also, but my question is related to all the other physicians that I work with who are suffering and I can see it in them. And it's the more that I learn your teachings, the more I see the suffering in them. And I don't know what to do to help them.

[Speaker 1] (34:00 - 34:11)

Have you made any attempt to somehow convey this to your colleagues? Maybe unsuccessful attempts so far?

[Speaker 6] (34:11 - 34:31)

To some degree. Just over the last couple of years, there's been real research showing burnout. And that's a definable thing.

And so we can use the term burnout, which doesn't seem to offend people to talk about it. And then I've introduced some mindfulness strategies because that's another term that doesn't seem to offend people.

I was just going to say that mindfulness has become almost acceptable. If you use that word, that might be more acceptable than presence. It's the same thing, of course, but I don't use mindfulness because it implies that your mind is full, but that's okay.

So what about creating a support group for people who work in similar capacities, both people that you know personally and perhaps other people? Because nowadays, the strange thing is, the wonderful thing about the technology that we have nowadays, you can reach so many people through the internet and so on. But you would start on a small scale.

What about a mindfulness group for physicians? You could call it that. You can become the leader of that because...

Okay. Sometimes life asks you to do something. It may ask you to do something before you may think you're ready for it, but life knows better.

And the strange thing is, you as a person would never really feel ready for this because it's hard to do. But if you can become still and get out of the way, because becoming still means getting out of the way, if you can become still, you'll be amazed. And I'm not only talking to you, but many others.

You'll be amazed how empowered suddenly the words that you speak become or the energy that flows through you and how inspired you become and what it might lead to. Because things need to change if the system, not only in medicine, but in many other areas, is ripe for either collapse or complete change. It cannot go on the way it's going because it can only become more disintegrating.

No matter where you look, it's a question of it'll either collapse or change. And if it collapses, that's fine too. Now I'm talking about social systems and so on in general.

Eventually something more conscious will arise or something more conscious may arise and transform the old before it collapses completely. So the ideas will come to you. You can just offer to them, for example, have a meditation, show them what mindfulness is, see if they like it and then go on from there and then transmit it, go on the internet, contact others, it may suddenly spread.

There are people in mainstream who are doing this. If you can build up a support network of people who can then support others, there are infinite possibilities. But anybody who is here would have to consider themselves as a leader in this because you may not yet be fully present all the time and fully enlightened on a daily basis, but you know much more than most.

I mean, and I don't mean conceptual knowledge. There's a knowing in you of that dimension of consciousness that is still new, still many. And I believe that the world desperately needs you.

And you start in your world. You can reach the most appropriate place for you to reach others is within your sphere of influence and that is your work. So what form that will take, only you can know.

It will be helpful to connect with others, get feedback, talk about it, what can we do? So see yourself as a spearheading this movement of awakening because they need you. So not only your patients need you, your colleagues need you.

And then the work that you do, which is wonderful, will be enhanced immeasurably by bringing a different state of consciousness to it. And once that happens, then the entire system may begin to undergo a change. Change always begins within.

How do you feel about this?

[Speaker 6] (39:30 - 40:00)

I'm a little speechless, but it's a crisis. And I think that it really is a crisis. I know you're speaking not just to me, but to others that are here.

And I think that we need to do this in all aspects of medicine. So if I can help. So thank you for giving me the push.

[Speaker 10] (40:00 - 40:25)

My question concerns the cultivation of virtue. I hear many traditions speak about cultivating loving kindness, cultivating compassion. I heard you say that loving kindness comes naturally out of presence.

So can we cultivate virtues like you practice, you practice and you become it?

Thanks. That term tends to be used a lot in Buddhist teachings, the term cultivate, cultivating virtues. So in Buddhism, there's a list of nice things that you...

I only know the essential Buddhism. I can't remember the long lists that you get in Buddhism of virtues and so on. I know the basic thing, which undoubtedly is what the Buddha taught is the origin of suffering and the way beyond suffering.

That's the Buddha. I think all the longer lists were compiled at a later stage by monks who wanted to make things more understandable and accessible to other monks, but they were not fully present when they did these long lists, but that's okay. So ultimately, of course, it is better that somebody should at least attempt to cultivate the various virtues.

So the primary one in Christianity would be, of course, love your neighbor as yourself. That's the primary. And really it all boils down to that.

In Buddhism, metta, loving kindness towards others is important, but ultimately to cultivate this, it's a wonderful intention and it's better than not trying to cultivate it, but ultimately you won't really succeed unless there's a shift in consciousness in you that is primary. There may be many other things that are important, but there's only one thing that is of primary importance and that is to find within you that dimension of consciousness and then live from that dimension of consciousness. And if you live from that dimension of consciousness, then naturally you will love your neighbor as yourself because you recognize your neighbor as essentially one with who you are.

And then you will also love God as yourself because you will then recognize essentially that God is the source of your very being. So all the virtues arise naturally out of that state of connectedness with being, which is presence, love, benevolence, goodwill towards other human beings, which is all aspects of love. And whatever other virtues, really it all comes down to no longer feeling that acute sense of separation between yourself and other human beings and between yourself and the source of who you are, the source of all life, God being the source of all life, the unmanifested source of all life.

When I use the word God, I'm not speaking of an authority figure, a controlling authority figure, but the source of all life. So your question was good. I'm glad you asked it.

[Speaker 4] (43:39 - 43:52)

Thank you for spreading such a positive shining light. My question is a fun kind of question. I was wondering, is it possible to have a conscious conversation?

[Speaker 1] (43:52 - 44:00)

Yes, yes. Have you experimented with that?

[Speaker 4] (44:01 - 44:14)

Yes, I have. I came to the conclusion that maybe two people wouldn't actually be talking to each other in a conscious conversation. They would be sitting opposite each other in awareness.

Oh, well, that's even better. A conscious conversation is basically a conversation where it's between two people. Each person is not identified with their viewpoint, their perspective, their mental position.

They put forward their perspective, their positions, their viewpoints without any sense of self in it because they don't need that because their sense of self is derived from the presence that they can sense throughout the conversation in the background of their being. And then they can play with concepts. They can play with opinions.

They can play with words. They can play with arguments even. My argument is this and then the other person, well, and mine is that.

The famous saying, what is it? We agree to disagree or something like that. That sounds relatively conscious because at least if you're not identified with your positions, then that's fine.

We agree. That's okay. It's interesting.

Self-identification with mental positions is the unconsciousness because then you will be defending your mental positions, but you're really defending your sense of self. And this is why these conversations become easily and very quickly become very unpleasant. They are unconscious.

So in unconscious conversation and with very unconscious people, it can even happen. I mean, you can probably read about it in the papers all the time. They get so defensive and aggressive about their respective mental positions.

They start physically attacking each other. So what is your experience with being engaged in conversation? Do you easily get into that position where you start to defend your sense of self?

In my case, I've been experimenting with thoughtless awareness. Yes. And I've been present appreciating and being aware of the essence of the individual in front of me.

[Speaker 1] (46:23 - 46:23)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (46:24 - 46:37)

Listening to their words, but just allowing that presence of acceptance. However, I've struggled with returning a conversation point in that state.

[Speaker 1] (46:37 - 47:16)

Yes, that's right. And that's where the real practice begins. Because if you kind of withdraw from engagement, then it's relatively easy to sustain presence.

But when you begin to actually interact verbally, of course, thoughts become words. Then the real practice begins. And especially if you engage in a conversation with certain things that you feel strongly about.

And ideally, you choose somebody who has the totally opposite viewpoints. Then you can really practice.

[Speaker 4] (47:16 - 47:56)

But it's funny you should mention that because I'm an acupuncturist. Oh, yeah. And the way I operate with energy medicine is in an opposite position to Western medicine in many respects from a thought-based point of view.

And so I'm meeting a lot of individuals who have got a very strong position and I'm trying my best to allow this concept into this new institution. So I should imagine I'll be facing a lot of challenges.

[Speaker 1] (47:57 - 49:35)

Yes, so you can, there's a lot of, you'll be practicing conscious conversation, especially with physicians who say, I don't believe in all that. And I know that's all, it's a lot of rubbish, but you do what you do. But then that could be an interesting conscious conversation, can be challenging.

But the art is to remain present even as you put forward your point of view so that, and this is important, I've said it before, but I say it again, so that you don't identify with whatever thoughts you are expressing. Identify meaning that they constitute your sense of self and that's unconscious. That is self-identification with thinking.

That's the essence of unconsciousness. And so in order to counteract that, because there is an enormous pull when you start arguing with somebody or they argue with you, there needs to be a high degree of alertness in you. And that alertness is presence.

And that alertness needs to be there. And then the words need to come out of that state of alertness. And that gives you your sense of who you are, your sense of self is in the presence.

Then you can play with concepts and words. Then you can put forward your viewpoints.

And even if your viewpoints are being challenged, you will not feel attacked in your sense of self.

That is the essence of conscious conversation. I wish you luck.

[Speaker 4] (49:37 - 49:38)

Thank you very much.

[Speaker 2] (49:45 - 51:28)

I'm a physician assistant and I practice in Michigan in the Midwest in an area that's still very conservative. I'm excited to say I'm involved on two wellness committees and I have dreams of bringing mindfulness to not just other providers, but to our patients. In the 12 years that I've been practicing, I've done lots of different things, worked in surgery, critical care, gastroenterology.

And as I've been listening to you, it seems like the imbalance is truly this codependency that is encouraged by modern day healthcare. Not just patients dissociating from their role in wellness, but the pressure of providers to assume that responsibility. And what I heard from you, and please tell me if I'm on the right track, is that as we, whether we're providers or patients, enter into the present moment, we can trust the now.

We can trust our connection to source and what's manifesting in our experience. And as long as we have that connection, that there's no need to fear what is being said, that the proper energy transference will happen, and that time as we know it dissolves. And so we, as persons who feel called to be healers, do the greatest service by teaching through example, by being present, and leading others back to the truth of their wholeness.

[Speaker 1] (51:29 - 51:29)

Yeah.

[Speaker 2] (51:30 - 51:30)

Right?

[Speaker 1] (51:30 - 51:54)

Thank you. Well, that's all. I think we needed to, everybody needed to listen to you.

There's no answer because there's no question, and the truth, you've been speaking the truth, so it's wonderful. Thank you.

[Speaker 8] (51:59 - 52:19)

Eckhart Tolle Awareness Of Our Thoughts Is the Beginning Of Awakening [f5f03808-8d80-4ee1-9ace-ac043b7c42a8]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:57)

Awareness of our thoughts is the beginning of awakening. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with an audience in Adelaide, Australia. He explains that many of us place little value on the current moment because we believe fulfillment can only happen at some point in the distant future.

He says the anticipation of things yet to be is so strong we miss opportunities in the here and now. The thinking mind takes over and muddies the water. Eckhart shares an experience he had at the age of 17 when a friend gave him several spiritual books.

Through study, he learned to shift his thinking from negative to positive and suddenly the well-worn idea that bad things always happen to him evaporated. Eckhart says this breakthrough was a catalyst for greater spiritual development that continued well into his 20s. Eckhart explains awareness of our thoughts is the beginning of awakening.

Wonderful to be back in Australia and of course here for the first time I can sense the energy field in the room that emanates from each one of you and each one of you is present. So the energy field of presence is beautiful. Obviously there could be one or two who are not present but hopefully by the end of the middle of our evening together those who are not present now or don't even know what I'm talking about who only came here because a friend said you must come, you will not only know what I mean when I say presence but actually have a taste of presence rather than a concept of what presence is and if it absolutely doesn't work for you it simply means you're not quite ready yet and that usually means you have to suffer a little bit more until the ego cracks open and presence is able to come through.

So I look forward to a deeply meditative evening and when I say I look forward I'm just remembering a while ago I was emailing somebody, I don't email a lot but I was emailing somebody and said I look forward to meeting you and then I finally met that person who is an aspiring spiritual teacher who is perhaps still some ego and he said I was surprised when you said in your email that you look forward to meeting you, doesn't that mean you're not in the present moment?

Of course we're not denying pleasurable anticipation there's nothing wrong with pleasurable anticipation as long as it doesn't detract from the way in which you experience the present moment but if the present moment is reduced to something of little value in your mind because your anticipation has such gravitational pull that it completely takes you out of the present moment in your mind and you into the future and you're expecting some kind of fulfillment there then of course if you say I'm looking forward to my vacation there and in the meantime I completely lose awareness of this present moment and my surroundings, it's only just peripheral awareness but not really there so that's a different matter if the anticipation absorbs so much of your attention that you miss this, perhaps we use this as an entry point this meaning here now if you miss this you miss the whole thing because there's never anything but this here and now some people find that if you really grasp that not just intellectually but intellectually you could say yeah of course it's that's all there's always now but if you really sense the importance of that what is of primary importance here now if you disregard that always mentally somewhere else only so yes sufficiently here not to bump into furniture or get run over by a car you still have some just a minimum of awareness in the present moment yes okay but your main occupation is to do with past and future and in the meantime you live here now but you're not really here now because you're looking you're there you don't want to be here I want to be there never want to be here and when you finally arrive there perhaps for a very brief moment it's nice I'm there but then the same mind pattern arises again because there when it becomes here it turns out not to be all that fulfilling and it's there because the next thing comes up it comes there you can never deeply penetrate into the here now you are prevented by deeply ingrained mind patterns from really embracing and penetrating into the present moment with your attention and so millions of humans on the planet live almost exclusively through anticipation and memory the older you get the more you live through memory because you get have more and more past behind you to remember and you can you can sense you have less and less future so the future is shrinking so you don't think when you reach a certain age maybe you don't think that much anymore more you some people still do when I retire then I'll be happy I'm just looking forward to retirement or only another 15 years then I will have and then I can really enjoy myself in 15 years I will start really living my life and then retirement comes and there you sit on a chair what do I do now who am I now without my job title I'm not important anymore weird what do you look for okay now you go into the past think about it there's a lot to think about there's always the mind pattern of this and this is the entry point into what we might call the spiritual dimension of life or the transcendent dimension of life it is the entry point into a certain state of consciousness that is quite different from the habitual prevalent egoic state of consciousness that most humans are still trapped in and the egoic state of consciousness needs past it lives through past and future it doesn't know what to do with the present moment or when it faces the present moment it interprets it according to its conditioning in other words it doesn't see it as it is because it sees it through the veil of its conditioning its judgments that has been inherited judgments over many years so the ego has been conditioned to interpret the world every experience in a certain way so when you are seemingly in the present moment because something is happening that requires your attention there's a person that says something to you it's challenging or situation is challenging and then even then you are not really in the egoic state you're not really present you are reacting according to the conditioning of your mind so in the past is still interfering even there when you seemingly are facing the present moment it's still facing it through the sometimes very dense veil of the past in you so people carry all that around with them their past which becomes their personality becomes the person that it makes up who you are or who you think you are so you carry the past around with you and many elements go into that make up your personality that consists of the accumulated past in your mental emotional field the accumulation of past experiences in your mental emotional field this accumulation is what you usually identify with as you that's me that's what people refer to when they use everybody's favorite pronoun there are all kinds of pronouns these days but everybody's favorite pronoun is i because they use it all the time i i think i know i i don't like unlike i want i must have i i so what is that i what is it that they refer to each person says i and the i refers to this accumulation of past experiences and past things that you have happened to you things that you have done things that you've experienced acquired and that has left traces in your mind as memories and forms of conditioning so that it becomes the person and that is what humans refer to when they say i now there is a deeper i another i many of you are awakening so you know what i'm talking about there is a deeper i that transcends who or what you are as a person a deeper transcendent identity and my intention is for you to experience if only glimpses or more to verify in your own experience what it is that i'm talking about when i talk about this this deeper i so i have recently started using some new terms that i didn't write in the books because the teaching kind of changes although the essence remains the same but the words sometimes change so we have the you have the surface i which is you as a person or the personality with all its dislikes and likes and its desires and its fears and its reactive patterns and its quirks and idiosyncrasies that's me and that's i call that the the surface i and then there is the potential the possibility of awakening to that deeper dimension of consciousness all ancient spirit traditions ultimately point to that but they use different pointers different words different terms there is the possibility of awakening to that deeper dimension within yourself and i say awakening that's an important term too that's a very ancient term awakening has been used for a long time in many spiritual traditions but it's an important term because it's used as an analogy to the awakening that happens to you every morning when you awaken from sleep and everybody can see what there's a fundamental difference between the sleep state and the dream state while you sleep and the awakening so every morning you awaken out of sleep and you go oh and then you may perhaps you think back a moment you had fragments of a dream are still in your mind and you said oh that was only a dream and so there's a obviously a very fundamental difference in your state of consciousness between being asleep or dreaming and suddenly awake so spiritual traditions use that analogy because everybody is familiar with what awakening is they use it as an analogy to point to another kind of awakening that has certain similarities with the habitual awakening that every human experiences every morning so in that awakening is to awaken out of complete identification with the personality the accumulated mental emotional energy field that you had identified with as me as I so in every human being that possibility of awakening is there in a one could say in many humans in a latent form it is a potential or you could call it to use another analogy you could call it like a seed that has not sprouted yet there's a reason why Jesus occasionally used the analogy of the seed or the mustard seed and then eventually it becomes a huge tree but the there is a the seed of awakening that in many many most still the majority use is still only a possibility it it has not sprouted yet that's an analogy one could use so what you this the spiritual awakening this is what it is it does not mean that you suddenly adopt certain new spiritual beliefs because the personality may already have an accumulation of spiritual beliefs and for some people their religious beliefs form an important part of their personality that you identify with I am such and such whatever label it is so the spiritual awakening is not to be confused with adopting suddenly or gradually a new belief system let's say you were an atheist and then suddenly somebody talks to you and says God exists you and you must believe and then the next day you say okay I believe now I believe and then perhaps you join a religion I'm just I have great respect for religions but in many cases religions can become incorporated into the egoic structure of the human mind potentially they are also a way of awakening ultimately religions are originally designed to provide humans with a portal through which awakening can happen but in many cases religions have instead of being a portal have become a closed a barrier wall and that happens when religion is no more than ideology a certain set of beliefs that you identify with in your mind and the identification becomes an important part of your ego your egoic sense of self sense of identity so this awakening then is not to be confused with suddenly having some new belief structure because the awakening transcends all conceptual mind activity it is not some new thought that arises although it could later once awakening has happened this new consciousness may flow into your mind and then you may express certain things in words that before you could never have expressed that's true but in itself the awakening is not to be looked for on the level of intellectual understanding or some kind of new belief system or even some people have certain visions which can be beautiful you let's you see an angel suddenly or you see have some kind of spiritual vision some people when they meditate some people have great experiences and good kind of fireworks or something and it's wonderful when it happens and then it happens and then it disappears and then you go oh what was that all about so it was an experience again it's not an experience not a great experience that you have to look for now here we come back to the importance of present moment and so on the looking for yourself as an awakened being to be reached at some point in the future which many spiritual seekers have that image of i want to be an awakened being enlightened whatever you want to call it and so they're looking for that in the same way that a non-spiritual person is looking for the next thing to acquire the next possession the next attainment the next thing that's going to make me feel more fulfilled more complete the next thing that i need to add to my sense of identity because my sense of identity is not satisfying enough i feel there's something big missing in me or in my life and i feel that i haven't arrived yet i don't know where but i haven't arrived yet i'm on my way and many humans have that continuous in the back of their minds or sometimes in the forefront that continuous sense of something is missing in my life this is a very intrinsic part of the egoic consciousness that sense of there's something missing in my life and so they look for that thing that's missing in all kinds of areas possessions i don't have enough recognition from other people but i don't get enough recognition i i feel i'm nobody or they don't appreciate me or the some kind of attainment or you look for improvement in your body body image that is part of the egoic consciousness of course is identifying with body image that's part of the makeup of the the eye structure you identify with the physical body that's a source of great pride and shame for many humans either one or the other or some halfway in between often this is the most perhaps the most fundamental identification begins with seeing yourself as this body and if the body is better looking than other bodies your ego would love that it's okay i feel superior to all these puny bodies there but if your body is not as good as other bodies then you you have a painful sense of identity as far as your body is concerned it is painful to think of yourself as less than this beautiful look at these beautiful people and look at me in cases like that of course the the egoic mind will very quickly try to repair its injured self-image if somebody shouts insults you shout something at you perhaps in traffic you're driving as somebody did not long ago i was driving and somebody shouted at me and said bad driver that was a relatively harmless insult well it it could have injured me deeply if my identity had been associated with being a good driver but i gave that up long ago but normally if somebody shouts at you you idiot the unconscious egoic reaction the ego any insult will injure the self-image and only that gets injured you don't get injured but you are not even there because you are not awakened yet so what gets injured is the egoic self-image that has a sense of injury and diminishment when you get insulted it feels you feel diminished in their senses so it's painful to the ego to you it's not but you are still asleep i mean you but most humans and so immediately the ego will go into repair activity immediately this is the most fundamental level of ego somebody shouts at you idiot and you have to immediately shout something back that is the way in which you eat the ego repairs its diminished sense of self if if somebody insults you you can shout back with an even greater insult and the ego which is all ultimately fictions in your mind so the ego feels repaired a bit bigger you've shouted something back and then of course it could get amplified because the other's ego now feels diminished and then they shout it back and finally you stop your cars and you get out and you start fighting not uncommon road rage is one of the many ways in which the ego manifests its unconsciousness so the every human carries within this possibility of awakening one could say it's covered up by very dense mental emotional stuff that has accumulated over you can look at it in even in this lifetime a lot has accumulated you can also look for past lifetimes accumulations over past lifetimes these accumulations which we could call karmic if we use eastern terminology everybody of course has this accumulation that makes up the personality everybody has that but the question is are you completely identified with that is that what gives you your sense of self and you have nothing but that surface i the surface i that is the unawakened state and the surface i everybody's surface i of course has a different makeup according to your experiences and past lifetimes if you want to go there but it's whether or not you believe in past lifetimes is irrelevant for our purposes of awakening so this accumulation is there the question is are you completely identified with it in which case the awakening has not happened yet or are you able to be aware at least occasionally because that would be the beginning of an awakening at least occasionally you're aware of your inner state of consciousness for example you're aware of thoughts in your mind especially with certain repetitive thoughts in your mind and you suddenly realize okay for the past few years i've been continuously thinking that type of thought for example in some people could be i'm not good enough that could obviously would can go back to childhood parents were not encouraging you thought finding on the part of your parents a deeply ingrained sense not of not being good enough and that's that's partly unconscious and partly conscious often you actually you think that in situations and a moment may come when after years of living with that and completely believing in that thought which is what we mean by identifying the thought is imbued with a sense of self that's the egoic state every thought that arises in your mind has a self in it this is a buddhist term the way i talk about is i say you you incarnate into every arising thought you ask the consciousness and that's just spiritually you're asleep you incarnate when you identify with the thought you incarnate into the thought you become it and so i'm not good enough and the day comes when suddenly we don't know why what triggered it but suddenly you're able to stand back and look at the thought as an awareness that this is a thought that has been in my mind for years and this shift of suddenly becoming aware of your own thoughts that is the beginning of an awakening spiritual awakening that is the beginning of this the seed of awakening is beginning to sprout when in other words a new dimension of consciousness is beginning to arise in you at first perhaps only briefly or we don't know in most humans it gets triggered by suffering in one way or another adversity is a great awakener the possibility of awakening grows with your experience adversity that's exactly what the ego does not want obviously the ego wants its comfort zone and the ego might tell you i want to spiritually awaken but what i need is a life where i don't need to worry anymore about relationships and about my finances and my work and my life situation if i could only be somewhere where i'm supportive get good clean wonderful food if perhaps even massages every day if i get all that then i could spiritually awaken i just need this ideal retreat center somewhere it must exist somewhere and then the ego says yeah but you can't afford it don't you know you you you've failed because you're not good enough you can't afford it oh oh my god i can't i can't yes that's when you feel the corresponding emotion that corresponds to that thought and then the emotion creates more thoughts of similar kind for a few more days and finally you can't stand it anymore or you're ready to have to come to a spiritual teacher suddenly point out to the possibility of becoming aware of your thoughts instead of being your thoughts i'm becoming aware of your thoughts instead of being your thoughts and here wow so all these thoughts going through my mind now i'm verbalizing something now that is not verbalized because the awareness is just aware and she suddenly reasons these are small well i had a partial awakening when i was 17 years old and then i went back to sleep spiritually speaking i had a partial awakening at 17 through a book that somebody left with us a woman was leaving the country and said can i leave these books with you and the books were written by some obscure mystic and i was that was the first time i came into contact with a spiritual book and i read a few a few pages and it said something about your thoughts that's not who you are they the thoughts especially the negative thoughts are they create negative life experience because the external world tends to confirm to you your state of consciousness so in other words if you think that everybody's out to cheat you then you're more likely to meet people who are going to cheat you if you think everybody is dishonest you're more likely to meet dishonest people so he was in that book he was talking about there's a certain correlation obviously between your state of consciousness and the way in which you experience reality there's a correlation but all this was new to me he talked about becoming free of negative thoughts so for the first time i suddenly became aware of my thoughts that i'd had almost since i began to think at age of three or four or five i can't remember there was one persistent thought that i had a lot and i suddenly at the age of 17 i became aware of that well that thought was of course bad things always happened to me i knew it but it's always me always bad things happen to me and they did my childhood was not very happy so bad things did happen a lot i mean some people had worse childhoods and that i know that but it was bad enough so at 17 i suddenly realized wow i've been thinking that thought and it's not a helpful thought and i to some extent i was able to let go of that thought and then there was sufficient shift in consciousness through those writings that my life circumstances one year later changed quite dramatically that one could never have predicted for the better for the first time great things happened to me i changed the negative thoughts into more positive thoughts and then great things it wasn't not a full awakening at all but a partial awakening so to speak and then i i got offered a well-paid job without any qualifications lived in quite a pleasant place moving to a country i wanted to move to it was actually london england i was living in spain at the time when that happened and so that was fine and then i was improved life circumstances and then spiritually speaking i gradually went back to sleep so i had this insight and then a lot of unhappiness came back and i couldn't disidentify from it until several years later but that was the beginning for many humans beginning of awakening is they become aware of their thoughts and that awareness is not a thought awareness is a dimension of consciousness that is beyond thought one could say you could i don't know whatever word you want to use you can say it's behind thought or it's above thought doesn't matter it's it transcends thought and another word for that of course is presence and this awareness is the beginning of liberation it's another spiritual term liberation from yourself liberation from yourself the self that you thought you were which was ultimately a narrative in your mind accompanied by corresponding emotions me and you can see how so many humans are still trapped in that completely in this they carry around this this heaviness of a personality if you know an unawakened human after a little while you can predict exactly how he or she is going to react or what he or she is going to say just you can press any button and it's like a recording that comes out it's been it yeah it comes out again so the liberation is the incredible thing that is the liberation from yourself this does not mean that you as a person disappear no for a little while you continue in this dimension as a person but you realize that ultimately that is not the essence of who you are at all it is a story it's a character like in a play it's like an actor on stage suddenly awakening while he is uttering his lines that he's uttered every evening in every performance and suddenly he realizes these are just lines i'm uttering because i've learned them it's my script i've learned this this is the script before he was so identified he was the script so this is the beginning of an awakening becoming aware of your thoughts all this mental emotional stuff that it makes up the personality yes it continues to be there but gradually and sometimes suddenly it no longer gives you your sense of identity it's just there as the makeup of your your person so if you are not then the person who or what are you if i am not ultimately that who or what am i well you begin with that thing that enabled you it's not a thing that enabled you to become aware of your thoughts that awareness that is the essence of who or what you are that is that transcends the time created person it's created by an accumulation of time in your mind and traces left i'm oprah

Becoming aware of the invisible you. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about our connection to the source of universal consciousness, which he compares to the vastness of the ocean. He says each person with individual awareness is like a small ripple on the surface of the ocean.

However, he believes if we only ever know ourselves as a ripple, then we won't recognize our true depth. Eckhart asks participants to consider who they are beyond the surface, a person with a personality to the fathomless invisible self deep below. He believes all ancient spiritual traditions point toward this journey of transformation.

And he says it's not only a possibility, but is a necessity for human evolution. He says we must ask ourselves, can the ripple realize its true identity as the ocean?

Let's go to the analogy of the ocean. You have the ocean. On the surface of the ocean, there are waves and ripples.

In this analogy, let's say every little ripple or wave believes itself to be an independent entity disconnected from other ripples. It only knows itself as a ripple, because it doesn't know its own depth. And every wave only knows itself as a wave.

Wave could be perhaps VIPs. If you own a private jet, you're a wave. And if you don't, you're a ripple.

But the wave and the ripple are all short-lived. Their destiny is the same. The body, one day the body is here, you're somebody, the next day you're nobody.

Whether you're a wave or ripple doesn't matter. This ripple, of course, feels uneasy on the surface of the ocean, because its sense of identity is very limited, and it feels sometimes threatened by other ripples, or it wants to use other ripples to associate with in order to become a bigger ripple. And sometimes temporarily that works, but not for very long.

And then you're looking for yourself on the horizontal realm. Where can I be a more complete ripple? Can you help me be a more complete ripple?

Or I need you. If we come together, we can be a big ripple. And it's never, nothing really works.

In one moment, the ripple goes to a talk in the chat, and it hears this weird analogy, and then says, but who are you beyond the body of you as the person, the invisible you? Can you become aware of the invisible you? First of all, it's the person that consists of thoughts and emotions, but that's already a little bit beyond the surface of the ocean.

You go a little bit into the ocean, and there you exist as a person. And there's all your emotions and your thoughts and your identity as a human. There you are.

You've become aware of that. And that's still very limited. And that is sustained by the incessant thinking machine, the conditioned mind.

It sustains the personal selfhood, self-identity. That's amazing. And so the key is to realizing, go deeper and sense your connectedness with the ocean.

Ocean, in this analogy, means consciousness, universal consciousness that pervades the entire universe, the intelligence that underlies all phenomenal existence, the intelligence behind it all, the organizing principle behind the arising of forms, all forms, a vast intelligence that does not exist as such, but it gives rise to existence. The vast intelligence is, it is being, it is not, it doesn't exist, because everything that exists, exists in this dimension. But beyond this dimension, there is the depth of being, which is vast universal consciousness.

So the ocean is, the analogy of the ocean points to that. And you can sense it, begin to get a glimpse of it. For a moment, the mind subsides.

This is the moment. Now that's, that's enough as a glimpse. Now, okay, what does that mean?

What does that mean? Anything you might, some people might ask. Yes, it does.

What happens when the mind subsides, which means the otherwise incessant stream of automatic, unconscious, compulsive thinking, comes to an end, briefly? What remains of you without the thoughts? And I'm not talking about the cessation of thinking that happens when you go to sleep.

We're not talking about that, because that could happen too. Hopefully not nobody here. The cessation of thinking, as you go into sleep, you become very tired, and you cannot think much anymore.

And there's a moment of transition between the state of wakefulness and the state of sleep, where you are still a little bit conscious. And that is a very sweet, precious moment. You feel the sweetness of sleep pulling you.

And you know you can't resist that. Sleep has come. It forces you to go there, to go beyond yourself.

So you have, even there, you have a moment before, before the sleep of self-transcendence. You cannot remember your story anymore. There's just a feeling of sweetness.

And it says, come this way. So, wonderful, just the moments before sleep. So, here again, a moment, a brief moment of self-transcendence.

And all self-transcendence consists in the cessation of the otherwise incessant stream of thinking, conceptualization. Well, now, what is it that remains? What is it that remains of you, when you don't remember your story, but you haven't fallen asleep, and you haven't taken any drugs?

Well, I assume not. Or you haven't had a few whiskeys before coming here. Because something like alcohol, which people, millions of people would jump off bridges without their alcohol, they would go totally crazy.

It's a drug. And what does it do? It also offers you a brief moment of self-transcendence.

Not always, but sometimes the possibility is there. And after a few drinks, you feel much better. If you go further, you feel much worse.

Why do you feel much better? Because the mind isn't that active anymore. And some people begin to laugh.

They also do that when they smoke, this thing that they smoke. And suddenly they start laughing. Before they were burdened with their problems, their problematic self.

And what am I going to do with my life? Look at my life, the mess of it. I can't stand it anymore.

And then they go, This is also a brief moment of self-transcendence, but it's taking you towards unconsciousness, similar to sleep. But I can see how some people love it, and might even think they need it, because they get this glimpse of becoming free of the burden of this themselves. Moment of self-transcendence.

But again, what is it that characterizes this moment? And again, if you look deeply, you see that it happens because there's little or no thinking anymore. And yet you are still there.

Now here's an interesting experiment. What is left of you when you're not thinking? You're not thinking about your life, your so-called life, which by the way, you don't have a life, because you are life.

You can't have it. Who is it that has a life? You are the life.

You are the consciousness. What you call my life is a mental construct. It's a concept.

And then when that goes, okay, you don't remember your past. You don't need to right now. That's an experiment.

You don't need to remember where you live or your email address. It's unnecessary. It adds nothing to this moment.

You don't remember anything about yourself. All you're aware of is this moment, and you're aware of sense perceptions, visual, auditory. You're aware of that.

More importantly, you're aware of something you cannot define. You're aware of being. You're aware that you are.

I wouldn't say that you exist, because existence is a form that manifests. It stands. X means out.

X exists to stand out. But beyond that, you're aware that you are the I am. Let's, again, you get a glimpse of that between two thoughts.

One thought comes to an end. The other thought hasn't started up yet. There are sense perceptions in this moment, but there's also an awareness behind the sense perceptions, without which there wouldn't be any sense perceptions.

This awareness has no form. It is pure beingness. And that is what I mean when I say in this analogy, the ripple suddenly becomes aware when it stops, when it stops thinking.

Because in this analogy, the ripple thinks a lot. When it stops thinking, it becomes aware of its own depths. It becomes aware of its own depths.

And its own depths, in the analogy of the ripple, is the vastness of the ocean. And so the ripple becomes aware of the vastness out of which it has come. The vastness that to which it is connected.

And not only connected, the vastness of the ocean that is inseparable from what the ripple is. Because the ripple is a manifestation of the ocean. And a surface manifestation of the ocean.

And suddenly, the ripple realizes its true identity as the ocean. And this is the analogy. And this happens when a little bit of stillness arises.

You get the first glimpse of it. Stillness means cessation of thinking. But no loss of consciousness.

In other words, you rise above thinking. When you go to sleep, in your journey towards sleep, you fall below thinking. Yes, there also you become free of thinking, briefly.

But you're moving towards unconsciousness. The same with drinking alcohol or whatever drug. Yes, it can free you temporarily from your mind.

But you're falling below thinking. Which is an unproblematic region. Because all of nature exists below thinking.

It's a manifestation of consciousness. But has no, the tree has no concept of who or what it is. The tree has a certain consciousness, yes.

It's a manifestation of the same animating presence that animates all forms in the universe. And the dog is a little bit more in common with the human. It hasn't arrived at the conceptual mind yet.

But it's closer to the human consciousness than the tree. But you might have noticed the dog doesn't have an ego. Well, almost.

Very occasionally, I have observed cats or dogs that have shown the beginnings of an ego. And usually the owner of the dog has a huge ego. And it drops off on the dog or the cat.

But most dogs don't. They don't have a narrative about that they call my life. There's no me.

They exist prior to egoic consciousness. They are free of that. But we, it is not our destiny to go back to the animal, to the tree, to the blade of grass.

Our journey is beyond all ancient spiritual traditions and teachings point to the possibility of realizing the transcendent consciousness, no matter how they talk about it, what they call it. The ancient, the deep teachings all point to this possibility and not only possibility to this need for humans to evolve into that. And that's the need is great.

Especially at this time of a crisis. So a shift in consciousness happens when you become aware, and let's put it like this, when you become aware of awareness. In other words, there is a presence that you can sense when you're not thinking, but you haven't, you're not moving towards sleep.

You're very alert. It can sometimes arise, as I said, when you look at a baby or dog or out in nature, suddenly the wow arises because you're not thinking. And there's a deep response to what you see and perceive.

But also, and more importantly, the realization of that in you, that is the essence of you. And that makes all perception possible. In the ancient Upanishads, the ancient scriptures of India, going back thousands of years, the one of the Upanishads, I don't usually memorize scriptures, so it's an incomplete quote, but it goes something like, not that which the eye sees, but that whereby the eye can see.

Know only that to be Brahman, God. Then it goes on to the other senses. Not that which the ear hears, but that whereby the ear can hear.

Know that to be Brahman, and not what people hear at all. And it goes to the other senses. So it's not what you see, what you hear, but that which makes all hearing and seeing and thinking possible.

It's not what you think, but that which makes thought possible. Know that to be the transcendent consciousness. And not what people hear at all is always added, which means, do not seek God in the realm of form or existence and say, God is over there or over there.

God is not, can never be an object of consciousness. I'm suddenly talking about God. Usually I avoid it, but it just happened.

I avoid it because there were so many misunderstandings about God. So God cannot be an object of consciousness. This is exactly what Jesus said when he, by the way, when he said, when they asked him, where is the kingdom of heaven?

The kingdom of heaven, by the way, means the transcendent consciousness. In my translation, the kingdom of heaven is the, the kingdom is the realm of heaven is the vast sky, vast spaciousness, the dimension of spaciousness, which is a dimension of consciousness, kingdom of heaven, the dimension of spaciousness. Heaven is also used in other spiritual traditions.

The closest you can get to spacious consciousness is the vastness of heaven. The sky, the sky is not an object either. You cannot touch it.

You can never arrive there. It just seems to be there. It's basically, it's, it's just an externalization of space, something that the senses seem to perceive, but has no actual existence.

So Jesus said, when they asked him, when is the kingdom of heaven going to come? He says, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be perceived. You cannot say, look, it's over here or look, it's over there, for truly the kingdom of heaven is within you.

Now, what does that mean? It does not come with signs to be perceived, means it cannot ever be an object of consciousness. This is the misunderstanding of God.

You can speak to God, that's fine, if it gives you comfort, but the essence of who you are is consciousness. And consciousness is an emanation of that one that we could call God, but does not exist in this dimension, is not part of space and time, but the light of it shines into this world and manifests in you as consciousness. This is why Jesus said, you are the light of the world.

This is so clear. What does that mean? It doesn't mean you are, you are better than others.

It points to the essence of who you are. The light of the world is a consciousness in which the world appears. You are the consciousness that makes this world possible.

You are the light of consciousness. You are the light of the world. And this is not something as an intermediate step.

It's fine to have that belief. And then it's time to go beyond belief, the mere belief, to a realization, an actual realization of the depths within you, the depth within you in which you are connected to that vastness that is consciousness. Now, as you probably know, you go back thousands of years, like ancient Egypt, they regarded the sun as God.

And there are many similarities, one could say, because the sun emanates light continuously, a vast outpouring of energy, which we perceive as light, the life-giving energy of the sun. It emanates continuously, it gives of itself continuously. And I suggest that in the same way, the consciousness that is in all living things, and even in a lower vibrational frequency, in so-called inanimate things, which are not ultimately inanimate, every form that exists is an expression of this one consciousness that emanates, shines into this dimension.

And gradually it brings about an increase in consciousness. So God itself obviously is beyond space and time, there's no development, there cannot be. But the emanation that shines into this dimension and creates this universe, there is an evolutionary process, and gradually more consciousness flows into this universe from that transcendent source of all life.

From that transcendent source of all life, consciousness flows into this universe and it animates, forms, and gradually there is an increase in the light that shines into this universe. There is the universe in the process of becoming more conscious. That's the amazing thing.

The universe is in the process of becoming more conscious. The light of consciousness emanates from the one source. The one source, of course, is beyond time, beyond space and time.

I'm explaining something that one cannot really understand conceptually, but I'm talking about it because I would like to refer to the possibility of realizing this beyond concepts, where you realize this depth that is within you, and then you see that the person that you thought you were is a relatively fleeting phenomenon. In essence, you are consciousness itself, which some in ancient times, some mystics in all traditions, Christian mystics, Sufis in Islam, Zen tradition, Buddhism, and so on, Hinduism very much. A few people in there realized this within themselves, and some kept quiet about it, that was very wise, and others suddenly shouted this was a misinterpretation of their mind, attempting to understand what had happened to them.

They suddenly shouted, I am God! This was not well received, and many of them got killed. I would advise against it, and it is not the complete truth.

It is, one could say, a partial truth. The same way that a ray of sunlight, you feel it when it comes down, you feel it on your skin. Now the ray of sunlight, obviously, is an emanation of the sun, and is still connected to the sun.

So in one sense, the ray of sunlight could say, I am the sun, but in another sense, the sun is infinitely more vast than just the ray that it emanates, although it's one with it. So I would not say that the ray of sunlight would say, I am the sun, but if the ray of sunlight says, I am an emanation of the sun, and I can sense the essence of the sun as my very being, that is the truth. And that realization comes to you in moments of stillness, and not necessarily when you are being undisturbed by things.

This is not a prerequisite for realizing this inner dimension. The stillness can come in the midst of turmoil too. This stillness, which is a transcendent consciousness, can come when the egoic self loses important things that made up its identity.

So when the egoic self, the mind-made self, loses things that gave it its identity, which could be possessions, sudden loss of possessions, losing relationships, losing somebody close to you through death, losing all your belongings, losing social status, suddenly being nobody in the eyes of the world, whereas before you were somebody in the eyes of the world. Loss of any kind can become an opening because it deprives the ego of its nourishment and sustenance. Without identifying, the ego begins to collapse, it crumbles.

This is why often you hear of people, when they lose all their possessions, they were perhaps important tycoons or business people. There was a story of in the 30s when there was the big economic downturn. Many people in Manhattan, they dumped off the skyscrapers, they couldn't take it anymore because they lost everything.

They were so associated with their egoic self, when this did not have any sustenance anymore, that was the end of the world for them. It was dreadful, and so this can happen, but potentially when you experience great loss, the things that had given the ego its identity are taken away, a crack appears in the egoic shell, and there suddenly what is, what you realize then suddenly is the peace that passes all understanding. You suddenly, when you surrender to this fact that there's loss now, suddenly you feel an inner peace, and you lost everything.

I've had many accounts of people telling me that it happened to them. Many people who've come to me over the years said, if I had not experienced, if I had not lost all my money, or if I had not, in some cases very tragic things, I'd lost my children in an accident, I was close to death, I was diagnosed with this illness, and I could feel death approaching, everything collapsed inside me. When you feel death approaching, it's hard to sustain an ego, and suddenly they felt deeply at peace, something opened up, and that peace is that deep stillness, and that deep stillness is the, you have transcended all you are as a person, self-transcendence.

Eckhart Tolle Beyond The Dream of Thinking [c49efc50-f987-4b58-a3df-fe4068723de9]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:47)

Beyond the Dream of Thinking. In this podcast, Eckhart inspires a crowd in New York City. He talks about the importance of rooting ourselves in the transcendent dimension, especially when we feel overwhelmed by the insanity of the world.

He explains it's easy to believe we are a species who has lost our way. His example is to simply watch the evening news. He says most people's attention is consumed by thinking.

Eckhart believes once we release the mind's constraints, our awareness becomes clear like precious stones, transparent to the light. He says consciousness is what remains when thought comes to an end. He believes it is only by taking our attention deeply into the present that we encounter the transcendent.

The being dimension is who we are beyond the dream of thinking.

[Speaker 1] (0:50 - 50:32)

And now let's go into the really good news, which is, what is this transcendent dimension? Now, as a concept, it's just that, just a concept. But what is the reality of it?

Is it possible to experience, or to know, or perhaps at least to have a glimpse of that transcendent dimension? Not at some point in the future, but here and now, here and now. So what am I talking about?

What is the transcendent dimension? What we need to do now, obviously, is take our attention to the present moment, because that's the only place where you can find the transcendent dimension of consciousness, because it is timeless. There's no past and future to it.

It is only by taking your attention deeply into this moment that you can encounter the transcendent dimension in yourself, and the transcendent dimension in yourself is also who you are beyond the personality, beyond the so-called person. And then you realize that you exist both on the level of humanhood, you are a human, as I call it, you are a human, which is your existence on the level of form, physical form, mental, psychological form of who you are, so that is your temporary existence of a person, and you also exist in the transcendent, and that is the being, human being. Human is who you are on the level of form, body and mental form.

Now, for most people, that's all they ever know about themselves, that they are trapped in that level, and that is what produces human history, what is what produces what you can watch on TV and the newscasts tonight, politics. That is that dimension of consciousness. Then the being dimension is who you are beyond the stream of thinking on the level of conscious awareness.

Let's stay with just this present moment. If we go deeply into this moment, how do we encounter, how do we go deep enough? What does it even mean to go deep into this moment?

Well, let's see. If we go deeply into this moment, what does it mean to encounter who you truly are? Because that's what the transcendent dimension is.

That's already was the question asked by the ancient Greeks. Know thyself, the dictum that probably was first uttered by Pythagoras, one of the first, or the first Greek philosopher who lived about the time of the Buddha. Know thyself.

Know thyself. That's on the Oracle at Delphi in ancient Greece. It was carved in the stone.

Know thyself. That's the most important dictum in human life. Now, that does not primarily refer to knowing the story of yourself better, but could be interesting, but that's not it.

It knows going beyond the story into a dimension of timelessness in yourself, the dimension of depth. So this moment, what does this moment consist of? This moment consists, first of all, obviously here, your sense perceptions, your sense perceptions, visual and auditory mainly, to some extent, tactile, because you feel that you're sitting on a chair and so on.

So you're taking in the entirety of this room, or there's a man sitting on a chair. You hear the sounds, the sounds of my voice, and they become thoughts in your head. You're kind of following the sounds because then they become thoughts in your head.

So temporarily you are, if you're listening carefully, you're thinking the same thoughts, but you might also get other thoughts in your head that say, oh no, that's not true. So that may also happen. Your entire life consists of sense perceptions, thoughts, and feelings, emotions.

I think that's it. Now with every person, though, they're mixed in a different way because the sense perception that you experienced as a child and experiencing now are different from other people's sense perceptions, but they're sense perceptions. You hear, you feel, you touch, you take in, you experience life, and then you experience life on the level of the mind.

And many people don't actually experience sense perception very strongly anymore because so much of their attention is absorbed by thinking. They're hardly here. Many people's attention, especially those people who are completely identified with thinking, they're hardly aware of their surroundings because they're continuously absorbed in thought.

It's a noise of thought. And you can see people like that. You can see that their eyes are kind of lifeless.

There's no longer any energy coming through their eyes because everything is being completely gobbled up by, devoured by mind activity and the entire consciousness, their attention is. So they might be looking at you, but they don't really see you. They might see a judgment they have about you, but they don't see you.

And then they're running about the city on the phone. Sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions. Okay, that makes those, because your entire past is thought.

It's your entire life consists of sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions that go with the thoughts. And that's it, isn't it? Yeah, okay, hmm.

Sense perception, that's my life. Haven't I forgotten something important? I have a feeling, I have a feeling I forgot something very important.

And that is so easily overlooked. Philosophers over the centuries have discussed the possibility that life is a dream. And you cannot refute the possibility.

There's a possibility you cannot deny that you may be dreaming this whole thing. You're dreaming that you're sitting in a chair, on a chair, and you're listening to a man or sitting on another chair who says that you may be dreaming right now. Okay, you may be dreaming, but even if you're dreaming, there's still something without which you couldn't be dreaming.

There needs to be a consciousness in which the dream appears. Without consciousness, there's no dream. Without the space in this room, there's no room.

You are conscious at this moment. Otherwise, you would not be experiencing this and you would not be able to think anything, see anything, hear anything. All these things require consciousness to appear.

But what is consciousness? Consciousness is what remains when one thought comes to an end and the next thought hasn't started yet. For example, I'm now coming to the end of a sentence right now.

And for just a few seconds, the following sentence will not start. And if you were alert during this gap, I wasn't thinking. And if you were alert during this gap, you were not thinking either.

I'm suggesting to you the possibility of being conscious without thinking. For example, now. It doesn't have to be long, just a little space.

Just a little space, alert, alert presence. You're still perceiving everything. You're still hearing, but you're not thinking.

Right now, in order to know yourself on that level, you do not need to remember your history. You do not need to remember your problems. You do not need to remember your victories or failures.

You don't need to remember your story, whether right now your story happens to be happy for a while or unhappy, no longer relevant. You don't need to remember your name to know who you are, because what is your name? It's a sound, it's a thought, nothing else.

So let's see if you can keep your internal space free and just be aware of yourself as a spacious presence. It's easier, by the way, if at the same time, you can feel that a certain aliveness pervades your entire body, so that one could almost say that you become present in every cell of the body. There's a simple presence, and while that presence is conscious, but it's not thinking.

If you can realize that this is possible, at first, of course, there seems to be nothing there, really, there's just a kind of blank space. But if you stay with it, if you don't run away from the blank space, because the mind doesn't want you to go there, it says, why are you doing this? Don't you know that you have problems?

Don't you know that you need to think about your problems right now? No, you deal with your problems. When the time comes, you take action and you pick up a phone and you do something.

But in the meantime, you're not going to have your life devoured up by your so-called problems, the beautiful essence of your life, devoured up by your mind, pretending that you need to worry about your problems and you're going to solve them by continuously thinking about your problematic self. You deal with it when the moment comes and there's a possibility of dealing with it, you take action, that's it. But here and now, don't follow the mind when it says, oh, don't go there, I have no time now to be present, I just, I need to get these problems sorted out first.

Now, if you say that, I need to get this sorted out first, and my life is just too complicated to be, I can't be bothered with this right now, I've too much on my plate, as the expression goes, I have too much on my plate. Okay, 10 years pass, are you ready now? No, I still have got a lot on my plate.

20 years pass, oh, I've never had more on my plate than now, don't come to me now. And then you're on your deathbed and still can't stop thinking. The amazing thing is, the next human evolution has not come to an end.

I mean, if human evolution had come to an end, that would be a tragedy. Oh my God, is that the best you can do? That would be a terrible tragedy.

No, it's a work in progress. Gradually, it's very slow, but it's faster now than it has ever been, I know that, because in the past, there's very slow advances and then regressive periods and another slow advance. The human consciousness is evolving, the entire universe is evolving, we are a manifestation of the evolving universe, which is gradually becoming more conscious and more differentiated and producing more conscious life forms.

The development of thinking has been an incredible advance in the evolutionary development of humans, but every advance that has been incredible, wonderful thing also had a downside as it became more and more pronounced, it took over more and more humans. Now, the next step is not to stop thinking altogether, that's absurd, to be able to think fruitfully and to be able to think effectively and to be able to actually use the mind in order to manifest things, to create things, it's a wonderful, wonderful tool, but it's only a wonderful tool if it is a tool, it is not a wonderful thing if you are possessed by your mind, it's not a wonderful thing if you identify with your mind and it gives you a sense of self, then it becomes destructive, it becomes the ego. The next step in the evolution is to be able to relinquish thinking temporarily for periods of time, brief periods, sometimes longer periods, to be able to step into no thought, but not to fall below thinking, sometimes people think I'm talking about regressing to the state of an animal because an animal doesn't think, not conceptually, it doesn't have a self image, but we cannot go back to the pre-thinking stage, many people try that because they are so burdened by their mind that they need to get me out of here, and of course then, that yes, you can take certain substances that will take you below thought, and for a little while, you are relieved, you say, I'm no longer burdened with my unhappy self, I'm, oh, such a relief, it's life, great, give me another drink, oh, God, I can't even remember my problems anymore, or whatever it is you take, no, this is a huge, millions need their drugs, whether it's prescription drugs or other drugs, they need their drugs because they need to escape the torture of their mind, but most of these drugs take you below thought and give you some relief, yes, so one way is to take go below thought, but where we are heading in evolutionary terms is we are rising above thought, we have to rise above thinking, which means it's in a state of relaxed alertness, and right now, if I'm inviting you into that state of relaxed alertness, in which you don't need to remember your name or your past, and you will now, I want you to verify in yourself without remembering your past or your name right now, are you still what you call you, your most essential identity, do you feel that's still there even if you don't remember your past?

Can you sense a presence there that has nothing to do with your history? There is undoubtedly a presence there, and that presence, if you stay with it and allow it to be there and go more deeply into it, you sense it much more strongly, and then it becomes something almost a very subtle sense of joy in that presence where you are there just as an aware presence. Once you sense that, it's the beginning of the liberation from your mind-made sense of self.

It's the beginning of the liberation from the person, from the personality, which still exists, but exists, but you're no longer in the grip of it. So to access that, that is the who you are in essence, and who you are in essence is no different from who I am in essence, and the other person is in essence. That essence is what we share.

What we don't share is the personality. If we only interact as personalities, every interaction is going to be conflict-ridden and become problematic very quickly. Every relationship is going to become problematic very quickly if you only interact one personality with another, but if you have access to this, I call it sometimes the deep I, I, first person, the pronoun, the deep I as opposed to the I that you use in conventional language when you say I, you normally refer to your personality.

You normally refer to the historical self. That's a normal usage of the word I, but there is in you a deep I that is not conditioned, that needs to be sensed, that needs to be realized to transform your life. You can be rooted in the deep I and yet function actually much better than before, function on the level of the personality or the person and deal with the stuff that you have to deal with and pursue goals, pursue, have aims, be active, but not mistaking any achievement or any activity for who you are, not seeking yourself in things, not trying to improve your sense of identity because you already have a full sense of identity in that presence. And then you are not dependent on the fluctuating externals in your life because every situation that you encounter in your life fluctuates. It's good for a while.

And then the thing that made you happy, suddenly very same thing makes you unhappy or you achieve for a while and then suddenly there's a failure. And that's a narrative in your mind. And that narrative creates so much suffering.

You can't just can't stand the suffering anymore that there is without ever perhaps having listened to any spiritual discourse or read any spiritual book, suddenly there's a disidentification from the narrative because it makes your life so painful that you can't stand it anymore. And you step out of it. And suddenly you're there as just a presence.

And there you sit in your prison cell and what you called your dreadful life has receded into the background. And what's left is you as consciousness. And I've known one or two people who told me that's what happened to them in prison, potentially.

And others have written to me also said, I'm still in prison, but I am free. I've had quite a few communications like that. So that can happen even the most extreme circumstances.

It can happen when the doctor has told you you have a few more weeks, no more. And what does that do? It removes time from you.

It removes future from you. And what does that mean? Remove future means it removes thoughts of future because every thought of future says, oh, I don't have any.

And it's terrible suffering. So this can force you into the present moment that there's suddenly almost a complete dissolving or collapse of the person or the personality, but not in a negative sense. It's a sudden, and what's left is just you as that presence.

And then your life is totally fulfilled. You don't need time anymore, which otherwise you do need because the person always says, oh, I haven't done that yet. I still have a long bucket list.

I'm not ready to go. Look, my bucket list is still 50 things I haven't seen and done. Okay.

So liberation from the personality, but still be able to use it and function as a personality. And then inviting the space of pure awareness into your life in ordinary situations throughout the day, which means little spaces. You get into your car, close the door.

Don't immediately start the engine. Sit there for 30 seconds. Breathing can help too, but don't see it as doing.

You're not doing anything. If you get the idea that you're doing something, you're doing presence, you're doing being, you can't do being. So you can't say, okay, now I'm going to do 30 seconds of presence.

That doesn't work. You have to completely go into the now, into the present moment, so that there's nothing left of you except a sense of presence and the sense perceptions, whatever you're perceiving. Now, there used to be a time before they invented all these devices, these handheld devices, whatever they're called, there used to be a time when sometimes people, where they were sitting and waiting somewhere in a waiting room or waiting at the airport or waiting, going out into nature, there used to be a time when there were no devices to fill up your mind and people could either be completely bored or they could be, oh, look around. So I suggest that great vigilance is required because these devices that everybody uses, they amplify the tendency of the mind to produce clutter continuously. So clutter means useless thoughts.

Many Facebook posts and even many text messages you get may be relatively useless, I think, and they clutter up your mind. They give you the impression that something important is happening. I need to look.

Do you ever see people just sitting somewhere? No. The moment they sit somewhere, they have to look at this or stand somewhere.

Have to engage with this. Be vigilant so that you don't clutter up your mind with unnecessarily engaging in this interaction continuously. It's actually addictive.

It's an addiction. What effect this will have on the development of civilization now that we have the first generation grown up now with these devices, we don't even know. Let's see.

But for you, it's important to be aware that they are addictive because it's the addiction of not being able to stop thinking is now reflected and amplified by this device. I've often said even before, 20 years ago, I already said, probably the greatest addiction, and at that time, they didn't have these devices yet to amplify the addiction, the greatest addiction is the addiction to thinking. And I don't mean fruitful thinking.

I mean thinking like worrying and useless projections and useless interpretations and misinterpretations of other people's intentions and all kinds of useless stuff that continuously is a noise in your head and you can't stop and you don't want to stop because you're in the grip of it. It's the addiction to overthinking. And why is the addiction to thinking?

Because your sense of identity is derived from thinking. If you don't know the deep eye, you need to stop thinking, who am I? And now this tendency, this addiction cannot stop thinking is made even worse by the device.

Now I can't, or not only can I not stop thinking, I can't stop interacting with this thing, which makes me think even more. And there are people who really walk around in a kind of trance. Youngsters, many, it's a terrible thing.

Hardly aware of their surroundings. So this is very important to counteract this tendency in your life so you create spaces in your life of no thought, of pure looking at something. They don't have to be long.

Just the more you practice that, the more it will arise in you. Look at a thing, whether it's a natural thing or a man-made thing, whether it's a table or a flower, natural things are even more helpful. Look at a thing for a few seconds without interpreting it mentally.

Look around this room right now without interpreting what you see, but seeing it. Being aware of what you see, but not naming it in your mind. Is that possible?

Yes. It's actually quite very pleasant. And in that moment when you're perceiving without naming, you are not perceiving things as a person.

You're not a historical person in that moment. In that moment, you are awareness. You are consciousness, timeless consciousness, the consciousness of the universe manifesting in you and as you and perceiving.

And now when you perceive in that way, there is a twofold thing. You're aware of what you're perceiving visually or auditory. Those are the two main organs of perception.

You're aware of what you're perceiving. You're not naming it. You're aware of it.

And when you're aware of it, somehow one could say you're aware that there's more to it than what you thought there was when you just gave it a name. That's why I've quoted it before somewhere in a book or not in a book. Krishnamurti said, when you teach a child the name of a bird, the child will never see that bird again.

Well, what he means, of course, was the moment you replace the pure perception with a mental concept, you have a huge veil between you and it. And immediately you dismiss what you see and you dismiss it by having a label for it. You can't really, you're not really looking and perceiving the bird anymore when you say, oh, that's a such and such.

That's a so-and-so. That's a, oh yeah. And this compulsive naming of everything becomes a huge veil between you and the world around you.

It's a veil of your conditioned mind. And that's an aspect of the egoic mind. And that's a terrible way to live, to continuously have this veil and especially destructive in human relationships.

Because in human relationships, you need to see the other human being. You need to see beyond the surface of the other, but you can't do it. It's immediately you have a label that you attach to that mental label and you call this person something.

I mean, you all know, every, nobody knows what prejudice is. Prejudice is to have a, there's just one aspect of having labels, a label for not being able to see the human being because you have attached a label to the human being. And then you relate to this negative label.

And so, and then your labels for everything, running commentary throughout the day in your mind about situations and people, like somebody is commenting in your head and you believe in everything it says. That's how it is. So to be able to perceive, you see an aliveness or in the presence, even in a table, it's, you acknowledge its being as its presence.

You acknowledge how the light is reflected. It's actually, things come to life when you don't compulsively label things. You begin to live again in a universe that's alive, but there's now, there's an added level now.

It's not only that. It's not only that you perceive things more clearly, more vividly. It's also that in that moment of not naming, you're also aware of the background to your sense perception.

And that background is the space, one could say, in which the sense perception arises, or another word one could use, a canvas. Let's imagine that you are a painting and what you see painted in the painting is your life situation or your life. There's a certain configuration of people and things and things appearing in this painting.

So you become aware of those things. But if this painting became self-aware, this painting would also become aware of the essence, which is the canvas on which it's painted. And if you become aware of the essence that is behind all your perceptions, that's yourself, that's yourself as presence.

So you can look around this room, see everything, and at the same time, not only be aware of what you are seeing, but also be aware, now this sounds a little weird, but also be aware of your own awareness, to sense your own presence. It's not your own, I just call it your own, to sense the presence that you are, without which there would be no perception. So you can sense your presence in the background of your perceptions, which means you're still, your mind is still.

If you haven't read my little book, Stillness Speaks, read it. It's good for meditative reading, for taking you into that space of still presence. Still, alert, presence.

And you can sense the presence in the background as if it were the canvas on which your sense perceptions are painted. And that is a wonderful way of being in the world. It changes the interaction with every human being, whether it's a very brief relationship or a close relationship, to perceive the other.

And when you look at another human being, you feel your own presence. And then you can look. Yes, you're aware of the personality of the other person, but you can sense that beyond the personality, there is a presence, there is a beingness.

But you can only sense that because it reflects yours. In fact, it's one with yours. And so to realize the other, in essence, is the same consciousness as you, and it's not your consciousness, and it's not the other person's consciousness.

It's universal consciousness expressing itself as a temporary human being. And then that is the true meaning of loving your, as it goes in the Gospels, love your neighbor as yourself. Your neighbor is the person next to you, as it's in some languages is translated as the one next to you.

Loving your neighbor as yourself, it doesn't mean, as yourself doesn't mean you love this person as much as you love yourself. It means to recognize yourself in the other, and that recognition that in essence, all you share, this consciousness, this is the one consciousness that all humans are temporary expressions of, and other life forms are also temporary expressions of. The one underlying consciousness that uses the brain, science haven't discovered this yet.

There's still a belief in mainstream science that consciousness is a by-product of the brain, of the physical brain, but most scientists don't even talk about consciousness because they don't know what to do with it. So consciousness is, I would say, suggest is a focalization of consciousness, and it receives consciousness and focalizes consciousness in a particular way through human beings that creates a particular world in this dimension, but it receives consciousness in the same way that a radio or a television receives the signals and forms an image. Consciousness then is the essence of all life, and to know yourself as consciousness is also knowing the other as consciousness, and that transforms human relationships.

Then you can still, you acknowledge the personality of the other, but you don't confuse the personality of the other with who they are, and then you can operate still as a personality, but there is a recognition, a silent recognition of the other, and that silent recognition of the other, that's actually the true spiritual, esoteric, true meaning of love, the true meaning of love, or we could say all empathy is there, an outflow of benevolence, an outflow of loving kindness. You may remember the Dalai Lama said, he didn't say, my religion is Buddhism.

He said, my religion is kindness. That's a wonderful statement because there's much more to kindness. It's not a superficial thing.

Kindness is an outflow of benevolence towards other life forms, towards other human beings. It's the ability to have empathy, and that all comes from, does not come from the personality. The personality might say, oh, I'm a good, I'm a good Christian, or I'm a good Buddhist, or I should be, I should be accepting, and I should be loving this person.

It's hard, but I'll try. So that is the, what transforms human relations, and if it transforms a relationship between two human beings, it will also transform relations between groups of humans. You don't need to deny your form identity, whether it's the physical body, whether it's the psychological form of you, or whether it's even a certain group identity.

You can still feel, yes, I belong to this particular group. You don't even have to give up your political persuasion. You don't have to, but you have to be able to look if you belong to one particular party in your mind.

Yes, you can have a position, a mental position. Of course, everybody has. I have certain political opinions.

I'm not going to talk about them, because they're more important things to talk about, but not to be identified with mental positions. Then you can voice your mental position, and this is how I see it, but you don't make the other into your dreadful enemy, because you can see, although the other may have different mental positions, there's still the beingness there, because if you make the other into an enemy, you might actually create the monster that you see. So the freedom is the freedom from compulsive thinking, the freedom from identifying totally with the thinking mind.

Meditation can be a helpful tool for many people. Meditation is a great thing if you don't regard it as you need to achieve something through the meditation, because then it becomes a doing again. The way why meditation ultimately does not, many people practice it, but they don't really experience a transformation in their normal daily life is that it's a doing.

They're doing a meditation, and they're trying to achieve a particular stage through the meditation, so that's already you're projecting a future self, whereas meditation ultimately is the realization of being. So it cannot be a doing. It's a realization of being.

And meditation can be at any moment when you become alert and you stop naming. In that moment, you have risen above thought. And it's, oh, it's so beautiful to be free of yourself.

And then, of course, you can still operate as a self without completely being trapped in it. You're not trapped in it anymore. There's a space in you, and there's a growing space in you, and there's more space in you.

And then the personality becomes a little bit transparent to the light of consciousness. So even while you are speaking and thinking, your thinking and your speaking is more spacious. There's an awareness that flows into your words, too.

And then the words become different. They're no longer just a repetition of stuff that you accumulated. You can be inspired speaking because the presence begins to use your mind.

And there can be inspired action because the unconditioned presence uses your mind to do things. And that's, it's beautiful. So the key is to embrace that beautiful state of alert attention, which is aware presence as much as possible.

Perform little actions, just being present, not as a means to an end. When you walk in your room from your desk to the door, you take the steps, and you're conscious at every step. Why do you think you need to get to the door?

You'll get there soon enough. In the meantime, this step is more important. Your life isn't going to better when you get to the door.

And this is just one example that you want. There's always, I need to get there. Of course you need to get there, but in the meantime, you're here.

The step you're taking at this moment is the most important step in your life because there is only this moment ever. And if you're completely absorbed by where you need to get to, all that it means is you're completely absorbed by your thinking mind. You will find that pursuing goals that arise not out of the egoic need to be more of something, to be more superior to somebody, but a true goal, something that brings some change into the world, then you will find your actions and your words become actually empowered.

And your thoughts, you will have creative thoughts, new, fresh thoughts that you didn't have before. And these are very different thoughts from the old repetitive thoughts that go through your head all the time. Oh, so you have an insight.

This is where intuition arises or any truly creative action arises. It comes, you have to go beyond the mind in order so that something that is deeper than the mind can use the mind. But primarily we do it because we become free of, as the Buddha put it, you become free of suffering, the psychological suffering that makes millions of people's lives dreadful.

Psychological suffering, the freedom from suffering is when you know who you are in your essence. Then challenges remain, but they're not transformed into unhappiness because it's the unhappy me that creates suffering. And then every challenge you can actually say, oh, here comes another, okay.

And you see, look at it. And you'll see that every challenge actually then intensifies your presence. Oh, and then even death, approaching death and all approaching death then does, and it'll come to you and to me, to all of us.

It's approaching already. Of course it is. Now, of course, death may come to you suddenly.

So you might not have time, but it may come gradually. And then you go totally, totally present. Totally, just there's no historical person anymore.

It's already dissolved before the body dissolves. The historical person is already burned up in the fire of presence. Death can do that to you, approaching death.

The historical person, the personality, the person, the conditioned person, burned up in the fire of presence. And there you are. Realize the timeless, the timeless being that you are.

And that's a realization. It's not a person realizing that. It's a universe realizing it through you.

So that is the whole purpose of human existence. You're the bringer of consciousness into this world. And that's why you're here.

Whatever you have done or failed to do as the historical person is fairly unimportant as regards the arising of the new consciousness. Whether you have failed in most things or have succeeded in many things, or it might be a mixed bag, doesn't matter anymore. It has brought you to this point, the point of awakening.

So it all made sense. And therefore, retrospectively, every mistake that you ever made was actually a good thing because it's brought you to this point of the awakening of consciousness. And every suffering that you created for yourself and even for others in your unconsciousness, it's human unconsciousness that creates the suffering.

Every suffering created and yet you create it for yourself. All the mistakes, oh, I made so many mistakes, just one after another. Why did I do that and that?

And then why did I marry that person? I shouldn't have done that. That was a huge mistake, but what can I do now?

Okay, all that evaporates. And suddenly all the mistakes have brought you to here, which means they're not mistakes at all. Thank you for all my mistakes.

Well, I thank the universe for all the mistakes I made and for the suffering. So the suffering, of course, is necessary. This is my paradoxical statement.

The suffering is necessary until you realize that it is unnecessary. Until you realize that it is unnecessary, the suffering's actually a helpful thing because eventually it forces you into awakening. Hopefully in this lifetime, it forces you into awakening.

And therefore the suffering is a twofold thing. It's both a wonderful thing and something that you transcend. And of course that's expressed, and you can understand, you don't need to be a Christian to understand this.

It's expressed in the symbol of the cross because the symbol of the cross, the cross is a torture instrument, obviously, and the cross is a symbol for the divine, twofold. So the cross symbolizes suffering, and the cross symbolizes the end of suffering and the transcendent dimension, which is exactly what the Buddha talked about. Because the Buddha said, I teach suffering and the end of suffering.

So with that, I will leave you.

Eckhart Tolle Beyond the Conceptual Self [40ea043c-7ed7-4895-a9a9-785f0e96d24e]

Beyond the conceptual self. In this episode, Eckhart talks with a live audience about letting go of our false sense of self. He says, when we base our identity on externals, our looks, what we do, where we live, that's the ego.

In that state, we're either inferior or superior, never equal. True relationships become impossible. But when we're grounded in essential being, the need to compare disappears and we discover we are infinitely precious.

[Speaker 1] (0:36 - 5:35)

An essential part of awakening spiritually is going beyond a conceptualized sense of self and living in a conceptual reality. And of course, all that implies being identified with thinking because concepts are thoughts. So for many people, the question arises, how do I see myself?

And there's a very common problem people have and that's called self-esteem. What value do I have? What value does my life have compared to others?

Some years ago, the Dalai Lama was asked by somebody about self-esteem and he didn't understand the word self-esteem. And the interpreter spent several minutes trying to explain to him the meaning of self-esteem and she just couldn't get it. Now, of course, you might say, well, if I were the Dalai Lama, I wouldn't have a problem with self-esteem either, but that's not it.

Self-esteem and the way in which it's conventionally used is comparative and it's always connected to ego. How do I rate myself relative to others? Either an achievement, worldly achievement, abilities, knowledge, physical appearance, physical strength, good looks, bad looks, fat, thin, and usually it's related to what you have, possessions, what you can do, abilities, what you know, knowledge, and physical appearance.

And that's an interesting thing when you look at your life from that point of view, there's always a sense of unease because there are always others who are better at at least some of these than you are. And then there are others who are worse. For many people, it's a continuous source of unease and even suffering, that feeling that I'm not enough, not as good as, and then there are others who have considered themselves better than others or most.

And underneath, hiding underneath that sense of superiority, there's always the fear of inferiority. And those who are predominantly feel inferior, hiding underneath the feeling of, or the sense of inferiority is the hidden desire to be superior. So when you live in that egoic state of consciousness, you always compare yourself to others you meet.

And usually you either feel you're superior or inferior. Now, there cannot be a true relationship when you relate to other humans and you either feel superior or inferior to them. Is there such a thing as healthy self-esteem?

Sometimes that expression is used. Or is that kind of self-esteem always unhealthy? I would suggest that the only healthy self-esteem is a self-esteem that is derived from a deeper place than any of those things that usually make up a person's self-esteem.

How you look, what you can do, your knowledge or your abilities, or even weird things like who you know. The strangest things make up a person's self-esteem. And sometimes it's based in some kind of reality, of course.

And in many other cases, it's a total fiction. But the ego needs that. So if you are, let's say, you're not good at anything in particular, there's nothing much that you can do, you're not wealthy, don't have much, don't have a lot of knowledge, haven't read many books, don't look great, and your body is not that great, neither your facial appearance nor your body are that great, what do you do then?

I hope there's nobody in this room who thinks, oh, that's me. Oh, that's me.

[Speaker 3] (5:37 - 5:38)

Oh, that's me.

[Speaker 1] (5:38 - 44:48)

First of all, usually the ego would create a certain narrative to compensate for that feeling of inferiority in an attempt to create some sense, at least in one area of superiority. And one such narrative could be that the world is totally corrupt and I'm not going to take any part in it. Every human is basically evil, implying that I'm the only one who is not.

You could also have an image of yourself as far more spiritual than anybody else because you're free of possessions, your mind is empty because you don't know anything, and you're physically weak because you're spiritually so strong. And then you have a narrative and that gives you some sense of self-esteem. And then you have even more fictitious narratives that are bordering on delusional, which could be, for example, that you are a reincarnation of King Arthur, the Buddha, Elvis Presley.

But no matter what it is, the element of comparison, the comparative element is always there. In that use, in that sense, there's no healthy self-esteem. The only healthy self-esteem is not derived from how you look or how physically strong you are or your abilities in whatever area or your possessions or the knowledge that you have acquired or any other things, your family background.

In some countries, that's a very important thing. Who is your family? Your grandfather, your great-grandfather.

They have that sense that determines their self-esteem. In the West, especially in the New World, North America, maybe South America too, Central America, that sense of family history is not as strong. But if you go to Europe, there are still quite a few people who have very high self-esteem and it's derived from the existence of their ancestors.

They've never done anything, but their ancestors did. And so that can give you a lovely fiction in your mind. And that fiction gives you your sense of worth, your self-esteem.

And if you have a title, then that's confirmed by everybody else who calls you by that title. You're a lord or lady. Not everybody who has a title actually derives their sense of self-esteem from that.

Some are actually not that concerned about it anymore. I've met some and others very strongly identified with it. So where's the true, really the healthy self-esteem?

Where does that originate? Not from any of these things. You have to go a little deeper into yourself and true self-esteem is not comparative.

It's not, I am better than or less than. Quite simply, that sense of value, of worthiness is derived from that deeper place of quite simply your presence, the presence of you, the presence of consciousness. If you can sense that presence of you, you don't need to compare yourself anymore to anybody else.

You know that that is who you are in your essence and no narrative is required anymore in your mind to justify your existence or to explain who you are in relation to others. And you can then meet, and that's that place of just beingness. And that's infinitely precious.

The presence of you is infinitely precious. Doesn't matter what you have achieved. Doesn't matter whether your life up to this point has been a complete failure or a phenomenal success.

And if you can sense that preciousness, then you can meet big egos in this world and you don't need to compare yourself and you feel absolutely even at one with them. And there's a strength and a power in that presence compared to which any egoic power is like a phantom. You may remember the story I wrote in a New Earth.

It's a Zen story, a true one, that the abbot of a monastery was getting ready to receive the governor of the province in an official visit to the monastery. And when the governor of the province arrived, the abbot greeted him. The visit lasted an hour.

The governor of the province and his retinue went away. And in the evening, the abbot announced to everybody in the monastery that he was resigning as an abbot. And the reason he gave was just as he was about to meet the governor of the province, he realized that the palms of his hands were moist.

And that was the reason why he resigned. And it wasn't because the temperature was high, because that is a sign of nervousness, wet palms. So he noticed, being very self-observant, he noticed, oh, what does that mean?

That means a lot. That means that I am not deeply enough rooted in my own essence to be able to relate to that person, to relate to his essence. I am mistaking who he is on the level of form for who he is in essence.

And the level of form, he would be superior to me. So he discovered remnants of ego in himself. So he went off, and the story is a few years later, he came back after he had studied with another, or not studied, but lived with another master.

Then he came back and his palms were not sweaty anymore. When your identity, your sense of self is rooted in your presence, in the presence of consciousness, we could call that the egoless state. It's egoless while you are in that connected, state of connectivity.

And that's far more powerful than any ego. I remember the movies about Kung Fu Master. It was many years ago, a series.

And he was always very meek, and he was moving around the United States, visiting places where people are larger than life, like Texas. And so he's meeting all these big egos. Roar, roar, roar, and they think, who is that little guy there?

And in the decisive moments, the Kung Fu Master responds to the situation, and suddenly enormous power goes through him. Roar. And then he's totally still again.

So there's nobody who says, look, see how strong I am, much stronger than you. No, there's nobody who claims anything, and he takes credit. I had an encounter not long after I experienced the awakening.

I was in a waiting room somewhere, and this huge guy came in. Compared to him, I'm just this puny little guy sitting there, and he planted himself in front of me, and obviously enjoying his power. I can't remember what he wanted.

He wanted something. And I could sense that sense of presence intensifying. And I just looked, and he said a few things, and suddenly he became extremely disconcerted because there was no attempt on my part to put up any kind of defense or compete in any way.

And he got deflated like a balloon and didn't know what to say or do anymore. That's an interesting phenomenon. So the important thing for you is in any situation, be in touch with that inherent power of presence, because ultimately that is the power of now.

Ultimately, the now is the presence, and the presence is you. And ultimately, you are, in its deepest sense, you are the now, because the now is the presence. And this is why I speak of the power of now.

The power of now is also the power of you, and not the personal you, but the you that remains and never was not connected and always is connected and always is an intrinsic part of universal power itself, universal consciousness itself, the one consciousness that underlies all phenomena, the one consciousness of which all phenomena are only a temporary expression. So there's enormous power there. How that manifests in this world is a secondary thing.

Perhaps it only manifests as an emanation that comes through you, or it flows into something that you do or create. And it's a great thing to feel that power, which is not comparative, because you know that everybody else is also a temporary expression of that inherent power, although most people don't know it. It's the famous guy that I spoke of in the perhaps the power of now, the beggar is sitting on his old box for as many years asking for little coins.

And then somebody says, what's inside that box? I've never looked, and it's filled with gold. And I gave that analogy or parable at the beginning of the power of now.

So that is discovering that power in you. And for most people, they're looking for little substitutes to give them a sense of who they are. And of course, this is the reason why it is not unusual for humans to awaken spiritually, to awaken to who they are in their essence, when either one big thing or many things that they have derived their identity from, good looks, physical strength, possessions, abilities to do this or that, recognition, status in society, those things.

And suddenly they lose these things or they lose one big thing that was the main, that gave them their sense of identity, the one main thing that gave them their sense of identity. And that's gone. And that's of course would be, as first is terrible suffering.

And then it can force a human to that deeper place because out here, unless you quickly, the ego might make an attempt to quickly rebuild some mind-made identity by creating another narrative. That's possible too. Not every human who loses, who experiences great loss necessarily goes to that deeper place, but the potential is there.

So it could be a sports person who is great, who is master of some sports, and then he or she has an accident, can never participate in that activity again. And that gave him or her the sense of identity that at first leads to terrible suffering. And then potentially there is a deepening there and the essence, then you are forced into your essence.

There's a medieval image of Fortuna. Fortuna is a goddess of good luck or fortune. It goes back to Roman times.

That shows the fickleness of things, the transient nature of all the things of this world, which are the things that people identify with and gives them that sense of identity, that's their self-esteem. And it has a Latin inscription on it. It's an image of the goddess and translated from Latin.

It says, this is supposed to be a king speaking or former king, which king stands for any ego. And it says, as these words in Latin, the first word is, I shall reign. The next word says, I reign, to reign a kingdom.

I shall reign. I reign. I have reigned.

I have lost the kingdom. The normal sequence of events. Old age is a great opportunity for that.

Unfortunately missed in many, many cases. Tragically missed. The opportunity as old age comes, approaches, and then you enter old age, proximity of death, loss of physical abilities, of social status, retired.

Who am I when I no longer have that title in my work? All these things are great opportunities for going deeper. And what we are attempting to do now is getting as many books and other material out to old people's homes everywhere, and also hospices and hospitals and so on, because those are great places where spiritual transformation could happen.

So the important thing then is sense your presence, the presence of you, which is not the person, something deeper, that is consciousness, being aware of itself. And then you no longer need a narrative to tell you who you are, free of that conceptual sense of self. And this telling yourself a story in your mind about your life, that also goes out of the window.

My life. This is what it has come to. All those illusions that I had, all those wonderful ideas I had when I was 20.

Now you may well still be at the peak of your success, worldly success, and that's fine. Why not enjoy it? It's not who you are, so you better go into the presence because it doesn't last.

With it also comes a wonderful ability to appreciate other human beings, what they can do, what they know, how they look without feeling diminished by appreciating the external thing connected to another human being. The ego can't do that because if the ego appreciates something, it might pretend because it wants something from you. But if the ego appreciates something, it feels diminished.

If you meet somebody who obviously looks so much better than you, the ego feels diminished by that. So sometimes it tries to say something critical about that person in order to restore the injured sense of self. It's absurd, but that's how it works.

But when you come from presence, you can look at a beautiful form of a human being and appreciate that and feel it's so beautiful. Or the achievements of another human being, to appreciate their achievements. Great, what wonderful things that this person can do.

It's so wonderful. I would never be able to do that. And yet the fact that you would never be able to do that because perhaps you're not strong enough or you're not inclined in that particular direction does not diminish anything of you.

So the appreciation of others then comes in and it's a lovely thing. I even appreciate when I occasionally see people getting into their Ferrari and of course, usually their ego is walking with them because, and so the car, and well, usually it's a red color just to make sure that everybody notices. I love that thing too.

It's a beautiful thing that somebody built. And okay, and this ego is enjoying himself. That's okay.

And you may find that sometimes very creative people, there are some who have no ego about their creations. They do not derive their identity from what they create. Others have fairly big egos.

That happens too. I believe the greatest creators in this world don't have an ego about that. Maybe they have it somewhere else, but not around that.

And that sometimes means that they continue to be creative. So sometimes you see this modesty, which is lack of ego in people who have created something really great, composers, poets, even some scientists like Einstein never developed an ego around what he came up with, the incredible realization about space and time. But he never developed this ego, his idea, I created that.

There was a relatively little conceptual self, just, and he found it absurd that he had become one of the most famous people on the planet even in his lifetime. He just couldn't, it's so weird. And he talked about the gap between what people think of me and who I am is just incredible.

And by the way, that's also the place where you can manifest out of the power of presence. If that presence, if you're linked into that presence, see what the universe wants to, because that presence is the presence of consciousness. It doesn't want to create something through you, perhaps it does.

But in that presence, everything is already present in an undifferentiated state. So whatever it is that you create externally is like the diluted form of something that in its essence, its concentrated non-form is already there in you. So whatever you can possibly create is already present on some level, on a deeper level.

There have been composers who created the most incredible pieces of music, and many of them said they listened as if it came out of that place of depths already fully created, and they just wrote it down. Okay, let's have this question on the list. Subject, happy thoughts.

A thought comes that can at times trigger negative emotion. I look at it and let it pass. I don't react to it, I stay spacious.

However, when nice thoughts come like life is beautiful, everything is working out perfectly for me, I want to feel them fully, or should I ignore those as well? What do you think? Well, the first thing anybody would probably say, it's more pleasant to have nice thoughts than negative thoughts.

It feels better, certainly. The body likes it more too, because negative thoughts influence the body in some way, obstructing the energy flow. You can test it out for yourself when you feel stressed or got into repetitive negative thoughts, then your body doesn't like it, it reacts.

Even mainstream medicine is discovering there is a link between, well, some still say no, but there is a link between your predominant state of mind or consciousness and the physical functioning. Now, you may also find that negative thoughts proliferate and multiply much more readily than positive thoughts. A negative thought wants to proliferate, and it wants to produce more negative thoughts.

And then you may find a positive thought is quite happy to stand alone. There isn't the pull towards proliferation of more of itself. A positive thought is much less likely to become obsessive, some that you can't get rid of, than a negative thought.

So when you are trapped in the mind, it's very rare, if ever happens, that you are trapped in obsessive good thoughts. You are usually trapped in obsessive negative thoughts, because that is what negative thoughts love to do. They love to take you over.

They want to, for some reason, they're like certain insects that suddenly reproduce and become from one, you get, they give birth to 50, and the 50 give birth to another 50, and suddenly you have millions and billions of them. And, so the difference, a fundamental difference, then, is a negative thought is actually, first of all, makes you feel better. It's easier to experience that which follows the thought, because often after a negative thought, you just experience the reality of what the thought just pointed to.

Life is beautiful, the person here mentions as an example of a positive thought. Life is beautiful. What's wrong with that thought?

Because after that thought, you're actually going to have a certain experience of life being beautiful. So the thought was no more than a pointer, a signpost, and that's perfectly fine. You use thought as a pointer.

It does not absorb all your attention as a thought. It's quite happy to be just a pointer. Life is beautiful, and then perhaps for the next few minutes, you appreciate everything that is around you, and it becomes a true experience.

So as a pointer, it can work beautifully. And the negative one is just one, and after another, after another, it becomes obsessive. But even if you change all your thinking from negative to positive, the most vital thing is to realize that which is beyond all thought.

Positive thought in itself is not yet liberating. It doesn't liberate you. Can be nice, but it doesn't liberate you.

Only to find the place that is beyond all thought liberates you. Now, does that free you from negative thoughts? Yes, after a while.

The negative thoughts need your identification, which means your unconsciousness, in order to proliferate continuously in your life. It's only if you're identified with them, you give them your total attention. In fact, it's not only that.

You become them. They come out of your mouth when you speak. They're in your thoughts.

They take you over. They possess you. You become them.

And that's how they continue to grow and grow and take over your life. And it can happen. Some thoughts or thought patterns have the same function in the human mind, in many cases, as a virus has in the body.

A virus can proliferate and takes over the body. And so there are many mental viruses that people get taken over by and can't get rid of. Sometimes you have that virus your whole lifetime.

Persistent, deep-seated negative thoughts that occupy either your entire mind or a particular section of your mind. And sometimes the virus that can take over collectively, an entire collective entity of human beings, be it a nation or a tribe or a religion or a section within a religion. It can be a political movement that suddenly has all the answers and knows where the enemies are.

It happened when national socialism in Germany was an infection of a collective mental virus. Soviet communism, which started, of course, with good intentions, but of course, had been absolutely no change in consciousness. So good intentions are not enough unless there's a shift in consciousness.

Good intentions will lead you to more suffering if there's no shift in consciousness. So Soviet communism became an awful thing. And it took over as, again, a collective mental virus.

China under Mao Zedong, a collective mental virus. Millions and millions died in China, in the Soviet Commission, obviously, Nazi Germany. Millions and millions.

Under Mao Zedong, children would denounce their parents. If a child was unhappy with their parents, they would go to somebody at school and say, my parents are saying this and that. The next day, they would be taken away to a labor camp and never be seen again.

Total insanity. Flowers were declared illegal. They had to tear out all the flowers.

Bourgeois infection, we don't want flowers. Just countless things being taken over by an entire nation, being taken over by a mental, obsessed with certain mind forms. And then it passes.

Can last a couple of decades. In Soviet communism, lasted fairly long. National socialism, the 1,000-year Reich, lasted, I don't know, 15 years or something.

So it runs its course. And then, like a virus infection, after a while, the virus disappears and a semblance of sanity returns. Certainly sanity compared to what was there before.

There's still the normal insanity that's part of the normal state of consciousness, but not the extreme unconsciousness that can take over when thought form becomes a virus. And of course, it happens to individuals. They have then, they interpret the world through their mental virus.

You might have certain ideas. If you go on the internet too much, and you might see things that suddenly, the virus infection can happen by looking up certain things on the internet, and you suddenly believe totally in what this, it could be a total fantasy, but it looks so convincing that it becomes a thought form in your mind. And then from there, it grows.

And after that, you only have contact with those people who are also infected by that thought form. And you think that becomes then your reality. That is the case with many conspiracy theories.

Now, I'm not saying that one out of 10, 20, or 50 conspiracy theories may not be correct. It could, it'll be. But many of them are fictitious constructs.

But of course, the world is pretty insane. So it's probably more insane than you realize. And that includes particularly politicians, and political power play, and so on.

So I'm not denying there is no conspiracy. There are quite mad things happening that we don't know about. And yet, I wouldn't go that way.

Even if it's true, don't get drawn into that. Your job is to be present. Your job is to embody a different state of consciousness.

You cannot fight unconsciousness on its own level. You have to rise above unconsciousness. So good thoughts, yes, good thoughts are preferable to bad thoughts, but then go beyond thought also.

Then negative thoughts will lessen in your life, even if you've been around for a long time, as more presence arises. Good thoughts can arise naturally. And a lot of your consciousness is no longer dependent on what thoughts you have.

There's just more presence. And you appreciate life through presence, rather than trying to convince yourself that you should appreciate life. You appreciate life directly.

Gratefulness is another important thing. Gratitude is, of course, wonderful, very transformative. Gratitude implies a deep appreciation of what you are perceiving around you.

Whether or not you have the thought in your mind that accompanies that, that says, thank you, it's secondary. And after a while, you don't need thank you anymore. But when you first practice gratitude, thankful can be helpful.

When you say something beautiful, thank you for things that otherwise you wouldn't even acknowledge. Thank you for how the light reflects off this table. Thank you for this amazing substance that we call water, got these little, tiny bubbles in it.

And here it is. I can look at it, drink it. It's alive.

It's an amazing thing. And you can appreciate it. It's filled with light, life-giving substance.

Why not appreciate it? And whether or not you say thank you, it's up to you. Thank you is not the main thing.

It's the act of giving it attention that, again, is perceiving it through presence. And then everything is something to be valued that's around you. That's wonderful spiritual practice.

And of course, for a while, it's a spiritual practice. Then it becomes second nature. That's how you live.

So there is some association with certain thoughts, yes, expressing gratitude, but it's not the main thing. The thoughts are more like pointers towards that which is beyond thought. But in many people's lives, the beginning of spiritual practice and realization is that they suddenly realize how much they've been trapped in negative thinking over past years.

And they suddenly wake up to their own thought processes, whereas before they were trapped in their own thought processes. That's the beginning of spiritual awakening. If you realize what kind of thought processes have been predominant in your life over the past few years on every day, through which you interpret other people, the world, yourself, your life, and so on.

And that's an amazing jump because it implies suddenly awareness or presence has emerged and suddenly you become aware of your thinking. That was my first breakthrough, spiritual breakthrough. It was not a real full awakening.

It was a partial awakening that then kind of disappeared again, went underground for another 10 years or more. It happened to me when I was 16 or 17, and my mind was deeply negative in many ways because I'd been unhappy as a child, parents in constant conflict, violent arguments, and even physical violence, and a great sense of insecurity because violence could explode at any moment at home. And we had very little money, so everybody else had more than we did.

They had cars, we didn't have a car. They had a television. We didn't even have a television.

I didn't realize then how lucky I was. And then I went to live with my dad in Spain, and he had moved from Germany to Spain with his savings. And just as I arrived there, he was running out of money.

And we were poor, almost third world, not enough money even to buy a fridge in Spain in the hot weather, but we could afford a block of ice. They would deliver at weekends, so you could order, somebody would come, and there was a huge, we had a fridge, but it didn't have any engine in it, just a cabinet, but you could put a block of ice in there and it would last for a day or two. So once a week, we had enough money to order a block of ice.

So on a Saturday, it would be put in there, and then we could put some food in there. But still, by Sunday lunchtime, it would have gone off in the summer heat. So I was still very negative.

My mind was, bad things always happen to me, was one of the repetitive thoughts. And whenever something bad happens, I'd, of course, bound to happen to me, always does. Nothing good ever happens to me.

And then the first shift came, I was 16 or 17. A lady who was living in Spain, a German lady, had to go back to Germany, and she said, can I leave a few books? I have too much, can't take all my books back with me.

Can I leave these books with you? She left a few books with us. And of those books, maybe 15 books, eight or nine of those books were written by a spiritual author, relatively unknown at that time and even now.

But I picked up a book, and for the first time, I read that there is a link between what happens in your outer world and your thought processes, and that negative thinking creates further negative experiences, and that you can become free. That was a huge revelation. And my mouth dropped open, and I read more and more.

And then at that time, I had a typewriter. I would even type out, the old-fashioned typewriter, of course. I would type out whole pages of the book and collect them.

And I shifted my thinking from negative to much more positive. And then, only a year later, I was longing to get away from that, from my dad and his second marriage, which wasn't working either. I was longing to get out, and suddenly, everything happened.

I got offered, at that time, was a wonderful job, even though I had no qualifications in London, England. And the most incredible thing, how life shifted, it was through changing my thinking through this author. But then, in England, I was fine for two, three years.

Then the negative thoughts became less and less, and I became unhappy again. So, it kind of disappeared. And then, I had many years of depression and anxiety.

And finally, at 29, something different happened. It wasn't just positive thinking. It was the end of being identified with thinking.

But the first little change happened there. And for many on the spiritual path, that is also the case. And this applies to many people, when they first realize what kind of thoughts they have been thinking or habitually think, and then shift comes.

That's the period when you put little stickers and labels in your place to remind you of positive things, such as, I love myself. Eventually, you transcend loving yourself. But it can be a wonderful intermediate step between transcending yourself and hating yourself.

So, you go from, I hate myself, to I love myself, to I am myself.

Eckhart Tolle Beyond the Surface Layer of Reality [5d4a4b28-db82-49ed-82d4-50aceb822e07]

Beyond the surface layer of reality. In this episode, Eckhart talks about our true purpose, which he believes is to transcend our surface layer of reality and our superficial sense of self. He says most of us define ourselves as a person with a past, an accumulation of thoughts and emotions built up over a lifetime.

Many identify completely with this limited view, but Eckhart explains we are more than that. He says often a life crisis becomes the catalyst for discovery. We may lose our homes, jobs or someone we love, but Eckhart says loss pushes us toward awakening.

He believes in this process, the ego burns up and the old ways of being give to our essential self.

[Speaker 1] (0:52 - 11:12)

Thank you. Welcome everybody. Here we are in the present moment, not trying to get anywhere, not even doing anything, but becoming aware of being, being aware of being.

Presence is being, becoming self-aware, so to speak. So there's already a contradiction. Becoming implies time, but being is timeless.

Contradiction is always there because in this dimension, time operates. Being is prior to time and space. So one could say that from our point of view here, sometimes I describe it as we're on the surface of being, it's a metaphor.

We exist here on the surface of being. Most people are unaware of what is beyond the surface of their life. The entire life consists of surface, which is past and future and doing.

What's the next thing to do here? And whatever is perceived by the senses, also sensory perception is surface, the surface of reality, you could say. It's not reality, it's the outer layer of reality.

It's a way of looking at it. But who you are is not confined to the outer layer of reality. For many people it is because they don't know anything else.

So they have a very limited sense of self, which in some spiritual traditions is described as illusory, not actually real. Well, it seems very real here on the surface. Our task, our mission, our purpose in life, the human purpose here is to go beyond the surface layer of reality and go beyond who we are on the surface, the person with a little bit of past and a little bit of future.

The person that consists of accumulated thoughts and emotions, complete identification with this. So one could say that on the surface of reality here, consciousness is dreaming that this dream of self is reality. But the purpose of the universe is for this universe, this dimension to awaken to something deeper.

This is one way of putting it. It's very hard to talk about these things. Because the words derived from the surface of so-called reality, every word reflects things on the surface.

So when you point to something that is beyond surface, it becomes difficult using words. Words become very, very limited. But we have to use words.

And so we use words from the surface reality to point to something that's beyond. So the word itself is never it. The word is a slight approximation, one could say.

Sometimes it's almost like a metaphor, a poetic metaphor or whatever. Now, the cleverest way of using words from our dimension is probably the Buddha. And he talked about the essence of all things, described it as traditionally translated Sanskrit term, shunyata, emptiness.

Emptiness is a term from, of course, it describes something, you can have a cup, and there's nothing in it, it's empty. So emptiness seems to be something in this word, so it points to something in this dimension. But it points to something that isn't actually there.

The cup is empty, there's a nothingness in that cup. So to describe the deeper realities, he uses the word emptiness. That's the one word I prefer to say spaciousness, but I would translate it as spaciousness, emptiness.

It's the one word from this dimension that actually isn't something. You can't say, oh, there's the emptiness. That's the one, and so it's clever, very wisely use that word.

Jesus, as you know, used a similar term. He said, it's the kingdom of heaven is like the sky. Kingdom of heaven is the dimension of depth.

And it's the kingdom of the sky, the kingdom of heaven. And again, what is the sky? It doesn't even exist because it's not something, it's spaciousness.

So he uses a term from the sense-perceived world, surface world, that which is the most appropriate term that points to something that doesn't actually exist. Because the sky doesn't exist as such. Space, does space exist?

Not really. It makes all existence possible. But if it exists, then you can say, oh, here it is.

It's not manifested, but it enables everything else to manifest. But it's all very simple, unless you start thinking about it, then it becomes complex. If you start trying to figure it out intellectually, it becomes difficult.

So when I talk about these things, it's better to just listen, let the words sink in, and then possibly something from within responds. And it's a kind of recognition that all says, oh, yeah, I get it. Or maybe just get it a little bit.

Or your mind might say, I don't get it, because you're trying to understand it. You can't understand it as such. You have to give up the need to understand.

There's a lot to understand on this level, the surface level, their understanding as a place. But you can't really understand being or presence. In order to sense this being, you have to give up your desire to understand.

So you surrender, you relinquish the need to understand. And then when you relinquish the need to understand, figure it out, suddenly there is a space, because when you relinquish this need, you relinquish applying thought. And thought obscures being, because thought is also form.

Thought is all part of the, it's not absolutely on the surface, because just underneath the surface of reality, that's where thought exists. It's already invisible, but it's still part of the manifested reality. So relinquishing thought is perhaps the most important thing to learn that.

And I'm not talking about falling below thought and becoming sleepy and unconscious, or kind of drifting, like if you're taking a drug or something like that, because that can do that sometimes too. Then you kind of become a bit floaty and you have a little smoke. And thinking begins to subside and you feel better for a while, free temporarily from yourself to some extent.

Ah, so liberating. And you smoke a bit more. And then maybe you start laughing.

Don't know why you just laugh, because it's all so funny. And you feel a little bit free, can be quite pleasant. But ultimately this is not the direction in which we are going, because that is the direction of falling below thinking.

Yes, it gives you a sense of temporary freedom from yourself, because that's what humans are actually longing for, this burden of self. And this is why this huge attraction to drugs, to free, give you a little bit of freedom from self, but then only temporary. And then you're back and sometimes it's worse than before.

So that's not it. Yes, cessation of thinking, but what remains is absolute alertness. As sometimes Zen masters described it as, they use the word attention.

[Speaker 4] (11:15 - 11:16)

Attention.

[Speaker 1] (11:16 - 19:07)

The essence of Zen, one Zen master, there are not many Zen masters left these days, I don't know if there are any, but there were some great ones. The essence of Zen described by certain Zen masters as attention. There was actually one Zen master lived early 20th century, when asked to explain Zen, he would simply raise his finger, and sometimes he would say nothing, and other times he would just say attention.

Or he would just look at you. So the disciples asked, what is, can you explain Zen? Because we've been trying to get it for years, still can't get it.

We've been in monks in the monasteries, have been in the monastery for 10 years. Please, I need, we need some more explanations, please, we still don't get it. And you just, that is the state, that is attention, that is pure presence, very alert, no thought, just pure awareness.

And this, I don't know if it was the same master or another one, he was asked to, can you write down something, because I'm going away now for a while, just want to remember, can you write, the disciple said to the master, can you write something down for me so that I remember what to meditate on? And the master got a piece of paper or whatever and wrote, and there it is. And the disciple reads, attention.

He says, is that it? Yeah. Well, can you add a little bit more?

Okay, gives it back, writes, gives it back to the disciple, and the disciple reads, attention, attention. Well, I don't understand, please say a little bit more. And the third time, right, three times, attention, attention, attention.

And the disciple says, I don't even know what that means. What is attention? What does it mean?

And the master says, attention means attention. You cannot get there via intellectualization. Relinquishing thought is, if you're able to realize that, then the being is immediately accessible to you.

And for some people, it happens through spiritual teaching. To other people, it happens through a succession of life experiences, many of them challenging. To other people, it happens through experiencing a lot of suffering and loss in life, so that all the things that they had identified with are taken away.

And what remains is after a while, you can't identify with anything anymore, which is when disaster sometimes strikes. And what's left then, when all the things are taken away, what yourself is left, but who or what are you when you can't identify with it anymore because you have lost, let's say, you lost your home, your spouse has gone away or died, lost your job, your security. So this, for people, can be awakening into what is left when all the things that you thought you were are no longer there.

And either you can commit suicide, as often happens, or you awaken, which is a positive suicide. The person dies, so to speak. And what's left is the essence of who you are.

And then the essence is not in thought. Ah, and if anybody then asks you, who are you? You won't be able to give an answer, but you will know.

Not conceptually, there's a deeper knowing, non-conceptual knowing. And once you know yourself non-conceptually, you can look at another human being and know them non-conceptually too. That is true empathy.

That is true love. You don't manufacture concepts in your mind about who or what this other person is. There's an immediate realization of the essence of the other, and the realization that at that deeper level, the other is not other.

You're meeting yourself. That's love. So you always love yourself, not egoically, but it's always the recognition, even nature.

Then you can look at a tree and can sense the, we've been speaking about that quite a few times. You can sense there's more to it than meets the eye, the beingness of it. And you let go of the concept of tree, letting go of concepts, letting go.

You can take them up again when you need them, because sometimes you need them in this dimension, but not be trapped in concepts. So you let go of concepts, and then you're not looking at a tree because you're not thinking when you're looking at a tree. It's just a pure awareness as you set the perception of it and an awareness behind it.

And then you have something else that's called the all related empathy, love, a certain reverence for all life forms, the reverence for nature, which we need to regain. So nature is not just something that we use. So the most vital thing to learn here is developing the abilities to step out of thought.

Doesn't have to be long. For example, just this little bit here, between here and here, no thought, just pure presence. It's not that hard.

Thinking is here and thinking is here, and then there's a space. First it's very little, just a space of three seconds or something. And then thinking is back and gets a bit in a space.

No self, or as in Indian teachings, it is the transcendent self, the Atman. Let's see if there are any questions left. If not, we'll spend the rest of our session in stillness.

[Speaker 2] (19:10 - 20:23)

Namaste, Eckhart. First of all, I wanted to say thank you for taking my question and thank you so much for all your teachings. It's truly a blessing.

Here is my question. My life fluctuates between presence and unconsciousness. When I practice your teachings, watch your videos, I feel a strong presence and I try to keep that awareness even after the teaching or practice has ended, as you recommend, and that works, but not for very long.

Sometimes it is for days I am into that presence, sometimes it is hours, and sometimes it is immediately I am drawn back into unconsciousness. And as soon as I realize that, I try to bring the presence back and that works too, but again, not for very long. So basically, my question is, is it really essential for us to go through this in circles between presence and unconsciousness, even if I know that it is the presence what I want and not the unconsciousness?

Can you please help?

Thank you. Thank you. Probably many people have similar questions.

That is a very common thing to, as you awaken, and as for most people, the awakening is an awakening process, which means there's a continuous going back and forth from being conscious, being present to being identified completely again with thinking or emotions, falling back into reactivity, being determined by external conditions, reactive, completely reactive to external conditions and people. I would recommend to make it a habit in your life to have brief moments of presence in your everyday life. You can associate them with conscious breaths, one or two conscious breaths.

There are two things you can do here. One is to associate being present with certain brief activities that you engage in every day. In everybody's life, there are certain things that they tend to do every day, the brief activities.

A brief activity could be anything from making coffee or tea to putting on your shoes. Don't choose anything that's too long. Let's choose the short thing.

Putting on shoes is fairly short. Taking a shower may be too long because you'll be there for several minutes, so that you can do that later perhaps. Choose short things that you do every day.

It could be if you have a staircase where you live or where you work and you go up and down several times every day. Choose that. Make every step conscious as you go up the staircase.

Let's say it's five steps, and then a conscious step is a step that you give your complete attention to. You're not attempting to arrive at the end. Every step is self-contained.

So every time you go up those steps, that is your presence practice. Again, short, short. And you can vary after having used certain things for a week or two weeks, then choose some other things that are also short.

What does that mean? That's introducing little tiny spaces into your everyday when otherwise you would be dragged along with one thing after another that you need to deal with. And the sense of inner space or space would be completely lost, and that is being unconscious.

Then you become reactive. Then you get completely absorbed in sometimes worrying or anxiety, whatever it may be. Choose little, very little, short activities.

There are so many things. Let's see, if you have curtains at home, when you wake up, maybe you open the curtains. Choose that you open the curtains consciously and then make it a practice to look out of the window for, what, 15 seconds consciously.

Consciously means let go of thought, just be there as the awareness. Choose those things or make a list. And if you work a lot with a computer, have a plant, maybe a potted plant next to your computer, and make it habit from time to time, give it attention.

Just 20 seconds, whatever, but don't count the seconds, just give it attention completely. Then your day becomes interspersed with little spaces of awareness. That's very helpful.

And, well, another thing you can do is a similar practice. You can vary. Before you do something, you can stop for a moment to be aware.

And again, choose things that you do regularly. Or before a desire arises, for example, a desire to go to the fridge and get a drink. As the desire arises to go to the fridge, stop for a moment and just be present.

Can be present with that desire, but you're there as presence. That's one thing, a desire arising. This is especially good for people who have a problem with addiction, one kind or another, because then an overpowering desire tends to come when you're addicted.

That makes you unconscious. So when, let's say, some people are addicted to food, they're addicted to drink, they're maybe addicted to whatever substance. Of course, obviously, the greatest addiction is thinking.

Everybody's completely addicted to overthinking. Excessive thinking is the greatest addiction. And this is, of course, the very essence of it.

So as a desire comes, just before you give in, give it a little space. And it could be that even after giving it this little space, you may not even have to do it anymore. It could subside in that space, not necessarily, but it could.

But even if it doesn't, it's a wonderful practice. So while you're doing something, short activities, let's say, brushing your teeth is almost, depends for how long you spend brushing your teeth. It's two minutes, maybe too much for many people.

One minute is still okay. If you can do two minutes, fine. So can you brush your teeth and be completely present instead of thinking about something else?

Another one, again, is just before you do something. So either be present in the doing or give a space before you enter into some activity that is habitual. Getting into the car, if you have a car that you drive every day, you get into your car and you close the door.

And usually the next thing you do is you put on your seat belt. So you close the door. But after you close the door, before you put on the seat belt, give it a space of whatever.

Don't count it, but I'm just saying like 30 seconds. You may be aware of your breathing while you sit there. Now, if it's an emergency, if you're so late or you need to so urgently get somewhere, then you can't even spare 30 seconds.

That's true. But in most cases, 30 seconds won't make much difference to wherever you have to get to. So don't let your mind tell you, no, I don't have time now.

Everybody has time for 30 seconds of presence, unless somebody has been injured and you need to get them to the hospital or whatever. But otherwise, everybody has time for 30 seconds of presence. I remember many, many years ago when I lived in England, they were just introducing the habit of putting on seat belts.

It was a long time ago. See how old I am. At that time, people were not always putting on seat belts and then they began to make it compulsory.

They had an advertising campaign associated with some visuals, but the words that went with it were clunk, click, every trip. Clunk is the door closing. Click is the seat belt going in.

Clunk, click, every trip. So they wanted people to absorb that so that as they associate closing of the door, the next thing is click, every trip. And you see how effective it is.

I still remember it. It was decades ago. And here you can say clunk, stillness, and then click, every trip.

And don't believe your mind when it says, I don't have time now. To have your day interspersed with moments of awareness or presence is very, very effective. It is more effective than to have just one meditation period, although meditation is helpful, to have just one meditation period, like half an hour every day, whatever, or even two meditation periods.

And the rest of the day, you're completely drawn into whatever arises. You're completely drawn in. If you can have both, that's even better.

If you can have a morning meditation and an evening meditation, it's not enough, however. And if you had to choose between meditation period and have your day interspersed with moments of presence, that would be more effective. If you had to choose, I would recommend that rather than the meditation period.

And that just many periods of presence, little throughout the day. So you have to make a list of activities, not too many, just a few that you do repeatedly every day, and be present either while you're doing them or just before you take that action. So you can present either while you're making a cup of tea or just before you make a cup of tea or just before you drink the cup of tea.

That's another one, before eating, before eating something, be present. They had that in, some people still do it, but not that many people to say grace, to say a few things of thankful, being thankful for the food, et cetera, was a habit for many people. Not that many people do it anymore.

But if you can do the silent grace before a meal, that was even more powerful than you're just silent, just silently present before you eat any meal. People don't even have to notice it. Let's say you're sitting around a table with other people.

You don't have to tell them, okay, just be quiet now, I have to be silently present before my meal. You don't have to do that. You just do it for yourself.

Probably people will hardly notice it, or maybe they will, and then you can tell them, just 20 seconds, 30 seconds, no more, just there's the food, and you're looking at the food, and you're present. You're not waiting for this short period to come to an end, that's important. So there's not an attitude, okay, just have to be present before I eat.

You have to hold back, it's not, you have to be more present than that. Now, another way, I can countless things, another practice, of course, present while you eat, to eat consciously. And again, don't do it with a whole meal, that's too long.

Maybe it's half your starter, if you have a salad or something as a starter, just the first half of the salad, maybe you can eat it consciously, which means you pick it up with a fork consciously, and chew consciously. You don't have to slow down that much. It might happen naturally that you slow down a bit, but you don't have to change it in any way, just be present as the witness, and then you chew.

This is quite important, because eating is one of the things that tend to make people quite unconscious. It's an activity that kind of brings you back to your animal ancestors. I've often observed people, when they eat, they go completely unconscious, and then when they finish eating, they kind of wake up again.

So many things, you can be creative, find things for yourself, and vary them, change them every week or every two weeks, so you have different things. So that's that. One more thing, you can have just little reminders in various places at home or at a place of work, that is a reminder of presence.

And every time you look at it, you take two or three conscious breaths. And you may have to vary them from time to time, because after a while you get used to them, and then they don't work anymore. Reminder can be a little sticker, whatever it may be.

So instead of, some people, of course, use little affirmations, but this is going beyond that. There's nothing wrong with affirmations. Some people put little stickers on their bathroom mirror and said, I love myself.

That's fine, but it's better than hating yourself. So that's a good step. But this sticker actually doesn't say anything, or it might just say presence.

And what does that mean? It means I am myself. When you become aware of being, then you are yourself, then you don't need to love yourself anymore.

Because if you are yourself, there's only one of you left. But if you're still loving yourself, there's two of you, there's I and myself. Of course, it's better to love yourself than to hate yourself.

It's an intermediate for many people, it's an intermediate step from being very negative, changing to positive. And then the next step is, you no longer have a relationship with yourself. You are yourself.

That is to be rooted in being. And that's a liberation from the self. And again, so you can have little reminders to be present and associate that with two or three conscious breaths throughout the day.

Very powerful. And then presence, let's put it like that. Presence power grows in you more as you engage in this practice.

Presence power grows. It seems insignificant at first, these little periods, but there is a cumulative effect. So that is my recommendation.

Please try it out. I believe you find it beneficial. And does it make sense what I said?

[Speaker 2] (36:06 - 36:09)

Yes, it does. Definitely. Thank you so much, Eckhart.

Eckhart Tolle Bringing Consciousness to This World [1d7106d1-60db-4e0b-bf53-adb9016b8c5a]

Bringing Consciousness to this World. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience about his belief that we are meant to bring consciousness to this world. To do that, he says, we must keep the pathways clear.

We rise above thought, not fall below it, which is what happens when we use substances like alcohol, drugs, and thinking. Once we become free of that, Eckhart says, we realize the essence behind the personality, which is pure presence.

[Speaker 1] (0:35 - 1:00:09)

You are connected to the depth of yourself, to a consciousness that arises from a place that is deeper than the human mind, so that the human mind is really only a receiving instrument of a deeper universal consciousness that pervades the entire space around you. So, the I am-ness, realizing that as the presence that is perceiving this room, in this case, here, or wherever you may be. And you develop the ability of refraining, especially when you don't need it, refraining from always interpreting mentally, imposing thought on everything.

That's the essence, for example, of, some of you may be familiar with Zen. That what I'm just describing, both in words and pointing to experientially, that is the essence of Zen. The essence of Zen is quite simply, relinquish thought, but stay awake.

You're not going to sleep. You can relinquish thought, you can get out of the, being trapped in thought, either by going to sleep tonight, there's a short transitional period when you feel really good because you're too tired to think. And this transitional period feels good, but you're moving below thought.

And so you go, ah, it feels, you're approaching sleep, and it's sweet and lovely, and it pulls you, and it says, come here, oh, it feels good. Why does it feel so good? Because you don't remember your problems anymore.

You don't remember yourself anymore. You don't remember the self anymore, but there's a price to pay. You're falling below thought.

And the same price you have to pay when you start drinking, stiff drinks, as they're called, because that can also take you below thought. At first you feel better, ha, ha, ha, no need to think that much anymore because I can't think really anymore, isn't that wonderful? Oh, I love you, I love you, it's beautiful.

Let's sing a song together. Have another one, okay. And again, another way of falling below thought.

And fine if that's what you choose to do, but it's not the way of spiritual awakening. A good smoke would help too. And of course, it does free you for a while from the burden of your thinking.

And for some people, certain drugs can, people who are so trapped in their minds, so identified with their thinking, it can be helpful for them to once or twice or three times experience, they can be actually be free of that through a drug or something. But ultimately, it's not the way to go. The way to go is to rise above thought, and that is becoming present, developing the ability of refraining from thinking and just being present.

As you are present, you become more intelligent. And this has nothing to do with IQ, or nothing to do with acquired knowledge, you're linking into a deeper source of, the deeper source of all intelligence. That was blocked because of complete, almost complete identification with thinking.

It wasn't totally blocked, because most humans, unless they are virtually on the verge of complete clinical insanity, most humans, even if they don't know it, have limited, very brief access points in their lives to this dimension of consciousness, when thinking subsides, and there's just an aliveness, may only last for three or four seconds spontaneously, it may happen when you look at a beautiful sky. And for a moment, as you look at the sky, the mind is spacious, as spacious as the sky.

And you look at the sky and you go, oh, now, most people don't realize in that moment, when they look at that, they also feel more alive. So they look at the sky and they go, oh, then after maybe three, four, five seconds, the mind starts saying something, either out aloud or in your head, say, oh, what a beautiful sky, or the mind says, if you've visited art galleries, it says, oh, this is a, looks like Turner kind of sky. The 19th century artists are used to paint skies.

So that is again, would be the mind coming in. But in the moment of looking and truly perceiving, there is no thought. There's only presence or awareness in the background of your sense perceptions.

And because in that moment, there's no thought, you feel this is a beautiful moment and you feel more alive and there's a beauty and aliveness to that moment. And you think it's caused by the sky, but it's only indirectly caused by the sky. It's really caused by the cessation of the mind stream in you and the arising of spacious presence for a few seconds.

And then it might happen again, a few hours later, you're walking and the person with a dog on the leash comes and you look at the dog and you look into the eyes of the dog.

And for a moment or three seconds, four seconds, five seconds, you are not thinking. You are actually communicating with a dog in a way that you hadn't perhaps yet been able to do with a human being because you're communicating with a dog beyond mind, beyond thought, because the dog is not imposing thought on you.

The dog is prior to thought. The dog is conscious in its own way, but it has no conceptual thinking. So the dog does not have an opinion about you.

You might have an opinion about the dog, but the dog does not judge you in any way. The dog just looks at you. And this can be a moment for many humans, a brief liberation from the stream of thinking when they look into the eyes of an animal and the animal is not thinking.

And so they look at the eyes of the animal and the animal is more rooted in being than the human, because the human is trapped in their minds. The animal is more rooted in being. And you can look into the eyes of the animal and feel, ah, you don't know what it is.

It feels good. And you think you love looking at this dog or maybe even touching the dog. Oh, and then the words come in.

Oh, what a lovely dog. But before the words came in, there was an experiencing of that that was beyond thought. So an animal can free you or you meet a baby, one year old baby and look into the eyes of the baby.

The baby hasn't learned words yet, but there's a light shining through the eyes and you look into the eyes of the baby. Oh, and in this moment of saying, oh, you're not thinking this. And this might last for a few seconds longer.

And you feel, it feels so good. So what I'm saying is, if you are not totally on the verge of insanity or actual insanity, it means there are moments in your life when these experiences of thoughtless awareness happen spontaneously, but you didn't know that. You always thought it was something else that caused it.

And once you know that, once you know that, you can actually invite it more into your life. And when you consciously know it, they become longer, the periods when you are in spacious presence. And then comes the time when you can actually choose to be in spacious presence.

You don't have to wait for a dog to go past, come past you. You don't have to wait for the, you don't have to wait for the next drink to fall below thought. You don't have to wait to climb.

It can also happen when you're engaged in strenuous physical activity or perhaps dangerous physical activity that stops your mind. And so whether it's motor racing or mountain climbing, or maybe probably surfing too, you have to be really there. And you can't be thinking about your problems when you're surfing or climbing up a wall of a mountain or racing, because then you're going to fall off.

If you think about your problems while you're on your surfboard, what about my life? So it forces you into the present moment. And so some people say they get addicted to dangerous things like that without realizing why.

They think the euphoric state that they experience, they believe is caused by that activity. It's not entirely true. It is, yes, it is indirectly caused by that activity, but the true cause of that intensified aliveness is the fact that the stream of thinking has subsided for a moment and they have not fallen below thought.

They have risen above thought. Into that state of beautiful presence where they are. No thought, but intense awareness.

And that also, why it feels so alive, it is a liberation from the person. With its personal history, it's a liberation from your personality, with all the conditioning from the past, all your viewpoints and opinions and likes and dislikes and complaints and this and that and regrets and grievances and all the things that make up the person. Suddenly you are liberated from that.

Wow. And you are just consciousness. That's what it is.

Unconditioned, just a conscious presence. You are liberated from yourself for a little while, but that is ultimately spiritual awakening is to consciously go there rather than wait for something to take you there briefly or rather than needing to engage in dangerous activities every weekend. And even then you don't only have it for a few hours while you're engaged in that activity or a few minutes.

And that's fine. It's better than nothing, of course. If you're surfing, go surfing.

It's great. But that's not enough. It can give you a taste.

But the important thing is you can invite that into your daily life. That is the shift in consciousness so that, yes, you are still a person, but you are no longer exclusively a person. There is still a personal self there.

Of course, you remember your history, but something else has emerged so that the person that you are is no longer the source for your sense of identity. You don't have to look to the personal, include your personal history and all the stuff associated and all the conditioning of your mind. You know it's there, but there's something else has arisen which we could call presence or awareness.

And increasingly, you realize that the essence of who you are isn't the person. The essence of who you are is the underlying consciousness. That's who I am.

And that was the same when we just looked around the room without labeling it mentally, just perceiving it. And at the same time, sensing the perceiving consciousness as yourself. But it has no particular form.

You can't say anything about it. It's just a presence. So to sense yourself as the presence, that frees you from believing that who you essentially are is this little person.

And then you can coexist. There is the person, but there is, more importantly, there is something that shines through the person. The presence, the awareness, the unconditioned conscious, whatever many words can be used, Buddha nature, your Buddha nature emerges.

Or in mystical Christianity, Christ consciousness emerges. It is the unconditioned consciousness that emerges and then shines through the person. So the person is still there.

The conditioning is still there. But you are no longer in the grip of the conditioned person. You are there as an awareness behind it.

And yes, certain things still happen. You may still, as you go through the transitional period, you still find from time to time or regularly find yourself taken over by the person again. And you completely lose presence, especially when you visit your family.

Because people with whom you share a lot of past, they are the most difficult people to stay present with. And even worse, it's your ex-wife or ex-husband that generates a lot of... So the vital thing is realizing that you are actually able to consciously choose many times during the day to be present rather than being a person.

But for example, simply looking around and not labeling mentally what it is you're seeing. Just be there and feel the presence of yourself. I am.

I am. Perhaps the most profound thing in the Old Testament is when God is asked, what's your name? Or who are you?

I don't remember what the question is. But God defines him, her, or itself as I am that I am. Which means I am the underlying I am of the entire universe.

And when you find the I am in yourself, that is the I am of all life. It is not your I am. It is the I am of the universe.

It is the universal consciousness. The one consciousness that you are. So on the one hand, you are a person, which is the ripple on the surface of the ocean.

But you're also the ocean. You're more fundamentally the ocean than the ripple on the surface of the ocean. Or you might be a wave.

But still you have the same destiny as the ripple. If your private jet is waiting at the airport for you, you're a wave on the surface of the ocean. But that's not going to last that long either.

You still need to find the essence of who you are as the ocean. So who am I then? Who am I?

This is a question that ancient teachers have asked often. Some have said, like Ramana Maharshi, the Indian spiritual teacher who lived in the first half of the 20th century. His highly recommended meditation was to ask yourself, who am I?

Who am I? So you have to sit there and you go, who am I? Now, as long as you ask yourself the question, who am I?

And you go, you're never going to get there because you're obviously looking for some answer, conceptual answer. So you can sit for hours, you can sit for days, you can sit for years. I met people who spent years in Zen monasteries as monks or nuns.

And still didn't get it. Because they tried to work something out mentally. What is Zen?

Who am I? I just can't get it. But of course, the answer is very simple.

And that is, there is no answer, not on a conceptual level. The answer to the question, who am I? Is the stillness that comes after that question.

Oh, oh, I got it now. Do you? And then you might find the mind may still want to come in, even after you get it for a moment.

Yes, but I have another question. I told the story, I believe it's in a new earth about the Zen story about the master, Zen master and the young monk on a pilgrimage out in nature, walking for hours. And then they sit down for a picnic and the young monk asked the master, please, can you, this may be a good opportunity, can you explain again what I really want to get the essence of Zen, but I can't get it.

I need some more explanation. Please help me. And I'll just repeat the story, but it's a different way than when you read it in the book.

Please help me. And the master said, can you hear the sound of that mountain stream in the distance? And the disciple said, no, I can't hear it.

And the master said, listen again, can you hear the sound of that mountain stream? And the disciple said, why are they saying that? I asked the explanation about Zen.

And then he, but then he went, but it was very distant, a very distant sound of water coming down the mountain. And finally he got it. He, and then he said, yeah, I can hear it now.

And then the master said, that's Zen. You enter Zen from there. Oh, and then after a few seconds, his mind came back in.

So you can see for a moment, the disciple's mind subsided and became present because the sound was so distant. He needed total attention to hear it. And then the disciple said, okay, I have a question now.

What would you have said if I had said, no, I can't hear the mountain stream. And of course the master raised his finger and said, enter Zen from there. So it's, it's so immediate, so direct that the complicating mind cannot possibly understand.

So Zen simply means thoughtless awareness, absolute presence. And that's why there was one Zen teacher who, whenever people asked any explanation about Zen, he became famous as the finger raising teacher. Whenever people asked him about, please explain Zen, he would simply go and look at you and he would go, and some people got it.

Many didn't. That means thoughtless awareness, absolute presence, rising above thought, not falling below thought, above thought. Now that becomes a dimension of consciousness that then becomes active in your daily life.

So you shift from, yes, you, of course you think, and of course you still, as you transitioned from the unawakened, unconscious state, unconscious in the way we use the word here, of course does not mean, it's not the conventional meaning of unconscious, which would be, unconscious means completely identified with your thinking mind, complete identification with thought is unconsciousness, spiritually speaking, and consciousness is to disidentify from thought, and then you can step out of thought when you want to.

That is spiritual awakening. Before consciousness and thought, all your consciousness, it's not your consciousness, but the consciousness that arises in you before you awaken, all that consciousness is trapped in thought. It's trapped.

And that makes up the heaviness of the personality. All your consciousness, all consciousness is trapped and immediately becomes thought. And that is the egoic mind.

It gobbles up all your consciousness, one thought after another. And you can see where people, how lost in thought people are, how uncentered they are, how unpresent they are in many cases, and they're very unhappy. It's a very unhappy state to be lost in thought.

And there's always something problematic in thought because thought is there, it's designed to solve problems, but the way it's developed is it creates more problems than it solves. So a large part of your so-called problems are mind-created. You may have a few real ones, but even that is still mind-created.

Let's say you've run out of money, you can't pay the rent, and next week you have to move out and you don't know where. That's usually called a problem. It would be a problem, and it is on a conventional level, but it is not in the present moment.

If you're really in this moment, there is no problem. And in this moment, you can take action. If you completely align yourself with this moment, you see the totality of the life situation and the power of this moment, and then you might take some action that solves the problem.

But you don't carry the burden in your mind of a problematic life anymore. This is such an incredible liberation from needing, from being trapped in thinking all the time, to being able to step out of thinking, and then you have conscious. Consciousness then becomes liberated from thought.

And there you have more. And then, of course, thought will want to get it back. It says, oh, come.

And so it pulls it back, and then you're lost in thought. And then, again, separation happens. And then, gradually, you learn to think without completely losing yourself in the thoughts.

So there's always a presence behind the thinking. So you are able to think, but there is an awareness behind the thinking. Meaning, you are no longer completely lost in your thinking.

You're no longer completely identified with your thinking. So the most vital thing as part of your spiritual awakening is stepping out of thought and realizing how vitally important that is. But thought will tell you, no, not now.

Before you step out of thought, you have to think a little bit more. When I've just solved this particular thing, then I can start doing it. But right now, I have too much on my plate.

It's really too much in my head. I can't, I can't, just can't do it now. It's just, it's, it's, I can't deal with that spiritual stuff now.

Just, this is not the time to be spiritual. And, of course, most people believe that if life left them alone for just a while, so that they could really dedicate themselves to their spiritual life, they might get somewhere. All I need is to please leave me alone for half a year.

And, and give me some money so that I can go to the most beautiful place where everything will be, I will be looked after. Don't have to worry about my food, massage every day. And only the purest food will be prepared for me, so I don't have to worry about that.

And the weather will be lovely every day, and so that I can really dedicate myself to my spiritual practice. That should do it. And, of course, that is called, what you really want is to be totally in your comfort zone, believing that that will actually awaken you.

And, of course, if you try it out, it will have the opposite effect. Yes, you may become free of thought, but you will have fallen below thought. Because in the absence of challenges, you very easily fall below thought.

It's the challenges that provide the motivation to rise above thought. But the challenges also can pull you below thought. So you have to look very clearly when you encounter a difficult situation, or a difficult person, which is not difficult to encounter.

Anything problematic that arises, how easy it is for you to become reactive. And let's say you meet a very rude person, doesn't respect you, or just says something disrespectful. And you can feel yourself wanting to, or actually responding, reacting in kind, and say something back.

That's the same kind of thing. The ego does that automatically. When the ego feels diminished, somebody criticizes you, somebody insults you, whatever they do, the ego is the mind made self.

The ego feels diminished even by a simple thing, like another driver shouting something at you. You idiot. And you've, immediately, the ego goes into automatic self-repair mode by shouting something back.

And to the ego that feels something good has happened because I have repaired myself. My diminished sense of self is restored now. And so this is done, can be done in discussions also.

The ego always is looking out for being very much afraid of being diminished in their sense of self. So any criticism, et cetera, is a diminishment. So if somebody said to you, isn't that your ego talking?

Let's say your spouse is saying, you might have an agreement. Please remind me when my ego is coming up strongly, let me know. And so your spouse says, oh, you better watch that.

What you just said seems to me was completely ego. It's coming from ego. You need to be right and you need me to be wrong, obviously.

That's why you said that. And then you will know immediately whether or not what this person, your spouse said was true or not by your reaction. If your reaction is, what?

My ego, you better look at yours. And that means he or she was right. It was your ego.

But if you say, really? Oh, I have to look into that. And then you might say, yeah, I think you're right.

Or you might say, it still doesn't. I don't feel it was ego. There's no reaction, which means there's a presence.

And then it's quite possible that the person was wrong. Perhaps it was their ego being projected onto you. So whenever you go into self-defense mechanism, the kind of thing is ego repair mechanism.

And you can practice with refraining from that. It's quite an interesting practice. It's not uncommon that people, when I drive, well, it does happen from time to time.

I don't know why they shout at me. And usually there's no reaction. I kind of look at them.

And they get, sometimes they shout even louder. I even had one last year. I had the windows closed in my car.

And maybe I did something or not. And he pulled up and his window came down and he shouted something unpleasant. And I just looked around.

And then he shouted, I know you can hear me. But it's interesting when you don't go into ego repair mechanism. At first, the ego would feel diminished at first.

And then you just, you stay with that. And just presence arises. And suddenly you realize there's nothing.

Nothing has been diminished at all. There was just somebody shouting. So you are no longer there as a target at all.

You've kind of disappeared as a target. So observe the reactivity in you, especially when challenges happen in life. There's always, you can go either way.

You can become reactive again, pull it into unconsciousness, or you can rise above and suddenly become more present through the challenge. And what happens as you begin to awaken spiritually, more and more, a challenge makes you more present. And when there's an absence of challenges for a few days, you go back into just ticking over, just normal kind of mind identification.

And then something else happens and goes wrong and go, oh. And then after a while, as you voluntarily embrace the shift in consciousness, you go there voluntarily by choice. Life does not need to challenge you that much anymore because you're already choosing it for yourself.

Everybody on the planet has a spiritual teacher. Now for 95% of the population, their spiritual teacher is their suffering. And so those are the challenges that become suffering.

And that eventually awakens people. You know it from your own life. I know it from my life.

If I had not gone through intense suffering and being challenged, you're challenged by external circumstances, but more fundamentally, you are challenged by your own mind. Which is the inherited collective mind. That is the greatest challenge.

For a long time, humans don't know that because they don't know that most of their problems arise from the unobserved mind. And so the greatest challenge is, yes, external circumstances, but more fundamentally, the unobserved mind, which creates reactions. And the reactions create further suffering and turmoil for yourself and others.

That's the vicious circle of karma. And karma gets broken when awareness arises. Presence is not part of your karma.

It is the wheel of karma, which is action, reaction, action, reaction, action, reaction, being passed on from generation to generation, from person to person, from parents to children, to their children, to their children. The karma, the unconsciousness, the unconscious reactivity. And when presence arises, something is there that is not part of karma.

You don't need fantastic karma to awaken spiritually. Karma meaning the things that you come into this world with. Some people, of course, have more pleasant life circumstances.

They are born into relatively pleasant environment and so on. And others are born into a very difficult environment. So it is the people who are born into a very pleasant environment are not necessarily, and probably not at all at an advantage as far as spiritual awakening is concerned.

It's the suffering that awakens you. And then you jump out of the wheel of karma. You're no longer reactive.

You can respond to situations, but you don't react anymore. You can take action, but the action arises out of the sense of presence rather than the accumulated conditioning of your mind. The action arises when the response comes out of being, you look at every situation that arises and you're present and you face it and you look at it and you accept it the way it is.

And then greater intelligence operates in you and spontaneously you do the right thing. Spontaneously you say the right thing or spontaneously you refrain from doing anything because you realize or you recognize that at that moment there's nothing to do. And you're at peace.

You're aligned with the isness of this moment. It's a wonderful, amazing time to live. You are going through a transition from one state of consciousness to another.

It's an evolution, almost a different species emerging that is no longer governed by ego. Ego meaning identification with the mind, identification with every thought. And something new is arriving, what Jesus called the kingdom of heaven, meaning kingdom dimension, heaven, sky, spaciousness, the dimension of spaciousness.

And then they asked him, where is it? It's within you. Oh, that's what he was talking about.

He was talking about the dimension of spacious awareness in you. But to explain it to people, he pointed at the sky, which was the closest thing he could find as an analogy to explain that he was actually talking about an inner realization. So he was looking around and spontaneously he pointed at the sky because the sky is the closest in the sense perceived reality that you could use as an analogy for the inner spaciousness because the sky is not an object.

Everything else that you see around you is an object. It's a material object, everything else. But the sky actually doesn't really exist.

It's just spaciousness, but you can never touch it. You can never get there because when you go up in a rocket, there's never a moment when you say, I'm now in the sky. It's not, you can be in a cloud, but you can't be in the sky because the sky doesn't really exist as an object.

So he very cleverly, deeply inspired, used that from the sense perceived world to point to an inner reality because also the consciousness that you are, that formless spacious consciousness that you are, can never be an object of everything else is an object that arises in your consciousness. But you can never say, ah, this is my consciousness. There it is.

I have it. No, it's like if you were shining a light, let's say you're shining a spotlight and you're looking, let's say you're looking for yourself or you're looking for God, same thing. So you're shining the spotlight of consciousness.

Where am I? Where am I? And it's just what I thought all kinds of objects.

It illuminates all these objects. No, I'm not that, not that. And finally, okay, I give up.

And maybe at that moment, when you say I gave up, you're no longer looking out there and you become aware of the light that you use to look for yourself. And suddenly you realize that's what I was looking for. I am what I was looking for.

I am the light with which I was looking for myself. Consciousness. So it's, you cannot become an object to yourself.

That's why Jesus used that expression, the dimension of space, kingdom of heaven, dimension of spaciousness. And then when they asked him, he said, when they asked, where is it going to come? When is it going to come?

The kingdom of heaven, because they obviously didn't understand what he was saying, but they wrote it all down. A few things survived, but most, a lot of it didn't go very well, but a few jewels survived. So it's worth, it's precious for those jewels.

So when they asked him, he said, well, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be observed. That's a literal translation. The kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be observed.

You cannot say, oh, it's over here, or, oh, it's over there. Because I tell you, it is within you. Other translations say in the midst of you.

It doesn't matter. The kingdom of heaven is within you. It's never there.

It's never there. It's not an object that can arise in consciousness. God is not an object that can arise in consciousness.

Oh, there's God. I met God there. Interesting question.

I don't use that term too often because it can be very misleading and has been misused for a long, long time by people who had no idea what they were talking about, but they're using God continuously, talking about God, God, God. What do you mean? Unless you have realized who you are beyond the person, you have not the slightest idea of what God is.

It's a mental concept. That's all. It's a mental idol when you use it without knowing yourself.

But when you know who you are beyond the person, and it's not a conceptual knowing, it's sensing the light of consciousness that you are, that spacious, one could say spacious, luminous, it's an analogy, spacious, luminous, the consciousness that manifests through you that becomes thought, but is not thought, is prior to thought, the unconditioned consciousness, which scientists tell you is produced by the physical brain, but they will realize at some point that consciousness is not produced by the physical brain, although there's a relationship between the physical brain and consciousness, in the same way that there's a relationship between the radio and what it transmits or a television set and what it transmits. Of course, there is a relationship between them, but mainstream science still believes that there's nothing but matter.

Mainstream science, except for a few very advanced scientists, and most of them are either retired or close to retirement, and then they have the courage to speak out and say things that otherwise, but they would lose tenure if they said things like consciousness is not produced by the brain. Only scientists who no longer were near retirement are able to make these statements because otherwise you get condemned like you got condemned in medieval times when you said something that the church didn't approve of. It is the most obvious thing is that you are essentially invisible.

Every one of you, I mean, what you see of another person or what you see of yourself when you look in the mirror is a very, the tiniest surface phenomenon. What matters most about you, your thoughts and your emotions and all the things that make up who you are. Go to a surgeon, could open up your brain, your head and examine your brain under a microscope and the most powerful microscope, he would not find a single thought.

He couldn't find a single emotion. How many thoughts are there in your head? The memories that you have, you have millions of memories in your head.

I sometimes suggest to people, think at this moment, the teacher you had when you were eight years old, your favorite teacher, suddenly he or she appears. The house where you lived when you were 10 years old, can you hear them? You open the door, you walk in, there's the living room, there was your room.

Now that I ask you, you can go there mentally. So in some way, that memory was dormant in you until I said this, how did that survive in you? Was that, were there certain atoms or molecules that was your living room?

Are there memory molecules and there is, some are reserved for this, some are reserved for that. So you wouldn't find any of that if you look to the brain with the most powerful instruments. Science doesn't even know what a thought is.

No idea what a thought is. And it's of course, it's invisible. It's obviously, you are not essentially a material being.

So, because if you examine the matter of you, the physical you, they would never find you there. They cannot find you there. You're not there.

So the consciousness that you are, and that is the most essential thing when you can sense yourself as consciousness. Now, what I'm saying now is a little weird. Can you become conscious right now that you are conscious?

Can you know that you are conscious? Can you sense yourself as consciousness? It's so easy really.

Sounds a little weird, but it's easy. Can you sense yourself as consciousness? A conscious presence.

It's a similar thing that we did before is let go of personal history, just presence. Consciousness. And this consciousness perceives.

Without it, there would be no perception. It makes all perception possible. This consciousness makes all thinking possible.

That consciousness makes all emotion possible without what it wouldn't be. That is the consciousness that you are. Now, where does that come from?

And now I will suggest to you the relationship between your consciousness and God is similar to the relationship between the sunshine and the sun. The ray of the sun, the sunshine, which comes from the sun. It's emanating some, the sun in the physical universe emanates continuously light.

God, now we can use the sun as an analogy for God in the sense-perceived universe. God, of course, you cannot talk about. God is the source of all being and all life beyond anything that you could possibly comprehend or talk about.

God does not live in this dimension in space or time. God is in the transcendent, but all life emanates from the one source of all life. That is similar to the sun.

And what it emanates into this dimension is consciousness. That is the light of God. So you are a ray of that central source.

It appears briefly and temporarily as a person, but of course it's not a person. But it's, that is, each one of you is an emanation of the one. And each life form is an emanation of the one.

Your essential identity is not, you're not an autonomous being, not a separate being. You are the one experiencing itself as the many. And at the ultimate realization is the realization of the underlying oneness of all life.

The underlying oneness of all life. And that is realized when thinking ceases and that beautiful stillness, alert stillness in you, that is light of consciousness itself. That is primordial intelligence emanating from the source of all life.

And so when you know yourself as that, then the way in which you experience life in this dimension changes. You are free of fear, for example, because you know the indestructibility of life, the life that you are. And you also know that the belief that you have a life that one day you're going to lose is not actually true.

Because obviously, when I say, I have a life, or when I say, he lost his life, she lost her life. How is that possible? How can I lose my life?

Because that would mean there's a duality there. Here's me and there's the life. And then I lose it.

But then what am I if I'm not life? How can I lose myself? He lost his life.

How can he? He is life. How can I lose my life?

I am an expression of the one life. There isn't me and life. I don't have a life.

And you don't. You just think you do. I don't have a life.

I am life. And you, of course, you have a life on the level of the person for a little while, and then that dissolves. But what remains is the ray of consciousness that emanates from the central sun, which is God.

And that is your essential identity. And that is on a journey in this dimension. Gradually, the transcendent source, the emanation from the transcendent source, gradually brings about a universe that evolves in this dimension.

So in this dimension, one could almost say God evolves and becomes more conscious of itself or himself in this dimension. So you could say, and this is an ancient, that God or consciousness, which is a light of God, is present in all things, but in different vibrational frequencies. So God or consciousness is asleep in the mineral, in the stone, in the rock.

God, this is an ancient saying, God is dreaming in the plant or plant life, like one consciousness is dreaming in the plant life, in the trees and the flowers and the plants. And God is awake in the animal and in the human. And then in those humans who are awakening, God awakens to him, her, itself in the awakened human.

But they're all expressions of one consciousness at different frequencies, but ultimately all one. And that is such a beautiful thing, that realization of the oneness of life. That's also where the love, true love, loving kindness, a goodwill towards all humans is part, emanates from you when you realize your central oneness with every other human.

So you look at a human being and you know there's a person there, but only on the surface. And then you look again and you listen and you can sense that they are consciousness, essentially, an expression of the one, as are you. But if you don't know yourself as consciousness, then you cannot recognize the other as consciousness.

And the other is always completely other. And that's the egoic state. The egoic state is surrounded by others.

And the stronger your ego is, the more you attempt to emphasize the otherness of others. In other words, you love your enemies and you want to have more enemies because the fictitious ego identity gets stronger in its encapsulated sense of self, the more enemies it has around. That's not what I believe.

That's not what we believe. We believe this and we are the only ones who are right. All this ego stuff, we know all that.

It's all delusion. And that's the opposite of recognizing the oneness. And then the sense of otherness disappears.

And that's a beautiful thing when you no longer have this strong sense of otherness, both for individual people, but also groups of people. So this is where we are moving. This is where you are moving.

A new way of being in the world that arises from the awakened state of consciousness. And it's such a wonderful adventure to be part of this right now. So whatever your life is on a personal level is secondary.

The important thing is, are you bringing consciousness into this world? It doesn't matter what you do or how you do it. Are you here as a conscious being?

Are you emanating consciousness even in any simple, just even when meeting another human being, is there another dimension there? Not just the personal. And then many of you will also be teaching either formally or informally because there's a longing for humans, many humans, still a minority, but they're growing.

There's a longing to awaken to who they truly are. And if they don't know who they truly are, then they are unhappy. And that's why millions survive on pills and antidepressants, tranquilizers.

Even children these days are given tranquilizers and antidepressants. It's terrible. Why?

Because there's spiritual ignorance. So that is where the awakening is vital. And now we're moving probably towards difficult times in the collective.

And that's how it's meant to be because that can only accelerate the awakening or that looks negative on the surface, but it will accelerate the awakening. Critical times and awakening often go together. So I'm very optimistic about the future of humanity long-term, short-term is a different matter, but consciousness cannot be.

The universe wants to, is meant to become more conscious and you are an expression of that. Consciousness, you are an expression of that universe that is evolving in consciousness. So you're not a person, at least not for that long.

So accept who you are on the personal level. The person becomes less dysfunctional as consciousness comes in. It still has its limitations.

The person has its imperfections and limitations. You can live with that. You're not going to be perfect as a person.

What you gain here, you lose there. That's how it is. But you become compassionate with yourself.

You become more compassionate with the limitations of others because you realize who you are beyond that limited personal sense of self. And then you cannot not teach others. Everybody you come into contact with somehow is affected by your consciousness.

And even people you're not in physical contact with are affected because we're all connected at a deeper level. So enjoy the journey. Your life is a great success because you are awakening.

So that means you're fulfilling the purpose of human existence. So whatever the world tells you, whether you're important or not, or whether your personal history is a great, wonderful tale or a sorry story, no longer matters. It has brought you to the point of awakening.

So it all worked. Your life was a total success. Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Bringing Consciousness to the Grief Process [caadcd2d-1694-48aa-bad8-72f811c9019d]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:35)

Bringing consciousness to the grief process. In this episode, Eckhart answers questions about dealing with grief consciously. He explains what the grief process looks like for an awakened person.

Eckhart believes even if we're in touch with the transcendent dimension, we will still experience grief. He says when we are awakened, grief doesn't disappear completely. However, the intensity will be less.

Eckhart also explains that facing death or the possibility of death is vital because it is the catalyst for the evolution of our consciousness.

Hello, everybody. Wonderful to be with you. Thank you for being so present that even to say that you were patient is no longer correct.

Because patience is a kind of intermediate stage. It's kind of trying to be really patient. I'm so patient.

You haven't yet fully arrived in the now, but you're patient. It's better than not being patient and restless and so on. And as you become present, even the concept of patience disappears.

Every concept, in fact, disappears. There are many ways in which one could encapsulate the essence of all spirituality, whatever you want to call it. Even there, we come to a word already.

It's a choice of words. There are many ways you could encapsulate the essence. A very simple one, for example, would be to say the spiritual awakening and the spiritual arising of the transcendent dimension, which is what it is, comes through the letting go of concepts.

A little threatening, perhaps, for many people who are so identified with mental concepts that they derive the entire sense of self from them. So if you derive your identity, your sense of who you are, your sense of I, if you derive that from mental concepts, then letting go of concepts is something threatening to be feared. That even includes spiritual concepts.

Now, concept is another word for thought. In the English language, there's a word that usually has negative connotations, and that is the word thoughtless. In the normal usage, to be thoughtless is not a good thing.

And it implies that the next thing that you do is going to have very bad consequences when you act from a state of thoughtlessness. But there's another way. There's a deeper meaning behind thoughtless, and that's not common usage.

Therefore, I would not use the term thoughtless to talk about it. But I would say free of thought. Thoughtless probably would imply that you are below thought.

You act out of some impulse. Then comes thought. Then comes the possibility, the realization that there is a dimension of consciousness that is above thought.

And that's easily realized when you become aware of an inner space of just awareness itself, space of no thought, freedom from thought. But your sense of beingness, however, is still there, but it can no longer be defined through concepts. It's just pure beingness, which cannot be doubted.

The one thing you cannot doubt is that you are. Everything else that you perceive and think about may well be the matrix, whatever it is. It may be a projection.

It may be a dreamlike state. All kinds of things are possible. But the one thing that cannot be doubted is the presence of consciousness.

I am. And that realization is you arrive at, as you arise above thought, a clear space of awareness. And that awareness is a deep sense of you haven't lost yourself.

I wrote this little book a long time ago, Stillness Speaks. I think the first sentence goes something like, you are never more truly yourself than when you are still. And to be still, of course, is to be free of concepts, free of thoughts, but awake, aware.

That's the transcendent dimension that opens up. You transcend concepts, which transcend doesn't mean you completely eliminate concepts. They are still able to operate, but no longer form the basis, foundation, for your sense of identity, that spiritual realization, spiritual awakening.

Now to the self that's derived from concepts, that is a kind of death. So it's quite possible for a spiritual seeker to arrive at this threshold. You've learned a lot about liberation, awakening, spirituality.

And then at some point, after reading 200 books about it, and going to workshops and lectures, at some point, you reach that point where it's time to let go, even of what you think you know about spirituality. Or if you've been reading about scriptures, some people, God is an important thing for many people. But of course, God also, until there comes a deeper realization, God is a concept.

And at some point, yes, you spend years reading whatever it is, religious texts, whatever tradition. And at some point, you've reached this threshold where you have to let go of your concept of God also. In order to find the reality that is behind that word God, you have to let go of the concept, the word God.

The Buddha must have realized that because he never used the word God. And as you realize this, something emerges that I call the deep eye. And the surface eye recedes quite a bit.

It doesn't disappear completely while you're still here in a physical form, with a memory, and so on. The surface eye, the antipersonality, the surface eye is there, but it becomes less important. And all the things associated with the surface eye, the personality, the person, many of these things still operate.

The surface eye has certain imperfections, inadequacies, undoubtedly. They won't go away. The insanity that's sometimes associated with the surface eye does tend to go away, or does go away.

There are many other inadequacies and imperfections and limitations of the surface eye that may remain. But you have transcended them, transcended. It means you haven't eliminated, you have gone beyond.

They're still there, but they no longer give you your sense of self. They're no longer the center of your life. The self becomes a little less important, and then even less important.

And then you become comfortable with a personality, because it becomes a vehicle for the deep eye to manifest itself into this dimension. Don't underestimate the power of nature to help you free yourself from concepts and from yourself. In other words, nature can be a very helpful thing to free you from yourself, to bring you to a perhaps temporary self-transcendence as you go into nature, whatever nature may be, a forest, the ocean shore, the desert, the forest, the desert, the garden, or even just the sky, the tree, the weather.

I love weather, different kinds of weather, always good. But you have to, it's not enough to just go out into nature. You have to really be there with your senses fully.

And if you're there fully with your senses, then you're not imposing concepts on nature. You're able to see and hear and feel directly without any mental labels. And it's very subtle.

It's no longer just the magnificent things that, like a magnificent sunset, although they're wonderful. It's not just the spectacular things in nature, which sometimes are there, but ordinary things that normally humans would overlook. Because humans are always looking for the spectacular or the big thing that stands out, not only in nature, in their own lives too.

They could completely ignore the so-called ordinary, which is 99% of your life is the ordinary things of daily existence. But they're looking for the spectacular, the one thing, the big thing. And sometimes it comes and then it goes, and then you're back to the ordinary.

Or sometimes it comes and it stays, the big thing. But if it stays, it's no longer a big thing. It becomes ordinary too.

So you go into nature and perceive with this alertness. And you realize you can know nature, not through concepts, but directly through awareness instead of through conceptualization. And these are the two modalities of knowing, conceptual knowing, which we need.

Yes, there's a place for it, but it becomes destructive if we become consumed by conceptual knowing and don't know anything else except concepts. Then it becomes a terrible, terrible prison. And so that means you have not transcended concepts.

You are imprisoned by concepts. Then you discover there is another way of knowing, not to replace concepts, but an additional dimension, a dimension of depth that wasn't there before. You didn't know it was there, but you had no idea it was there, so it wasn't there for you.

You can have a hundred million dollars in the bank, but if you don't know it, you're poor. You have no idea that you have it. Of course, what we're talking about is infinitely vaster than a hundred million dollars.

So to know something is always a choice. What's the best how to approach anything that comes into your life? So judging through concepts, judgment and concepts go together.

And then there's a deeper knowing that comes from the deep eye. It doesn't consist of judgments, and yet you know that there's a knowing. And you can test it with things like you can just look at something, even an object.

Nature is even better. You can look at something without any words in your mind, and you know what it is. Look at a tree, any tree.

Look at a tree. You know what it is. Well, yes and no.

It's hard to say whether there's a deep recognition of this thing that we call tree when we use concepts. And yet there's also something deeper that goes deeper than sense perceptions and certainly deeper than any concept. And when you're still for just a moment and observe something visually or through auditory perception, whatever it may be, the song of a bird or the sound of rain or whatever it may be, or the sky, and you see it and there's a deep knowing, unitive, I sometimes call it unitive knowing.

You and it merge. There's no longer a sense of me and it, the separation. You and it, this unitive knowing.

And that's a deeply peaceful and deeply satisfying and wonderful, this unitive knowing. The sense of separation falls away. That inevitably comes when you only relate through concepts.

Because every concept is a limited form. It is this, but not this. And so if you define your identity only through concepts, then your sense of identity needs the other that is not like you in order to survive.

That's very interesting. Let's say you're part of a, let's say it's a religious church and the members of this church believe that only we are in possession of the truth. All the others are not only wrong, they're actually evil.

Everybody who is not part of us is evil. Every member of the church defines his or her identity through the other. If suddenly the entire planet were exactly the same beliefs, it couldn't before your identity anymore.

You would lose your sense of identity without the other. I sometimes give the example of racial identity too. Well, it's fine to raise this part of your form identity, physical form.

In this case, form identity is also psychological form, of course. So if form identity is to be acknowledged, it's there, it's fine. Recognized, accepted, it's fine.

But to what extent does it give you your sense of who you are? If your racial identity is the most important part of your sense of who you are, then I suggest you imagine a scenario where you are taken by a spaceship suddenly comes and takes you to a planet where everybody is exactly the same race as you. Everybody, exactly the same, which means your entire sense of identity that was built on race will collapse because the other is gone.

Where am I without the other? So with concepts, you need the other. And if you're very strongly embedded and interacted by concepts, you need to emphasize how different the other is from you.

And that strengthens your sense of self. It's called ego, personal ego, collective ego. It doesn't matter.

They're all forms of ego. So in the egoic sense of identity, you desperately need the other. And that is the absence of love.

You can't afford yourself really to love. You can't love the other. You need to say the other is not.

You're superior, obviously, to the other. So love, true love can only arise in the unitive knowing, not knowing through concepts. Then you can sense something in the so-called other that is not other at all, that is one with who you are, the essence of who you are.

And you look at a human being, a so-called other human being, and you recognize something, but you can't say what exactly that is. But you recognize their beingness, their essence, their breath beyond the veil of the personality, which of course is there. And it could be that sometimes the veil of the personality is so dense that it's very hard to recognize the essence of that human that can happen.

It's somewhere. And so you need to pierce through the density of the personality, heavy karma, whatever term you want to use, in the other. And then it's there, or sometimes you can't sense it at all because it's so dense.

And then something may happen. And suddenly there's a crack in it. And then there's a moment where the recognition beyond the person, beyond the personality.

This is also vital that everything else in your life recedes into relative insignificance, considering how important this is, this realization. It's not just a temporary realization. It's the transition to this state of consciousness where the deep eye and the surface eye live together.

Let's see if there are any questions.

Hi. Thank you. Thank you, Eckhart, for your teachings and for taking my question.

So I'm just going to read it. So in the last few years, I've lost several key relationships to death, drug addiction, mental health illness, and other reasons. And so I've been in a continuous state of grieving, and it's been really draining.

And so I do finally feel myself approaching acceptance or some sense of peace. But I wonder if I could have managed the process better or made progress more quickly. And so my questions are, you know, what does the process of grieving look like for an awakened person?

Does one experience those classic stages of like denial and anger and bargaining and depression? Or is there more like an immediate, like acceptance or transcendence? And also, can you please provide guidance on how to bring awareness and consciousness to the grief process?

Thank you. Thank you. It helps, of course, to have had some realization of what we've been calling the deep eye when you are faced with death around people that happens to people around you.

If you've had some awareness, or you have some awareness of the transcendent dimension, does not mean that grieving will disappear. Grieving will be there. The other things you mentioned will probably not be there so much.

But if they are, like denial and anger and so on, if they are there, you will recognize them. There will be an awareness that recognizes that this is happening to you. That's very different from it happening to you without awareness.

And if it's happening to you, while you're aware that this is happening, they are short-lived, anger, denial, anger, and so on, whatever they are. And what remains then is the grieving or the sadness that comes. Grieving becomes mourning, sadness that comes with it.

That remains for a while, but you are not consumed by it. There is a sadness, and there is also that sadness is not incompatible with a deep sense of peace. In fact, they kind of go together.

One of my favorite things, especially when I go to Europe, like England, English villages, countryside, each village has an old church. And then there's an old churchyard with gravestones, sometimes two, three, 400 years old. And often the name is already half eroded or eroded.

Sometimes it's still legible. And what I sent there is a sadness at the impermanence of the human condition, but also a very deep sense of peace. And the grieving process, therefore, is something that still operates because that's to do with, yes, it is very sad to lose this being that you knew the form of this being, the physical body and the personality, and that suddenly is no longer there.

That leaves a very painful gap hole, a hole in the, I sometimes call it a hole in the tapestry of your life, the tapestry of your life where everything looks all nicely arranged. And then suddenly something is torn out of it. It's painful.

And it's particularly painful if all you know, you don't know what's behind the tapestry. You'd only know the surface of it. Then it's particularly painful.

And of course, when this hole is torn into the tapestry, torn out of it, a piece is torn out, that is also an opportunity, even if you have never realized the deeper dimension before, if you're able to accept this hole, the disappearance, the sudden disappearance of this person, it's something very strange, very strange. If you're able to accept it, then this becomes an opening into the transcendent dimension. This is why some people, when they are confronted with death, or even they become aware of the existence of death, some people don't even believe that they are going to die.

Conceptually on the surface, they say, yes, of course, I'm going to die one day. But they don't, it's not, they don't know, really know that. Then somebody close to them suddenly dies.

And for some people that for the first time, they become aware of the reality of death. And that can be a terrible shock. It can be extremely painful.

But it can also bring about a sudden deepening. If you're able to accept this, this is harder in our contemporary culture, Western culture. Of course, a lot of the world has become westernized by now.

But Western culture traditionally denies death, not hasn't always been like that. But contemporary Western culture is so focused on externals, so focused on things and getting things, doing things, all the world of form, and it's kind of lost awareness of the inner dimension. And it has a symptom of this is the denial of death.

It's a little less so right now, but it has been a taboo for a long, long time to talk about it. It's regarded as something that should not be happening, something the most terrible, terrible thing. So grieving is something that will still happen.

But you're not consumed by it anymore, as you become accepting of the fleetingness of the human form. It no longer consumes you. Grieving also has a natural lifespan.

That's fine. But when you are consumed by grieving, then it can happen that you for a year or two or three continue to grieve, even about one person's death, and you can continue to be consumed by grief, and it destroys your life. You're not helping anybody.

The person who is no longer here in the physical form, if he or she observes you, would be very sad if you were still grieving after two or three years. And why are you still grieving? Because you are continuously reviving in your mind.

You have memories attached with your life with that person, and the memories continuously revive the emotion. You relive this again and again and again. And there's a lack of awareness there where you can bring your attention away from compulsive thinking and bring your attention into the reality and the aliveness of the present moment.

So death is a vital part of spiritual realization, is to investigate and to face death. It's all around us continuously, but you don't see dead bodies usually. So then you have the illusion that death is an anomaly.

It's an anomaly because you never see any dead bodies until somebody so close to you dies, and you don't see any dead bodies because it's regarded as something wrong with seeing a dead body. It's a taboo. Unless you're a very close relative, you cannot see a dead body.

It hasn't always been like that. There was a time when we were more familiar with death and therefore also less fearful. Fear, to a very large extent, is ultimately the fear of death.

And if we are able to investigate death, then an opportunity opens up for going deeper. Death, when you face it, either your own, the possibility of your own death, or somebody close to you approaching death or having just died, is an enormous opportunity for deepening. And by deepening, I mean you become aware of that which transcends the personality, because that dies.

The person dies, the physical form dies. The essence of that being is beyond death. But you have to find that which is beyond death within yourself.

Then you're free of the fear of death. And that's a wonderful liberation. In, I don't know if you know, in many, many traditional cultures, very ancient cultures, all parts of the world, for people who were reaching adulthood, adolescents who were reaching adulthood, they had initiations.

They had to face a very difficult situation that was part of their life was structured that way. When you reached a certain age, you had to, you were confronted with a difficult situation that in some cases even led to death. So it was, you were, you encountered the possibility of death.

Sometimes you might have been sent out into the jungle and survived there alone for two or three days. I'm not saying we should go back to that. I'm just explaining that's how it is.

But there's a very deep wisdom embedded in that. And these people who did that, they wouldn't have been able to explain what they did. It was an expression of an innate wisdom.

And what was the purpose of that? The purpose of that was is to bring an end to childhood by forcing this adolescent to face the possibility of death, bring about a deepening in who they are. And when they emerge out of that ordeal, they are transformed to some extent.

They are a deeper human being and they have reached adulthood. They do not carry childhood into their 20s and 30s as is often the case in Western culture. It's everywhere.

There's lots of adult children around in Western culture. So just look on the internet. So the deep wisdom in this, we can't go back to that right now.

This is not the situation people would say we cannot return to initiation rituals where adolescents are facing death. Our culture does not allow for that and that's fine. But to understand that there was a very deep wisdom in that.

So something is lost that we have lost this unfortunately. So we have to find it in another way. And this is of course why we are here and facing death or the possibility of death is the most vital thing that's inseparable from the evolution of your consciousness.

It's absolutely vital. So death is a wonderful thing without which there would be no evolution. In the Western world, if you look at paintings, old paintings done in medieval times and so on, you can often see when it's the rooms, there was a room where a man or woman sitting in a room and there's a desk.

On the desk or somewhere else on the shelf or the windowsill, there's a human skull. That was quite normal for people to have a human skull somewhere in the room on their desk or somewhere. Why?

Because, well, they even had a name for it. I think it was called memento mori, which means the remembrance of death. So you would become, you would be continuously aware of mortality.

Now, is that a bad thing? Not necessarily, because if you're continuously aware of mortality, it gives you a right perspective on the relative importance of the things that are happening in your life. And when you are aware of mortality, all the things that you thought were so incredibly important and all-consuming, suddenly you see it's even from a deeper perspective.

And the deeper perspective is in a few years, you will be gone. And with you, all your problems will be gone. So that's very helpful.

There is a transcendent dimension. The essence of who you are does not die because it's not even visible. It's not part of this world.

That which inhabits the body, the human form, the mind, which gives rise to the mind, that is what Buddhists call the deathless. Jesus said eternal life. Find eternal life.

Very inspiring. Buddha said the deathless. Of course, they are both true, different approaches.

One states what it is, one states what it isn't. And if you state what it is, there is the danger that you could mistake the concept for it. The kingdom of heaven, eternal life.

Okay, where is it? It's going to come. So you're mistaking the concept for it.

But the concept was very inspiring. You felt good about it. Yes.

And for some people, it might have worked. They might have realized what Jesus talks about when he says eternal life, which means timeless, by the way. Eternal doesn't mean it goes on and on.

It means timeless. The timeless life that you are doesn't go on and on. The eternal life, the deathless realm is the Buddhist term, the deathless realm.

Well, much harder to make that into a concept that you can believe in. And that's a good thing. Because that forces you to realize the reality behind the words instead of making the words into an idol.

Of course, over the centuries, Buddhists have also managed to transform many Buddhist terms into idols that they did manage to just maybe took a little bit longer than with Christianity. Of course, not ever. There are still people alive who realize the essence of Buddhism, obviously.

There are still people alive who realize the essence of Christianity. Of course, they are one. So eternal life, the deathless realm, these are pointers.

One is a negative pointer. One is a positive pointer. Becoming aware of the impermanence of all forms, when you don't reject it, but accept it fully, fully accept the impermanence of all forms, then that takes you deeper.

As long as you reject it, you say, oh, no, that's terrible. Look, all these people are dead now. I don't want to see them.

That doesn't take you anywhere. You're more trapped in ego. But if you accept, it takes you deeper into the deathless, timeless dimension within yourself.

So the grieving process has a lifespan, and then it subsides. And even while you're grieving, through acceptance, you can be aware of a deep inner peace behind the grieving. They can go together.

[Speaker 2] (39:16 - 39:18)

Thank you. That's so helpful. Thank you, Eckhart.

[Speaker 3] (39:20 - 39:40)

Eckhart Tolle Challenges Push Us Into Presence [0bcf10a3-d865-49d2-82e0-1927be6061e6]

Challenges push us into presence. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions on how to deal with death for ourselves and those we love. He says it's critical that we break the taboo so we can overcome our fear.

Eckhart proposes that when we are faced with the possibility of a very limited future, the ultimate question is not whether or not we will survive, but instead allow the push us towards higher consciousness. He says it's possible to transcend our fear to reach a state of deeper presence.

Hello, thank you for taking my question. I am an oncology nurse. I've also just recently had two friends diagnosed with cancer and this week I had a friend who passed away from ALS that she lived with for 14 years.

I deal a lot with disease and end of life, but I've never understood people who use their faith. They feel that in order to be cured, they must have a strong faith and if their disease isn't cured or they die, it's because they did not believe strong enough. I was always puzzled by that attitude because I felt like if you have a strong faith in God, why are you so afraid to go and meet him?

Even as a young child, I never liked the story of Jesus raising Lazarus from the dead. It just always puzzled me. I remember you saying that one time, Eckhart, when you were talking about spiritual healing, eventually everybody's going to die.

It just bothered me why Jesus didn't let Lazarus die. I just find that sometimes people are so afraid of dying that they cannot enjoy living. On the other hand, I'm not suggesting that we all forego any kind of treatments and run off and commit suicide, but just how do we balance how much treatment we should go with and to decide if we're presented with a situation, how do we decide should I go for treatment, try treatment?

How far do you go? You try a certain treatment if it stops working. I'm often stuck on how to talk with people.

I'm pretty good about talking people about end of life and options, but if someone is presented with a choice, I don't always know how to present it. If my thoughts would be to go with end of life hospice care and it's not something that they wish, I don't want to sound callous, but I also want to be supportive of them. It's a term I hate.

It's a fight with cancer or a fight against whatever disease they have, but how much fight are we supposed to give to stay in this world?

[Speaker 1] (3:19 - 18:18)

Yes, thank you. Good question. Yes, it's interesting what you said about Lazarus.

He was raised from the dead and a few years later he died, undoubtedly. Unless, of course, the entire story is symbolic of something else, which, of course, that's another matter, but again, the most important thing for our civilization, perhaps, or one of the most important things is to become more familiar with death because death is such a taboo still in our society, mostly. It's rarely talked about.

Nobody can recommend, of course, you mentioned somebody falling ill and there are various things you mentioned. One is to have faith that you will be cured. Sometimes it works.

Some people do become cured of cancer. They cure themselves through faith or whatever it is, presence. In other cases, they don't.

I would say that when you are faced with a potentially fatal illness, when you know that there is a condition in your body that might kill you, ultimately, because everybody has a condition in their body that will kill you, it's called time, so that's a virus that nobody escapes on the physical level. So, if you become aware of mortality, that can be a dreadful thing, impending mortality or the possibility of mortality approaching before you're really old, that can be very frightening for many people. And if you have your religious beliefs, then you might think, if I have enough faith or I pray enough, I will get cured.

And sometimes you may get cured and at other times you will not. So, my advice, if for anybody, and perhaps you can pass it on in some way, when coming into contact with people who are in that situation, when you are faced with the possibility of imminent death or death or a very limited future, if the doctor tells you you only have one year or maybe two, that initially can be a dreadful thing. But within the context of this teaching, which is any true spiritual teaching, the ultimate thing is not whether or not you survive and you die a few years later, rather than in a year's time.

The ultimate thing is that you use that situation or that condition to force you into a, one could say, higher state of consciousness or deeper state of consciousness. When you have little or no future, you think, I may not have any more future or very little. That at first is a dreadful thing because the usual egoic entity looks to the future for fulfillment.

The first worst thing we can do to a human being is to remove future. And so, if there's very little future or there's a possibility that there may not be a lot of future, then at first it will bring out a lot of fear, of course, and despair. But if you have already become familiar with the practice of presence, the practice of awareness, then it may become easier and you can allow the situation, the expression I use is, to force you into intense presence so that you don't look to the future anymore.

And you don't look to the past anymore because you know the moment you look to the future, you begin to suffer and you begin to have fear. So, if you allow the situation to push you into intense present moment awareness, and I've known several people who were able to do that, and I'm sure there are many others who I don't know who are also able to do that, allow the situation to force you into intense presence. And sometimes that can happen, usually it happens after you suffer for a period of time, and then you just can't stand the suffering anymore.

And then you become intensely present, and that's the end of the suffering. But that presence can also be very healing. In some cases, intense presence, which pervades the entire body, intense presence pervades every cell of the body, is extremely healing.

In that state of presence, you're not fighting an illness. That's very important. Many people have the need to fight this illness.

I don't believe that is the most effective way of dealing with an illness, to have the inner attitude that you're fighting an enemy. I'm going to kill you, they say to that thing that wants to kill them. So, instead of fighting an illness, first step would be acceptance of the present moment, this is what is, and then an intensification of the presence in the present moment.

I have had some accounts of healings that have happened to people who were suffering from potentially fatal illnesses. In many cases, healing happened not because they were fighting an illness, but because they surrendered not to the idea of illness, but to whatever they are experiencing at this present moment. So, when I talk about surrender, which means acceptance, you don't accept, oh, I have to accept that I'm going to die in a year.

No, that's not real acceptance. Or I have to accept that I'm a cancer sufferer. That's not acceptance, that's a narrative in your mind.

Acceptance is always refers to this moment, what are you experiencing at this moment? Maybe you're not experiencing anything in particular, you just accept, or they experience some disability, or you experience some dysfunction, or even pain, acceptance of this moment, and then intensification of presence. In some cases, healing happens.

But whether or not healing happens is a secondary matter. If you use the illness to force you into intense presence, then you can, you die before you die in a good sense. And there's a flowering of consciousness that takes place through you, that would not have happened without the illness.

I've personally known several people who have experienced that. And some died a year later, six months later, it no longer mattered because there was an intensification of consciousness. And there was already a light shining through them.

The personality or the ego dissolved completely in that intense presence. In some cases, it can even happen. I remember reading an account a few years ago.

In England, there was a famous musician, I don't remember the name. And he had this account, it was published in the Times in London, I think. He was diagnosed with potentially fatal cancer.

He went to the doctor and the doctor said, well, you don't have that much longer, it's already spread throughout the body. And then he was interviewed. And then he said, he walked out of the doctor's office.

And he had had no spiritual, any kind of spiritual preparation before. And this is very rare. He walked out of the office.

And he suddenly became intensely conscious of, intensely aware of everything. He was looking at the sky, he was looking at the trees, and everything was amazing in its intensity of aliveness. And he said, why didn't I live like that before?

What is this? This is very rare for most people, suffering comes first and then they surrender. But with this person, there was an immediate shift into intense presence.

And he had never been present before. And he said, how wonderful this life is every moment, every second. And there's not even a need to cling to anything, not even need, how much longer am I going to experience this?

Even those questions disappeared. So, there's a great opportunity when something like that happens, for an intensification and acceleration, one could almost say of spiritual awakening. So, if that happens to you, or anybody I'm talking to, or anybody you know, potentially, it can be an intensification and acceleration of awakening, if you use it in that way.

How to advise somebody who's never had any contact with any kind of spiritual teaching before is difficult. And you cannot advise somebody whether or not to go on with treatment or not, because you cannot take that responsibility for them. If they are very afraid of death, then whatever their decision is, will probably be, I will suffer even for another six months of life, I'd rather suffer than to die six months earlier.

Because they are so afraid of death, they have not gone beyond identification with the body, with the psychological entity, the me. So, anybody who is here with us, of course, is much better prepared to deal with a situation like that, if it arises. At some point, of course, death will come to everybody.

We don't know when it will come, but at some point, death will no longer be tomorrow, it will be today. And therefore, it's so important to die to the surface, I call it the surface self, the egoic self, it's based on the past, the personality, and find, and we come back here to the vertical dimension of presence, find that before death comes, then you are prepared for death. And not only are you prepared for death, if you see it approaching, your presence will only intensify.

And that is how anything that's normally regarded as negative, any kind of disaster, it doesn't have to be an illness, can also have that function. Let's say you lose everything, you lose your marriage, you lose your job, you lose your home, all at once, it does happen to people. And again, when disaster strikes, there's always another side to it, there's potentially, there's an opening into the transcendent dimension, and a deepening can happen.

And it happens, most likely, when you're experiencing some kind of challenge, whatever form, loss, death, big upheavals, then that drives the evolution of consciousness. The suffering that's created by that leads to the transcendence, potentially to the transcendence of suffering. And that drives the evolution of consciousness.

All the challenges of life, and they are manifold, all the challenges of life that every human experiences, inevitably, they are the driving force behind the evolution of consciousness, and that includes death. So all this is a, what we are engaged in here is to do with finding death before death finds us, and then realize that there is no death, and it's no longer just a belief. There's nothing wrong with the belief.

But quite often, the belief is not quite enough. It doesn't free you from the deep fear of death, in many cases. There's actually a realization of the deep I that is beyond the physical you, and beyond the psychological you.

And that's, in fact, to bring it to the more simple terms, when you stop thinking for a moment, and awareness remains, I mentioned it before in our session at the beginning, there's a cessation of thinking, which means the entire personality subsides, the person. Because when you're not thinking about yourself or anything, you're not the person. Thinking subsides, there's a moment of spacious awareness.

And again, as I said before, that's a little death. Then thinking resumes. And I call that you reincarnate into the entity again.

And then you step out of thinking, and there's pure awareness. You die again. And the more you die in that way, the more deeply you realize that death is not something that needs to be feared.

So die daily. That's, I don't know who's, there was one saint, I think, who said that. Die daily, die as much as you can, by inviting the cessation of the otherwise incessant stream of thinking.

And there's a spacious awareness, you're dead. When you are dead, there's something that's left that's intensely alive. So I hope that makes sense.

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 5] (18:20 - 18:39)

Eckhart, our next question is a written question. If, quote, consciousness is gradually arising, unquote, that implies time. So how can there be no need for time to awaken?

[Speaker 1] (18:40 - 27:20)

Right. It sounds like a paradox. And it is.

So how do we explain that? Well, let's find an analogy. Let's say there's a, you have a lamp, a lamp, a table lamp with a lampshade.

So there's a light bulb, and there's a lampshade. And the lampshade, let's say the lampshade is very dense, so it lets through very little light from the source of light. But gradually, for various reasons, the shade, the light shade, loses some of its density, and more light begins to shine through gradually.

So the light represents the, the light is timeless. But as the, this is, we're talking about the light of consciousness here in this analogy, the light is, comes from, the light of consciousness emanates from a transcendent dimension. The consciousness does not have a location in space or time.

And so there's an emanation of consciousness in the same way that it emanates from a lamp or the sun. And the light that emanates, the consciousness that emanates into this dimension, what we call the universe, not just this planet, the entire universe and all galaxies, there's a gradual intensification of the light that reaches this dimension. The light itself is timeless.

So consciousness doesn't grow as such. It's only in this dimension, it can manifest more fully and measure that through the temporal time here. On this planet, the planet most likely started with just mineral, there was nothing.

And then at some point, there was the first plant life. And then gradually, other life forms came over millions and millions of years, with many setbacks, many setbacks, not a continuous progression. And after each setback, there was, again, an intensification, a renewal of life.

So gradually, there's more consciousness, the life forms become more complex here on this planet, and therefore everywhere else. And you can, in humans too, humans evolve gradually with many setbacks. Yes, often regressive periods happen, not only to an individual, but also the collective of humanity can experience regression in this.

It's not a continuous ascent to higher consciousness, but there is a movement, an evolutionary movement here. And that takes time. So it takes time for this dimension that is timeless to manifest itself in this world.

And so I sometimes on a personal level, on a human level, I sometimes say, you need time before you fully realize that you don't need time to be yourself. Sometimes it requires time, you need, in other words, you practice meditation, you have spiritual practices, every meditation kind of takes time. You say, okay, I'm going to meditate for 15 minutes now, or half an hour.

And you might even sometimes open your eyes and see how much longer do I have to meditate now. Any practice takes time, any spiritual practice takes time, inevitably. And that is the greatest obstacle also.

If you do practice meditation, meditation can be quite helpful. But if you want to achieve something through your meditation, become a better meditator, or you want to achieve some kind of state, hoping to achieve a state of enlightenment through meditation, you're already creating time. And that becomes the greatest obstacle.

Because you're still moving in the realm of becoming, instead of being. For most people who do a spiritual practice, they are on the level of becoming, I want to reach this level. There's a future they want to reach.

And paradoxically, that prevents them from finding the vertical dimension, the being dimension. If through your meditation, you want to become an enlightened human, then that idea that you want to become an enlightened human is the greatest obstacle to the realization of who you are as an enlightened being. Enlightened means to know who you are on the deepest level.

Now, the Buddha, as a good example, the Buddha's life, he practiced the most arduous and austere spiritual practices for many years when the Buddha was a young man, because he wanted to become enlightened. And it didn't work, he almost starved himself to death as part of his spiritual practice. That's the story goes.

And I believe it's true that it was transmitted from just 2,500 years ago. And at some point, the Buddha says, I've had enough. I'm not, this is my paraphrase.

I've had enough, he said, I'm done with becoming. I'm done with this. And he sat under a tree.

And he already had disciples at that point. And the disciples left him, they said, he's lost it. He's no longer practicing.

So all his disciples went away, and then he was left alone under a tree. He was no longer trying to get anywhere. And he sat under the tree, and he sat under a tree.

And that's where his realization happened. He had left the realm of becoming. And he found the dimension of being.

And now the question is, one could ask, as sometimes people have asked, would he have found this being dimension if he had not gone through the attempt at becoming for such a long time? Would he still, nobody can answer that question. Perhaps yes, perhaps no.

Was it necessary for him to do all these practices to come to the point of realization that spiritual awakening is not something that can be found in time in the future? We don't know. Some people might say, well, why didn't he start with that and sat under, just instead of going through all this, why doesn't he just sit under a tree?

Well, this is not how it happened. Perhaps he needed to go through this. Perhaps he needed time in order to realize that he did not need time.

And that is a paradox. You can't remove the fact that there is a paradox here, because we are operating on the level of becoming, and language itself is becoming on that level of time. But we are pointing to something that's beyond that.

And therefore, paradox arises. So that really is the, you cannot remove the paradox, but perhaps the story may help you that you may need time, a bit more time before you realize that you don't need it. And perhaps the time has come now.

You realize that you cannot awaken in the future. You can only awaken by going deeply into the present. This is really what is meant by that.

Perhaps one more question.

Hi, Kurt, I'm so grateful for the opportunity to talk to you today. I just want to say that your teaching found me at an important time in my life. And I'm so grateful for everything you did and for everything you're doing right now.

So my question is today, and it's interesting with everything you said, because I'm from a place of achieving a lot, and something happened to me, and I realized that it's not that important for me to achieve big thing in my life, instead of just being present to realize what I want to do with my life, with my time, with my husband and with my kids and everything. So I feel that all the foundation of what I did before just doesn't matter anymore. But my family and my colleagues and everybody tried to achieve so many things in their lives and in their work.

So my question is, I suffered from depression and burnout, and I feel that everybody around me are in that kind of state and a lot of anxiety. And so I'm wondering, right now, are we cluttering too much of our mind with so many information to become something that, I don't want to say that doesn't really matter, but how can someone arrive at something in their life that they want to do without cluttering their mind with so many stuff that you become burned out and depressed and anxiety are always in your day?

[Speaker 1] (29:22 - 42:07)

Right. Thank you. Thank you.

Yeah. So the most important thing is to be as much as possible rooted in the vertical dimension of life so that you're as present as possible. And sometimes as people realize, beginning to realize this dimension, sometimes they lose interest completely in achieving things in the outer world.

Some of this may be happening to you also, and that is almost a natural thing that happens to many people. Some people temporarily even lose the ability to do things because they become so so deeply immersed in being that they can't be bothered with achieving or becoming. I had a little bit, or not a little bit, quite a bit of that when I first went through a shift in consciousness.

For quite some time, I lost interest in future, my so-called future. In fact, I never really regained that much interest in my future, but I lost interest in planning and doing for a while. For many people, after a while, they realize that they still live in this dimension and to lead a balanced life, it is best not to completely ignore the demands perhaps that this dimension places upon you, the dimension of becoming and doing, the doing dimension.

You can regain your ability to do, but in a different way from before. Because before, when you do things without having this deep connectedness with being, then doing is all there is to your life, and you seek some kind of fulfillment through the doing. You're always like the famous thing, the carrot, the dangling a carrot in front of the donkey.

The donkey is running towards the carrot, but he doesn't know that he can never reach the carrot. So humans are sometimes obsessively consumed by doing, wanting to achieve some kind of success, which ultimately never satisfies for very long, and then the next thing comes. So there's a seriousness behind the way in which people are engaged in doing when this happens, they're very serious about it.

And stress, a lot of stress arises, which is bad for you, it's bad for the body, it's bad for your consciousness. Stress means you want to be there, but you are here. Basically, so the gap between there and here or now and then creates stress.

For example, you may be, you're in this particular location, maybe you're sitting in your car or whatever, but you need to be some other location, and you would rather be there, but you can't get there quite yet. So this mentally you create stress, there's a pull between here and there. I am here, but I want to be there.

It works on the dimension of time, this is now, but I want to be there then when I finish this, I need to finish this task, because I want to get to the end of this thing that I'm doing now, in order to arrive at the end of this doing. And you're projecting yourself mentally, you're more there than here, you're not completely present in what you do, because you want it to be over with, I want to, because there's the next thing to do after that, and the next thing after that, you never arrive really, because when you achieve this, there's the next thing that you're striving towards. This is not a healthy or constructive way of doing, and you're creating a lot of unhappiness for yourself and even others around you.

So people who live in that way, millions of people do, they make themselves unhappy, and they make others unhappy, whoever is around them. Some people are bosses of big companies, and everybody is under continuous stress, they're all ultimately, one could almost say insane, and miraculously the company still survives, but everyone is unhappy. And so when you're not motivated by this, how does the doing arise when you are rooted in being?

First of all, what you do might change, you may see that the things that you've been doing before are not really something that you truly enjoy, you might find something else that you enjoy. The level of enjoyment comes into the doing, the needing the outcome, lessons diminish, to need a particular outcome to your doing becomes secondary. Yes, I want to achieve this or get there, but you have the ability to actually be completely present in what you do, which means you even enjoy what you do in the moment.

The doing of the moment becomes more important than the place that you want to get to in the future. That is a sign that you become more conscious in your doing. And then it also does not mean that there cannot be intense energy to what you do, because you might have some wonderful project that you want to create, achieve, and there's this great enjoyment in the doing.

And you have to be very careful that the old egoic way of doing could reassert itself. And you can detect it, for example, when an obstacle comes in, because whenever you want to do something, you're likely to encounter occasionally obstacles to where you want to get to in the form of other humans or in the form of situations that you encounter, you get as a delay or people don't do what they're supposed to do, or you fail at something, an obstacle arises, and how you respond to an obstacle can give you good feedback of whether there's still egoic mindset behind the doing an obstacle, when an obstacle arises, when you're present is immediately accepted. Oh, and so you look at the obstacle, and then instead of focusing on what's wrong, or complaining about this, this human being, or instead of that, you immediately focus on the net, what's possible now.

So can I walk around this obstacle? Or can I transform it into something good? There's never a complaining, there's never, there's not a resistance, there's an immediately alignment with the present moment.

So you're not stressed when an obstacle appears, you don't get negative. When an obstacle you immediately you look at it, oh, and you know the obstacles are bound to appear in whatever work you do, you will encounter challenges and obstacles, and they're no longer something negative, that means you're present in what you do. So you're, the obstacle is transformed often into something helpful.

But it is suddenly it's no longer an obstacle. The most important thing then is what you want to achieve. Yes, you know what you want to achieve.

But it's secondary, because there's enjoyment in the doing. And if you achieve it, you're, it's fine, you're great, achieved it, it doesn't produce an unrealistic high in you. Wow, I have achieved it.

Because a few days later, you may experience a corresponding low. Because it hasn't satisfied you for long enough, whatever it may be. Another thing that is, there's a playfulness that comes a little bit of a playful attitude when you're engaged in doing.

The seriousness goes out of it. When you're present with what you do. And that's very important, because the, when you look at the world, people that kind of deadly serious in wherever you look, whether it's in business or commerce or politics, or wherever you, you look, they say, and that goes out, there is a certain detachment.

Because you don't need the externals to function a particular way for to make you happy. You don't need the outcome to make you happy. You don't need to have no challenges in order to be happy.

That's so a playfulness. This is the world of, you play in the world of form. Yes, there can be an intensity of doing, but not that's not the seriousness.

And then if somebody comes, you immediately will be get angry with them. This is so, so important. This is so important.

And you realize, nothing is that important. There are many things that are, they might be relatively important, but not absolutely important. So less attachment or no attachment to outcome, the result of the action, enjoyment of what you're doing.

When obstacles arise, there's no negativity that they produce, the obstacle is immediately accepted. And then enjoyment in the doing, and a playfulness, a playfulness, lack of dead seriousness, that changes. So you may find that you're able to do things, but the entire energy behind your doing has shifted.

So life is much more enjoyable. And there may be a period when you do very little, you just be, or you do just routine things, because there may be periods when you don't need to achieve anything. And there are some humans who, I call them frequency holders, humans who have no particular big project goal that they want to achieve.

They're happy with the little things in the present. And that's fine too, if they can sustain presence. For example, let's say you're a gardener, and you can sustain presence without losing presence.

And if you have routine activities, if you're not challenged, and you have routine activities, the danger is that you lose presence. Because when life goes too smoothly, let's say you're a gardener, you just want a peaceful life as a gardener, it's fine. Let's say you have 10 years of no challenges, you're just, you have a regular small, but regular income and a very peaceful life as a gardener, it might work for you.

There's a danger though, without any challenge, that gradually your degree of presence would diminish, because we need the challenges. Challenges come in two kinds. Challenges that you create for yourself, they're good too.

If you have a project, let's say you want to write a book or a song or whatever, that's a challenge you create for yourself, and that's good. Then there are challenges that you haven't created that come seemingly from the outside, and suddenly something appears, represents a big challenge in your life. So there's a self-created challenges, and they're good.

And there are challenges from outside. Both of them are very helpful.

Hello, podcast listeners, I am truly delighted to bring you this weekly series from someone I believe is one of the great spiritual thinkers of our time, Eckhart Tolle. These essential teachings by Eckhart will help you learn how to quiet your mind and understand the difference between your ego and your true self. If you're interested in living a fully present life, Eckhart's essential teachings can put you on a path to discover an enlightened state of consciousness.

I know this one thing for sure, Eckhart Tolle and his teachings have certainly enhanced and transformed my life. I hope listening to Eckhart as a podcast will create a riveting, instructive, and spiritual experience for you, all at the touch of your fingertips. In this podcast, Eckhart explains how challenging times have the potential to awaken us, whether it's political upheaval, the pandemic, or a personal crisis.

We all know it's pretty rare for people to evolve when life is going well. Eckhart says that it's actually adversity, not comfort, that pushes us to grow spiritually and awaken to the deeper dimension of who we really are.

Welcome. So, we're here to address the topic of living in challenging times, how to deal with sometimes extreme challenges, how to stay conscious when challenges arise. It is, of course, true to say that most of the time, life is experienced for most people as challenging, although there are sometimes interludes when everything seems to be going very well, according to plan, good things happen, you can relax, be happy, perhaps you've fallen in love, or you're just getting married, or you got a promotion, you're doing well professionally, a child is born, happy moments, happy interludes. It's wonderful when things are going well in one's life, but the strange thing is, there's always something that comes in sooner or later that seems to want to sabotage the things that are going well in your life. Some people take it even personally, and they think there's perhaps a God who has something against them, or they say, life in general is treating me unfairly, why do these things always happen to me?

Everybody else seems to be fine. Of course, that's a misperception. They may look fine if you look at their Instagram posts, and what they post on Facebook, but of course, as you may know, that's a facade, it's an artificially, mentally constructed image that people project into the world in order to get recognition, in order to get as many likes as possible, and then they feel strengthened and experience an enhanced sense of identity, and they may not realize that they are living ultimately a lie, that they are continuously projecting and living through a false, fictitious sense of self. Now, to some extent, that was already the case even before people invented social media and all those things, but this has now become amplified, the tendency to have a mental image of who you are, and to experience life and other people and events through this mental image of who you are.

It's a role that you've been conditioned to play, the roles vary from person to person, but almost everybody, unless they begin to awaken, become aware, awaken spiritually, almost everybody then plays without knowing it, so you become this entity. And ultimately, when you are unconscious, which means you are completely identified with this role, you are acting out a script, and if somebody lives with you, then they know that after a while they realize their behavior is quite predictable, and what you say tends to be always the same, it's a script that you mistake for who you actually are, the conditioning of your mind. And so, this entity, this mind-made sense of self that we could call the ego, is never happy for very long, and it tends to very much resent it when things go wrong in your life, in other words, when challenges appear, something that does not fit into the narrative of me, and so it is very common for people to complain a lot about their life, either mentally or out loud, when things happen, little things that seem to sabotage, even the smallest things, you miss the bus, you're stuck in the traffic, the ego is not happy most of the time with where it is and what it's doing, and so the challenges that arise in people's lives, now let's for a moment use another word. When things happen, it's usually something that feels more like what one could call adversity that happens in your life, something that's wrong. So this adversity is related to adversary, and so it's almost as if you were facing an enemy in the form of a situation, or an unpleasant person, or an event that either is not happening but should be happening, or is happening but should not be happening, so you experience adversity on a small scale, and from time to time on a large scale, large scale adversity and small scale adversity leads to suffering. The ego experiences it as unhappiness, and the adversity, the different forms of adversity that arise, they're basically, one could say, three types of adversity, one is adversity that arises in your personal life, in your immediate environment, to do with the people you know, the people you work with, at home, at work, wherever it may be, or some kind of illness that arises, or financial problems, relationship problems, and so on.

So adversity arises in your personal life. Then there's another type of adversity, and this is something that we want to focus on here in the next few sessions particularly, is adversity that arises on a larger scale in the collective of which you are a part. That is adversity that does not just affect you, but adversity that affects large numbers of people in your city, in your country, or even in the entire world.

So that could be, whatever it may be, it could be an earthquake, it could be a hurricane, it could be financial collapse, it could be a pandemic, a very relevant topic at the moment. So suddenly, you, not only you, but millions of others are faced with the same kind of adversity, and those things tend to be bigger things that arise that seem to sabotage, the little things that seem to sabotage your life on a daily basis. So you're sometimes faced with huge forms of adversity.

So we have those personal and collective. Sometimes the collective adversities that arise is so huge that you forget about your personal problems. Let's say there's a war somewhere that comes into your country, there's civil unrest, civil war, or your country gets invaded, or pandemic, complete financial collapse, and so on.

And suddenly, you may find that things that you've been worrying about recede into relative insignificance. And now there's a third type, but the third type is an element of all the others. The third type of adversity that is extremely common is adversity, suffering, you could say, that arises in your mind as a result of certain types of dysfunctional mind activity or thinking.

And that is very important to recognize in yourself and to ask yourself in any situation when you're experiencing adversity, suffering, unhappiness, is there actually something here that is causing me to be unhappy, or is my mind creating the unhappiness that I'm experiencing at this moment? And very often the unhappiness that my mind, if it is your mind, is creating at this moment is some type of fear. It's a very common form of suffering that people experience, fear.

So if you become more conscious of that so you can separate what it is that your mind is doing from what it is that's actually an immediate problem in your life, you can free yourself from a significant amount of unhappiness by recognizing that a huge percentage of the unhappiness in your life does not arise from situations that you find yourself in. Or that seems to be the case, but when you look more closely, you realize that actually the narrative that's arising in my mind right now is creating this emotion of unhappiness in me. A typical case is, of course, you wake up in the middle of the night and you begin to worry.

Why, or what's going to happen? It doesn't have to be the middle of the night, it could be anywhere during the day too. You suddenly feel worry.

What is worry? Worry is a certain type of mind activity and usually it means you're projecting yourself into some future moment that is critical. Worry does not concern the present moment.

When you have a problem or a challenge that arises in the present moment, you're not worrying about it, you're looking at it, and you may be required to take action, or you may look at the problem that arises in this moment and there's nothing you can do. And then, well, there it is. Worry usually implies future, projection into the future, which you cannot control.

There's nothing you can do about something that you imagine happening in the future, and that makes it even more frustrating. If it were happening in the present moment, you could take action, or you could say, well, I'll just have to accept the way it is right now, that's how it is. But if it's something that your mind has created, there's nothing you can do about it.

And so the mind projects itself and creates scenarios in which you find yourself, or people close to you find themselves, maybe your children, you imagine something happening to them, something happening to you, some kind of great loss that will diminish who you are, that will make your life unbearable. And it could be a big event, there's a problem of pandemic, what's going to happen to me, to my family, is it going to affect me, am I going to get ill, am I going to not be able to work anymore, am I going to die, and then you imagine yourself these things happening to you, and then you experience fear. So it's important to realize that the fear is not created by the situation, if you look at it really closely, the fear is created by the mind activity, by unconscious mind activity - when I say unconscious mind activity, by that I mean you're completely identified with the conditioned mind and what the mind does, you're in the grip of certain types of thinking.

And this type of thinking, and if it's worry, it creates an emotion that you experience in the body, this emotion is anxiety, fear. You can feel it in your stomach often, you can feel a contraction in your energy field, you might even feel that the palms of your hand become moist, it's a sign of extreme nervousness or anxiety, all kinds of things, that kind of emotion is actually very harmful to the body. Even mainstream medicine now recognizes that people who frequently experience the emotion of fear, anxiety, stress, have a greatly reduced immune system, it affects the entire functioning of your body, it interferes with the otherwise harmonious functioning of your body.

And the paradox is, the irony is, the sad irony is, very often that which you fear continuously, you tend to attract. So in the case of illness, one can see it more clearly, if you continuously worry about illness and you see yourself falling prey to some virus, and continuously we have this mental image, first of all the emotion that goes with it weakens your immune system. And also there's something else, the mental image of yourself as suffering from an illness tends to create, the mind is a very powerful creative instrument.

So the mind is capable of creating something that it projects into the world on a regular basis. You're more likely, not only because your immune system has been weakened, but also because you're projecting yourself as a person suffering from an illness, you're more likely to experience it in reality. So it's actually quite dangerous.

I'm not saying that will necessarily happen, but it is more likely to happen. And I'm also not saying that when you don't have this mental image of yourself being ill that you cannot fall ill at all, there are many other factors involved, but this is one important factor. Fear.

So you experience fear. And that's a very unpleasant emotion. The fear is, as I said, experienced in the body.

And the reason why the body is experiencing this emotion is that the body, which has its own intelligence, is pervaded with intelligence that coordinates the countless functions that every organ, every cell, cooperates with the totality of the body. And there's a vast intelligence that underlies the functioning of the body. This intelligence, although it cannot tell the difference between something that's happening actually in reality and something that's happening only in your mind.

And that's the reason why you experience fear. The body believes that when you worry, which means you're experiencing critical situations in your mind, you find yourself in this narrative, the body cannot tell the difference between the reality or just the mental creation. So the body reacts as if what you're imagining were reality, so it experiences fear.

If challenging situations were happening to you at this moment, the body would also experience perhaps this energy field that we call fear, but there would be a purpose to it. You would need this heightened energy in order to take action, so it wouldn't be trapped. Or it is possible that fear can paralyze you.

But potentially, when you're faced with a situation, then you need an influx of surplus energy and then fear has a place. It's not psychological fear. It is something that enables you to do something, to remove yourself or to fight.

Fight or flight is the word. But when you're worrying, then that is not the case, there's nothing you can do. So fear is extremely unpleasant and millions of people, majority of people still experience it.

And when things go wrong, adversity arises on a larger scale, either in your personal life or in the collective, then you experience even more fear than you would normally experience. So the first thing is to see whether it is possible to reduce, if not eliminate, the fear that you experience. Because then that would, a huge burden would be lifted off your shoulders if you were able to experience life with no fear whatsoever or at least with a diminished amount of fear.

So that is something very important that you can work on. When you experience fear, become aware of your mind activity, what is your thinking. And you will usually find there's a mental projection into a future moment that's very bad.

It could be for yourself, you might have a fear for other people, bad things happening to them. And the first step in becoming free of unnecessary suffering is to become aware of your mind, of your own mind. And then you will find that a huge chunk of suffering is produced by your mind rather than by the situation.

And now, the first thing is to recognize that that's a fact. Now this does not perhaps immediately free you because the mind has a certain momentum. But you begin to awaken when you recognize that actually right now, here and now, in this moment in which I find myself, there's actually nothing to fear.

And the weird thing is, that applies to almost every moment in your life. When I say every moment, what I really mean is, it applies to the present moment. And what is the present moment?

The present moment is the space in which your life unfolds, cannot unfold anywhere else. Everything unfolds in the present moment, there is never anything other than the present moment. Your life, what you call your life, is inseparable from the present moment.

The present moment is the space for your life. It is the space. Even when you remember the past and even when you're thinking about the future, you're doing it now.

And so, in the present moment, usually, there's nothing to fear. Yes, there can be something that's going wrong in the present moment, a situation that is challenging and you need to do something about it. And you do something about it.

If a wild animal came into this room, suddenly the door opens and a bear comes in, it's possible that we would experience, and I would experience, a moment of fear. You go, ahh. And after that, enormous energy is released, perhaps, in order for action to happen.

We can't predict what action that might be if a bear comes in. Maybe the best action would be to be totally still, or you remove yourself very quickly, who knows. Or make yourself as big as possible so that the bear gets afraid.

That's what they recommend when you go for walks in the forest here in British Columbia. If you find a brown bear, it might help to make yourself look bigger than you actually are. And you go, ahh.

So you're taking right action. It might work or it might not. Maybe the bear will not be fooled by it.

Maybe the bear will attack you. Maybe the bear will kill you. But this is a rare moment in which you're being challenged.

Most of the time, these things do not happen. Almost always, when you look at the present moment, which the only thing there ever is, in this moment, there is nothing to fear. Let's look at the virus, the pandemic.

We know that it's affecting many, many people. But in this moment here, is there something to fear right here and now? I'm breathing.

I'm looking around. I'm alive. I can feel the energy.

If you find yourself with symptoms arising that could mean that the virus has entered your body, or whatever it may be, headache, sore throat, then you say, well, it may be the virus or it may not be the virus. Then of course, again, the mind may come in and say, oh, am I going to die? So even when you experience the symptoms, if you could be focused on the present moment, then you just experience these symptoms.

And in addition to experiencing the symptoms, you can still experience the inner energy field of the body, because not every part of the body is feeling the symptoms. So you can feel the energy in your legs or your arms or your hand. And this is what it is.

And you come into a place of acceptance. This is what I experience now. It's a continuous returning your attention to the present moment, always.

And in the present moment, most of the time, you find that suffering or unhappiness or fear cannot survive in the present moment. And that's a very interesting realization. They cannot survive in the present moment.

And so the practice is for you, when you experience fear, become alert, become aware, and ask yourself, what's my mind doing? What are the stories that my mind is creating right now? Or has been creating for the past hour, the past two hours, the past two days?

And then you find, oh, it had created scenarios, critical scenarios, that are not happening but could happen. And so then, yes, there is a momentum behind that. There's a momentum behind those types of thought.

In other words, that type of thinking wants to continue in you because it is an energy field and it's part of the egoic consciousness, the ego consciousness. This energy field lives in you. It does not want to go away.

It wants actually to grow. It's possible for people to become completely absorbed in certain types of thinking. They obsessively think about certain things that are experienced as very problematic or awful and they cannot let go on almost every moment of their daily lives.

These are the more extreme cases, but it's not uncommon. Obsessive thinking. In other words, something has taken possession of your mind.

It's an energy field. It wants to grow. It's like a mental virus, not a physical virus.

Many people experience mental virus without knowing it, which means one thought grows, replicates, one could say, leads to other related thoughts. This bundle of thoughts has taken possession and almost anything that you think of is then colored by this bundle of obsessive thought that lives in you. But you're so identified with it that you don't even know that.

That is your reality and that's an awful way to live, not uncommon at all. In a minor form, everybody who does not have even a minimum of awareness of their mind, who is completely identified with their mind, experiences that to some degree, some people to a much greater degree than others, to be possessed by certain types of thought in your mind and you call it I. You're so identified with the thoughts that you call them me.

You are this bundle of thoughts. Who is speaking? When you speak, this bundle of thoughts uses your voice.

You are not even there. You are asleep, spiritually speaking. You are completely unconscious.

You are possessed by certain types of thinking which become part of your ego, your egoic consciousness. And then life becomes pretty unpleasant because in most cases, in virtually all cases, these types of thinking are not happy thoughts. The obsessive thoughts are unhappy thoughts.

I haven't yet met anybody who has obsessive thoughts like, isn't life wonderful? Life is so good. No, that's not an obsessive thought.

But life is dreadful. Look what they've done to me. Look at those awful people, whoever they are, whatever the nature of that thought is.

It has taken possession of you. And then now we need to look at something else. These are not ultimately your thoughts.

These thoughts you have absorbed, these thoughts from the collective. The hive mind is the collective mind. And this collective mind finds expression, yes, nowadays you can see it more clearly than you could before.

The collective mind already existed before we invented social media and the internet and so on. But now you can actually see the collective mind externalized in the internet and social media and you can also see the collective mind externalized in mainstream media. And so when you watch these things, wherever you do it, on your computer, on your television, on your phone, you watch these things and then you absorb certain thoughts from the collective hive mind.

They then cling to you and they become part of the thoughts that live in you. And you don't know that this has nothing to do with you. You have linked into the collective hive mind and then you express your opinions, but it's not your opinions, it's just certain thoughts that live in you.

So awareness is missing. That which frees you from this terrible fate of being at the mercy of the conditioning of your mind that creates so much unhappiness, awareness is the key that frees you from that. And awareness is the awakening of consciousness.

It begins with a simple realization that all the thoughts that go through your mind are not who you are. How do you know that? Because there is the ability in you to become aware of the thoughts that are happening to you because that's what it is, they are happening to you.

And then you no longer completely believe in the thoughts. You just see their thoughts. And then you can see very often, for example, as far as the hive mind is concerned, the craziness of many things that people say and speak about.

You can suddenly see, oh, a lot of what I see in the mainstream media, there's a lot there that's actually pretty crazy. The mainstream media then, and other forms of media too, and the internet and so on, are an externalization of the human mind. And they can also strengthen the fear that you would normally feel even without those things if you interact too frequently with those forms of the externalized collective mind.

If you watch too much television, if you watch too much social media, if you interact too much with it, then a lot of the things that are a cause of unhappiness in your mind are then amplified by what is absorbed from the collective mind. So you become even more fearful than you would be without all the social media and the mainstream media. You become even more fearful because they amplify what's already in you.

So it's extremely important, especially at these times, when you interact with the media, you become conscious of how unconscious most of these people are. You can watch the news, but more objectively, you can be there as an aware presence, and then you see how much fear-mongering there is. And they are not doing it on purpose, they can't help it, that's their job, they have to do it.

They are creating suffering, but they don't even know it. So first of all, you need to reduce the amount of time that you spend linking into the externalized collective mind, and social media, and mainstream media, and internet. And when you do interact, be very conscious of the fact that this is an expression, ultimately, most of what you see and read is an expression of human unconsciousness, of the ego, the personal and the collective ego.

So that you don't get hypnotized by, because it is a form of hypnosis almost, you get hypnotized by this type of technology and what is conveyed through it. Another interesting factor is when the hype that you experience, the fear that comes, the end of the world, there's a certain ambivalence in many people about the end of the world. On the one hand, they fear it, or some huge catastrophe, as you see in many movies, and these movies have been around for years, and many of them are very successful, movies that show huge catastrophes, collective catastrophes happening to humanity.

And so there's countless movies that have been made of that, and people love watching these movies, something draws them to the huge catastrophe. Yes, when it happens in reality, of course, there is an enormous amount of fear also, but there's an ambivalence, there's also an unconscious desire in many human beings for what we could call the collapse of the human-made world, because most humans experience the world as a burden, they have to live in this world, but the world is problematic, the world has a heaviness to it. You have your job, you have the taxes, you have money, and the world is complex and heavy, and there's an unconscious longing for people in what we might bluntly call the end of the world.

But ultimately, what they are longing for is, yes, it is a kind of liberation, but the ultimate liberation that they are really longing for is the liberation from themselves, the liberation from what they experience as their problematic, heavy sense of self that's inseparable from the so-called outer world. And so there's a longing in every human for that. But that's not going to happen yet.

Eckhart Tolle Confronting The Challenges of Our Present Time [f70ef6b8-d9fd-4b24-867f-fc7f67431fc6]

Confronting the challenges of our present time. In this episode, Eckhart encourages us to rise up to meet the challenges of the present time. He says the turmoil that exists here and around the globe is an opportunity to grow spiritually.

He explains most people do not awaken when they're in their comfort zone and it usually takes a push in the form of a crisis. He says if we're not challenged then the motivation to change is not there. He goes on to say that our external circumstances do not have to determine our fate.

He cautions against victim consciousness, which is what happens when we let the world or other people define our being. He says the most primordial fact is not what happens around us. It's to maintain our state of awareness.

Eckhart explains the only thing that can save the world is a shift in consciousness.

Particularly helpful, I would say, at this present time as we are finding ourselves in a time of global disruption, many global challenges arising and likely, it's likely that the challenges will remain with us and new challenges will come as we are moving into a period of global turbulence. And that's fine. It's a unique opportunity for spiritual awakening, a unique opportunity for disidentifying from the egoic mind and finding the transcendent dimension to who you are.

The motivation for awakening, for going deeper grows for human beings as the challenges grow. And this is a reason why this is potentially an auspicious time. When humans are not being challenged then the motivation to evolve is not there.

It's lacking because you're relatively comfortable in your little comfort zone. But when you're taken out of your comfort zone, when things get disrupted, a huge amount of uncertainty comes into your life. Loss comes into your life or the possibility of loss.

And that's often the same thing for people because the possibility of loss is a projected future. And you suffer just as much as if you were already in that situation, which may never happen. But all these things potentially become the motivating force for deep, profound inner change, for a shift in consciousness, for a step forward in the evolution of your consciousness, which is the consciousness of humanity.

So we need to rise up to the challenge of our present time because if we don't, or if you don't, then it will affect you in a very unpleasant way. You suffer more and more as already millions of people are experiencing suffering. For example, an enormous amount of fear in the collective energy field.

And so there's a disruption that occurs on the outside and there's also a disruption that occurs in human consciousness. The most important realization is to become aware of the fact that the most primordial thing in your life, ultimately the one thing that determines how you experience your life or your reality, determines how you respond or react to events and situations and circumstances. The most primordial fact is not what happens around you.

The most important factor is your state of consciousness, the state of consciousness with which you meet the circumstances of your life, the situation of your life. And so if people live unconsciously, they're not aware of this, it's very easy to become a victim of your circumstances. And many, many humans are victim of their circumstances.

What does that mean? Their inner state of consciousness is completely determined by the external world, by other people, by what happens on the outside, both their personal situation and the collective situation in the world. So they're at the mercy of circumstances.

Even on the smallest level, at the mercy of another human being, you meet another human being who is angry. If you are not sufficiently present, this human being who is angry will trigger the same emotion in you. And so you are at the mercy of somebody else's state.

It's just a small example and it happens all the time. And then you have the, whatever you absorb through the media these days, the mainstream media, social media. Mainstream media, for example, generates an enormous amount of emotion.

It's there because emotion sells. It sells people tune in. It has an almost addictive quality to it.

And so without knowing it, I don't believe the people who run the media, the mainstream media are probably not aware of what they're doing, but they themselves are in the grip of this collective energy field underneath the surface of things. And there's a huge amount of collective fear running through. And if you are not sufficiently present, then you have no immunity to what goes on around you.

And you are susceptible to catching, so to speak. I'm not talking of a virus because there's another kind of immunity that is of a different kind that is within your consciousness. You are then at the mercy of whatever mental virus is floating around in the collective energy field.

And without knowing it, it infects you. So you absorb by watching an excessive amount of news, television or whatever device you use, you absorb all that collective energy field that you can't see it. It's underneath the surface of things.

And you're then taken over by a mental emotional energy field. Without knowing it, you think that's you. You're identified with this collective energy field.

You've been taken over by what could be described as a virus, a mental virus, a mental emotional virus. And you find yourself in a state of either fear or a state of anger or anxiety. And so, when you identify with that state of anger or anxiety or fear, you become it, so to speak, or it becomes you.

It becomes part of your identity. And spiritually speaking, we call that unconscious living. To be unconscious is to completely identify with a mental emotional energy field.

Identify means you seek yourself in it. It takes you over. You don't know yourself except through that.

Your consciousness is completely identified with that energy. And that's a terrible state to be in. Now, a state of quite normal.

It's very important then when this becomes more and more unpleasant, fear grows, anger grows, then it's easier for humans to suddenly become aware of what's happening to them. And that is the motivating force that helps people to step out of the identification with the collective streams of emotional mental streams. That's the most vital thing.

You need vigilance so that you are not drawn into these unconscious collective energy fields, which are really very much like a mental virus collective. So there's an equivalent on a mental level to what we have on the physical level. On the physical level we have the virus that we all know about all over the world.

And the equivalent of that on the mental level is a virus of destructive negative thought forms and emotions that people get taken over by. And that makes life very unpleasant. It can also lead to an intensification of external problems.

When more and more people are being taken over by negative energy fields without knowing it, then they create in the external, they create whatever corresponds to their inner state of consciousness. So this is a time, a very critical time, but the most critical element of it as I see it, is not in the external. Yes, there are external problems, but more fundamentally it is a problem of human consciousness.

And it can only be tackled there. It's not possible to take wise action and make wise decisions out of a state of fear. Also many people want, they have good intentions.

They want to create a better world and that is wonderful. But if you neglect the causal realm which is your consciousness, then whatever you do on the outer, you might be very angry and out of your anger you want to create a better world. That's dangerous.

It's understandable, but it's dangerous because any action you take is contaminated by the energy field of anger and creates in Eastern terms would say creates more karma, more suffering. So the important thing for us is not to be taken over by the collective virus that's floating around and that's everywhere in the media and so on. So be very vigilant.

Vigilance is required. It's ultimately, and this is what meditation is all about and this is what healing is all about. Healing in a wider sense normally healing refers to physical healing, which is wonderful too, but the deeper healing is a healing of your consciousness, the healing of the fragmented consciousness, the healing of the suffering that arises when you completely identify with mental emotional streams that come to you.

They take you over. So then you identify with all your mental positions. You have political views, mental positions, and you derive your sense of self from your position and the other becomes the enemy.

It does not mean as you awaken out of that, it does not mean that you no longer have any mental positions. You continue to have certain views, for example with regards to the political situation or the social situation. You have certain views and that's fine.

It would be virtually impossible to say I'm now giving up all my viewpoints completely. I'm no longer having any viewpoint. You can't do that, but you can recognize a mental position as a mental position without deriving your sense of self from it.

Then when you become involved in a discussion with someone who holds for example in the United States at the present time, there's a huge division. It's almost like two gradually two universes are developing. They're separate.

There's a fragmentation and if you're unconscious which means you're identified with your mental positions then when anybody questions your mental position with an opposite mental position the person becomes your enemy. If millions of people live in that unconscious way civil disorder even civil war is not impossible. That means millions of people are so identified with their positions that they're completely unaware that they are being taken over by an energy field.

The answer is to become aware of the positions that your mind is taking and saying this is my position. You can then have a discussion with someone without making the other into an enemy without attacking the other either emotionally, mentally or even physically in the case of very unconscious people. You can have a discussion and perhaps you can arrive at some kind of you can meet at some point in the middle if you're conscious.

If you're unconscious which means completely identified with your mental position there's no meeting anymore. You cannot meet the other because the other is the enemy. The primordial problem and this is where the healing also comes in healing is really to be restored to wholeness not to be fragmented and lose yourself in the fragmentation of your mind.

So how does this happen? How can I have a mental position for example? Even I have certain positions obviously every human has with regards to politics.

I don't talk about them because who cares what my mental position is that's not important. I'm here to guide humans to a higher or deeper dimension where they are no longer completely identified with and absorbed by their mental positions their minds, their thoughts. Then you can have the thoughts but you have the thoughts exist within a greater wholeness which we could call the awareness and your identity lies in the awareness the presence, the consciousness not in the position of the mind then you can still have your position but you're no longer threatened in your sense of identity if somebody questions your position or contradicts and that's the essence of meditation also the essence of meditation is to find that to discover that transcendent dimension to who you are the being of yourself and you discover it as I speak there's an opportunity for you to realize this within yourself as I speak here and now this transcendent dimension to who you are the unconditioned being is something that you do not need to bring about through arduous discipline and you cannot generate it by being a good person it comes before all that it's already here at that level you are already complete perfect or to use this word whole whole you are already whole on the level of being you are already whole now that's an interesting word W H O L E whole on the personal level the conditioned mental emotional entity you are not whole there's a lot still that you could do and many things you cannot do you can improve your life on the level of the person of course it's a good thing to improve your life on that level but if you miss the fundamental dimension of the transcendent which is the spiritual dimension then nothing on the level of your personal self will ever ultimately satisfy you no matter what you achieve on that level it doesn't mean that you should not strive to achieve things it's a good thing to try and achieve things as a human being to learn new things, experience new things, to grow this is part of why you are here but it's not enough and in fact it's frustrating ultimately and not satisfying if you miss the more fundamental human task which is to awaken to the deeper dimension of who you are beyond the conditioned person and that's the healing that's the wholeness you realize on that level you are already whole healing and whole go back to the same root if you go back the etymology in English healing and whole go back to the same root which lies in Old English, Old High German and Norse which is Scandinavian language healing and whole go back to the same root sometimes wisdom is embodied sometimes in language if you follow it to its root so healing and whole have the same root and then there's another word that's part of that that comes out of the same root and that's the word holy so the word healing whole and holy have the same etymologically have the same root so you discover a dimension that has always been there is not subject to time discover a dimension within yourself that is also the realm of the holy and you cannot define that, holy points to the fact that you are intrinsically connected to the source of all life which traditionally is called God the holy points to that, holy is not a word that you will hear very frequently in our present civilization it's unlikely that the word holy has ever been used in the past few years on CNN MSNBC or Fox News very unlikely and the New York Times also haven't seen the word holy I've been looking for it a long time no, it's not there because humans no longer know even know what that means you can only get a glimpse of what that means within yourself beyond conceptualization when you go out into nature and you're in a state of pure awareness and you look at the totality of nature that surrounds you, no matter where you are trees or there's a landscape or there's the ocean or there's a mountain or just a field or even just a park or even just one tree you give it your complete attention then without labeling it, without analyzing it without calling it anything you give it your complete attention then you can sense that beyond that which you see in nature with your senses or what you can hear, see, hear take in with your senses there is an essence in nature there is a presence in nature that can only be described as holy and you're in a state of awe I like that word awe when you're in nature and you go and of course at that moment your mind stops, you're just conscious, you're not labeling what you perceive every sense perception is a surface reality but beyond the surface reality there's a deeper reality and you can sense this deeper reality which ultimately what is that?

it's the universal consciousness that manifests itself through countless millions of life forms but underneath it there is the one, ultimately the one consciousness, the one being and you can sense that when your mind is still you can sense that in nature and then you can sense that there's not a separation anymore between you and nature the same consciousness but different frequency, yes, is alive in you as you as the consciousness that manifests as a plant, a tree a flower and so you sense that that is the awakening that's the restoration of wholeness the wholeness of life when the fragmented entity, the ego subsides and you become restored to the wholeness of who you are this is what is needed for sanity to come back into human interactions the only thing that can save the world is this shift in consciousness this realization, it begins with you and it begins here and now and how does it begin here and now?

it begins, and I'm inviting you now perhaps it's already happening in you but you're not quite aware of it it begins with a moment of no thought but just pure presence of beingness like now that's meditation meditation is thinking subsides awareness remains and when thinking subsides the entire self what we could call the self the egoic self the person the personality also subsides because it's created by the movement of thought so when thinking subsides even for a moment in that moment the conditioned entity the personality also subsides and something else arises and there are many names that we could use to describe that something else that arises that is much deeper much more fundamental than the person many words have been used over centuries and millennia to describe this the most neutral term you could use is the being of you or the beingness of you it could also be called the Atman the innermost the divinity within this is from Indian spirituality the Atman now Jesus had certain words for it he called it sometimes he called it the kingdom of heaven which is a dimension of consciousness it's not something you can see it's here or it's there he clearly said you can never say it's here or it's there because it's inseparable from who you are so the kingdom of heaven is another term you can use to describe that dimension the entire teaching of Jesus was about finding that dimension within sometimes he called it other things he also called it eternal life and he said I want you to have eternal life my teaching is this, eternal life what does that mean? it doesn't mean that the person goes on and on eternal means timeless the timeless dimension of who you are and then the Buddha came and the Buddha refused all positive terminology like kingdom of heaven or the Atman or eternal life because he knew that humans would fall into the trap of transforming any positive statement into a mental idol so he refused to make any positive statements he used only negative statements he denies everything that is ultimately not it so Buddha described it as the no self this is the no self and that's the ultimate teaching of the Buddha to discover within yourself the ultimate unreality of the person the personal sense of the egoic sense of self which also Jesus said when he made the important statement deny thyself that wasn't the Buddha Jesus said it deny thyself deny yourself meaning deny is a strange word here it doesn't mean that you say I don't exist that's not it deny means as he uses it recognize the unreality of the self that you thought you were that is the denial of self deny thyself recognize that ultimately that is not really who you are this is just a surface phenomenon you find that it also has its place you have to live with it for a while but the deeper dimension is that that is not who you are

Eckhart Tolle Conscious Creativity [ff3a9733-4bc2-4c1b-8e3d-0505e0dd32ac]

Conscious creativity. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about overcoming obstacles to conscious creativity. He explains, we may have a vision of what we'd like to create, but when we try to express ourselves, the ego kicks up resistance.

Eckhart says, we feel attacked by inner voices, such as, who do you think you are? You're not ready for this. And then we self-sabotage.

He explains how we doubt our talent and give in to our fears. Eckhart says, when this happens, we must recognize it as the voice of the ego. And in those moments, we should practice presence.

He shares, we need to release our negative thinking, allowing the creative process to flow through.

Hi, Eckhart and everybody here. Such a wonderful thing to be here with all of you and be here with you, Eckhart. I'm so grateful.

My question is this, it says, I have long since had a clear vision of what it is I'd like to create in this world, and this vision, it lives inside of me, and it continually brings me such exquisite delight beyond description. It is as if it already is, very much to me. That said, when I begin taking the necessary steps to begin bringing it into creation, into manifestation, I oftentimes, I experience gripping egoic contractions, some resistance in me, panic and self-sabotage come into play.

And at times, it can feel as if there's a war going on inside of me. How can I best offer myself to the situation at hand?

Thank you. Thank you for your question. Would you describe that as fear?

Those are fearful states? That's basically what you're describing, that which is sabotaging you and creates certain thoughts. Would you describe the underlying emotion as fear?

[Speaker 2] (2:14 - 2:52)

I guess so. It's as if these very kind of reactive things come up in me with such tremendous force that kind of seem to pull me back down into that. Yeah, I guess it is fear, because it's into that safe sense of the familiar.

But what's familiar isn't, is suffering. Suffering is familiar. So these things, they keep me just kind of held down a little bit, and I wanna give myself fully to it.

[Speaker 1] (2:56 - 3:10)

Are you referring to something external that you have a vision of that you want to create, or do you want to share with us what it is, or would you rather keep it private?

[Speaker 2] (3:11 - 5:03)

No, I'm happy to share. So I had these tremendous awakening experiences when I was around 17. I've always loved music.

I play music. But I want to connect with as many people as possible on as deep a level as possible. So basically to share that deepest nameless truth through music primarily.

There's also been, I've also been leading meditation groups for years now, and I also see part of the vision as being a speaker. And then also in the last couple of years, there has been a woman has come into the picture who has a child, and I would like so much to be able to fulfill that role of being a provider and a family man. I have never needed much.

I've always had plenty just for myself, but I've been a caregiver all my life. I've never really pursued money, career plan in that way. I've just cared for people, and that's been a good part of my spiritual practice.

And so now it feels as though I'm embarking on this new chapter and want to share through music and speaking. But I grew up around a lot of drugs and poverty, and difficult things like that. And so, pretty extreme dysfunction in family.

And so it's been a lot of pretty unhealthy behavior patterns and mental patterns ingrained in me pretty deeply from early on. So I've spent a lifetime kind of unpacking and I'm- Yes. Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (5:03 - 11:00)

Yes. So there's one good say, there's two of you there. One is the conditioned entity with its very limited patterns, mind patterns and reactive patterns.

So they're all part of the ego. As long as you're completely identified with them, they are part of the ego. When you're no longer completely identified with them, they are just remaining patterns.

You're on your way to freedom when you're no longer completely identified with the patterns. In other words, they don't take you over completely. You're able to observe them.

So to continue to realize that there's two of you, there's the unconditioned, aware, conscious being, the self that is emerging, but the old conditioned patterns don't want it to emerge because they realize, well, it's also, I'm saying they, but ultimately, yes, there are many patterns, but together they form the ego. So the ego, as you know, is afraid of disappearing. It wants like everything in existence wants to remain in existence.

Everything that is every life form wants to remain as this form, but it cannot remain as this form. So the question is, and it's not a battle. So the awareness is not something that would need to fight the ego.

You cannot fight the unconscious patterns in your mental, emotional field. You can only be aware of them and not be taken over by them. It begins with when a thought comes into your head that is a thought of fear or doubt or questioning yourself, whatever it may be, not to believe in every thought that arises.

You don't have to believe. It's just, it's a thought that arises. It may be a complete lie.

In many cases, thoughts are complete misinterpretations of events, other people, yourself. Many people live with a self image that is just a completely erroneous narrative, but they believe in it. They are it.

So there's the arising awareness and on top of it, there's the conditioned entity that feels threatened. And so it's important for you to realize that who you essentially are, and that is the aware presence. And when obstacles arise in the form of thoughts or reactions, to be able to be aware of them and realize you don't need to act on them.

You need to just observe them and realize what they are. So to recognize what they are, it's a conditioned thought. And some conditioned thoughts have been there for a long time, for decades.

Sometimes the same kind of thought comes up again and again. And when it arises, do you lose awareness? Does the thought, the conditioned thought obliterate your awareness temporarily?

Perhaps it sometimes does, but vigilance is very important. Vigilance is part of being aware. To be vigilant is to be acutely aware, to be acutely present.

So when you are, let's say you want to give a... You mentioned music and perhaps helping others by speaking. Let's say you want to have a speaking event.

So you, and you put something online to say that I'm going to speak, please join me. But, and then while you're typing into this, you're in doubt suddenly, am I ready for this? Can I do it?

And then you have this, I'm just imagining, because I know the human mind. It doubts you, it says, no, you can't, you shouldn't. Who do you think you are?

You're not ready for this, you have to wait. And a good thing to know is when you, when these thoughts come is to realize they're egoic thoughts and say, thank you for coming up and realize that you'll never be ready for a spiritual teaching. You will never be ready to be a spiritual teacher, but you have to get out of the way so that the teaching flows through you, but you cannot do it.

So if you think you can do it, then you're right, you can't. For the teaching to happen, you need to step out of the way. You need to, and you do that by cessation from thinking.

There's a state of clear, spacious presence. And then you become comfortable with not knowing what to say. And so you are not doing it.

It happens, the universe speaks through you. It happens through you. And with music, I don't know what form that takes for you, but there may be opportunities that you have not taken advantage of and so on because of fear.

And again, it's the deep enjoyment is very important part of that. When you, I assume that you experienced that, when you, what music do you play?

[Speaker 2] (11:01 - 11:27)

I play acoustic guitar and sing and write songs, but I also have taken on producing stuff at home and doing stuff that's a little bit more beat oriented as well. So it's mostly taken format that I think the focal point of it is the kind of presence through singing. And so it shines through my voice the most.

[Speaker 1] (11:28 - 42:19)

Yes, very good. Thank you. Yeah.

Well, whether or not you even need to manifest to have a vision of where you want to go with your music, in some cases, people do practice that. They have a vision of where they want to go and others simply deep enjoyment of what they're doing. And they continue to do what they're doing.

And then at some point it grows and grows and grows. You reach suddenly a point where you're riding this wave and it suddenly grows. And I haven't had any visualization or anything that I want to achieve for many, many, many years.

So I'm simply happy with how things are unfolding. And I'm happy with the present moment. I have no vision of where I want to go with the teaching in the next few years.

I may not even be around, who knows. So I'm quite happy with things unfolding. And that is also a way of manifesting.

Manifesting doesn't always mean that you have a clear vision of what it is that you want to achieve. Sometimes that is fine and works. But to be in a state of appreciation of life, in deep alignment with the present moment, so that you're not in an antagonistic relationship with the present moment anymore.

You're just deeply aligned with the flow of life in the now and you appreciate everything that is and the things you do. The things you do, you do them fully. You give your fullest attention to what you do.

That's another obstacle of many people. They somehow are not able to give themselves fully. They're not, there's something holding back.

There's something that's holding them back. You can sometimes see it with people who are on stage or sometimes singers or musicians. You can sometimes see they're not the full, there's not the full energy is not there for some reason.

Perhaps they're afraid for some reason of, they may be afraid of giving themselves fully. So to be fully in what you're doing, to give your fullest attention to what you're doing in the present moment is a very powerful way of manifesting. But whether or not you have a vision that you project and you feel it's already happening, the vision can only work if you continue giving your fullest attention to the present moment and to enjoy the energy of what it is that you are producing in the present moment that empowers the vision.

The vision is always, the point of power is always in the present moment. A great obstacle for achieving a vision or any success is to be, and this almost sounds paradoxical at first until you begin to understand it, is to have an excessive attachment to the outcome. That's a huge hindrance.

Now you might think, well, if I have a vision of what it is I want to achieve, would it not be natural for me to be attached to the outcome that I want to get there? I want to reach millions of people with my music and I want millions of people to feel better by listening to my music, perhaps to get a glimpse of presence by listening to my music. That's a great vision, but the mastery of this lies in not attaching yourself to the vision so that you lose consciousness in what you are doing and it gets dissipated into the vision which ultimately is a mental thing.

The point of power is always in the present moment. Excessive attachment to the outcome, one could almost say any real attachment to the outcome weakens your ability to manifest. I give the example of a pilgrimage.

Let's say you're on a pilgrimage. Life could be regarded as a pilgrimage or journey. And you know where you're going.

You want to go to whatever it is. You pilgrimage to a holy site. In medieval times there were pilgrimages to Rome and other sacred places.

Now, the very purpose of pilgrimage is to bring about a transformation of who you are, transformation of consciousness. The arriving is relatively unimportant. Arriving at your destination is just a short moment and there you are.

But the journey is how conscious are you of the step you're taking at this moment. If you're excessively attached to the outcome, which in this case would be your destination, then you're mentally, you already want to be there. That takes away from the quality of your step at this moment.

Now the step stands, it's an analogy for whatever it is you're doing at this moment. And quality means how much consciousness flows into what you're doing in this moment. So if you are dissipating it and you lose yourself in an outcome that you need, you're expecting ultimate fulfillment through the outcome.

That is a hindrance and a delusion. And many people who have achieved so-called great things in the eyes of the world, things that are called great in the eyes of the world, a lot of the time are not great at all. A lot of things, they have achieved it and then it became after initial elation, I made it.

After an initial elation, they experienced a very deep disillusionment, a very deep disillusionment with fame, with wealth. And many of them became more unhappy than they had ever been before. Because there was an excessive attachment to outcome as some future point will provide me with the fullest version of myself.

It doesn't happen. So you make it. And so there are many people who make it in the eyes of the world.

And this is the very thing that makes them extremely unhappy and they can't even take refuge anymore and say, oh, okay, it's going to get better in the future. They have arrived already, where do you go if you have all the things that people believe are signs of the ultimate success in this world? And now you have your private jet waiting for you.

You have your big houses in various places. You can do anything, go anywhere, have any sensory experience, feel important because people admire you. So you see yourself in magazines and so on.

And you're not, you're unhappy because you never learned to go into the vertical dimension of life and realize that fulfillment cannot be found in, this is the manifestation can only be successful if you do not expect to find yourself in whatever you want to manifest. You need to treat it as a play. Leela is a word used in Indian philosophy, spiritual philosophy, the divine play.

It's a, you play with form. There's not, whether or not it happens is a secondary and relatively unimportant thing when you're already deeply rooted in the aliveness of the present moment. That's where it comes from.

And then you give your fullest attention to the step you're taking at this moment instead of continuously losing yourself in your destination. And if, because if you're losing, if you're mentally lost in your destination, the quality of the step you're taking at this moment decreases. If the quality is something that is hard to, you may not know what I mean when I say quality.

It means how much consciousness is in it. There can be quality in the slightest thing you do because it means, are you doing it simply as a means to an end or are you giving your fullest attention to what you're doing? So many people are held back because they have excessive attachment to outcome.

For example, that's one of the main teachings of the Indian Bhagavad Gita, the wonderful, one of the great books of Hinduism. If you haven't read it, you should, Bhagavad Gita. And it talks about the importance of not looking to the fruit of your action.

So be completely present in the action, but renounce the fruit of the action. So that is a secret of successful manifestation. You know, and again, coming back to my analogy of pilgrimage, yes, there's a certain importance in your destination, but it's not the ultimate.

The destination, it's a good thing to have a destination. You know where you want to go. You know the direction in which you want to go.

So you're conscious of that, but your fullest attention is in the present moment. This is a reversal of normal living. In normal living, your awareness of the present moment is peripheral and because you are so much more concerned with where you want to get to or your past or the future, and you're hardly aware of the present moment.

It's just peripheral. That gets reversed. Your awareness of where you want to get to continues to be there in the periphery of your attention, like a person on a pilgrimage.

You know where you're going. Let's say you're in Spain, northern Spain, going towards Santiago de Compostela, and it's fine, you want to arrive there, but this step you're taking right now, this is what the ultimate, that's the whole journey consists of one step at one time. The entire life journey consists of the step you're taking at this moment.

And what is the quality of the step you're taking at this moment? What is the attention that you give it? Give it your fullest attention.

Then that is the transformation of happens through the journey of you become more and more present. And then finally you arrive. Oh, fine.

And where do you go from there? Well, you're not going to be there for that long. Then you have to go somewhere else.

If that was the ultimate, it's you're going to be very disappointed by the things that you achieve. Oh, is that it? And I've been looking forward to this for years.

Is this really it? And of course it's not it. It's the present moment is it.

That also means if for some reason you should not arrive at your destination, maybe you die before you can get there or something else happens, who knows? Maybe something else prevents you. Suddenly there's a pandemic that suddenly stops you in your tracks.

So you don't make it. It's almost irrelevant whether or not you arrive at the destination. Because the important thing was the journey, the step at this moment that brings about the deepening into the vertical dimension, whether you arrive or not, who cares?

Well, it's a nice when you arrive, it's fine. But that is not that which liberates you, that frees you, that gives you ultimate satisfaction. It cannot.

And so you become liberated from needing to arrive somewhere. Then you regard it as something that you, in this world, you play with form. It's a play of form.

And yes, the universe may want to create something through you and maybe it will. And when it is, it's lovely, it's beautiful, but it's the act of creation, not the final product. Because the final product of any creation is already the beginning of dissolution and the level of form.

Let's say you write a great bestseller. Okay, and where do you go now? Okay, you have to write another one.

Okay, and then is it going to be as good as the first one? Probably not, or maybe it is. There are many people in this world who feel they haven't arrived.

That's a common disease, it's a misconception. They feel this sense of lack. There's also a syndrome that's called, somebody told me a while ago, it's called the fear of missing out.

The fear of missing their field, that's something, my life has failed. The terrible fear, or I haven't made it. I haven't achieved my goal.

And maybe it's too late. The mind says too late to achieve it. Or you have all kinds of narratives that are created on the basis of that misperception.

So the important thing is ultimately what you achieve in this world is secondary. Your greatest achievement is to be conscious now. Is to realize this vertical dimension of being, to become aware of being.

That is the awakening. That is your greatest achievement. Then the universe wants to awaken.

Otherwise you couldn't awaken. The universe was creating millions of life forms, manifesting continuously, increasingly complex life forms on this planet, many other planets, millions, billions of planets, and billions of life forms even on this planet. It creates life forms, gradually manifests more consciousness.

That's one, the universe wants that. The universe also wants to, one could call it the dream of creation, the dream of form. The consciousness loses itself in the forms.

It loves to experience that. And the universe gradually grows and becomes more conscious. And at some point, this expansion into multiplicity and complexity, increasing complexity, this expansion of the world of form, this is the outward journey.

At some point, that reaches a point where suddenly the universe begins to awaken out of the dream of form. It had lost itself in every form. Every form experienced itself as autonomous in the human form too.

You were lost until you began to awaken. You were lost in the dream of your life. And that was, you derived your sense identity from that.

The return movement, as I call it, is the awakening of the universe where it becomes aware of itself. The one consciousness becomes aware of itself. And that's, we have it, we're at this point now where the outburst of the universe is approaching the end.

I'm talking mystical terms. Don't be too concerned about it. Science cannot verify this.

The outburst of the universe has come to an end and the universe is beginning to breathe in again where the multiplicity of things returns to oneness, complete oneness. Now, in our terms, that would happen in several billion years from now where the big bang was the expansion and then there's a contraction in physical terms. Physical term is only the surface of things.

It's like the beating heart too, the way your heart beats, it goes. The in-breath and the out-breath. These are the two movements and you find these in yourself too.

There's a tendency in you, you want to do things and create things, but you also want to be. And it's more fun, the being is becoming more important for you now. And we're at the point where you can bring the two together.

I wrote about that a little bit in the New Earth. You can bring the two together, the awakening consciousness, that you become aware of yourself as the underlying being. And from there, you can cooperate with the universe, co-create and create whatever it is that you want to create in this.

Ultimately, it's not you because you as a separate entity do not exist. It's you as an expression of the one, then the one expresses itself and creates through you. But if that sounds too complicated, it's the important thing is to realize, coming back to practical things, to be very careful of not attaching yourself to some outcome and to very careful not to fall into the delusion that your sense of self-worth, for example, let's put it like that, depends on achieving a particular outcome in the world of form.

Now, that's a big one. So that your sense of self-worth does not depend on what you know, what you can do, what you have achieved, how you look, what you possess. All these things are usually used by people to determine their sense of self-worth, what you own and what's mine, the ability, I can do this, but other people can't do this, my body, how my body looks better than others for some people for a while until it doesn't, what you know to be identified with some kinds of knowledge and opinions.

So you derive your sense of self-worth from one or several of these achievements, what have I achieved? And you look back, and that's a delusion because you cannot find your ultimate sense of self, which is self-worth and self is the same thing. In any of these things, they are nice when they happen to be appreciated.

Oh, that's nice. It's very nice. It's not the ultimate thing, and it probably won't last.

It'll either leave you or you will leave it, or it no longer functions as something that gives you satisfaction. It could suddenly turn into its opposite, something that makes you unhappy. So your sense of self or self-worth is derived from a more immediate place.

And that is what I sometimes call, as you know, the vertical dimension where you become aware of yourself as the aware presence. You are say something in you that's far deeper than the person. That is the ultimate source of satisfaction in life.

What is that then? It's to know yourself as consciousness. Consciousness becoming aware of itself is the ultimate source of satisfaction in life.

Oh, you're free of the person. It's still there, but you don't look for yourself in it anymore. The ultimate source of satisfaction is found in the present moment.

And that is the secret. And that the Indians knew that, the Indian teachers, and they described that realization, which is an awakening relation, by using the three words, stringing them together. There is one word, they have come from Sanskrit, Sat, Chit, Ananda.

Three words strung together as one word. Sat, Chit, Ananda. Sat, Chit, Ananda.

Sat means being. Chit means consciousness. Ananda means joy or bliss.

Sometimes it's right, it's bliss. I call it joy. Now these three are three facets of the same thing or no thing.

Being, Sat, Chit, consciousness. Sat and Chit together. Being and consciousness means the awareness of being conscious.

Being is Sat. Being, consciousness, joy. They're one thing.

It is the joy of knowing, of being conscious of your being. It's all one thing or no thing. It's not a thing.

Sat, Chit, Ananda is the realization, being consciousness bliss, to be aware of yourself as the conscious being. That is a joy. That's the liberation from the person.

And then you can play around with the person. It's fine. And that's where your sense of self-worth arises because it's not the self in the conventional terms.

It's the consciousness, what the Buddha called spaciousness or emptiness, spaciousness. And the Buddha also called it the non-self. But that is what we are talking about.

It's the ultimate realization. So I'm mentioning that because it's very important because otherwise, even if you master to some extent, the art of manifestation, if you don't know the underlying truth, even that will make you unhappy, ultimately. Even if you achieve what you set out to achieve, it's not going to fulfill you for very long.

There's a saying, I don't know who said it, who first said it. There's two ways of being unhappy. One is not getting what you want and the other is getting what you want.

Now, getting what you want makes you happy for a little while until it doesn't. But if you were not attached to the outcome, not to the, as the Bhagavad Gita says, not attached to the fruit of the action, then whatever the fruit of the action is can be enjoyed for what it is. Oh, nice, very nice.

Knowing that it's not going to last, nothing lasts, and you might not even be that interested anymore after a while. But while it's there, it's very nice, enjoy it. So I need to mention that because sometimes when you read about manifestation, there are books, there are good books about how to manifest.

Some of them omit the most important part, and which is what we've just been talking about. And that's the very foundation for your life. And by omitting the most important part, people who achieve these things are not made happy by the achievement.

In some cases, as I said, they're even more unhappy than before because after that, what else can they look forward to? In the eyes of the world, once you have your private jet and your many houses and your yacht and your whatever it is that people think to determine success, adoration of others, look, everybody loves me. Then that's a trap.

That's not it. So the self-esteem, I'd told the story a few years ago, I read it a long time ago. The Dalai Lama was answering questions and somebody asked him a question about self-worth or self-esteem.

He said, many people have a problem with self-worth or self-esteem. Can you please comment on that? And then, of course, he said, what is self-worth?

And then he asked his interpreter to explain, what is self-esteem or self-worth? And the interpreter was talking to him for several minutes and he still didn't get it. Talking, trying to explain, he just couldn't get what self-worth or self-esteem was.

Because he doesn't, he does not derive his sense of self from his position. You can see it when you listen to him that he's not attached at all. He does not derive his sense of importance from his...

One would think if you're the Dalai Lama, you must feel really important. You have achieved a great thing. Well, he hadn't even achieved it.

From birth, he was already, well, soon after he was born, he was already chosen. But no, he didn't have, and it was almost impossible for him to understand that people have a problem with self-esteem because his sense of worth, it does not derive from externals, from position, in no conceptual sense of self, but a deeper sense of self, not a conceptual sense of self. It's all connected.

Not to be lost in a conceptual sense of self that's associated with things that you achieve. And then the things that you achieve improve temporarily your conceptual sense of self. And then you derive your identity for a little while, an enhanced sense of identity from your conceptual sense of self because you add your so-called achievements to who you think you are.

And again, it doesn't last. So the basis for all is, again, it's all very simple. The step you're taking at this moment, give it your fullest attention.

The present moment is no longer relegated to the periphery of your consciousness. It becomes a focal point of your consciousness. What is relegated to the periphery of your consciousness is your destination, but you still have one.

It's good to know where you're going. To some extent, you have some kind of direction in life. You have a goal.

It's not bad to have a goal in life. That's the place on pilgrimage. You want to arrive at that site of where you, the holy site or whatever it is.

You have that goal and that's fine. But in the meantime, the journey, the step you're taking, what is the quality of the step you're taking at this moment? That's the ultimate.

And if that is of high quality, then you can be assured, even if you do not practice any specific manifestation techniques, even if you do not practice them, you can be fairly assured that the so-called future will look after itself in a harmonious way. If you give your fullest attention to this moment, and because this moment is very deep, this moment is inseparable from who you are in the essence of your being, because ultimately what we call this moment is the consciousness of this moment, the consciousness that underlies everything. I needed to say this because we do not want you to become a master at manifestation and still be unhappy when you manifest what you wanted to manifest.

So we are silent for a moment, realizing our essential being as the one consciousness. You are that. I am that.

Oh, so liberating to know that. Thank you. Thank you to all of you.

Eckhart Tolle Conscious Relationships [3aecbd28-fffd-4303-9193-ad81016a6bb6]

[Speaker 6] (0:00 - 0:20)

Conscious relationships. In this podcast, Eckhart talks to an international audience in Greece. He brings his renowned wisdom to everyday concerns, like how to quiet an overactive mind, what is the best way to set boundaries with friends and family, and how we can use the practice of presence to create conscious relationships.

[Speaker 1] (0:23 - 0:31)

Let's have the first question. Somebody has been chosen. Take your time.

One step at a time. There you are. Hi, Eckhart.

[Speaker 5] (0:32 - 1:05)

Eckhart, you said very frequently to observe the mind and to detach from the mind and let it go. But sometimes, you know, personally I observe the mind and I see sometimes how it drains my own energy. It's like the mind has its own intelligence, and it knows my weakness, and sometimes it becomes so aggressive, so demanding.

So I would appreciate it if you tell us how to deal with this kind of situations.

So the mind has a momentum of its own, but seems to be the case that you are aware of that. So this is already a gain in consciousness, because you are aware of what your mind is doing. The question is, are you usually aware after a very noisy mind movement?

Are you aware in the moment of it happening? Or do you become aware after a certain mind movement has exhausted itself? Are you aware while it happens?

[Speaker 5] (1:42 - 1:42)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (1:43 - 1:44)

While it happens.

[Speaker 5] (1:44 - 1:46)

I'm aware that this is not me.

[Speaker 1] (1:46 - 1:47)

Right.

[Speaker 5] (1:47 - 1:51)

But it's so demanding. Yes. Sometimes I cannot control it.

[Speaker 1] (1:51 - 12:54)

Right. And does that become sometimes speech when you're communicating, and it goes, it uses your voice, and then you speak to people, to your mind, then makes you say, speaks through you, right? Yes.

And I know it's not me. Right. When it happens.

Right. Okay. Well, that's already a big step forward, because if you were completely identified with your mind, you wouldn't even know it, you'd be totally it.

It is not possible by willpower to stop your mind. It can only be done by heightening your power, your witnessing power, so that the mind loses some of its momentum. It might take time.

And I would recommend that you start with little things when it's a relatively small event, where your mind is speaking through you. It may also happen that there's nobody around you, but you are speaking, the mind is speaking to itself. You also experience that.

Yes. And that can be also quite a very extremely dramatic things happen in people's minds, without anything dramatic happening externally. But you know that this is happening.

Ask yourself if you have a choice. Do I have a choice? And let's find out if I have a choice.

Ask yourself, am I able to take attention away from the mind? Because the mind is, as you know, is very cunning. It's tricky.

It will come up with all kinds of reasons why it is not a good idea to step out of the mind now. You really need to think about this. This is a real problem.

Although it's four o'clock in the morning, you need to think about a bit more about this. It is vitally important. You're in the grip.

But if you have some awareness there, then you can see whatever reason the mind gives you is just a way to stay in control. And then you say, okay, let me try if I can just, I see it is futile from the level of awareness, you can see it's futile. Am I able to take one conscious breath right now when this happens?

First, you have to see the futility of it. It's that it ultimately serves no purpose except to strengthen the egoic self. Am I able to take one conscious breath in between all this mind activity?

Find out. And I believe you can. One conscious breath means you breathe in.

And while you breathe in, you observe the inflow of air into the body. Then there's a stop. Then you observe the outflow of air out of the body.

And then there's a stop. That is a huge success. You were able to take in the midst of all this mind stream, you were able to take one conscious breath.

That's a big win. And if you were able to take one conscious breath, which by the way, to connect with what I've been talking about just now, immediately, one conscious breath brings about a small gap in the mind stream and brings about a deepening. You go, the breath gives you access to this inner space.

So you go down into and then you come out again. And then the mind may immediately start up again, or you may find that if I can take one conscious breath, perhaps I can take another one. You have to experiment, regard yourself, your psychological experiment, regard yourself as you're conducting psychological experiments with yourself.

So after the one conscious breath, perhaps I can take one more. Yes, then you might feel at the back of your mind, a certain push, a force, the mind wants to come back in by push. You keep it out by a high degree of alertness, so that I had to use the analogy, perhaps in the power of now or somewhere, a cat watching a mouse hole.

If you've ever watched a cat watching a mouse hole, that gives you a good illustration of what an alert state of consciousness is. A cat watching a mouse hole looks like for a long time. Now, I gave the example in the book somewhere.

This is not to be done when you're immersed in very violent mind stream, but at normal times, you can try this, you can try it now, this little experiment that goes like this. I wrote about it. I wonder what my next thought is going to be.

I wonder what the next thought is going to be. And then you're very alert, watching for the next thought. And if you're really alert, really alert, like the cat, you're really alert, the next thought does not come, because the alertness keeps it at bay.

And that's when you find this power in you, this power of alertness, which is an actual power, it's the power of consciousness itself, then you have something that is far more powerful than the mind. But they are not ultimately in opposition. The mind is a bit like, a turbulence on the surface of the water.

And the depths of who you are is the depths of the ocean or the lake. And where in the depths it's still, the turbulence is only on the surface. So they're not separate.

Your mind is not separate from consciousness. Your mind is a manifestation of consciousness, but a surface manifestation of consciousness. And so, when you have access to this power that I just illustrated, and you find in your own experience, a little experiment, what's my next thought going to be?

I wonder, let's wait for it. Hasn't arrived yet. Still no thought.

There's not just an absence while you're not thinking, it's not just an absence, there is a powerful presence there. And that is the light of consciousness. And only the light of consciousness is more powerful than the surface turbulence of your mind.

So, find in yourself, develop this, the inner muscle, so to speak, of presence, of alert presence. Do it when your mind is relatively calm, and find the presence by doing what's my next thought going to be, do some conscious breathing, feel the inner aliveness in the body, or just be, just be still. When you, when that, that's a huge discovery and a huge advance, if you can just be still by wanting to be still, and you just say, okay, I'll be still now.

This is kind of a graduate work, PhD in stillness, where you can simply step into alert stillness, because that's what you want. You want alert stillness and you go into, then you have really graduated and you, you're close to being a master. The only difference being a master and you, spiritual master and you, is that the master is able to step out of the stream of mind and be the presence.

That's all. There are many spiritual teachers, and there have been many spiritual teachers who were not particularly educated, and especially teachers who lived in the distant past, Jesus or the Buddha, almost certainly had less knowledge than any one of you, because there wasn't as much knowledge around, but it didn't matter because it's not, it's not to do with knowledge, to do with the power of presence of consciousness. So when you get a, an actual sense of what that this power is, then it can be there, even at times when the mind becomes turbulent, but you have to not be hypnotized or seduced by something that the mind is telling you and giving you some reason why this is not the time to do it. This is not the time to be present.

I need to think, I need to think, I need to think. My life is going to fall apart if I don't think, or it has some, there may be emotion behind it. Emotional thinking has an enormous power behind it.

It might be emotions connected with certain other human beings. And so you have, you get not only thinking, you get thinking that is being amplified by a huge burst of emotion, emotional thinking, and emotional thinking can be extremely unconscious. When emotion rises up into your mind and affects your thinking, also your ability to think rationality decreases enormously, and you can think all kinds of very dysfunctional thoughts based on certain emotions.

So it's a, it's a wonderful, the purpose of the rest of your life is this. Whatever else you do is secondary, whether you're doing your business or whatever you do, or whether you make a lot of money or not, it's all secondary. The purpose of the rest of your life is this, what I've just described.

[Speaker 5] (12:54 - 12:55)

Thank you very much.

[Speaker 1] (13:03 - 13:07)

Take your time. We're not in a hurry. One step at a time.

[Speaker 3] (13:08 - 13:56)

Thank you Akart, for your power of now. It has played a vital role in my life and it has taught me to hurry slowly. All right.

All right. I just want your suggestion regarding how you would handle if a close member of the family, you don't see eye to eye. For example, you want to get to the airport together.

You would like to start early, drive slowly and arrive safely. Whereas your partner, laid back, always late, rushes and then drives fast, not sure when reach. How do you manage?

[Speaker 1] (14:02 - 14:24)

I think quite a few people have a similar problem. That's it. Yes, it is a dilemma.

Have you had a conversation, not while this is happening, but at another time, have you had a conversation with your partner about this?

[Speaker 3] (14:25 - 14:39)

Not really. I mean, in the sense that there is a conflict between, you know, you're trying to become more aware, more cool. The other person is not really at that level as you are.

Yes. How do you manage?

[Speaker 1] (14:40 - 14:40)

Not easy.

[Speaker 3] (14:43 - 14:44)

That's why I ask this question.

[Speaker 1] (14:44 - 14:50)

Let's not fool ourselves. No, your partner is not here, right?

[Speaker 3] (14:50 - 14:51)

I'm not talking about my partner.

[Speaker 1] (14:52 - 19:40)

I said a person close in my circle. Okay, good. So let's assume you live with somebody.

To generalize that a little bit more, there are certain ways in which this person does things that seem to be the opposite of how you do things. And then you become anxious and frustrated with that person. And let's also assume that this person is not conscious enough so that you can have a conversation with this person about changing his or her behavior.

So then you need to look at the totality of your relationship. And the totality of your relationship, which let's assume it's a loving relationship, where there is a lot of perhaps feeling of love still there. And let's assume I'm not going to want to ask you too many detailed questions.

So you have to see this, these various incidents that repeat themselves within the context of the totality of the relationship. Assuming that the totality relationship is still a relatively desirable one, then it is up to you to accept this person as he or she is so that you can find inner peace in the midst of all this. So that this person does not become a source of continuous or repeated frustration for you, because that would cause you to become unconscious again and again.

So you realize that what really matters at any given moment, or rather in the present moment, it's not so much whatever is going on in the situation around you that is always secondary. It's easy to forget that. Whatever is happening externally in your life is always secondary.

Most people forget that what is primary is your state of consciousness with which you meet what is happening around you. That is primary. What's happening is secondary.

Also, when you realize that that is primary, then your state of consciousness will become, to a large degree or completely, independent of external conditions. It will no longer be at the mercy of external conditions, at the mercy of what somebody is doing or not doing. And that's an enormous amount of freedom you can experience when you feel the power in you of dwelling in that state of consciousness that is no longer determined, controlled by somebody else's behavior in a reactive way.

Therefore, whatever happens externally, you mentioned going to the airport and so on, missing the plane would be a price worth paying for being totally dependent on somebody else's behavior. A very small price to pay. And you may find that until now, your inner resistance that was there perhaps came out through some things you said, but also in your energy field, actually contributed to perpetuating this person's behavior in some strange, unconscious way.

That person motivated by certain unconscious forces was actually strengthened in their unconsciousness by your reactivity. And it's often that you find when you accept, when you come to a complete acceptance, not only do you become free internally of external conditions, miraculously, you may also find that suddenly or gradually the other person's behavior changes. And that's almost like a little miracle, but it is not uncommon.

Many people have reported that when they start practicing. So that's your work, very different from what it was before when you asked the question, you see now what you have to do. Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (19:47 - 20:26)

Hello. I think my question will be interesting for most of the people who are here. And it's very simple, though.

We have all our family members and friends, people who we care about, and just random people as well. And sometimes observing them, you can see they suffer a lot because of total impresence. If they were more conscious, they might be happier.

So the question is, shall we give them an idea or just watch them? How to check when they're ready to change?

[Speaker 1] (20:26 - 20:33)

Yes. So the question is, do you mean, do you talk to them and try to explain something?

[Speaker 4] (20:33 - 20:38)

The question is, shall we start or just watch till they ask for help?

[Speaker 1] (20:38 - 35:18)

Right, right. Okay. Yes, I think it's a very helpful question that many people will have a similar situation.

If you talk to somebody before they have reached a point of readiness, what you say will not be received. Jesus had a somewhat, if he said it, you never know, but it's in the gospel, a somewhat brutal way of putting it, casting clouds. If he said it, we can't be sure.

Your presence there could have some effect. But it may not be immediately observable. If there's one person who is present, it can, if there is, if there's a latent readiness in anyone in this, in your environment, then your presence could act as an awakener.

It is possible that, and this is, I speak from my own experience, it's possible that in an, in an ordinary conversation that you have with someone, somebody says something or ask you something, and your answer has a little bit element of something spiritual or consciousness in it. And then that person will suddenly go, oh, but the most important thing is, first of all, the power comes with acceptance. The foundation is you accept these people as they are, although it would be nice if they didn't produce their self-made suffering.

Of course, you know, that would be very nice, but that's not happening at the moment. So at the moment you practice acceptance, you accept them for who they are, and you accept that they act according to their level of consciousness. Nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness.

So to expect somebody to act beyond their level of consciousness is futile. At some point, I realized that with reference to my parents, when I went through a shift in consciousness, I realized that I, towards my father, although there was love, I also had resentment towards my father. And the resentment was partly to do with the fact that he left us, my mother and me, when I was about 11 or so.

He just went off to another country with another woman. And my mother was virtually destitute. She was a traditional, at the time, traditional housewife, not trained for any kind of job.

And we had no idea where money would come from for food or anything. Even the social services at the time were not fully developed. They're not like now.

So there was enormous crisis. And he just, he left. And there was some resentment.

I didn't hate him for it as a child. I still loved him. But when I later thought about it, there was resentment.

And so whenever I saw him, I could feel resentment. And my mother, she was also, there was love also. But on top of that, it was, she was very irritating.

So I was almost continuously irritated by her whenever I was. And when I went through this shift in consciousness, things changed when I was 29. Of course, I was no longer, had left home long ago.

I left home when I was 18. And it was one of the happiest moments of my life. I remember it forever.

But then I suddenly realized after the shift in consciousness, and also there was this continuous, while my parents were still together, there were continuous conflicts, dreadful, like living in some kind of madhouse. But I realized suddenly they had no choice. There was not enough consciousness in them to act differently.

Their state of consciousness manifested externally in their behavior. My father could not stop his anger that he would always burst into. Of course, my mother irritated him even more than she irritated me.

And so his anger was like bombs exploding in the house. Every other day, they would go to read huge outburst of shouting and banging tables. Oh, this is, I learned a lot about the ego and without knowing that it was the ego, but he could not help it.

So he had didn't, there wasn't enough consciousness to have a choice. Because to have a choice, you need some certain amount of consciousness. And this was quite normal, especially at that time.

I don't know anybody who at that time who had conscious parents. They were all unconscious. There might have been some, but I didn't meet them.

And then at 29, what is in conventional terms, they would call forgiveness, but it wasn't forgiveness because I suddenly realized there was absolutely nothing to forgive. And of course, that's true forgiveness. True forgiveness is the realization that there's nothing to forgive, because you realize they act according to their level of consciousness.

And then suddenly there was no more resentment with my father. And whenever I saw him, either I visited him or he came to visit me occasionally, it was fine. He still had a huge ego.

That was okay. I accepted that that's how it is. But little changes happened in him when I was able to completely accept him.

Certain areas emerged in his life where he behaved very consciously, almost like a spiritual master. And then other areas remained where he was still totally ego-dominated. Consciously, for example, when he had to wait for something, he says, I can wait for hours.

I don't mind. I'll just sit here and I'll wait. So that was amazing.

And then he had occasionally some statements came out of him that seemed, oh, there's a consciousness emerging. He had various ailments, like most elderly people have, including myself, things in the body that don't go as they should, but he would never see a doctor. I have inherited that, by the way.

And he would always say, I live in peaceful coexistence with my illnesses. That was quite a profound statement. But in other areas, he was still totally unconscious.

But I accepted him totally for the way he was. I believe that my acceptance had something to do with his partial awakening. And my mother, she didn't irritate me anymore.

I only saw her, of course, when I visited her or she came to visit me once a year. She didn't irritate me anymore. However, I did reduce the amount of time that I would, the number of days that I would spend with her, because her mind was so active, she would speak continuously, talk and talk and talk and talk and talk and talk and talk.

A wonderful acceptance practice. That's how she is. And occasionally, she had some very occasionally breakthroughs into brief realizations.

And that was wonderful, wonderful to see. So acceptance is vital. There may be a time rather than giving some abstract explanation, that you don't have to live in this way.

You don't have to, you can live more consciously, all this probably doesn't work. But some very simple things may work if the moment is right. And only you can tell whether the moment is right.

Even a simple thing like, can you feel the energy in your right hand? Do you want to try a game? Can you feel the energy in your right hand and say, what do you mean right hand?

Yeah. If you close your eyes, hold your hand like this. And is there any way you can know if your hand is still there, even without looking at it or even touching anything?

This is a little game that will direct attention into the hand. And without them knowing it, what they have done is they have taken attention away from thinking and put it in here. Then can you feel your left hand?

How does it feel? Then you can say, I do that every night and it feels so good. Maybe you could want to do it too, you might like it.

And then you can even go from there, but can you feel your feet or even if you just stay with your hand? This is one way of taking attention away from incessant thinking and bring a little bit of presence. Breathing, do something with breath.

Perhaps you can have a little, if the moment is right, but if not, your acceptance is vital. Accept each human as they are. It is not uncommon for humans to change when they are accepted fully.

When one person accepts them fully, very often change happens and you no longer expect it because if you expect change, there's not complete acceptance. Complete acceptance. So you observe how they create their own suffering and you just see it and you don't, wow, you become the witnessing presence.

The witnessing presence that has not yet arisen in them. But if it's there in their immediate environment, that can be almost a substitute for their witnessing presence that arises within them. And that's the power that emanates from a human being who is present.

A certain power emanates from you. So don't underestimate the power of acceptance. And then it may happen that at some point in some conversation, it may just arise that you say something that they are ready to listen to in that moment.

I've had quite a few people telling me that they found the power of now on new earth and they said, oh, it changed my life. I must give that to my uncle, my brother, my whoever it is. And they bought a copy and said for Christmas or birthday, this book changed my life.

You must read it. It'll change yours too. And so they got the book and then the next day or next week, did you, have you looked at that?

Have you started reading that book that's going to change your life? And he said, I read one page. I couldn't get beyond it.

It doesn't make any sense to me whatsoever. Why do you give me books like that? And it has also happened is more than one person that told me that they were given this book and this is, this was their reaction.

And the book was put on a shelf and several years passed. And in the interval of these years, these people who had received the book, but didn't understand a word, went through further life experiences involving, I suspect, further suffering. So they went through more suffering and then they had reached a point where the suffering had made them ready to hear the message.

And then they tell me, several people have told me, I had your book on my shelf for years. I could, at first it made no sense at all. And then I picked it up again and suddenly it made complete sense and it changed my life.

So there needs to be the readiness. If you give them one of these books for Christmas, this may happen, but hopefully they won't throw it away. Hopefully they'll put it on a shelf somewhere and one day they may be ready for it.

What does not work is wanting to change people. Even if your intentions are good, often it has the opposite effect. As you know, the famous proverb, the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

So that's your practice. We'll see how it goes. But remember, acceptance comes first.

Everything else arises out of that. But if you want to have this little trick about feeling the hand or something to do with breathing, that might work for some people without any other explanation. You don't have to say, if you feel your hand, this will take attention away from your thinking mind and it will gradually free you of your ego.

Don't go there.

[Speaker 4] (35:21 - 35:22)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (35:22 - 35:32)

Thank you. Let's have one more and then we'll have a little meditation.

[Speaker 2] (35:33 - 35:33)

Hello.

[Speaker 1] (35:33 - 35:34)

Hello.

[Speaker 2] (35:35 - 35:41)

First, I just want to thank you for the contribution that you've made to my life, Eckhart.

[Speaker 1] (35:41 - 35:41)

Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (35:41 - 36:20)

And I know to many lives. And I love the subject that we're on, relationships. I really feel that that's where there's a lot of healing opportunities like you have spoken about.

And the one piece I need help with along those lines is setting healthy boundaries in relationships and staying in a state of consciousness. When somebody is projecting their pain onto me, I have been able to do this is in my biological family.

Yes.

[Speaker 2] (36:21 - 36:44)

And I'd like to hear you share about that, because the boundary that I've set has been very strong in so many words, that type of treatment towards me is not acceptable. And

I don't want to have contact if you're going to continue to treat me that way.

[Speaker 1] (36:45 - 36:45)

Right.

[Speaker 2] (36:45 - 36:47)

So I'd love to hear you share.

[Speaker 1] (36:47 - 37:07)

Right. So the behavior of those people, it was not just mostly talking to you about their drama or unhappiness or suffering. It was actually aggressively directed towards you.

[Speaker 7] (37:07 - 37:07)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (37:08 - 37:12)

Right. And more than one person.

[Speaker 2] (37:12 - 37:24)

Yes. And I hold it as a healing opportunity, you know, so that that's the piece to give you more.

[Speaker 1] (37:24 - 37:25)

Yes, of course.

[Speaker 2] (37:27 - 37:30)

This may help many people in this room.

[Speaker 1] (37:32 - 37:32)

Yes.

[Speaker 7] (37:34 - 37:34)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (37:34 - 37:37)

At the moment, it's kind of focuses on that.

[Speaker 7] (37:38 - 37:38)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (37:38 - 37:52)

Yeah. Well, one, of course, is in some cases, when you when you say boundaries, do you mean that you refuse to have contact with these people anymore? Do you reduce the amount of contact you have?

[Speaker 2] (37:52 - 38:27)

Well, I had been reducing the contact. It just kind of was organic. And then what happened was there was a conversation on the phone and there was, oh, you think you're so much better than everybody else, hang up on you.

And then the next week, oh, I have a favor, you know, and it was it just had me feeling like, well, this doesn't feel good anymore. And this has been a pattern in my family. So I think I just got to the place where I was like, I don't want this anymore.

[Speaker 1] (38:28 - 38:28)

Right.

[Speaker 2] (38:28 - 38:30)

And right.

[Speaker 1] (38:30 - 42:48)

Well, with certain types of aggression, then to place boundaries and reduce the amount of time you spend with these people or no longer engage in extreme cases that might be extreme, that may be necessary. But another thing to try out and consider is the way in which you converse with these people. If you are able to perhaps avoid certain subjects or don't contradict them, let them say what they want to say without stating your mental position, which is your viewpoint, your perspective, how you see things.

I call that mental positions. A mental position is a thought form that you identify with. The moment you identify with a thought form, which becomes your opinion, which, or which if many people regard their opinion as the absolute truth, and anybody who argues with that opinion is not truthful, doesn't know the truth, they confuse opinion with objective truth.

If you are able to become aware of your own mental positions and realize that a mental position that you identify with is a substitute for a true and deeper sense of self. And when the mental position is attacked by somebody, when this happens, and it has become a substitute for a deeper sense of self, then you feel it, you are being attacked. And they are basically attacking you by attacking your mental position, you feel you are being attacked, and they will also confuse your mental position with who you are.

And so you become their enemy, because they are deeply identified with their mental position. It's possible, on the one hand, to have a conversation with somebody and put forward your viewpoints without identifying with your mental positions, in which case you simply state, this is how I see it. Then the other person will say, oh, they see it, they might be attacking your position, but if you have not identified with it, there's nobody there that they can attack.

It's also possible to avoid certain subjects, because it makes no difference whether or not you state your viewpoint in that situation, it does not make a difference to the world, it does not make a difference to the political situation, whether or not you state your point of view in that situation. If you have been called to testify in front of Congress or something, then perhaps you would have to state your point of view, but you are at a family barbecue or whatever, and what your point of view is, is ultimately irrelevant. If you uphold your point of view, it only serves to uphold your sense of your separate self, your egoic self, as opposed to, it strengthens the other person's ego, and it strengthens yours.

So one way is to simply not talk about certain things and allow people to say whatever they want to say, nothing is going to change by the, whatever they say will make no difference to anybody. It's sometimes hard to remember that. They can say anything, what difference does it make?

It goes up into the air and then it dissipates. And so you don't need to oppose it, and you don't need to assert your existence by opposing it, because you're already fully yourself without needing to state your mental positions. They are not who you are.

Yes, the mistake I made was when she asked me my opinion, and maybe I should have known, you know, because I know how emotional they get about that subject.

[Speaker 1] (43:02 - 43:02)

Yes.

[Speaker 2] (43:02 - 43:14)

So when they asked my opinion, I did not probably stay in my awareness enough to know, oh, do not answer that question.

[Speaker 1] (43:14 - 43:22)

Yes, that's probably a correct interpretation of that event. Yes. Thank you.

[Speaker 6] (43:28 - 43:48)

Eckhart Tolle Continuous Doing Leads to Forgetfulness of Being [17014055-1bdd-40e4-b637-528fdd4d5ed8]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:56)

Continuous doing leads to forgetfulness of being. In this episode, Eckhart talks about the fact that many people live in a continuous state of waiting for the next thing that will magically transform their lives. A relationship, a job, a house, or more money.

He says we're misguided when we believe something outside ourselves will provide lasting fulfillment. This mindset is considered normal, but Eckhart says normal won't free us from our inner turmoil. He says even during the best of times, we feel something important is missing from our lives.

Eckhart explains when we're continuously doing, waiting for the next thing, we become forgetful of being, and this leads to suffering. Eckhart says the being dimension is fundamental to living a fulfilled whole life. He says awareness of our inner states is the first step in getting there.

Welcome, glad you could make it. I assume nobody's in a hurry to get anywhere, and I also assume nobody is waiting for anything to happen, and here we have already arrived at a shift in consciousness, because most people, without knowing it unconsciously, habitually, are always waiting for the next thing to happen. It's so deeply ingrained and habitual, they don't even realize it.

It's absolutely normal, but normal isn't good enough anymore. Normal doesn't free you from suffering and unhappiness. One could go so far as to say normal is suffering, unhappiness, dissatisfaction, sense of deep sense of lack, of non-fulfillment, of frustration, and a lot of that has to do with the inability to be present.

So, this continuous sense of not having arrived yet, except for brief moments when certain desires have been fulfilled, a good meal, some other physical short-lived satisfaction, and then the normal state returns. It is always, at the best of times, an underlying sense of something missing, not being fully yourself, neediness, and whereas it's true to say that on the horizontal level of life, there are always things that you can do, some things you have to do, there are things to be achieved, to be experienced, and all those things happen in time, they unfold in time, which implies something in the future, you're going towards it.

So, that's one aspect of life, is the horizontal aspect that unfolds in time, where you're looking towards the next thing, doing, and to be completely absorbed in the doing dimension, which is a necessary part of life, of course, but to be completely absorbed in the continuous doing dimension, I call it sometimes the horizontal dimension of life, leads to a very serious condition, more serious than any other condition that you might contract, or illness, or virus, it leads to forgetfulness of being, and then the life is experienced as eternally unfulfilling, ultimately, any condition that you arrive at for a little while seems to be fine, and then very quickly, it's unfulfilling again, relationships, achievements, nothing wrong with these things, nothing wrong with obviously having a relationship, achieving things, wonderful, but if there's forgetfulness of being, then nothing satisfies for very long, and this is why I say, you are a human being, human being, the human is the person, the conditioned entity, including the physical body, the psychological entity, the personality, conditioned by the past, all things that happen in your mind and in your emotional field, they're all part of you as the human, the person, and of course, it's all conditioned by the past, but you're not just a human, you're a human being, and the being dimension is the one that is fundamental to a fulfilled life, but it's the one that is habitually overlooked, and remains unrealized, and all the spiritual teachings point to it, they use different pointers, different words, but they all point to this one thing, Jesus says somewhere, only one thing is needed fundamentally, deeply, on the surface, other things are needed, in the depths of who you are, only the realization of who you are, beyond the conditioning, the conditioned entity, the person, that is vital, and that begins with a simple thing, to become aware that you're always waiting for the next thing, the next thing is a thought, there's no next thing other than a thought, in other words, the future can only be experienced as a thought, isn't that an incredible thing, the future, because if it were something other, if it could be experienced other than as a thought, some intrepid explorer would have arrived there one day, and said, I have found the future, where, it's here, now, in other words, it's not the future, oh, the future is necessary on the horizontal dimension of life, we need it, we needed the future to come together here, to make a plan, schedule, what time is it, okay, that is, that's fine, but you cannot experience the future, you cannot arrive there, the so-called future can only manifest as the present moment, so it's fine to make plans for the future, to have goals, but not to give that which is to be achieved, the goals, not to attribute to these goals an importance that the goals ultimately don't have, not to expect these goals to lead to ultimate fulfillment, a fuller sense of who you are, because you won't really enjoy the fruit of your labors, if habitually you cannot be present in the moment, no matter what you achieve, the enjoyment will be short-lived because of the habitual pattern of dissatisfaction, in the background, it's always there, some obscure sense of lack, and often it comes into the foreground as real unhappiness, frustration, and then if you realize that there's always this waiting for the next thing, which is thought, when you're waiting for the next thing, you're trapped in thought, because that's where the future happens, the realization that this is happening to you is very important, the first step is the beginning of something else arising, and in all of you that has already arisen, although occasionally it still gets obscured, perhaps, probably, I assume, something else has arisen that's not thought, that is beyond thought, the ability to recognize thought, the ability to recognize certain patterns that habitually arise in your mind, your mental emotional field, the ability to witness that which arises in your mental emotional field, that's an enormous leap in consciousness, another dimension, one could say, has arisen, we could call it presence, we could call it awareness, it's not thought, but it's intelligence, so intelligence is not confined to thought, there is a dimension in you that is far greater, far more intelligent than any intelligent thought, it's the place from where all intelligence arises, a place of where all creativity arises, so there's the ability to suddenly be aware of your inner states, to be aware of what your mind is saying, the narrative, the habitual narrative, that you're telling yourself, you're having a monologue, or many people have a dialogue with themselves, where they split themselves in two, and then this one argues with the other, why aren't you good enough, why did you do this, why do you never get anything right, you shouldn't have, he shouldn't have said that, yes, but on the other, so you can have a dialogue in your narrative, or you can have a monologue, says I am such a miserable creature, because a lot of the time, the narratives, the unconscious thought processes, tend to be more negative than positive for many, many people, so to be aware that this is happening, that's an enormous gain in consciousness, it's the beginning of awakening, spiritually speaking, something arises that is not part of the conditioned mind patterns, so there's the ability to observe your inner states, and that's a wonderful little pointer, to ask yourself frequently, what's my inner state at this moment, and then look at it, direct your attention to it, the narratives, what have I been telling myself, and the emotion that accompanies the narrative, what am I feeling, what's the emotion, so in addition to being a story in your head, and an emotion, there's a knowing behind it, there's a space behind it, sometimes I call it inner space, there's an inner space, from where you can be aware of what's happening on the level of the person, the personality, because that inner space, the awareness, is not part of the personality, it's part, it's the being, the knowing that is inherent in the being, and so when you become aware of dysfunctional patterns, dysfunctional meaning, narratives that cause unhappiness, for example, what your mind is telling you something, and what your mind is saying about you, about where you are, about other people, whatever it may be doing, you become aware of it, and then you realize the emotion you feel very often is a reflection of the self-talk, this emotion reflects the self-talk, if the self-talk is about the bad things that could happen to me tomorrow, or next month, or next year, or the bad things that probably will happen to me, unless I get really bored now and start thinking very hard, otherwise those bad things are certainly going to happen to me, and then the body doesn't know, it believes that's already happening, so you have the emotion arises, as if the scenario that your mind creates at three o'clock in the morning when you're in bed, awake, the scenario that the mind creates, the emotion that you feel is no different from the emotion that you would feel if that were actually happening, you were in that state of absolute danger, it's called anxiety, it's a very common state, very common, and people don't know it, how do I get out of it, so you first, you investigate by being aware of what happens, this inner process, oh, this is what I'm doing to myself, because in this moment, there is nothing to fear, so when anxiety arises, it's something that a narrative that the mind creates, if there is an emergency situation, that's a different matter, when a true emergency arises, then you need to deal with it, and you do it now, but that's not anxiety, an emergency situation may bring up fear response, perhaps, and that adrenaline arises, arises up in your body, and then action is needed to deal with it, that's a different matter, but anxiety is to do with mental creations, and very often, certain external situations cause you to react in certain ways mentally, to interpret the situation as bad, and then you feel the corresponding emotion, so I often recommend, when you're in an actual situation, let's not talk about being in bed at 3 in the morning, that's another way, it's totally, completely a mental creation, let's say you're in a situation that's not going the way you want it to go, people don't do what they're expected to do, they don't arrive on time, things get cancelled, things go wrong, things break down, it happens quite a lot, things breaking down, going wrong, this is not supposed to happen, why is this happening? But of course, this happens all the time in life, it's part of life, is that things don't go the way you expect them to go, no matter how much positive thinking you practice, which is a good thing, nevertheless, you will experience, quite often, things don't go according to the way the mind says they should be going, why did they cancel my flight, I've been waiting for three hours and now it's cancelled again, this is awful, this is dreadful, dreadful, so there's a narrative, there's not really anything you can do right now, you can see that if you imply your intelligence, you say, no matter how much you complain that this flight has been cancelled, it's cancelled, just one example, there are bigger things than cancelled flights, but the mechanism behind it is the same, the flight is cancelled, and then the narrative is very dreadful, these people are so inefficient, and then if awareness arises, you suddenly realise there's a narrative in my mind, and then the mind says, yeah, of course, there's a narrative, because this is awful, which again is part of the narrative, and then awareness comes in again and says, how would I experience this situation or this moment, it's always this moment, how would I experience this present moment, without the addition of a narrative, okay, you have plenty of time, because your flight got cancelled, so you might as well experiment, how would I experience this without the addition of a narrative, a mental narrative, okay, now to find the answer to that, you have to drop the narrative, because otherwise you won't know how you experience this situation, you drop the narrative and there you stand there, or you sit or stand, whatever it is, and you look around, people, room full of people perhaps, and you're breathing, and there are lights, artificial lights probably, but noises around you, noise, lights, people, life unfolding in the present moment, and you're breathing and looking, perhaps you can even feel your body, the inside of your body, because it's alive, perhaps you become aware that the body is alive, if you're not distracted by a narrative, you might become aware that your body is alive, so now you have the answer to how would I experience this situation if I didn't add a narrative to it, and the answer is, peace, it would be quite peaceful, because suddenly you're no longer reactive to the externals, the conditioned reaction to the externals has dropped away, and you have discovered a kind of, well, what's the word, autonomy, independence of external conditions as far as your inner state is concerned by dropping the narrative, this is what is, maybe your mind is still saying occasional things, but it's not reacting, just saying, well, this is what is, and here you are, or here I am, breathing, feeling the aliveness in my inner body, looking around, other life forms surrounding me, technology here and there, that's what is, and you're standing or sitting somewhere, and it's actually not that bad at all, in fact, you feel some inner peace despite the external condition, not as caused by the external condition, if you feel happiness or inner peace that's caused by an external condition, that's always short-lived, because every external condition is short-lived, or the external condition loses its ability to make you happy after a short while, a relationship, for example, this person is making me happy, okay, just wait, then this relationship in the form of this person loses its ability to make you happy, or the external condition quickly disappears, whatever that may be, as the Buddha said, it's impermanent, everything is impermanent, so to attach yourself to an impermanent condition for your inner state of satisfaction, inner peace, fulfillment, happiness, whatever you call it, is erroneous and leads to suffering, as the Buddha said, dukkha, suffering. Anicca is the term in the scriptures that the Buddha said is, that means impermanence, so attaching yourself to impermanence is suffering, but the attachment is a mental thing, so how would I experience this without the addition, the baggage of unnecessary thought, ah, and then you arrive in the present moment, without the barrier or the veil of unnecessary thought, and you have the bareness and aliveness of the present moment, because every moment is alive, it's a manifestation in the external realm, the physical realm of life, every human, even technology, they're all manifestations of life, and that's what is, now it doesn't mean you become incapable of taking action, in fact you're more likely to take intelligent action if you access the deeper intelligence that arises in that space of awareness, so if there's something you can do, you're going to do it, and it won't be a reactive, it will be a true response, real intelligence operating through you, perhaps using your mind, but you're connected, but to be connected to that, you need to come to an alignment with the present moment, without the alignment with the is-ness of now, you are disconnected from the deeper intelligence that potentially is there, actually is there, but unrecognized within you, for the power to operate through you, power that transcends who you are as a person, you have to come to an inner alignment with the is-ness of the present moment, and no matter what form it takes, sometimes it's relatively okay, sometimes things go wrong, sometimes it's quite nice, but they're all is-ness, is-ness of this moment, and when you become aligned with the is-ness of this moment, without demanding that it should be different, you discover that there's an alive peace that you sense within you, first you don't, may not sense it very clearly, but there's an inner peace suddenly, that inner peace is also power, I call it the power of now, there it is, it's independent of external, it is not caused by external conditions, and one characteristic of this is, if you look very closely, you discover when you come aligned with the present moment, there is less unnecessary thinking happening, thinking slows down, but you don't go to sleep, thinking slows down, even you get spaces in between thoughts arise, where the thought is replaced by awareness, just giving attention to something, instead of calling it something, you just give it attention, there's a difference between looking at a tree and calling it something, giving it a name, nothing wrong with it, but there's more to life than that, there's a difference between saying something about the tree, either you know its name, or you say, oh that looks like a tree that my grandmother had in her garden, or you say, oh I would like to have that tree in my garden, or where did you get that, that if it's a pot, this is a potted tree, where did you get that tree, that looks like a tree that so-and-so painter painted, a 19th century impressionist, he painted something, didn't he, yes, yes, that's all true and fine, but you're still looking at the tree through the veil of thought, and there's a place for that too, but more importantly, it is possible to look at this tree without imposing any thought in it, instead of looking at it through the veil of concepts, you look at the tree through awareness, and then you see it, but you don't call it, you don't compare it to anything, you don't judge it in any way, it just is, how long will you look at it like that, I don't know, maybe a few seconds, or half a minute, or a minute, but it's a different way of relating to the tree than relating to the tree through the veil of concepts, there's a place for that, you need to be familiar with these two modes of knowing, knowing through concepts, but more importantly, knowing without concepts, awareness through awareness, through awareness you know everything at a deeper level, even the tree, you realize there's more to the tree than the word tree, there's more to the tree than what your senses tell you about the tree, the senses only give you a fraction of what's there, there's a mystery embedded in this tree that you cannot analyze and conceptualize, but you can sense the presence of the tree as you can sense your own presence, that's a new way of relating to nature, that humans have lost, that's why humans have become so destructive with nature, they have lost the ability to sense the presence that is inherent in everything that is natural, what in ancient times would have been called sacred presence of everything, so that's an amazing shift to be able to relate, become aware that there are the two, you have to dance between the two modes of being in your life, the two modes of interacting, of relating, of perceiving, one is through concepts, it is fine, knowledge, concepts, comparing, analyzing, sometimes you have to do these things, but not being taken over by concepts, not losing the ability to step out of conceptualization into awareness, because that frees you, conceptualization is all the conditioning, it's part of the conditioning of your mind, the culture that conditions your mind, etc., your upbringing, even the language that you grew up with is already a form of conditioning, everything, so you have the two, the two modes, know when the conceptualization is necessary, then you can use it, but you're no longer used by it, and most importantly, because if you don't know the being dimension, you're trapped in conceptualization that also applies to your sense of identity, your sense of identity or your sense of self, your sense of who you are, is then derived from concepts, if you have no awareness of the being dimension, your sense of who you are is a conceptual sense of self, it's a kind of narrative again, the me, me and my life, it's called, me and my life, ah, and there's a heaviness to it, and it's very problematic, all these things that happened in the past, oh god, and what's going to happen in the future, oh, I don't know, and then you oscillate between future is so important because I'm not fully myself yet, I'm a conceptual entity, I'm a narrative, of course I'm not myself, and then you look to the future, which doesn't exist except as a thought, so it's a place you never arrive at, so you look to the future for your real self, when I'm enlightened, that's the spiritual person, well, the conceptual spiritual person, or when I get this or that, or obtain this or that, or become free of this or that, so you look to the future for what the future cannot give you, because it's only a thought, so your sense of self is a conceptual one, it's called the ego, by the way.

Creative solutions come from stillness. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions from participants. A woman is reluctant to experience another life on earth.

She asks, do we actually choose to reincarnate? Eckhart says if we're compulsively reincarnating with every thought and emotion that occurs, then we probably will continue the same dysfunctional pattern, not only in the next moment, but in the next life. Another woman asks about how to be a conscious parent.

Her teenage daughter feels unmotivated. And wants to find a purpose. She's been partying with her friends and feels aimless.

Eckhart says most of us make many mistakes in our lives, and that is how we evolve. Lastly, a man who is a technologist and creates virtual worlds says there's a lot of suffering on these platforms. He asks Eckhart about designing social media in conscious ways.

Eckhart reminds him that creative solutions come from stillness.

It's my birthday today. Lindsay from Australia. Happy birthday.

And I am not sure I would choose to come to earth again. I'm sure not having a body would be more fun or peaceful. My question is, do we choose to be incarnated?

Can you talk about this? If you incarnate, which means to take on form, incarnate, well carnate comes from carna, flesh, they become chili con carne, it's the same word. That's the same, the same origin of incarnate, flesh.

But the question is, do you incarnate here in this lifetime, here and now, do you as consciousness incarnate into every thought that arises in your mind, which here means do you identify completely with every thought in your mind? So the thought absorbs your consciousness completely, so you reincarnate every moment into the unconscious mind. You identify with it, that is reincarnation.

And the emotions that go with it take you over completely. There's no awareness left. There's complete identification with the pain body, complete identification with thoughts.

So if you are completely identified with the pain body, you incarnate into the pain body. And so from there you can, if you incarnate in this lifetime every moment compulsively because you are not conscious enough, then it is more than likely that you have no choice about your next reincarnation, because the same compulsion, the same unconsciousness that draws you into every thought and every emotion here and now, is the same thing that will draw you into some other form in order to experience the same dysfunction and dysfunctional drama and the same unconscious person again living out its unconsciousness. If you cannot experience the end of this compulsive reincarnation into every thought in this lifetime, then my prediction would be that you will be forced to reincarnate again. You have no choice in the matter.

Just as you seem to have no choice in this lifetime. So the solution then to the problem of reincarnation is not sometimes if you go to a Buddhist temple they might tell you maybe in 20 lifetimes you might be able to come to the end of this compulsion to reincarnate. You become free of the cycle.

Well, the question is here and now. Are you free of it here and now? And the possibility is there here and now.

Instead of looking to time to become free of the compulsion to reincarnate, the possibility is there here and now. So that's the important question and catch yourself when you reincarnate into a thought and into the pain body and into an emotion. You become it.

You can see how it takes you over a reaction, a thought. You're not even there. You're completely asleep and at night you wake up in a horrible state.

But of course you're all beyond that already. I'm just acting out. Perhaps there are some questions here.

If anybody has a question, please ask. Somebody will choose some omnipotent person. One or two are here.

They will choose the questioners. I can't do it from here because nobody would know who I'm pointing to.

So I've been following the teachings for about 16 years and a question has finally arisen. I remember you saying a number of years ago, and probably many times since then, our practice as parents is to just be present with our children. That's our spiritual practice, our whole spiritual practice.

So I've done a lot of that since my children were born, just being with them, not telling, not doing, and now that my children are older, they're teenagers, this has become an even more important practice. And they have some background. We used to listen to your audio books to calm them down at night, and that's been incredibly helpful.

I think it's a real foundation for them. So when they ask me questions, like my 16-year-old said a couple weeks ago, she said, Mom, I'm really feeling unmotivated. I have no intrinsic motivation.

I really want to know what my purpose is and what I'm meant to do here, what my impact is. And I say, for once, there's a doing when something comes out of me versus the being. And I say, well, your purpose, your inner purpose is to be.

And she laughs and says, did the tree tell you that, Mom? So my question is, is there a doing that needs to come from the being of them at this age? Because at this age, it feels like the stakes are higher.

It feels like she's a teenager. She's going out and doing all the things that teenagers do. Many of us have also done.

So the question is, as I refrain from labeling what she's doing, and I just be with her, is there anything else?

Thank you. Thank you. I believe you are providing good guidance, and the trees have provided good guidance for you.

And now, increasingly, the child who is no longer a child gradually has to face the challenges of life, various ways in which life can go wrong. It's always good for a child to explore. It would be too much to expect at this age to find what their life purpose is.

They were very rare. I didn't know my life purpose until I was, I don't know, early 30s. Many people have to make many mistakes and go through various kinds of suffering, sometimes as a result of those mistakes.

And hopefully, you can help her so that she does not make mistakes that can never be rectified, or very difficult to rectify, like getting into a drug addiction, or what seems to happen a lot to teenagers these days. Just that is not the case, I believe, with your daughter. So there is no answer at this point of what the life purpose is.

Perhaps by asking questions, what would you like to do first instead of, is she still at school, right?

[Speaker 2] (9:09 - 9:19)

She is in school. She was traveling, schooling abroad, and she's come home now. It's very different after you've been a global student.

[Speaker 1] (9:19 - 9:30)

Yes, yes. And of course, for all, it's important. I don't know how much time she spends on her devices when the youngster spent many hours on.

[Speaker 2] (9:30 - 9:38)

Many hours on the devices, and school supports that, and the partying. And there's a big focus on that at this age.

[Speaker 1] (9:38 - 15:01)

Yes. Life, as you experience it, can be divided into this past, there's the present moment, there's the future, and for most people, traditionally, past and future have been the focal points for their life, especially future. Now we have to add a fourth one for modern, especially young humans, which is the digital, the virtual world.

So they not only don't live in past and future, in addition, they live in the virtual reality, which for many youngsters becomes their primary reality. That is the strange thing. For many young people, the virtual world is their primary reality.

And we cannot predict what consequences this will have in the long term, because this is the first generation growing up now for whom the virtual world is, for many of them, their primary reality. And that, I believe, can lead to very dysfunctional inner states. It's very hard, although at this point it may be impossible for you to ask her not to indulge in excessive participation in that dimension.

But it's funny that she mentioned three when you said being, because something that can provide some kind of counterbalance to the virtual world, which is an abstract world, where there's no true human interaction, it's all abstractions. As a counterbalance to that, as much as possible, I would encourage my child or help my child to continue to have contact with nature as much as possible, so that they, in whatever way you do that, I don't know, activities in nature, going on hikes or camping, stay in touch with nature. That's also, many people feel depressed.

Youngsters feel depressed these days. Again, loss of touch with the natural environment, for many of them, can be the cause of depression. And I would recommend nature to anybody, even adults, to keep you sane, to escape the insanity of this human-made world, go into nature, spend as much time as possible in nature or perhaps also interact with nature, doing something in nature, make a fire or collect some berries or whatever it may be, be in nature, interact with it, give it attention.

And so, she's 16. I don't know if, at this point, she has her own mind already and she may not want to go into nature, I don't know. But you could make it as attractive as possible for her.

That is a vital thing to counterbalance the harmful effect and it applies to millions of youngsters these days. I do not know where humanity is going with that. I do not know, I don't feel terribly confident that this is having a good effect on the collective human consciousness.

It could lead even to a breakdown of entire civilization within two generations. It is possible. The inability to focus on anything for very long, attention deficit disorder, it's called, and this is one of the effects of the virtual world where everything is short attention spans.

And in order to be creative in this world, in order to create something new, you have to give it attention. With a short attention span, you cannot create anything significant in this world. You have to give something attention so that creativity can happen.

If you lose the ability to give attention to something, then creativity would be lost. And if creativity is lost in humanity, then humanity will be overwhelmed by self-created problems without finding any solution whatsoever, any creative solution. But all these are larger issues.

My recommendation is to encourage your daughter, maybe together, spend as much time in nature as possible. That would be helpful. And then you have to allow her also to find her own path.

You can give some guidance. And you have to allow her, she will make mistakes. If she doesn't make mistakes, she's not going to evolve.

And in order to find something that she really wants to do, her life purpose for many humans, they have to go make many mistakes before they finally find something worth the experience of flow. And you have to allow her to make mistakes. As long as they become, hopefully, not too destructive.

You have done your best, as far as I can tell. She is aware, although she said jokingly about the trees. She has some awareness of the being dimension, I believe.

She said, most kids my age don't even know what a life purpose is. They don't know how to define the word impact.

[Speaker 1] (15:09 - 15:27)

Right. Yes, that's right. Yes.

So that's all I can say at the moment. But you have provided a good foundation for her life, which hopefully will counteract the harmful effects of the virtual world that she's engaged in, like all of them are.

[Speaker 3] (15:37 - 17:41)

Hi, my name is Baba. And I started listening to you a year ago during the pandemic. Thanks a lot to my partner who introduced me to you.

I have a three dimensional question for you, sir. As a technologist, I come from this experience of creating virtual worlds. And I would say there's some good news.

The good news there, both as a producer and a consumer, is there's a lot of suffering there. And as we always say, suffering is the foundation to consciousness. So hopefully we'll find a solution there.

On a serious note, the three dimensional question I have for you is, in regards to language, how has your understanding of multiple languages enabled you to get access to wisdom in the conscious dimension and communicate that in accessible ways? So that's the first one. Then the second one is, talk about how you would design social media in conscious ways.

What would you recommend there? Because I usually quit my job to explore some of these ideas. Because yeah, I think, as the pandemic showed me, it's important we solve this problem.

Then the final one is the power of now. I come from a different community whereby thoughts like yours was inaccessible to me. And I feel like it was a language barrier.

And I would like to work with you and your team to help make the power of now accessible in major African languages. Because I... So please, languages, digital media, and the power of now.

[Speaker 1] (17:48 - 18:03)

Thank you. Wonderful proposal. And that will help perhaps millions of people.

However, I must confess that I have forgotten your first question.

[Speaker 3] (18:07 - 18:21)

Your understanding of several languages, does that help in accessing wisdom from the conscious dimension? And does that help in communicating that in accessible ways?

[Speaker 1] (18:22 - 24:45)

Right. Well, we had a retreat in Mexico. And for the first time ever, I wanted to challenge myself and decided to do the entire retreat in Spanish.

And... I learned Spanish a long time ago, over half a century ago. And I haven't used it very much since.

Reading, occasionally reading a book. And at first, it was very hard for my mind to find the words There's an intuition that comes. Before you speak, it's very hard to describe.

Before language happens, you already know what wants to be said at a non-verbal level. And then this knowing what wants to be said, which is a non-conceptual knowing, then it gets translated into concepts and words. And in English, they say your language is rusty when you haven't used the language for a long time.

You say it's rusty. And that's how I experienced it. The impulse came to say something.

And sometimes the flow was there. It was fine. Then you can't find the right word.

Immediately, the mind has to work overtime to find an equivalent or similar word. And it slows you down a bit. But that was fine.

And after a couple of days, the flow came back and it went much more easily. Quite enjoyable, reaching people in their own language. That makes a difference, if you can reach people in their own language rather than have it translated into their language.

This is why I wanted to do it. And people were grateful that I made this effort. Normally, I'm not into efforting at all.

But I made an effort to speak Spanish and it worked. And that was good. A similar thing in Germany, years ago, I saw out of touch with the German language that I spoke as a child.

And I said, I cannot possibly, that was 20 years ago, I said, I cannot possibly give a talk in German. It's just the words are not there. And at the first event, I had a translator.

I spoke English and the translator translated into German. Didn't feel quite right. And a few times, I knew the translator wasn't correct, but I couldn't say anything.

And at the second talk, the organizer said, why don't you just say a few words in German and explain to them why you are not going to speak German? And that's a good idea. So I started and I talked.

The reason why I'm not going to speak in German, I said in German. The reason why I cannot speak in German because I haven't used the language in 60 years or whatever. And then I talked and talked and talked.

And 15 minutes later, I said, oh, I'm still speaking German. And then they continued. Translation was unnecessary.

The flow was there. It was a miracle. And so after that, I've always, whenever I go Germany, Switzerland, I speak in German now.

That's good. But the language is a strange thing. It's an abstraction language.

I use language to teach. And the words that one uses in spiritual discourse, the words have a different function from the function that words have in ordinary discourse. In spiritual discourse, the words are not the thing.

They only point to the thing. All the words point us to something that is beyond words. So I'm using words in order to point something that is beyond the words.

Even when I say stillness, the word stillness isn't stillness. So it's a pointer. When I say the awakening, spiritual awakening, presence, whatever it may be, they're all just pointers.

They are not something to be believed in. It's not, you cannot learn the terminology of spirituality and then believing because you have mastered the words that are used in a spiritual teaching. Then you have mastered the spiritual teaching.

In ordinary subjects, this is how it works. You learn the words and in exams, you regurgitate what you have learned. You write it all down and you pass your exam.

And so to learn the words is you become proficient. In spiritual discourse, if you learn the words, you might become proficient in spiritual discourse, but it hasn't done anything to your state of consciousness. There are actually people around these days who give talks, spiritual talks.

I've seen a few on YouTube who have mastered the spiritual discourse, especially in the area of what in India is called Advaita, Advaita Vedanta. People who have mastered the terminology of Advaita and they can beautifully explain it. Whatever you say to them, it's all delusion, of course.

It's all totally delusion. Everything is denied. It's very easy to make sense apparently, but it doesn't make sense at all.

And you can see it hasn't done anything to their state of consciousness, but they have mastered the terminology. So language has a different function in spiritual discourse.

[Speaker 3] (24:46 - 25:00)

Do you have thoughts on how social media, digital media can result in more consciousness? I think this is going to help technologies like me design things for the next generation.

Well, I am not an expert. I'm not only not an expert, I am computer, almost computer illiterate, but I'm observing things. I know how these things function, how they work.

I don't have a creative solution as such. I do know that a few things that appear in the virtual world are actually helpful. There are apps that can teach you to meditate or to breathe consciously, to bring you back into the present moment.

Also, there are talks by Eckhart on YouTube. I was, not long ago, I was going for a walk and you know that people have different conceptual identities. One of my conceptual identities is I'm a writer.

When people ask me, I usually say I'm a writer. Or if I don't want any further questions from them, I will say I'm retired. Which is not a lie because I've been retired for many decades in a deeper sense.

So I'd rarely say I'm a spiritual teacher because I'm not a spiritual teacher, except in the moment when spiritual teaching happens. I don't carry around with me a conceptual identity in my head. I am a spiritual teacher.

Anyway, I was walking. A young man was coming with his partner opposite direction and the man stopped and he looked at me and said, I know you from somewhere. What's your name?

Said Eckhart. Oh, so you. I watched you.

I read you on YouTube all the time. And then he said to his girlfriend, look, this guy is a famous YouTuber. And then I realized I have a new identity now.

So sometimes the virtual world is used for good purposes. This is not the only example, of course. But there is an inherent danger in the medium itself.

That's the hard to describe. Even a simple thing when I occasionally read. I love books, the physical presence of books.

But sometimes when I travel, I have things on my iPad or virtual books because books are heavy otherwise. It is not quite the same to have the experience of reading on a screen. I find it hard to describe what the difference is.

It's almost as if I was leaking energy when I'm engaging with a screen. I have sometimes the feeling there's an energy leakage. That energy pours out.

It's kind of the screen sucks it out. And perhaps to some extent this happens to everybody because the energy is directed onto that screen and attention is energy. So there's an outflow of attention onto there.

And so I don't know what the screen does with it. Here we have a nice idea from a science fiction movie that the screens are sucking up human energy. It's the Matrix.

Nobody can control what people put out there. There's nothing you can do about that. If people are very unconscious, what they communicate will reflect their state of unconsciousness.

So there is not much you can do. To censor people becomes problematic, although obviously there are already laws against threats of physical violence or slander and things like that. In an ideal world, one would say, oh, let's only allow polite and nice messages to come through.

Anything other we need to censor, that would not be the right way to go. But I have no solution except to encourage you to apply your presence that is already there so that you have creative insights into what is possible. Use the presence instead of looking to me for an answer because it appears that I don't have one.

Instead of looking to me for an answer, go into that stillness, that presence, and see what arises because creative solutions, creative answers come from there. So trust yourself, not the personal superficial self, but trust in the depth of your being where intuition resides, the source of all creativity. Become present, become still, direct your attention, have a question.

What do you want? A creative answer to allow the virtual world to become a helpful tool in the development of human consciousness or whatever your purpose is to direct it. And then you become still.

You ask the question, let go of the question. It drops into the stillness. This applies to any creative solution that you may need.

You ask a question and then you become still. And perhaps not immediately, perhaps after several days, weeks, or months, an answer arises. And repeat that process several times.

Ask a question so you focus. And then be happy with not finding, not having an answer. Allow the answer to come up.

So what you're asking, the question you're asking me is what you should be asking yourself. You will find a creative solution to that. I can sense that that will happen.

And reaching people in their own African language is a wonderful idea. So please connect with us so we can pursue that.

Eckhart Tolle Daily Life As Spiritual Practice [1cf2a65b-4c68-4f8f-a317-c676e9dc554a]

Daily life as spiritual practice. In this episode, Eckhart talks with a live audience about the importance of using our daily lives as spiritual practice. Throughout the day, when we're not challenged by difficult people or circumstances, we invite presence into our lives, like a muscle that gets stronger with use.

It becomes part of our daily routine. Then, when challenges do arise, we don't fall into unconsciousness. We draw on our reserves.

Eckhart calls it presence power.

[Speaker 1] (0:37 - 57:09)

More and more, your spiritual practice is everyday life, rather than a separate time. And you can have that too. It can be very helpful.

But the most important thing is use daily life. If you want to divide daily life into those times when things are running okay, you're not being particularly challenged by difficult people or situations. And then there are times when you are being challenged by difficult situations.

They may not be difficult, but you may think they are difficult, or you react as if they were difficult, and then you make them difficult. And the same with people. There are people, they may not be conscious.

Your reaction to those people changes the way in which you experience, and changes that person's behavior too, unless they are immune, and they're so present that they can no longer be influenced by your state of consciousness. But when you relate to someone, one state of consciousness meets another. To some extent, they link up, and then you get pulled down into their state.

Your reaction pulls the other person even further, and you're both going down. Use those times when you're not being challenged to invite presence into your life. Then you grow, so to speak, in presence power.

If there's not enough presence power, then every time you get challenged, you lose it. You lose yourself. You become completely unconscious.

And you may know in your personal life, there may be certain situations that always create upset, anger, any kind of overwhelming reaction. Perhaps you already know what those are. There may be certain people who do that to you.

It could be your parents when you visit them. It could be other relatives, or it could be when your ex-husband or wife, when you bump into them, or whatever it is. It could be even remembering something from the past.

It could be having to deal with money. And every time anybody mentions money, you go completely unconscious. Whatever it may be, if you don't invite presence into your life when you're not being challenged, there may not and probably will not be enough presence power so that you can transcend the old reactive patterns in you and stay present when the old challenges come that usually pull you into unconsciousness.

So it's vital not to just, when things are going okay, it's a routine kind of day, and you're drifting or doing the usual things. No, there it's essential to choose whenever an opportunity arises. It arises continuously for choosing to be present rather than be involved in judging and thinking.

So choose presence when you walk from the building to your car. Watch your surroundings without labeling anything. Just be the presence through which the perception happens.

Every time you do that, presence power grows in you. Then the next thing you get into your car, you shut the door. Why not stay for whatever, 30 seconds?

Not automatically go into the next thing you do. No, consciously bring space into your life, which is primarily inner space. So you sit for half a minute before you start the engine and you look around and you feel the energy in your inner body and you perceive.

There's a presence that arises. And many occasions, whether it's at home, performing routine actions, or just going from here to there, or just sitting. So presence does not mean that you always have to become still and stationary.

You don't get necessarily frozen. Like there are some, I don't know if they still have flash mobs. Flash, when they can only do that through, people have phones these days, so they can ring hundreds of people at the same time and say, we meet in that particular place.

And when their phone rings, you all go, whatever position you are in, they can do it in a supermarket or some public place. And suddenly everybody goes, it's quite nice because it breaks the routine of everyday life. So it's almost like a performance art performed by hundreds of people sometimes, but you don't need that for presence.

It can help. There was even a spiritual teacher called Gurdjieff in the early 20th century who had the stop practice. So when the students were talking amongst themselves, he would sometimes come into the room and suddenly shout, stop.

And everybody has to freeze, whatever they were doing, any posture. And he did that in order to make people aware of how automatic their usual life is. They run on automatic, the next thing, and then that's the next thing.

And then there's always, there's never really this, there's always the next thing you have to do and the next thing, totally automatic. I think he called it mechanical, like some kind of big machine. So he goes, stop.

And then I think they would have to wait until he released them and then they could carry on. But it's a desperate measure to bring some presence into people who are otherwise completely absorbed in their mind. Another thing he did, which I would not recommend, but he was a very eccentric teacher.

He would sometimes have drinking sessions with his students and he would challenge him to stay conscious even under the influence of alcohol. Now, I usually recommend as presence arises in you not to indulge too much in alcohol. A glass of wine is fine, but if after one glass, you no longer realize that two or three glasses would be too much, then one glass is too much too.

But as presence arises, it can pull you down every time you get drunk. You go, it's like you go up the escalator and then you get drunk and it pulls you down and you stop walking up. I would recommend not indulging in alcohol.

Once a certain degree of presence is there, it would be a pity if just a glass of wine could take you out, then it's not the real thing. I love a glass of wine with dinner, sometimes two, but almost never more than two. One is the usual and that's fine.

Now, he tried to bring people to that awareness through very unconventional methods. Another thing he had is dance, some kind of movement or dance. At that time, he thought these people were so unconscious, they needed desperate measures were called for, but you don't need to freeze.

You don't need to say, okay, I need to be still somewhere and sit, I need to get present. No, bring presence into, it can be on the one hand, it can be contemplative. When you are present, you're not doing anything in particular, but just perceiving.

You're sitting in the car at the traffic lights. Why not use that precious moment rather than mentally create upset because you're not somewhere else? Isn't that absurd?

You're creating upset in your mind because you're here, but not somewhere else. And it's not just the traffic lights. Many people live a large part of their life like that.

They are upset or dissatisfied with where they are, what they are doing and who they are with. And this is the origin of the famous bumper sticker, I'd rather be whatever, not here and not now. It's very normal, but unconscious, dysfunctional.

Life becomes a frustrating experience. So use all those opportunities, whether it's contemplative, like you're sitting in the car, waiting at the lights, why not be the presence? It's a precious moment.

The only one there ever is. It manifests as this moment. There's the lights and here's the body sitting in the car, but it's always the present moment and it's precious.

It's precious because there is nothing else. Only the mind tells you there's something else. The mind tells you there's something more valuable than this moment.

It's called some future point where I want to get there. Once I'm there, things will be better, but you're never there because every here becomes a there in the mind that you'd rather be. Then everyday life, invite presence in ordinary situations that are not particularly challenging.

For some people, even a red light, a traffic light is challenging. Having to wait in line somewhere is challenging. Why not use this precious moment and become alert?

Feel the energy field in the inner body and just be there as an observing presence. Then you have the two dimensions. You have sense perceptions, hearing, and you have the formless presence.

So you have this light and that which appears in the light. It's always the same, the light of consciousness. So then you grow in presence power as you use all those situations that before were never good enough.

You're always on your way somewhere better. Use those situations to bring presence in, and then that power grows in you. It's only then if that power grows in you, presence power, that you can deal with the heavy, let's call it, use an Eastern term, the karmic stuff.

Those accumulations in you that are old patterns, some of which originating in your present lifetime, in childhood, but in many cases, patterns that go back a long way in time. Your ancestors acting out patterns that your ancestors acted out 500 years ago, 1,000 years ago, 2,000 years ago. It's still the same conditioning.

Or you can look at it in terms of whether you look at it in terms of genetics, that you think that come or in terms of past lifetimes, whatever approach you want to use is fine. The fact is there are accumulations in you. There are patterns of unconsciousness that have been there a long time.

We could call them karmic. Karmic meaning unconscious patterns that you usually identify with as yourself that take you over completely. And the real karma is not the external events in your life.

The external events in your life really trigger the karma that you carry inside and they become your reactions. And your reactions determine how you experience your life. So in a way, you could have the same thing happening to one person creating a certain response and the same event happening to another person creating a totally different response.

For example, when I had just written my first book, the publisher said, why don't you sign some books for some famous people? They might give you an endorsement. So I did and they were sent out and almost nobody replied.

And I didn't realize at the time that those famous people, how many books and manuscripts they get sent every week and every month. Now I'm getting them. And now I'm the one who doesn't reply because you just can't.

It's impossible to read it all even dipping in. They pile up. There's a backlog.

I have now already several months of backlog to get through. So it's very hard, if not impossible. But I didn't know that.

But fortunately, I didn't take it personally without having read the four agreements. I already knew this is not a personal thing. So it was not problematic.

But I've had some instances where people have sent me books and they got extremely upset because they didn't get a reply. And they get more and more upset. And the letters became more and more angry.

And then I became the worst dreadful person in the world. And those are old karmic patterns that people carry. The external event triggers the pattern.

For some people, what becomes a huge drama for one person is an insignificant event for another. So how you experience your life is not really so much to do with what happens to you, but it's how you react. Because every reaction determines the next thing that happens.

So something goes wrong, you make drama out of it. And that creates more stuff. And this is how more karma gets created.

How you react to a person determines how that person reacts to you. And so it's a reflection, in other words, create to a large extent, your life, not to a large extent, completely, your life experience unconsciously. And so to break the old patterns that create so much suffering, unnecessary baggage, I sometimes call it, that you carry around with you, that you, so you meet it, you interpret situations and people through the unnecessary baggage in your mind.

For that to be transcended or dissolved, that requires presence power. The presence needs to be there when the old patterns arise in your life. And that is there so you don't wait for the challenge when hoping that you can stay present because you won't.

Use it when you're not being challenged and invite presence into your life. All those moments that are really precious. And that generates more than you, it's like a, almost like the equivalent on the physical level would be working out.

You get stronger, so to speak. And so it's sometimes, it's only a disaster that makes a person conscious. It has a potential of making a person conscious.

It doesn't always, the potential is not always fulfilled. Often a disaster can make you even more unconscious and more unhappy, but potentially any disaster, any great loss in your life can be the awakener, the awakener. And then you see, for example, many people, when they fall seriously ill, they realize all the things that we're worried about and upset about are quite insignificant.

And suddenly they realize, what was all that about? All that drama that I had to pass 10, 15, 20 years in my life. Nothing.

It was just generated out of nothingness. What is a Shakespearean, a tale told by an idiot full of sound and fury signifying nothing. That is what many people's lives unfortunately boils down to.

Full of sound and fury. And then they die. It was so important, it mattered so much.

And then there's the gravestone. And it's almost a relief that they died because all this stuff finally comes to an end. But does it?

Maybe they continue in another dimension, more drama in the astral realm. So that is the, as I sometimes call it, the sword of presence needs to be there. And you practice in ordinary situations.

And it's wonderful because already there, the benefit is, it's not a preparation for when things, when you're getting challenged. Yes, that also, but the benefit is already there in the moment because the way in which you experience even the ordinary moments, which before I'm so boring and routine and not another, I have to go shopping again and my laundry, do that again and again. Even that is actually quite, when you really bring presence to it, every movement is actually, has a certain quality to it.

You pick something up, put it in the washing machine and suddenly no thinking, just a presence. And you listen to the noise, whatever noises are associated with that particular movement. And it's a pleasant experience.

You could call it a meditation. And then you might lose yourself in the mind and then you come back. So the alertness is there more and more.

And that means the person subsides, the presence arises. So it's like the person is the seed that begins to dissolve slowly. It's still there as long as you have a body, you're still a person, but it becomes transparent.

So the seed, if you want to continue with that analogy, something comes through where the person was, something shines through the person. And that means your identity, and this is a wonderful thing, your sense of who you are is not derived from that particular person that you are in space and time. Your personal history is not, no longer gives you your sense of who you are.

But your sense of who you are is the presence that you sense right now, that you are right now. That is who you are. Yes, you still have your personal history.

It's fine. Don't forget it. You remember exactly what happened.

But you don't go there unnecessarily, trying in your past and continuously revisit, especially the unpleasant things or even the pleasant. Try to revisit this pleasant time five years ago. That was so nice.

And then you miss this moment. Or you revisit painful things in the past. And you derive your sense, your identity from something that happened, you did in the past, something happened to you, you achieved something.

10 years ago, I achieved something. Who cares? Or that was the big failure.

I failed. I failed at my marriage. I failed at my job.

I didn't get, I didn't, I failed at my university. I failed at everything. I failed.

Okay. Now what about this moment? Are you, how can you fail at this moment?

You can only fail at this moment by not being present to this moment. That's the real failure. No other failure.

And then suddenly your sense of identity shifts from this construct in the head that you call me and my past to the alive presence. Even the me and my past construct in your head could not exist without the consciousness that gave it form. So you go deeper and realize this is who I am.

And it's not a conceptual sense of self anymore because everything else is conceptual. Every story you tell yourself in your head is conceptual. Ideas about who I am.

Concepts, in other words, thoughts. So deriving your sense of self from that is very limiting. Somebody asked the question here, the meditation is, who am I?

Somebody asks, who am I? This contemplation message seems to be goal oriented and very appealing, but the spiritual consensus seems to be that enlightenment cannot be made into a goal. I can't tell if these meditations will do what is promised.

Please comment. This person thinks that when I say, who am I, the meditation becomes a goal. No, it's not because you're not asking who am I going to be.

When I'm enlightened, that would be a goal. But you're asking who am I is not a goal. It takes you more deeply into the present.

It takes you into the present. It eliminates past and future. Who am I?

Don't answer the question. That's the essential thing. Any answer to who am I?

You failed. You failed miserably. No, not miserably.

It just means you didn't get it. That's okay. Who am I?

Those words are the pointers. What comes after the pointers is an alert presence in which you do not know who you are, because there's no longer any concepts. And you can't really say, you know, at least not conceptually, you don't know.

You have to have the courage to not know. Not only the courage to not know who you are, also the courage not to interpret other people or situations. You don't need to formulate immediately judgments and concepts about everything around you.

Let it be. Because the moment you start formulating, the clash begins between reality and your mind. Because the concepts say this shouldn't be how it is.

And so this person, they should, the word should comes very often. When you operate through concepts, you can see how frequently the word should comes in. I should have.

I should, he should, he shouldn't have. I should not have. So this is a continuous conflict between the mental expectations and reality.

So this is when you happen to live through concepts. So that goes away and you have the courage to not know who you are. Who am I?

Well, even saying, I don't know, you've gone too far already. Because even that's not totally true. It is true that you do not know conceptually who you are by being able to give some kinds of conceptual answer.

But the miracle is, there is another way of knowing, another dimension in humans that is non-conceptual. And that arises when you're no longer totally trapped in concepts, mental concepts. It's only from the point of view of mental concepts that it appears that you have become completely ignorant when you not judge anymore compulsively.

But there is a deeper knowing that cannot be put into words. It is direct knowing. There are analogies.

There's traditional analogy from the East, the difference between talking about honey and tasting honey. You know that you can know the honey by writing a PhD about honey without ever having tasted it. And you can know everything about honey, but have never tasted it.

And then you can taste the honey without knowing anything conceptually about it. This is an analogy. It's not quite the same.

So there's a direct knowing, and there's a knowing about. Now all conceptual knowledge is knowing about. It's not knowing.

So most people's sense of self or identity is they know things about themselves. And the things they know about themselves is what they have been told by others. That's how it starts.

What your parents tell you about you, what your surroundings tell you about you, what your culture tells you about you, where you fit in in your particular culture, what the world tells you who you are, and you take it on board. And then it becomes what you tell yourself about who you are. And it's always knowing about, but not knowing.

Not the true knowing. That's where the ancient word gnosis comes from. G-N-O-S-I-S.

And this is dreadfully neglected in our ignorant civilization. The deeper level of knowing, they don't even know it exists. And this is why they cannot experience anything deeply.

You can go into the forest or anywhere in nature. Of course, you can walk in the forest and talk about the stock market with your friend. And occasionally you glimpse at the trees.

Oh, that's a nice tree. Now what about those shares? Oh, that's a nice flower.

He tells me I should sell apple shares. So yeah, there you're not there at all. Or you can go through a forest knowing a lot about the forest, which is fine.

You can say, oh, that's such and such a bird. That's such and such a tree. And that's how it grows.

And that's that. Isn't that lovely? I wonder if I can find this kind of fern that I've been...

Oh yes, there it is. And you can know a lot and you can label what you see. Names for trees and birds and animals and plants and flowers.

And miss the knowing. You know a lot about the forest, but do you know the forest? Now to know the forest, your mind has to become still.

And you have to be the presence that experiences everything in the forest. And you become the presence from the point of view of conception knowledge. You don't know anything suddenly anymore.

You're just taking it all in. And what you take in brings a much, there's a deeper dimension suddenly that you were not aware of at all when all you knew was knowing about the forest. And suddenly you experience a depth that is in the forest and in you.

Simultaneous, they go together. A depth opens up and you can sense that the forest is an alive energy field. The forest itself is a presence.

And you can sense the inherent aliveness that pervades the entire forest. And then you go, wow. And you go very alert and you look and listen.

Every sound, every little thing, even a little leaf quivering, the slight breeze and everything is... And what then arises in traditional spiritual terminology is called sacredness. Then you go, wow.

And you walk more carefully. And that is inaccessible to you if all you have is conceptual knowledge about the forest. You have to go into the deeper knowing.

The same applies to knowing another human being. Again, you can know a lot about another person, perhaps because you know their personal history, perhaps you've known them for a long time, or perhaps you know so much about psychology that when you look at a person or the way they behave or move or speak, you can already interpret and know a lot about them. He's such and such a kind of person or that you can apply your knowledge.

Yes. But again, we are missing something very vital. If you only know the person through mental concepts, you're missing the most vital part or dimension of that human being, because then all you know is the limited, all you know is who that person is within the limitations of their conditioning, their form, their physical form and their psychological form.

And emotional, mental form. That's all you, that's knowing about. But to really to go deeper and beyond that in the other person and relate to this human being on a deeper level, you need to let go if only for a moment of the conceptual knowledge and just look and listen.

If they're talking, look, listen. There's an outflow of attention towards the other. And there's a true meeting.

And suddenly you can sense in the same way that you can sense the forest, all you knew was things about the forest. You can now sense an inherent aliveness in the other that has nothing to do with their history. You transcend the karmic limitations in the other, because you have transcended the karmic limitations in yourself by becoming present.

Otherwise, it's just two karmic formations meeting and having a difficult time, for a little while a good time, and then it gets hard. Always does. So that is all part of bringing presence into everyday life.

It is another dimension of consciousness. The most vital thing in your lifetime here is that. It's very much secondary in what situation of your so-called personal life, in what situation that happens to arise.

Whether your life situation is very limited right now, or whether relatively okay, or whether your experience, everybody experiencing is that, I don't think there's anybody who has no problems. Life is problematic. It is.

That's how it is. It's meant to be. Otherwise it wouldn't be.

Life is challenging. It's never not challenging. Unless you go completely unconscious and drifting off to sleep, but then you'll have nightmares.

So regardless of what your particular situation is, whether you are doing a job that could be considered not important, or whether you're doing a job that in the eyes of the world is considered important, is secondary. Whether you are serving coffee at Starbucks, or whether you are the CEO of Starbucks, it doesn't matter. Who cares?

What matters is your state of consciousness. And it is quite possible that the person serving coffee at Starbucks is much more present. I don't know who the CEO of Starbucks is, but it is possible that that person is much more present than the CEO.

Of course it is. And so ultimately what you do is secondary. The important thing is what is the state of consciousness through which you do things.

So this is really to do with inner purpose and outer purpose. As I wrote about in a book, the inner purpose is the awakening. The outer purpose is what you do externally.

And what you do is secondary. As more presence arises in you, it is possible that your outer purpose changes before it suddenly, you get taken away. And suddenly you're not serving coffee at Starbucks anymore.

Suddenly you're taken somewhere totally different and perhaps performing some totally different function. It is important to honor the present moment, which means to be present with what you're doing, no matter what you're doing, so that the mind doesn't tell you that you'd rather be doing something else. Now, if absolutely you cannot surrender to whatever you're doing at any given moment, or let's say it's your work, your job, I would suggest you try first to see if you can give it honor what you are doing, even if your mind tells you it's not important enough and you are really doing something that's beneath you, but you happen to be doing it right now.

So if you can really fully give it your fullest attention, it means presence flows into it. Everything changes. If absolutely you cannot, if your surroundings are so dreadful that every time you're there, you go, ah, then please leave.

Don't do that to yourself. But in many situations, presence can be brought in. And then you can still be, yes, I don't want to be doing this for the rest of my life.

Of course not. But at this moment, you're doing it. And why not honor it so that a quality flows into what you do.

And then much more likely things are going to change than for somebody who is internally at war with what is, who is internally arguing with the present moment and doesn't want to be there. That is really means to be stuck as shown in the movie Groundhog Day. It's a monumental thing because as presence arises and we invited in into everyday life, and then we can apply it when the old patterns come up, the pain body comes up, the strong reactive patterns in certain situations.

This is a huge shift in consciousness as karma dissolves and something else takes its place. You think it's a personal thing. It goes far beyond that.

It's a shift in the collective consciousness. It's an adventure. It's wonderful.

So use what you have, use whatever situation you're in right now. Sometimes the mind says, I don't know what I should be doing in life. I need to figure out what I'm meant to do, what I should be doing, because the mind says, I know I shouldn't be doing this.

And I need to figure out where I'm meant to be, because I know I'm not meant to be here. I should figure out who I'm meant to be, because I know I'm not meant to be this person here. That's not quite somewhat dysfunctional thinking.

The first realization is, if you're here, you might as well accept and admit that this moment is as it is, and I'm where I am. Wherever you go, there you are. It's not only the title of a book, but also a fact.

Wherever you go, there you are. And wherever you are, it's here. And no matter what time you can even think of in your life or some future moment, it's going to be here, now, always.

To cooperate with life, to align yourself with life first, you accept that you should be where you happen to be. That's where you should be, otherwise you wouldn't be there. Oh, that means I can't complain anymore.

Okay, that's true, you can't complain anymore. It does not mean that you cannot see, okay, this is fine, here I am. You can still know where you want to go, but not out of unhappiness or negativity, but you see clearly there are other possibilities.

But you're not denying the present moment, and you're not resisting the present moment, because if you're internally resist the present moment, the intelligence of life cannot fully express itself through you, because it needs for you to be open in the present moment to flow through you. Life wants to move through you and flow through you, but humans are closed. That's already been expressed in the Bible that God wants, if you want to use theistic language, God wants to support you, but you're closed.

So that the power can move through you, you have to be open to the present moment, which means not denying where you are right now and even what you're doing right now. And if absolutely every fiber of your being says no to where you are, let's say you work in a slaughterhouse, but you have to make money to keep your family alive, but every fiber of your being says no, then you need to walk out. Those are extreme situations, but if you cannot walk out, if it's a prison, then you need to go surrender there to the present moment, and you have to go very deeply there, and people have done it and are doing it, and they can no longer argue with the isness of this moment.

So if every fiber of your being says no, if you can, you need to remove yourself, but make sure it's not a pattern that is really in you rather than the external situation, because then you can do something else, and again, that it may well be external. But there are places where you would rather not be, or if you're involved in total insanity, a war situation, everybody's going totally insane, they're killing each other. If you can, of course, rather than saying, I need to stay here because I need to surrender to the present moment, no, if you can, walk away, remove yourself.

If absolutely you cannot, then even there, it can be done, but you have to go very deep. These are some philosophers, existentialist philosophers called that limit situations. If you find yourself in a limit situation with dreadful things going on around you, and you cannot remove yourself, then you have to go very deep into surrender to the present moment, and then sometimes there, even there, miracles happen, even on the outer level, but the miracle then always happens on the inner level, because you become internally free of the situation, and even in hell, if you went deep enough, you could be at peace, and even in heaven, if you're not ready for it, you will think it's hell, because you carry the hell inside your mind, and when you get to heaven, you'll start complaining.

I'd rather be somewhere exciting. So that's our, that's your life purpose, is this presence practice, and then the rest unfolds, the outer purpose, either what you're doing now deepens, and you do it more effectively, and love and joy flows into what you do, and affects other people around you, or you are so present that it becomes incompatible with where you are, and life takes you and says, no, you're not meant to be here, and puts you somewhere else, either because they, you get fired, because you're too present.

Some companies don't want to have presence, so you get fired, and that'll be great, or you walk out one day, you look around, we were meant to be asking questions, but the present moment always determines what happens. There may still be time for a few questions.

Time is now, now, now, now. It's half past now. The strange thing, dividing the day into segments, and, and then there's the week, and there's the months, and then there's the years.

It seems so real, but of course, it's a mental thing, those are as unreal as the equator. We were a few years ago in Ecuador, the country, which is Spanish for equator, because it's situated on the equator, and they have a place where tourists go, and there's a line, and says, this is the equator, and people take photos. There's nothing there, it's just a line.

And in the same way, it's not really 4.30, it's just, it's a mental construct, so that, yes, it's helpful, so that we can meet, rather than saying, one day we are going to meet. But it's not, it's not the year 2013, that's what we say it is. It's a concept, no more.

It's not Monday, it's not whatever it is. These are just, we just, it's not no, the absolute reality is just, it's always just this moment. There was a time when humans had not invented these concepts, and all they ever had was the present moment.

What time? What do you mean, time? What day is it today?

Huh? What year is it? Year?

It's now. Here's a question about observing your thoughts. When observing my thoughts, I notice the observation is made after the thought has passed.

Is the concept of observing one's thoughts supposed to occur simultaneously? For example, a thought arises, and so does the being observing the thought? I hope this makes sense.

Thanks for everything. That's a good question. One talks often about observing one's thoughts.

Can you observe a thought while it arises, or does the observation come in afterwards? As presence arises, there is presence in the background, and thoughts arise in the foreground of your being. So the thoughts arise.

This is very hard to describe, but I'm sure many of you know it because you have experienced it. There is a knowing that these thoughts are arising. There is not a total identification with the arising thoughts.

They arise. They may be quite powerful, but if presence remains, there is a remnant of awareness in the background. You're not totally drawn into the thoughts that arise, which could be opinions, which could be likes and dislikes, which could be all kinds of things.

You're not totally identified with the thoughts anymore. The background is there, the background of awareness. That really is the balance that needs to be there in your life between the background, which is presence, and the foreground where things happen.

It's another way of putting it. In the foreground, you're thinking, but while you think, in the background, you still sense a certain presence, a certain field of awareness. And as you listen now, for example, and as I speak now, you're taking in what you're hearing, and external noises, police car going past right now, just to give us an example, at the right moment.

You hear those things that are happening, and in the background, there is an awareness that this is happening. So there's a sense perception. Now you hear my words.

You take them in. They become thoughts in your head. That's the only way you can access them.

Auditory perception goes into your ears. Signals are transmitted to your brain. The brain reassembles the signals, and then they become thoughts again.

But you're also aware of your own presence in the background. I'm aware of the presence out of which the words come. So you're no longer totally trapped in the stream of thought as those people in whom the presence or awareness has not been awakened yet.

They are totally at the mercy of every thought that arises, and then they get continuously dragged along by this stream of incessant compulsive thinking, accompanied by certain emotions that reflect the kinds of thoughts they think, and that's their life. Every waking moment, with a few brief intervals of relief when they go, ah, that's beautiful, or they pet a dog, ah, for a moment the mind stops, and then it comes back. Or you have a child, a baby, you look into the baby's eyes, and for a moment there's a space that opens up.

It's whenever you feel really good, and there's a goodness that you feel, a joy comes in for a moment. There's a space of no thought, just aware presence, and that's where it comes through. And then the clouds come back again, and they become strongest when there's a reaction towards something, against something.

The awareness is in the background, and the thoughts are happening, so you're not totally identified anymore with it. That's really how it is. A wonderful thing that happens, as I sometimes put it, thinking old patterns may still arise, old thoughts may still arise.

You don't completely believe in them anymore, not completely, in other words, they lose their power to make you unhappy. Judgments may still be there, but they are recognized as judgments. So you're not totally in the grip anymore of thoughts, and then thought is no longer problematic.

It actually can be a useful tool for creating certain things. Thought is helpful. You can write a book.

You need thought to write a book. You need thought for many things, and for many other things, you don't need thought. To be a good dancer, you don't need much thought.

You need to be able to step out of thought while you dance, or even a painter, a great painter wouldn't say, no, I wonder what color is going in that corner there. That's not how creation works. You look, and you're present, and something comes through you, and that's the state of creation.

You go into the state of creation. For certain creative things, the presence may have to use your mind. It flows into your mind, and then you speak from presence.

Maybe you become a public speaker, and to be a powerful public speaker, you need to be able to speak from presence, and people listen. When you read your script, they are half away. They are only half listening, or they drift off because the power isn't there.

You read, ladies and gentlemen, it is my honor to be here tonight to address you, blah, blah, blah, blah, but if you lose your script, you go, words, I don't know what to say right now, and everybody listens. You say, I don't know what to say, but they can feel the words are genuine and come out of this moment. I feel so nervous as I sit here facing, I don't, I'm just saying.

I feel so nervous as I sit here facing all of you, then people begin to wake up and listen, because the words come out of that moment, out of presence, and they are genuine, and then maybe you forget all the things that you meant to say, and it doesn't matter anymore, but you connect, and not only when you talk to an audience, when you talk to an individual person, too. You can be boring, just repeat all this stuff that you've repeated already many times, all the predictable reactions, or you can be alert, present, spacious, listening. Some of the best interviewers can do that.

When they interview a person, they are spontaneous. They may have some questions prepared, but most of the interview then develops spontaneously, and they are the few that are, they always say the right thing at the right moment, and there's a true meeting, but you have to be thoughtless in that moment, thoughtless awareness, and when thought happens, it's in the background. When no thought happens, what before was the background becomes the foreground, like now.

I've been speaking, and as I've been speaking, in the background was the awareness.

Now that I stop speaking for a moment, the awareness that was in the background comes into the foreground, and when words happen, it recedes again a little bit, and the words appear in the space of awareness, and then the words stop, and it comes into the foreground, or you could be interested in certain things that you're looking at or listening to, and still feel your essential beingness there, listening, and then you could close your eyes, and all you sense is the presence, and you open your eyes, and there's sense perception again. Another analogy you could use is the awareness is a canvas, and your life is painted on the canvas, and it changes all the time, although some fixtures, some things seem pretty permanent, so it's a complex canvas.

There's a complex picture, and colors appear, and figures appear, meaning things happen, thoughts, emotions, events, but they all appear on this canvas, and sometimes, if you awaken spiritually, little spaces appear on the canvas, and it's just white. Nothing appears there. There's stillness, little moments of stillness here and there, then covered up again, and then as awareness emerges as a more permanent state or realization, the canvas shines through the colors that appear on it, and the figures, and the pictures that appear on it, and so there's an awareness of the canvas, and at the same time, life happens.

It's an analogy, no more, and then the canvas actually has a more ethereal quality to it, because it's not just the stuff on it. It's that which enables the stuff that's on it to be shines through, and that's a wonderful shift in your life, because before that happens, all you have is the stuff of your life. You don't know anything other than the stuff that makes up your life, which by stuff, I use that generic term.

Stuff means external stuff and inner stuff. External stuff is all the things that go on in your life. It includes all the possessions of the stuff that's in your house or your apartment that you may be looking for more stuff to put in there, and then there's the stuff of your relationships, and your finances, and the stuff of all, and then the inner stuff of all your thoughts that go one thought after another, more stuff, so most people's lives are just filled with stuff.

Stuff is my life. I'm using that generic term to include almost everything, but they're not aware of that which is beyond stuff, but enables all the stuff to be. The canvas, which of course is the space, the consciousness, so they're not aware.

As that awareness comes into your life, the canvas shines through the stuff, and the stuff is no longer opaque. It does not have that density anymore. It still happens, and that is liberation from just stuff.

That is the transcendent dimension that then shines into your life. That is the true meaning of spiritual. Spiritual is not a thought.

It's not even a feeling, and it's not a belief, and talking about God 12 hours a day doesn't make you spiritual either, and so when that shines through in your life, you can give a sigh of relief. Oh, then it does get easier.

Eckhart Tolle Dealing With Expectations [57c9f66f-d30f-46c1-8330-ad5100041a01]

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:21)

Dealing with expectations. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions from a live audience about issues many people can relate to, like what to do when you start to compare yourself to others, how to turn family arguments into opportunities for conscious relationships, and surprisingly, how anger can be used as a tool for spiritual growth.

[Speaker 6] (0:24 - 0:41)

Hi, Eckhart. I often find myself comparing myself to other people, my physical appearance compared to other women, and it gets very tiresome, as you can imagine. And I was wondering if you had any practical advice for helping dissolve this.

[Speaker 1] (0:42 - 0:53)

Okay, thanks. And I assume sometimes you come out as better than and at other times as not as good as, is that right?

[Speaker 6] (0:53 - 0:54)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (0:54 - 0:58)

And better than feels good and not as good as doesn't.

[Speaker 6] (0:59 - 1:01)

It all feels tiresome, to be honest.

[Speaker 1] (1:01 - 14:10)

That's a good point to reach. To get tired of an old pattern like that, then you're ready to let go. As the Course in Miracles puts it, comparison is one of the favorite ego devices to keep the ego going, or it keeps itself going, especially by comparing, whether the comparing is to do with external appearance, or comparing other things, evaluating others in comparison to how in your own mind you evaluate yourself.

It could be to do with knowledge, education, class, social class, strength, physical strength, how many possessions he's worth, such and such amount of dollars, and I'm worth so much more than he or so much less than he, all kinds of things. Implied in that is a sense of desire on the part of the ego to enhance its sense of worthiness. And if anybody has less than you, or appears less than you, or can do less than you, in some nonsensical way, it seems to add something to your sense of self.

Of course, it doesn't make sense. It's a little bit absurd, but that's how the ego functions. And in reverse, it feels to the ego as if somebody has just achieved something, or that you haven't achieved.

It feels to the ego as if something of its sense of self had been taken away. So it gets deflated and is not happy. If you're really trapped in ego, you're not happy when something good happens to somebody close to you.

Because it feels to the ego as if it had become diminished because somebody else has enhanced their identity in the eyes of the ego. You can see when you explain it in this way so that you can actually see how it operates, then you realize that it is absurd to feel you have become less because somebody else has received more of something, or can do something that you can't do. And so you can see how unreal that sense of identity is.

You feel diminished because something good has happened to somebody close to you. And in some cases, if the ego is very strong in you without any trace of awareness, you cannot even admit to yourself that you feel bad when something good has happened to somebody close to you. It's there as an unreal, an unwitnessed emotion, and then it might come out when you speak to that person with a desire to diminish what they now have that you don't have.

And it's totally unconscious. With you, you are not totally unconscious. There's already an awareness in you that is aware of that pattern.

If there were no awareness in you, you wouldn't be asking that question. You wouldn't be sitting here. You would be acting out that pattern.

And next time somebody in your vicinity has just bought a new dress that looks absolutely stunning, you would look at it, if you were totally trapped in ego, you would look at it, and something inside you would contract. But you wouldn't know that because there wouldn't be enough awareness for that. But that contraction as an energy field would then flow into your mind.

And then words would come out of your mouth, again unconscious, to diminish the worthiness of that dress. And you might say, oh, that dress, that would look good on your sister. And the other person, who perhaps is also identified completely with their appearance, suddenly feels hurt deeply.

And in both cases, the famous saying applies, they know not what they do, which of course points to complete lack of awareness. So in that sense, people hurt each other and try to take away in order to feel. And the moment the ego said that would look good on somebody else, it feels a little bit better already because you've taken away a bit from the value, the perceived value of that thing.

It's a delusional system. But many people are still totally trapped in that. Not with you, of course, it's not the case with you.

You're not totally trapped. It still operates in you to some extent, but not totally trapped. So there's some connection with value, your own sense of worth or worthiness, which is connected to your external appearance.

It could be connected to other things. It may also be connected to other things. So there's an image in you of who you are.

It's a surface image of the surface appearance, your body. And the solution, of course, is very simple. It's to take your attention beyond the surface, where it usually is, the surface of your body, the surface of that which is on top of your body, the clothes.

Take your attention deeper to the inherent energy field or aliveness or conscious presence that pervades who you are, the entire being, nothing to do with the external, nothing to do with the shape of the body or what's on top of the body. And if you begin to go there, into that dimension, take your attention into that dimension where you are not the external form, but you sense the very essence of who you are, you sense the life that you are beyond the form, then you no longer need to identify with form. You're no longer then threatened when somebody else's form is seemingly better than yours.

It no longer does anything to your sense of identity or your sense of worthiness. And then you're free. And you're free to admire somebody else's good looks.

And you're free to be happy with the way you look for the time being until years pass. And then perhaps the body doesn't look that great anymore. After a few more decades, you have a few decades to go.

But they pass fairly quickly, too. And the further you go, the more quickly they seem to pass. That's strange.

And so the time comes when you notice a deterioration in the appearance, and then you begin to notice that most women around you actually look better than you for the simple fact that they're younger. And you can appreciate the way they look because they are a manifestation of life without feeling threatened in any way in your own sense of self because the life of which those lovely women around you are manifestations, you can sense that very life in its essence in you. So you can acknowledge all the beauty that is in others, even though in the external form of you, that beauty may no longer be manifested as such.

And that's wonderful freedom to appreciate the beauty that you see around you, even if your own body is no longer part of that. Because there is a beauty in you that has nothing to do with form. And one could call that the essence of all beauty.

That's the very essence of life itself. So when you have the essence, you appreciate the external manifestation of it in its so-called, one could say, diluted form in the flower. Now, most egos are not threatened by flowers.

But in another human being, you can appreciate the beauty in another human being. And the comparison, the compulsive need to compare disappears. There isn't, oh, what about me?

That thought pattern dissolved long ago. By the time you reach the point where most women will externally look better than you, then it's disappearing already. So you don't need to wait a few more decades to get there.

Or the ego can say, okay, I have another 30 years I can identify with my good looks. So the answer, of course, is then find the essence of who you are, which is what all this teaching is always about. Find the essence of who you are so that you get in touch with the inherent sense of beingness or aliveness or presence within you, which pervades the entire so-called physical body, but is not the physical body.

And as I speak about it now, you should be able to feel that within you, the fact that there is an aliveness that pervades your entire being. Can you feel that? That is more essentially who you are than the external appearance of who you are.

And that is going to be exactly the same in 30 years time as it is now. Then you become free of form, you're essentially the consciousness behind it all. So know yourself as that life or consciousness, there's the same no thing, know yourself as that and you're free of the ego.

The ego is there as a substitute. It's to seek yourself in some form. That's the delusion.

And it creates an unhappy life. So it's a wonderful thing. It's also liberating to see the absurdity of the ego.

Once you see how the patterns that I just described just now, you can see how mad it is to feel diminished when something good happens to somebody else, to feel enhanced when something bad happens to somebody else, and not even know it. So let's see what happens next time. And the same thing happens with a beautiful object, whether it's a natural object or something that is a man-made object, you can appreciate the beauty of whatever form again here without the ego need of owning it.

I'd love to have that and keep it and make it mine. You may see in some shop windows, you see actually beautiful human-made things. And you can appreciate the beauty for 30 seconds or one minute without feeling necessarily the need to go into the shop and say, how much is that?

I want to have it because I will feel enhanced in my sense of self or aliveness if I have that object and add it to my life. Which doesn't mean that you never buy anything and you might find yourself going into it and buying a lovely object but not out of the need to have it, just simply appreciating its beauty. I wouldn't mind having that around for a while in my place and appreciating the beauty, so you can, but many times you will find it's enough to look and feel the recognition of beauty and you walk on.

Now this may not be good for the economy, but that can't be helped. There will have to be changes in the economic structure of the world that we have created. That's inevitable.

So we are not here to feed the old patterns, neither inner nor outer.

[Speaker 6] (14:10 - 14:11)

Thank you.

[Speaker 7] (14:11 - 14:26)

Hi. I have met people in my life that have an awareness and an intuition that can only come with presence. That's very attractive and it invites trust.

So my question is, can presence be used to manipulate or use others?

[Speaker 1] (14:27 - 14:32)

Without going into detail, would you say that you have experienced something like that?

[Speaker 7] (14:33 - 14:33)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (14:33 - 24:48)

Now presence cannot be used, but presence can arise and then be covered up again and then the ego returns and claims something. It claims ownership of presence. That's one thing that can happen.

It claims the ownership of the power that is in presence. That's the downfall frequently of spiritual teachers. Who have periods of egolessness and the ego has become dormant or stepped aside and presence arises, but the ego is still lurking in the background and then it reasserts itself.

And then you know it when the spiritual teacher claims some sort of specialness for him or herself when he says, I'm the most advanced human that ever lived and ever will live on the planet. Then you know that probably the ego has crept back in, even though that teacher might have uttered beautiful words only a few weeks ago, inspired words. So that can happen and has happened.

There are certain abilities that some people have, that's now the second part of the answer. There are certain abilities that some people have that sometimes look as if they were things that only an awakened human being, an ability that only an awakened human being would have. It sometimes appears like that.

For example, what in India they call siddhis, which are psychic powers, people who are able to have sometimes clairvoyance or can tell you what the name of your grandmother was and at what age your grandmother died. They can perhaps influence others, infuse their own will into others and make people do certain things that otherwise they would not do. They can have a hypnotic effect on others.

Sometimes it looks to an outside observer as if you were looking at a highly evolved being, an enlightened being, but that is not necessarily the case because there are many humans who have psychic powers which do not necessarily go together with spiritual realization. But if you don't know that, you can easily be led to believe that these things can only come out of spiritual realization. If I levitated here and now and somebody films it, then suddenly large numbers of people all over the world would believe that I am the most highly evolved human being on the planet.

But it could be that I simply have certain psychic powers, like an athlete on the physical realm has developed enormous physical abilities that other humans don't have because he or she has trained certain muscles and limbs to move in certain ways. So he has things that are almost superhuman. In the same way, there are some humans who have psychic abilities.

They're like athletes in the psychic realm and doesn't necessarily go together with absence of ego. In fact, it's quite dangerous if there's a big ego that is hidden. Egos are also good at concealing themselves.

So the ego is hidden and this person is able to bend spoons or to manifest things out of nothing. Well, it seems out of nothing, but maybe the sleeve is not nothing. It manifests somewhere.

I haven't practiced enough. I can't do it. So those things are often, of course, often used, not necessarily often used in the service of the ego, but presence itself cannot be used by the ego.

Ego can only come in once presence has been covered up, receded into the background, and then the ego claims something, perhaps because there was inspiration there. And then with some spiritual teachers, you can see the difference once the presence has been covered up. Also, the quality of what they say is diminished.

It no longer has the inspirational power that it had before. There's also a difference between charisma and presence that is sometimes confused by people. There are certain humans, some are spiritual teachers, other humans that perhaps have certain powers or positions of power, who seem to emanate a very powerful energy field.

And that is also, in those of you who don't know the difference, can also be confused with spiritual attainment or enlightenment or awakening. Some spiritual teachers have both presence and charisma. Some have only presence.

Presence is more fine, an energy field of a higher vibrational frequency than charisma. Charisma is a very, very powerful, it's basically, it's chi or shakti that emanates from them. And I have described chi or shakti, whatever you want to call it, as the bridge between the manifested physical world and the unmanifested formlessness.

In between, as form is born out of formlessness, it becomes energy. It's the first manifestation is energy. You can't see it with your senses.

And that energy is chi. And then that energy flows into creating form. So it's a bridge between form and some humans are in touch with that level.

And those humans have charisma. Sometimes spiritual teachers have, as I just said, have both presence and occasionally charisma, or psychic powers can often come with charisma also. And then you have people who are in powerful positions in the world.

And because of the energy that flows through them and the attention they're given by other humans, they develop the charisma, they are in touch with that energy source of chi. For example, obviously, some of these are not necessarily great, good people, because that energy can be used for egoic purposes. And in the past, kings often had that.

In medieval times, many kings were reputed to have the ability to heal. And so they called it the royal touch, and often sick people were brought into the presence of the king, and he would place his hand on them, and many of them were healed. And through perhaps the power of the energy added to that, of course, is also their belief that in the presence of the king you are healed.

So it was their own power, of course, very often that healed them. It's sometimes hard to tell the difference, unless you're already firmly established in presence yourself, between charisma and presence. And some spiritual teachers, I don't know whether you had contact with what you just mentioned, whether that was a spiritual teacher that you had contact with and you witnessed what you just described.

Some spiritual teachers, I'm not mentioning any names, of course, whether they're alive or dead, I'm not mentioning any names, but there are some who very clearly had enormous energy outflow, and people would get virtually addicted to their energy field. Whenever they came into the presence of the teacher, they could feel, ah. And with presence, a little bit like that happens also, because presence in one human being awakens your own presence.

But the teacher needs to point out that what you're experiencing is yourself. It's not the energy of the teacher. The energy of the teacher awakens your presence.

But there's a misperception when humans are addicted to an external figure, to the energy that comes from that figure, they are dependent on him or her for their energy intake. But a very clear sign that they're not being enlightened is when they go back into ordinary life, they're just as unconscious as everybody else. So there's no real change.

There's only an energy absorption, which really, the energy, you should find your own source from within rather than depend on an external source. So presence cannot be used. Two things can happen.

Either it's not presence, it's she in the service of the ego, or it was presence, but it became covered up, ego reasserted itself, and then made claims and tried to manipulate people for its own purposes. Now which one it is in your case, I don't know, but perhaps you can, you will be able to see for yourself. The main thing is a person in presence, presence and ego cannot coexist at the same time.

So the ego can be in the background, but it cannot use, ego cannot use presence when presence is present.

[Speaker 7] (24:49 - 24:50)

I understand.

[Speaker 1] (24:50 - 24:51)

Thank you.

[Speaker 5] (24:52 - 25:01)

My question is, should we seek professional help to recover missing or lost childhood memories?

[Speaker 1] (25:02 - 25:07)

Professional help? You feel inclined to seek professional help yourself?

[Speaker 5] (25:08 - 25:18)

No, not really. I guess a part of me is concerned that, because I cannot remember, that possibly I have a negative energy that I've got stored.

[Speaker 1] (25:18 - 28:13)

Yes. I would not categorically say don't, because usually the focal point of this teaching is, of course, the present moment, and to address whatever is arising in the present moment. And often what is arising in the present moment is something from the past, a past pattern, a past emotion, a past feeling.

At some point it arises in the now, and it's there that you bring your awareness to it. And by bringing your awareness to it as it arises in the now, something happens, certain transmutation happens to that. The past gets burned up in the presence, in the presence of presence, the past gets burned up as it arises.

And when that happens, you may suddenly remember where that emotion that is now seen in the light of presence, where that emotion originated. So the memory can come spontaneously and suddenly when the light of presence shines on an old pattern that is arising in the present moment. And then suddenly you can sometimes see, oh, that's where it came from, that's where it started.

In other cases, you may never know where it started, but it's enough for it to come into the light of presence and being transmuted through the light of presence. But however, this is generally, I believe, true. Nevertheless, I would not categorically say to everybody not to seek something that happened once.

There may be certain cases where it is advisable to look at the past, I would say exceptional cases, and only the person who is guiding you, who hopefully is quite present, could judge that, where it may occasionally be advisable to see if you can retrieve a memory. So my first choice is always, and my first recommendation is always, look at what arises in the present moment. And as you are present, the past, in some form, will come into the light of presence.

An event happens, it triggers something old, and there you have it. Where it originally came from is secondary. If the memory is there, fine, it suddenly arises.

If you never know where it originally came from, it doesn't matter, it's now in the light of presence. You may have to go back generations, where the same dysfunction was inflicted from parents to their children, to their children, to their children, to their children.

[Speaker 5] (28:13 - 28:14)

Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (28:17 - 28:52)

Hello. I've got two questions. The first one is, how do I stay present with my family members when we're all together?

And this comes up at dinner time. I can be present with myself, and present with one family member, but when there's three of them together, or two of them together, my presence goes out the window, and I get caught up in the drama of what's going on. My second question is from my husband, who's not here tonight, and he was recently diagnosed with Parkinson's disease.

And his question to you is, how can he heal this?

Well, let's start with the second one. There's something more important. Whether or not it can be healed, I don't know.

There is something more important than the healing of that physical condition, or any physical condition. And that which is more important than the healing, which I'm going to just briefly talk about now, is also that which in some cases brings about the healing. But that's not the main thing.

That which is more important than the healing is to use the condition, in this case it's a deterioration of the physical form, which comes slowly over years, as far as I understand, to use that to push you into intense presence practice. That's all you can do. So allow it to push you into that which changes the entire vibrational frequency of the physical body.

When you truly live in presence, which affects every cell of the body, the entire frequency of the physical form changes. If you do intense body awareness, you can feel that for yourself. It's an enormously enlivening energy field.

That practice also burns up the ego. So the opportunity there is you have an enormous motivation to embrace the state of consciousness that we call presence. That's the most vital thing.

And that may bring about healing, or if it does not bring about healing, it may delay considerably the onset or the process of deterioration that comes with that disease. So the predictions that the doctors make are not necessarily correct, especially if surrender happens. So surrender, it's not uncommon for the state of surrender to give you much more to slow down the progress of the disease.

It sometimes also happens that through surrender, which brings about presence, that healing happens. But healing is a beautiful byproduct of the arising of presence, which sometimes occurs, but don't expect it necessarily to occur. Considering to the importance of the arising of presence, the healing of the physical body is a secondary matter, because the arising of presence is so much more vitally important because it is part of the entire evolutionary impulse of the universe, compared to which whether this body gets healed or not, and by getting healed lives a few more years, a little bit longer than it would otherwise live, is not that important. As you have both embarked already on the awakening process, you can also help him. It's wonderful if the two of you are practicing presence.

He would quickly become more advanced than you because his motivation is so much stronger through the physical condition. So it's a beautiful opportunity. Don't believe in all the predictions.

Welcome healing if it happens, but don't believe that healing is the that which matters most here. Whether he becomes healed or not, I don't know what age he is now. What age is he now?

[Speaker 2] (32:27 - 32:28)

He's 59.

[Speaker 1] (32:28 - 32:53)

59. So in the meantime, what really matters is whether the flowering of consciousness happened through that particular form, and whether he has 40 years to live or 10 years to live is less important, as far as the flowering of consciousness is what matters. And now your relatives?

[Speaker 2] (32:54 - 32:56)

My children and my husband.

[Speaker 1] (32:57 - 32:59)

When they come together?

[Speaker 2] (32:59 - 33:03)

At the dinner table, and there's dramas going on.

[Speaker 1] (33:03 - 33:06)

How do you lose presence? You get drawn into...

[Speaker 2] (33:06 - 33:36)

I get drawn into it. I also have a special needs daughter, the younger one, and she wants my attention. My husband wants my attention, and I have a teenage daughter who usually doesn't want my attention at all.

Yeah, but it's a dynamic there, and then my husband and my teenage daughter going at it, and me wanting to protect her and then take care of the younger one's needs. I basically just want to run away, not come back home. Yeah.

Well, that's also very good practice. Just be aware of, if you're able to not lose yourself, when you give attention, as you must give attention, of course, it's wonderful to give attention to your child or to another human being, but not to lose yourself in the giving of attention so that you are connected with the source of attention, which is within you, without losing this connectedness with the source, then your attention can flow and you can say something to your child, say something to the other, without losing yourself in that movement. And again, inner body awareness can be the anchor for staying present. So as you sit at the table, you have to feel yourself, feel your inner being, and then you're rooted in being, and then you can give attention, and you can feel the connectedness with being.

You're not lost then in the mental realm. They may be, but something, if there's only one person who stays connected, it usually affects the entire energy field in the room, in the same way that a deeply unconscious person also affects the entire energy field in the room, and if there is a deeply unconscious person there, for example, a deeply negative person, that may not be the case in your family, then your presence would have to be quite intense to counteract that.

It doesn't fight it, you don't fight the darkness, just the light needs to be stronger, you turn up the dimmer switch. But you have to turn it up anyway, to some extent, as you sit with people at home. There's also the additional factor that people with whom you share a lot of past, it's sometimes more difficult to stay present with them than people with whom you don't share so much past people, acquaintances, friends, but family members that goes back often a very long time, but it's a lovely challenge too.

So practice when you're just with one or two people there, and then there's enough presence power in you, so that you can sustain presence even when there are more. What is required here is vigilance of your own energy, your own consciousness. Without the vigilance, you could call it attention too, as one Zen master explains that the essence of Zen is just this, the raised finger.

That was his explanation for Zen, that's all that's needed, attention. That means alert presence, vigilance. So it needs to be particularly strong when you're in the presence of a number of people who are mind dominated, as most humans still are, it needs to be particularly strong when you're with somebody who is mentally disturbed, intense vigilance, intense presence required.

It needs to be particularly strong when you have a physical condition and a serious so-called illness, then that can be the motivating force for intense presence or vigilance. You can see how much more helpful the raised finger is than conceptual explanations.

You cannot conceptually explain what presence is or what vigilance is to the mind, because it immediately takes you beyond the mind.

And sometimes people ask, I had somebody after a week-long retreat some years ago who asked, can you just explain again the concept of presence? I just want to hear again what it really actually is. I didn't quite get it.

The entire week was the practice of presence, but his mind said, I didn't quite get it. Of course it didn't get it, because he was expecting to understand conceptually, and he thought, if I just explain a little bit more, then he'll really become present. No, I've already said too much.

Presence is just attention. Attention is non-conceptual intelligence. It's the spacious awareness.

This attention basically means there's little or no thought. There's just consciousness, just the light. So you shine the light on people, and then you can speak, and the light is still there, and you speak.

The presence is there. In other words, as I'm speaking to you now, the presence is there, but the words are also there. They come out of the presence.

And if there's a child here that says, Daddy, Daddy, he just took away my toy. Tell him not to do that. You can look at him in that lovely presence in which there's also compassion and benevolence.

It's all part of that. And you look at the child and say, OK, well, just don't talk now. Say whatever comes to you without losing yourself in the drama, the daily drama, the drama of daily existence, the nervousness of that.

So that's your job. OK.

[Speaker 2] (39:08 - 39:09)

Thank you. Thank you very much.

[Speaker 3] (39:10 - 39:54)

Hi. I often feel overwhelmed by anger. And that anger makes me throw my spiritual practice really out of the window.

It's like a big impotence that I feel, and pessimism. So it's not going to work anyway. So just hell with it.

That's one thing. And the other thing is, I also feel very often that something is wrong. So I need to take some action to correct something that probably is just imaginary.

So it's unreal. So there is no action needed, most probably, but I have to do something about it.

[Speaker 8] (39:54 - 39:54)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (39:55 - 39:57)

So and I get carried away by that.

[Speaker 8] (39:58 - 39:58)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (39:58 - 40:05)

Yeah. For example, right now, I feel my heartbeat very strongly. Yes.

And I guess there's no reason for that.

[Speaker 1] (40:05 - 41:06)

But well, you're doing public speaking right now. So maybe that's why. Yeah.

And that's fine. You just you acknowledge that the heart is beating and you let that be. And the feeling that something is wrong, that's not a personal problem of yours.

It's a universal human condition that to carry that feeling inside that something is wrong. And then the mind looks for what can I do about this? Or where is it?

Where is the thing that's wrong? And then it misinterprets situations. So anger, when anger comes, of course, the energy field of it immediately flows into your mind.

And the thoughts that you then think are reflections of the anger. The anger makes you think certain thoughts. And as you put it, it says all that spiritual stuff obviously doesn't work.

These are thoughts that come out of the anger, the energy field.

[Speaker 3] (41:06 - 41:17)

Yes, or whatever I do, it's gonna be always the same. And, you know, no point of it, because it's not going to work. So that's the kind of thoughts that it generates.

[Speaker 1] (41:17 - 45:12)

Yes. But next time it happens, see if you are able to, in addition to thinking those thoughts. Well, at the same time, you can be aware that these are thoughts that have arisen out of the energy field of anger.

In other words, see if you can have an awareness. It's not easy with anger, because it comes so suddenly. Whether you can have an awareness, not only that there's the energy of anger flowing through you, but also perhaps that the energy of anger, which may be old anger that has lived in you for a long time, pain body, I call it, which can easily then rise into your mind and control your thoughts.

Are you able to stay aware while it happens and recognize anger as an expression of the pain body? And if you are thinking angry thoughts, to realize that these are the thoughts of anger. Anger is thinking these thoughts.

They are not true. So they are simply thoughts that reflect the energy field of anger. So the experiment then is whether you can stay aware as the observer or the witness of those thoughts and of the energy field of anger.

You may not. I'm just suggesting it as an experiment. Whether or not you're able to stay present depends on how much presence there is already in you, how much presence power there is already in you.

Perhaps after having spent some time here with us, there may be more presence power in you because this energy field is helpful for drawing that out of you. Once you are there as the witness, then changes begin to happen. You don't even have to do anything.

You know what I mean by witness. It's simply to witness, to be aware of the energy so that you don't become completely identified with it. So the witnessing consciousness is in the same way that you now witness perhaps a certain nervousness.

Your heart is beating. There may be a certain nervousness as you stand there. You witness there's the nervousness and there's the heart beating and the witness allows everything to be as it is but there's a deeper dimension in you from where you can say my heart is beating.

I feel nervous energy inside me. These are still verbalizations but beyond the verbalization there's the ability to simply see it so to speak and that will change all the old patterns. The more awareness comes in, the more the old patterns will change.

So you don't have to change yourself because that's complicated. Many people try to do that. I have to change myself.

The most powerful, the real change comes with becoming aware of whatever is happening inside you so that the anger is no longer you. The anger is anger and you are the awareness. You know it.

You see it. You feel it. There it is and that's the decisive shift from being the anger to having the anger in your energy field and observing it.

That's a wonderful shift. So use anger as your spiritual practice. If you fail of course anger will immediately say you see you failed again.

You can't do it. That's the anger speaking.

[Speaker 3] (45:12 - 45:13)

There is something wrong with you.

[Speaker 1] (45:13 - 47:39)

Yes particularly that there's something wrong with me. Now I don't know if you may be surprised to know that there are millions, billions of people on the planet who have that same thought pattern. There's something wrong with me.

It's part of the human ego. So you bring in the awareness and that will change everything. That's the only true key.

If you fail next time the anger arises what happens you will become aware immediately after the anger has subsided. And then oh there it was and I wasn't present. And then the moment will come when you are there in the first, if you can catch the anger the first moment it comes or if you might even see that it could be the result of a thought that creates the anger and if you can be there in the first moment before it becomes the fully blown anger then you can stay there and it might not even become fully blown anger if you catch it the first moment.

You can feel the first stirrings of anger. You may only have three seconds. It may come very quickly.

Anger is like an explosive energy. You may only have two, three, four, five seconds to stay there with your awareness and feel it. Oh it's coming.

There it is. That's the pain body, the angry pain body coming. And if you catch it in the early stage don't suppress it.

By catch it I mean feel it. Be there as the witness. Then you can stay even as it grows.

The witness grows with it. It may not even grow. We'll have to see whether it still grows into full blown anger or not.

That doesn't matter. And so be thankful for your anger because the anger can become a very important spiritual practice for you because through it awareness can grow. So sometimes strange for people to see you can be thankful for things that you think are the most difficult obstacles in your life but they can become your greatest opportunity for spiritual awakening.

Use it as part of your practice.

[Speaker 3] (47:41 - 47:46)

I think the most difficult thing to deal with is impotence. When you feel it's not going to work.

[Speaker 1] (47:47 - 47:47)

Powerlessness.

[Speaker 3] (47:48 - 47:53)

Yes. Deep pessimism. It's not going to work.

You're about to fail.

[Speaker 1] (47:53 - 48:59)

Yes. And you have to recognize that these are thought forms. They are thoughts that arise in your mind.

And when you're aware you don't need to believe in every thought that arises. And that's an enormous freedom. You recognize it as a thought that comes from anger.

Not the truth. It's a thought. A thought form that comes from anger.

The pain body. If a thought comes from anger it's not the truth. It's a distortion.

Recognize it and you say oh there's another thought form that says something negative that there's nothing you can do. You might as well give up. Whatever thoughts come.

Recognize that it's a thought form. Do you see how important that is? And it's always interesting to see how things have evolved as you practice now.

As you bring awareness into the anger see what happens to it a year later.

[Speaker 3] (49:01 - 49:02)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (49:03 - 49:33)

We need to finish now. Thank you. Wonderful.

It's just wonderful to see consciousness evolving, awakening in different ways and that we can be thankful for everything, especially the difficult parts of our life. Because without that there would be no awakening. The challenges create the necessary energy for the flowering of consciousness.

Deepening Presence. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions from a live audience on a wide range of topics like what's the function of the ego? How does it feel to be enlightened?

And what's the best remedy for loneliness and the pain body? Eckhart responds with his renowned wisdom. He says the best motivation for liberation is the desire to stop suffering.

All of life's events can lead to that.

[Speaker 5] (0:37 - 0:52)

My question is around the ego. And is there any, we all have one. And that's I have to believe that the world comes from perfection.

And so is there a positive role? Because we do a lot of talking about making it go away?

[Speaker 1] (0:52 - 16:28)

Yes, thank you. Good question. The ego is has been absolutely a necessary part of the evolution of human consciousness.

Also, we need to be aware before I talk more about that, when we talk of ego, not to confuse ego with what I call form identity. Everybody has a form identity, which means you have a physical form, and you have a psychological form, the person, the makeup of that person on the level of the mind and the emotions. And the psychological form of you and the physical form of you have their place and must not be confused with ego.

So to look after the form of you and to acknowledge and honor it and even improve it is a good thing. You can improve your physical form by exercise and right nutrition. You can improve your psychological form by acquiring new experiences, more knowledge, learning new things.

That's all part of your form identity. As form identity also, you are not complete yet. As form identity, there are many possibilities.

There are many things you can still do unless you are 100 years old, in which case, well, you're returning. You no longer need to do much. As the older you get, the more you go into the being.

But in the meantime, some form is still there. As you get very old, the form begins to fade and then more and more essence, you're more and more just essence. So to acknowledge your own form, and that remains, it does not mean when the ego subsides.

Oh, sorry. What is the difference between your form identity and the ego? Very simple.

Ego means complete identification with your form identity. So that means you only know yourself as the physical vehicle, which may be good looking, not good looking, fat, too thin, too fat, whatever. Great, just right, better than anybody else's or whatever, or getting old.

I don't want to look in the mirror anymore. Whatever. That's the physical form.

There is the mental and emotional form of you. Complete identification with your form identity means ego. So it's important when one speaks of ego to define what one means by ego.

And sometimes people have discussions about ego. One person means something else by that word, and the other person means something very different. So it's very important for us to know how, in what sense we use the word ego.

Now, when I say complete identification with form identity, what does identification mean? Identification means you derive your sense of self from exclusively from the form of you, exclusively from body appearance and abilities and so on, and mind and emotion, knowledge, achievements, ability to do, all the things we've been talking about, form identity. And that is something that was unavoidable, as unavoidable as the human consciousness has been growing for thousands of years, the ability to think grew more and more.

And that's an incredible thing. It was an incredible evolutionary development, the ability to create a consciousness, to create thought. What then happened was that humans who, before the arising of thought, humans lived in a state of connectedness with being, the oneness.

And then very, very gradually, they began to think very gradually. And even when they began to think, that wasn't a problem yet. That was a wondrous thing.

There are some anthropologists, and I believe they are correct, who say that when humans first began to think, which is of course linked with the arising of language, a lot of thinking is words in your mind, the arising of language came, and then as language formed more and more, the ability to think grew more and more. And some anthropologists say, and I believe they are correct, the first humans in those times when the thinking arose, they believed that gods were talking to them because they heard these voices in their head. So they interpreted their thought processes as messages from God, or one God, one of many gods.

So they might say, now go there and kill those people in that village, maybe. But perhaps they were not yet, they had not yet arrived at that state where they felt the need to kill people in the neighboring village, which arose later when they began to identify more and more with the thinking structures in their mind, and a collective ego developed before a personal ego developed. A personal ego is a later stage of development.

So the ability to think arose, and gradually it grew more and more, and their consciousness got drawn more and more into mind, into thought. They lost that sense of rootedness in being gradually, and that was the beginning stages of the ego forming. And this is the reason I would say is why in many civilizations and ancient cultures, there is an ancient myth in many parts of the world called by different names, and that ancient myth is called the Golden Age.

And that tells the story there was once, a long time ago in the distant past, there was a time when humans were happy, when things were well, life was easy. And then for thousands of years, people have been telling that story of these ancient times. And those were the times, the pre-egoic stage of human consciousness, when there was that connectedness.

And that's where animals still live too, in that rootedness in being, before any self-image arose created by thought. But we had to go through that, it is in order to reach another level of consciousness, another evolutionary level, in order to go deeper often you have to lose something that you originally or seemingly lose something you originally had. And when you regain it, and that is the connectedness with being, when you regain it after losing it, you have it at a much deeper level.

So the Golden Age that actually, I believe that myth has a reality to it. There was such a thing a long time ago, that in ancient myth is called the Golden Age, that can and is destined to return, but not in the same way that it was then. The return of the Golden Age means conscious realization of being.

And then that is when, as the ego then dissolves, it was a necessary part of that development of human consciousness. Ego dissolving does not mean that you no longer have a form identity or do not honor your form identity. It simply means that you derive your sense of who you are no longer from anything that constitutes your form.

And so the egoic stage that we have arrived at now is an end stage. And that means as the ego approaches the transition and begins to dissolve, not form identity, that's fine, that's there, but ego as identification with form begins to, is destined to dissolve. It has been an evolutionary stage, an evolutionary development in consciousness, but in the same way that the caterpillar, just before it metamorphoses into a butterfly, experiences life becoming more and more difficult as a caterpillar.

And something seems to be going very wrong for the life of the caterpillar before the butterfly comes out. Oh, if the caterpillar could speak, it would say, I can't stand this anymore. Life is so hard.

Why is it so hard? Because you are supposed to give birth to something totally different, which is you also, but in a totally different manifestation. And so at some point, the caterpillar dissolves or changes into, whoa, what an incredible metamorphosis, the most miraculous thing.

And so the human ego is at a stage now where it becomes more and more dysfunctional. And this started quite a while ago. It becomes more and more dysfunctional in a dangerous way, because of the advances that the mind has progressed more and more, the ability of analytical thinking, science came in.

Science is the applied use of mind, grown and grown and grown. There hasn't yet, we are lagging behind in the growth of consciousness. It has to catch up with the incredible advances in technology and science, the growth of consciousness lagging behind.

And if the egoic state continues for much longer, it creates more and more havoc on the planet because a dysfunctional ego without technology can create a certain amount of havoc, but not that much with a sword or throwing stones. But the more technology develops, the more dangerously dysfunctional the ego becomes in its attempt to have enemies, to fight its enemies, it needs its enemies, always can't do without that, both on a personal level and on a collective level, creating enormous amount of unnecessary conflict, if you really look into it, unnecessary. So we need and we continue to have a form identity.

Yes. The only thing that changes is we don't derive our identity from it anymore. And so the way in which we as a form identity operate in this world becomes very different from the way in which somebody operates who identifies with their form identity.

So that is the transition. There are also, there are ancient stories about this need to lose something in order to regain it at a deeper level, including in the gospels, there's the narrative, it's called the prodigal son. The prodigal son has everything.

He's the son of a wealthy father. This is a parable. He is the son of a wealthy father.

He has everything. And then he says to father, give me my inheritance. I'm going to go away and experience life in a different way.

I want to be independent. I don't want to be part of this. I want my own life.

And the father says, yes, the son goes off into foreign countries and gradually, by the way, there are other versions of it. It's an ancient story, but gradually he squanders his wealth. And not only that, he doesn't even remember who he is anymore.

And at some point, the father sends messengers and the messengers finally find him. And they tell him, don't you know who you are? Oh, not really.

I can't remember. And he's become poor by then. And then they remind him who he is.

And then there's a return journey. He goes back to his father's home. And when he returns home, his father loves him more deeply.

That little thing in the parable points to the fact that when you return and regain what is lost, paradise lost, paradise regained. When you regain what you have lost, there is a greater, deeper consciousness to it. It's a totally different dimension of the same thing.

So that's a wonderful realization. So as this is the path of humanity, we had to go through the ego stage because that's how the ability to think was inseparable from that. And it became so powerful, the ability to think, that it absorbed all our consciousness.

And the power to think will remain, but we will not be dominated by thought. We will not be trapped in thought. In fact, what thought can do once it's no longer egoic is wonderful.

It can create and manifest incredible things. So the answer to your question is, the ego has been a necessary development in the evolution of consciousness. It's coming to its final stage now, but it's not to be confused with who we are on the level of form.

[Speaker 4] (16:34 - 16:36)

To be enlightened, how does it feel like?

[Speaker 1] (16:43 - 16:44)

Feels good.

[Speaker 4] (16:44 - 17:01)

I mean, I need to know what I'm doing. I think I have to go through the mental process of understanding this. What will I get out of this?

[Speaker 1] (17:03 - 23:51)

The motivation to seek enlightenment can be of various kinds. Some work better than others. There's a danger that the search for enlightenment is ego-motivated, that can easily happen.

The ego feels a sense, which is quite normal, of lack or dissatisfaction with the things, either the things it has or the things it has already achieved and didn't fulfill it. And then it went on to something else. And that wasn't quite that fulfilling either.

And then it reads or hears something about the possibility of achieving a state of enlightenment. Well, that sounds much better than all the things I've been looking for so far, because those things haven't satisfied me. So I'm going to go for that.

And then the ego creates, of course, a goal. I want to reach that goal in the same way that before it created other goals that it either reached or did not reach. Either way, it wasn't satisfying.

You might have heard the saying, there are two ways of being unhappy. One is not getting what you want. The other is getting what you want.

That's when the ego operates, that's the case. So either it achieved already what it wanted, and it didn't satisfy it, or it couldn't achieve it, and now it's looking for something else that maybe it could achieve. And enlightenment seems a good option because the Ferrari, that didn't satisfy me.

And then I tried the Lamborghini, and that didn't satisfy me. And then I tried whatever else didn't satisfy me. But enlightenment, that's it.

I want to go for that. And then of course, it wants to know, okay, but what exactly does that mean? I want to know what I'm striving towards, because it might be the wrong thing.

Maybe when I achieve it, I won't be there anymore. Or maybe the only way to achieve it is for me to dissolve. I don't know if I want it anymore.

I think I'm going to ask Eckhart that question. What I can tell you, in addition to what I've already said, is enlightenment will not satisfy your ego. Sorry about that.

Ego needs to be recognized as an illusion, an ultimate fiction in your mind for something else to emerge. And in that sense, one can say, nobody actually becomes enlightened. You don't become enlightened.

But when you get out of the way, there it is. So enlightenment is not something you can actually achieve. And I have no feeling that I achieved anything or that I am enlightened.

I said it feels good because just the present moment feels good. That's all I know. So just even to make that claim, I am enlightened, is ultimately cannot be correct.

Because who is saying that? Who is making that claim? So in ultimate terms, you cannot be enlightened.

But if you, the person, recognize its ephemeral nature, and you no longer see your sense of self there, then something else is suddenly there that has always been there, but you just didn't know it. It was obscured. It was continuously overlooked.

The presence of consciousness was continuously overlooked in every experience. You could have been conscious of it at any moment, but it was overlooked because the hypnotic nature of the sensory world, and especially of the mind, was so overpowering that you overlooked something more essential in you that has always been there, is always there, will always be there. And therefore, if the motivation to seek so-called enlightenment comes from that place of seeking some permanent fulfillment, then it's not going to work.

And there are spiritual practitioners, without knowing it, they spend years and years looking for that thing, and they're mentally projected into this place called future, which, by the way, only exists as a thought, but has no reality as such. There is no future, except as a thought in your head. Nobody has seen future, touched it, been there.

You can't. It's not there. Life is now, always.

There is no future. So if you seek a future state, it's misleading. And if you seek enlightenment in the future, that very search is the obstacle.

So there can be another motivation for seeking enlightenment, but then I would suggest a different word for it, and not enlightenment, but liberation. And that motivation can be not to find some greater fulfillment, but that motivation can be to become free of suffering. So there can be another motivation for seeking enlightenment, but although I would prefer the term liberation here, or in Christian terminology, a related word that's used in Christian terminology is salvation.

So if the suffering in your life gets too much, and then realizing that there is a way beyond suffering and wanting to know more about that, that is a better motivation for finding liberation than seeing what can I get out of it when I finally get enlightened. And of course, the answer is the one that's asking that question won't be even there to experience it.

I want to speak about loneliness and pain body, because since two years I'm traveling alone, trying to do like you, like doing nothing.

[Speaker 1] (24:17 - 24:18)

That's a good try, yeah.

[Speaker 2] (24:22 - 24:43)

And then I have difficulty to accept this nothingness, so then I spend time on devices, on Facebook, and then the pain body arrives, and then sometimes I see the world like it doesn't exist, and that other people are like robots, so it's a lot of suffering. I don't know how to overcome this kind of feeling.

So you've been traveling for a couple of years?

[Speaker 2] (24:47 - 24:54)

Yeah, like one year and a half. I start with India, and then now I'm following you because I went to Norway, New York, Costa Rica.

[Speaker 1] (24:55 - 24:58)

Okay, and you're not running out of money yet?

[Speaker 2] (24:58 - 25:02)

The universe gives me what I need.

[Speaker 1] (25:03 - 25:05)

Okay, that's good. That's a good sign.

[Speaker 2] (25:05 - 25:12)

But it's about like the disconnection with the world when I am alone and with devices.

[Speaker 1] (25:12 - 34:48)

Yes, you're not in a relationship at present, and you haven't been for the past two years, and the relationship has not arisen, or do you on purpose avoid entering a relationship? Okay, well, whatever it is, learning to be with yourself, at ease with yourself. Loneliness can be a great thing when it comes transformed through acceptance into solitude.

Solitude only arises when you accept your aloneness, become completely present, and suddenly you sense your own presence, which does not need anything, is already complete. Which is not to say that on the level of your form, there may not be a need for some company, whether it's physical or emotional or mental or altogether. On the level of form, you will continue to experience certain pulls and certain needs.

On the level of form, if you have no relationship, you may feel that sense of needing something to complete you on the level of form to some extent. That's not a problem if you are rooted in your essence. You can be aware that on the level of form, there are still, there are certain needs, and these needs may be met at some point, or right now, they may not be met, and that no longer matters that much.

It is only of relative importance whether you have a relationship or you don't have a relationship. On the deepest level, you don't need it. On a slightly up, on a form level, you're not complete.

There's masculine, there's the polarities of yin and yang, not necessarily always related to the biological masculine feminine, but you are either, if you are yin, you need some yang. If you are more yang, you need some yin. And that operates on the level of opposites and of form.

It may be advisable for you to engage in some kind of activity so that you can not only practice presence by doing nothing, because it was never my decision when it happened to me. It was not my decision to do nothing for a couple of years or so. By the way, I'm still good at doing nothing, but it wasn't my decision to do nothing in order to achieve some state.

The doing nothing arose because already I was so deeply immersed in presence that I had lost the balance as a human being. I had lost the balance between human and being. I love that word human being.

The English language doesn't have a word for man and woman, like German has Mensch, which is the word for human being. But in English, you have to use two words. But there's the human part of you, that's the form.

There's the being of you, that's the essence. Ultimately, everybody needs to be in some kind of balance between those two. I was immersed in being so deeply that I lost the balance.

I wasn't unhappy about that at all, but I lost the balance between the human. The human became so unimportant to me that I didn't do anything to even, I knew what am I supposed to do with my life, even that didn't arise, that thought. It was so delicious, delightful to be immersed in being.

And that's how this period of complete, not complete, there was some activity because I had to occasionally get little jobs to survive. And occasionally people gave me money, but I did have temporary jobs to survive, so that I was forced occasionally to come out a little bit out of the being. But I didn't last in any job for very long.

The moment I had enough money, I would stop again. So I got temporary jobs at various places. For two weeks, I worked at the kennel club in London, filling out forms of puppies that had just been born of different dogs.

Fortunately, they had no computers at that time yet, because that would have been beyond me. So there was just the bliss of being was so all-consuming that the balance between the human and the being was lost. And then it only began to re-establish itself when people started coming to me and asking me questions.

And the question pulled me out of the being because an answer was required, but the answer came from the being. So when I started answering questions, suddenly there was a flow. And the answering of questions became my doing.

So that's how the balance got re-established slowly. I would not necessarily seek inactivity as a way of achieving a kind of presence. It is sometimes easier to engage in some activity and even engage in relationships and see if you can stay present there.

But it all comes back to really the present moment, whatever it is, wherever you are, wherever you are. Is there enough intensity in you not to be drawn into mind for long periods of time? Is there enough intensity in you to stay present in that state of aloneness so that you can be the consciousness rather than the person?

You are the consciousness. And it could be a great opportunity that you're able to do that, to just travel and explore. But you already went to India.

You did not find what you were seeking, perhaps. And then you came to Eckhart. And there you did not find what you were seeking, perhaps.

And the only place where you can find what you're seeking is within you in the present moment. Doesn't matter where you are. So intensity of presence is important to cut through mind.

Are you motivated enough to have that intensity of presence? And it could well be that there's not enough suffering in your life to provide the motivation. So that is a possibility, but that's not a problem because it'll come.

My sense is that right now is just too easy for you. It's too easy. So the suffering is, I mentioned before, the best motivation for liberation is the desire to escape from suffering or realizing the possibility that is possible to be free of suffering.

And that's why the Buddha chose that term to describe his teaching, which is very wise. What's my teaching about? The Buddha said, I'll tell you what it is about.

It's not about enlightenment. It's not about achieving God realization. It's not about that.

The end of suffering. So it seems that he attracted mostly people who were at that stage where that meant something to them. I don't know if you are at that stage where the end of suffering means enough to you to provide the intensity for awakening.

I was suffering. That was the motivation. I didn't even have a name for awakening.

The wonderful news though is, life always gives you what you need. And it could well be that if you continue your life in this way, the way in which you live will create more and more suffering. Perhaps the loneliness will become unbearable.

And so then the suffering of the loneliness might drive you into a relationship. And then something may go wrong in the relationship. Then the relationship will become unbearable.

And then you will seek out another situation and something will go wrong there. And then that will become unbearable. And then suddenly you will want to be free of suffering.

And there you have the motivation. So whether you carry on the way you are now, fine. Life will give you what you need.

Or if you think, okay, I'll try a relationship. Great too. You will find the necessary suffering to get you there.

Eckhart Tolle Discovering Our Deeper Essence [b6283770-f7c4-40fc-8f78-0f7783bb8d4e]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:34)

Discovering our deeper essence. In this episode, Eckhart reveals why becoming aware of the present moment is synonymous with connecting to the deeper dimension of who we are. He explains how we go beyond the personality to reach our transcendent self.

Eckhart describes how we're not just human doings, we are human beings. He says our primary mission is to integrate the two. He believes this is the most important discovery we can make in our lifetime.

Welcome, everybody. Before we get to the questions, let's just becoming aware of the present moment. No need to call it a meditation, just more simple than that.

Just becoming aware of the present moment. Not only becoming aware of the content of the present moment, what I call the content of the present moment is whatever appears in your awareness. You may have perhaps certain emotions or feelings right now, it's possible, perhaps something that's lingering, something that happened earlier today or who knows, or something that might happen and this has a little bit of residue or whatever it may be, whatever emotion, anxiety or sadness.

But again, if you sense anything like that, that's fine too, that's also what appears. Or any thoughts that come in, also they appear in your awareness, of course. So the present moment is what appears to your sense perception and your inner perception of thoughts and feelings.

But that's not all. Well, that's already a good step in the right direction to become aware of whatever appears in this moment, become more aware of your sense perceptions and become aware of your thoughts or fully feeling or physical feeling in the body, that's good. But becoming aware of the present moment is deeper than that.

You're not only aware of what appears in your field or space of awareness, this is more subtle now, you can also become aware of that space of awareness itself, that is the awareness that makes everything else possible, that's much more subtle. To become aware of that, there needs to be at least a moment of stillness, stillness is inseparable from that stillness, not necessarily outer stillness. Inner stillness means a cessation of the stream of thinking, just a little gap.

What remains at first seems like nothing or nothing much or nothing, certainly nothing interesting. Thoughts are interesting, or it can be very boring too, but even boring thoughts pretend to be interesting. But that space of stillness is not interesting,

So it's something that's overlooked completely for most people. They're looking for the next thing to arise, the next whatever it is, something that's hoped for, something that's feared, whatever it may be. But if you go more deeply into the present moment, you become aware of the essence of the present moment, which is inseparable from the essence of who or what you are beyond the person, the transcendent dimension.

It's very simple, just a brief moment of stillness, but not a tired kind of stillness, an alert stillness. So the real meaning of becoming aware of the present moment really is synonymous with becoming aware of yourself beyond the conditioned entity that is called the person, the deeper dimension to who you are. I would say that that is the most important discovery that you can make in your entire life.

That is what some spiritual traditions call liberation. Liberation from what? Liberation from the conditioned person, the entity, the limited conditioned entity.

Other traditions call it awakening or salvation. So to be able to enter the present moment is something that's a skill, one could almost say, that grows in you, and it becomes easier and easier to step out of the conditioned entity, it doesn't matter for how long, in everyday life, and sense the underlying presence, awareness, whatever you want to call it. But the thing is, that is not an object that you are aware of, although when we use language, it sounds as if it were something that you become aware of, but the real you becoming aware of applies to everything else, because everything else is an object that arises in your field or space of consciousness, sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions, they're all objects, they come and go, but the awareness itself is not an object that you are aware of because you are it. So it becomes aware of itself, you become aware of yourself, and it's only object-subject relationship when you speak about it, but when you actually realize it, it's not a subject-object because it's the arising of self-awareness.

Now, this little talk here, the most important part of it is what I'm not saying, which is the gaps between the words. If you pay attention to the gaps between the words, you have to become aware and still. If you are not still or present, you cannot be aware of the gaps between the words.

You would immediately fill the gaps between the words with your thoughts, thoughts that, for example, are trying to figure out what the speaker has just said, or that takes you somewhere completely different to tomorrow morning or tonight or yesterday or 10 years ago, or the gaps between words become an uncomfortable place, and there's a feeling of frustration, and why is he speaking so slowly? What's he really saying? I don't get it.

I'm trying to get it, but I don't get it. Of course, you don't get it because you can't get it by thinking about it. Now, this is helpful, this little talk.

The purpose of it is to become aware of that which is beyond language and beyond thought, and again, the moment you talk about it becomes falsified to some extent because I've already just said you become aware of it, not really. It's the arising of awareness as yourself, and there you are now a complete human being, and before you were just a human unaware of being. I believe this Chinese sage Confucius said somewhere that humans are not fully human yet.

We are on the way towards becoming fully human, and so one could say, yes, this is what it is because you're not fully human until you are aware that you're a human being, not just human. It's not enough to be human. It's horrible to be just a human.

It's suffering, frustration, fear, regrets, and continuously stuff happening that make your life difficult as a human. There's no end to it. It's not a personal problem or challenge, then it's a collective problem or challenge, and then personal and collective come together.

There's no end to it until you become aware of the transcendent dimension. The mind stops for a moment, and you become aware of the space of awareness, and the tendency is for this to easily, very easily become obscured again when you engage in everyday life, so your mission here is to integrate the dimension of being with your everyday life as a person, a human. No matter what you are engaged in in your personal life, whatever it is, no matter how old you are or what your station is in society, that is your task, is this integration of the transcendent dimension and the conditioned dimension here.

There are other words you could use. You could say integrate doing and being. The person is the doer, and even if you sit still and are not active outwardly, you're still continuously thinking as a person, so you're still doing the thinking.

Well, you're not really doing the thinking, the thinking happens to you, but it's a kind of... Most people don't think they are the victim of their thoughts, but don't even know it. When that level is completely missing the transcendent dimension, you are at the mercy of whatever thoughts arise in your mind, and you confuse those thoughts with who you are.

It's called normal, and you absorb thoughts from the collective mind, facilitated these days by our technology, and then certain thoughts become more predominant than others, they take over your mind, it can happen very easily, and then you derive your sense of identity from a bundle of conditioned thoughts that drown out all other thoughts, or most other thoughts. Some people have obsessive ideas about the world or about themselves, about other people, they're totally in the grip. These are more extreme manifestations of the same dysfunction that is in everybody who has not begun to awaken.

So, in the more extreme manifestation, which are not all that rare either, you are in the grip of very dysfunctional thoughts that act like a virus in your mind, mental virus, affects all other thinking, all other thoughts, and then you look at reality through the veil of that, and you can't even see what's there anymore, because you could look at something that's, it's white, but your thoughts say it's black, and you can't even see that it's white, or the other way around.

Thoughts can be so, become so heavy that they make it impossible for you to actually become aware of reality out there, it can, it's then denied. This can also happen collectively, collective mind viruses, and there are periods of time in human history when certain areas on the planet get taken over by a virus infection, not the virus that we're talking about now, but a mental virus, not the physical virus, taken over by a mental virus, and then an entire collective being taken over by a mental virus. It's sometimes in small areas on the planet for a certain period of time, it's like a disease, and then it subsides, and then you just have the normal identification with thought again, which is dysfunctional enough, but not quite as extreme as those periods when there is a viral infection of sometimes millions of people, for example, I mean, everybody's familiar with witch burnings in the Middle Ages, so it's when a totally unbelievably insane, say, how is it possible that everybody, almost everybody got infected by this?

Then we have certain other, sometimes it could be a religious virus, in religious terms, it could be a political virus, we've had some big ones, they last a few years usually, the infection, National Socialism, the Communism, and we're familiar with that, smaller areas of the planet, Cambodia, for example, under the regime of the Khmer Rouge Pol Pot, not that many people perhaps are aware of that anymore, not that long ago, the country killed one third of its own population, totally insane, taken over by a political virus, so-called political, that said that we need to kill all those who are the oppressors, which means everybody who can read and write, for example, they are obviously the oppressors of the peasants, and let's kill them, and their children, of course, so we get very extreme forms periodically, but they all go back to the normal dysfunction, so sometimes the normal dysfunction, which identification with thought, can become extreme, the only immunity you have against this virus, there is no vaccine, by the way, for the mental virus, you can't inject yourself with something, that doesn't work, the only immunity is awareness, the only immunity is presence, so that when thoughts happen to you, there's the ability to be aware of the thoughts that happen to you, instead of being totally in the grip of the thoughts that happen to you, that's immunity from mental viruses, and I'm glad you're all here, because you have voluntarily come here for the spiritual vaccine against the mental virus, no anti-vaxxers here, and that is the, before we go on to the questions, just a little bit more, it's particularly when a person is confronted with unusual difficulties, problems, adversity, challenges, then it can happen more easily, that this person's level of consciousness decreases, you become more unconscious in the face of extreme challenges, so often extreme challenges make you more unconscious, and then that is when the mental virus can much more easily arise, because there's not enough consciousness left, so when, in other words, when life gets difficult, whether it's on a personal level or on a collective level, when life is always difficult, but when it gets particularly difficult in heart, that is, at those times, whether it's in your personal life, things get difficult, when you lose your job, you lose your livelihood, your career, breakdown of marriage, the relationship, death of a loved one, loss of possessions, loss of status in society, whatever it may be, some collapse in your personal life, something more extreme than the usual difficulties of life, those are times when it's very easy to become reactive and lose consciousness, and then you are much more prone to be taken over by a mental virus, and that can also happen collectively, when the society is faced with extreme challenges, it is much more likely that a collective mental virus may arise, one example from politics in Germany in the 30s, there was a breakdown, a total economic breakdown, everybody lost all their money, inflation was rampant, to buy a loaf of bread you needed a pile of money, just to get a million marks to buy a loaf of bread, everybody lost all their savings, everything, unemployment, complete collapse on many levels, and of course, fear arose, enormous fear in people, and then the moment the fear gets intensified, then you are really susceptible to that virus, and then very quickly, a collective viral infection, mental virus infection happened, and the virus infection, the mental virus, it lowers consciousness, it makes you, to put it bluntly, and in very simple terms, it also makes you more, obviously makes you more stupid, so your level of intelligence goes down too, because you really have to be stupid to do things that, to do those things that you do when you're infected, your ability to think rationally diminishes, so without going into it, I can see some of it happening now, because collectively, we are faced with the challenge of the physical virus, and there's a lot of fear arising, and the fear lowers your consciousness, and then you are really, can very easily become infected by a collective mental virus, which means you can no longer think rationally about these things, and then whatever you do is wrong, and makes things worse, so it's terribly important what we've been talking about, is the becoming aware of the transcendent dimension within yourself, and become liberated from the person, the person continues to operate in this world until the person dies, but the person that continues to operate in this world is no longer as dysfunctional as a normal person, it still has its quirks, and it has its idiosyncrasies, it still has perhaps certain likes and dislikes, and maybe a few weird things are still around, but it's no longer the person is no longer really an agent of suffering, does not cause suffering to others, and does not make itself suffer anymore, so to some extent, the transcendent dimension begins to shine through the person, and that's how it's like the lamp and the lampshade, the person is a lampshade, and the awareness is the light, the lamp, and the lampshade gradually becomes more and more transparent to the light, it still has its shape and form, but it becomes more transparent to the light, and that is your destiny, that's why you're here, and let's look at some questions, if any are left.

My question is like, it's easier for me to stay present when I'm alone with like conscious people like all of you, but it's really hard for me to stay present when I'm with like my friends, like they're always on their phones or check social media, stuff like that, makes me really hard for me to be present with them, and I know that I cannot change them or just tell them don't look at your phone, so yeah, I'm just wondering, do you have any suggestions for that?

[Speaker 1] (22:53 - 35:32)

Right, right, yes, it's something that gradually you learn to bring that awareness into interactions with other people in groups, it's initially perhaps very difficult when there's a group of people coming together, and you're swept along with the mind movement within the group, conversations, discussions, and so on, with a single person, while you're interacting with a single person might be easier at first, and I suggest that you give attention to the person, and that's an interesting thing, let's say the person is telling you a story, what happened yesterday, let me tell you what happened yesterday, I saw this guy, and then he said, and then whatever the story is, and you're listening, giving your fullest attention to a person, both let's say on the visual level, you're looking at the person in the auditory, you're listening to what the person has to say, and you have this open attention, this is a, could call it a spiritual practice, if you give full attention to a person, yes, not the words that this person is saying, you're aware of what the person is saying, but there's more to attention than that, it's not just attention to the words, it's more than that, or it's deeper than that, you give attention, you look and you listen, and you are present, while you look and listen, while you are not saying anything, you just look and listen, and then you become aware, while you're looking and listening, you become aware of that attention itself in yourself, that which is presence, so while you're looking and listening, you're aware of yourself as the attention, and people love that, they like to be looked at and listened to, they like to be given attention, children particularly, it's very important to give children attention, to, it requires an alertness, and there's an openness to it, you're not preparing them, the next thing you are going to say, you're a space, very good communicators do that intuitively, although they may, in other areas of their life, they may be completely non-present, but there are certain people, extremely good communicators, and they have, without knowing it, the ability to listen, to give attention, and when, then you connect with a person at a deeper level, that's beyond the words, because what I call attention here, is really presence, and when you give attention, you can even do it, start with simple things, like meeting a person in the elevator, and perhaps you're saying, some people are comfortable with silence, so they might say something, they say, I think it's going to rain today, or hasn't the weather been awful, or whatever it may be, or you're a brief interaction in the street with someone, somebody asks you a question, asking for directions, you go to a store to buy something, even during those brief interactions, give attention to that person, might only be for a few seconds while the interaction is happening, you look and you listen, and there's no, the mind is clear, in other words, there's a still presence, so as much as you can, be the still presence, when you're with another person, it doesn't mean that you're unable to speak anymore, because when the moment comes, you will say something, words come, then you participate, perhaps in a somewhat different way, not quite in the same way, if what the other person is saying is very dysfunctional, you would not participate in the dysfunctional discourse, whatever the person is saying, the other person is complaining about how awful some other people are, and what they, and you know what he did then, and then I said, and then he said, and then and so on, all the stories that people have, instead of being getting totally drawn into that, if it's dysfunctional kind of narratives, be there as a space, there was a early 20th century spiritual teacher, and he would sometimes, when his disciples were in a room talking to each other, or having some kind of gathering together, they were standing around talking, discussion, he would sometimes burst into a room and shout, stop, and everybody stopped, no matter whatever posture they were at, they were at a glass in their hands, or they had to completely become motionless while he was saying that, the purpose behind it is what he called self-remembering, what he wanted people to become aware of themselves in that moment, but not of the person, but of the underlying consciousness, self-remembering is stop, because before he said that stop, everybody was identified with the mindstream, completely identified to it, it's like a raiding river, it drags you along, especially if you're in a group setting, and everybody's talking, and you're saying what you think, and the other person saying what they think, you're like a raiding river, and you're being dragged along, stop, awareness, he would even sometimes encourage people to drink alcohol, I don't recommend it, he would encourage people to drink, become drunk, and then he would say, see how unconscious you are, to make people aware, of course, when you drink, you can very quickly, unless you're firmly established in presence, when you drink, you very quickly lose your ordinary level of relative consciousness, not that conscious, ordinary consciousness, not that conscious either, but you fall from ordinary consciousness to lower consciousness when you drink alcohol or certain other substances, and so people then lose the little awareness that they had, when they drink, they lose that completely, and then something else takes over, so he used that sometimes as a test, he would give drinks to see who of his disciples could actually stay present, even while the alcohol was infecting their minds, could they still be present, this is why it's not recommended for people on these awakening paths, it is not recommended that they indulge in excessive drinking, for example, a glass of wine may be fine, but some people, after one glass of wine, they already lose sufficient consciousness to remember that 10 minutes before they said, I'm just going to have one glass, and so it leads to more and more, so you have to be careful with that, when you're firmly established in, honestly, it doesn't matter anymore, but obviously, you wouldn't want to drink a lot, because your normal state of consciousness is so much more pleasant than whatever you could achieve through any kind of drug, so coming back to your question, giving attention, giving attention, and become aware of the field of attention that you're giving, and then you can practice, even in a group sometimes, you may be able to practice while others are talking, you suddenly become aware of yourself as the awareness that's taking it all in, make it into a spiritual practice, that an interaction with a friend or friends, make it into a spiritual practice, you don't have to tell them that, because they think you're weird, if you tell them that, so, and don't neglect little things, very brief interactions with people, they're also quite important, and sometimes easier that way to practice that, it's wonderful when you can just look at a person, and for a moment, while that person is saying something, you are not saying anything inside you, there's only still alert presence, that also you begin to sense, I'm reluctant to use a word that just came to mind, but I'll use it anyway, you begin to sense some degree of love towards that person, when you look in that way, maybe a better term is loving kindness, that's a Buddhist term, loving kindness, you can sense that, and so people become much more pleasant to interact with, and to meet, because when you are present, you can sense the presence in the other, even if they are not present, you can sense that which is beyond the person or the personality, you can almost, one could say, you can pierce through the veil of the person or personality, and then you connect at a deeper level, and this connection at a deeper level is love, which as I, love I say is the recognition of oneness, that's what love is, the recognition of oneness, so ultimately you always love, you love the other as yourself, that's the real meaning, because you recognize ultimately the other is yourself, because the oneness, you are both manifestations of the one consciousness, the light is the same, the lampshades differ, there are many, many lampshades, but it's always the same light, so instead of reacting to the lampshade, you kind of look beyond the lampshade, you are aware of the lampshade, yes, but you look beyond it, and you are actually more aware of the light that shines through than the lampshade, you are aware of both, but you are more aware of the light, and that's a wonderful thing that changes your interactions with humans, because until that happens, really humans are just so difficult, they're just so troublemakers, and sometimes you think they're great, and then the next day they disappoint you, and they let you down, and then they make your life difficult, so it's very important, this is a human interaction as spiritual practice, that is really extremely important, human interaction as spiritual practice, yeah, I wish you well in your spiritual practice with humans, so you bring the being into the human level, thank you.

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:32)

Discovering our true identity. In this podcast, Eckhart discusses how we define our personal identity. He says it usually begins with the physical body, then possessions and achievements.

He says we may have a long list of accomplishments, even personal wealth, but we're not satisfied. We're still not good enough. Eckhart explains defining ourselves in these superficial terms is a trap and just another form of ego.

Our true identity is beyond that.

[Speaker 1] (0:34 - 15:05)

Wonderful to see you. There'll be many people from all over the planet joining us. We are not in a hurry to get anywhere.

We are happy with being here in this moment. But before we hear the questions and maybe the answers, if they come, I'd like to have a little experiment or experimental, brief meditation, so to speak, to do with identity. Identity is very important for people, to have an identity.

And many people are continuously in search of a better or more complete sense of identity, sense of self, sense of who you are. And for many people, or most, unless they awaken spiritually, there always remains a significant area within their sense of identity of dissatisfaction, incompleteness, the sense of something lacking, the sense that I haven't completely arrived yet, wherever that may be, the sense that I am not completely myself yet. That's why people are so afraid to die, because if you have no more time to become who you could be, that's terrible to the sense of identity that is the ego.

So identity begins with your body, the physical body, that's me, me and my body. Then whatever else you incorporate into your sense of self, it becomes imbued with a sense of self, possessions, achievements, sufferings, memories that are imbued with a sense of self that create eventually a sense of my life, me and my life. You have personal identity that you identify with things that you own, or things that you suffer that were done to you.

Then you have identities always connected with a thought, even a possession, it's an external thing, or an achievement. Ultimately, it's all experienced as a thought in your mind. Your car, if it's a great car and it enhances your sense of self, if you're at that stage of identity, then it's not ultimately the car that gives you your identity, it's the thought of my car that enhances your sense of self, but not in a lasting way.

And as we have moved, this is an entire, just a little aside, it's a topic that one of these days I will talk about in more detail. We have shifted a significant segment of the population in the past 50 years, or 60 years has shifted from being dominated very much by yang energies for a very long time to a shift to more yin energies and not affecting everybody within the population, but a significant segment of the population, which was a wonderful development because that enabled the arising of, started I would say in the 60s in the Western world, it enabled the arising of deep spirituality. It also was the breakdown of certain rigid yang, yang being masculine, yin feminine, yang structures that were very rigid, so some were, if not dissolving, they were no longer, many people were no longer identified with those structures. And there was a great deal of wonderful development and growth of compassion and empathy of human beings, awareness of other humans, their feelings, all wonderful developments.

And so, in the yin energy, as many people are now collectively a bit more in yin than in yang, what the segment of the population is varies. Many other people are still very much in yang. And now, of course, the yin has very much taken over significantly the segment of the population, very much moving into yin.

You can now see that interesting event, the identity, the strongest identity these days in the popular culture is not the victorious one, the conqueror, the one who has achieved great things. That's a yang identity. The strongest identity is the one who has suffered or who belongs to a group of people who have suffered.

And that is fine because it means there's compassion arising towards other human beings. If you take it too far, anything that you take too far becomes counterproductive and creates its opposite. So, a little bit of this has also happened and is happening.

Too far, by that I mean that it has become very popular to have a victim identity, because then you have a stronger identity than the one who has achieved, the one who has suffered in the yin culture has a more valid and stronger collective identity than the one who has achieved great things. But you have to be careful with that so that you don't fall into that trap, because that can also become a trap to see yourself as a victim or belong to a group of people or there have been groups of people who have been victims. Of course, we need to acknowledge that.

But to make that into an identity, that's where you get trapped in another form of ego. So, we need to be aware of that. At some point, I'll talk a bit more about that.

Identity, then, is very important. It comes to the point of who am I. For many people, identity is partly personal and partly collective.

For some people, it's more collective. So, you have a group identity that's us. But now, with ego, you need the other to define who you are.

The other who is different, who is not who you are. Without the other, you cannot define your identity. It will dissolve or collapse.

You need the other to remain other in order to have this defined sense of identity. The ego, which is complete identification with this form that you are, whatever psychological identity you have, the ego likes to make the others even more other. It likes to create a picture of enemies, so to speak.

Then, you feel more strongly who you are, but that's ultimately an illusion, because that's not who you are. You're dependent on antagonism, and you're dependent on fighting with others, because that is an unconscious ego strategy. To feel more strongly a sense of identity, we need to go beyond that to awaken, which means going beyond ego.

So, how do we do that? So, here comes a little experiment or experimental meditation. The pointer is a question.

I would like to ask you a question, just to direct your attention in a certain direction. What does it feel like to be you? What is that identity of you?

Now, what does it feel like to be you? What does it feel like without any memory about your past? Because you are right now in the present moment without reference to the past.

What does it feel like? Where is your identity, your innermost identity, the you, that sense of I? And it's something very precious.

You don't want to lose that, that sense of being. And the strange thing is, you can get a sense of identity without reference to memory. You are not more fully yourself when you remember all your past than you are in this moment when you're simply aware of being.

That is the core of your identity. And this awareness of being gets mixed up with thoughts and emotions. So, then the thoughts and emotions become imbued with that sense of self.

But it comes from the formless realm within yourself. It is liberating to know yourself simply as this presence that is prior to all memories or thought. It gives you a sense of intense aliveness.

That's where all power, not egoic power, but true power emanates. You're going deeper than, much deeper than the person. And so, your true identity lies far beyond the person.

And to even have glimpses of that is the beginning of a great shift in your life, a shift in identity from form to formless. And then you no longer desperately seek to enhance your identity on the level of form. Of course, you continue to have a form identity, but it's not the essence of who you are.

It's a reflection of the essence. It's not the essence. So, you have a former, you have a body.

To some extent, everybody identifies a little bit with the body. But if you go deeper, the identification with body grows less. And that in itself is liberating.

Particularly difficult for people who had a lovely body, whether young or even up into middle age. Good looking, strong, maybe sexy, whatever. So, they naturally identified a lot of their identities derived from body image.

That's in a positive sense. Then for many people are not happy with their body. Too thin, too fat, too this, too that, not enough this.

Compare yourself to others, not as good as other people. I don't like my body. I'm ashamed of my body.

That's the other identity. But both are strong body identities. And the positive body identity, eventually the body begins to grow older and it's no longer that strong and beautiful to look at.

Then suffering starts. Because your entire sense of identity begins to crumble. Because for many decades, it was on your body.

For many people, deep suffering. So, let's take this opportunity to transcend all that. It's not just the body, it's the whole psychological image.

These days, there's a lot of talk about race and gender, all forms of form identity. It has, of course, to some extent, you're identified with your gender. To some extent, you may be identified with your race.

But how strong is that? If that occupies the greater part of your sense of identity, then you're lost in form. You can acknowledge your form identity.

It's fine. You can honor it, but that's not the ultimate reality of who you are. So, the ultimate reality is, in part, in this moment, what is it?

What does it feel like to be you? And you can't think about it. You can only stop thinking and start to sense that beingness of you.

And there you have transcended your form identity. You still have it, but you have transcended. Transcend doesn't mean you get rid of it.

It means you go beyond it. It's still there, but you are beyond. So liberating.

So, the ultimate liberation is the liberation from yourself. This is the mind-made self, form identity. And then the form identity is no longer yourself.

It's just your form identity. So, I hope this little meditation was helpful and continues to be helpful, even as we carry on now with questions. Perhaps you can still sense the deeper being of you.

Let's go on to the first question.

Hello, everybody. Hello, Eckhart. My question is about the deep I, of course.

So, I'll just begin. There are times when I have difficulty differentiating between the deeper self that speaks from that deep I and the part of me that is my conditioning and my ego, all those patterns. I used to believe that the inner voice was a piece of you that you should always follow.

That is until I started learning about the ego and conditioning. Knowing what I know now, I can see that there have been many times when I was misled by my own inner voice and I was confusing conditioning with the deep I at that time. So, you've said that the deep I comes from a deep place within or that it feels like a deep knowing, but sometimes the ego feels very similar to me and it's hard to catch it.

These patterns can be very sly. However, there is a difference. For some thoughts, they feel more urgent and they have an intense, almost anxious energy behind them versus a time where these thoughts are more stern, less intense, but also very powerful.

Sometimes it's very obvious and I can feel that deep knowing, knowing something without understanding how I know it, versus a conditioned thought process like I should have known better, and there's just more traffic involved with those. So, my question is, is my method of feeling these thoughts just another trick of my ego or is my ability to feel the difference in those energies enough to know when my ego is taking over versus the deep I?

[Speaker 1] (16:55 - 29:29)

Thank you. Thank you. It seems to me that you're on the right path.

There's an awareness there. You don't unquestioningly believe in every thought that arises in your mind and most importantly, you have discovered that not everything that comes up is a realization from the deep I, whatever you may feel or any intuition that you may have, because there are other layers in your mind that are part of the conditioning of who you are. So, you might meet somebody and have a feeling of, oh, I can't trust this person.

Now, this may come from a very deep level, but then you hardly need to verbalize it. There's just deep knowing and it doesn't come as I can't trust. You just know.

A lot of that knowing from the deeper place is non-conceptual knowing. You just know even without verbalizing you know. The more you verbalize, the more likely it is that it comes from other most egoic layers of your psyche.

So, you have this person and there may be a feeling of anxiety mixed up with it of this, I can't trust this person. And if anxiety is mixed up with it, it's more likely to be part of your conditioning. Perhaps this person reminds you of somebody as a child who was not kind to you or whatever it may be.

Many forms of conditioning. So, through conditioning, we very frequently misinterpret the world. Through our conditioning, we very often misinterpret situations.

We misinterpret people's intentions towards us and that creates a lot of unnecessary drama when you misinterpret other people's intention. Even to look for an intention, in many cases, is not necessary and leads you astray. So, yes, that is a very important discovery that a lot of these things are part of your conditioning, especially if it involves any form of negativity, fear, anxiety, any reactivity in situations or people, then you know it is part of the conditioned you, the ego.

Interesting, I've just talked about yin and yang coming into this world, like a shift towards more yin for many people right now. And one of the things I noticed is what used to be very common, people would say, I think this is how it is. I think this is how he is.

I think this. I think that. The number of times when people use I think is greatly reduced and it has been replaced with I feel.

50 years ago, 60 years ago, most people would still mostly say I think, unless they were specifically talking about their feelings. But here, when you have an opinion, people no longer say I think. Well, I feel that I do it sometimes too.

I feel that that is a shift, of course, from the yang, the conceptual thinking to the yin, I feel. So, that is fine, but can also be misleading. It's good to be open to your feelings, but it can also be misleading because when you say I feel something, it does not necessarily mean you are right.

Just because you feel something doesn't mean this is the correct interpretation of reality. I feel something about this person or about this situation. It is a correct reflection of what you feel.

That's fine. So, you're honestly expressing your feelings, but that it may not be the case, or it may be, it may come from a deeper level too. But very often, it does not come from a deeper level.

It just is a reflection of your conditioning. So, I feel. What do you ask?

What do you feel about this situation? Well, I feel. Another interesting thing is that you can't argue that easily with I feel.

When somebody says I feel that he is such and such a person, if you say I think he is such and such a person, you say no, I think you're wrong. If you say I feel he is such and such a person, you're absolutely not wrong. This is what you feel.

It's hard to argue with the way somebody feels. Think kind of requires a bit more logic, logical explanations, but once you have a feeling, it is just what I feel. So, awareness is the key, as you know.

Awareness is not a feeling. The feeling arises within the space of awareness, and the feeling, which may be an emotion coupled to a thought, can be seen from the level of awareness, and then you can perhaps know where it comes, whether it comes from a deeper level, an insight that you have, and it feels, and you can say this feels right. But you can't, not everybody says this feels right.

It's actually right about the situation, only saying that it feels right. Yes, that's true, but is it right? We don't know.

So, feeling is not when you feel something, it doesn't mean you're right. You may be right, but we don't know. Similarly, when you get angry about something, sometimes the more angry a person is about something, the more feel that the more right they think they are.

The more you can shout at other people, then that's proof that you're right. Of course, in many cases, it's proof that you're wrong, but you're definitely, your approach is correct. The awareness is there, so that, and here's the key, so that you don't get taken over by thoughts or feelings.

The real insights arise, they may be experienced as a kind of feeling because language is limited, but they're not really feelings. The real insights arise from awareness, not from a feeling, or the length, since language is limited, we sometimes describe these as also feelings, but feelings. So, awareness is the key.

Without awareness, you can get taken over by thoughts or emotions or feelings without knowing it. Then you are, you are being run by certain thoughts or emotions, and you think that's absolutely how it is. Awareness or presence is the key that gives you immunity from mental viruses, because mental viruses are more, can be and are more destructive than physical viruses.

Mental viruses are thoughts that take over your mind. You can see it on a personal level, it's easy to recognize in another person, some people are obsessed with one particular thought, and they interpret a certain associated thought, and then they interpret the whole of reality through the filter of those thoughts. People sometimes get infected with the weirdest thoughts, but then it's immediately recognized as a mental dysfunction.

Somebody says, the earth has been taken over by aliens, and I'm the only human left, for example. It's a weird thought that has crept into your mind, and then you go around the world, around the city, and you look at all these aliens out there, and I'm the only human. I'm just giving one extreme example, it's not, it happens.

The thought has occupied your mind, and it's now, it spreads into all areas of your mind. It's a virus, a mental virus has taken you over. Why?

Because you believe in every thought that comes into your head. And this is just an extreme example, but in less extreme forms, it happens to many people, they don't know it, that they have been hijacked by thought, or groups of thoughts. And then we have collective, collective viruses in your mind.

So people, certain ideas that float around in the collective, they enter your mind these days, very frequently through the media, social media, all that, where people connect. This is a very dangerous place, there are lots of good opportunities too, but it's a very dangerous place, because mental viruses can spread very easily through the technology that we have developed. They spread even before we had this technology, mental viruses did spread, they could take over millions of people for a certain period of time, and make them into maniacs.

So we have certain political movements, like, that were extremely violent and destructive, communism and Soviet Russia, the Maoist Cultural Revolution, millions died, National Socialism in Germany, Cambodia, the Pol Pot regime in Cambodia, where one third of the population was killed, where you look at these people, they have all gone insane, been taken over by a mental virus. And therefore, it was the psychologist Carl Jung said, the greatest danger for humanity is not some natural disaster or pandemic. The greatest danger for humanity is mass psychosis, mass collective psychosis.

And that's absolutely true. And so, for you to become immune, you need to be aware when you connect to technology, you connect with the internet and the social media and the mainstream media and other media, whatever it is, all the stuff that people Facebook and Twitter and Instagram and I don't even know the names, be very careful. Without awareness, your mind can, together with millions of others minds can be taken over.

And then you suddenly lose the ability to think rationally. To some extent, it is happening now. I don't want to go into this now, maybe some other time.

So, there is a movement of lack of ability to think rationally among a certain segment of the population, a regressive movement, one could say, whereas another segment of the population is becoming more aware. Very interesting separation. You're becoming more aware, but a certain segment of the population are becoming less rational.

They actually lose their ability to think rationally. Temporarily, eventually they will wake up. Once you create enough suffering, eventually you wake up.

So, this is a very important topic, but you are, as I said at the beginning, you are on the right path. It's only awareness that can provide you with immunity to mental viruses. That's really what it is.

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (29:31 - 30:29)

Hi, thank you so much. I don't have my question here to read to you, so I'm going to go by memory. It was very easy for me to go into presence and to know thought and to be in that state most of the time.

However, it seems lately that my mind and my thoughts will not stop. It feels kind of like my ego is holding on for dear life and to go into a meditation or even doing like the daily meditation to have a moment of presence without my thoughts arising and taking over seems like it's not happening anymore. But the thing is, I'm aware that this is happening at all the times that it is happening.

So, it's kind of driving me a little crazy and I don't know what to do.

[Speaker 1] (30:31 - 30:54)

Well, that's an important point you just mentioned at the end. You are aware that this is happening. That's very important.

So, all of the thoughts are there. They're behind them. They're still that awareness.

So, you're not 100% lost in the thoughts.

[Speaker 3] (30:55 - 31:02)

No, there are just thousands of them, which I used to be able to shut off and be still.

[Speaker 1] (31:03 - 44:20)

So, it seems to be this is not uncommon as more presence arises. The egoic self becomes a little bit anxious because it's fearing its demise. Okay.

Then it comes up with all kinds of sometimes weird thoughts. It sometimes chooses your weakest area and suddenly amplifies that and focuses on that. Sometimes the ego can use many avenues.

It can use sexuality and, for example, thoughts about sex could suddenly proliferate in your mind because the ego knows all that. That'll keep him or her going. So, it will choose all kinds of things to stay in control, to dominate you.

But if there is an awareness there that this is happening and you're saying, but you cannot shut off the thoughts, right? Well, it would be advisable not to let go of the idea that you want to shut off your thoughts. Instead, being aware, direct your attention somewhere else, but not the thought.

But that only works when the thoughts tell you, no, I can't do it. That's not the truth. If you believe when the thought says, I can't stop now, I can't stop now.

If you believe that, then, of course, you're in the grip of it. Inviting presence into your life is more powerful than trying to stop your thinking. As you invite presence into your life, thinking subsides by itself.

So, you cannot directly attack the movement of thought or to hold it down with willpower or whatever it may be. You can't. So, instead of trying to stop thoughts, when there's an awareness, you know, I would rather not be thinking all the time, these chaotic thoughts right now.

What is it that, where can I direct my attention? And then you will notice the thoughts have a magnetic pull. They won't easily allow you to take your attention away from the thoughts, to extract, so to speak, your attention from the thoughts, which is your consciousness.

So, in a way, the thoughts are forms that have a grip on consciousness, but they're consciousness too, but they're forms that consciousness has taken. So, you'll notice something in you does not want you to place your attention elsewhere that is not thought. But it doesn't mean that you can't do it.

This movement of thought pretends that you can't do it, but you actually can. And that means you can invite presence into your life, realizing the thoughts are futile, chaotic, even causing you unhappiness, destructive. And so, then you choose the most powerful, very simple places where you initially put your attention is your inner body and your breathing.

They're connected. Awareness of your breathing connects you with the energy field in the inner body. This is not the physical body.

It's the inhabiting presence that pervades every cell of your body. So, attention is directed away from thinking. And you'll notice a little bit, the thinking will always try to get your attention back.

But you say, no, thank you. And go. If you can't now, you might say, oh, I can't feel the inner body.

That's not true either. Start with your hands. So, you ask, can I feel the energy in my hands?

And in order to have the answer to that question, you have to stop thinking for a moment, because thinking cannot tell you whether you can feel the energy in your hands. Only if you stop thinking, there is a possibility that the focus of your consciousness moves into your hands, the inner hands, and you suddenly sense the aliveness in your hands. Oh, and while you feel the aliveness in your hands, thinking has subsided.

You can't do both. You cannot feel the aliveness within your hands and think at the same time. So, you haven't tried to stop thinking, you just feel the aliveness in your hands.

Then thinking subsides. Then if you breathe consciously into the body, of course, and you feel it's not just the air that moves into the body, you feel the whole energy movement that's associated with breathing. The whole energy movement that's associated with breathing that makes the feeling of your inner body more intense.

You can suddenly, as the air flows, I always recommend that you feel as you breathe in, it moves into your abdomen. The energy of the breath or the air probably is not reaching your abdomen, but it feels as if you are breathing into your abdomen. And then for a moment, there's a three or four seconds stop, and then there's a breathing out.

And that little bit of conscious breathing, just a couple of minutes, easily puts you in touch with the rest of the energy of the inner body. Then you can feel gradually a global sense of aliveness within the body, all over. In some parts of the body, you feel it more strongly than in others.

Yes. But so what you feel is not the physical body. It's the consciousness that inhabits the body.

So the consciousness that inhabits the body is not different from who you are. When we talk about it, it looks like subject and object that I can sense the consciousness. That's because we break it up when we talk about it.

We create subject and object in a sentence. What really is happening is the consciousness that you are, which includes the consciousness that pervades the entire energy field of the body, becomes conscious of itself. And if you feel the body, the inner body, you are not thinking.

It's virtually impossible. Okay, occasional fragments may drift in and out of your awareness, little fragments of thought. But basically, you cannot sustain, the movement of thought cannot sustain itself when you are connected with the inner energy field of the body.

And so immediately you can sense this liberation from your mind. And you sense a heightened sense of aliveness pervading your entire being. So you haven't tried to stop thought.

You've just placed your attention elsewhere. So wonderful. And that shift that can happen in a space of five minutes, from being totally immersed in useless thinking, to feeling this wonderful aliveness that is within you.

Now, you may find at some point, some thought will try to come in again, and get your attention back. It'll come up, often it's something to do with an anxious thought, something that just might happen tomorrow, whatever, anxious. And so it'll focus on some anxious thought in the hope that this will lead to other anxious thoughts.

And then a minute later, you're totally back in your thinking. So you will notice thought sometimes tries to get you back, get your attention out of the body and back into your mind. And then when you notice it, you simply, the noticing is the important part, and to place attention back into the body.

Be very much, be careful with anxious thoughts, because that's a big thing. A lot of the movement of thought for many people is associated with anxiety, fear. A lot of their thought is fear thought, directly or indirectly, consciously or unconsciously.

And even angry thoughts, often you find if you look deeply underneath the anger, there's fear, and it's disguised as anger. And then you may have developed the ability to continue to feel the inner body and contemplate the world around you at the same time. This is the practice of being present within and without.

And so you look, you listen, you may sense, perhaps there's a movement of air, breathing. And again, very little or no conceptualization, learning to be simply aware. That is the most important thing in your life, this shift, where gradually awareness becomes more powerful than thinking.

And your identity is rooted in the awareness, your identity is no longer rooted in the thinking. Then of course, at some point, you start thinking again, and it's fine, you have to think many things. When you deal with the things of this world, you have to think.

Also, other thoughts may arise that are just kind of casual thoughts, when you're not specifically practicing body awareness, or breathing. Yes, you will start thinking again. But the self-identification with thinking then disappears.

And so gradually thinking is no longer a problem, and does not create a world of problems for yourself. Because many people have no awareness, or they inhabit a very problem, their existence is very problematic. The entire sense of identity, and we come back to identity, the entire sense of identity is based around their problems.

That's what they think about all day long, to do with things that have happened, could happen, other people who are making my life so difficult, to think about that, situations, so problematic. So for many, for many people, their sense of who they are, it sounds a little funny, but their sense of who they are, is they are a problem to be solved. That's how they feel about themselves.

And then they go to seek help, psychotherapists, psychologists. Now, if the psychotherapist is a good one, he, she will be able to take you beyond that. If the psychotherapist himself, or herself has not gone beyond, you will spend years talking about your problems.

And the poor psychologist, psychoanalyst, whoever he is, the poor man or woman, whatever, has to sit there and listen to your problems for months and months and years and years. And because he or himself has not gone beyond that dimension, can't take you out of it. He or she thinks eventually if you talk long enough, you'll get beyond it.

But no, the more you talk about it, the more complex it gets. Talking is fine up to a point, but the reason why it is to become aware of the patterns in your mind in order to transcend. So that's the practice.

I wish you well, and I'm sure you will succeed in this transition.

Eckhart Tolle Discovering Our True Nature [25d7cbbd-d8cb-4350-b3e7-2175f9d4ffde]

Discovering our true nature. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about our dependence on people, places, things, and concepts as the source of our identity. He says most of us derive a sense of self from our attachments, but the essence of who we truly are is much deeper.

Eckhart calls it the alive stillness at the center of our being. Once we become aware of it, our attachment to external things fades and we discover our true nature. Eckhart illustrates this idea with the story of a Buddhist monk who sought to release worldly things.

His difficulties were great until he let go. Absolutely.

[Speaker 1] (0:43 - 33:40)

Years ago I spoke to a Buddhist monk. He was a Westerner and he became a Buddhist monk. He still is a Buddhist monk.

He's been a Buddhist monk now for over 55 years, but that was many, many years ago. I talked to him and when he became a monk, and the monks in the Buddhist tradition, and it used to be like that. Perhaps it's in some places still is in the Christian tradition.

Definitely in India, there's a tradition of letting go of everything. You become a mendicant or you become an ascetic. So in Buddhist, you can't own anything.

It's in most Buddhist traditions. This happened to be the Theravada tradition, Southeast Asia. You let go of possessions.

You're not allowed to even touch any money. You can't touch a bill or a coin. You're not allowed to touch.

You let go of your usual dress, the clothes that you wear. You have to use the monks, the nuns too, monks or nuns robes. And you have to give up your name too.

You're given a new name. It's a spiritual name. And they shave your hair because they realize that many people derive part of their sense of self from their hair.

It's true. And so I talked to this monk and then he told me a story that he noticed that what he was at the time living in a monastery in Thailand and he was the the saffron robe that he was wearing was being washed and read the diet to give it the saffron color. And when he got it back after being washed and that was after a couple of years in the monastery.

And suddenly he not he became extremely upset because that was not the color it was before. It was a different shade of saffron. And he started arguing with the person who had dyed it and noticed he became extremely upset about the color of his robes that had changed the different shade of saffron.

And for a day or so he was trapped in there when he suddenly realized his attachments had shifted. And whatever this unconscious mechanism could latch itself onto it was the robes. And then he was able to let go of that.

But then there were other steps. He then realized he was attached to a self-image as a very serious Buddhist monk. He had become a very there was a lot of gravitas in the way he spoke to people at that stage.

And he realized he was attached to a self-image of somebody who had let go of all attachments. And then he he realized that they took years of course. And then finally when I met him he had already gone beyond that and he was like a little child.

He laughed all the time. There's no sense of self-importance anymore. He had been able to let go of that.

But it was a journey of discovering how many things how clever and cunning the mind is the egoic mind in its attempt to derive identity from some external thing. So I do recommend then that you don't focus excessively on letting go of attachments because in the absence of realizing even if it's just through glimpses in the absence of realizing this deeper essence of yourself as the conscious presence you can never be free of attachment to things whether it's external things or mental creations mental concepts. So if you think first I need to go right as attachments and then I can find myself probably not going to work because you'll never get to an end of the attachments.

And the the ways in which you attach yourself and what you attach yourself to becomes more and more subtle but it's still there. So it's not a gradual relinquishment of attachments. You go to the deeper place and when gradually you begin to realize or sense realize still sounds a little bit like an intellectual thing you sense that deeper essence that is the presence that you are the alive stillness you sense that and you go to there the more you go to that the less attached you will be to the external things.

So it's a gradual fading of needing you no longer need to reinforce or feed your sense of self through anything in this world. So the need to do that gradually diminishes and so then as you become more deeply rooted in who you actually are one with one with who you are whenever we use language we create duality it's inevitable when you become rooted in that deeper essence then you will notice the need to touch yourself isn't there but you can see me you may still find remnants of that here and there in your life little things but they are relatively unimportant and when something leaves you so oh that's a pity it no longer changes anything in your sense of who you are your sense of self your sense of identity now your ability to connect with other human beings when you no longer connect through attachment actually deepens some people attempt to let go of because they've suffered so much in relationships that they decide not to have anymore which means I don't want to get close to any other human being anymore because it's just it's going to end up ending suffering again some people go after their third divorce or fourth divorce some people have that realization or that delusion that that's the way to go and then you cut yourself off from the aliveness of this world from and you can no longer truly connect with other human beings but the opposite actually is the way to go is when you as you gradually your need to derive identity from attachments including humans that you're attached to in egoic sense it's called love but love in the egoic sense is not love it's love in the egoic sense is a deep neediness of the other of wanting the other to fulfill your unfulfilled sense of self of wanting the other to put it in the simplest terms of wanting the other to make you happy make me happy please that's why I've chosen you to make me happy and I'll make you happy so well it probably won't work unless you're able to go deeper where when the attachment to other humans goes then something deeper arises if you go deeper it's no longer it's not cutting yourself off the only you cut yourself off when you when you have no awareness of the as your essence identity but if the awareness of your essence identity arises then the attachment goes and when the attachment goes then and only then does love arise and before that what was called love wasn't love at all it wasn't a part of the egoic the insufficiency the sense of lack that is part of every egoic self every ego has that there's something terrible missing there's something very wrong with me or my life I don't that's an underlying often sometimes spoken sometimes unspoken thought there's something wrong sometimes it's projected there's something deeply wrong with the world so the entire sense of lack or insufficiency is projected outward and then you go and you look at oh it's all it's the politics it's that it's capitalism it's communism it's socialist whatever it's or you have some fantasy of what they are all doing that it's all before being planned I know exactly what they're doing it's all out there they're trying to do this who they are I don't know exactly what conspiracy theories they're projecting out but I'm not saying every conspiracy is wrong probably 1 in 20 may have some truth to it but that's another story so you can project the sense of lack of insufficiency outward or you can have it to yourself if you if you really deeply there's something deeply wrong with me then you you would perhaps seek out therapists and go to all kinds of things to solve the dilemma the conundrum of me and of course it can't be solved on that level so if you continue to try to solve it on that level you never solve it so either you it's either the internally sensed sense of insufficiency or an externally projected insufficiency in which case you would say this this world is that everything is wrong with this world everything not realizing that what you experiencing as this world is inseparable from your and the collective consciousness of humanity it's so this sense of insufficiency begins to disappear the sense of lack when you begin to realize this deeper essence of who you are which sometimes I call the present moment sometimes I call awareness Jesus called in the kingdom of heaven buddha called it that various times he sometimes used emptiness sunyata which I translate as spacious awareness emptiness that is a dimension for then and as you the more you sense that the less you need to attach yourself to anything and the more you sense it the more love what is true love shines through and then this love which we could also use other words to point to it we could say loving kindness that arises that you can sense towards all life forms and that's other human beings and arising the loving kindness empathy to sense the other in their beingness not just the suffering of the other you might sense it too but you can send something that's beyond their suffering their beingness and that is love to sense the other as ultimately yourself one with who you are the one consciousness is you sense the consciousness in yourself and it might have started with a simple thing like this give attention to this or the sky or whatever then become aware of yourself of the presence which is the absence of the self entity and become aware of that presence there is an aliveness there too but the so in the in the case of a so-called inanimate object which is a erroneous term i wouldn't perhaps call it love i would call it appreciation you appreciate the beingness of this flower you appreciate you sense the beingness that is even that is beyond the sense possession sensation is beautiful but there's something beyond that is you only see the surface phenomenon when you see anything beautiful there's a surface phenomenon beyond that there's something deeper and the deeper is inseparable from your the depth dimension within you so here we have an appreciation of simple things and some people call that i believe one term you could use is gratitude another term you could use appreciation and gratitude of to me almost synonymous for our purposes so there's a deep appreciation of this and that is that is the love expresses itself or manifests as a deep appreciation even of the world of physical things so a gratefulness for you can be grateful for this beautiful thing here you can be grateful for things you would never notice before there's the sun coming around you can't see it but it's there's a reflection of the sun on the wall there and you can look at that and be you don't you don't tell yourself i'm so grateful what you could as a helpful pointer but you simply appreciate it you give it your attention and then you can sense the source of that attention that is inseparable from the source of who you are so anything that you give attention to you're aware of that and you're aware of the source without which that thing would not even be perceivable the light of god is consciousness god is transcendent to all phenomena beyond space and time the light of god shines into this dimension and you can know it as yourself because you are a ray of that one consciousness so at first it's returning your attention as much as possible to that dimension the dimension of sunyata a vast inner spacious awareness the kingdom of heaven that which makes all thinking all feeling and all sense perception possible without which there would be no feeling no sense perception no thinking so it's not separate ultimately from feeling and sense perception and thinking there's no duality i compare it sometimes to the ocean and the surface of the ocean so all thinking and feeling and sense perceptions happen on the surface of the ocean although some feelings go a little bit beyond the surface but not too deep and then you have the vastness of the ocean the depths of the totality of the ocean the surface of the ocean is waves and ripples thoughts feelings the entire sense of identity form identity is derived from what happens on the surface of the ocean that's your form identity as a ripple you are a ripple effect of the ocean or as somebody once said you are something that the universe is doing in the same way that a wave or ripple is something that the ocean is doing so the the consciousness in you the consciousness that is you remember when we talk about it we create duality you have to allow for that so when i say the consciousness in you it's already a mistake but we have to use language the consciousness in you is the consciousness of the universe there's only one consciousness so you are in you the universe is actually there is an evolutionary process in this dimension not in the transcendent dimension but in this dimension there is an evolutionary process and in you and as you the universe is becoming more conscious and that manifests as the gradual increase in complexity that you find when you look at the life on our planet we know a little bit about going back millions of years through geology and so on we have made certain discoveries about the evolution of life on our planet and we know that there was a gradually an intensification of the complexity of life forms grew more and more the more and more complex life forms develop even though already i believe five times the universe suffered unimaginable catastrophe extinction events the universe already suffered five i believe it's five extinction events when 70 percent in one or two cases 80 percent of all life forms became eradicated incredible now five times and that if there had been an external observer he would have all this oh my god and of course it was in this level it was terrible and but then life regenerated didn't take long only a few million years and then life regenerated and as it regenerated the complexity the life forms that then arose were more complex than in the previous one could say the previous incarnation of life on the planet in that sense the planet has already had several incarnations of life forms and death and then a rebirth and then a death and a rebirth i'm not saying we should not do all we can to love and appreciate and protect this planet and we shouldn't say oh it doesn't matter if there's another extinction it is our job here to live conscious as conscious as participants in the totality if an extinction event another one were inevitable it would be tragic of course it would be but only in relative terms in from a deeper level it would be a dust and a rebirth again the same way that the death of a human being is tragic if looked at in isolation so the you are an expression of a manifestation of the consciousness of the universe you are the con you express you in you embody you are the consciousness of the universe the awakening consciousness of the universe why do i know that because i experienced the awakening of consciousness and i know that you most of you if not all of you are also experiencing a shift in consciousness an awakening of consciousness so that is a new stage and i believe if it's happening here it probably is happening in in many other worlds planets galaxies inconceivable vastness there isn't the universe is one awakening being impossible to even imagine or understand can we begin to understand the vastness of it but you can have get little you can get insights beyond conceptualization there's a lot that i understand about the universe but i can't talk about it because in concepts i don't understand it any concept i use are distant approximations they're pointing to something yes there's a little bit of truth in what i'm saying that all concepts can do but if you go deep enough within and realize that that essence then the through you the universe is awakening to itself in that sense one could say that up to now at least on this planet or up to recently no recently could mean the past few thousand years the consciousness as it gradually grew through manifold ever more complex life forms it was a kind of dream that the universe is dreaming of a beautiful dream of the arising of life there's a possibility of awakening from the dream and this is what's happening to us we if an unawakened human is so identified with all the stuff in this world derive their sense of identity from or and is reactive to whatever is happening around them completely determined by their surroundings is in a kind of dream world and any human who is completely identified with their thought processes continuously deriving their identity from their thought processes lives in a kind of dream and the dream is determined by the past your past whatever thoughts you think are determined by the world that you grew up in and so on so there's a any human who does not have yet any awareness of their thoughts but is completely possessed by their thoughts and the emotions that go with the thoughts lives in a kind of dream lives a dream-like existence and is kind of predetermined the dream is more or less predetermined some humans are predetermined to to experience unpleasant events because they basically through their reactivity they amplify every problem they encounter and therefore make it bigger they create one drama after another it's karma is what what you could use of eastern term karma is the dream so it's involuntary you don't know you're dreaming you're just dreaming now perhaps all of you have had occasionally the experience of actually dreaming at night and in the middle of a dream realizing oh this is actually a dream that's a very strange realization and then you think oh i could actually could do anything and it didn't wouldn't really matter some people pursue that they want to develop that ability to be able to lucid dreaming it's called they want to develop the ability to be awake in their dreams it's interesting it's not liberating but it's interesting it's much more important lucid living is much more important than lucid dreaming so you have to awaken here to your attachment to all those things that while you're attached to them are part of your dream and suddenly you you awaken and you realize that which awakens is consciousness in you it becomes aware of itself this is why i sometimes often say can you be aware that you are aware right now can you sense that awareness with which you are perceiving can you sense that as yourself here and now wow yes that is the awakening of consciousness and this is the beginning of lucid living when yes you still inhabit this world which then assumes a somewhat of a dream-like quality but it's no longer a threatening dream as because before dreams can be quite threatening when you're completely trapped in them so the world of all these forms here are no longer threatening because you don't need them for your identity anymore you have to you're not attached in that sense so the dream then still happens around you you go on with your life and but there's always an underlying presence or witness that is not part of the dream in the same way like the ocean becoming aware of itself because the ripple has become aware of itself as the ocean if the ripple had not become aware of itself as the ocean the ocean wouldn't be aware of itself the ocean becomes aware itself through the ripple you are the ripple and being or consciousness universal consciousness is the ocean so you are ripple on the ocean of being the ocean of being needs you i mean you're not separate from it the ocean of being needs you for its awareness this is an approximation of something i'm giving you some analogies it's an i'm not giving the ultimate explanation of the universe it's impossible to do it's it's an approximation it's a bit like this that's all one can say it's a bit like this not some ultimate thing that you need to believe in that's how it that's how it is so the you're awakening the universe is awakening in and through you and then the quality of the dream actually improves considerably and that's a relief and even if the dream temporarily is not very pleasant there's no longer that much of a reactivity to it you don't amplify the so-called bad things you're able to allow them because you are the witnessing presence for it and out of the witnessing presence very often insight arises right action can arise so you you act upon that you act in the dream but in a no longer in a reactive way you actually can act with wisdom and if you act on this dream with wisdom then the dream improves without wisdom whatever action you take in most cases makes things worse ultimately so the wisdom is not to be confused with intelligence you can be highly intelligent without wisdom in fact highly intelligent people without wisdom are very dangerous in this world because they create all kinds of havoc that a non-intelligent person might not be able to create for example build atom bombs you need considerable intelligence to build an atom bomb a low iq person wouldn't be able to do it but is there any wisdom in that no there's no wisdom so where does wisdom come from what is it even wisdom is comes from a greater intelligence that is the consciousness in you the unconditioned consciousness so it's not only love that arises loving kindness that arises empathy that arises also wisdom arises out of that dimension and that wisdom inspires can inspire and use your mind and then you can speak words that are powerful and meaningful and helpful in this world bring about a better dream make the dream a bit better without wanting to make the dream a bit better it just happens amazing amazing i'm always the truth is so amazing i've been talking about this for decades and every time i talk about it i'm amazed myself at all this it's like the first time so here we are here you are here i am ultimately it's all i it's all i am and so you let go of whatever you add to the i am is ultimately part of the dream that's fine you can take it up later but get used to being the i am without any additions and that is the i am that i am which is in the old testament maybe the most meaningful statement when god is asked what's your name god says i am that i am oh the core identity of the universe and of you thank you for your presence i wish you well in your awareness practice and gradually it will become second nature to you in fact second nature is not really the best way of putting it it's the first nature your true nature find your true nature thank you

Eckhart Tolle Dismissing The Demand That Life Should Be Perfect [923796ac-c676-4310-8eb8-90f900ec25d5]

Dismissing the demand that life should be perfect. In this episode, Eckhart continues his talk with an audience in Budapest, explaining that if we're waiting for the world to make us happy in the form of the right person, place, job or situation, we will probably wait for a very long time. He says our expectations for the perfect life usually lead to deep disappointment.

He explains life is fragile and cannot possibly meet all of our demands. He says we ask ourselves, what is the world here for if it's not to make us happy? Eckhart explains that every person is like a seed of awakening consciousness.

Life's challenges push the seed to sprout. Eckhart implores that we must learn to drop the demand that life should be perfect.

[Speaker 1] (0:48 - 50:58)

It's in the nature of every life situation to be precarious. You can't have it all going perfectly, every aspect of your life situation. What you're doing great suddenly financially and then your wife leaves you.

Or your body is very healthy but something else goes wrong. You lose your job or something happens to your child, somebody close to you. Something problematic goes in there.

It is good to strive to make your life better. Of course it is. You do your best and that's perfectly fine.

And you should continue to do your best so that your life situation can improve. It's a wonderful thing to do. So you focus.

What can I do? What should I do? Wonderful.

The only thing that does not work is to look for yourself in your life situation. To look for a sense of completion. Because there it's very, everything is so impermanent as the Buddha already said.

Everything, if you hang on to anything, it leaves you or it doesn't make you happy anymore. Everything is impermanent. So you have to deal with your life situation as best you can.

But not have expectations that it cannot meet. And these expectations are really, I want my life situation to be in such a way that I can feel happy and fulfilled. Ultimately what it means is, I want the world to make me happy.

The world means other people, situations, events, places where you live or where you go. Achievements, possessions, all those things are the world. So if you're looking to the world to really make you happy and fulfilled, the world can't do that because it's too fragile and too impermanent.

And yet you should do your best but not look for yourself there. And if you can drop the demand or the expectation that something should be perfect, that a place you go to should be perfect, that a job, a new job you find should be great, no problems. The job is fantastic and no unpleasant people there.

Everybody's great. Your body, nothing goes wrong with your body. If you expect that, you expect the world to make you happy, people, that's a big thing.

I'm looking for somebody to make me happy. Oh dear, that's a recipe for unhappiness. You might have noticed because the weird thing is, many of you may have experienced that or will have experienced that, the person that makes you happy today, very happy, falling in love, followed by the wedding and honeymoon.

And then daily life begins. But this person made you so happy for a year, two years, three. But then you begin to notice aspects of that person that you didn't know were there.

Somebody's recognizing it. And you're asking, who is this person that I married? This wasn't supposed to happen.

This wasn't the person I looked at, gazing into his or her eyes when we were having dinner before getting married and honeymoon. And suddenly it all turns around. And before you know it, the person that made you so happy now makes you so unhappy, so miserable.

The same person. Isn't that strange? So in a way, you could say almost everybody, you may be a lucky exception, but almost everybody will find or will have the suspicion at some point when they start living with somebody, have the suspicion at some point that they married the wrong person or something not right.

I made a big mistake. Big mistake. And you can go to another part of the world.

Perhaps I'll be happy there. I'm not happy here. But if I could live in Bali, I will be happy.

I know that. And then you go to Bali and for a while you're happy. It's the honeymoon of Bali.

And then you see, Bali is not a perfect place. If you leave the food in the kitchen overnight, the rats come in. Mosquitoes got stung by mosquitoes.

And I just can't stand the heat anymore. I'm losing my energy in this heat. I need to get out of here.

You can experience the world and enjoy the experience of every moment and so on, but not look for some ultimate satisfaction. The world cannot make you happy. No person, no place, no achievement, no possession.

Possession is another one. You feel the feeling when you just buy something and you carry it home in your bag. And then you take it out, whatever it is.

Feeling of satisfaction for a moment. With some people, even when they take it out of the bag, the satisfaction that they had while they were buying it already begins to disappear. Maybe I'll bring it back to the store.

That's not quite it. Okay. I'm looking for myself, but you don't know you're looking for yourself, but you are looking for yourself.

So the world can't make you... If the world can't make you happy, what is the world here for? The world is here to make you conscious.

The world is here to challenge you. To challenge you means it's here to confront you with obstacles. What?

Can't be. I thought the opposite was true. The world's supposed to...

No. You might have noticed that this tends to happen a lot. And many people believe that they have been singled out by life or God or some malevolent deity.

They have been singled out. Some malevolent deities have singled them out to continuously sabotage their life. It's all...

Just the moment you get something and something else happens again. Oh no. You sought out here and another problem crops up there.

Why is it always like, leave me alone. Please life, leave me alone. Occasionally, yes, you get a moment of a few days or weeks or maybe even months of...

It's great. But it won't last. So the burden of walking around with an unhappy, calling it my life.

This is your life situation. Everybody has one. Everybody has a life situation.

And very few or nobody has a life situation that is totally satisfactory. Except for brief moments. You might think sometimes when you look on Facebook, that Facebook is full of people who have totally satisfying life situations, as is shown by their photos and the photos, the meals that they take photos of.

That I'm in a restaurant and this is what I'm eating. And this is me. And here I'm doing this exciting thing.

And this is just an extension. Technology has miraculously given us the opportunity, not only to have a mind made ego in our heads, we can project it out into the world and polish it even more. And so we polish the mental image of ourselves and put it out.

And people see it. And some people who don't know how this works, they think everybody is okay except me. And then they do the same thing.

Okay, I can pretend too that I'm okay. And the whole thing is a world of make-believe. So your life situation exists in time.

It is continuously kept alive by thinking about me. The most interesting subject in the world is me. And this is why I need to think about it a lot.

Because if I stop thinking about me, everything is going to fall apart. I need to keep thinking about, especially at three o'clock in the morning. I need to think about me and my problems.

Because if I stop thinking, it means I'm not responsible anymore. I need to worry. It is my responsibility to worry as much as possible.

What is worry? Unconscious, totally useful and dysfunctional thinking. But worry pretends to be necessary.

You need to worry. It's a thought. You need to worry.

You should be worried. There's a lot to be worried about. Because you don't know what's going to happen.

Or yeah, I do know what's going to happen. It's going to be bad. Tomorrow is going to be bad.

Or let alone next year, don't get me all there. Your life situation exists in time. But where is time?

Where is time? Time is the weirdest thing in the universe. It gradually kills you.

Everybody here has a fatal illness. We just don't know the date. But everybody's infected by time.

It's a kind of virus, I suppose. And this time will kill you and me, the body. Or if you want a shorter version of what's going to happen to your body.

Let's say you're still young. What is time going to do to my body? You put an apple on the windowsill.

And a fresh apple. And you go back to it four weeks later. And look what time did to the apple.

And that's what time is going to do to your body. Oh dear. And you thought this was going to be an inspiring talk.

Your life situation exists in time. But time exists in your mind. Time seems to be all pervasive.

You can't get it. It's like an express train. You're on an express train.

It never stops. You can't get off. That's time.

Oh, let me go. Can't get. Gosh.

Can't get off. It seems to be everywhere. It seems to affect everything.

You need it to do anything. You need time. But you always experience life as the present moment.

It's always now. It's always now. It's never not now.

There was never a moment in your life that was not now. There never will be a moment in your life that is not now. And even now while you're thinking about the past, it's in the now that the past arises as thought in you.

So time doesn't really have an objective independent existence, independent from your mind. For example, no explorer has ever encountered the future. They've gone to the North Pole and the South Pole, and now they're going into outer space.

But no explorer has ever said, I found the future. I have arrived. The thing that everybody's looking to, I found it.

No, because the moment you find the future, it's the present moment. The moment the future comes, you can only experience it as the present moment. So the future and past are thoughts in your head.

You can only, the future is a thought in your head. Ultimately, it's intimately connected with mind activity. And totally fine.

I'm not saying throw away your watch, if you still wear a watch, throw away your watches and clocks, and don't look at the time anymore, because it's all an illusion. I'm not saying that because your life would collapse. You need time.

We could only meet here because we use time for practical purposes. A date and a time. Otherwise, we wouldn't have met here accidentally, even in a million years.

So it worked on a practical level. But on a deeper level, if you look more closely, time is always a thought. It's always a thought.

So this life situation exists in time. But there's something else, and I wrote about it in the Power of Now. More fundamentally, you have a life situation, but more importantly, you have a life.

And it's important to distinguish between your life situation, which is, of course, it's problematic. Every life situation is problematic, and every person here has their share of suffering in their life situation. It's challenging.

Life is undoubtedly challenging for everybody in different ways. It is challenging, yes. But do you need to carry around this burden of your problematic life situation continuously, or can you enter a different dimension where your life situation is still there, you can deal with it because you have to deal with it, but there's something deeper in you that is deeper than your life situation, and I call that your life.

And your life is inseparable from the present moment, and the present moment is now. Now, that is a doorway into a deeper or higher state of consciousness, which we may call awareness or presence. And I'm inviting you at this moment, now we get to the good part.

I'm inviting you at this moment to step out of your life situation. Don't worry, it's still there, but it'll come back to you. But step out at this moment of your life situation and just experience this moment without reference to past or future.

You have nothing to lose. So let's say right now, don't give any attention to anything in your past, including your name or whatever happened in your past, and you don't focus on any future moment. You just stay in this moment.

And now what is your experience of this moment without reference to past and future? What does it feel like to be you without reference to the past? What does it feel like to be you?

This is a very strange question, and you may not be able to answer it in words. It's an immediate experience. And the immediate experience is to experience yourself beyond concepts.

But what is there if there are no concepts? There's the sense perceptions, but what is it that makes the sense perceptions possible? How is it possible for you to perceive all this?

There's something. So you are the one that perceives all this, but what makes it possible for you to be here, to sit here and perceive? What is there left?

And that is, of course, you can sense a certain sense of presence or beingness, but it has no attributes. It's not this or that. It's just, it's a primordial sense of I, the I.

I call it the deep I, as opposed to the surface I, which is the mind-created I. When a person says I, everybody's favorite word, I. But usually the I refers to the mind-made self, me and my life.

But here you can realize there is another I in you that is deeper. It's not separate from, but there's a deeper beingness in you, a sense of presence, where you just know that you are. I am.

That's all that's left. You know, but how do you know that you are? You know that you are.

We could say that's consciousness, and that without the consciousness, there would be no sense perception. So you become conscious at this moment. What I'm saying now sounds a little strange at first.

You become conscious at this moment of the fact that you are conscious. You directly know that, yes, I am conscious. Not because you say it, because you know it directly.

You know that you are conscious. That is the deep I that is your, I call it your essence identity. Essence identity.

The other identity I call your form identity. Everybody has a form identity. It begins with a body.

That's the physical form. But there's also the psychological form of you. That's the mind-made self, the conditions.

That's fine. Of course it's there. Everybody has a form identity, but most people, all those people who are still unconscious, spiritually speaking, they only know themselves as their form identity, which is the body and the psychological entity in the head.

They only know themselves as that. And they're continuously looking, because only knowing yourself as that is frustrating because somehow you realize that that's ultimately not you. At least it's only a tiny fraction.

It's only the surface phenomenon. But who are you underneath the surface? And underneath the surface, there's something very deep.

You are very deep. And when you begin to sense that depth that's in you, then gradually you go there more often. You sense this essence identity more often where the story of you becomes irrelevant when you sense that.

Let's say one of you might be a billionaire and you have a private jet waiting and you have mentions all over the place. And another one of you might be, whatever you did in your life was one mistake after another and you've just been released from prison for the fifth time. And you've just made one bad decision after another and it's all a disaster.

Your entire life is a disaster. So you have the great person who made it and the other person whose life is a disaster. For the realization of your essence identity, it doesn't matter.

It doesn't matter. It is beyond the forms of your life. And then at first it's just a little, oh, a little stillness, a little sense of still presence.

And the mind might say and come in and say, well, I have more important things to worry about than this. Okay. The mind doesn't want you to go there.

It'll always tell you, no, no, no, don't go there. Go into the depths of who you are, which is the consciousness. Know yourself as consciousness.

And when that happens, you may notice, and this is so important. There is a gap in the stream of thinking because you might've noticed the thinking goes on and on in your head. There's a voice that you talk to yourself.

So most people's fate is they are lost in thought. Lost in thought. And suddenly you come to the end of one thought and there's a gap.

The next thought hasn't started yet. A gap between two thoughts. And while I'm speaking now, I'm kind of doing this gesture to illustrate the gap between two thoughts.

And right now, let's see if this gap between two thoughts can be there in you right now when you're not thinking for three seconds, four seconds, five seconds. You're not thinking. You are just aware.

It's an amazing thing. Just aware. And as that awareness, you can look around the room, take everything in, but don't call it anything.

You just see everything and yet you're just the awareness. You're not the person. You're the awareness.

That's an amazing shift in consciousness. Wow. And there's no time there this is why we could call it the timeless state of consciousness.

And so you are, and that becomes your true identity. Then you can still operate as a person and deal with your life situation, but you're no longer lost in it. And it doesn't make you unhappy anymore.

The challenges of life are not transformed into unhappiness anymore. And then whatever challenges happen in your life, they will help you to awaken more to who you are in your essence. You become more present.

And the shift happens and it's a little bit, the analogy I use a lot is, if you are a wave or a ripple on the surface of the ocean, there's a little ripple and this ripple is me. And you're surrounded by other ripples and waves on the surface of the ocean. This is other people.

And then you compare yourself to others and the whole story starts. And the ripple never realized that it is only a surface manifestation of a vast ocean. The ripple existed only on this surface level of reality.

It only knew other ripples and ripple existence. And it looked for fulfillment through other stuff on the surface, other ripples. I'm going to marry this ripple and we are going to be, she or he is going to make me happy.

And we two together can be a bigger ripple and so on. And always looking for, and always disappointed by the ripple existence. Every person that you think, oh, every person in one way or another will let you down.

It's just a limited person. Every person lets you down sooner or later. And if you know that it doesn't matter anymore, you can love them anyway because you don't expect it.

Fulfillment through this person, you don't expect it perfection. And suddenly the ripple becomes aware that there's more to who I am than this. But it was aware because for a moment, the ripple withdraws attention from the surface ripple existence, which is sense perception of thinking, thinking, thinking, and stops thinking.

And suddenly by stopping thinking, it becomes aware of, oh, there's a huge depth to me which transcends who I am as a ripple. There's something much vaster that's not separate from me and yet is much vaster than me. It's a little paradox.

And suddenly there's a great sense of rootedness in something vast that sustains you. And this is the rootedness in being. And that's the thing that we lost thousands of years ago when we started to think and become identified with thinking and started to look for ourselves in thinking.

So we've come a long way from that time when we were rooted in being ah, and then going into thought, a whole phase in the evolution of consciousness. We've come to the end of this phase where we became identified completely with thinking. And now we rise above thinking.

And so we've come full circle. Again, we become rooted in being because we've gone through the thinking stage. And it's not that we don't think anymore, but we are no longer completely lost in thought.

We are no longer being used by thinking. We can actually, for the first time, think creatively. When you are connected with a deeper dimension of consciousness, that's where all creativity arises.

Any truly creative person must, at least in the moment of their creation, when they create something, get in touch with this deeper level. And for a moment, they're not thinking. They're just kind of listening.

Many great composers have often have said this great melody that came to them, that is so sublimely beautiful, they received it almost ready-made, and then they just wrote it down. So this inspiration happens from the deeper level. Many things happen when you're in touch with the, we could call it the transcendent dimension.

It sounds a little abstract, but it doesn't need to be abstract. It's not abstract. The transcendent dimension, that which transcends all this, but doesn't exclude it, but is something deeper.

And you become rooted in that depth. And that's the end of fear. So your true identity, your essence identity is there.

So you're no longer looking for ultimate satisfaction in your form identity, but you do your best. And in fact, the way in which you conduct your life, when you no longer live through a fictitious identity in the head, the way you conduct your life, the way you interact with other people becomes much better, improves a lot. The dysfunctional nature of the ego disappears and relationships become more harmonious.

Situations, challenges become resolved more quickly because you don't fight a challenge. You accept what is, and then you do what you can. You don't complain anymore in your head about things, oh, well, this shouldn't be...

Complain about people, complain about this and that. And the ego loves complaining. You know what he said, and then he did that.

Oh dear, tomorrow I'm going to talk to him and tell him this. So you exist as form identity, but you are the essence that's deeper, far deeper than the form. So the key then is, have these little spaces in your life every day when you're not thinking.

Too many of you, this will happen naturally, but you may not, it's too easy to overlook. For example, whenever you look at something, let's say your head is turning. Oh, now I'm looking at these flowers.

Now before my mind calls them orchids, there's a gap of two seconds while I'm looking. And for these two or three seconds, I'm not calling them anything. I'm just aware of the flowers.

Then the mind comes in. If you can catch these initial seconds, whenever something new comes into your perceptual field, there's a gap of two or three seconds when you're, it could be sound too. A sound arises, you're listening.

Before you interpret it, there's a moment of just awareness and the sound. If you can catch all those initial moments, then they become longer. And during this time, when you don't label things mentally, there is a depth, you experience them differently.

You experience them, they have greater depths. Even looking at a flower, when you don't call it anything, there's another way of knowing this flower or anything. What the world knows is only conceptual knowledge.

At universities and so on and everywhere, knowledge is associated with accumulating concepts, conceptual knowledge. Then you can know the flower by learning things about the flower, it's fine. But if you neglect the other way of knowing that is non-conceptual, then your life becomes very superficial and you become trapped on a conceptual dimension alone.

So this is just another aspect of what we've been talking about and experiencing. I can know this flower without concepts too. If I contemplate this and just look at it and do not label it, I'm just aware.

And I know that I'm aware. I can feel that that which makes the perception possible of this flower is the awareness. I don't want to call it my awareness because it's not mine.

There's only one awareness, one consciousness. Your consciousness and my consciousness are the just manifestations of the one universal consciousness that has created all this. So I'm looking and suddenly I can sense the essence of this flower too.

I can sense the aliveness of this flower. I can sense its beingness. I can truly connect with it and sense it.

It's a totally different way of knowing the flower. But if I'm lost in the conceptual alone, all I know is a surface phenomenon of flower, no matter how much I know. And ultimately in this world, you need both.

You need the conceptual to operate in this world, but not lose yourself in the conceptual. So you have the other dimension, which is awareness. There's a knowing there too, a very deep knowing that is non-conceptual.

And do that to a human being. Look at a human being. On the one hand, there's a form identity and you might even, it may be somebody you've only just met, or it may be somebody with whom you've shared many years, a family member you've known all their life.

Let's say it's somebody you've only just met. It's easier because otherwise there's a lot of past. Family members are difficult.

So you're looking at a human being on the one hand, of course you take in their body.

That's often the first thing that you look at. And then you bring in a little bit of their personality or whatever they say or how they look, behave and look at you.

So that's their form identity, physical and psychological form. You're aware of that. And you might be a great psychologist and immediately figure out what their psychology is and immediately know what they're like.

Maybe you have a lot of knowledge. That's fine. But that's not the essence of who they are either.

It's still conceptual. In order to connect with another human being on the level of essence, you have to for a moment look at this human being without the interference of thought, just as an aware presence. And then you look at into their eyes and then you can, if you know yourself as the aware presence, then you can sense that presence in the other.

In other words, you feel their essence identity beyond the personality. And that's a wonderful way of connecting to the other. And this is really what traditionally the true meaning of love is to recognize the other in their essence and to recognize the other as ultimately one with yourself, because the consciousness that you are is the same consciousness that that person is.

It's their essence identity. As consciousness, you are one. As personalities, you are different.

The otherness, if you only operate on the level of personality, the other is always other. And not only that, the level of personality on the ego level, the ego tries to make the other even more other because the ego likes enemies. It likes to fight.

It likes, because it thinks it's stronger when it has enemies. It defines its identity through the other. That's crazy.

So all those things that have been traditionally spoken of as things that make life worth living and are part of a deeper human being is love, not in the romantic sense, but a deeper thing. The Lord is love, then it is the recognition ultimately of the other as yourself in essence. Jesus once said once, love thy neighbor as yourself.

And I believe that as an isolated statement, it doesn't work because if you tell somebody you must love your neighbor as yourself, you say, okay, I'll try. I'm trying really hard, but I just can't. Sorry, I can't.

I mustn't be a good Christian. I can't. But what they forgot is, Jesus said to us, find the kingdom of heaven and then you love your neighbor as yourself.

Those two belong together. But what is the kingdom of heaven? What is a kingdom?

That's an old word. Nowadays, there are not that many kingdoms anymore. The modern translation, my translation is dimension.

Kingdom is the dimension. And what is heaven? Sky.

Spaciousness. Spaciousness. Inner spaciousness is when between two thoughts, there's a space of aware presence.

It's an inner spaciousness. Jesus used this because in the sense-perceived world, the closest he can get to just give people a sense of what he's talking about, the best word he could find was to talk about the sky or the heavens because it's just space. But that he's talking about inner space, so the dimension of spaciousness and the inner space is beyond thought, in between thought.

It's the aware space of awareness. Find that dimension of spaciousness in you and then you will recognize and love the other as yourself. Now it works.

So that has to come first. And so for the rest of your life, you, of course, everybody has a different, as a personality, you have different things to do in your life and different things to deal with. Everybody's life situation is different.

But at a deeper level, there are two purposes. One is the purposes you have as a person, but there's a more important purpose and that is the purpose of consciousness. So that consciousness can awaken more fully in and through you.

Which means you awaken to your true identity. And when you awaken to your true identity, it's not just you because you are not a separate particle in the universe. You are the universe.

You are an aspect of the universe. When you awaken, the universe participates in the awakening. The universe awakens through you to itself.

It's a vast, it's a vast thing. So the person is a little bit like a seed for the awakening of consciousness. And then gradually, as you grow older or even before then, the person still operates but is no longer all that important.

You still deal with it, but something becomes more important than the person. And all the things that before that the person thought, oh, this is so important. All the stuff, the gossip and all the stuff that the drama that the person loves to talk about and think about and all that becomes a little boring.

A lot of the stuff that happens on the person level is okay. And you don't want to watch soap operas anymore on television because it's all boring. And you might even find that your friends' stories become boring if they're not awakening.

And so there's something that emerges where the person was before something emerges. Thinking was before awareness emerges. So there's less thinking and more awareness.

Less thinking, more awareness. Especially all the dysfunctional, useless thinking such as worry begins to disappear. And the thinking that remains is no longer thinking that makes you unhappy.

It's thinking that is actually useful that can create something new. Thinking can create form. It's a very powerful thing.

So thinking becomes then helpful. Then for the first time, you can thinking is in the service, not of the ego, self-serving, but thinking is in the service of something deeper or higher. You become a creator.

The consciousness, the unconditioned consciousness create, can flow into your mind and create, use you as an instrument. And you create whatever you do. We don't know what you do, but something, this power flows into what you do.

And it emanates through you. And even if you don't do anything in particular, it even changes people who come into contact with you because you then represent a deeper dimension of the universe, higher, deeper, whatever you want to call it. Your purpose in life is to cooperate with where the universe is going.

And the universe is in the process of awakening. And the consciousness that you are, the universal consciousness is, I call it the light of God. You might remember, Jesus said to his disciples or to others, you are the light of the world.

He also said it about himself. He said, I am the light of the world. And then he said to others, you are the light of the world.

It does not mean your VIPs are very special because they were not. It can only mean one thing. You are the consciousness of the world.

You are the consciousness. And that light emanates from the source of all life, which is a transcendent. It has no location in space or time.

The unspeakable source of all life. Something emanates from there into this dimension in the same way that light emanates from the sun. There's a reason why ancient civilizations regarded the sun as divine, but it's not the sun.

I only use it as an analogy. The sun continuously gives of itself. It gives life.

It continuously, almost infinite. Yes, it has a lifespan, but compared to all, it's virtually infinite, continuously outpouring. And so we use this analogy, the consciousness that you are is the emanation from the one source of all life that's transcendent, which means God.

So the light of God is the light of consciousness in you and all beings in different degrees and different vibrational frequencies. Then when you recognize yourself as consciousness, then you recognize the true nature of who you ultimately are. But it doesn't mean that you will suddenly go out in the street and shout, I am God.

I would not advise you to do that. And it's not 100% correct. In the same way, if a ray of sunlight says, I am the sun, it's true and not true.

Yes, it's connected to the sun, but of course the sun is infinitely vaster. So it's true and not true. You are the light of the world, which is the consciousness.

So this is the transcendent dimension where you as a person become relatively unimportant or you can still deal with things better than before, but you're no longer consumed by this and you're no longer at the mercy of your thoughts. So that's a wonderful liberation. When you're no longer lost in your mind and that's the awakening.

So your destiny is something fabulous and far transcends who you are as a person. As I said before, the person is a kind of, is a seed for the new consciousness. And if the person had not encountered all his challenges in life, all the difficulties, those are the things that make the seed sprout.

So you have to be grateful because I know I would not be here if it hadn't been for all the obstacles that I encountered in my life, all the difficult stuff that brought about an awakening. And most of you are here because you went through a sufficient amount of suffering to bring you to this point of awakening. So you've done it.

You don't need to suffer much more. Now, challenge, yes, but challenges don't need to be transformed into suffering. So you come to the, as to use the words of the Buddha, the end of suffering, psychological suffering, which is most of suffering.

And it's a wonderful, wonderful thing. So all these people like Buddha and Jesus, they were the early flowers of human consciousness. And now it's happened on a wider scale.

Not if you look at politics because politicians will probably be the last people to awaken, but that's okay. They'll come too. Well, thank you for being here.

And I wish you blessings and hope you enjoy the adventure of human existence and the awakening of consciousness through you.

Eckhart Tolle Distinguishing Between Your Life and Your Life Situation [b25aa3f3-aef9-4ca3-b354-66273324b76b]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:51)

Distinguishing between your life and your life situation. In this episode, Eckhart jokes with an audience about getting a call from the Star Wars galactic fleet. He then turns to practical matters when he discusses returning home after being away on a retreat.

He says we all have a life situation which includes relationships, work, finances, and physical health. All burdens we carry with us even when we're on vacation. Eckhart cautions against having our consciousness completely absorbed by problems.

He says our real life is in the present moment which should only unfold in the here and now, not in the past nor in the future. He believes the profound difference between our life and our life situation is where our awareness remains.

[Speaker 1] (0:54 - 41:05)

More questions have been coming in. I got my phone here too, just in case there are any more questions coming in. Or I might get a call from the commander of the galactic fleet.

I distinguish between your life situation and your life. Life situation is whatever your past that has brought you here, all the circumstances of your life that at the moment are kind of temporarily on ice, so to speak, because you're here on a retreat. But then, of course, when you go back home, you will re-enter the circumstances of your life.

Everybody has a set of circumstances, relationships, work, finances, home situation, physical health. So you re-enter your life situation and, of course, I don't know to what extent each one of you have been while you were here, carrying perhaps the burden of your life situation, even here in a totally different environment. You carry it in your mind, obviously, that these are all the problematic things that exist in your life situation.

If there are no problematic things, other challenging things in your life situation, then I congratulate you. However, we don't know how long that will last. It's important not to continuously, not only here, but in your daily life, not to have your consciousness continuously absorbed in the various challenges of your life situation, which is always on past and future, but to return your attention as much as possible every day during your daily activities, return your attention to the present moment, which is where your life is.

It unfolds in the present moment. There are many opportunities for doing that, and that's a little art that you can develop when you are engaged in waiting or moving from here to there or taking a break. It doesn't matter for how long, returning your attention to the present moment.

And that usually means the stream of thinking slows down, and then it may subside for a while. It doesn't matter for how long. And awareness remains.

And as I said before, the personality of the person also recedes, and instead of being a person, you are conscious presence. Now, some of you may be able to just decide to enter the present. Let's say you've been involved in talking on the phone or Zoom calls.

That's what people do these days. Even I do it sometimes. Now, another question is, were you completely lost in whatever discussion was happening on Zoom?

Were you completely in your mind, or were you able to have some of your attention on the inner energy field? A good thing if it sounds a little bit too vague to say, have your attention on the awareness or feel the awareness. The inner body is a good portal into awareness.

So while you are watching people on Zoom and feel the inner body, while you listen, and even while you speak, that keeps some of your attention within. Being present usually involves the entire body. If you can, especially if you're sitting somewhere and you're present, being present is not a head phenomenon.

It's an entire body phenomenon. So to, when you feel, when you become present, almost inevitably, you will feel the entire inner body being alive in a very subtle way. You feel the aliveness from head to toe.

You feel your body is alive, and that is part of being present. And it happens naturally. So you, when you, when you become present, you automatically become present within the entire energy field of the body.

Or if you can also use it the other way around, you can direct your attention into the body and use that to become present. And that is, you can verify that in your own experience here and now. Be completely attentive to the present moment.

This is what is, feel. You're obviously aware of sense perceptions, but deeper than that, you're aware of yourself, but not the usual historical self, but the deeper sense of beingness that's yourself at a deeper level, which the Buddha calls the no-self. Be aware of yourself in any situation.

Not the narrative of you, which is the historical self, but something much more immediate and much more direct. That is the sense of beingness or presence that pervades the entire body, not just in the head. And so you, you, one could almost say every cell of the body becomes present a little bit more alive.

It feels alive. Breathing helps too. If you don't feel it very strongly yet, a few deep breaths, conscious breaths into the body, let the flow of the breath reach the abdomen.

Although the air doesn't reach the abdomen, your attention can go as you breathe in into the body and your attention then moves down into the, it rides on the intake of the air, so to speak. Your attention rides on the air and it goes, and then you're into the belly, the abdomen. And that is also a good starting point for body awareness.

You feel as you breathe in and out a few times with each in-breath, the abdomen expands slightly. And then with the out-breath, it just deflates, is that the word? Well, slightly.

Shrinks, and it's a good thing. I have to shrink my belly. Doesn't shrink for very long.

The belly is very important in Zen, also the Hara, as an energy center. So you feel a sense of aliveness. It starts here and then it spreads throughout the body.

Another good thing is when you do it, these are all little, you could call it meditations or practices or something that just happens almost naturally after a while. When you want to, we're talking about returning to the present moment, or even better, staying in the background, continue to stay present even while you're engaged in doing things in the world. But if you, until you reach that stage where you're able to stay present, even while you're engaged in daily activities, then at least if you are not able to do that yet, do is not a doing, but it's just language.

If you're not able to do that yet, then return to presence, to the present moment as much as frequently as possible in your daily life. So until you, there's always some presence, awareness of yourself, which is another way of speaking of presence. It's the awareness of yourself.

Now, when I talk about it, I formulate a sentence with words and immediately a duality arises. Awareness of yourself, I say, because I'm talking about it. But these are not two things.

There isn't the awareness that is aware of yourself. The awareness is the self that is self-aware. So when we break it up into language, inevitably we create a duality.

That's just how language operates. A sentence has a subject and an object. So then you can say, I am aware of the awareness.

It has broken it up into two, but it's one. It's awareness becoming self-aware, one could say. So, but when we talk about it, duality immediately arises, but there's no duality there.

So the, as you gradually move towards living more and more consciously, at first, as I said, you may need to return to presence frequently. And you do that by breathing. You can, as an entry point, use your breath or go immediately into the body or allow the breath to take your attention into the body.

And even one minute is fine. Sometimes I say, even one conscious breath is a mini meditation. One conscious breath.

It's the in-breath and the out-breath. One conscious breath, it takes about, I don't know, 15, 20 seconds. I haven't actually counted it.

The length varies from person to person. When you take a conscious breath, automatically it becomes a little longer than it would normally be when you're breathing unconsciously, which is most of the time. So most of the time you're breathing, but you don't know you're breathing.

You don't even have to remember to breathe because you would soon die. Oh, I forgot. Sorry, gone.

So breathing is something that happens to you. One can't, yes, you can regulate your breathing, you can make it deeper, but it is something that beyond extending the length of your breath or regulating your breath, you don't have a choice in the matter. You don't have a choice.

I don't believe anybody has ever committed suicide by deciding not to breathe anymore. So you, the little unhappy person, wants to die, but something in you says, no, not yet. Something in you wants to continue to live for a while.

And you can't stop it. So breathing is an unconscious process, but it's always there. And spiritually speaking, to make this unconscious process conscious is one of the most ancient spiritual practices, going back to the time of the Buddha and beyond, the awareness of your breath.

So you couple the breath with awareness, the awareness moves with the breath. So one conscious breath is already a gain in consciousness, because while you are taking this one conscious breath, which goes like this, and notice at the end of the in-breath, there's a slight cessation of breath for maybe one or two seconds. That's an important still point.

And then the out-breath happens. Let's do it one more time. And the point at the end of the in-breath, your attention has reached the abdominal area.

And it is there where you experience the cessation between the two breaths, between the in-breath and the out-breath. In the abdominal area, there you can sense that the energy that is there at that still point, at the end of the out-breath, the in-breath, the out-breath hasn't happened yet. It is, ah, so, ah.

And it feels so good that you would probably want to take another conscious breath after one. And you might even take three in the midst of your busy life. Three conscious, can you make time for three conscious breaths?

You could put it on your phone. When is my next conscious breath due? In six minutes.

Okay. I can't wait. And then, of course, you have the famous excuse in the human mind that says, I can't do it now.

Not now. I mean, just so much to deal with here. Leave me alone.

All that spiritual thing comes later. But not now. I'm too busy.

Can't you see? It's a lie, of course, because everybody, unless you engage in an emergency situation, you need to get to the hospital, or you need to take someone to the hospital, or you administer first aid, or something like that, then don't take three conscious breaths. But otherwise, many opportunities, the minimum is one.

But as I said, you may like it so much, because it's such a qualitative difference between your normal state of consciousness and that, that you immediately can sense that difference, and you can sense that power that you have touched. And so, two or three would be good. And how long is three conscious?

I don't know, a minute and a half, or a minute, I don't know, I haven't measured it. A very wonderful practice, to do that several times a day, is actually more powerful than one longer meditation period a day. Although you can have both.

But if you had a choice of either one long meditation period a day, or two, or several times during the day, take three conscious breaths. The three conscious breaths several times a day would be more effective in changing your state of consciousness, because then, the important thing is, your daily life will become interspersed with spaces of awareness, presence. Instead of having one compartment, when you meditate, and the rest of your life, you're as unconscious as everybody else.

There's the famous example of the man who has a family, and he says, look, I need to meditate now, it was such a terrible day, I just need to come. And then he goes, he needs to study. And then the door opens, and the little daughter comes in, Daddy, Daddy!

And the spiritual Daddy says, oh forget the God you see, I'm meditating. Not integrated. Awareness not integrated with ordinary life.

By the way, if you do meditate, and you probably know this, because I'm sure there are many experienced meditators here, if you do have a meditation period, then whatever technique you use, eventually, every technique is designed to take you to the realization of being. And that's good, maybe it works, as long as you don't give it the idea of needing to achieve something. Then you bring in time, and that will prevent you from the realization of being which is now, can only be now.

So that idea of, okay, I'm trying to get somewhere, don't try to get anywhere, because you're there already, you are already. You are. I am.

And so are you. And anything that disturbs you during the meditation must immediately be incorporated into the meditation. Any disturbing sound, whatever it may be, or a sensation in the body, a little pain arising there, whatever.

Usually when you meditate, all kinds of sounds happen around you, and immediately they're part of the meditation, become incorporated. Let's say there's a, you're meditating, there's a pneumatic drill, you know these things, I don't know what they're called here. They're breaking up the surface of the street, one of the worst noises you can imagine.

If you're a good meditator, you'd immediately welcome that sound as part of your meditation, and it creates no resistance. Then you're the Buddha. But here, these three breaths, many times during the day, and if you absolutely don't have enough time, one is fine too, better than nothing, definitely.

Many times during the day, you breathe in, hold for one or two seconds, and while you hold, you feel it here. It has expanded, and then the out-breath happens. And if you are really following the breath with your attention, you are not thinking.

You cannot be thinking at the same time. If you think, you're not following the breath with your attention. So that's why it's a very effective way of stopping the addiction to useless thinking, over-thinking.

So that's a return to the present moment, and it makes you feel more alive. And then gradually, even while you're engaged in doing, you may be able to hold the attention in the background, so to speak, to continue to be aware of yourself as the experiencing presence in any situation. And that is what I call, as I mentioned earlier, having the foot in both dimensions, to be present within and without, because externally, also you are present with what's going on, and then you have some presence, awareness in the inner energy field.

You're aware that you are. So, initially I recommend you practice that while, let's say you're engaged with other human beings, talking, whatever it may be. At first, you practice it particularly when you're listening to somebody, while they are talking, and you are listening.

And while you listen, feel the presence within, pervading the body. So you're there, and there you are listening. Yes, your attention is on the words, but some of your attention is in the I am, the presence.

And you feel it, you're there, your entire body is present while you listen. And you're not preparing the next thing you're going to say, then your contribution, if it's a discussion or a meeting, your contribution will be more inspired or creative if it comes out of the present moment, and the realization comes of what it is that you need to say, and then you speak. And so while listening is important, not many people are able to really listen, because good listening implies being present.

And you're not only listening to the words, you're also aware of the other, so-called other person's beingness. It's not just the words that are important when somebody is speaking to you, you're also aware of their essence behind the words. But you can only do that if you are aware of, it's only through your own essence that you can be aware of theirs.

And then the most difficult thing is to stay present in a discussion, a heated discussion maybe. Now what is a heated discussion? A heated discussion is that people are emotionally involved in defending their mental positions.

That's a heated discussion. The heat is the emotion. So, and this happens very often, people get involved in heated discussions.

They have mental positions, thoughts that they completely identify with, opinions, viewpoints, which are thoughts. But you don't only, you don't have an opinion or a viewpoint, you are, if you're unconscious, if there's not enough awareness, you are possessed by your opinion or your viewpoint. It has you, you don't have it.

The thought has you, you don't have the thought. It occupies your mind. You are possessed by certain bundles of thoughts which are your opinion.

Now because you are identified, you derive your sense of self from them, meaning anybody who questions or even attacks verbally your opinions or viewpoints will unconsciously be regarded as an enemy. Because that person is not attacking just your viewpoint in your unconsciousness, this person is attacking your very self. Because you have identified with a viewpoint, with the opinion.

It has become your self. And so that is how a discussion becomes heated or even violent. Some people start shouting and screaming, and then it can even lead to physical violence if you are very unconscious, for nothing quite often.

Just because two people have different opinions. But they are not just opinions, they are thoughts that have taken possession of your mind and they pretend to be you and they want to survive in you. They are little, one could almost say parasitic entities that live in your mind.

You have no immunity if there is no awareness. You have no immunity against parasitic entities in your mind. Thoughts that won't go away.

You see it all the time. So this leads to a lot of extreme dysfunctional behavior and so on.

But it goes down to that.

Some people adopt collective thoughts that millions of people also have. Often these days through these things, or bigger screens too, they enter your mind and then they lodge themselves in your mind. And then you think, this is what I believe.

Well, it is what you believe, and that in itself would not be a problem. It may actually quite possibly be more rational than somebody else's belief. I'm not saying every belief is equally valid.

Some beliefs are obviously absurd, but you would be surprised how many people are identified completely with totally irrational and absurd beliefs. Almost as absurd as saying 2 plus 2 is 5. Of course it is.

So it may well be that your opinions or viewpoints are perhaps more in alignment with reality than somebody else's. That's possible. But the important thing is, even though your viewpoint may be more aligned with reality and may be more rational, there is still the danger that you completely identify with that viewpoint and even that viewpoint that may be more rational than somebody else's by complete identification could still pull you into unconsciousness.

And you would still become very upset and you could still regard the other as your mortal enemy. So even though, yes, there is a qualitative difference in beliefs, but even if your belief is rational and certainly the other person's belief is totally irrational, there is still the danger that even your rational belief could pull you into unconsciousness in the absence of awareness. So that's where you have to be careful.

It's not enough to be objectively right in something, although it's better than to be objectively wrong, but it's not enough to be objectively right because even if you're objectively right, you could still be pulled into unconsciousness through lack of awareness and then you start fighting and the other becomes almost a demon to you. You identify it with thought and that's ego. It's always ego.

If you have rational viewpoints, then probably, and other people, many others have irrational viewpoints, probably there's already a certain degree of awareness in you so that you're able to still... You haven't lost the ability to think rationally because it can easily be lost if there's no awareness at all. The weirdest idea can take possession of your mind and often it does.

The strangest thing can take possession and then that's what you believe. You have no idea where that came from, but you're completely identified with it. That has happened throughout history.

In certain time periods, collective beliefs that are totally irrational can take over an entire nation or groups of people. Be very careful with the ego's need to be right that is associated with identification with the mental position. If you identify with the mental position, you have an enormous compulsion or need to be right and to prove the other wrong because that's how the ego survives.

The ego could not tolerate saying, Oh, I was wrong. That would be a little death to the ego because it identified with the position. So be very careful when you're engaged in discussions with other people so that you don't have this emotional...

You're in the grip of an emotional need to be right. You may be objectively right, but you still become unconscious by defending a mental position emotionally and make the other person into your enemy. Everybody needs to be extremely careful here so that you don't get taken over by mental parasites.

That can happen either on an individual level or collectively. Parasitic thoughts that just feed on you and you think that's you. But most of you are already beyond that anyway.

So I highly recommend three breaths several times a day. It sounds like a medicine. Take it five times a day, but not on a full stomach.

Breath and spirit traditionally, in many spiritual traditions, go together, are related. There's something about breath that is related to spirit. It's also formless.

Breath is also formless. I also, as you know, I sometimes often recommend while you're waiting for something to be present instead of looking at your phone, be present while you're waiting, no matter even if it's just for the elevator. While you're waiting, be present.

But you may not be able to just step into presence without any technique or entry point, so use the breath. Let's say you're waiting at the elevator for, maybe let's say it takes a minute. This is quite a long time for many, and many people think about one minute.

You can't, wow, where is it? Can't wait much longer. You can look for your next Tinder date.

So while you're waiting at the elevator, conscious breath. And it's still not there, which means there's another conscious breath coming. Abdomen.

And out. And here there's always a brief cessation of the breath when it reached the end of the in-breath. It's so good that you might even hope that the elevator won't be coming for a while.

And immediately, no thought. You're out of your thinking. The Buddha, as far as we can tell from script, many of the Buddhist scriptures that we read come actually from a later age.

They were attributed to the Buddha, but you see, well, probably not. But there are some things about the Buddha's teaching that seem to me to come directly from him. The main things are breath awareness, anapanasati yoga, the awareness of the ingoing and outgoing breaths, very powerful meditation, and vipassana, which is the meditation on the inner body.

Vipassana meditation. Those two are very powerful meditations. And the Buddha, I don't think the Buddha ever said, stop thinking.

All he said is, observe your breath. It's the same thing. Observe your breath means stop thinking, because you cannot observe your breath and think at the same time.

So vipassana, as some of you may know, is an inner body awareness, but a very structured, slow-moving inner body awareness that you can start wherever you start, with your feet, and then gradually you feel every part of the body gradually can take a long time, and then finally you bring it all together into one. And some people may need that. They may need a very structured approach.

Others may be able to just enter the body with their awareness. The best starting points are either your hands or the belly. And if you start with the belly, that's how I teach it.

Start with the belly, then a good thing is to breathe into the belly and abdomen, and then the feeling of aliveness then spreads out from there into the rest of the body, and there you are. Then you have a global sense of aliveness, and you are present with the entire energy field. If you are not able to do that with the hands, it's another good starting point, because some people, when I talk about this, especially in talks in big cities, many people have come.

I've never heard of anything spiritual or meditation. They say, what are you talking about inner body awareness? Feel the inner body.

What does that mean, feel the inner body? Also, when you come into contact with people who you think might be helped by this, instead of talking about presence and transcendence of the egoic state of consciousness, your uncle or your mother-in-law may not be able to follow you there, but they may be suffering mentally, so you can say, let's play a little game. Well, hopefully they'll do it.

Say, close your eyes, hold your hands like this, and keep your eyes closed. Is there any way you can know, without moving your hand or touching anything, is there any way you can know whether your right hand still exists or not? How can you know?

Don't move your hand, don't touch anything. How can you know whether your right hand exists or not? Can you know it?

Now, if a person is very much mind-identified, they'll say, of course it does, I just saw it a second ago. So it exists as a memory in the mind. But that's, of course, not what you're referring to.

You're saying, at this moment, can you know? And that will force the person to move their attention there, and then suddenly realize there's actually such a thing as a feeling of hand. And that is the beginning of the inner body.

Oh yeah, I can feel it. And then, if you leave your attention there, you can tell them, if you leave your attention there, then it gets a little stronger, that feeling of the aliveness in your hand. Oh, that's interesting.

And, of course, another thing that happens also here, very little thinking can survive when you put your attention anywhere in the body. So then with this person that you're practicing with, your family member or whatever, then you say, well, let's do the other hand at the same time. Can you feel both hands at the same time?

Are they still there? Is the left hand also still there? Yes, I can feel it.

Now, are you able to bring the feeling of hand together so that simultaneously you feel your left and your right hand? Oh yes. Okay.

Can you feel your feet in the same way? Oh. Now they're getting used to it.

Okay, yeah. And then you can work up with legs, and then the entire body. And then they know what inner body awareness is.

And for some people that's enough that they need to change their entire life if they practice that. They may not want to go any further in this lifetime. Just inner body awareness can be enough for some people, can be good enough.

Eckhart Tolle Do You Embody the Awakening of Consciousness ? [0c59b152-307e-4352-82aa-c11d8b71bca9]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:48)

Do you embody the awakening of consciousness? In this podcast, Eckhart talks with an audience in Stockholm, Sweden, and he says, our main purpose is to inhabit the now. Ironically, he says most of us try to escape it through activities, addiction, or our thinking.

He says we avoid being anywhere other than here by saying, I got too much going on. I don't have time for presents. Eckhart explains this mindset can wreak havoc with our lives and create dysfunction.

He says the most important thing any of us can do is to embody consciousness. He says evolution on this planet is actually happening through us, and on a larger scale, we are inseparable from the awakening universe.

[Speaker 1] (0:50 - 35:18)

Just making sure that everybody is present. Almost everybody is. I can sense it in the energy field.

It's wonderful to be back here after quite a few years in time, but it's still the now, it seems. Strange. Can't get away from it.

Although many humans try very, very hard to get away from it. It's part of the inherited collective mental patterns is the compulsion to get away from the now. And that's at the root of a lot of dysfunction in human consciousness.

So here we are, the main purpose of being here. Well, both here in this space, at this time, but also the main purpose of being here on this planet, incarnated as a so-called human being. The main purpose is to inhabit the now.

Well, everybody inhabits the now, but to inhabit the now, to be in the now consciously. And we could call that the awakening of consciousness, learning to be present, which seems to be a process that happens in time, although presence itself is a timeless state of consciousness. A slight paradox, perhaps, the ability to live here and be present develops over time, which means you're present for a while, then you lose it, and you're present again, and you lose it, and then you're present for a little bit longer.

This is the awakening of consciousness, we could call it. And you're all here because something in you is awakening to this dimension of consciousness. It's no surprise that this term, awakening, has been used in many spiritual traditions for thousands of years, awakening and to be awake.

That's the most important thing that could happen to a human being here. In fact, it's the only thing of absolute importance in your incarnation here, the only thing of absolute importance is whether you represent or embody the awakening of consciousness, that is the evolution of consciousness on this planet through you. And on a larger scale, it is the evolution of consciousness throughout the universe.

It is an awakening universe, and you are an essential part of the awakening universe. In fact, you are inseparable from the awakening universe. You look like a person, but you are the universe in the process of awakening, disguised temporarily as a little person with its problems.

So much going on in my life, I don't know. I have no time for presents. Maybe when things are going better, I'll be present, but not now.

Got too much on my plate, as the expression goes. I have a lot on my plate, they say, which means a lot of problems. Of course, there's no end to the problems.

So there's only one thing of absolute importance, and that is whether you embody the awakening of consciousness. All the rest is secondary, I call it. It may be relatively important.

All the things that make up your life, what people call my life, very problematic thing that you call my life, that is all maybe important. Yes, there are things that are important. Your health is important.

Your relationships, of course, situation, important. Your home situation, your professional work situation, important. All of those things, whether you have money or not enough money, all these things are important, relatively important, but not absolutely important.

So you have the two levels. I don't deny the relative importance of all these things that make up your so-called life, but what humans neglect and do not realize that there is a transcendent dimension to your life, and to encounter that, to consciously awaken to the transcendent dimension of your life, that is the only thing that is of absolute importance. Then everything else falls into place.

So if you focus on the awakening, whether you are conscious at any moment, the important thing in any situation that you encounter in your life is the state of consciousness with which you meet that situation. What is the state of consciousness in which you face whatever situation arises in the present moment? That determines the next thing, how it's going to go on in the next, next moment, in the next, how do you perceive, react to this, whatever is arising in this moment?

So whatever is arising in this moment, the situation that arises, they come and go, different situations arise, is always maybe important, but it of secondary importance. More important is your state of consciousness now. If you could remember only that and live that, that's really all you need.

So whenever you encounter any situation, realize what's my state of consciousness right now? And there's a situation that perhaps you need to deal with. Perhaps you need to take action right now.

Perhaps there's nothing you can do and you have to leave it alone. We don't know. But what is your state of consciousness in the present moment?

That vital question. And in order to answer that question, and it doesn't really have a conceptual answer because you immediately know whether you are present or not. That question can help you become present.

What is my state of consciousness right now? Maybe are there certain thoughts that are happening that are telling you that something is very wrong? Emotions that are telling you that something is wrong?

There are certain thoughts that are telling you you'd rather be somewhere else? Very common thing. It's so common people don't realize it.

Some people live almost continuously as if they were longing to be somewhere else, but not here and now. To get away from here and now. This isn't right.

There's something not right. Never. And occasionally it seems right.

Ah, I have arrived. Whatever it is that makes it right for a moment, it's an illusion. I'm in love.

This is the completion of my life. I've fallen in love. There's a person who's going to complete me.

When you go to a restaurant and observe other people sitting at various tables, you can tell whether they're a couple sitting at a table. You can tell whether their relationship is relatively recent. They haven't known each other for very long.

They're in that state that they call falling in love. The way they interact is very different from those who have been in a relationship for longer or are married. The ones that have just met, they've fallen in love.

They are in a kind of state of delusion. You can see it in their eyes. Everybody's playing their part in it.

It's a theatrical performance, but they don't know it. And that comes to an end the latest when they start living together. Then the essence of all this is awakening.

Awakening, the awakened state of consciousness. And as I mentioned earlier, not surprisingly, this term awakening has been used over thousands of years since the time of the Buddha and before. The essence of the teaching of the Buddha is to awaken.

The word Buddha itself means to be awake. The one who is awake. This is a Sanskrit root of the word, is to be awake.

Buddha is not a, it's not a name of a person. It describes a state of consciousness. And then go to Jesus, and there are quite a few parables that talk about not going to sleep, about staying awake.

And these are not, he's not, these are parables. They're not to be taken literally, obviously, literally you cannot tell a person stay awake because eventually, of course, you'll go to sleep. So we are just using this analogy of awake and asleep in order to point to something that most humans are not yet familiar with.

To quote Jesus again from one of the gospels, he said, and this is quite a bit of what we read about Jesus' teaching, may not be quite what he said or distorted, but a few things I can sense are absolutely, literally what he said. A few things here and there. For example, he said, and what I say to you, I say to all, stay awake.

Huh? Is that, was that the Buddha or Jesus? No, it was Jesus.

Oh. No, he's not talking about the normal state of wakefulness. Nobody could stay awake for that long because there's something that pulls you into sleep.

So we are not talking about that. We are using that as an analogy. Everybody knows what it means to awaken in the morning when you've been asleep, which is a particular state of consciousness.

You're asleep. And in sleep, you have dream state and you have dreamless sleep. You have those two.

And then you wake up. You awaken in the morning. And there's a huge difference between the state of sleep and the state of being awake.

Everybody experienced that every morning. And you go, suddenly you open your eyes and you go, oh, completely different world. You've just awakened.

It's a different state of consciousness. So this analogy is used because there is something in ordinary consciousness, normal human consciousness, which really should be called unconsciousness. Normal human consciousness could also be described as a kind of sleep because it's totally conditioned by the past.

And the past makes up the content of your mind. The mental emotional field is determined by the conditioning from your past. And most humans are completely identified with that conditioned entity, which is a mental emotional entity, an energy field.

And so they are so identified that that's all they know. In other words, the conditioned thought processes never stop continuously. There's a voice talking to you or you're talking to yourself or you're having a monologue or you're having a dialogue.

Some people argue with themselves. It's all the voice in the head never stops for most people. And that is, spiritually speaking, that is a state of unconsciousness completely identified with the conditioned mental emotional patterns, which make up the so-called person, personality, the ego.

So if you are completely identified with it, every thought has you in its grasp. Every emotion that arises has you completely in its grasp. And you think you're thinking, but you're not thinking.

Thinking happens to you. You don't have a choice if you're unconscious. There's no choice.

All your thought processes happen to you. You're at the mercy of your thoughts, the conditioned thoughts in your head and all the reactions that come with it. Every situation you encounter, there comes a conditioned reaction to the situation.

It's the person or the personality that reacts. And you don't even have a choice. Why don't you have a choice?

Because you're asleep, spiritually speaking. This thing is taking you over. It's a dreamlike state also.

And you can see often people are completely up there and they're never really, they're not really here. You can see sometimes the complete absence in a person's eyes. They're not really here.

They are asleep. But they're thinking very hard. And even at night when there's nobody around to talk to, you're still, the voice is going on.

And it's telling you, I have these problems. What's going to happen next? Awful, sick, my God.

I can't take any more of this. What's my life come to? I imagined something different when I was 20 years old.

I imagined something very different. Why did it all go so wrong? Many people actually have that feeling that something had just gone drastically wrong in my life.

And with others, it's a mixed bag. Some things went okay and others didn't. It depends what their mind, and your mind tends to focus more on the negative than the positive.

Much more memorable, the negative than the positive. If you go on vacation and everything goes perfectly fine, okay, you'll remember some nice moments and sunsets. But if something went drastically wrong, you'll remember that for the rest of your life.

And you talk about it continuously. You tell the story of what went wrong. If everything went fine, you don't talk about it.

We had a wonderful holiday. Oh yeah, okay. So that's the end of it.

But you know what happened? We went into our room and there were these cockroaches crying on the floor. And then the water was coming through the ceiling.

And then they stole all my bags. Oh my God. So interesting.

And then you know what he said to me? He said, how dare you? And I said, how dare I?

What about you? You are the one with the biggest ego. I said, and whatever.

And the stories go on and on. And so a lot of the things you, the negative things are much more memorable. That's the ego focuses on that.

It loves its enemies. And every negative situation is the ego's enemy. And then it can enhance its fictitious identity through the more enemies you have, the stronger your fictitious sense of self becomes.

Entire nations do that too. They need their enemies. Except Sweden, so peaceful.

All the non-peace loving people have left Sweden a long time ago. They were called the Vikings. And they occupied other lands.

So then we have in Indian spiritual figures philosophy, psychology, there's a word that's been around for a long time. It's called Turiya. Turiya means the force.

First, second, third, fourth. Turiya is the force. It's the force is, it refers to a state of consciousness.

They divided the human consciousness into these four parts. There is dreamless sleep. There is the dream state in sleep.

There is a state of wakefulness, which is ordinary human consciousness. And Turiya is the awakened state of consciousness. That's the force state of consciousness.

They've been talking about that for hundreds of years, thousands of years. The possibility of this dimension of consciousness arising in humans, the force state. And this is what this is all about.

And it is not some distant possibility that you may achieve in some future lifetime, as many people still believe that. Many Buddhists, I've met Buddhists who say, I think I'll need another 15 lifetimes. And then, in fact, my teacher told me, they say, he told me 15 more lifetimes and then I'll be enlightened.

Oh, wow. Okay, that's right. Well, you have plenty of time so you can stay unconscious now.

It's okay. But the strange thing is, the awakened state of consciousness is already there within you. It's just covered up, hidden by mental noise and emotional turmoil.

It's already there as your essential reality. So that's interesting. So it means that time is ultimately not helpful as far as your awakening is concerned.

Time is not helpful. In fact, it's a hindrance in your awakening. So, no time is required for awakening.

Now, the mind says, let me try to figure this out. That doesn't make sense. Meaning I've been meditating for nothing all these years.

Meditation, if it works as it should, ultimately the purpose is, the aim is to be present while you meditate, not to seek some future condition. This is a fundamental mistake that meditators make is they imagine a future condition that they want to arrive at or achieve. And they think, if I just practice more and harder, I will eventually achieve that awakened state.

And that belief is actually a hindrance because then you are doing a meditation. And if you're doing a meditation, you miss the one thing that is the awakened state. And we could call that being.

The realization of being. There needs to be a cessation of doing, an end of doing in order to realize being. You have the two dimensions in your life.

Doing, it requires time. And being, that requires no time. Now, most humans are unaware of being.

They are lost in doing. And the primordial doing is thinking. And then you miss the now, which is inseparable from being.

So I invite you as we speak, or I speak, all the speaking happens. I don't know who is speaking, something is speaking. Invite you here now to become aware of being.

Being, here now. Now, some of you may just, as I say these words, which are only pointers, like signposts, as I say these words, some of you may be able to sense their own beingness. You sense that you are.

And if you have no idea what I'm talking about yet, you're still trying to understand it mentally, let me take you then gradually into being. Let's become aware of this moment. And the first thing you become aware of in this moment is sense perceptions, visual, auditory, and then some of the others do tactile and so on.

But the most predominant sense perceptions are the visual and the auditory. You're here and you see. This is the, you're becoming aware of the present moment, which taken the form of sensory perception here now.

And you look around the room, or you see this person, so-called person sitting on a chair, and you can take in the totality of the room. Question that arises is, are you able to take in the totality of your sense perceptions at this moment without any mental commentary? Just be like a, maybe like a one-year-old child that hasn't learned language yet and just looks in wonder and amazement at the world.

You don't have to look like that, I'm just proving. So you look around at the innocent perception without, is it possible for you, only you can answer that for yourself, but not through words, through just knowing. Are you able to be here in this moment, allow your sense perceptions to be there, being aware of all these things without commenting mentally, without interpretation.

Just let it be, like the Beatles song, let it be. Now that's, there's a shift in consciousness that's already happened because when you interpret your sense perceptions, that's the conditioning of your mind. It's a person perceiving things.

But when you don't interpret, there's still a knowing there, but not conceptual. There's a deeper knowing, but the person isn't there really at that moment when you're not commenting, not interpreting, not imposing some kind of interpretation on the world, then the person that was there before when you were commenting has been replaced by awareness or presence. So there was a person, but then the person comes to an end temporarily.

And they simply, who or what is perceiving this room when you are not commenting according to the conditioning of your past? Who or what is perceiving this awareness itself? So something has, something has receded, the person, and something else has arisen to replace it, so to speak.

Awareness. That awareness is very still. Stillness is in spiritual discourse.

Stillness is another important term. It's just another pointer. It's stillness.

So, and that stillness is not a sleepy stillness. It's an alert stillness. And so a shift has taken place from being a conditioned entity, conditioned by the past, and now the shift has happened, and suddenly just you are that space of awareness.

And so the next step in presence, you're not just, yes, you are aware of your sense perceptions, and you're not labeling, but you're also aware of the awareness itself, through which you are able to be aware of sense perceptions. Words are very limited, but we have to use them. You're aware of the being of yourself, the presence that makes sense perceptions possible, the presence of consciousness that makes sense perceptions possible, and you can sense that not as a subject-object relationship, although when we talk about it, it sounds like a subject-object relationship because language operates in that way.

Language has a subject and an object, so as you use language, you say, I am aware of awareness. That creates a duality that's not really there. When you talk about it, there's an I that is aware of awareness, so there's two of you, but there isn't.

It's only when you start talking about it, it's you become aware of yourself as awareness itself. Awareness becomes the self-aware, whatever you want to call it, but that is an amazing thing that you are able to enter the, even if it's just for brief moments, for brief moments, you can become free of the person. Oh my God, that heaviness, that burden that people carry around that they are so identified with, that they are that heaviness, and that's why many, many persons, their identity is intimately bound up with their, this burden of problems that they have to figure out how to solve my life problems.

So for many people, their identity is, I am a problem to be solved, so it's seeking a solution, and then you go to a therapist. However, if the therapist is present, that makes a huge difference, but I don't know. I'm sure there are some therapists here, and some of you are probably doing fantastic work because you are able to, even though your client or patient is talking, perhaps you are able to be present while you listen instead of interpreting everything, but be the consciousness.

And then perhaps some awakening can happen if you embody presence. So here, the big secret, it's not a secret, but it seems to be a secret, to be aware that you're conscious, to be aware of yourself as consciousness, as awareness, as presence, to sense the beingness of you, which is not the you, the limited you. It's actually the beingness of the universe in you, this transcendent dimension to who you are.

So in English, we don't have a word that applies to both men and women. I don't know if in Swedish, in German, you have the word mensch, which means, could mean it's man and woman, but the English language doesn't have that. So you have to say human being, human being.

And that's great. I like that because I realized that that points to the two dimensions that constitute your reality. You are a human, undoubtedly, which means you have a past, you have mental, emotional conditioning that makes up the person or the ego, the personality.

You have a life situation, just you are a human and you have your desires as a human. You have your goals and so on, all the things that you experience as a human, right? Okay, but what about being?

The being dimension is overlooked by most humans. They are lost in their human nature. They are completely unaware of that transcendent dimension of consciousness that actually is the essential reality to who or what they are.

I sometimes call it your essence identity, the essence. Your essence identity is the being of you. And the being is timeless.

The being is consciousness itself. And then there's the human and the two are together. And if you can awaken to the beingness of you, then of course you continue to be a human until you are no longer, until the body dissolves.

But in the meantime, your task, your mission, your purpose is to, as a human, to also embody the being. Then you have both dimensions in your life. The limited dimension of here that is temporal, inseparable from time.

And you have the transcendent dimension to who you are in the timeless realm of consciousness itself and that is a continuous realization. At first, it may only come to you as glimpses in brief moments. And you feel suddenly a sense of lightness and very peaceful, but very intensely alive.

And you go, oh. And you may realize you're not thinking in those moments. Thinking has subsided, but you haven't fallen asleep.

You're awake. And then you may remember those moments as this was so wonderful. Sometimes it happens when you go into nature.

If you can really be there, nature can help you in your awakening. If you can really be there with all the senses and be aware of the awareness itself when you're out there in nature. And sometimes it can happen to some humans almost accidentally.

They're out and they're climbing a mountain or they're swimming or somewhere in nature and suddenly the person subsides and just an awareness arises and they go, oh, oh. And they think it's been caused by the beauty that they see, but it's not really that. It's being caused by the cessation of thinking.

And you can have that in the middle of a city.

Eckhart Tolle Dropping The Narrative of The Unhappy Me [96910e5c-b317-4295-9701-792520c51897]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:58)

Dropping the narrative of the unhappy me. In this episode, Eckhart talks to an audience in Budapest, Hungary. The crowd erupts with laughter and applause when he speaks a few words in Hungarian, especially the word for now, which is most. Eckhart then explains that the next step in the evolution of humanity is to awaken.

He says there is the potential in every person for a deeper dimension of consciousness, which is the light of God. He says many people look for themselves in their thoughts. They compare themselves to others, their childhoods, their bodies, jobs, possessions.

He explains these thoughts become a sad story and an identity, which we call my life. We keep it alive by overthinking, but it is a delusion. Eckhart says we will find liberation when we drop the narrative of the unhappy me.

Take your time.

[Speaker 1] (1:01 - 42:06)

We have plenty of time. We are in the present moment where there is no time. We'll take this opportunity.

People are still coming in to just be here for a moment in stillness, not looking for the next moment. The key word is most. Most.

Many years ago, I received a book sent by my publisher and it had my name on it. And then it said something like, my memory is not the best. My thoughts are most autonomous.

And I've always remembered that for some reason. However, that is not the only Hungarian part of my talk. Before coming here, I consulted the oracle called Google.

And I can now greet you in your native language by saying, your estate. So that was the Hungarian part of my talk. And now we go on to the English part.

And what happens here? One could say there are two dimensions to our gathering here. Two dimensions.

One is the normal dimension where I speak using words, using concepts, and you listen and your mind translates these words and concepts. So they become thoughts in your head. That's the conceptual level.

It works on a conceptual level, but that is not the main level. There's another dimension here. And that dimension is beyond the words.

That dimension is beyond the conceptual mind. We could even say that dimension is beyond thought, beyond thinking. And whether we give it a name or not, doesn't matter.

We could call it the dimension of awareness or the dimension of presence in you. It is a dimension in human consciousness. And unfortunately, most human beings alive on the planet now, or all those who have lived in past generations, most of them were not really in touch with that dimension.

They didn't know it existed inside them. They missed it. So there's a potential in every human for a deeper dimension of consciousness.

We could also say higher. It depends how you use language. I prefer to say a deeper consciousness than the conceptual consciousness.

And of course, I use words here, which are concepts, but I'm not using words because I want you to believe in the words that I use. I'm not asking you to believe in anything. You must believe me.

The concepts are only useful because they point towards the deeper dimension in you. And whether or not you find it interesting or gripping enough to stay here in your seats, depends to a large extent on whether this dimension has already awakened in you, at least to some extent. So to recognize the essence of this gathering here, you need to have even a little bit of access in yourself to that deeper dimension that is beyond the conceptual mind, the dimension of awareness.

And a good way of finding out whether or not you have some access to that dimension is whether you find it pleasant and interesting enough to stay here, whether there's something in you that says, oh, oh, yes, is it nice to be here? Or does it become very, very boring after 10, 15, maybe already, after a few minutes? Because if this only works for you on the level of concepts, then maybe for a little while you say, oh, interesting.

He says, there's only the present moment. Well, I haven't said it yet, but I probably will. He says, there's only the present interesting.

And now he's, well, but five minutes later, he's, well, he said that already. Why is he saying it again? I know that now there's only the present moment.

Okay, that's done. Don't want to hear about the present moment again. So then it only works on the level of concepts and it's no longer interesting and you feel like getting up.

But most of you are here because that dimension in you has already awakened. Another way of putting it is to say that we could use the term spiritual awakening, or we could say the awakening of consciousness. As I see it, that is the next step in the evolution of humanity.

Because I would like to suggest to you that the evolution of humanity is not finished yet. At least I hope it isn't, because it would be sad if it were finished. One could almost say to God, is that the best you can do?

I'm sure you can do better, but God is still working in you as you, the consciousness, which is the light of God. I'm jumping ahead. Let's come back to just this moment.

So most of you have come because this awakening process is already happening in you, but it is possible that you never called it awakening process. You never called it the deeper dimension of consciousness. It is possible that you only experienced it, perhaps after reading a certain book or books, you only experienced it as some inner peace emerging in you that wasn't there before, or less suffering in your life, less unhappiness than before.

It is possible that you experienced it as that, that certain situations that before created a lot of unhappiness for you, no longer create that unhappiness. You may also find that life becomes easier because you're no longer in conflict with the isness of things, with the present moment. And you realized, perhaps some of you realized at some point that a lot of your unhappiness was unnecessary.

It was created by unconscious dysfunctional thinking. And so many of you then experienced a diminishment of suffering or unhappiness, and perhaps a deeper sense of aliveness and inner peace, not all the time, perhaps yet. And this is what brought you here.

Another way of putting it is to say that, well, one of the most important or the most important thing in a person's life is their sense of identity, who they are, who am I? And even a child, as it begins to grow up, already begins to look for a stronger sense of identity. Even a three-year-old child already looks for an identity.

At a certain age, when the child begins to speak, one of the first things the child learns, his or her name, John. John, what's that, John? That's you, John, John.

And sometimes for a little while, the child talks in the third person. John is hungry. No, you are John, it's not here, you.

Okay, and then he begins to equate I with the concept. The sense of I merges with a mental concept. The mental concept is John.

And then this concept becomes the receptacle for many other things as the person grows up, many other things he or she looks for in order to have a more complete sense of self. So the body becomes important. The body, whether the body is stronger than another's bodies, whether the body is better looking than somebody else's body.

So the body becomes a mental image too. That's me and my body. So you identify with the body.

It's a very important thing in many people's lives. Body identification is very important. And with some people, it's so strong that they have a feeling mainly who I am is my body and the rest is other stuff.

And that can become a source of, for many people, it's a source of suffering, unhappiness, because they compare their body with other bodies. And they come to the conclusion that my body is not as good as these bodies. And so you have a diminished sense of self and this diminished identity as feeling inferior.

Me as a body feeling inferior to another body is a source of suffering. And many people, as you know, that I'm sure in this country also, there are magazines you can buy and read that continuously talk what you can do about your body. And it's important for people.

And then it might be external looks, good looking. It could be strengths. It could be looks.

And so you identify and you compare yourself. And then if you're lucky, your body is stronger or better looking than other bodies. And that becomes a source of great satisfaction to you.

And you look in the mirror every morning with great satisfaction. And every day you take selfies and you post them on Facebook out into the world. And then you wait for the likes.

How many? And that becomes more concepts in your mind about your identity. The more likes, the more your sense of identity becomes.

Oh, if we'd now jumped ahead 30 or 40 years with a person who is very strongly identified with the body and a person who every morning looks with great satisfaction in the mirror, jump ahead 30 or 40 years to another morning when this person looks in the mirror and suddenly notices that something is very wrong because time has done something to the body. Something terrible. Time has done something terrible to the body.

What's wrong with this mirror? Oh, that's me. Now there's a whole industry that, of course, if you have enough money, you can go and temporarily undergo repair treatment for your body.

And you have a few more years when you say, okay, I have stopped time. Time is no longer attacking my body, but it is. So what before was a source of great satisfaction, years pass, and then it becomes a great source of pain and unhappiness because it's not really your body that's making you unhappy.

The mental image of who you are has suffered a terrible blow. And suddenly you look at people who are 30 years younger than you and say, oh, your comparison is no longer a source of pride. It's a source of pain, suffering.

That's body identification. And that's only one way in which people look for themselves. They look for themselves in this realm of identification.

Of course, yes, the most obvious one for many people is the body. And for many people, it continues to be throughout their life. Some people are extremely unhappy almost continuously with their body.

So they're, oh, and others are very happy until they are not. But many others change a lot from day to day or week to week, or depending on how much weight you have put on or how much you have lost or whatever it is. There's a mixture of, sometimes your body is good and then it's not good anymore.

And then it's good and it's not. So many people are not happy with themselves. They have a problematic relationship with themselves.

And this shows there's a split. There's a split in their identity. There's a self that they think they are.

And it's a mind created self. It's like an image. And many other things go into this.

You can put things on the body. Even if your body is not as good as others, the clothes you wear can be better than other people's clothes. You can put on great designer things, whatever they're called.

Gucci and Prada and whatever. And this is a huge conceptual thing. They are not selling you goods.

They know that. The people who make these things and advertise them, they're not really selling things to you. They're selling you.

They're selling you an identity, an enhanced identity. But if the body doesn't work for you, some people just say, okay, I'm not paying attention to my body anymore. There are other things that are more important.

I did that when I was young. Because I was neither good looking, nor did I have a strong body. So what can you do?

And I didn't have money to put designer clothes on my body. So there was nothing to do. Okay, then other things that people look for in their sense of identity could be their family.

Where do I come from? What are my ancestors? What have they achieved?

What is my social status in the world? How do I fit in? Am I upper class?

And of course there also, I couldn't find any identity there either, because I was not an aristocrat. And I didn't know anybody beyond my grandparents. So I didn't have ancestors 500 years ago who lived in a beautiful palace.

And I could identify with that. There wasn't anything to identify with. So I would continue to look for myself.

And I kept looking for myself. So it wasn't the body, it wasn't strength. Possessions, I didn't have any money.

So I couldn't buy stuff and then have more stuff than other people. That's a great thing for your identity. But I couldn't do that either.

Oh dear, what am I going to do now? Who am I? I was looking for myself.

Every human being wants to know who they are and they want to be that more fully. Ultimately, everybody's looking for themselves. I'm looking for me.

Okay, if I buy that and add it to me, then that will become the BMW or the Mercedes that I buy becomes part of me if I buy it. But if somebody else has a bigger car, then I get diminished again. So complicated.

So everybody, they're looking for themselves. And a huge problem for many, many people is a deficient sense of self-esteem. This is a very common thing.

People, self-esteem means who you think you are. And a self-esteem that is lacking, that means you feel less than others. And that's a source of great unhappiness and suffering.

This is the human level. There are ancient stories in many different cultures on the planet. And there are ancient stories that all speak of a golden age, whether they call it golden age or call it the garden of Eden or paradise or a time when things went so well, there wasn't suffering.

The psychological suffering wasn't there and people lived happily. The golden age, it's a mythical tale. I believe it is a memory of a pre-conceptual stage of human consciousness when the problematic ego identity had not yet arisen.

And humans for thousands of years remember it was a distant and vague memory of something that they lost or seemed to have lost. And why did they lose it? They lost it because something happened in them which was an important step in the evolution of consciousness.

And it is called thinking. They developed the ability to think conceptually. This is, of course, strongly linked to the use of language because thinking to a large extent, conceptual thinking is talking to yourself in your head.

And that was an incredible step forward in evolution. Thinking was an incredible thing to happen. Some anthropologists believe that when humans began to think, soon after as they began to speak, they began to think, they were often surprised by their own thoughts.

And they thought that God or a God was talking to them when suddenly thoughts came into their heads. Who is talking? And so progress began.

Progress began as thinking. It was very slow at first, very, very slow. But civilizations began to develop and so incredible things happened.

But we live in the world of polarities, which means you gain something here and you lose something there. There's a price to pay for everything because this enormous gain in consciousness, gradually, humans became more and more unhappy. Gradually, humans, the human existence became more and more problematic.

And gradually, humans began to lose, let's call it their original rootedness in God. The rootedness in being, the rootedness in being to feel connected to something vast. Not to feel like you're a little particle being tossed about and not feel connected to anything anymore.

To feel just always feeling that something is missing. I need something more. There's something wrong here.

Something is missing. Gradually then, instead of being rooted in being, I mean, look at a tree. The tree is not only rooted physically in the earth.

A tree, when you can really contemplate a tree, you can see that it exists in that state of deep stillness. And it has a certain consciousness too. It can respond to the environment.

It grows. But it is totally rooted in being. There's no sense of separate self.

But with humans, there's a huge sense of separateness. The separateness from everybody else and the separateness from nature, the separateness from being itself. So a word that is sometimes used in philosophy or existentialist philosophy, alienation.

Alienation, which means humans become aliens to themselves. You become a stranger to yourself. So there was this incredible development of consciousness through thinking.

And then came science, which is applied thinking, made it even empowered thinking even more. And more and more humans had the price to pay was a heavy one. The price to pay was suffering, unhappiness.

As the Buddha said, all life is suffering, dukkha. So the price to pay was you couldn't find yourself anymore. You were lost.

And this is, I could say, loss of paradise, paradise lost. So you lost your sense of self. And then you began to look for your sense of self in the dimension of thought.

And so this is what we talked about just before. You need to add to your, always needing to add something to your mind made sense of self of who you are. So everybody here has a certain life situation and everybody here has a certain, when you can talk about your life, who are you?

So you start thinking about you and me and my life. And me and my life is mostly, for most people, it's a story in their heads that they derive their sense of self from things that you own, things that you have achieved, things that you have not achieved, your successes, your failures, your relationships, your body, all these things, the conditioning of your mind, which depends on what happened to you from childhood onwards. Their mind became conditioned in a certain way.

You identify with this and that, not just personal things. You identify also with your environment, the country you live in becomes part of your identity or your religion or your particular group, tribal group that you belong to or is incorporated into your sense of self. And there are many people who carry a very unhappy self.

The unhappy self is the predominantly unhappy self is more common than a predominantly happy self. If you have a predominantly happy self, you're very lucky or very stupid. If you are predominantly happy, it could be that you still exist partly below thought, which traditionally in mythology and so on, it's called the fool.

Or before the term became politically incorrect, it was called the idiot. So this is a person, but they said every village in medieval times, every village had a fool, a village fool. And the village fool was somebody whose mind was so undeveloped that they hadn't formed an ego yet, but they were not very good at conceptual thinking.

But they were, in many cases, they were the happiest person in the village. So they went around. Oh, there goes the fool.

Look how happy he is. Yes, no self hasn't, they existed below the level of conceptualization, but ego hadn't arrived yet. You can also see it in mythological tales where the fool is however important because the fool is connected with something that the more advanced human has lost.

And this is why the fool is important even in mythology and in even more recent literature. The Hobbit, Lord of the Rings, is a little bit of a fool because he's not as intelligent as most of the other people he interacts with, but only he can do something, only he has a certain power to do something. A famous movie that you might have seen years ago, a Forrest Gump, which is, again, it's about a person whose level of intelligence is far below average.

And again, this is the human who has not yet developed a full ego. And so we cannot go back there, unfortunately. And I'm not attempting to take you back below conceptualization.

That's not the way to go. There are millions of people who try to get away from themselves, the self, the mind-created self. The Buddha called it the self and said it's the great illusion.

The self is an illusion. That's what we are talking about because it's a fictitious mind-created entity that makes you unhappy a lot of the time, creates all kinds of trouble and problems that are completely unnecessary. But you can't get rid of it easily.

It's there. You can travel to the other end of the earth. And when you arrive, you're still there with yourself.

Can't get away from myself. I'm now in Hawaii. I'm now in Bali.

And I'm still with myself. And so how do you get away from yourself? People tried and they've developed many ways of getting away from themselves, but they all take you ultimately below thought.

It's a regressive step. Alcohol. Okay, that helps for a little while to get away from your unhappy self.

Just have four or five whiskeys. That's a little bit of relief from your daily torture of your mind because for many people, their minds is a daily torture. Their minds make them unhappy.

They don't even, they don't know it. They think it's a situation. They don't realize it's not the situation that makes you unhappy.

It's the narrative that your mind has about the situation that's making you unhappy. And that's an egoic narrative. Try it out in any situation.

Let's not go to the very extreme situations. We may touch on that later, but basically it's true too. Any situation where you get unhappy in whatever form, you get irritated, you get angry, you get whatever it is.

In the present moment, you get happy. Why are you getting unhappy in this situation? You're just waiting for somebody to arrive.

You're waiting at the airline counter, but they are so slow and it's not moving and you get very upset and unhappy. This is a minor situation, but life is full of these minor situations. If you're unconscious, spiritually speaking, which means completely identified with your conceptual mind.

If you're unconscious, then you believe that all these events and situations and people make you unhappy. This situation is just, it's so awful. But if you wake up in that moment, you realize it's not the situation.

It's the narrative in your mind about the situation creates the emotion of unhappiness. Very easily can be verified as an experiment. Next time you find yourself in a situation that makes you unhappy, or you think the situation makes you unhappy, you can ask yourself, let's try an experiment.

How would I experience this situation if I did not add any concepts or thoughts to it, to this situation? I'm not adding any thought to this moment. This moment is the way it is.

And I'm not going to withdraw the addition of thought to it. So here you are, wherever it may be, waiting in line. The line is not moving.

You've been standing there for 40 minutes waiting to check in or whatever way it is. How would I experience this moment if I didn't add any of the baggage of thought to it? And suddenly you realize, okay, now I am not labeling this situation as either good or bad.

I'm not labeling it. I'm allowing it to be as it is this moment. And suddenly, yes, you may still have a pain in your body or whatever it is because you've been standing ever too long.

But suddenly this moment just is as it is. It's no longer an unhappy moment because the unhappiness was there because of unconscious thinking. Mistaking a situation, an interpretation of a situation.

It's a single thing. You can go in the, let's say winter's coming. So in the morning you look out of the window and you could either, you could go, let's say it's been raining.

I suppose it rains here too sometimes. After a few days of rain, you open the window and say, oh no, it's another miserable day. I don't know how many more of these days I can take.

And it's just my miserable life and another miserable day in my miserable life. Of course, you're adding a lot of thoughts to this moment. How would you experience it if you open the curtains and you simply look outside and take in what's there?

There's no unhappiness because there's no self. You're not seeing it through the conceptual self. You're seeing it through awareness.

That's the great liberation. If you can see something through awareness instead of the conditioned conceptual self, suddenly there's clear seeing and the heaviness isn't there anymore. The suffering suddenly evaporates.

And amazing if you can learn to distinguish between the situation that is and the interpretation. And then suddenly you withdraw the narrative, the story, and there's what is left. When you withdraw the story, there's just the isness of this moment as it is.

And you're no longer fighting against the isness. You're allowing this moment to be as it is. That's an amazing liberation.

And with that, the self diminishes, it shrinks, the conceptual self, the mind-created self. And what takes its place is a different dimension of consciousness, which we could call presence or awareness. So that arises.

That's an enormous shift in consciousness. Look, for example, many people carry an enormous burden around with them every day. And that burden that they carry around with them, they call it my life.

My life. Oh, it wasn't supposed to be like that. And when I was 20, I imagined something very different.

Where did it start going wrong? Well, it started with my parents. If I'd had more conscious parents, perhaps things would have been better.

If life had treated me more fairly, I would be okay. But many things went wrong. And I don't know if I've lost faith.

It's all going downhill. Or whatever the narrative says, it has regrets, has a few successes. That was great.

It was so nice. But then it ended. It was so wonderful.

And then it came to an end. I'm still thinking about it. Can't stop thinking.

Can't stop thinking about it. I can't stop. I can't stop thinking about the good times that I've lost.

And I can't stop thinking about all the bad stuff that happened to me. Can't stop thinking about that either. And that's my life.

That's my life. Oh, dear. And millions of humans carry that mental burden, mental, emotional burden around with them.

And believe that that is their reality. They do not realize that is not their reality. It is their conceptual reality, which consists of the movement of thought, thought, thought.

So you continuously think about your unpleasant life. And you keep it alive by continuously thinking about it and being so identified with the thinking that you become that thinker, the unhappy thinker, the unhappy self. It's incredible to see how many people walk around to their grave carrying the heavy burden of an unhappy me, unhappy self.

It doesn't need to be like that. But how can you be free of that? It's not that difficult.

What happens is that you are mistaking what you call your life for your life situation. Your life situation involves the past. It has arisen out of the past and probably involves some future where you want to get to.

Still, you have certain, perhaps you have certain hope still that your life situation one day will become, will resolve itself. This problematic thing that I carry around, one day my life situation, this is an unconscious belief or hope in many people, one day my life situation will resolve itself. And then finally I can start breathing freely when I need just the right person and just the right place to live and good health for my body and a good income and social recognition and a few other things.

Don't have to worry anymore about money, don't have to worry anymore about anything. Perhaps one day I can get there, but it's very unlikely.

Eckhart Tolle Eckhart Tolle Special : Finding Death Before Death Finds You [fe75dbce-dd49-462e-87e2-a8f728be496b]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:33)

Finding death before death finds you. In this episode, Eckhart discusses a topic that is taboo for many. The subject of death.

In the Western world, he says denial and the fear of death has prevailed for centuries. However, Eckhart explains that need not continue. He says there is a much deeper dimension to who we are.

One that never dies. And if we can get in touch with that transcendent aspect of ourselves, our fear of death will ultimately disappear.

[Speaker 1] (0:34 - 46:36)

It's important to familiarize yourself with death. You can't really live in a wise way if you are not familiar with death. They go together.

From the point of view of the physical vehicle and the form identity, one could say that every one of us is infected with a lethal virus already. But it's not a physical virus. The virus is called time.

And in the end, it will consume you and destroy you. That's for sure. So, the outcome is already assured.

The seeming solidity of our world is an illusion. Especially in the Western world, the denial of death has been prevalent for a long time. Not so in medieval times, but since we moved into modern times.

In medieval times, in the Western world, Europe, humans were very much aware of death. It was all around them. Life was very unpredictable, more so than now.

Although nowadays, it's also unpredictable, as we are seeing. But in medieval times, even more so, of course. So, death could come at any moment.

And you can see in old paintings, medieval paintings, many people on their desk or table, they had a skull, a human skull, to remind them of death. Because if you're aware of death, everything else, you have a different perspective on everything else. For example, if you were aware continuously of mortality, short-lived nature of the individual life form, perhaps nothing would be that all-consuming and serious anymore.

If you knew any dispute or disagreement or semblance. And if you have a dispute with somebody, if you remember, in a few years, we'll both be dead. Somehow, you rise above it a little bit.

This lethal virus called time, unless something else kills you first, traffic accident every year, 1,250,000 people die, many of them young. Many people in the Western world die of drugs, overdoses of drugs, which are connected with unhappiness and despair and finding something to mitigate the unhappiness and despair or lifelessness they feel. And then they are drawn to drugs and then it kills them.

They don't know who they are. They haven't gone deeper. Nobody has taught them all the most vital things and not taught to young people.

So mortality has been a taboo in the West for a long time, ever since medieval ages came to an end. In other parts of the world, death is not yet a taboo. It's still on open display, such as in India, where the dead bodies are cremated out in the open.

Anybody can come and watch dead bodies being burned and carried to the streets and then being burned. That gives you more of a sense of reality because if you deny death, you get a distorted view of things. And not only the West denied death, even old age.

Most old people are now in senior residences whereas in other countries still you see they are out in the street. So in particular at this time, people that you know may die before their time. Some others may already have been approaching old age, death, and then through this illness, they die just a little bit sooner.

So it's important to face death, not kind of think about it in a morbid way, but just to face it, the fact of it, the inevitability of it, and to see that it's very important, spiritually too, to be aware of the short-lived nature of all life forms. One of the essential teachings of the Buddha is the fact of impermanence. A lot of the fear that people feel, yes, there's fear of loss, but deep down perhaps it could all be traced to fear of death.

Because a fear of loss is your fear of losing your job or fear of losing somebody close to you. Well, that's death that's happening to somebody else. Or you have a fear of loss of job, loss of your savings, loss of home, whatever it may be.

It's the fear, a kind of loss, a diminishment of through these things. And so these are little deaths when you lose something that was important to you. There's a little death there.

Now I want to face death and talk about death just briefly without necessarily giving you too much or anything to believe in. Some people believe, of course, death is many people in Western world especially, but increasingly the East too, believe, of course, death is the end of everything, the end of you. Because life, including human life, they believe, and that's still, of course, the mainstream belief, is an accident.

Accidentally, these atoms and molecules have come together. The whole of life is an accidental conglomeration of atoms, total chance event. There's nothing behind it.

That's the belief. There's nothing, there's nothing transcendent. The entire universe, the apparent harmony of everything, the amazing life forms and everything is just a chance event.

Or as Shakespeare put it, well, he wasn't referring to that, but that is the modern view, a tale told by an idiot full of sound and fury, signifying nothing, dreadful view of life. And of course, because that, even those humans who have not done any philosophical investigations for themselves, they have all absorbed it because it's in the mainstream culture, that belief of nothing there, chance events. Complete meaning, there's no meaning.

Any meaning they believe is, it's a fabrication. There is no meaning to the universe. There's no underlying dimension.

I believe, of course, these are grave errors, but that is still the mainstream belief. And then there are some religious people who still believe that they have their own forms of belief, of life after death. Perhaps they're a little bit better off than those who believe that there's absolutely nothing.

It's all chance. There's no transcendent meaning to human life or any life. For most, it's still, even the religious people, for most, it's still, it's a belief.

It's a conceptual idea in their head. It can perhaps free them a little bit from the fear of death, but I don't know how much. So I don't want to talk in terms of belief so that in order to go beyond the fear of death, if that is possible, is there another way rather than the belief that there is something?

If you can sense that the essential you is not a visible entity, who you are essentially cannot be found in the realm of physicality. If it could be found in the realm of physicality, then a surgeon could open your brain and find you there. Or find your memories, whatever, find your thoughts, who you are, but you are not there.

You can't find a single thought because thought does not exist in the realm of physicality. In fact, science has no idea, no matter what they say, basic truth is their ego sometimes, ego doesn't allow scientists to say that they don't know. They find it hard to say they don't know.

But the basic fact is science has no idea what consciousness is. Many scientists avoid the word altogether because they don't know what to do with it. Certainly there's a relationship between the physical brain and consciousness, but they believe that the physical brain produces consciousness as a byproduct of physicality.

But that's all they can say. But they don't know even what a thought is. Where is it?

How does a thought survive in you? For decades, memories, hundreds of thousands of memories survive in you. I can remember the most crazy, insignificant things.

People have said to me 40 years ago, so many things are there, where are they? The entire you, who you are, who you are in your essence is not, you're invisible. That's the realization.

You're essentially invisible. If you can sense that essentially who you are is an invisible presence that kind of inhabits the body, not as a belief, I believe that I'm an immortal soul, that would be an old term. But right now in this moment, can you sense the essence of who you are as an invisible presence that pervades the entire body, but goes beyond it too?

The mind has to become still for a moment so that your attention can move there. But your attention and it are actually a single thing. And again, there's a very still presence there.

And even if you only have glimpses of it, then you have a kind of direct experience of who or what you are beyond the physical body. If you are very strongly identified with the physical body, then it might be more difficult. Your identity is mainly derived from the physicality, which happens to some people, particular people who are very proud of their body or very unhappy with their body, either extreme.

If you're proud of your body, derive your sense of self from it because it looks better than other people's. Your appearance and body, it's fine. It's a limitation.

I mean, appreciating if you're lucky enough to have a great body, it's wonderful. But is that all to who you are? So this sensing of yourself as an invisible presence, even if you only have it occasionally, can free you to some extent from the fear of death.

That presence is timeless. You don't remember it. It's nothing to do with memory.

It's nothing to do with what you have achieved as a person here, whether you're a big failure or big success is irrelevant. It's nothing to do with your future. It's just so comforting to know that that deeper self is beyond the decay of the body.

Now the question arises, well, what happens to it when the body dissolves? Wait and see. I don't want to give you too many ideas to believe in, but at least there's something there that is not subject to time because let's say you are 20 years now and you can sense that.

When you're 90 years old, you can still sense that. And it's the same. And then you're less fearful or no longer fearful of your own death, which will come either when you're old or sooner or the death of other people around you or wherever they are.

Then you can see that death on one level is very sad and tragic. And on another level, it's the most natural thing in the world and part of life. And then when somebody dies close to you, you can cry or weep and at the same time feel that which is beyond death in you, which must be the same as that which is beyond death in that person who died.

One could go so far as to say, nothing ever dies, nothing real ever dies. There's only the morphosis of forms, the continuous birth and death of forms, life forms, bodies. So you can be sad when somebody dies or you may be sad even when people die that you don't know.

And at the same time, there's these two levels. On one level, death is tragic. On a higher or deeper level, it's natural and not tragic at all.

And the two can coexist in you at the same time. I experienced it when my mother died. I cried and yet I felt a great peace underneath it.

If the peace could have spoken, it probably would have said, there is no death, only forms die. But it was just peace. It didn't say anything.

And then a few months later, my dad died and they didn't even live together. And then the same thing happened again. I don't know if you've heard of, there's a famous spiritual book, it's called A Course in Miracles.

I believe it's a wonderful book if you can look beyond terminologies. And this is relevant to what we've been speaking about. It says, nothing real can be threatened.

Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God. That's it.

Nothing real can be threatened. So what is it that can be threatened? Well, of course, the body can be threatened.

Everything in this physical realm can be threatened. It's subject to destruction and decay. Nothing real can be threatened.

So is there something that, if it can't be threatened, then it's not part of the physicality of what we perceive as the physical universe. Nothing unreal exists. In ultimate terms, and that's not just A Course in Miracles, it's in all Indian spiritual philosophy and so on.

In ultimate terms, the entire universe is a kind of dream, a dream of the universal mind. You are part of the dream of the universal mind. Everything is a dream of the universal mind, where it's going.

And then the universal mind, my suggestion is, is gradually awakening. It's becoming more conscious. But nothing unreal exists.

So only what is real exists. Nothing unreal actually exists. In this realization lies a deep peace that is knowing the source of all life, which is God.

The peace of God is not peace that is derived from some circumstance or something. It's not happy circumstances that give you peace. No, the peace of God is a realization of, ultimately, who you are in your essence.

And who you are in your essence is one with what the universe is in its essence. That is the peace of God. And then you can relax and say, OK, but not as a believer.

You know that this is all fine, but there's something beyond that. And I'm part of that which is beyond. So you might say then, as I say, well, I wouldn't mind in the realm of time, could live a few more years, maybe.

Perhaps continue to be a channel for consciousness coming into this world. But if that's not to be, that's fine. It doesn't really matter.

Now, most people believe you need more time because they believe time will eventually enable them to find themselves. A fuller version of themselves. The worst thing you can do to a person is to remove time from them.

And so you have no more time. And that happens, for example, when you have an illness and you go to a doctor and the doctor says, well, maybe six weeks. You have six weeks.

It's virtually nothing. And that would be devastating for most, especially, of course, if you are completely identified with this personality in the form. You've never sensed anything beyond it.

And it's awful because you said, I haven't. I'm not comp... But then there have been cases, some I knew personally, who were told this.

They knew only a few months or a few weeks. And because time was removed from them, they suddenly accepted it. They didn't go into, oh my God, this.

And suddenly they were lived completely in the present moment. Like a little child, almost. When I was still doing counseling sessions years ago, I had a couple of people independently who had virtually no time left.

And they became enlightened beings, just the light of consciousness shining through them. And we just sat together a few times and they kind of just looked at me. There was no person there anymore.

The person was already gone. The person had already died. But the knowledge that I have no more time didn't give any food, any fuel to the person anymore.

The personality just dissolved already. And what was left when the personality dissolved was just the consciousness behind the personality and that pure consciousness shining through. And that is what you sense.

Again, you get a glimpse of when you sense within and feel that you are lived, that an invisible presence lives through you. And when the personality dies, which is the ego death, then of course, in some cases, the personality dies before the body dies. And then that shines through, the consciousness shines through.

And that's an amazing thing. In the Western world, the contemporary world, nobody knows what to do with that. There's no knowledge to refer to.

Perhaps in more distant past, yes, they would have been recognized. They would have become saints. Or in India, even nowadays, more readily they would have been recognized as holy men or women.

Just look at them. Wow. But it doesn't matter whether they were recognized or not.

They were not concerned with that. And time suddenly didn't matter anymore. What is another 10, 20, 30 years?

So what? No longer made any difference whatsoever because they realized that the essence of who they are, the total fulfillment of their lives, it doesn't matter how old they were. The destiny of humans is that realization.

Whether it comes to you shortly before you die at the age of 30 or shortly before you die at the age of 90, it doesn't matter. And of course, this is where the saying comes from. Find death before death finds you.

So that means that's the death of the personality. Now, here, what we are engaged in through the teaching and the practice is a gradual diminishment of the personality. Now, some of you, when you're confronted with death or death close to you and see a very situation involving death, it could be that suddenly your entire personality can also die.

It could happen. And that's a wonderful thing. It's the greatest thing that can happen to a human.

In the meantime, it's quite enough that here, through the practice, there is a diminishment of you as a person. The person or the personality becomes somewhat less important and all-pervasive because you begin to sense there is something beyond it. And that something beyond it is more essentially who you are than the person or the personality.

And that something beyond it can shine through the personality as long as it's there. And then the personality is actually a much nicer personality, so to speak. It's not as obnoxious as most personalities.

And it's not such a problem maker like most personalities, but the dimension is completely missing. Then without that, personalities are just a nuisance. You might have noticed.

Now, with some people, you have that shining through. There are people who have never come into touch with any spiritual teaching, and it's happening in them for some other reason, triggered by something else, and that's perfectly fine. So to have a deeper perspective on what's happening around you, because, yes, as we are experiencing this collective, in conventional terms, to use the old-fashioned word, calamity.

If you experience this right now, which is to gain a deeper perspective on it is very important. Then you're no longer drawn into the hysterical, fear-mongering, overreaction to it. And you are light in this world.

You are peace, because then there's some peace in you. You become at peace because that presence that you sense is at peace, your connectedness with Source. And then you can do a lot of good in this world.

Even just your presence does a lot of good, because you emanate a certain frequency. But, of course, you probably will do them, just be there, or could be. You might speak to people.

You may be active here or there to help whatever you feel called upon to do. But you're not devastated anymore. The end of the world could happen.

And you would still know nothing real can be threatened, nothing unreal exists. Because the world, what we see as the world is, yes, one way of looking at it is, you could say it's the dream of the universal mind. It's one way of looking at it.

Another way of looking at it is it's a surface phenomenon. Underneath it, there are vast energy movements, and there is an intelligence underlying it. And that's, we could say, to connect it with the other ways, the universal mind.

Underneath it, there is an intelligence energy field that expresses itself on the surface as the manifest life-forms continuously. But the life-forms are here. What lives through the life-forms is the universal intelligence underneath the invisible energy field that is the organizing principle behind all phenomena that arise in this world.

And that is an invisible energy field. In fact, different energies, but all deriving from one energy and then separating into other one energy field is the earth itself. The earth itself is a living being.

It has an intelligence of its own. The earth itself is a manifestation of the universal mind, of the universal consciousness. And every human being on the earth is a manifestation of the universal consciousness connected with the earth.

But the earth is not a dead thing. And this is why I will speak about this in more detail. But for now, just a brief mention.

There were only five extinctions on the planet. Total chaos, chaotic, total eradication of, in some cases, 60, 70, even 90% of all life-forms in this, I believe, the second extinction disappeared. And then how was it that each time out of nothing, the earth regenerated itself with even more complex life-forms?

Because that which was the underlying intelligence is actually much greater than our limited human intelligence. And it is vast. It has a totally different view of time.

So it then produced new life-forms. But just to know what applies to the earth applies to each human. Underlying it, there is an invisible energy field and it holds the body together temporarily.

The important thing is to be able to sense it. And everything else, the world itself is no longer seen as the ultimate reality. The ultimate reality is unseen.

So that frees you, to some extent, from the world. But you participate in it. There's an ancient Christian saying, this is very beautiful, that points to a particular way of being in this world.

And the saying is, to be in the world, but not of it. That would be enlightened living. You are in the world, but you're not of the world.

It shows the two dimensions. It's an ancient Christian saying, to be in the world, but not of it. And that really is for us, for you, to realize and to live, to be a helpful, beneficial presence in the world.

But not realizing that your home is not in this realm. I like the English word home, H-O-M-E. What does that remind you of?

The Indian om, om, O-M, om. The sacred sound that points to the origin of all things. It could be either coincidence, or it could be that they are connected.

Would not be too surprising, because the European languages are Indo-European languages. They have many of their words have roots in Sanskrit. So what we've been talking about is pointing to the possibility of being peaceful or at peace, even in the face of apparent disaster and death and so on.

And it's sometimes only through the disaster that people find that dimension. There is a transcendent dimension to this universe. Just as there's a transcendent dimension to who you are.

You are who you are. There's the physical body, and there's your mind. Is that who you are?

In this dimension, the sense-perceived reality, that's not where you ultimately are. So you are invisible. You can sense that when you become very attentive and go within.

You can sense that the essence of who you are is that indefinable consciousness, the presence. It cannot be sense-perceived with the senses. But where does that come from?

What is the essence of all life? That's the light of the world, Jesus called it, the light of the world. And you are the light of the world, he said.

That's consciousness. You are consciousness. Where does it come from?

It comes from God. But where is God? And what is God?

Well, we cannot explain what God is. God is transcendent to this dimension. It's not in the universe.

There's a transcendent dimension. And from there, God emanates something into this world like the sun emanates light continuously. So God is like the sun but not part of this universe.

It emanates consciousness into this dimension. And it's this dimension of space and time. And here, the emanation of consciousness is creating a universe.

It's not finished yet. It's continuing. The consciousness that you are is a ray from the one source of all life that we call God.

So what we perceive as suffering, the birth pangs of life forms in this universe, they are like a bad dream in the process of the universe, in the process of being created still. It's not a finished thing. And there are the limited perceptions that we have create a very dream that appears like a nightmare.

But when you wake up out of it, you realize it, oh, it was only a nightmare. What does it mean on a practical level? What does it mean when a child dies in a seemingly innocent child or millions of people suffer in a meaningless way?

Now, this is very strange. If every human being is regarded as an autonomous entity, it's very tragic. But I would suggest a different perspective, just as a try it out or a higher perspective.

There's only one life. There's only one consciousness. And that manifests in countless forms, countless life forms.

It's the indwelling presence in every life form manifesting briefly, but continuously. And this one presence is the identity of each. Let's stay with human beings.

The identity of each human being is that underlying presence. That's the essence identity. Every human being is the same being on that level that gradually, that same being that lives, takes on a temporary form and then dissolves.

And in this continuous taking on form and dissolving as a form, there is an awakening process. I would suggest for a moment that you regard the entire human race, all humanity, look at it as a single organism. All humanity is one single, invisible organism.

And this organism is not separate from the source of all life. It is an emanation of the one source that we could call God if we wanted to. It's an emanation into this dimension of space and time.

And every human is, I could say, a piece of God, a tiny fragment of God in disguise. That's like a ray of sunlight in disguise. Every human.

So the essence identity of every human is consciousness. It's the light of consciousness, which is the light of God. And so what is evolving is the one human consciousness is undergoing an evolutionary process.

Every human being that ever lived and ever will live is a tiny cell, to borrow a word from the physical realm, is a tiny cell in this evolving being. It evolves in this dimension. It becomes, there's more of God that flows into it.

So there's a gradual process at work that, in a sense, you could say, a spiritualization of all matter, of all universe. Matter becomes less and less heavy and physical, including the human body. But we don't need to go there.

But to realize that your essence identity and my essence identity and the essence identity of all beings is one. And emanates from one source. And you can recognize it when you look at other human beings.

And you can, now the important thing is you need to be able to sense, if only faintly, the essence of who you are that is beyond the personality, the form, the form identity, physical, mental form, personality. The essence of who you are is not that. The essence of who you are is that which you can sense at this moment as consciousness.

Without any memory or anticipation, you sense that essence. It's only in the present. It's inseparable.

It's called presence. The presence, the consciousness. And then you realize you no longer need to believe something.

And then you can intuitively comprehend what is very misleading and could easily be misinterpreted when you express it in words. Then you can sense that there is a transcendent harmony that in this harmony transcends the apparent suffering. Because what's suffering is just the birthing process of the one consciousness.

The birthing process of this one that is gradually expressing itself more and more fully through these forms. But the forms, you and me, do not have an independent autonomous identity. It just looks like it.

We are continuously an emanation of the one. We are never separate from the one. And even when this body dissolves, the form that is beyond the body will still persist for a while before it realizes fully where it comes from, what it is connected to.

Not the personality. The personality does not survive. But there is an essence that is you that survives for quite a while until it fully realizes its home.

But gradually you live more and more consciously, which means when you have conscious connecting it with source, then all the upheavals of this world, which come in many forms, personal forms and collective forms, do not affect you anymore at the deepest level. They can still affect you on the surface level of your person. You get, oh, I'd rather be healthy than ill.

I'd rather not catch this virus. Of course you would. But you're no longer, whatever happens or doesn't happen in this world, does not affect you at the deepest level where the rock is, that is the foundation, which really means the essence of who you are.

So the only way to become free of being at the mercy not only of things that happen around you, you just hope that everything will be okay, but it's not always okay. Can't be. Not always at the mercy of things around you and no longer at the mercy of your own mind.

Whatever thoughts go through your mind, that is the dreadful fate. Then your inner state of being is dependent on what's going on around you and then you're always fearful. Oh, I might lose that or this may happen.

What do I do then? And you're at the mercy of whatever thoughts come into your head that interpret the world and interpret yourself in terms of their conditioning, which is from the past. So to become free, to become liberated, you become liberated from the world, although you should participate in the world, but with a sense of detachment.

You're not bound to it or by it. So you participate in a more enjoyable and often joyful way in the affairs of this world and you have a relationship and you appreciate the good things without needing to attach yourself to the good things or the relationship because if you lose it, you're nobody again because they give you your identity that there's nothing anymore that you need for your sense of identity because you already have found your essence identity which has nothing to do with the things of this world or your mind. And that's a wonderful liberation when you do not need the world to provide you with ultimate satisfaction, connectedness with the source of who you are.

Then you become free of the world and then you actually participate in the world in a way that not to use almost a cliché expression that makes the world a better place. But what does it mean make the world a better place? The only thing it can really mean it has any meaning is it makes the world a more conscious place so that humans begin to live more consciously and that means no longer totally identified with their personality and the conditioning of their minds.

A more conscious world is the new earth that I sometimes speak or write about. Now, it seems very often that the new earth would more easily arise if the world would not present so many obstacles to the arising of a new consciousness of which the new earth would just be an outer manifestation. What we are really talking about, of course, when we talk about a new earth, we're talking about a new consciousness.

It's not new, but it's the awakened consciousness. It's not new because it is timeless, but it's new to you, as it sometimes say in shops when you buy second-hand goods, new to you. If you haven't experienced it before, suddenly it seems like a new consciousness.

It's a deeper dimension that had always been there, but you hadn't realized it. And when you suddenly realize it, you call it new consciousness. Why not?

So there we are. The new earth is the outer manifestation of the new consciousness, which is the awakened consciousness. And this is, your purpose is to bring this into this world by embodying it, embodying it, not just through your words.

Yes, when you speak, it tends to be more inspired, more useful, more helpful, more good speech rather than destructive speech and action that you take, no longer dysfunctional, egoically motivated action, all these things are good. And even if you don't say or do anything, just the fact that you are here as representing the awakened consciousness, and even if you're not fully awakened yet, there may still be remnants of ego. That's good enough.

You represent the awakening consciousness on the planet, and that your purpose is to be there as that consciousness. Your secondary purpose is to have a fulfilling life as a personality. And the personality can never have a fulfilling life if you don't realize who you are beyond the personality.

It's only the realization who you are in your essence that can give some sense of satisfaction on the level of your personality. Otherwise, you're always looking for yourself in this world, and it's always whatever is frustrating. Every relationship will end in frustration.

Everything you achieve ultimately will not satisfy you, and you keep looking and looking. So here we are, and your job, your mission is to align yourself with the present moment and whatever is happening here and see that it is an opportunity, this upheaval that we're experiencing at the moment, and it probably will not be the first upheaval that's going to come on a collective level because this is a time for upheavals, but it is also a time for awakening. The two go together.

Just in a personal life, you need the adversity, as we've seen, to awaken. It's an opportunity, but not a guarantee. And there can be a more collective awakening if not, of course, not the whole of humanity, but far more humans through experiencing the upheaval that not only we're experiencing now, but the upheavals to come in the near future, and they are inseparable from the awakening of consciousness, and they are part of the transcendent hidden harmony behind the apparent opposites.

And so what looks like tragic and unpleasant on a conventional lower level is actually perfectly fine as it should be on a higher level. It would not be happening otherwise. It's all part of the awakening of the human being and planetary awakening.

And what awakens is not you. You don't awaken and I don't awaken. Ultimately, you and I are constructs, mental constructs, but that which shines through us, the consciousness that is awakening in this world.

There's only one consciousness that awakens. So awakening is not anybody's personal achievement. It's only there when you recognize that the person is a temporary, short-lived, relatively insignificant construct.

That's fine. You honor it as much as necessary in this dimension here, and something else is happening that far transcends the person but would not even happen if it weren't for that person. It's only because the ego was, and still to some extent is, a necessary prerequisite for the awakening of consciousness.

The very thing that seems to obstruct the awakening of consciousness is a prerequisite for it happening. That's quite amazing. In Buddhism, there's a saying that says, if there were no illusion, there would be no enlightenment.

Eckhart Tolle Eckhart Tolle Special : Healing Fear Through Difficult Times [94bdc929-b437-4fc9-a737-89ec521fb1eb]

[Speaker 2] (0:01 - 0:52)

Transforming our fear through difficult times. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions about how to deal with our fears, especially when confronted with a crisis. He says intelligent action cannot occur when we're gripped by anxiety and negative thinking, which can be incredibly destructive.

What's needed is wisdom. Looking at the totality of the situation, not just one aspect of the problem. Eckhart says we must free ourselves from the negative thinking that accompanies fear and align ourselves with what he calls the vertical dimension, the place where we are one with all that is.

He also urges us to pay attention to the most important thing in any situation, our state of consciousness.

[Speaker 1] (0:54 - 50:15)

Effective and intelligent action does not arise out of fear. And no matter, this requires not only action that you take in your personal life, but also action that we need to take on a collective level. If the action that we take arises out of fear, it's unlikely that it will be effective because what is missing then is wisdom.

Wisdom that takes into account the totality of a situation, not just focuses on one aspect of a problem and tries to solve it there, disregarding how it affects other things. So what's happening collectively to us is then potentially a great awakener for many humans. And practice whenever the fearful thinking arises, realize that it is not helpful, it's destructive, and realize that the primary factor in your life is connected with the vertical dimension.

In other words, the primary factor is your state of consciousness in any situation, any problematic situation, any challenging situation. How do you respond to it? The primary factor and your primary attention needs to be on your inner energy field, your state of consciousness.

If that is not right, if that is negative egoically, ego means complete identification with mind, if the ego is there, the ego may have good intentions. It may look good at the beginning of an egoic thing that the ego says, this is what we need to do. But if you disregard your underlying consciousness, then you will find that the famous proverb applies, the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

So there have been many people in the world their good intentions have led to disaster because they disregarded their own consciousness. They just had an idea in their head, let's create a society that is a society where humans are equal, they're no longer exploited, let's get rid of the dreadful things of private property, and that all sounds so wonderful, so that's all great, it's called communism, let's try it out. And they tried it out, it just, it looked so great intention, I suppose, well there might not have been totally pure, there might have been a resentment also and other things with it, but there were good intentions there.

They just forgot about the human ego, the unconsciousness in every human being, including the people who wanted to bring about the revolution. And then it led to millions dead, killed, how I don't want to go into it now, don't need to, but you can read history books. Now it could work if there's a change in human consciousness then naturally the world that humans manifest will be very different, but there cannot be a true change outside without the inner change.

If you try to implement an outer change without an inner change, then you will lead again create a new set of problems, could be worse than the original ones. So I highly recommend that in the morning and at night that you go to sleep at night sensing the inner body, not reading the news on your phone and then go to sleep, not watching television and then go to sleep. It's better if there's no device at all in your bedroom, but if you can't help it, if you think it needs to be there, that's fine, but go to sleep from the inner body.

When you wake up, first thing, feel the inner body for five minutes, ten minutes. Don't read on your phone. You'll know soon enough what's happening in the world.

In the middle of the night you wake up, inner body, especially if you're tortured by your mind. How come I feel so much like a separate person? You say we are one being, but why do I feel like a separate entity, a me?

Why is this feeling so deep in me? On one level you are a separate person. There is a form identity.

You are this particular form and the amazing thing is there's not a single human being on the planet or ever has been who is exactly like you. Of course there may be people who very much resemble you, but it's unlikely that your mother or father would ever be fooled by somebody says he or she is you, but would immediately recognize you out of billions of humans and that's just the outer appearance and even your life story, the story of your life on the level form is very unique. There are many similarities, yes, with others and depends of course how individualized you are.

If you lived in a tribal consciousness then there would be far more similarities. If you lived in a more individualized consciousness then enormous differences between humans. So your form identity as a form identity, which is your body, your mental makeup, the psychology of you, the personality, the aspects that make up your personality, the elements of who you are as a person, which as they're all mental-emotional formations that are in you, you identify with them, they are you.

This is your psychological form of you and again nobody is quite the same as you. You're unique and that's all to do with your form identity. Every human is different and yet, yes, there are many similarities especially in the way in which their mind functions.

The content of people's minds differs but the basic functioning of the egoic mind is the same. In other words, you derive your sense of identity from certain images and narratives in your mind accompanied by emotions. This is a conditioning of your mind.

That's the same for everybody. So the basic mechanism behind the ego is the same. The content of the ego varies.

Depends what culture you grow up in, what life experiences you've had, especially in childhood and so on. But that's all your form identity. And the ego, by the way, if you don't know what it is, ego is complete identification with the conditioned mind.

That's the ego. When you're no longer identified with the conditioned mind, there is still a conditioned mind but there's an awareness behind it, which means you're relatively free of ego, although not perhaps for quite a while. Periodically you will get drawn back into complete identification.

The ego is back and you're out again and you're back again and you're out again. I know people who've been on the spiritual path for many years and I can often observe that there's almost two humans are there in one. One is the conditioned ego personality that sometimes operates totally and at other times there is a more awakened consciousness there that speaks through them and acts through them.

And you never know who is going to be there at any given moment. And very interesting to see, at first people who meet you, if you are such a person, somebody who meets you, one state, somebody may meet you at a time when you're egoically possessed, the ego has taken possession of you again and you're in a reactive mode and a fearful mode or you want to control, you want something from somebody, whatever the ego wants to add to itself and somebody meets you there and you have a certain impression of who you are and then may not realize that the next day you may be suddenly very conscious. But that person then would already have formed an idea of who you are and might not even realize that the next day you're very conscious because that person will already have formed certain judgments about you, understandably so, because you're a jerk in that state, will have formed certain judgments about you and then of course these judgments are stuck in the person's mind, their own egoic mind and even if you behave differently you might not even see it anymore because they've already formed an opinion or judgment about who you are. The mistake is when you see a human being you think there's a single entity then. I'm not just talking about humans manifest, humans are actually on the spiritual path, who are in the process of awakening or in whom the awakening process is happening, they can still be drawn back into egoic state of consciousness, especially when certain challenges happen.

As I said, collective or personal, they can be drawn back into fearful mode, reactive mode, until the challenges of life, whether they are personal or of a collective kind, the big collective ones, until the challenges of life, instead of drawing you back into egoic state of consciousness, reactive and so on, the challenges can also have the opposite effect and this is why they are so helpful, they can awaken you and so many of you are at this point where you could go either way, you could be drawn back through, at the moment, big collective challenges, you could be drawn back into a reactive, fearful, egoically possessed state of consciousness, especially if you listen to the news and the media too much and then you get drawn in, or the challenge is the great awakener and we are here, right here and now, in order to make sure that the challenges have this awakening function in you and in as many humans as possible and then, this doesn't mean that action is not important, action, of course we need to take action, it's important, but it's not the primary factor, action is always the secondary factor, primary factor is your state of consciousness that determines what kind of action you take, whether it's intelligent or stupid, it determines what the energy is that flows into the action that you take, so why we are here then is to use this precious time and I call it precious although normally, conventionally, the times we are living in would be called threatening, fearful, bad times, upheavals, disaster, and there may be more to come and it's a great opportunity within the totality of human evolution from a higher perspective, all these things are necessary developments, if it's happening it's necessary, there is an inevitability about whatever form the present moment takes, whatever form this moment takes, right here now, is to do with the whole history of the universe has brought about this moment, the form it takes, so it couldn't be otherwise, but that doesn't mean that it has to stay the same, is as it is, and that's an interesting thing, that acceptance doesn't mean you are stuck in it, you're more likely to be stuck in it if you resist what is, famous saying, what you resist persists, so you're more likely to be stuck with this on a personal level or collective level, if you resist inner resistance, but if you can accept that this is what is, and then you can say, okay, fine, and where do I go from here, but you might need to take some action, but once you've said fine to the isness of this, you're more intelligent, because you're no longer reactive, you cannot say okay to what is, no matter what the appearance of it is, the okay to what is, to be friendly with the present moment, no matter what form it takes, enables you to have some access to the vertical dimension, the depth in you, which means also access the unconditioned intelligence, so it's the moment you are no longer resistant to the present moment, you become truly intelligent and capable of intelligent action.

There are people who are in conventional terms called intelligent, they might have a PhD or two, but live in continuous reactivity, denial, and they're against what is, and the action is not ultimately intelligent. I call it intelligence in the service of madness. If you build an atom bomb, or you build chemical weapons, or you build something that is extremely destructive to the environment just for profit, of course, yes, it requires intelligence to build these things, it requires great intelligence to build an atom bomb, or chemical weapon, or some huge thing that uses nature and destroys it, but it's not true intelligence, it's egoic cleverness.

The real intelligence, which is inseparable from wisdom, a rare word these days, you won't hear much about wisdom, and you can't get a PhD in wisdom, so that arises from that deeper level, where the wisdom and intelligence are a single thing. Here's a question. Do we need all this suffering and adversity that the planet is currently facing to bring forth a new Earth that you wrote about?

Apparently, yes, otherwise it wouldn't be happening. Well, that was a short answer. Oh, I just realized that I haven't fully answered the previous question, which was, how come I feel so much like a separate person?

You say we are one being, but why do I feel like a separate entity, a me? Why is this feeling so deep in me? So I already gave one half of the answer, and then I got sidetracked, so the one half of the answer was, yes, you are a separate being.

As a form identity, you are a separate being, and that's how it's meant to be, and it's fine. The only problem arises, or the suffering arises, if this separate being is the only way in which you know yourself. You only know yourself as this separate being, then, yes, then you are in a state of delusion, ultimately, because you don't know the most vital fact about yourself, and I don't talk about conceptual knowing.

So there's nothing wrong with being that's a separate being, as long as you have this body and so on, you are a separate being. But is that all? If you only know yourself as a separate being, then your life is frustrating, and you suffer a lot, because you ignore an entire dimension of your existence, and that is the vertical dimension.

And in the vertical dimension, you are connected, one with all that is, not only with every other human, you're connected with a source of all life that sometimes is called God, and you need to know that. How do you know that? It begins with a simple thing.

Here and now, this moment, stop thinking, just a moment of no thought, like now, doesn't matter how long, 5 seconds, 10 seconds, no thought, stillness. And in that brief moment of stillness, strange thing is, from the point of view of the horizontal you, you no longer know who you are in that moment of stillness, where there's only still presence, you don't know who you are. On the horizontal dimension, you know very well who you are, you can talk about it endlessly, can think about it endlessly.

But on the vertical dimension, the moment you enter it, in the moment of no thought, you no longer know who you are. And that not knowing, in conceptual terms, activates a deeper knowing that's non-conceptual. So in that moment, you know who you are, but you can't talk about it, because you know that you are that presence.

But it's not differentiated, and you can't remember it. So there's a deep knowing there, in that unknowing, there is a deep knowing. You have to have the courage to go into that unknowing and be rooted in that unknowing, and then the other dimension of you can operate much more effectively, fruitfully, harmoniously, compassionately, in this world.

The horizontal, the personality of you, can only become transformed if you realize the other dimension. I sometimes call this vertical the transcendent dimension of consciousness. So you need both as a human being here, your destiny, your fate, your purpose, your mission, is to live in both worlds at the same time.

There, where you don't know yourself, but you do know, but no longer conceptually, and the horizontal. It expresses itself more and more in the horizontal dimension of life. It expresses itself more and more here.

It transforms what's here. And that's the secret of life for humans at the present time. And to realize that is why we're here.

I hear a question, why do I choose to react when I know better, in quotation marks? Is being exhausted an excuse for making a shameful choice? Do I actually want to react and be bad?

That's interesting. People who are in the process of awakening often experience periods when they are very unawakened again. They revert back into reactivity and ego consciousness.

And then they are back in a more awakened state. And when they get into a more awakened state, they look back on something that perhaps they did the other day, or yesterday, or this morning, and say, how could I have been so, why was I suddenly so, whatever, I don't know what the questioner refers to, why was I so reactive to that person? Why was I so angry?

Why did I do that? How could I have done that? Then it happens repeatedly, and he's asking, why do I choose to react when I know better?

Now, the answer, of course, is you don't choose to react. And you know better only afterwards. So in the moment, you have no choice, because you are run by the conditioned mind, the mental-emotional field with its conditioned patterns.

And to be run by the conditioned mind means to be trapped in ego. So it's the ego in you that does it. You have no choice.

The choice only comes in when you're aware. So the choice would be there if you've noticed, let's say, in a conversation or an interaction with somebody, and you can suddenly feel the impulse to react and to say something, or whatever it is. And at that moment, if you could know it for what it is, an awareness is there.

And at that moment, you could choose either to say what you wanted to say, what the impulse wanted you to say, or you can let it go, not suppress it. Let it go, because you realize it as, to use a Buddhist term, unskillful. Buddhists like the term unskillful living.

Basically, that means, I call it unconscious, and Buddhists call it unskillful, unskillful action. And so you recognize it as unskillful, and you just let it go. But until that happens, when the awareness is there, yes, the impulse is about to take you over.

What tends to happen is the awareness comes in afterwards, but the time interval between having to act something out and realizing that this is what you did, the time interval gets shorter. So at first, you may act something out, and two days later, you think, oh. And then you act something out, and one day later, you act something out, and an hour later, you say, oh, the awareness comes.

And then you act something out, and a minute after you did it, you know it, oh, you did it again. Sometimes, of course, you find people apologize to others. They say, I'm so sorry I said that.

At that time, they were not sorry, because something else was in them that did it, almost another subpersonality, and the ego was there, did it. And most egos have different subpersonalities. They're all aspects of the ego.

So you have one subpersonality that, in certain circumstances, acts like a little child, oh. And then another one, when it gets triggered by something like money, suddenly gets extremely angry and fearful. Oh, you took that money away from me.

So you have a multiplicity of people inside you, and others who meet you happen to just meet one of them at that particular time. And you never know which one is going to come up any given day or in any given circumstance. I had close observation with people when I lived for a little while in a commune in England many years ago with a shared house with a bit of land.

And I could so clearly observe with many people living there how many of them were different people on different days, completely different. And I was often sitting at breakfast downstairs, and I could hear steps coming down. I wonder who is coming down now.

It could be the same human being, but a different incarnation of that same person. A very cheerful person. What a wonderful morning.

Great, isn't it? Great to be alive. We should be grateful to God for being here in this wonderful...

And the next day, God talked to me. Leave me alone. Don't want to know.

Same person. But in all cases, unconscious, taken over by certain patterns. Now, when there's awareness, then the different sub-personalities, which are aspects of the ego, are kind of more contained.

So you don't lose yourself in one or the other. They are more contained, and gradually they dissipate. So you're no longer many different people.

And then as you grow more conscious, you find yourself, you're basically the same, same, same in every circumstance. And you don't act out roles anymore, which is, you're the same whether you meet the Pope or the Dalai Lama, or you meet a person sweeping the street. It's exactly the same, because you don't have a mental image of who you're meeting, and you don't operate through mental images anymore.

You're meeting a human being. You're meeting the being. It's the same.

So when it happens, you don't have a choice, so you don't choose. The questioner asked, why do I choose to react? You don't choose.

It happens to you. Now, the next part of the question is, is being exhausted an excuse for making a shameful choice? It is true that when people who are beginning to awaken often find that when they have low energy, their consciousness is also low.

So they are tired, or they had a long day and exhausted, and then they just can't be present anymore. They don't have the energy to be present. Don't talk to me about presence.

I don't want to know just what is all that rubbish, presence. They're exhausted. A time comes when they begin to realize that, and then even when they're exhausted, they can still know that they're exhausted without it making them unconscious.

And the last part of the question is, do I actually want to react and be bad? No, you don't want to react and be bad, but the ego wants to react. And being bad is not bad either for the ego.

Trouble is good. To have an argument with somebody is great. To try to prove somebody's wrong is great.

The ego loves that. It needs to be right. It needs an enemy somewhere.

Please give me an enemy. Because if I don't have an enemy, I don't know who I am anymore. I define myself through the other.

And so I need to emphasize the otherness of the other, because otherwise I don't know who I am anymore. Individual people do it. Entire countries do it.

So they point to another country as those are the bad guys over there. The mainstream media, they participate. They habitually create an image of another country as bad.

And it's ego. It's collective ego. They don't know what they do.

So the question is not, do I actually want to react and be bad? No, you're not even there when it happens. It's happening to you or inside you, and you can't know anything about it.

You're asleep at that moment. Spiritually speaking, you're asleep. In other words, unconscious at that moment.

The moment you become conscious again, you look back and say, oh, I did it again. Well, you didn't. It happened to you.

But you have to suffer the consequences. Now some people, when this happens, there are people who are very unconscious and have violent tendency, very unconscious. They can even perpetrate acts of violence in moments of deep unconsciousness when they overcome.

They may not even be really aware at any time, but they can function normally for some of the time. In other words, I call that normal unconsciousness. You still can function, be a part of society.

Yes, in conflict with others, yes, but nevertheless, in normal unconsciousness, you can be part of society and function like millions of others, normal unconsciousness. And then periodically, from normal unconsciousness, they go down to deep unconsciousness. And such deep unconsciousness, they can perpetrate acts of violence.

Sometimes it happens through alcohol. Many crimes are committed because people get completely drunk, and then they get a gun, and then they shoot somebody. Just an argument is enough, and something dreadful happens.

So one could say, is this person who is now going to prison for the rest of his life, is he responsible? If he was completely unconscious when he did that, it just happened to him, and he did it, is he responsible? Now, if he's not responsible, as I seem to imply, because it's unconscious, then naturally, you would have to say, well, then he shouldn't go to prison, should he?

Well, then the reason you should give why he should go to prison is to protect others, because it probably will happen again. That's one reason why he should go to prison. And I would agree with that.

There's another reason, and that is, even though people may not be responsible for their unconsciousness, they still have to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness. And this is how evolution happens. Many humans, they don't necessarily go to prison.

There are other consequences for unconsciousness. So even if you're not responsible, because it is the destiny of humans to become more conscious, to grow in consciousness. And for very unconscious humans, the way they become more conscious is to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness.

And by suffering the consequences of their unconsciousness, they become more conscious. In other words, some people become more conscious after 20 or 30 years in prison, or just a few years, and suddenly, suddenly the personality subsides and something else arises, and they go, wow. And they can't, who did that?

So it's a little paradoxical, but this is how evolution happens. For very unconscious humans, they perpetrate, they do bad things. Sometimes the consequence is their own premature death, because if you kill a few people, one day somebody kills you, or they get maimed, or whatever it is, you suffer the consequences of your unconsciousness.

And through that extreme suffering, there's an opportunity of awakening. So quite a few very unconscious humans awaken in that way. So you could say the ego, their very unconscious ego, ultimately becomes an instrument for their awakening, which is the ego's own death.

My final answer to the question then is, it may be that there's certain situations that you go into in your daily life that you know are more likely to trigger your unconscious reactivity, in other words, make you unconscious. It could be a person that you go visit, and this person always makes you unconscious, and that could be somebody you work with, or it could be somebody you've known for a very long time in your family, whoever it may be, maybe your parents. Whenever you visit your parents, the same script is being played out.

Your mother or father accuses you of not being good enough, or whatever they do, and you react, and you storm out, and you shout, oh, this is one of many possible scenarios. Or you, before having contact with your ex-spouse, for some reason you still need to be in contact to know that you're going to be triggered, and then instead of just going into the situation, use it as a spiritual practice to see if you can stay present while you talk to them. But you have to really feel your entire body when you talk to your ex-wife or ex-husband, and you have to go, okay, don't tell them I'm just practicing being present, that doesn't work.

Just be present as much as you can, so that's opportunity. And that's, of course, people with whom you share a lot of history are often like that. You need to, they trigger you.

And so before you interact with them, know, okay, I'll stay present now. And then you go into this high degree of alertness when you talk to them, so that you're not forced to act out the same script again, the same reactivity again, and again, and again. So as Ram Dass said, famous advice, if you're so enlightened, go and spend two weeks with your parents.

If you think you're so enlightened, go visit your parents for two weeks. Ah, well, that will give you good feedback where you're at. And it is often the case that other humans give you feedback as to your state of consciousness, because it's easy to fool yourself when you're alone in the room, or out in nature, and you say, oh, I'm completely enlightened now.

Nothing is bothering me. Wonderful. And then the next thing happens.

You meet somebody. What? How dare you say that?

How dare you? There's an interesting division. That's another challenge in our present age right now.

Not as acute a challenge as the pandemic, but there's a division between people, not only in the United States, but in many other Western countries, but perhaps, maybe stronger in the United States, but it's definitely also there in other Western countries, a division between, it's hard to put a name to it, maybe traditionally it was called left-wing and right-wing, but they seem to be, the polarities become more pronounced, as if they can't meet anymore, they can't have a conversation anymore.

And here's a question about what advice do you have when someone finds themselves in conversations with family members, friends, or co-workers, and it is obvious there are strong differences of opinion on a particular topic, such as health care, guns, same-sex marriage, immigration policies, homelessness, and politics. Yes. Well, what advice do you have when somebody finds themselves in conversations like that?

The way the question is asked, I don't see a problem. I know what the problem is. Strong differences of opinion.

Well, that wouldn't be a problem, would it? But there's more to it than that. It's not just strong differences of opinion, because that would be fine.

You have a different opinion than I. Okay. But that's not how it is.

What the questioner means, of course, is that people are identified with their opinion. What is an opinion? It's a thought form in your head.

And you've probably adopted that taken from somewhere outside, from watching the internet, mainstream media, or some alternative source. You took in some opinion about any of these topics, and it becomes your opinion. What's an opinion?

It's a thought form. Now, an unconscious person, lack of awareness, awareness being at the deeper dimension of consciousness or higher dimension of consciousness, an unconscious person derives their sense of self from thought, plus emotions. Thoughts give them their sense.

So if you derive your identity from a thought, then you need to be right. Your opinion is regarded as the truth. You derive your sense of self from your opinion.

Therefore, if anybody questions it or contradicts, this person is actually perceived as attacking you, not as somebody who has a different opinion. The unconscious perception is that this person is attacking you. And then you react as if you had been almost physically attacked.

And this is how a discussion about these topics becomes very toxic. And it's not only when you're physically together, it operates in an exaggerated form when people only communicate online. And they communicate with people they haven't never even met.

All they have of the person is a statement that this person posted. And they react as if this person were the devil and their mortal enemy. They know nothing about this person.

And then they post something to insult that person, say what a dreadful human being you are. And once you've posted this thing, your ego feels a little bit bigger. But then of course comes a reply of that person.

And then you have to react to that. And then other people post things in reply to that. And then you find yourself in the middle of this.

Some people are behind you. Others are behind this other guy. And you can sit there for hours.

And the ego loves it. Completely crazy. It's one of the insanities of our civilization.

And there are many is that kind of interaction, complete identification with conceptual ideas and mistaking who a person is reducing another human being to a mental concept. Completely insane. And this is a new technology has enabled the human ego to proliferate and grow in that way.

And the people who participate in that don't even know that it's insane. And that's making them more and more unconscious. So the polarity has become more pronounced in viewpoints and opinions.

So you have basically, that can be kind of divided into left and right. Where is that going? Well, how is it going to end?

We don't know. Is there going to be some actual civil conflict? Is it going to end peacefully?

It depends how human consciousness, human consciousness will grow. It either grows through violent conflict, or it grows in a more peaceful way. In every age, the ego, the collective ego, manifests in different forms, but they differ from time period to time period.

In the 20th century, you had the collective ego manifesting in certain ways, for example, leading to the insanities of the First World War, and the Second World War, First World War, everybody was eager to fight in every country. They would say, Yeah, we're having another war. Great.

If you were there, you'd have been have to be very conscious to see the insanity of it all. Because it's not easy, you need to be pretty awakened to recognize the insanity in your own cultural environment, retrospectively, you can see it more easily, or they were crazy. Or you can go back to the Middle Ages, and many of the beliefs and what they did, and they burned people and they put the most absurd ideas.

Yes, there were some enlightened people, too. But the general culture was pretty crazy. And you can see how can they make it easy to see how crazy the human collective ego can be.

But how crazy is it? No, you could be part of it. Some of your opinions could be part of the insanity of the collective ego, and you wouldn't even know it.

I'm not going to tell you what it might be, because it's for you to become aware enough to find out for yourself. But yes, this age has a growing craziness about it, too. It's always what applies to the individual, what applies to the collective.

It's easier to see the unconsciousness in others than it is to recognize the unconsciousness in yourself. Just as it is easier to see the collective unconsciousness in a certain culture in past ages, or somewhere totally different on the planet, easier to see that than to see the craziness in your present, your own culture, where you are living. You need more awareness to see it.

I do not attack verbally any crazy beliefs that I see around in the popular culture because it's pointless. It would be like saying when somebody comes to me, if I were a psychologist or psychiatrist, and somebody comes and says, I am, well, let's say, what's a common delusion? I am a reincarnation of Napoleon, but nobody believes me.

I would not question and say, no, you're not. That's a delusion. I would just listen.

There's no point in, because if I question the delusion, he'll just run away or attack me. So I just listen. Okay, that's interesting.

And then perhaps by acting as the presence for his belief system, perhaps I can bring more presence to him just by being the presence there for him. And then perhaps he will have enough awareness to recognize his own delusion. And then I wouldn't have had, instead of me trying to convince him that he is deluded, I'm just there as the presence.

And I do the same. I don't comment on contemporary culture very much, except in general terms, because it's not helpful. It's my job to help people awaken.

As they awaken, they become aware of their thought processes, and they will also become aware of certain thought processes that are completely deluded, that they have taken on from somewhere, probably the internet. So I still need to complete my answer to this question. What advice do you have when you find yourself in conversations with people and so on, completely different opinions?

Well, what is your state of consciousness when you're engaged in these conversations with friends or family members and you disagree? That's the question to ask yourself. What is your state?

Do you experience certain emotions? How do you interact with them when you have a discussion about this or that? Are you completely identified with your opinion?

Do you become defensive or aggressive when you talk? Then you are part of the unconsciousness. And for the unconsciousness to operate, it needs at least two.

It needs two sides. If you don't offer any opposition to their viewpoints, then the conversation would quickly come to an end. Is it possible to have a conversation with completely different viewpoints about these topics without involvement of the ego?

Yes, it is possible. You do not have to give up your opinions. You can have your opinions on whatever these subjects you mentioned or others, but what you have to give up as you awaken, you do give up, is your identification with your opinions.

In other words, deriving your sense of identity, your sense of who you are from your mental positions. That's a delusion. And as long as you do that, you're engaged in a very unpleasant discussion where you're actually not defending the truth.

You're defending your fictitious sense of self. And the more you defend your fictitious sense of self, the more unconscious you become, up to the point of physical violence sometimes. That's it.

So it's up to you. It's not so much what others do. It's up to you to see, are you able to express your opinion even almost forcefully?

This is what I believe, but you are not in it. It's just that your opinion is there. It is.

Because, so where are you? You are behind that much deeper. You're the presence.

It's nothing to do with thought. So you derive your identity from the deeper place, your essence identity, and then you can play with ideas and discuss them. Now the question is, can the other person also do that, or are they completely identified?

Well, maybe they're still completely identified with their opinions, in which case it would be a very strange experiment to have a discussion with one participant not identified with their opinion, the other participant completely identified with their opinion. It would be interesting to see where that goes, or whether the conversation will quickly come to an end. There certainly would, that person who is identified, would they perhaps suddenly run away, because it's so weird to be, to have somebody who has no ego involvement in the discussion.

And that's for you to practice. Are you identified with your mental positions, or are you able to explain your mental positions without the self involved in them, your egoic self? Interesting experiment, so next time be very conscious when you have these discussions.

Now when you're discussing online, on the internet, it's a different matter. You're not really meeting a human being there. Do you dehumanize people by responding as if these people, who have different opinions, were the devil or your personal enemies?

So you have to be very conscious how do you interact with people if you do online, people that you've never even met. So be very, very much aware of your inner state while you don't post anything, or give it some time. That's perhaps a good recommendation.

Before you write something, but don't post it. Give it at least half an hour, one hour, or even better, have a good night's sleep. In the morning, look at it again, and then see, do I want to post this or not?

In many cases, you may want to say, okay, I don't need this. So the time interval perhaps is a helpful thing.

[Speaker 2] (0:01 - 0:28)

Order and chaos. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about the paradox of order and chaos. From the minor disruptions we experience in daily life to bigger events like the loss of income or someone we love, Eckhart says chaos and disorder are an essential part of a higher order.

If we surrender to the present moment, life's challenges will shake us out of our complacency, transforming our consciousness.

[Speaker 1] (0:31 - 43:12)

Two fundamental opposites in this world, without which the world could not even be, are the opposites of order and disorder. Another word for disorder, when it becomes more extreme, would be chaos. Order and chaos, or order and disorder.

Usually we would prefer, of course, to have order in our lives, which means to have things going well, things growing, we learn things, we experience new things, your life unfolds, we would like relative harmony in our lives, and yet that very often is marred by the eruption of some form of disorder. And usually we resent that. We can get resentful or angry or despondent or sad.

Things in our lives are not going in a way we would want them to go. And so disorder can come in many forms. What I call disorder, although it may not usually be recognized as disorder, a simple thing, whenever the smooth way in which your life unfolds on a daily basis is interrupted by some form of adversity, let's say you lose your wallet, so suddenly something comes in which looks like an act of sabotage against you, and you're thrown into fear or panic or confusion.

Suffering arises, and that's a relatively small thing. You're at a meeting, and suddenly there's a huge disagreement and people shouting at each other before it was going well, and then one person made a comment and everybody reacted, and before you know it, the meeting has degenerated into disorder. It comes in so many forms, small forms, missing an appointment, missing the plane, contracting a small illness or having a small accident.

Disorder comes in many, many forms, big and small, and usually when disorder comes, it creates a kind of havoc sometimes in our lives for a while, and there's definitely the strong underlying belief that there's something very wrong, that this should not be happening, or the underlying belief there's something wrong with me, or somebody's against me, maybe God is against me, otherwise why would this be happening to me?

Slightly bigger forms of disorder, breakdown of a marriage, you lose your job, you lose your home, a more serious illness, something bad happening to somebody very close to you, a child, a spouse, or something connected with a collective pandemic, financial breakdown, civil unrest, hurricanes, earthquakes, and so usually it brings up a very strong reaction.

As I said, the ways in which you can react is through anger, through fear, through panic, becoming sad, despondent, say what's the point of it all, I strived so hard to build up this business and now this has to happen. Now we need to understand that, again, disorder, which earlier we called adversity, is inevitable and is an essential part of a higher order. Normally when we look at order and disorder, we look at order, which things are going as they should, they're going well, we call that that's harmonious.

Disorder is lack of harmony, something comes in, or could even be worse, could be chaos. So we usually look at order as desirable, it's harmony and things going well. Disorder is undesirable, lack of harmony, things going wrong, and that's true on this one level, that's true.

But there is always other levels, you can look at it from a higher perspective, a higher level, the existence of order and disorder, or order and chaos, are a necessary part for the evolution of life. A few examples, I sometimes walk in the forest, and when you walk in the forest, there's the typical smell that you have of this vegetation, but part of what you smell in the forest is actually the soil, especially when it's been raining, you can smell the soil. Now what is the soil?

The soil is mostly decaying matter. The soil is trees that have fallen or other plants that have died, and these plants are returning into the molecular structure of the plants and so on. It's no longer ordered, the atoms are separating, they are dissolving into disorder.

It's no longer structured, it's not orderly, the decaying matter is a manifestation of disorder or chaos. It's death, and yet the death is necessary for the new trees to thrive and to grow. They grow out of the chaos of decaying matter, grows the new order of new plant life and new trees.

You cannot separate them. Every day, when you eat, whatever you eat, you create disorder or chaos to that which you eat. You bite into an apple, the apple has a very orderly molecular structure.

When you bite into an apple and you start chewing it, you destroy the order that created the apple, the molecule that makes it into an apple. You create chaos or disorder, so that's what you do every time you eat. Then the apple goes into the digestive system and things happen to this.

It's now become disorderly, but then your body absorbs the nutrients and this becomes part of the, again, the orderly structure of your body. So the food is destroyed, chaos is created, so that life can be sustained and continue. Interesting way of looking at it.

Many people have found that they experience a deepening and a deeper sense of self or beingness, a deeper peace or some kind of renewal in their lives after, immediately after and as a result of having endured a period of disorder or chaos. That is, I don't know if you're familiar with the spiritual term which comes from Christianity, medieval Christianity, dark night of the soul, dark night of the soul. Christian spiritual teachers and mystics in the Middle Ages, I think they created this expression.

What it means is, before you awaken spiritually, it's before quite a few of those teachers awakened spiritually, they experienced extreme forms of despondency and depression, where everything suddenly became meaningless. So they experienced in their mental chaos, so to speak, often even a mental breakdown. And out of that, and in this mental breakdown, the old self kind of died, experienced a death.

So there was the eruption of disorder, of destruction, the destruction. Then out of that, a deeper realization arose. And so that is, the dark night of the soul is basically the experience of inner chaos or inner disorder.

When things don't make sense anymore, that's a form of disorder on the level of mind. And other people, they experienced some kind of breakdown in their lives. It could have been sometimes two or three things happening, bad things happening at the same time.

At the same time, their marriage collapsed, they lost their job and their income, and then somebody very close to them died at the same time. The eruption of, to use our terminology, the eruption of disorder suddenly came in multiple forms. And when something that you had identified with, that had become part of your life, suddenly dissolves, is taken away, that's what you could call disorder.

I sometimes compare that to a tapestry. And when you have a tapestry, that's your life, the various elements that make up your life, let's say in this analogy, it's like a tapestry. These are the people that you know, your family, your work, your home, all the tapestry of your life.

And suddenly, something is torn out of this tapestry of your life violently. It could have been an accident, could be, as I said, complete financial breakdown, or whatever it may be, end of marriage. And suddenly, it leaves a gaping hole in the tapestry of your life.

And it's yes, basically, yes, certainly is disorder. And yet, often people report that they experience spiritual awakening when holes appeared in the tapestry of their lives. So the tapestry of their lives represents whatever it is that these people identified with and called it my life.

And suddenly, what you called my life, a big chunk of what you called your life is not there anymore. And that can be very painful. But the strange thing is, it's precisely there that many humans experienced a transcendence to remain for a moment with this analogy, the hole that was torn into the tapestry of their lives, this hole pointed to something beyond the forms of life, there was a space behind that hole is an empty space.

And so they suddenly experienced an empty space within where something had been before, let's say, your spouse died, or even worse, your child died, or your mother died father. And suddenly, this weather before there was this presence, it was part of your life, there is an empty space. I mean, when somebody dies, you can look next day, there's a chair, they sat in this every day, they would sit in this chair.

And now the chairs empty, very strange, this emptiness left behind. And at first, it's very painful. But it can be that when you come to a place of acceptance, the emptiness brings about an inner emptiness in you, but not in a negative sense, an emptiness in the sense of spaciousness, where something you become aware of, just the content is gone, this particular content of your consciousness is gone.

And what remains when you remove the content of your consciousness is the consciousness itself without the content. One could also say to use another analogy, the ripple on the surface of the ocean, this particular ripple has dissolved. It's not there anymore.

But what's left is the ocean, the ripple had a particular form. But the ocean has no form. And that's what's left is the formless consciousness.

And that is the realization of the transcendent dimension within you. And that often comes with breakdown, loss, death. In other words, the experience of some form of disorder or chaos.

In other words, again, something that would normally be labeled as bad, or very bad. And that's very strange. So here we have that something that normally would be called good.

And then we have something that's normally called bad. But that which was called good, actually kept you in a relatively confined and limited place. Whereas that which is conventionally called bad, created an opening in you.

This loss created an opening in you. Strange fact is that the good, and usually perhaps when you say, my life is going well, you're in a relative comfort zone in your life, things are going well. And when something so called bad erupts, it then destroys the comfort zone.

But the strange fact is that it almost never happens that people awaken spiritually, while they're in their comfort zone, or that they deepen, become more deeper as human beings, which would be a partial awakening. It almost never happens. So the place where people truly, where the evolutionary shift happens, or the evolutionary step forward, the evolutionary leap, is usually the experience of disorder in a person's life.

But not only in a person's life, we'll see in a minute. And so your life then moves between order and disorder. You have both, and they're both necessary.

And you don't have to look for disorder, because you want to awaken spiritually, and then say, okay, I need to make myself suffer, and I need to give up everything and make myself suffer. Many people have done that in the past, because they could see how it operates. They could see that when somebody suffers, there is a possibility of transcendence and awakening.

Not a guarantee. They may be stuck in their suffering until they die, or they may die off their suffering. There's no guarantee that when disorder erupts, or when you suffer, that this will bring about an awakening, or at least a deepening.

There's always the possibility. It is an opportunity, but often it is not. It is missed.

And then the person becomes even more deeply entrenched in their egoic sense of self. It becomes very rigid. You can see it with some people who have had a bad life, and what's left of them towards the end of their lives is a personality whose main component is a deep sense of bitterness, grievances, and resentments.

Instead of giving them an opening into transcendence, it has made the ego more rigid. That's not uncommon. So you get older people, sometimes even younger people, who already have an important part of their personality is their grievances, their bitterness, and their resentment.

And that colors everything they see and perceive and every relationship. And that's very sad. Nobody has told them, because it's not common knowledge yet, that experiencing suffering can be a great opportunity, and is actually inevitable in everybody's life.

They didn't know. Nobody at school teaches these things, which should be one of the most important subjects at school. There's no guarantee then that it will happen.

It's just an opportunity for it to happen. Sometimes suffering is already a disorder, is already experienced early in a person's life. Some children are born into a very chaotic environment.

There could be violence where they live in their family, between their parents. One parent or both parents could be alcoholics, could be drug addicts. Some children are born into very disordered and chaotic environments, and other children experience great loss at an early age.

Some children experience the loss of one or both of their parents at a very young age, like six, seven, through accidents and so on. That's a huge challenge early in a person's life. Nobody can predict what effect this will have on the child.

Without guidance, it could easily mean that, especially in a child that grows up in a very dysfunctional household with alcoholism, violence, and drug addiction, the chance that this child will, through experiencing this type of chaos or adversity, that this child will grow into a very conscious adult, the chances are relatively small, especially if the child gets no guidance from anybody at all. All that happens there is the perpetuation of the dysfunction, and then the child would then have a relationship and perhaps create a similar environment again. And then the next generation, until perhaps sometimes it happens after a generation of several dysfunctional family backgrounds, finally one human can break this vicious circle and suddenly step out and awaken spiritually and become an enormous power for good in this world.

But this person came out of sometimes generations of suffering and dysfunction. There are children who experience early loss in their lives, through loss of a parent, and some of them become mature at a very early age. That can happen, too.

I've seen that a few times, where children who've already been through that great loss already have access to wisdom. Even at the age of 11 or 12, they say wise things. So it can go either way.

So the important thing is to realize it is inevitable that you will experience both opposites in your life. Usually, it is advisable that you strive for order in your life. It's advisable that you think positively, if you can, that you acknowledge the goodness of life in every moment, that you live in a state of gratitude, because the more you live in a state of acknowledging the good that is here now, the more good will manifest in your life.

It does not mean, however, even if you live like that every day, you will still experience certain forms of disorder erupting into your life, but probably much less so than a person who is very unconscious and whose daily life is fairly negative, with continuous complaining, with harboring grievances, with bouts of anger, with always accusing other people of this or that, always criticizing everything and everybody. There, already, you have a lack of harmony, even in their daily lives.

And often, these people experience a succession of disasters and drama and so on. The periods then for creating something new, there's a new order that you create. When you create something new, you create whatever it may be, a new structure, a new business, and you write a book, you make music, you create some artistic, whatever it may be, you create something new in this world.

That means you bring about a new structure that is an ordered structure into this world. That's all order, and that's good. So the creative periods in your life is when you manifest a new order, an orderly structure, and this is wonderful.

But even if you do, at some point, you will still experience, from time to time, the eruption of disorder in whatever form. Perhaps what you created will still, of course, what you created is still subject to the law of impermanence of all things, so nothing lasts for too long. So whatever you create may not last.

If you get too attached to what you create and you said, I did that, if there's ego in it, then you suffer a lot when things begin to dissolve or leave you. No matter how consciously you live, a certain amount of disorder will occasionally appear. And, of course, we're all moving towards old age and finally death.

Of course, death is the ultimate disorder or chaos for the human being because it's the same as the forest where the trees have fallen and the soil is basically decaying matter. So when you die, that which held the atoms and molecules of the body together in an orderly way, very highly intelligent structure, suddenly is totally disordered. It begins to dissolve.

So on a physical level, we are all moving towards, obviously, disorder. And even when you get old, you begin to get old, you experience the body doesn't function as well anymore. Just athlete, you reach a certain age and suddenly you can't do this anymore, you can't do that anymore.

If you were too identified with the order in your life, if you derived your sense of identity from the order in your life, then you suffer. So you appreciate, you can appreciate the order in your life, the order is going well. You have certain abilities that other people may not have.

That's wonderful. You have achieved perhaps certain things that other people have not achieved, but things that have contributed to enriching people's lives or making people more conscious, all that's wonderful. But if there was a sense of I in whatever you'd created, which means you derived your sense of identity from that which you created, and it's not going to last, all the abilities that you have that others don't have, it's not going to last.

So anything you identify with creates suffering because it will leave you or it'll dissolve or not satisfy you. It's subject to the law of impermanence. In other words, it will go back to disorder.

Everything in this world is subject to impermanence. Everything in this world, including your body, and yet there's something within you that is not subject to impermanence. We'll come to that in a little while.

I just want to mention one more thing to see how order and disorder operates on all levels. We talked about the forest, we talked about when you eat, you create disorder so that a new order can then manifest. On a huge global scale, the planet itself periodically experiences the eruption of extreme disorder or chaos.

This has been found through geology and virtually all scientists agree with those findings. And what they found is in the evolutionary life of our planet, the planet has already experienced five extinctions. Five times in the life of this planet, life became almost extinct.

It was always the borderline of extinction of all life. I believe, if I remember correctly, in the second extinction, which I don't know when it was, 400 million years ago over there, almost 90 percent of all life forms disappeared. The last one they say was 60 million years ago and I believe that was the one the dinosaurs and many other species disappeared fairly quickly, probably created by a meteor impact.

Now that's a great example for disorder. Before you had an orderly planet, harmonious life, suddenly a huge thing comes from outer space and rams into this planet and totally changes everything. The climate, everything immediately changed.

Temperature would have probably fallen very, very quickly because there's not much sunlight coming through anymore. That was about 60 million years ago. Now the interesting fact is, yes, it took the planet each time several million years to recover, so to speak, but every time it did more than recover.

Every time the life forms that came became more complex. There was greater complexity of life forms. And then the complex life forms were destroyed again like 100 million years later and again to destruction and then rebirth.

So the planet has experienced destruction on a vast scale, rebirth and destruction already five times. Some people say we are moving into a sixth extinction. That's a very interesting subject and very relevant.

But here I'm just giving it as an example for this law of opposites, order and disorder, operates on all levels. So it's the same law when you bite into an apple. It's suggested as the law that brings about massive extinctions on the planet.

Humans are surprised because they don't know these things. When suddenly disorder happens, as it's happening now, for example, with a pandemic, life seemed so safe and secure and suddenly it doesn't seem that safe and secure anymore. It's a great shock to many people.

They didn't realize that the life that surrounds us is not that secure. Everybody is one heartbeat away from death. Everybody who listens to this will be dead in a few years, but by a few I mean could be anything from one or two to 80 or 90 years.

Not that much. They are amazed that when a pandemic happens, then you become a little bit aware of your mortality. And that can be a great, at first perhaps painful, but then a deepening realization.

Mortality, the awareness of mortality, is happening to many people now. And they are fearful, as if nobody had told them that death could happen at any moment. Now you might think, well, if you're young, you're in your 20s or 30s, you think, I don't need to think about death.

It's a long way away. Or as I heard somebody say not a while ago, a young 20-year-old said, she said, oh, I'm not worried about death. By the time I get old, they will have found a cure for it.

It's such a long way in the future. We should not dwell on death in a morbid fashion, but to be aware that death can happen easily and not necessarily when you grow old. If you're lucky, you grow old and then you die.

Some people would say if you're unlucky, you grow very old and then you die, experience some years of disability. But many young people die. We are not aware.

There are certain things that we take for granted. For example, every year, approximately 1,250,000 people die in traffic accidents on the planet. 1,250,000.

Many are young. Out of these, at least two or three times as many experience serious disability through traffic accidents. They survive, but serious injury.

There's despair, suicide. 800,000 to 1,000,000 people commit suicide every year. On average, every 40 seconds somebody commits suicide on the planet.

And people, of course, die continuously. In this very moment, several people are dying right now and now and now and now, continuously. Others are being born.

Amazing. Now, death, suffering and death. Interesting, when the Buddha was a young man, he grew up in a very wealthy environment, very protected because his parents, his father especially, protected him from all adversity.

Only surrounded by beautiful things, good food, pleasant experiences. That was how the Buddha grew up. Then when he was already, I don't know how old, 20 or something, for the first time he left the sheltered environment of the palace grounds.

Maybe his parents were kind of probably kings of a small kingdom. And he went to the village and a town and there he saw an old person because you had always been surrounded by lovely young people because his father wanted him to not experience unhappiness. It had been predicted that the Buddha would either become a great spiritual master or he would become very successful in business or as a ruler of a kingdom.

His father wanted him to be successful as a ruler. He said, he must not become spiritual so we're not going to show him anything that might give, would put bad ideas into his head. But he did leave his parents, his palace on an excursion when he was maybe 20 or 21.

And he saw a 90 year old man is there close to death and he was so shocked. What is this? He said, he's old.

Old? What's that? He said, well it happens to everybody sooner or later.

What? This is terrible. And then he walked a bit further and he saw a sick person.

I don't know, probably coronavirus. And the sick person was there. Oh, so painful.

What's that? This person is sick. Sick?

He said, yes, everybody eventually gets sick. Everybody experiences it. What?

When he saw a dead body, he said, what's that? He said, this is a dead body. What?

Yes, everybody dies. He couldn't believe it. If this is our destiny, then everything I've experienced so far is delusion.

If he had experienced it from an early age, he would have gotten used to it. But because his father waited for so long to release him into the world, it was such a shock to him to experience sickness, old age, and death that he said, I need to find something, whether there's anything beyond that. Because if there's nothing beyond it, everything is meaningless.

And that was the beginning of his spiritual search. He left. And then what he did then is what he had never experienced before.

He inflicted adversity on himself because he became an ascetic monk who lived on virtually no food. They eat locusts and leaves. And for several years, he practiced extreme deprivations of all sense pleasures.

And he became very, very thin and almost wasted away. So he knew he needed to experience something beyond. And after that, he said, No, this is not the way either.

Then he started eating and drinking again. And then he became enlightened. So some people say he realized that adversity or extreme deprivation or suffering doesn't get you there.

But that's not really true. He had to go through extreme suffering and deprivation, which he inflicted on himself. And then he went, he stopped it.

And if he hadn't gone through that and realized you don't really need that, but he did.

You don't really need it, but you do need it. There's a there's a paradox here.

People have recognized how it works that through disorder and suffering, you awakened. In many traditions, they have tried to recreate adversity in a spiritual setting. They've tried to recreate the experience of deprivation, of even sensory deprivation, of deprivation of food, of in many, many traditions, in order to bring about a spiritual awakening through extreme forms of adversity.

I don't think that's necessary. And in very few cases has it actually worked. Although I can see the idea behind it seems to make sense.

But you don't need it. Life is enough. Normal life is enough.

Normal life will give you exactly what you need for your spiritual awakening. Normal life will give you good experiences. And normal life will also give you the experience of disorder or chaos.

The important thing is to come to realize that to believe that there is something fundamentally wrong when you experience disorder or chaos, that's a delusion that prevents you from fully, one could almost say, taking advantage of this opportunity that loss or disorder brings when you believe this should not be happening to me. Why to me? Well, it happens to everybody sooner or later.

So if you complain about it, if you have a strong inner resistance to it, then you cannot accept what's happening. You are in opposition to the flow of life. You have an antagonistic relationship with the present moment, because what is happening in the present moment, you condemn as dreadful.

You have a narrative around it. So you cannot use this opportunity of deepening and awakening. So harmony, disharmony on this conventional level, order is harmony, disorder is disharmony or chaos.

But on a higher level, there is a higher hidden harmony, which includes disorder and chaos. Because these two, life moves between these two opposites and evolves between these two opposites. So there is a higher order that includes all the bad things that on our level where we look very bad.

Hidden harmony that is transcendent. And that's helpful to know, but not just as a mental belief that doesn't help very much. If you said, well, Eckhart said there's a hidden harmony, so it must be true.

Well, no, it's not true unless you at least have a glimpse of what that means. Harmony that's beyond the so-called good and bad, that is beyond good and bad. And you can see what it means, perhaps in your own life, if you've already been through a certain amount of suffering and seen that it has taken you already this far.

So it has had a purpose. It's brought you here. Of course, it could have killed you.

What then? Now, that's an interesting question. The usual argument or very the most common argument against the existence of God is a fact of suffering.

And so usually when you argue with an atheist or two atheists talking to each other and agreeing with everything they say, the person who denies the existence of God, whatever that is, but they talk about it without really knowing what it is. But let's put that aside. When you use the word God, it doesn't mean you know what you're talking about.

You're just using a sound. So the usual argument is for the non-existence of God is the fact of human suffering and violence and disorder. And they say, look, if God is omnipotent, as God is supposed to be omnipotent, because if he's not omnipotent, he's not God.

If God is omnipotent, would he allow this suffering? Would he allow a child to die of disease? Would he allow millions to die in a pandemic?

Would he allow genocide in concentration camps and labor camps? The dreadful things that have happened to humans, mostly actually done by humans to other humans. Would he allow these things?

If I were God, I wouldn't allow. I would have created a much better world, a just and fair world, and not this. So therefore, I would be morally superior to this God that you talk about.

This is the argument. Therefore, there is no God, because if I'm morally superior, then what kind of God is that? And so that's the traditional argument against it.

Non-existence of God is the seemingly meaningless suffering in this world on a huge, vast scale. But it could be that the starting point for the discussion was already a mistake. And the starting point for this discussion was the belief that there is a controlling entity somewhere that could control things, that has created all these imperfect things, could improve them, and could control them, but is refusing to do so.

So you start with this idea that there's an omnipotent entity who is not doing what he should be doing. And therefore, either he doesn't exist, or he's not worthy of being called God, and maybe he's just a demon. There was actually a belief in the very early Christianity.

There were the Gnostics, a Christian sect, and some of them believed that the God of the Old Testament and the God that created this world was an inferior deity, that not God at all, because if it were God would not have created this extremely imperfect world. So here we have the starting point for this discussion was already the erroneous assumption that there is an omnipotent being somewhere that could control things, but doesn't do it, or takes pleasure in torturing people. So we have to remove the erroneous foundation for this discussion, say this is not what God is at all.

God is not an entity somewhere that's controlling. So what meaning does God have then, the word God? Very hard to talk about.

The moment you talk about it, you can almost say you've already distorted it.

Eckhart's Inner Journey. In this podcast, Eckhart shares the story of his own personal journey, beginning with his childhood in Europe. His years at university and ultimately the anxiety and depression that pushed him to the brink of despair.

Out of that pain, Eckhart says, he experienced a profound spiritual transformation that forever changed his life. Eckhart went on to share his newfound wisdom with others, which set him on the path to become a best-selling author and a groundbreaking spiritual teacher.

[Speaker 1] (0:36 - 47:19)

I grew up in northwest Germany up to the age of 13. My father was a journalist, my mother a housewife. Then my parents got divorced when I was 12, and my father dropped out of conventional life and society.

He was an early dropout before the term dropout even existed. My father left to live in Spain, and I was very unhappy at school. So at 13, I refused to go to school any longer.

That was my only act of rebellion as a child. I was on the whole a very meek, obedient child, but something within me prevented me from going to school. I just couldn't do it anymore.

So I stopped. My mother didn't know what to do with me. So finally it was decided that I should join my father in Spain, who had remarried and lived a very unconventional life.

He lived on his savings for a few years, and then he started working there. So I spent my teenage years from 13 to 19 in Spain, and so the Spanish language became my second language. I was taken out of the culture that had surrounded me for the first 13 years of my life, and then placed in a completely different environment and culture.

That probably was a good thing, because if one spends one's whole life in one particular cultural environment, one tends to become conditioned by that particular culture without knowing it. So by experiencing different cultures as a child, that somehow perhaps made the cultural conditioning less deep, less rigid. And my father was always a very unconventional person.

Some people would call him eccentric. So when I got to Spain, he asked me, do you want to go to school here? And of course I said no.

And so he said, okay, then don't go to school and do what you like. And that's what I was able to do. I was reading certain books that I liked to read.

I began reading some literature. I went to language classes in the evenings and afternoons and studied some other subjects that I was interested in, like astronomy and so on. So I grew up without, especially in my teenage years, without the pressure that most youngsters experience.

And then at 19, I went on my own to live in England. In England, I was offered a job, although I didn't have any formal qualifications. Miraculously, somebody offered me a job, and I was actually teaching German and Spanish for a few years at a language school.

And then a kind of quest started. What also started at that point was already the beginnings of depression that I would experience periodically, living in a state of increasing anxiety, a kind of generalized anxiety. And I was looking for some answer to the dilemma of life and living, and I was looking to philosophy and the intellect for an answer.

So I began to read a lot, and then I thought the answers would probably be found at the universities, the professors would know. So I took the exams that I needed in evening classes to get to university, and then I went on to London University, where I did languages and literature, and increasingly became more and more unhappy, and continued to search and absorb more and more knowledge, and gradually beginning to realize that they didn't really have the answers to life's dilemma. I remember there was one professor at London University that I liked very much.

I would go to his classes and admired him. Very knowledgeable. And one day we arrived on a Monday morning, and we were told that he had just committed suicide.

And that shook me inside, and I realized that certainly these people that I looked to for an answer didn't have it either. And so my depression intensified, and I did very well in the degree examinations, because I studied so hard, out of fear really. I was driven by anxiety.

Then after graduating from London University, I didn't do anything for about a year, and that was the year in which I became even more unhappy and depressed, and when an inner shift suddenly happened inside me. It was in my 29th year, I woke up in the middle of the night, and this was not uncommon for me, waking up in the middle of the night and feeling intensely depressed and in a state of great fear at the same time. And that happened again that night, and the thought occurred to me, I can't live with myself any longer.

And that thought repeated itself in my mind. I just, I can't live with myself. And then suddenly I looked at the thought.

I kind of stood back from that thought and looked at it and said, that's a strange thought. I cannot live with myself. Am I one or am I two?

This thought seems to show that there's two people here, I and the self that I cannot live with. I didn't have an answer to that question. It's just that question, that puzzle arose in my mind.

Much later, it reminded me of koans that they have in Zen that are puzzles that are designed to stop the mind. For example, what is the sound of one hand clapping is a famous koan, and it doesn't have an answer on an intellectual level. And so the question that arose in my mind also didn't have an answer on an intellectual level.

Who am I and who is myself that I cannot live with? But that question triggered an inner shift. Something inside me, and I didn't understand it at that point, must have disidentified from the self, the unhappy me, as I later called it.

So a kind of an inner disidentification happened. The I am, which I later recognized as the consciousness that I am, separated itself from the conditioned entity, the conditioned consciousness that provided me with my sense of identity, the self. And that consisted largely of an unhappy story.

So then I felt I was like being drawn into some kind of vortex of energy, as if I were disappearing in that. And there was still a moment of resistance, and I heard something almost like a voice inside me that said, resist nothing. So I gave up resisting the feeling of, almost the feeling of disappearing into nothingness.

Don't remember very much else of that night. All I know is that the next morning I woke up, and I opened my eyes, and I looked around the room, and everything seemed as if I was seeing it for the first time, fresh, new, alive. The light coming through the windows, familiar objects on the table, they looked fresh, new, and alive.

So I got up and went out for a walk, and I looked around, and everything seemed so peaceful. Even the traffic in the city seemed so peaceful, and I knew something strange had happened. Suddenly everything was filled with aliveness and peace, and I didn't know why.

And that went on. And then this inner peace as the background to all experiences, and the background to all sense perceptions, even as the background to my thinking, that then never really left me again. But it took me a long time to understand it, to be able to put it into words.

And so a little later I started investigating other spiritual teachings for the first time, Buddhism, Christianity, and more contemporary spiritual teachings. And very quickly I recognized the truth that is, in many cases, hiding underneath sometimes centuries of cultural additions, interpretations, and misinterpretations. And I could see the truth that's in Buddhism, that's in Christianity, the original teachings.

And in turn, they shed light on what had happened to me. For example, I picked up the New Testament, and I read Jesus' words, the peace that passes all understanding. I said, that's exactly what I feel.

I have this peace, and I don't understand what it is. So he must have had the same experience. Peace suddenly arose, which was not causally related to anything in the external world.

It wasn't caused by something wonderful happening in my external environment. So it didn't seem to have a cause, an external cause. And then later I visited Zen teachers, and so on.

And again, I recognized the truth of Zen immediately. But they also helped me to understand what had happened to me into a wider context. For example, I remember talking to one Buddhist monk who talked about coming to the end of always having to think, thinking.

And he said, Zen is about not thinking, ultimately. I immediately realized something that I actually, strangely, I hadn't realized before, that my thought processes, ever since that happened that night, had become reduced by maybe 80 percent. So I wasn't actually thinking that much anymore.

And that's why there was so much peace. So I realized the continuous mental noise, as I now call it, which is the compulsive and largely useless thinking that most people are continuously engaged in, that had come to an end. And there would still be some thought, and thought I could use thinking when I needed it, and occasionally thoughts would come in and out.

But there were huge stretches of no thought. And in those long gaps and intervals of no thought, there was that wonderful experience of inner peace. And I realized that inner peace had been there before, even when I was still anxious.

But it had simply been covered up by the anxiety, by the hyperactive mind. And so this then gradually developed into a spiritual teaching. So the spiritual teaching now attempts to show people that they have within themselves already what they may perhaps are looking for on the outside.

The aliveness, the peace, the sense of deep inner fulfillment is already present in every human being as their innermost essence. So it's not a question of needing to obtain or acquire something new, which is often what spiritual seekers are looking for. Everybody's looking to acquire something to fulfill him or herself.

They may be looking for it on a material level, or on the level of experiences, or on the level of accumulating knowledge, or accumulating wealth. Or spiritual seekers want to add more spiritual experiences to who they are, or find themselves at some point in the future. And you can't, because if you're looking to the future to find yourself, you're missing yourself already, the essence of your being, which you can only find in the now.

So my realization that night took me years to understand. And in the process of understanding it, at the same time, people would already come to me occasionally and ask questions. So gradually I was able to talk about it.

And I was able to recognize in others what I had been through. The same dilemma, perhaps with the exception that I was suffering from it more acutely than many others. That's all.

I was even more deeply immersed in the mental noise and the emotional turmoil than would be normal. But the same mechanism operates in everyone. So the teaching now is to point out that there is a dimension in you that is deeper than what you normally identify with as yourself, that is deeper than the me, the personal history that most people believe is who they are.

And so the recognition of that dimension comes when you make room inside yourself for the present moment, because it can only come out of an inner alignment with now, as I call it, which is life itself. The stream of thinking is always concerned with past and future. So for most people who are identified with thinking all the time, every thought is invested with a sense of self, a me.

Every thought grips you completely and you are in it. This is what identified means. Every thought that arises becomes a me, and you think it and you're in it.

And so most people are dragged along all day long by this mind stream, one thought after another. And within that mind stream, there is a mind-made sense of self, a me, consisting of past memories and experiences and things that my mind has identified with and that contribute to my identity. They are all thought forms.

For example, my possessions, my knowledge, my experiences, or what people have done to me, what I have done to people, things that whatever you identify with and then hang on to in your mind becomes a me. And that was really the self that that night I recognized as not really me. So there's the mind stream, there's identification with the mind stream, and there's the possibility of stepping out of the mind stream by accessing the present moment.

Now to most people, the present moment almost doesn't exist, because what they're really interested in is the next moment or the one after that. So they live always towards the future. They live towards the next moment.

And unconsciously, they regard the next moment, the next point in the future that they need to get to, unconsciously, they regard that as more important than this moment. Not realizing that the future moment that they so desperately want to get to, tonight, tomorrow, whatever, or in any activity, wanting to get it out of the way as quickly as possible, needing to get to the end point on a small scale, on a large scale. And so they don't recognize that the future has no existence except as a thought form.

So when you always live towards the future, you live your life trapped in a conceptual reality of thought forms, which assumes a greater significance for you than the immediate reality of life, which is always now, because your life consists entirely of the present moment. If you truly realize the significance of that statement, your entire life consists of the present moment, your life is never not this moment. Even when you remember the past, you can only remember it now.

And when you think about the future, you can only think about it now. But people live as if the present moment were an obstacle that they need to overcome in order to get to some better point, which never arrives. So that's a mad way to live.

And it makes living hard. It makes living into an effort. We have been conditioned over thousands of years, the human mind, which was a wonderful thing, the ability to think at some point, a long, long time ago, must have arisen in humans, the ability to conceptualize mentally.

And this has opened up a whole new dimension for humanity. And of course, it has made humanity the most powerful species on the planet, because humans are not physically the strongest species, but they were able to dominate all the other species because of their ability to think. And so that developed slowly, probably in mythological form, it's expressed in the story of Genesis at the beginning of the Bible, when they eat this apple that comes from the tree of the knowledge of good and bad, to differentiate this, that, that comes only through the ability to think, to analyze, to separate.

And so that gradually developed in humans. And at first, it wasn't a problem, it opened up new possibilities. Then over thousands and thousands of years, the thinking mind became stronger, it grew and grew.

And gradually, they lost connectedness with something that is deeper and more essential within themselves. We could call that being, the sense of aliveness, a deeper intelligence, even, that is more than just the thoughts that go on in your head. So gradually, humans, because of the growth of the thinking mind, lost their ability to sense their deeper connectedness with life.

And then, now we have arrived at a point where our whole sense of who we are is caught up in the mind and in thought. So we have been through an evolutionary stage, which was a necessary one for humanity, and we could call that the stage of mind, the stage of thought. And to such a point now that we are completely possessed, I use that word, we are possessed by the mind without knowing it.

We cannot stop thinking, it seems. We can, but for most people, that's not yet a reality. They have to think, the compulsion to think, and to derive your sense of self from the movement of thought.

We're arriving at the end of this whole evolutionary stage. And for humanity now to go on, it needs to transcend the mind, no longer be possessed by the mind, to go beyond the compulsion to think into a deeper level of being. So it's almost like regaining what they have lost.

When you regain something that you lost, you regain it with a deeper awareness. And this is the process that we are involved in now, that humanity is involved in now, because an evolutionary transformation, a transformation of consciousness, really is no longer a luxury, so to speak, is no longer optional for humanity. For the first time in the history of humanity, a transformation of consciousness is a necessity if humanity is to survive, because we are creating havoc on the planet.

We are creating hell to a large extent, on a planet that potentially is paradise. Being a teacher was the response to a demand that came to me. It wasn't a conscious choice that, oh, I want to teach or I need to teach.

It simply arose out of, first of all, individual people coming to me and asking questions or wanting some kind of help or becoming drawn, becoming interested in what I had to say and experiencing an inner shift after coming a few times. And so being a teacher that developed organically without me ever deciding I want to be a teacher. And so from seeing individuals, it gradually developed into occasionally meeting in small groups, and that went on for a few years.

And out of all these meetings with individual people and small groups, I took notes after meeting with people often, because things that I said in those individual sessions or group meetings were things that were new to me also. They came out of that moment. They came out as a response to a person's question.

So I would often take notes, and I had a collection of notes after a few years. And some of those notes later became incorporated into The Power of Now, the book. So The Power of Now is in part the result of my work with people over a number of years, and in part the arising of also a new teaching in the process of writing it.

After the transformation happened that night, my external life for a few more years went on as if nothing much had changed on the external level. I went on to do graduate work. However, my heart was never fully in it anymore, in intellectual pursuits, in analytical work.

But my external life had a certain momentum, so it went on for a few more years, and then that momentum came to an end. And a point arrived when I was at Cambridge doing graduate work and some teaching, and suddenly I realized this has come to an end, and I simply walked away from it all. And after that, two years followed in which I did very little, and I didn't have a home of my own.

I would drift from here to there, spend most days just sitting. When it was warm enough, I would sit outside on park benches or walk around. I was then in London at that time.

And I was so deeply immersed in the peace, almost the bliss of the simple experience of being, the simple feeling, the goodness of life every moment, that I lost interest in future completely. There were no ambitions, and I wasn't even interested in doing anything. So from an external viewpoint, one could say my life for a while became unbalanced.

I became so deeply immersed in being that I lost interest in doing. One could almost say I lost the ability for a while to be active in the world, and then gradually the ability to be active in the world came back. So a balance after a while re-established itself.

So I'm now able to be active in the world, and at the same time be rooted in being. One does not exclude the other. But for some reason, I had to go very deeply within for a while.

Perhaps even on a larger scale, it may be that some people for a while have to go very deeply into being simply to provide a balance on the level of the collective consciousness, because most human beings are totally lost in doing. So it may require a few humans who go very deeply into being to provide a balance, although on a personal level it might look as if they were unbalanced. I live in a surrender to the present moment, and so that is always there.

Whatever happens right now, I recognize that it is futile to argue with whatever is happening at this moment. So emotions occasionally still come. If I see human suffering, I sometimes weep.

I can cry. And yet even then, there's a deep sense of peace in the background, even though I may cry externally if I see especially humans inflicting so much suffering on other human beings, and on animals, and on nature, on the planet. So sometimes tears come, and yet deep down I know that ultimately life is timeless and indestructible, and I know that death is not the opposite of life, but only the opposite of birth.

Life is beyond the forms of life. Life is timeless and immortal, that which underlies the entire manifested world, and that dimension is present in each human being. My life is now very different from what it was before, especially before the book came out.

I was already teaching before the book came out, but soon after the book came out, the book grew very quickly. At first through word of mouth for one year, and then other people discovered it and started writing about it and speaking about it, and then it accelerated. So soon after the book came out, the teaching developed a momentum that was almost overwhelming, and it turned my external life around completely, from living a very sheltered life, a very quiet life, almost a hermit-like life.

Suddenly, everybody wanted me to teach and demands for this and that were coming in, invitations flooding in from all over the world, and then I responded at the beginning to almost every invitation, and then I realized it's impossible. I can no longer respond to every invitation. So nevertheless, my life is now almost public, and the groups become bigger and bigger.

In the United States, the average number for talks is 2,000 people now, and so I'm very much out there in the world, and this is not something that naturally I would have chosen for myself. My natural inclination would be withdrawn, not to be known. I like to be invisible in public places, not to be noticed, and that becomes more difficult now, and yet I accept the fact that this is how it is, and so I've had to surrender to the fact that my external life changed completely.

It's been wonderful, too, to see how many people are being reached by the teaching, the book, and the talks and the retreats, how many people are open to the message. That was the greatest surprise after the book came out, because when I was writing the book, the book wrote itself, one can almost say, my feeling was that only people who had already been on the spiritual path for a long time would respond to the book, and that was not the case. People responded to the book, both people who had been on the path for many years, they responded, but also people who had never read a spiritual book in their lives, who had never had access to that dimension, they wrote to me and said, my life has changed.

This is incredible. I've read this book several times already, and it's fresh and new every time, and there's so much peace in my life suddenly. So the book seems to have reached all kinds of people, no matter what their background is.

Also, education doesn't seem to matter very much. Some highly educated people are open to it, and others who are not are equally open, because it's not difficult to understand on an intellectual level. For a large part of my life, I lived with very little money, and probably people would have said I lived below the poverty line, as they call it, and yet I never felt poor.

I always felt I had quite enough, and now I don't feel wealthy anymore than I did then. So it's exactly the same feeling. It's a very abstract thing, the fact that now there is more wealth in my life on an external dimension is only an abstract truth to me.

It has not affected me inside at all, and it's only very slightly affected my external life. I walk around cities and look at shops, and I sometimes like to look at things, but very rarely do I actually feel the impulse to go and buy something. It's enough to look at a beautiful object and then walk on.

I wouldn't know what to buy with it. There is the possibility at some point that there may be a center, a spiritual center coming into being. That is something that I'm not actively planning now, but I have a feeling it may happen.

Before, it used to be the way that anybody who wanted to see me could just call me and talk to me on the phone. I would talk to them and say, can I see you? Yes, come.

And then after the book came out, that became impossible, because the phone kept ringing. So in one sense, when I was only reaching a small number of people, however, there was the satisfaction of having close personal contact with people who came to me. Now the close personal contact, because the numbers have grown so much, that has become lost to a large extent, and yet the teaching is reaching far, far, far more people than it did before.

So really, and this is very much the same in any situation in life, every situation has its own limitations. There were certain limitations to my life on an external level when the teaching was not yet reaching many people. The teaching was very limited in that sense, although it was very satisfying.

Now the limitation is that people cannot access me personally very easily. I have to have several people in between me and the world, simply because on a practical level, it's the only way I can live. I cannot reply to every email or answer every letter, and thousands and thousands of letters come in all the time, and emails, and I cannot just pick up the phone and answer it, so that it's harder for individual people to reach me.

It's difficult, if not impossible, and that's simply, I need to accept that is a limitation that's unavoidable. It's always a question of surrendering to whatever the present moment presents you with, and whatever limitations there may be at this moment, there's no situation that is free of limitation of one kind or another. In the group sessions, nothing is ever prepared.

I don't come with a script. I don't even come with any idea in my head what we are going to do today or talk about today. When I sit down on the chair, I have no idea, even a few seconds before opening my mouth, what's going to come out.

So, in that sense, you can say it comes really out of the immediacy of the present moment, and so what words come out depends very often on the energy field of the group, and so there is an interaction between the teaching, the teacher, and the taught. There's an ancient Eastern saying that says, the teacher and the taught together produce the teaching, and that's how it is, and that's why the teaching has great power, because it doesn't come from the accumulated knowledge of the mind, but it comes out of the immediacy of the present moment. It's not prepared, and even on a retreat that lasts for three, four, five days sometimes, there's absolutely no pre-planned structure to the retreat.

It all grows organically out of the present moment. Surrender means only accept this moment as it is, but you won't be able to surrender unless you're completely fed up with suffering. You've had enough suffering, and at some level, you recognize that most of your suffering is self-created.

It is created out of resistance to what is. It is created out of an interpretation of something that is. It comes from a thought, from an interpretation, not from the situation.

So you realize really that I've had enough suffering, and only when you've truly had enough suffering in your life are you able to say, I don't need it anymore. Suffering is a wonderful teacher. Suffering is most people's only spiritual teacher, and suffering deepens you.

It gradually erodes the mind-made sense of self, the ego, and for some people, the point arrives where they realize I have suffered enough, and that, for example, is the case with almost all the people who come to a retreat. If you ask them, they've all had their share of human suffering. Otherwise, they wouldn't be open to the message.

They've had their share of human suffering, and they have reached a point where they are ready to listen to the message that says there is another way to live. There is another way in which you can live that does not create further suffering for yourself, because to a large extent, humans create their own suffering. And so when you are ready to hear that message, and that's really the message that is in every religion.

The central message of Buddhism is the end of suffering, and even the central message of the teaching of Jesus is finding the pearl of great price, finding the kingdom of heaven that is within you, here and now, as Jesus says. And that, of course, is the end of living in a state of suffering. So one could say that you need suffering for you to realize, for you to come to a point of realization that you do not need to suffer anymore.

There's a paradox here. If I had not suffered, this teaching would not exist. So you could say it has come partly as a result of intense suffering, because as a human being, I would not have evolved spiritually if I had not suffered.

So suffering was my main teacher, and suffering is for many people their main teacher. But then some people, when they are ready, they come into contact with a spiritual teaching or teacher, and that can speed up the process of realization that you don't need to suffer anymore. You're ready to hear that.

The Buddha talked about nothing else already 2,600 years ago, that there can be an end to self-inflicted suffering. And when you don't inflict suffering on yourself anymore, and remember, it's the thoughts. Your thoughts make you suffer more than anything else.

It's not usually the situation. It's your interpretation of the situation, of how dreadful it all is. And so when you see that, then you see there is another way to live in which I no longer mentally argue with what is.

And that's the end of self-inflicted suffering. And if I no longer inflict suffering on myself, I no longer inflict suffering on others, because the two go together. It's acceptance, but acceptance won't come unless you've reached this inner point of readiness.

And this is why I never try to convince anybody that what I'm saying is true, or they should practice something. I never say, you should do this, or try to convince somebody who doesn't want to believe it. That is pointless.

Only if you are ready internally for it, and so one way of putting it is to say, if you have suffered enough, then you're ready, then you're open to it, and you immediately see the truth of it. You immediately see that you ultimately make yourself suffer. It's not the situation.

It's the mental interpretation of the situation, which in most cases is a form of resistance. And that creates the suffering. When you hear these words, if you don't immediately recognize the truth, if there's an inner arguing, that's fine.

There's no should here. The teaching never says, this is how you should live. It's only if you can hear the truth of it, it will make sense to you, and then it can help you.

So it can only help those who have an inner readiness. But there are many, many people alive now in whom the readiness is there. They are able to hear it, to truly hear it, and immediately recognize, yes, this is true.

Convincing never works. One thing is certain, that the world would look very different from the way it is now. We can't possibly imagine how the human world would look if everybody lived in a different state of consciousness, in a state predominantly a state of inner peace.

What kind of civilization would we create out of a state of inner peace? It's impossible to predict. All we can say is that probably it would not be as complex as it is now.

People would not be running around continuously engaged in largely pointless activities. It would probably not be such a noisy civilization as it is now, because no civilization has ever been as noisy as this one, and that's simply because whatever human beings create externally is a reflection of their inner state. So we are polluting the planet simply because our inner selves are being polluted by an enormous amount of negativity, of continuous resistance.

So the outer is always a reflection of the inner. So if the inner is predominantly a state of inner peace, we create a peaceful world on the outside. What exact form that would take, we don't know.

We'd have to see what it is. It would very probably be a much more simple world, more harmonious and beautiful. The essence is very simple and the essence could probably be taught and perhaps one day will be taught to very young children at school, and children are very close to it anyway.

The essence is, I could put it in the most simple terms, because the most simple is often the most powerful. The essence is to make the present moment into your friend, not your enemy. To always ask yourself, what is my relationship with the present moment?

At this moment, of course. What is my inner relationship with the present moment? Am I friendly towards the present moment or am I hostile towards the present moment?

Is the present moment my enemy? And then that would be enough to bring about a change, because when you realize that you are making the present moment into your enemy and you also know that that's all you ever have in life, then you realize it is a mad way to live. To treat this moment as if it were an obstacle to where you want to get to.

And you never get there because it's always now. Then your relationship towards the present moment changes. It changes and your relationship becomes one of yes rather than no to what is.

It does not mean that you become passive or that you will never do anything again. It simply means that the foundation for any action you take is the state of yes to what is. And if the inner state of yes to what is, that is the state of inner peace.

And inner peace is much more powerful as a foundation for right action than the state of resistance and negativity. So that is the essence. Find that state of inner alignment with the present moment which comes with the yes.

And then see what happens. See how your world changes as you no longer resist the isness of this moment. And that's why I say I don't really have anything to teach in the sense of adding information to you.

There's nothing that you need to add in order to find yourself and be yourself. You can add on an external level. It's nice to learn new things.

It's nice to explore this or that. And yet the essential level is the level of who you are, your innermost sense of self. It's the level of being.

On the most essential level, no matter where you are at in what your life situation is, on the most essential level, nothing needs to be added to who you are. So the spiritual teaching is not a more. It's not an addition.

It's simply a pointing towards that which is already there. And those who are ready then suddenly recognize the truth of it. Recognize means they already knew it.

It's almost like remembering. Ah, yes. And then there's no question about it.

Convincing is not necessary. It's immediate realization. Then spiritual teaching works as it should.

So that's how it operates. And that's the difference between a conventional teaching and spiritual teaching. In some sense, one could say the teaching is almost the opposite of the conventional teaching.

If anything, it takes something away from you. It takes away that which covered up who you are. But it is not taken away by the teacher.

It's taken away by yourself when you see it and become conscious of it.

Eckhart Tolle Empathy And the Suffering of Others [9da606a0-b0b8-495f-a6ac-5650b15a5237]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:40)

Empathy and the suffering of others. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about our growing awareness and how it can be used in service of others. He says when presence is the foundation of our lives, we are more available emotionally.

He explains that this is when the pitfalls of the ego no longer block us. Eckhart believes that when we are confronted by the pain of others, if we have a clear channel connected to the source of consciousness, we will exercise empathy and compassion. In this state, he says, we will not be shaken when the winds of misfortune blow because we are rooted in the deepest part of our being.

[Speaker 2] (0:42 - 2:29)

Hi, Eckhart. It's an absolute honor and a pleasure to see you. I've been studying the Upanishads and the Vedas for a while.

And the thing that everyone talks about is the non-attachment. I began to feel somewhere that it was almost selfish not to identify with the pain of someone else because individual pain body, I can understand. I can wrap my head around it.

But this collective pain body, you sometimes feel so helpless about the things that are happening around. And it sometimes almost feels very, very small to not identify with it and yet do what is required. But sometimes it feels that am I am I missing out on feeling that emotion and identifying with it?

Because if you bring that awareness of being the witness consciousness to what is happening, there is no feeling that you feel there. And then you look at people around you suffering and then you feel like am I being insensitive? So it's a very confusing state sometimes.

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (2:30 - 20:51)

Yeah. Yes. I understand exactly what you're talking about.

It does make sense. So let's see what there is to say about it. There's a wonderful quality that is possible for human beings.

We could call that empathy. Empathy. Empathy is to feel what the other is feeling to have to tune into another and to some extent feel the suffering, the pain of the other.

You can even have you can have empathy with animals too. You can feel the suffering of an animal. You can feel the suffering of a human.

And the ego is not capable of empathy. So people who are ego possessed to a high degree feel little or no empathy for other humans because their sense of separateness, separation is so strong that the other only exists for them as a conceptual entity. They cannot sense the other as human and they cannot let alone sense the other as the being beyond the human.

So when you have empathy this can only arise when there's some absence of ego. So they said it doesn't mean that a person with empathy is completely egoless. But even empathy could be used by the ego.

Anything can be used by the ego. Your spiritual practice can be used by the ego. Anything.

But there's an opening there. And I remember various occasions when I felt what you describe traveling and so on, looking at human suffering and I wept. One can only help a little, but what I wept, that's the human.

On a human level, you feel that. Compassion is another word that's sometimes used. It's very closely related to empathy.

Compassion is a feeling can lead to action, but you know that whatever action you take in the face of human suffering is probably limited. So there's compassion, there's empathy. The German word for compassion is quite interesting when you break it up and translate it literally.

The German word for compassion is mitleid, which translated literally is suffering with. To suffer with someone. Mit means with, leid means suffering.

Mitleid means with suffering, to suffer with someone together. That's a German word for compassion. So it's inevitable that that arises as you gradually free yourself from egoic consciousness.

More and more empathy arises. And then you feel that. I feel it for many instances when I just, I was in a country somewhere, saw a beggar sitting in the street and I felt tears.

Another strange thing I remember, we were in Italy in a small town, perhaps it was Assisi where we had a retreat. I walked, there was a church and the bells were ringing very slowly. And then people were coming out of the church carrying a coffin.

So I realized it was a funeral. I don't know who died. Somebody died.

And I couldn't stop crying for 10 minutes. I was, it was, I cried because this for me meant the death of every human being. And I thought I just was very strange for 10 minutes.

I was just crying, crying. And even when I talk about it now, I almost cry. Why?

How could you cry? Because that was on a human level, everybody's, every human's destiny is that. And on a human level alone, it's tragic.

But as I cried, now this is hard to describe, underneath the crying, there was a very, very deep peace underneath it. One could say almost perhaps when one talks about it, it's incompatible almost say, how can, but there was, there was a, there was peace. And on the surface, there was the weeping.

I can feel it even now. Because on a human level, the human destiny is tragic. Everybody's attention's to death.

It's just amazing. On a human level alone, each one of us in the not too distant future is going to die. Then that's it.

And sometimes before you die, you may have to suffer a bit more, physical suffering, whatever it may be. But now where's the peace? Where does that come from that you feel in the face of, where you even, you feel it even more strongly in the face of death, which when you observe the fact of impermanence, as the Buddha called it, the fact of impermanence of all forms, and don't deny it, but really face it.

Then by completely looking in the face of impermanence, you become aware of something that is beyond impermanence in you. The Buddhists sometimes called it the deathless. Buddhism likes negative terms.

It denies something, the end of suffering, the deathless. Jesus didn't use those terms mostly. He used more positive terms.

He said, the equivalent of the deathless dimension in Buddhism, Amaravati, is the term that Jesus used, which is eternal life. Jesus spoke about eternal life, the possibility of finding eternal life. Sometimes in bad translations of the Bible, it's translated as everlasting life.

That's the wrong translation. Eternal doesn't mean everlasting. It goes on and on and on.

No, eternal means timeless, the timeless dimension of consciousness. Now, I believe I wrote that in a Stillness Speaks book. This is just a little analogy to explain what I'm talking about.

If the entire world were green, let's say everything is green in this world, there's no other color other than green. That means green would not exist. There would be no word for it.

Because for anything to exist, you need the other. So everything is green, there's no green. You could even apply it to race.

If everybody were exactly the same skin color, there would be no race. You could not derive your identity from your race. Because you can only have an identity because somebody else has a different identity on that level of the human level.

So now, impermanence, the fact that you become aware of impermanence, you can become aware of it, brings up that which is beyond it. Because if there were nothing beyond impermanence, you wouldn't even know it. You'd be so much part of it.

But there is a knowing. So if there's a knowing that this is green, there must be something that's not green. It's a little analogy.

So to become aware of the fact of impermanence means there's something that is beyond impermanence. Only that can become aware of impermanence. And this is why it's so helpful to, and I love going to cemeteries for meditations.

So you walk through the cemeteries and you look at the gravestones. What could be better reminder of impermanence than a cemetery? You look at the gravestones.

One of the greatest meditations, highly recommend walk around and then experience two things, the sadness of impermanence and the deeper peace underneath it. And again, that brings us back to where we started, the human and the being. The human and the being.

The human is subject to impermanence. The being is the transcendent dimension, the consciousness, the being that is not yours, but it's the essence of it all. And to be aware of both simultaneously is very liberating.

And it's really, it's ultimately that in itself is a healing sling when you are aware, when you, let's say you're with a human who is dying, that can also be a very deep meditation. If you sit with someone, perhaps a loved one, a father, mother, whoever it may be, and you sit with a dying person. And if you become still and alert without any more denial or anything like that, without needing some kind of explanation in your mind or seeking some kind of explanation for it all, you'll become aware of the two levels, the sadness of it.

And, but as you completely accept that, the impermanence of all forms, you become aware of something underlying, something deeper. That's the consciousness. And that's also the essence of this human who died, the being.

That is eternal, eternal life. And you know very well when the moment this person has passed away, only the body remains and you realize he or she is gone. And the physical body was never who that being was.

The physical body was never it. And so it comes, it brings you to the realization that you also, that you are essentially invisible. What you see, what I see of myself or what I see of you is very little, almost the body.

You see the body. You see the, you can't even see the thoughts. The thoughts already exist already in the realm of the invisible.

You cannot find a thought. You can examine the brain, but you cannot find a thought. We don't even know exactly what a thought is.

And I can remember at this moment, my grandmother who died when I was 11, but only this one, where was she all this time? In, as a thought, as a memory, would a scientist, if he opened up my brain, would he or she have found my grandmother there, the memory of my grandmother? No, because thought already is invisible, exists in the realm of the invisible.

And thought is only the upper layer of consciousness. It's the, so thought is a ripple on the surface of the ocean. So if you can sense that you are also invisible, what you, nobody can find you through the senses.

You don't exist ultimately in the so-called material realm. Nobody would find you. They open up your brain.

Where are you? Gone. So the death is something that is a very important portal into awakening, potentially, the fact of impermanence.

And it's both, it's tragic, and it's perfectly fine. Nothing real can be threatened, as the miracle says at the beginning. Nothing real can be threatened.

Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God. Nothing real can be threatened.

So in ultimate terms, the body is not real. It's just a temporary apparition. Nothing real can, nothing unreal exists.

Ultimately, it doesn't even exist. We don't need to go into that. It's like a dream.

Herein lies the peace of God. In knowing this, you have this deep peace. And that's the being, the realization of being.

And you can still weep. And you can also take action to remedy, to some extent, as much as possible, the suffering of others, without being consumed by the suffering of others. Because there are many humans who feel they want to help, and eventually they experience burnout and frustration.

That's the danger when you feel like, I must help, help, help. Yes, it's wonderful to help. But are you losing yourself in that?

Or are you able to help without losing connectedness to the source? And then an additional dimension flows into what you do. And that is through help.

Then you emanate that. And that also then changes the way in which you act upon the world and help others. A very last, before we finish the answer to this question, a very great form of healing, if you want to help others by healing in whatever sense, whether it's physical healing or deeper healing.

Deeper healing, of course, means self-realization, awakening. It's the only true healing. To heal, to help others with, to heal others is to recognize the, let's say, somebody is seriously ill.

Instead of focusing on the illness, which is on the human level, you focus on the being. On the level of being, that human is already complete and healed forever. In the state of oneness with source, with oneness with God.

So you can, if you focus in another human being, not on the external manifestation of the human, but on the, who that human is in the essence of their being, where they don't even need any healing, where they are already complete. Nothing can be added on that level to who you already are. Nothing can be added, needs to be added.

And if you focus on that, sometimes a person suddenly feels better or gets better. So you acknowledge the deeper reality in that human being. Thank you so much.

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (20:52 - 21:03)

Hello. Thank you. So my question is, what do you consider a true limitation to manifestation versus a limitation of the mind?

[Speaker 1] (21:06 - 38:51)

Good question. Thank you. Now, when you read what Jesus said, when you have faith, faith is, faith in the terms that Jesus used is to be connected with the power within you that is inseparable from the source consciousness.

When you have faith, you can tell a mountain, move from here to there and it will happen. Now, there could be a kind of parable or analogy, or some people might want to take it literally. He also said, as you know, I've had before the one statement that encapsulates the entire secret about manifestation.

Jesus said, when you asked for something, believe that you have received it and it will be yours. They just encapsulate, believe that you have received it. I've spoken about that at length in other sessions, to believe that you have received it is to feel connected with the essence of being where you, anything else is, that's the cream, everything else is the skimmed milk.

So if you have the cream, you can manifest anything in the realm of the skimmed milk. Now, that would mean that you can entirely change, if the statement about the mountain is to be taken literally, then it would be saying that it is possible to completely change external reality, so-called physical reality, simply by the power of your mind. And I believe that is the destiny of humans.

Eventually, humans will be able to simply manifest through the mind. At the moment, you can manifest quite a bit, not immediately, you always need a little bit of time, mostly. There's a lot you can do, and even sometimes things that you think might be almost impossible, that is too far, that is possible to manifest.

But there are limitations, you're absolutely right, and you need to recognize those limitations so that you're not engaged in completely useless manifestation practice, aiming at something that is not within the realm of possibility. For example, let's say I suddenly got it into my mind that I'm going to participate in whatever capacity in the Olympic Games, the next Olympic Games, whenever they are going to be, and I'm going to win a gold medal in boxing or whatever, and no matter how powerful my manifestation is, that is not going to happen. So I know that is an impossibility, or I want, let's say I got it into my mind, I want to become the world's greatest ballet dancer.

Okay. Now, if I'd been 10 years old, it might have worked, but it's not going to happen, that's for sure, no matter how powerful my manifestation practice is. So there are, now these things are kind of obvious, that there are physical limitations to what you can do or what your body can do, there may also be mental manifestations.

Sometimes people have an image in their mind of what they want to be. I remember watching years ago, when we still had cable television, all these people who perform, they want to be chosen and all kinds of singing and dancing and so on. And one is sometimes amazed at the discrepancy between what people thought of themselves, how good they were at singing or dancing, and how bad they actually were when they performed.

It's just, the discrepancy was just incredible. They thought they were the potential greatest singer, but they were just awful. Just everybody could see that they can.

Now that could be that they haven't practiced enough. It could be that they haven't, that they forgot that in to achieve mastery in anything, you have to focus your mind and you have to enjoy what you're doing for quite some time before power flows into what you do. So they have just a mental projection, I'm going to be a rock star.

But then all this, the practice, you have to live it, you have to live the music, you have to live, or you compose the music and you live it every day. And you live, your instrument becomes part of your very being, and you live it, and you enjoy it. And then you go into the subway and you play there for a year or two, and then you go somewhere else, a little bar and you play there.

That's how many great stars have started. And then you live, and there was this book he found and he looked at the various great musicians and dancers who had achieved great things. He calculated that they had 10,000 hours of practice before mastery was achieved and something was able to flow through them that made them great.

With the Beatles, for example, he examined for how many years the Beatles performed in just little bars in Liverpool and in Hamburg, they were performing in little beer cellars and tiny bars, and he calculated and he came to the average figure of 10,000 hours of practice. So very often the people don't achieve the heaven, the goal may not be totally unrealistic, it may be within the realm of possibility, but what they miss is the journey towards the goal and they don't enjoy the journey and they don't want to, the energy is not there to practice every day, to do every day, so that the power increases and flows through them. Now many, quite a few of those people, they never manifest, they never consciously manifested something.

The Beatles, I'm sure, it just was a gradual evolutionary process for them before they, what they created was very deeply inspiring. I mean, the songs are relatively simple, but they have an essence, there's something there that makes them, they'll still be around in two or three hundred years time, there's something there that suddenly came and it wasn't there initially. So are you able to enjoy the doing, if the present moment really comes back to the present moment, do you enjoy the journey towards it?

Or let's say you want to become a, people have an image of what they want to become, but are not able to give it attention in the continuous, in the present moment, so that the journey must be joyful to be empowered. And when I was writing The Power of Now, people sometimes asked me, what do you do? And I said, I'm writing, I'm writing a book, spiritual book.

And they say, what about? I said, it's about present moment, living in the present moment. And several times people said, oh, forget about it.

It's been done so many times. This is something that's already been overdone. You should think of something else.

This possibly present moment is old hat, just don't do it. There's no point, you're wasting your time. Somebody actually told me literally, he had read many spiritual books, and said, if you are writing another book about the present moment, you're wasting your time.

And I was writing The Power of Now. I didn't listen to him. I knew I wasn't wasting your time.

I loved the process. It was, there was an empowerment that happened. It didn't have, it didn't matter to me very much that whether the book would be successful or not, which was very much secondary.

I knew the book had to be read. If I had not written it, I would have become ill and I would have died. That's how strong the energy flow was.

If I had not responded to it, I would have died or become seriously ill. So don't necessarily listen to others. But yes, it is true.

On the one hand, there are things that are not possible. Certain things are impossible. And you need to just use your discrimination and look at it without limiting yourself unduly.

Because many things that other people might tell you are impossible, are actually within the realm of possibility. And even certain things that your mind will tell you are impossible, may be within the realm of possibility. And again, there's a fine line there.

Important thing is make sure that you enjoy the doing of it. And then you can, you focus on your destination, but enjoy the doing in the present moment. And then whether or not you even arrive at your destination, becomes secondary.

Because there's such deep enjoyment in the present moment. So, because the arriving at your destination, which means achieving your goal, is a relatively short lived phenomenon. Let's say your goal is, I want to live in a nice big house.

And then you've somehow, you're able to manifest it. And in the meantime, presumably you engage in a certain activity that enables you to have that. And then you sit in the big house.

And very quickly, you will experience the state of unsatisfactoriness again. Very quickly, any destination you arrive at is already the end. And this many people have become famous actors and others.

I've spoken to quite a few. And most of them have said, a little while after they became famous, after the initial euphoric high that they were on, subsided, they became very unhappy. Or they would have, before they thought when I'm famous, I'll now be happy.

Because everybody will love me. And everybody will acknowledge how great I am. I'll be happy.

I can do anything or anywhere. I'll be happy. Yeah, the euphoria was there initially.

And then suddenly there was a huge depression set in, unhappiness set in. And they didn't understand it. So the arriving is very little, unless you break through into the deeper dimension of who you are.

But you do that now. The realization of being needs to happen now. Then you're not looking to the arriving to free you from a state of unsatisfactoriness.

Your manifestation will become useless if you look to the arriving for a state of liberation, from a state of unsatisfactoriness or insufficiency or feeling you're not something missing. This feeling that there's something missing does not derive ultimately from not achieving this or that. It derives from not having accessed the vertical dimension in your life, which is to realize the being and you're still trapped on the level of the human, the doing.

That's where ultimately the feeling of something missing arises. It's because of from the in the level of being, nothing is missing. You're already complete.

The rest is a more, is a secondary thing. It's quite nice to achieve certain things on that level. It's fine.

You enjoy it up to a point. You enjoy what you achieve. If you don't look to these achievements for some kind of liberation or or fulfillment of who you are, that's true.

Expecting too much. The world can't give you that. A certain amount of satisfaction can come, not ultimate lasting satisfaction.

A certain amount of superficial satisfaction when you achieve this or that is fine. And then of course it changes. Sometimes it leaves you or it evaporates again.

So it's a very subtle thing to know just to summarize the answer to your question. Yes, on the one hand, there are things that you should not pursue because they are not clearly not within the realm of possibility. But on the other hand, quite a few other things you could pursue because they are possible even though people may tell you they are not, or your mind may tell you they're not.

But whatever it is, do make sure that you enjoy the present moment. The step you're taking at this moment is really the most important step ever. There's only ever the step you're taking at this moment.

If you don't honor that and give it your fullest attention, then the rest would be very frustrating to honor this, the step you're taking at this moment. And then perhaps in order to achieve mastery, you need to take 10,000 steps with the 10,000 hours that this man did. Okay, but you enjoy, you enjoy.

While you take this step, you're not counting and saying, okay, or you don't count the hours. If you practice dance or music or being an artist or a writer, you don't say, okay, this guy said I need 10,000 hours, so I better start now. And then you count, okay, I've now done 150 hours.

How many more to go? You're not present. When you give it attention and honor it, acknowledge it, there's a quality in the doing.

It's hard to define, but there's a quality in how you do what you do and that empowers it. Yes, thank you. Thank you so much, everybody, for being here, sharing presence, not your presence, not my presence, just presence.

And become aware of yourself, not mainly as a human with a history, a past and a future, but become aware of the invisible being that you are. So easy. You just have to remember to be aware.

It's not a memory. It's coming back from, get lost in the human, reconnect with being. Stop thinking for a moment and sense that you are still there, not as a historical person, but as a living presence.

Eckhart Tolle Every Setback Is Part of The Journey [c475eddf-47ee-4c3e-b51e-a8857cfb8bd3]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:43)

Every setback is part of the journey. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about the coming changes for humanity, including a shift to a different level of consciousness. He explains collectively, we are going through difficult times now because real change only occurs when society is pushed to the brink.

He says without adversity, there is no transformation. He believes we need not be afraid when hardship strikes because that too will be a catalyst for more spiritual growth. Eckhart says historically, humanity has gone through many regressions and collective disasters.

He explains they are intrinsic to the process of awakening because every setback is part of the journey.

[Speaker 1] (0:45 - 32:12)

When you become spacious or realize the spaciousness within you, then what is it that's being realized? You realize that the most fundamental, primordial fact about who you are is that you are conscious. Or even that's not quite correct because by saying you are conscious, I'm separating you and conscious.

There's a kind of duality which is created by language. Every sentence has a subject and an object. So you say, I am conscious.

That's already misleading because that would imply that apart from consciousness, there's still you. But there isn't. So it's more accurate to say, I am consciousness.

I am consciousness. So when you realize at this moment, can you be right here now, can you be conscious that you are conscious? Sounds weird, but that's how it is.

Yes, it's a direct knowing. You can't analyze it or even describe it, but you know that you are. I am.

I am. And this consciousness is described, again, going back to Jesus. He said, I am the light of the world.

That's in the gospel of John. In another gospel, he says, he's talking to his disciples and he says, you are the light of the world. What could that possibly mean?

You are the light of the world. It is the light of consciousness that illuminates the entire world. You are consciousness.

The light is an analogy. Light is an analogy for consciousness. It's the inner light.

So where does it come from? If it's not a byproduct of the physical brain, or there's a relationship, but consciousness pervades the entire universe, consciousness is in this flower. It manifests as this flower.

It manifests as all the things that we see. It manifests as the sun, as the universe, the galaxies, the blades of grass. Okay, we're going now to a deep place that may look a little bit mystical or speculative, but it isn't.

What you can sense as consciousness in yourself could be compared to use the term light that Jesus used. The closest analogy I can find is, there's the sun, and the sun in many ancient civilizations was regarded as divine or God. And there's a reason for that, because the sun emanates almost endlessly life energy.

It emanates light for millions and millions of years. One could almost say eternally. It's not eternal, but relative to our lifespan, it's, we could call it eternal.

The sun continuously emanates light. When you go out, the light that you can sense on your body is sunlight. Now, that light, let's say, continue with this analogy a little bit further.

Imagine a ray of sunlight becomes conscious suddenly that it is a ray of sunlight. The ray of sunlight becomes self-consciousness. Oh, and then it looks around.

It's a strange analogy. And then it looks around and says, oh, look at all that. And then it starts to identify with things.

It forgets who it is. It is a ray of sunlight continuously and eternally connected with the sun, because this ray of sunlight isn't connected to the sun. It's an extension of the sun.

But the ray of sunlight becomes so interested in all the stuff that it loses its realization of its origin. And it identifies with stuff. And stuff becomes very important.

Stuff being the stuff of thoughts, of minds. Physical stuff, yes, but more importantly, mental stuff. It enters a kind of dreamlike world of where the stuff becomes incredibly important.

Every thought goes, oh, oh, oh. And at some point, it suffers so much that it can't stand it anymore. Who am I?

And suddenly, it stops thinking about stuff. And it's going, hmm. Suddenly, there's a spacious stillness, and it begins to feel its connectedness to something very deep and profound.

And it realizes, it remembers or realizes again its true origin. Not a historical fact, but a present fact. It realizes that it is continuously part of the sun.

It is an extension of the sun. So, I'm using sun as an analogy for the source from which all life emanates, which is traditionally called God. We can't really talk about God, because whatever we say is so absurdly limited, it is virtually pointless to even say anything, and yet I'll say something.

Consciousness is the emanation from the transcendent source of all life. Transcendent means it is not a source that can be found in space or time. I can say it's there or it's there.

Where is it? Is it a million light years from here? None of that.

It comes from the transcendent dimension that emanates, the source emanates into this dimension. And as it emanates into this dimension, it gradually creates all the life forms of this dimension. And it gradually, this dimension awakens gradually to its true identity, its origin.

So, the source wants to realize itself in and through this dimension. So, the essence of who you are, which you can, it's not something to believe in. Say, I believe I am consciousness.

I believe it. Not to realize it immediately, indirectly, here and now, because it's the most immediate thing or no thing in you that you're conscious. That is the emanation from source, from God.

So, you are the light of the world. That is your true identity is that. And temporarily, this light of the world, the light emanation from source, temporarily incarnates, pretends to be this, that, and the other.

There's a very brief flash. Every life form, let's say every human on this planet, is like a flash of light, of consciousness on the planet. The lifespan is quite short on a universal scale.

So, every human life is this flash that appears, if you could see it from a bird's eye view, far away, you see the planet and all the conscious, the life forms of humans on the planet, you speed it up. So, if you speed it up, you see the human is born, and then it grows, it runs around, and then it goes, and then another one comes. The one being incarnating, the one light manifesting as.

And if you speed it up even more, all you see is flashes of light appearing continuously, like sparkles of consciousness. And each sparkle that appears for a fraction of a second is a human lifetime. And this human, unless the human awakens to his or her transcendent identity, is completely identified with its external form.

It doesn't know who he or she is. It's lost in the dream of form. It's unaware of the formless dimension, the spaciousness, the origin, the source.

So, this is the realization that you are predominantly the deep I. Your true identity is the I am, the deep I, the spaciousness. I am consciousness.

And you can sense yourself as this presence, this beingness. And once you can sense that and sustain that, although you might initially, you lose it, or you forget it, and you return to it. But more and more, this becomes the foundation for your sense of self.

But the Buddha called it the no-self. Jesus called it, sometimes called it the fullness of life. I want you to have the fullness of life, which is realizing who you are in your essence.

And that's the awakening. Then you live in two dimensions. And this is your destiny.

And ultimately, every human's destiny is to live in the two dimensions of the formless being and the temporary entity. So, this is why you are a human being. Human is the form, not only the physical form, but also the psychological form, the person, the personality with the history.

You're the human. This is the surface level of reality. And yes, you have to deal with it.

You can't just say, I'm no longer interested in the surface level. I'm not doing anything anymore. Because it's all an illusion.

And then, if that is a belief, because you've heard somebody said it, or you've read it in a book, it's all an illusion. I'm not dealing with any stuff anymore. I've had enough.

Then you will be surprised how real the surface dimension, it will really challenge you. Part of the awakening is to be challenged in and by the surface dimension of life, and to confront the challenges of the vertical, without losing yourself in it, without taking it so seriously that there's nothing else for you but that. And then every little drama becomes a big thing for you.

Oh my God, what's happening now? Oh, the continuous fear of the next damn thing happening to you. Oh, and then you go through your life just waiting for the next thing to happen.

That's the surface level of reality. That's where the surface I lives, and has to live, while it's here in this dimension. And it gets challenged, and eventually the challenges drive it deeper, deeper into a realization of its essence identity, which is the deep.

And then the two, you bring the two together, and then the deep I is present while you engage in the surface activities of life, and deal with the stuff that you have to deal with. And you have this connectedness in the background with the source, which means in practical terms that you begin to experience frequently, throughout the day, moments of spacious presence in the midst of situations. Initially, brief moments of spacious presence, where you just, perhaps you just look at something, a sky, or a tree, or a traffic light, but you're just there.

A few seconds perhaps, but moments, and you actually, you begin to invite moments of spaciousness into your life, and there's nobody who is that busy that they cannot have brief moments of spaciousness in their life, their daily life. How often you wait for something every day, there's always little waiting times. The seductive thing, especially with our technology these days, you're never free of the clutter.

It was a challenge even before they came up with these things. But now, whenever humans have to wait for something, immediately they get this thing out of their pocket. They must just be standing at the elevator.

They have to get this thing out. There's nothing really to look at, but they have to look at it. So, the clutter in their minds, this amplifies the tendency that's already been there for hundreds and thousands of years for the mind to be cluttered and to completely lose yourself in the clutter of your mind.

Lost, the human condition could be described, the unawakened human condition could be described as lost in your mind, which is lost in the clutter of your mind. And now we have invented these things that amplify the clutter, give you even more seductive, even more addictive than your own mind. So, you need to be very careful that you give yourself time for spaciousness.

Don't get this thing out unless there really is something to do or look at. Even when it does make strange noises, it's another, yes, somebody has posted something on Facebook, but why would you be interested in this right now? It's more clutter.

Or some newsflash has come in, but do you need to look at this now? Or maybe you receive tweets from countless people and your phone makes a noise, more clutter for the mind. What has he tweeted now?

This time he's gone too far. He's already gone too far 1,000 times, but this time, and then you have to turn on the TV. This is a situation room.

What's happening today? Very serious, very, very serious. And then the interviewer goes, asks the question, politician, what's this?

I'm not saying cut yourself off completely. There's a time for everything. There's a time for reading the news, finding out what's happening without losing yourself in it.

And yet always realizing the very foundation of life, of your life, and realizing all the things of this world may be important or are important. Many things are important, but they're all relatively important. But there's only one thing that is absolutely important, and that is realizing who you are in the depths of your being, who you are in your essence.

Ultimately then realizing the one thing that is of ultimate importance is knowing who you are. And that's why the ancient Greeks already said, know thyself. It's on the temple, Apollo's temple in Delphi in ancient Greece, 500 BC, carved in the temple.

Know thyself. My ancient Greek is not very good. Know thyself.

What does that mean? Know who you are in your essence. And people would go to this temple to receive messages from the transcendent realm.

They asked questions, and there was a priestess sitting there and channeling answers in modern terms, just channeling answers to their questions. What do you do with my life? What should I marry this person or not?

What do I do? How do I get more money? How do I do all this?

But at the end of the temple was the thing that is of absolute importance. Know thyself. The rest is secondary.

Einstein said, I don't know whether this is what he actually meant, but this is how I interpret it. Einstein said, I want to know the mind of God. The rest is details.

I want to know the mind of God. How can you know the mind of God except by knowing your own mind or your own consciousness, which is an emanation, an extension of the mind of the transcendent that we call God? I want to know the mind of God.

The rest, and all this is the rest, your entire life situation, all the drama of your life is the rest. It's details. It's fine.

Yes, you have to deal with it. It's there to challenge you, but realize what is relatively important. That's all this on the surface dimension of life and what is absolutely important, and that is your connectedness with source.

And so bring moments of spaciousness as much as possible into your daily life by stopping, let go of thinking, without loss of consciousness, remaining alert and present. Sometimes it just involves becoming aware of sense perceptions, listening, looking, without labeling anything mentally. Just listen, look, listen, look.

But sense perception is not all. That's the entry point into who you are. Come to your senses and then realize yourself as the consciousness behind the sense perceptions, which you could call the stillness.

Realize the stillness, the alert stillness as a background, the spaciousness in which sense perceptions happen. So there's a twofold awareness. There's an awareness of sense perceptions, even occasional thoughts.

You're not losing yourself in the thought. There's an awareness of that, but more fundamentally, there is an awareness of awareness. That's a weird way of putting it.

There's an awareness that you are aware. That's the source dimension. That's the deep eye.

That's the alert stillness. Then you're aware of awareness or conscious of consciousness, and then you perceive the world from there. At first you practice it when you're, moments when you're not being challenged by life.

There's a moment you're waiting for the elevator. Okay. Instead of getting out your device, you are suddenly, you contemplate and you become aware that you are the awareness behind the sense perception.

Not through words, through direct realization. There's a stillness, an alert stillness. That's beautiful.

And so invite these moments, spaciousness into your life. It could just be a little thing like looking at a flower for 10, 15 seconds and sensing at the same time, the awareness that's looking. So you look in stillness, bring spaciousness into your life more and more.

And then after a while, the moments of spaciousness become a little longer. And then a time comes when the sense of spaciousness doesn't leave you even while you're thinking. Even while you're talking to somebody, you're talking to another human being.

Okay. Maybe you're buying or selling something. How much is that?

Okay. But while you're talking, you're aware of the two dimensions also. One dimension is a human dimension, which is to do with whatever the interaction involves.

But at the same time, you're not losing yourself only in the human dimension, because as you talk to this person and listen to this person and look at this person, you're aware of that still background while you're talking and listening. And that means you're aware of yourself as the presence. But the miracle is, the moment you're aware of the deep I in yourself, you're also aware of the deep I in the other.

That's the beauty of it. And that means you truly recognize the other in their beingness. And you don't get stopped on the level of the person or the personality, which is usually not easy to deal with.

So you acknowledge the personality, but you can sense beyond the personality of the other, and realize that a beingness in the other as one with your own beingness, which isn't your own, we just call it that. And that realization that no matter how different the personality of the other is, in your essence, you are one with the other. In other words, the other is no other.

That is called the realization of oneness. And another term for the realization of oneness is the often misused word, love. That is true love, not egoic love, which says, I want you, I need you, don't you dare leave me.

Not that. Love is recognizing the other as yourself. So the weird thing is, when you love another in the truest sense, you're always just, you're loving yourself.

Because you always see yourself in the other. This is what Jesus said, love your neighbor, neighbor means the other, love your neighbor as yourself. Now, this is an impossible commandment in isolation, because how am I going to love my neighbors?

I hate my neighbor. I knew somebody many years ago, she would go to church every Sunday. And then at some point, many years ago, in the Catholic church, they introduced the custom of, at some point during mass, you would have to shake hands with the people next to you and in front of you and behind you, and wish them peace, peace.

And she said, I'm not going to church anymore. Because I have to shake hands with all the people I hate. So she stopped going to church.

Now, this happens when you take love your neighbor as yourself in isolation does not work. But when the gospels were written, they brought all kinds of fragments together. It only works in conjunction with the dictum, find the kingdom of heaven, the dimension of spaciousness that is within you.

That's all that ultimately matters. Find the dimension of spaciousness within you, then you will love or recognize your neighbor as yourself. Now it makes sense.

But if you take in isolation, if you have not found that inner dimension, you cannot love your neighbor as yourself. It's impossible to do, because he's a jerk. Says the mind, says the personality, how do you want to lie?

I don't like anybody really. As Jean-Paul Sartre, the French philosopher said, hell is other people. That's the ego talking, of course.

So that's love is that recognition. And it's not only love. That is also where compassion arises, originates, where empathy originates, all the things that would transform the world, if more humans were able to live in and from that dimension.

And then even the way in which you deal with the surface reality of your life changes, because you're no longer trapped in it. You're no longer totally confined to it. You deal with it, but you don't take it that seriously anymore, because it will all evaporate like smoke.

Just give it a few, sometimes it's days, sometimes it's weeks or a few years. It'll all evaporate. I love watching old, very early movie clips.

You can sometimes see them on YouTube from city scenes, 1890 New York, Fifth Avenue, London, 1900 London, people walking around the city streets, hurrying, still horses and carriages, or a little bit later, 1910, 1915, first cars. Where are they now? All the drama of their life, nobody even remembers anybody's name.

These hundreds of people running through the streets, now you look at them, what were their names? Nobody remembers. So these are how ephemeral the human form is.

And even if they did remember, maybe if you do something, they will remember your name, but that doesn't make any difference either. You evaporate as this form is very short-lived. So yes, seeing how importance, relative importance, absolute importance.

We've been addressing tonight the secret of life for humans at their present evolutionary stage, and what we are witnessing is a shift to a different level of consciousness for humanity, and this is why we are going through critical times. Huge shifts only happen when huge challenges happen. Again, we see from once and before, challenges coinciding with huge transformations.

Without the challenge, no transformation. There are huge collective challenges coming towards us, and that's fine. And that can become, will eventually become a trigger for a collective transformation of consciousness.

Whether or not we need to experience a regression, it's possible through collective disasters. We may have to go through that. It's fine.

There's nothing wrong with that. The one being that continuously incarnates, the light of consciousness is gradually flowering in this dimension and growing in this dimension. Every setback is part of the journey.

Every obstacle is an essential part of the journey. What seems to be in the way often turns out to be the way. It becomes the opening.

So it's a wonderful adventure to be involved in this, especially if you realize that in addition to a person, in addition to personal meaning to your life, there's a deeper and more important transcendent meaning to your life, far more important than whatever you may be doing as a person, but they're connected. So this is how it is. And with this, I leave you and wish you wonderful journey more deeply into the essence of who you are.

More Enlightened Teachings from Eckhart Tolle. Thank you for listening.

Eckhart Tolle Everything Has A Soul [cef9e6e7-2fdf-46de-b893-e419330837d7]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:54)

Everything has a soul. In this podcast, Eckhart talks about an inspiring trip he took to Alaska. He describes the awe he felt on a tour through a majestic forest.

Eckhart explains at one point he lagged behind his guided tour group so he could feel the sacredness of the nature around him. He says we have lost touch with a form of knowing which transcends conceptual learning. He believes beyond our five senses there is a more profound form of knowing that we must revive.

Eckhart explains ancient people sense the aliveness of the world around them. He says when we define our existence only through mental concepts, sacredness is lost. Eckhart believes for the sake of the planet and ourselves, we need to realize that everything is alive.

Everything has a soul.

[Speaker 1] (0:57 - 37:07)

If I had sufficient time, I would experience the forest alone, non-conceptually, and walk through it. Just being there as the perceiving presence and sense it deeply, connect with it at a deep level, free of concepts. Just pure experiencing of the not only individual life forms, but the totality of that energy field.

And then, at the end of that walk or hike, if somebody had asked me what have you learned about the forest, I would have to say nothing. I haven't learned anything, not conceptually. I have experienced it deeply, but conceptually I don't know anymore about it.

But I knew it, I was able to know the forest in a different way, because that is also a kind of knowing. And then, perhaps the next day, if I had still been there, would have asked the guide for a tour of the forest with explanations and learnings. And on the third day, I would go through the forest again and have both dimensions.

I know something about it, but I'm not trapped in my conceptual knowledge. I'm also able to step out of my conceptual knowledge and know the forest more deeply than I could ever know it through concepts. And that is the balance between the two modalities of knowing.

Everybody in this world is familiar with the first modality of knowing, that's all we know. But we lost knowledge of the other modality of knowing. We don't, or very few humans, have access to it.

But in the past, all over the world, humans had that, had access to that way of knowing. Because in all indigenous cultures, whether it's in South America or North America or Polynesia or Australia or Asia, China, Taoism, a very deep empathy with the natural world and the energies behind the natural world. I mean, also in ancient Europe, also that deep connectedness with nature, the Druids, the ancient tribes in England, the Germanic tribes and so on, and the Romans and the Greeks, they all had it.

So with reference to indigenous cultures, the anthropologists call it animism, animism from animus, the soul, that everything has a soul. Now, how is it that all over the world, different cultures came to the same conclusion or had the same belief? How is that possible?

Well, the answer is simple. It wasn't a belief. It wasn't a mental thing.

They all had the ability to sense that. So it was sensing a reality underlying sensory perceptions. There's more to the world than sensory perception, what is accessible to us through sensory perception.

And then the conceptual mind became more and more developed in humans. And through this overdevelopment of the conceptual mind, they gradually lost the ability to sense the aliveness in the environment and especially in the natural world through excessive conceptualization. And through excessive conceptualization, also the ego grew stronger and stronger because the ego is a conceptual sense of self.

So you reduce the world to mental concepts. And not only the world, you reduce yourself to a mental concept. And that becomes a mental image that you live with.

You call it me. And so that was the enormous price we had to pay, so to speak, for our gain in scientific knowledge, technology, and so on. We gained enormous knowledge there and we lost something equally enormous.

And then, of course, as a result of excessive or extreme conceptualization, then in the 19th century, we began to develop seriously science and industry. An industrial revolution happened in England. Darwin came along and discovered, well, he wasn't, other people also discovered it even before him, but he became famous, as everybody knows, through the discovery of the evolution of species.

Obviously, it wasn't quite a realization that there has been, there is an evolution, there has been an evolution. But the unfortunate thing is that the evolution is regarded as a random process. According to this theory, there is no intelligence behind it, and not even a purpose, except perhaps survival of the fittest.

So there's no, as the theory of evolution came and began to come into serious conflict with, obviously, with Christianity and et cetera, and gradually that seeped into the collective consciousness or unconsciousness, and even humans who had never even heard of Darwin became affected by this. It seeped into the main, into the culture, the belief that the universe actually is meaningless. It doesn't make sense because it's a random coming together of molecules and atoms, and it is devoid of any kind of purpose.

And that seeped into the consciousness of humans, even though humans had never heard of the theory of evolution, and that became gradually part of the mainstream belief system and culture, and still to this day, many scientists, but not all, have this belief that the material world is all there is, and that all evolutionary processes are random events. And so the entire universe that we see is a random coming together of atoms and molecules, the beauty we see, or the beauty we create, everything is meaningless according to that. Before we had this idea that the belief, a Christian story, the story, biblical story of creation, God created, it's less a kind of architect, created gradually the world, and then the idea of God gradually disappeared, and when Nietzsche discovered in the 19th century when he was writing his famous realization that he called God is dead, I don't think he referred to the actual God, because that would not be possible, but to humans, God would become dead. And God, meaning there is a greater, deeper, higher intelligence behind creation.

And then we came into conflict with nature, and we started to destroy nature, because we lost the ability to sense the sacredness of nature, which all the ancient cultures had, and because we could no longer sense the aliveness of it, and then we had the belief that it's all meaningless anyway, it's all random. Now there are many scientists, other scientists that say, well, there isn't enough time for this universe to have come into existence as an orderly universe, a cosmos, cosmos means order as opposed to chaos, there were just even billions of years would not be enough time for randomly these things coming together as they are. There's a famous example of the monkey and the typewriter, it goes back to the time when people used typewriters, but nowadays you would use a monkey on the keyboard, so if you, according to this, if you give the monkey enough time, the monkey of course randomly will type in numbers on the keyboard, if you give the monkey enough time, eventually the monkey will come up with one of the works of Shakespeare. Now how long would that take? And probably billions of years, probably even that would take more than the entire lifespan of the universe as we know it.

I've heard another slightly funny, similar story, somebody's inviting some people for a sumptuous, fantastic dinner, beautifully cooked and prepared, and they enjoy this fantastic dinner, best ingredients, and at the dinner they are asking, is there a chef? Does a chef exist? The cook, is there a cook?

Do you understand? It's an absurd question, because obviously there is a chef, you had this wonderful dinner, there must be a chef, but you are questioning it, you can't, I don't believe there is a chef, because I can't see him, he's probably gone home. The chef has retired, and the dinner has come into existence, into existence randomly, it cooked itself.

So it is not necessary for us to believe that the ancient humans, indigenous people, ancient people throughout the world, we do not need to believe the same thing that they believed, or they didn't just believe it, they sensed it. It's not for us to persuade, convince ourselves that there is an intelligence behind all that, an organizing principle, a power, a spirit presence that pervades the universe, it's not a belief, the question is, are we able to regain the ability to sense that? That is the question, not changing our belief system, it's nothing to do with belief, in fact every belief is a hindrance, because it's a concept.

Are we able to regain this ability to sense the aliveness that pervades the universe, throughout the universe? Not only the ancient indigenous culture spoke of it, later on also the great religions of the world came to that realization, in Hinduism and in Taoism in China especially, they had a very deep ability to sense that which is hidden, the energy that is hidden behind our sense perception and the spirit presence. This is true religion, is the ability to sense the ultimate sacredness of the universe which includes you, to sense that.

True religion isn't really a conceptual belief system that comes in later or it comes when humans perhaps lose the ability, then religion becomes conceptualized and it becomes in many cases when you lose the ability to sense that, when you lose that completely and then you still have a religion, then your religion has become an ideology. It then has become an ideology which is mental constructs and not only that, you identify with those mental constructs, in other words they become incorporated into your egoic sense of identity and so religions have in many cases become incorporated into the human ego and become corrupted because originally they originated from the deep realizations and then gradually in many cases, not in all cases, it doesn't apply to every human being, but in roughly speaking it's become lost and become replaced with mental concepts. In Christianity if you say I believe that this and this and this happened, then you are saved. I don't think that's true because if you, it just means I believe that the story that somebody's telling me is correct.

It's a story I have no way of verifying whether it's correct or not, but I believe it's correct and therefore I'm saved. Of course throughout history many Christians said they believed that and very obviously they were not saved because quite often they did dreadful things. But perhaps there have always been some individuals who were able to go deeper in every religion including Christianity and usually it's not been the people who were in the hierarchy, high up in the hierarchy of the establishment, established churches.

Those humans, I don't know how many of them who were still able to sense the deeper truth that is the core of all religions, they tended to be the humble and simple people who had a low place in the hierarchy of the established churches and religious structures, simple monks and nuns quite often. So we need to dwell on this for a little longer. I was going to have a question and answer session here but whether or not this will happen I don't know yet because I don't know how much more I will be saying now.

There's a little bit more I need to add and as soon as I run out of things to say we'll have questions. This could be tomorrow. I have here, I want to just read you just a few lines from the Tao Te Ching.

If those of you who haven't read the Tao Te Ching, the great book, Chinese book written approximately 2,500 years ago, 500 B.C., at approximately the same time that the Buddha lived but no connection. There are many, many translations. I have about seven or eight and you should probably read at least two or three translations and compare them.

The few lines which I just want to read to you, just an illustration of what we've been talking about. This is translated by Stephen Mitchell which is a good translation. Another good translation is by Jane English.

There are many others. Some of them are also quite good. The word used to describe that spirit presence that underlies the universe is the Tao is the word used here.

The Chinese spirituality uses the term the Tao. This book speaks of the Tao, the Tao Te Ching. The really translated Tao Te Ching, the real translation is the power of the Tao.

Sometimes they say it's the virtue of the Tao but it's not. It's the power of now. And it says at the beginning of the very book, in the first line, it says you can't really talk about the Tao.

The Tao that can be told is not the eternal Tao. In some translations it's not the real Tao. The name that can be named is not the eternal name.

The unnameable is the eternally real. And then of course he starts talking, continues talking about it and then it becomes a book. So first it says you can't talk about it and then he talks about it.

And somehow it works. All the words are just pointers. They're not explanations.

There's nothing to believe in. They're just pointers. Either they work for you or they don't as pointers, as signposts.

So just a few lines, just an illustration of what we've just been talking about. There was something formless and perfect before the universe was born. It is serene, empty, solitary, unchanging, infinite, eternally present.

It is the mother of the universe. For lack of a better name, I call it the Tao. It flows through all things.

And now the translator has a little footnote and points to a quote by a scientist, Albert Einstein, which happens to be my favorite quote by Einstein who has said many wonderful things. And he mentioned it in the back of the book. This was Einstein's answer when somebody asked him whether he was religious.

And so he said, he starts by saying, the scientist's religious feeling, he described it as the scientist's religious feeling is like this. What he really means is my religious feeling. But he says the scientist, I don't believe most scientists have that religious feeling that he's talking about.

He's really talking about himself, his religious feeling. So that's how I'm going to read it now. My religious feeling takes the form of a rapturous amazement at the harmony of natural law, which reveals an intelligence of such superiority that in comparison with it, all the systematic thinking of human beings is an utterly insignificant reflection.

This feeling is the guiding principle of my life and work. Now this means that I believe that he had to some extent the ability still to sense that most humans had lost. He had the ability to sense that.

And he was very much had a connectedness with being more than a normal regular scientist, which was very much totally immersed in mental concepts. He developed very slowly as a child, too. He learned to speak at quite a late age.

And when he was around four years old, he wasn't just didn't speak very much. His conceptual mind was not that active. And he continued to have this ability to completely switch off when he went out for walks in nature.

And I read somewhere that the theory of relativity actually came to him when he was not thinking of his actually lying in his bathtub. One more quote, and this is from the Upanishads, another great, well, this is a selection of some of the Upanishads. There's over 100 Upanishads, the ancient scriptures of Hinduism.

Some go back, the oldest ones go back 800 years B.C., 2800 years, and then over a long time span. This book I've had for probably 40 years. It's a little paperback.

The pages are beginning to turn yellow. That's how old I am. And I have to tell you something before I read this about, I love books, not only for the content, but also for their simple presence.

Now, this is not an expensive book. It's a simple paperback. But I've had it for so long, and I can, many of my books I can identify by smell.

I have this habit since childhood. I've always smelled books and loved handling them. They're little, they're little beings.

In Hinduism, that spirit presence that underlies the universe is called Brahman. Brahman is, has no form. Brahman is the intelligence that underlies all manifestation and pervades the universe.

When you realize Brahman within yourself, that's called Atman. Atman is the divinity within you, that is the pure consciousness that you are, is Atman. That spirit presence that pervades the universe within you can be realized.

The essence of it is the consciousness that you are. There's a little line here in one of the Upanishads that says, we should consider that in the inner world, Brahman is consciousness, and that's Atman. And we should consider that in the outer world, and this is interesting, it says in the outer world, Brahman is space.

Now, that's interesting for a moment. Let's see if we consider that possibility that space is spirit presence. In the inner realm, it's the inner space of consciousness.

These are just little pointers, nothing to believe in. Either they work for you as pointers, or they don't. It's space is spirit presence.

And when you become present, thinking subsides, awareness remains, then you may be able to sense that this presence that is within you is also without, meaning outside. There's a presence that is both within and without. So you can sense when you become present within, you can sense that there is a presence that pervades the universe, even in this room.

So, in theistic terms, you could say that presence, what we describe as presence, that spiritual presence, is the presence of God. One could almost say this beautiful presence is a state of, an analogy one could use, is in a state of acute listening. But it's not really listening, we just use listening as an analogy.

It's as if you were listening for a distant sound that requires a high degree of alertness, but there is no sound. And what remains is the listening itself. But what is the listening in this analogy?

The listening is pure presence, pure consciousness, because there's nothing to listen to if there's silence. So the listening really is the consciousness that's behind the listening. And this is, I believe, why Jesus had a few parables about waiting.

You're waiting, somebody's waiting for the return of the master. So he's waiting, the master could come at any moment, and the servant is waiting, and has to stay awake and listen, because the master could come at any time. This is interpreted in a certain way in conventional Christianity, but I believe that it is an analogy, and it points towards a certain state of consciousness.

And that state of consciousness is a state of wakefulness, spiritual wakefulness. And it actually, somewhere in the Gospels, Jesus says, and what I say to you, I say to all, stay awake. Stay awake.

So there are parables about staying awake, and in being in an attitude as if you were in an attitude of alert listening. When you're in that attitude, and then you go out into nature, then you begin to be able to sense what the ancients were able to sense, the presence that is there beyond the outer manifestations. And this is just a little, simple, very simple little story about a father and a son having a conversation, and the father says, bring me a fruit from this banyan tree.

And the son comes and says, here it is, father, break it. It is broken, sir. He calls his father sir.

In ancient cultures, you show great respect towards your parents. So it is broken, sir. What do you see in it?

Very small seeds, sir. Break one of them, my son. It is broken, sir.

What do you see in it? Nothing at all, sir. Then his father spoke to him, my son, from the very essence in the seed, which you cannot see, comes in truth, this vast banyan tree.

Believe me, my son, an invisible and subtle essence is the spirit of the whole universe. That is reality. That is Atman.

Thou art that. You are that. Tat tvam asi in Sanskrit.

Thou art that. You are that. So that spirit presence is not just out there.

It is the essence of who you are, of what you are. So it's regaining this, and then this is the only way we can go beyond the meaninglessness of our civilization that will destroy it, unless a sufficient number of humans are able to go deeper and reconnect with the transcendent dimension. When you have lost something, and then you find it again, you regain it, you regain it at a deeper level.

For example, the ancient cultures, they lived more in harmony with nature. Then we lost that because we couldn't sense the aliveness and sacredness of nature anymore. And now the possibility arises of regaining that.

But there will be an added dimension to it, because for them, that was their natural state of connectedness. Before the human ego developed, human beings probably, most likely, lived in a less problematic state than humans are now, because the ego creates an enormous amount of dysfunction and suffering. So there was a time when humans lived in natural connectedness with beings still, in the same way that plants and animals, they are naturally connected with being.

And humans then, they lost that. They had it before, and that most likely explains, in all cultures, you have the myth of ancient times, the so-called golden age, when there was happiness and harmony on the planet. Many ancient cultures have the same mythological tales of the golden age.

Even the paradise in the Bible could be interpreted in that way, when humans lived in natural connectedness. And then they began to develop the ability to think, which was an enormous, enormous event. Perhaps that is symbolized in the Bible by eating of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, to be able to divide and say, this is that, that is that.

So it could point to the beginning of thinking. The thinking function was the end of paradise, in the same way that the ancient mythological tale from ancient Greece of a young man called Narcissus. And this mythological story contains deep wisdom, because it points to the arising of the human ego, which is to have an image that you carry of yourself, and you have a relationship with it, and it makes you unhappy.

And so that's enormous wisdom contained there in those tales. The myth of the golden age, natural connectedness with being was then lost, but it can be regained. When we regain it, we are then consciously connected to the being dimension, instead of you're unconsciously connected because you don't know anything else.

You've never not had it. If you have something, if you have something in your life that you were born with, a beautiful thing, you've never not had it. Yes, it's fine, you live with it, but if you then lost it, and then regained it, found it again, you would appreciate it at a much deeper level.

So there is an added dimension when you lose something, and then you regain it. You regain it at a deeper level. As we regain this connectedness with being that humans lost a long time ago, before the arising of ego, then we regain it as ego begins to be transcended.

We are able to regain that connectedness, but now being fully conscious of it, of your connectedness with it.

Eckhart Tolle Expressing Our Deeper Purpose [0d9ebdff-7bea-44bc-9c73-8a625527ca2e]

[Speaker 2] (0:01 - 0:40)

Expressing our deeper purpose. In this episode, Eckhart discusses our deeper purpose. He emphasizes how important it is for humans to be connected to the kind of higher intelligence that comes from presence.

While our careers matter, he says what we do in our work life is secondary to our state of consciousness. He explains there's a vast intelligence underlying the world that we perceive with our senses and our job is to connect to it. Eckhart believes we are all manifestations of the one great consciousness emanating like rays of sunlight.

[Speaker 1] (0:42 - 31:35)

So when your attention is in the present moment, then there are many moments when you're not actively doing something. You're just sitting somewhere or standing somewhere or walking. That is a more kind of passive state of presence.

And that's very important too. Are you the observing presence at this moment as you're sitting on the plane, looking out of the window or looking at the aisle if you don't have a window seat and you're sitting there. Now you might say, well, this environment on the plane, maybe you don't have a window seat.

It's not particularly inspiring. And after you've looked at it for a few minutes, you say, okay, what else is there to look at? Nothing.

And then you might get drift off into something else. So it's important to realize there's not just present moment awareness. It's not just the awareness of what is around you.

It is more fundamentally the awareness of yourself in that moment. So it doesn't, your environment does not need to be particularly interesting. And if it's not interesting, like as it would be if you're going out into nature, there's wonders all around you.

But if it's not particularly interesting, like you're trapped on, you're sitting on a plane or on a bus or whatever, or at the airport, then direct your attention to yourself. This is the essential part. The deeper part of being present is to be consciously, to realize that you are, not to realize who you are, but to realize that you are.

And that is the sense of beingness or presence, present within. When you are conscious of your surroundings, you're present without. Then being conscious of yourself as the presence being present within, one could say.

Both should be operating really simultaneously. But there may be times when you may close your eyes and then you can sense very strongly that you are. In other words, I am.

Not that you are anything, this or that, just I am. That's the key. That's what God called himself, herself, itself, the I am.

And as I'm speaking about this now, the important question is, do you realize at this moment what it is that I'm talking about? Thinking has nothing to do with it. If you think you need to understand what I'm saying, you're wrong.

You cannot understand it. It's nothing conceptual. Can you sense the beingness of you, the presence, here and now, which you cannot define in any way, but there's a silent power, one could say, at the center of your being, there's a silent power.

That's one way of putting it. It's very still, but it's alive. So the question, who am I, has two answers.

The first answer, who am I, is I'm a man or a woman, and I'm of such and such age, such and such a race, such and such profession, such and such physical condition. All those things describe who you are on that level. So when you ask people that question, this is what they refer to as I.

Who am I? Well, obviously, I'm a so-and-so old, I'm an old white male, in my case. That's my form identity, as people would call me nowadays.

Maybe in the past, they might have said a wise old man, but now I'm an old white male. It doesn't sound very good. But what can you do?

So that's one answer, and you have different answers, of course, for that. That's who you are. But the second answer, who you are, comes from a deeper place.

So if I ask you again then, who are you, but from the deeper place, beyond all the things that you just told me about who you are, gender, et cetera, et cetera, age, et cetera, who are you? Now, the second answer to the question, it can come through words, but that's not the real answer. You could say I am the consciousness, and that is true, but that's still a conceptual answer.

The real answer is silence, and in the silence or stillness, there is a realization of being. So that is the depth's dimension, the deep I. You are both, but the depth's dimension is a more fundamental.

The only real thing is that. The rest is an insubstantial movement of a dreamlike movement of fluctuating forms. Another Buddhist monk I talked to, I must have spoken to many Buddhist monks.

And he said, there are no people. What do you mean? He said, no, there are no people.

There are only karmic formations. So now you know what you are. You are a karmic formation.

That would be the personality, as I call it, with all its attributes. And of course, who you are on that level is determined by the past. You have come, even your body is determined.

It goes back hundreds of thousands or a million years of people reproducing bodies, one body after another, after another. And finally, you appear briefly, and then you disappear. And then there's your whole past, cultural past, genetic past, past lives, whatever.

All that makes up who you are. That's what he meant, karmic formation. That's your whole karma.

Karma is the, karma literally means action, but karma is the conditioning that you identify with as yourself. And that is the unconscious state. Karma gets perpetuated in the unconscious state.

So the same conditions you perpetuate in your lifetime, and you transmit it to your children, and you infect other people with your karma, people who are around you. The moment you wake up and become aware of your conditioning, which is a person with its characteristics and idiosyncrasies and all the things that make up the person, the moment you become aware of yourself as an ultimately not really being the person, but the awareness that's behind the person, you come to the end of karma in the traditional sense of perpetuation of the stream of unconsciousness, the wheel, the wheel, that then a different dimension enters through that awakening. The karma ends in the present moment when you are able to respond to situations instead of react to situations. Because the way in which you react or respond to a situation is usually determined by the conditioning of your mind, your mental or emotional conditioning.

So what happens or is much more important in your life, people think things that happen to me determine my life, but they're ultimately not true. The way in which you respond to what happens to you determines how you experience your life. So not so much what happens, but how you respond or react to what happens that determined your life experience.

It also determines what happens next, how you deal with the present moment. In the unconscious state, you react to life situations, and thereby usually it means any challenge, you usually make it worse and you amplify it through your reaction. That is the case with human beings when you have a confrontation with another human being.

It's the case with any challenge that anything that happens to you in your life, you contract an illness and then you react, oh my God, it's horrible. Your psychological suffering is often far worse than the physical suffering. And then you get old, oh my God.

For many people, psychologically, they suffer more than physically. So we can use the two words, react, respond. The way I use them is react means it's a karmically determined reaction.

You react out of the conditioning of your mental emotional field. Response implies that you are present, and your action is no longer determined by the mental emotional conditioning of the person. There is a higher intelligence, one could say, I call it wisdom.

But in other words, there's a high intelligence that can then operate in your daily life. A higher intelligence, which we could call wisdom. So it's not the conventional intelligence that you can measure in IQ tests.

That's a very limited version of intelligence. There's a higher intelligence that comes in through presence that deals more intelligently with any situation that arises in your life. That's the only possible way of dealing intelligently is by dealing with the situation through presence.

Especially important, of course, in human relationships, because there's so much unconsciousness that happens in the interaction between human beings, between two human beings, and larger numbers of human beings, and then groups of your collectives of your millions of human beings here, and another million there and there. You can see when you look at politics and affairs, and so what's happening in the world, there's very little intelligence, the way they deal with things. And you would be, you're amazed.

How can they be so short-sighted and ultimately have to use a simple word, stupid. But these people have degrees, they have university degrees. How can they be so stupid?

Well, they only activated a very limited version of intelligence that you can measure in IQ tests. That's not enough. I'm sorry, I don't want to offend anybody who has a very high IQ.

And, or is a member of this, there's an organization called Mensa, I believe. So if you have a very IQ, you can be a member of that. And that's good for your identity, of course.

So I don't want to take anything away from you. But there is, that is what real intelligence, it's a, yes, it's a form of intelligence, but it's a relatively low form of intelligence. A much higher intelligence comes in through presence, and that is lacking in the world.

There are, occasionally you see, very rarely you see a politician, actually you can see, oh, this person has some real intelligence and insights. And it's usually not the people who are running things. It's, if it's a politician, it's usually somebody who's been pushed to the periphery of politics.

And from there, he or she comments on the stupidity of what's happening in the world. I've observed it. It's in different countries, similar phenomenon.

There are a few people here and there who can see clearly where we are going and what we're doing, and it's crazy. There is a lack of this higher intelligence that is beyond the egoic mind. And at the moment, it doesn't look good because we are going, oh, no.

I was going to use that weird expression about the hand basket again. No. No.

No. No. No.

No. No. No.

Now, it's important when you look at the state of the world, it's important that you do not enter a reactive mode because that will draw you into unconsciousness. If you watch too much television or current affairs, you will be drawn into, most likely, unconsciousness unless you watch it as an anthropological study of how misguided humanity can be. So you need to stay present while you look at all this and see what's happening.

Question may arise, shouldn't I be doing something to, well, there may be something you can do. Bring some sanity into this world, perhaps through saying something, speaking out, pointing out something, not creating enemies. If you see people are deluded in what they say or do, don't make them into enemies and attack them and say, you are totally crazy.

It may be that what they do may be and probably is dysfunctional and stupid, or the opinions they hold may be extremely misguided and irrational. So you can address the opinions that they hold, their mental positions, and point out the irrationality and so on without making the people who hold their opinion into enemies. So don't equate the mental positions that people hold with who they essentially are.

You can speak out, maybe you can post something on one of the many platforms that are available, something that is sane rather than insane. Perhaps you can post something that points out the insanity of it all. So some people do that, so that's a good thing.

No, because some people may suddenly say, oh yes, that's true. So higher intelligence comes in and that can then deal with situations and that's the end of karma. What humanity is doing now collectively is karma playing itself out, the movement of unconsciousness.

And so with reference to individuals, we talked about responsibility. Can you hold a person responsible for what they do if they are unconscious, if they are in the grip of their mental, emotional conditioning? That is part, that's their karma.

Can you hold a karmic formation person? Can you hold a karmic formation responsible for what they do? Not really.

So there's a deep wisdom in what Jesus said, forgive them for they know not what they do. Forgiveness means the realization that they are not responsible, they cannot do otherwise. But we also, and this also applies to the collective, what all the politicians are doing and so on.

They don't know any better. They are in the grip of egoic reactivity and short-sightedness that comes with it and so on. But as is the case with individuals, although they may not be and are not, cannot be held responsible, and yet they have to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness.

This is how humans ultimately awaken. They are not responsible, they still have to create suffering for themselves and others. And through the suffering that's created by the unconsciousness, an awakening happens.

So in other words, the ego is necessary for the awakening to happen. The ego ultimately self-destructs. It has built into it a self-destruct function.

That is ultimate wisdom. So that also applies to the collective. Already, if you look at the 20th century, the wars that happened and the internal conflict in countries that happens, the countless millions upon millions killed by other humans, what they did, the terrible suffering, this is all the movement of unconsciousness.

They don't know what they do. And then humanity suffers and suffers and suffers. Through the suffering, gradually an awakening happens.

So the ego's dysfunction creates suffering, and ultimately the suffering acts as an awakener. It's just a question of how much longer is the suffering going to go? And what's the next stage, you may ask, on the scale of collective suffering?

I don't know, but it doesn't look good at the moment. But you are here to represent, to embody the higher intelligence. I mean, hopefully you don't make that into a mental concept.

I embody the higher intelligence. It is true, but it should not become a mental concept that you identify with. And so the sanity, you embody the sanity in a world that is still predominantly, one has to say, insane in many ways.

Not all of it is insane, but a lot of it, some important parts are insane. So let's then see what the, whatever comes is maybe bad from a lower perspective, doesn't look good. But ultimately, everything happens in the service of the evolution of consciousness, even in your own life.

And if it applies in your own life, it also applies to the collective of humanity. So don't allow yourself to get drawn into these dysfunctional states that are associated with ego. For example, fear and anxiety.

And the other would be anger or despair. Or another very dangerous and dysfunctional state is called nihilism or nihilism, which is the sense that it's all completely pointless. One could slip into that.

There are many millions of humans these days who are in a nihilistic state where the whole world does not make sense and everything is pointless. Whatever I do is pointless. They see things are not going well in the world.

What's the point of it all? It's all meaningless. Nihilism is particularly started in the 19th century, when the notion that there is a purpose disappeared when Darwin discovered the fact of evolution, but unfortunately, the misinterpretation was that evolution is entirely random.

There is absolutely no guiding intelligence behind it at all. It's a random process. By chance, atoms and molecules come together and after billions of years, we appear.

And Beethoven's Ninth Symphony suddenly appears out of nowhere through the accidental coming together of atoms and molecules. It's all meaningless, absolutely meaningless. As the Old Testament prophet said in the book of Ecclesiastes, vanity of vanities, all is vanity.

Vanity, the old meaning of the word is pointlessness. It's all pointless. That book almost got into the Bible.

I don't know how, but it's wonderful literature, but not particularly inspiring, but great to read. So that's nihilism, the idea that there's no purpose behind this, nothing behind the phenomena that we see, there's no deeper intelligence. That's probably what Nietzsche was talking about when he talked in the 19th century, God is dead, that insight.

And then he wrote about what that means, what repercussions it have. And he saw that at an early stage. He saw that it would result in widespread nihilism.

So the dysfunctional states then, fear, anxiety, anger, nihilism. That means there's still, you don't see things clearly and deeply enough, and you haven't gone deep enough within yourself, then you experience a fear, you experience anxiety and all those things. It's strange that I've observed in this country and some other countries, the reaction to the pandemic, one could almost divide the collective reaction into two camps.

One camp says, this is so very, really dangerous. We need to be very, very careful and we're anxious and fearful as to, oh, this is, of course it is dangerous, but fearful. The other camp says, you're overblowing the whole thing, it's an overreaction.

We should, all these things, they just want to control us, all these things, be brave, just step out, go outside. All this is, the mandates are pointless and controlling and so you have this, and they get angry about it. Ah, the others are fearful, oh.

And then the two camps dislike each other very much. And the fearful ones then get angry on top because the others are not fearful, they're angry and then they're angry with them. It's.

So you represent, you embody the sanity in this world. You have to, and it's a challenge, but that is the purpose of your life. Talking about nihilism, that's the opposite, is the realization of how important you are, not conceptually, don't go there, how important your consciousness is in this world.

How important it is for this world, for human beings to be sane and connected to the deeper or higher intelligence in this world. That is your purpose in life, no matter, that's your deeper purpose. Your outer purpose is whatever you do in your work situation, in your life situation, it matters to some extent, but it does not matter absolutely.

It matters, but not absolutely. There's only one thing that matters absolutely, and that is your state of consciousness, your connectedness with being, embodying presence. So in other words, what you do is secondary, but how you do what you do is primary.

The how refers to the state of consciousness that underlies what you do. The what is secondary, the how is primary. So there is an intelligence, a vast intelligence that underlies the phenomenal world that we perceive with our senses.

Even Einstein said that very strongly. He could sense that very strongly. I don't have the actual quote in my head, I wish I did, but he said he was aware of that, he acknowledged that.

That's why he had a connectedness with it, and why deep inspiration came to him. He was a great thinker, but the realizations of theory and relativity, they came to him, that came to him. So there is a vast intelligence underneath it all that is the intelligence that operates in you.

There's only one, not many. Not my consciousness or your consciousness. We are manifestations of the one consciousness, like rays of sunlight.

And with that, let's just have a brief silence, stillness.

[Speaker 4] (0:00 - 0:29)

We're going to do a little something different in the feed today. We're sharing another episode of a podcast called Real Good by US Bank. Every season, Real Good seeks to tell stories of people putting in the work.

It's a podcast that shows us that while the world is an imperfect place, there are people out there trying to make it better. They've put out four really great seasons and they've just started their fifth. You're about to hear a clip from the fifth season.

If you like what you heard, go listen and subscribe to Real Good wherever you get your podcasts.

[Speaker 3] (0:31 - 1:55)

This is Real Good by US Bank, a podcast about helpers. I'm Faith Saley. Eric Toda is a master marketer, brand visionary, and strong supporter of the Asian American and Pacific Islander community.

Professionally, Eric is the global head of social marketing and executive director of Meta Prosper, both at Facebook's parent company, Meta. Yet in the years following a slate of AAPI-directed violent crimes, Eric's grown a reputation as a vocal advocate for his community, both in business and broader society. Eric doesn't shy away from tough issues or hard talk.

He shared stories of violence directed at his grandfather, discrimination he grew up with in Northern California, and the moment that propelled him into public advocacy. He also spoke with us about the world he wants to leave for his children. But before we tackle the future, we're going to take a trip to the past.

We begin the conversation with a topic that can be daunting for anyone, parental expectations. All right, Eric, I just want to start out by getting the hard stuff out of the way. We're going to we're going to go a little dark, and I would like you to explain how you disappointed your mother because I've heard you say that she wanted you to be an optometrist.

Go.

[Speaker 1] (1:56 - 4:06)

Man, she really did. She really did. This will actually be the first time I ever speak about this.

And this piece of information is the first time it'll ever be truly, truly public. I'm actually blind in the left eye. Really?

Yeah. So, Faith, you know, you did your research on me. This is one thing you didn't know.

I'm blind, legally blind in the left eye. When I was five years old, I was a bit rambunctious of a child. And I wasn't listening to my mother when she was telling me to not go into, you know, some bushes in the middle of January where there was just literally just sticks.

It was like like like little spears everywhere. And unfortunately, unfortunately, one of those little spears hit me in the eye and I lost my vision. And so at a very early age, I had to deal with a little bit of, you know, a little bit of, you know, an adjustment, only having one eye.

And I saw a ton of optometrists during the time, a ton of ophthalmologists during that time. And my uncle was actually one of our optometrists. And my mother saw that profession as so honorable because of how they were helping me and how they were supporting me.

And so, you know, when when my cousin started to go down the path of being an optometrist, she really wanted me to be an optometrist as well. She really wanted me to. She said that I could help relate to kids like me.

She thought that I could, you know, show empathy to kids that didn't listen to their mothers, all that stuff. And so, yes, that, you know, I've. You know, when I didn't become an optometrist, my mother was certainly disappointed.

I haven't asked her how she feels now. Something tells me that maybe she would still want me to be an optometrist. I don't know.

There's still time. Hey, there's there's always time. There's always time.

[Speaker 3] (4:06 - 4:08)

As long as you're a global optometrist.

[Speaker 1] (4:09 - 4:21)

Yeah. You know what? Like, it doesn't matter if I'm on TV.

I know that she wants she really wanted me to be an optometrist. So, yes, I she was certainly disappointed when I chose another path, for sure.

[Speaker 3] (4:22 - 4:52)

So I didn't. So thank you for sharing that, because I didn't realize that's where it was going to go, because I have heard you kind of casually mentioned your mom wanted you to be an optometrist in the context of talking about some stereotypical expectations of Asian-American parents, which is and I'm quoting you, which is a lot of a lot of parents want their kids to be doctors and lawyers. Right.

I did not see it veering in that rather heartwarming.

[Speaker 1] (4:52 - 5:59)

Oh, I wanted to give you something that, you know, you didn't have yet. I mean, here's the thing. There's still certainly that pressure.

Right. I think my mother being an immigrant from the Philippines, you know, the the level of success to her is postgraduate degrees. Doesn't matter what they are, just postgraduate degrees.

So when I when I decided to be an optometrist, she's like, great, then you'll be an attorney. And and and I took the LSAT, you know, I got a law school, all that good stuff. Right.

And so, you know, and obviously I didn't go. But, you know, even after that, she's like, well. You're going to get your MBA, right.

And I was like, what is it? What is with this? So so again, there's certainly still that aspect of it, for sure.

There's always been that pressure. There's always been, you know, that undercurrent of the the immigrant mindset expectation of what success looks like to what the reality looks like of what success is actually redefined in America now. And so, yeah, I mean, you're not wrong.

I just wanted to give you something a little different.

[Speaker 3] (6:00 - 6:19)

I love that your success in a field that is decidedly not medical or law is is a challenge to stereotypes, but also you have been really transparent about the fact that, again, quoting you, you barely graduated high school.

[Speaker 1] (6:20 - 7:32)

I mean, that's not untrue. I, you know, I think. High school was really difficult for me for a number of different reasons, and the easiest thing for me to say was, ah, this school is not for me.

Right. But I've done a lot of work on myself with my therapist and taking care of my mental health and really understanding why I do things and understand why I think things. And when I think back during my high school time, it wasn't that just high school or it wasn't that school just wasn't my thing.

It was because school is very difficult for me because I grew up in a town that was predominantly white, that didn't have a lot of people that look like me. And immediately you feel pretty isolated. You feel different.

So that's one thing that you're thinking about alongside school. The second thing is, it's that when when you have that and you also have these expectations of, OK, well, if he is one of the only Asian people in the school, he must be amazing at math. That's another thing you have to think about alongside the other thing and alongside and alongside just the basics of school.

[Speaker 3] (7:32 - 7:37)

And then and alongside the fact that you were blind in one eye. But I mean, there's certainly that.

[Speaker 1] (7:37 - 7:54)

Yeah, I mean, there's certainly that, too. But, you know, and then and then on top of all of that, you do feel and sense and witness and experience discrimination. And that happened pretty frequently to me.

And for a long time.

[Speaker 3] (7:54 - 8:02)

Can you can you give us I'm sure there are countless examples, but what kind of stuff were you dealing with growing up in Moraga, California?

[Speaker 1] (8:03 - 11:19)

Yeah, for those of you don't know, Moraga is a suburbs of the Bay Area. It's it's an affluent, predominantly Caucasian town. And, you know, being one of the only Asian families there, you know, and I grew up there from when I was five until I graduated high school.

I actually live about two minutes from Moraga now. It's and we can go into that. There's a whole little reason for that.

But the things that you experience are significant otherness, where you open up your history books and you see parts of American history in your history books as you're a child. And you see things that have defined the United States and the people who that have defined the United States, good or bad. And when you don't see yourself in those history books, you they immediately say, well, who the hell are you and do you even belong here?

When did you come to the United States, Eric? And for a little bit of history, my family came to the United States pre-Gold Rush. So I'm fifth generation, fourth generation Japanese-American from Central California.

And, you know, I don't speak another language. My grandparents were born here. My great grandparents were born here in Monterey.

And when I get I get asked, you know, where are you from? I'm from Monterey. And they're like, well, that's not true.

You're from another foreign you're from a foreign place. And you feel that that you feel those questions in your heart. You feel the weight of those questions.

You feel ashamed to be different. You wish that people didn't you wish that people looked at like you like at you. But they saw themselves so they wouldn't have to ask questions.

You wish that you didn't bring the foods that you did to school because I love Filipino food and my mom made a ton of Filipino food. I couldn't bring it to school because it's very aromatic. And because of that, the weight that you pull with you through your education and through and through school is something it's additional to the already unique pressures of being a teenager in high school, trying to figure things out.

And, you know, we there are many times in which my family, when I was growing up. Left the restaurant early because someone on another side of the restaurant didn't like how we look like, you know, before the food didn't come. There are many times where, you know, in high school, I asked a girl to homecoming and she point blank tells me, I don't like it.

Asian guys, why would you even ask me? And that's totally OK in her mind. Right.

And so I think I do think you harbor all of these things. And then again, like alongside the pressures of high school, the pressures and this is I went to a very great high school that is, I think, top 20 in the state. And so the pressure is already there to succeed.

And I just couldn't do it. I just couldn't couldn't do it. And that's why I barely graduated high school, because I barely survived high school.

[Speaker 3] (11:20 - 11:35)

You know, just a side note. Sorry, I just have to say this, Greg, in case it gives anybody hope. My niece, who is 13 and is black, has announced she will never date anyone who's not Asian and she will only marry an Asian man.

So I don't know if we can all look at that as progress.

[Speaker 1] (11:36 - 12:47)

You know, I think the bigger thing for me is, first off, like you learn saying that to someone somewhere. Right. Oh, I don't like Asian people.

You learn that. That's a learned behavior. You know, my kids are mixed race.

They're Jewish and Asian. And, you know, there are there are many people that won't look like them. There are many people that do look like them.

But the reality is, is that you will never hear from me and my wife telling our kids, like, you know, you can't be with them because they don't look like you like you. You love who you love. You do you.

Right. But I do think I think, yeah, there's that's certainly progress. I also think, too, just generally speaking, generally speaking.

I would love for us to be to be in a place in which that's not the first thing that you think about when you get asked the homecoming, like you tell me, tell me I have bad breath or something, like, tell me, tell me I don't dress well, tell me I can't dance, tell me I can't dance, like to tell me to tell me that's like that's the first thing that you tell me, like, like, let me down easy, you know, have some tact here, have some tact.

[Speaker 3] (12:50 - 12:51)

Greg, you were going to say something.

[Speaker 2] (12:52 - 15:15)

No, I think this is such an interesting area we're exploring because it it's the minority tax, you know, it's the it's all of the other stuff that you'd have to navigate just to compete, feel accepted, a sense of belonging. And I think all these things that Eric is describing, you know, it's oftentimes referred to as that tax and, you know, it's the extra burden that you carry. And not only do you I don't know if you felt this, Eric, but, you know, similar to your experience, mine was was was very much the same.

But the other side of that coin is sometimes you don't even feel accepted in your own community because you're you're trying to navigate the majority world and you're trying to do everything you can. And as a young child, you don't have that. You don't have the tools yet to navigate that.

You don't have the tools to say just be yourself and just do you. And just because you're trying to deal with all of your your peer group and and just fit in and you're not yet equipped with the sense of self-esteem and self-awareness and self-worth to say, you know what, I am who I am. Now, there are some kids who are there are some kids who early on to sort of adapt that that coping mechanism and they're just going to be who they are and they're able to push through.

But most kids aren't equipped. And so you're doing that and you overcompensate. And so I used to come back to my neighborhood and the kids in my neighborhood used to like I went to a Catholic school and so we used to have to wear these ties and come home with my little clip on.

And like the kids in my neighborhood would like snatch my clip on off and I'd have to fight. So I was fighting at school and when I got home, because when I got home, the kids, oh, you're trying to be white or you think you're cute or you think you're smarter than us and you think you and so you're sort of caught too much and never enough. And you don't know who you are.

You don't know who you are, who you should try to be. And it's a really challenging thing. And the other thing that I think, Eric, that you touched on and I would I think we should explore a little bit is.

Is it also causes friction between minority groups, right? Because it's then it's like who is accepted, who's not accepted? Well, just don't be like them.

Yeah, right. And then you might be actually be able to fit in or we might accept you as long as you're not like them and it causes divisions between groups. And so I think this is such a powerful thing that you're sharing, Eric, that faith that is worthy of exploration as well.

[Speaker 3] (15:18 - 15:42)

Eric, I my my kids go to schools where that are my kids go to two separate schools. Both of their schools are more than 50 percent Asian-American kids. And a couple of years ago, my son came home with a book about a baseball game being started in a Japanese internment camp.

[Speaker 1] (15:42 - 15:43)

The game that saved us. Yeah.

[Speaker 3] (15:44 - 15:44)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (15:44 - 15:45)

Great book. Game that saved us.

[Speaker 3] (15:46 - 16:04)

And he also came home and with tears in his eyes was bursting to tell me, mom, have you ever heard about Angel Island? I think where where where there was a prison for Chinese immigrants who were just just trying to come over to America in the 1800s.

[Speaker 1] (16:05 - 16:05)

Yeah.

[Speaker 3] (16:05 - 16:54)

Indefinitely imprisoned. And and his class was learning about the poetry they left on the wall. And I thought.

Thank God, my kid, no matter what color my kid is, thank God he's learning this history of America now, because I didn't learn about Japanese internment camps until I was going to grad school and my Japanese-American friend said, oh, you don't know about I mean, no shame. She was like, you don't know about this. My grandparents were in them.

So so I hope you're not that old, but I hope that your experience is of not seeing yourself and and not seeing the stories of Asian-Americans as part of a curriculum in school. I hope that is going extinct.

[Speaker 1] (16:55 - 18:55)

You know, I I hope so, too. And, you know, I think, you know, there's only so much I could hope. And that is why I joined the Smithsonian Asian Pacific American Center as the as one of the board directors, because our hope is that.

If you look at the National Mall. And you think about the museums that are on the National Mall celebrating the rich history of the United States, you certainly have the the National Museum of African-American history and culture, which is incredible if you haven't gone yet. But it details the rich history that may not be told in history books.

I think that's going to change now because it again, it's on the National Mall so that you kind of force feed that into K through 12. The American Latino, the Natural History Museum of the American Latino, the natural the National Women's History Museum and the natural the National History Museum of the indigenous people of America. But you if you when you have those alongside and also alongside the Holocaust Museum.

Right. And so I think the more that you have and celebrate the rich history, good and bad, because, again, no history is really clean of of a people, especially in the United States, you gain something called perspective and perspective breeds empathy. And so I do think that, you know, the curriculum is going to change.

And I think it's going to change with the work that we're doing at the Smithsonian, because we will have a we will have a place on the National Mall to be celebrated. But also that will help us get into curriculum for K through 12. And that's the ultimate end goal for me is that hope wasn't enough.

Hope is not a strategy to me. Action, you know, to me, especially in this time of my life, was more important to me and succeed or fail. At least I tried because, again, like to me, hope is not a strategy.

[Speaker 3] (18:57 - 19:21)

Greg, it's we're pretty lucky that not only are we talking to Eric today, but Eric, Greg and I have talked with Jorge Zamanillo, who is yeah, well, you know who he is. But I'll remind folks that he he is is leading the creation of the Hispanic Museum of the Smithsonian. So it's I mean, it's no coincidence you got two of us.

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (19:21 - 19:27)

Storytelling is not approved by the Smithsonian to be talking about it. But here we are. I love it.

But here we are. I'm sorry, Smithsonian.

[Speaker 2] (19:32 - 20:32)

Well, it's public enough that the U.S. Bank has contributed a million dollars to that museum, and so we look forward to supporting the Asian Museum, too, whenever you know when that effort really gets underway. I think I think those things are important and they're important for corporations and business to understand their role in it. You know, it's things like, you know, obviously our partnership with you, Eric, and Meta Prosper and.

Which is all about advancing the Asian Pacific Islander community, you know, it's it's a it's an important time for companies to continue to lean forward and lean in, not only because it's the right thing to do, but what we're talking about in all of this, it's actually good business, too. It's great business. It's actually good business.

The reason representation matters is clearly it's the right thing morally. It's the right social thing to do. But the reason it's the right thing to do is because it's more profitable.

[Speaker 1] (20:33 - 21:34)

I mean, I mean, I mean, let's just look at the numbers, right? Like, listen, most CEOs who don't look like me and you probably went to business school in business school. They probably outside of partying and drinking, they probably had to go to an economics class.

Right. And in that economics class, they probably said, hey, if you're running a business, look, it might be a good thing to look at the census report. And if you look at the census report, the two fastest growing populations in the United States are Asian-Americans, half of that fueled by immigration and the African-American population combined.

You're looking at trillions and trillions of dollars in total addressable market. Now, if you are going to deprioritize DEI and if you are going to deprioritize two of those populations, guess what? New York Times estimates before 2042, those two populations will be the majority of the United States.

That means they are your consumer today. And so if you're not building equity with those consumers today, your business will cease to exist.

[Speaker 2] (21:36 - 21:37)

That is the truth.

[Speaker 5] (21:37 - 21:38)

That is the truth.

[Speaker 2] (21:39 - 23:46)

It's to your point, it's simple economics. And I think, you know, all of all of this is a wake up call to business to really understand, because the real business case and faith has heard me say this a number of times, the real business case today around DEI church. We don't we don't go to church.

We don't go to church today. The real business case today about DEI is all about inclusive growth and innovation. Like that is the business case.

Like it's it's inclusion in terms of looking at the marketplace in the broadest possible perspective and doing things at scale. That's what inclusive growth is. It's it's it's it's approaching the marketplace at scale.

And who doesn't want growth and scale? It's innovation in the sense that you're you're looking at your products and services and trying to serve the broadest possible market. And if you start with insights from the Hispanic, Asian-American, African-American and other, if you start with those insights at the very beginning as you're developing and designing your products and services, you're actually designing for everybody.

You're actually including everybody into the into the product design. And so I think it's such an exciting time for for those of us who represent and deeply care about these communities to be in leadership roles. The responsibilities that we carry, I think it always is the extra burden of shouldering your community.

I don't know if you feel this, Eric, in the sense that. When you're in these leadership positions in these companies, you recognize that you're not only representing yourself, but you're representing a whole community behind you. And so you feel an undue sense of burden that if you fail, you're actually letting your community down.

And and, you know, you should have followed mom's advice to be an optometrist. Or what did you say? Potato, potato.

I should have done that. But no, seriously, like you actually do sort of understand that it's an undue burden in that sense. But it's also fuels you because you're actually trying to serve something bigger than yourself.

And that's how you that's how you go forward.

[Speaker 1] (23:46 - 26:06)

I mean, the burden is real, right? The burden, I mean, the weight that you feel is not for the faint of heart because you do carry you carry the hopes and the ambitions of the community in the actions that you do. But you also carry and we don't talk about this a lot.

I think you mentioned it earlier. You also carry the criticisms. Majority of the people who critique and criticize my actions, the things that I've built, my career, the way I talk, the fact that I don't speak another language, the fact that I'm not married to, you know, a full Asian woman or Asian, those people are Asian and you carry that with you.

And again, growing up in this town, not seeing other Asian people, this is this is all new to me, right? This is like this Asian versus Asian thing is very new to me. But but that's why when you talk about failure and when you talk about you, you, you, you, you acknowledge that if you fail, you don't just fail yourself.

You fail the ambitions and the dreams of the community. That's why I won't fail. Yeah, I just won't.

I just, you know, I think there's going to come a day where. I can't do the things that I do, and that's the day that I stop, but that's not that's not today, you know what I mean? And that's why that's why I just won't I have a relentless drive.

To continue to push, but to succeed and to succeed for not just my community, but for all the other communities that are adjacent to us, because to me. It's not enough that I lift my community. It's not enough that I lift my community in the black community.

It's not enough that I love my community and Hispanic community. It's because I don't just represent half of my children. I represent the totality of them and the totality of their friends.

And so it's my drive to succeed and to change the perspective of people who look like me, of people that I put on that may not look like me. And and that's why, again, you know, I just I refuse to fail. Refuse.

Yeah.

[Speaker 3] (26:06 - 26:38)

I want to talk about how you became so vocal about this, how you how you really found your purpose in in making this kind of personal mandate public. And I don't want to just make the Japanese internment camp a passing reference because this plays a part in your journey. Your your grandfather, Kenji James Toda, was was he put in an internment camp?

Was his family put in one?

[Speaker 1] (26:39 - 28:13)

Yeah. So my grandfather was a strawberry farmer in Watsonville, California, which is a little bit on the outskirts of Monterey. And during World War Two, right after Pearl Harbor, they have that United States mandate that all Japanese people are enemy of the state and they will be placed into an internment camp.

And while his family was getting shipped off by the U.S. Army into into an internment camp in Arizona, posted in Arizona, he decided on the way there that he was going to enlist in the U.S. Army. While the U.S. Army was taking away his farm and the ultimate the U.S. Army actually ultimately gave like, you know, there's that there's that there's that saying like, oh, you gave the farm away. They literally gave the farm away to a family, to another family that, you know, some families held it on, held on to it for when the family came back.

This family took the farm and we never saw it again. And so we lost the farm. You know, my grandfather's family ultimately went to post in Arizona and my grandfather enlisted in the U.S. Army in a all Japanese regiment codenamed the 442nd Regiment. The motto for them was go for broke. And it was all Japanese again. It was all Japanese, all Japanese American.

And they are still to this day the highest decorated U.S. Army regiment in all of armed forces.

[Speaker 3] (28:14 - 28:15)

That gives me chills.

[Speaker 1] (28:16 - 29:09)

To this day, to this day. And many of you, many people don't know this, too. There was I forgot, you know, I forgot the name of it, but there was also and again, during this time, there were other regiments dedicated to other minority groups, too, like, you know, the black community and the Jewish community.

And they fought alongside them because I remember what's really interesting. My wife, my wife's late grandfather, I remember the first one of the first things he asked me when he met me, he's like, did your grandfather fight in the 442nd? I was like, he did.

He's like, he did. He's like, I fought alongside the 442nd in Germany when, you know, when we were fighting, when we were fighting the Nazis. And I was like, and he was he was Jewish.

He's Jewish. And so he fought in the Jewish regiment. And so it's a very decorated history of the United States that not a lot of people know about.

[Speaker 3] (29:10 - 29:17)

So you're to be clear, your grandfather was what, third, third generation American, correct?

[Speaker 1] (29:17 - 29:19)

Yeah, he was born, he was born in Watsonville.

[Speaker 3] (29:19 - 29:21)

Yeah. He didn't even speak Japanese.

[Speaker 1] (29:21 - 29:22)

No, he did not.

[Speaker 3] (29:23 - 29:41)

And and his his family's farm was taken away. He he he enlists. He's a World War Two veteran.

And then when you were talking about the challenges you faced as a teenager growing up, your your grandfather was brutally attacked when you were a teenager.

[Speaker 1] (29:42 - 31:03)

Correct. When I was 14, my grandfather was a victim of a hate crime in San Francisco. You know, he used to go for walks all the time, you know, in the around Golden Gate

Park.

And that used to be like his thing. And yeah, he was he was targeted in a very brutal hate crime that left him, you know, in a hospital bed for a long time. They never found the perpetrators.

They just heard from some eyewitnesses that there are racial slurs thrown at him. And, you know, I think the when I think about that, you know, the biggest thing that I think about was. This guy fought for the freedom and democracy that allowed people to walk free on the streets, you know, and like he looks a certain way, sure, whatever.

But this guy fought in what is known as the greatest generation and probably one of the greatest victories in world history, you know, to be treated like that. And I thought, again, when I was 14, I thought that was and again, middle of high school, I thought that, you know, that was so wrong. And I wish I wish every day that back then I could have done something more.

[Speaker 3] (31:05 - 31:33)

And then you did you you you really have done something more so. So in 2020 and 2021, you became an incredibly vocal critic of racism and violence facing the AAPI community. Can you talk about the moment when you realized you I mean, you wrote something called My People Are Dying in Silence and I'm Here with a Megaphone.

What was your moment of realizing I have this megaphone, I have to use it?

[Speaker 1] (31:36 - 35:36)

You know, I think. Even before that, I think the United States was going through a significant cultural awakening. And I think we still are to this day, you know, starting with in 2017, the Me Too movement in which, you know, we started to question, again, treatment of women in the workplace, you know, the pay gap representation of women.

And ultimately that opened the door for the black community to start doing the same. And rightfully so. And you start to see.

A lot of voices that look like yours that. Maybe like me for the first 12 years, 15 years of their career, just focused on their career, right? I'm going to put together a good marketing career, I'm going to be a great business executive, you know, I'm going to do me.

But then one of the things that inspired me the most was I started to see friends that came up with me that are other executives from the black community to start to really advocate for who they are on all levels. And. One of the things that I saw through that, especially during that time, that's the summer of 2020, was that the xenophobia against the Asian-American community and the rhetoric against the Asian-American community was at the highest and no one was really talking about it.

Certainly, we were talking about other things and rightfully so. But, you know, one of the things that I saw was that. While the black community and the female community were still very, very, very vocal, the Asian-American community was silent, like absolutely silent, and I think many people were scared, I think many people didn't know what to say.

I think, Greg, like Kyla, what you mentioned, and I fit on this too, it's you don't feel like you have the credibility to speak for an entire community. For me, I grew up in an all white town, I was the only Asian, one of the only Asian people, and then my cousins are from San Francisco and they see me and they're like, look, look, look at this white guy. And so, therefore, I'm on this spectrum of ethnicity, right, I'm like somewhere in the middle, I'm not, you know, I'm not as Asian as they want me to be, and I'm more white than they don't want, right, and so I never felt like I had a place, you know, to really speak for the community because, one, the community never accepted me because of where I sat, and two, I've been really taught to just keep my nose clean, keep my head down, and, you know, and don't speak up. What is also not said during my grandfather's hate crime attack was that the question was asked, do we continue to search for the perpetrators, and my family said no. My family said no, like, they're like, let's just leave it, let's just leave it, let's just leave it the way, you know, it's all right, like, you know, we didn't want to cause a stir, right, and I think a lot of that's generational trauma.

If you think about it, you know, my grandfather and his family were in incarceration camps with an AK-47, like, to your face, right, of course you're not going to speak up, of course you're not going to look them in the eyes, of course you're not going to kind of ruffle some feathers and, like, I'm going to press charges. No, of course you're not going to do that, right, because all you want to do is get that gun out of your face and get on with your life and go into your little corner that you've been given, and so that's been passed on, you know, through my family, you know, even to when I became an executive, you know, some of the tips that I got was, like, Eric, don't speak up, Eric, be great at math, Eric, don't challenge people, Eric, when a white executive looks you in the eye, don't look at them in the eye.

Those are all things that were passed down to me because of all the things that we've been through as a family throughout history, and so...

[Speaker 3] (35:36 - 35:42)

That's like a DNA inheritance, right? Was it your dad who told you not to look white executives in the eye?

[Speaker 1] (35:43 - 36:22)

That was generational trauma. I think that is something that you carry with you, right? And you hear it quite, like, a lot of my Black friends tell me that that is something that they carry with them as well, is that, you know, when you see, when you carry something that's so ingrained in your history, it's hard for you not to escape it.

It's hard for you not to hear in the back of your head, even though you know, even though, you know, you might have the potential to change the trajectory, right? And for me...

[Speaker 3] (36:23 - 36:33)

Eric, I, you're giving me this really, you're illuminating for me the really pernicious, really pernicious side of model minority.

[Speaker 1] (36:33 - 36:34)

Right.

[Speaker 3] (36:35 - 36:53)

Which is that this head down compliance, don't speak up, which has, is it fair to say, enabled a lot of Asian American communities to succeed to a point comes from such a horrific and destructive place.

[Speaker 2] (36:53 - 37:24)

It is, and it is in some of it too, Faith, I'm glad you brought up the model minority myth, because it's success at what cost. You know, it's, it's success in quotes. And like, what did you have to give up in terms of who you are in order to achieve that success?

Which breeds more trauma, which gets passed down from generation to generation.

[Speaker 1] (37:24 - 45:16)

It breeds more trauma because it does isolate you. I think too, the further you get away from the exact, like catalytic moment of that, you, you, you wonder like why you do things. You wonder why, why you, why you are afraid of other communities.

You know, why you don't trust, you know, certain people that don't look like you. And I think that's absolutely wrong. I think it's absolutely wrong.

And so to go back to your original question, Faith is, you know, I started to see a lot of these things happening and I started to see my black friends start to grapple with the same type of truth, especially being an executive. And what, the thing that tipped the scales for me was at the, I wouldn't say the peak, but at a surge of anti-Asian violence in New York and Oakland and San Francisco, there were about eight, nine days straight of attacks against the community that left a few people, a few elderly people dead. And then we go into the Superbowl and all the Superbowl spots are very positive, you know, Joe Biden's in the administration now, hooray, you know, and like we got through the summer, you know, and I thought that was really wrong.

I thought that was really wrong, mostly because as an advertiser and a marketer, all it takes is for one, it's going to take consistency to defeat racism. It's going to take, it's going to take consistency, you know, to stand with minority communities. It's going to take consistency of messaging, you know, to reinforce your commitment, you know, to your employee base that probably isn't just one race.

And none of the brands did that. And it was very disappointing to me. And I get a phone call from Adweek asking if I wanted to write a thought piece on what's happening to the community as an Asian American executive.

I said, no, pretty quickly. I was within 10 seconds. I said, no, I was like, wrong person asked.

Sorry. And the reason is because I was like, I don't have a place to do this. Like, this is what possibly could I say?

What possibly could I say that could help people? And well, and the convincing argument to me from them was, Eric, you're actually our last call. There were about eight other executives that said no to us.

Eight other. And I know every single one of those eight. Right.

And I respect them. I respect them. I respect why they said no.

And to me, I was, I felt ashamed. I felt super ashamed. And, you know, those other eight executives speak other languages, you know, they're further down the spectrum than I am, you know, and I was like, you know what?

Like, I might have something to say. I might. And that's when I put pen to paper and I wrote it and I sat on it for about 48 hours.

And we kept calling like, did you do it? Did you write it? We don't touch this thing, man.

And I was like, I wrote it. I don't know if it's any good. I don't know if people are going to read this, but I wrote it and I wrote what was in my head and my heart.

And I remember sending it in to Adweek and crying, crying quite a bit. I remember not sleeping. I remember my wife asking me why I'm not sleeping.

And I was just really nervous. I was really scared. I was scared for a couple different reasons.

And this is kind of what part of the evolution of me. I was scared because I didn't think I had a place to talk about the community or lead the community or even be a leader in the community. I've always known I've been in a great executive, a great leader that certainly looks like other people.

But that was never like a con. I was never like, yes, and that's me, an Asian-American leader. Let's go.

It's always, yes, that's me. I'm a marketing executive and I just happen to be Asian. And that still continues to be true.

But now there's this other part of me where I'm like, but the part of my identity that I was not proud of before, I am proud of now. And that was the change that I am proud of now. I am proud of it.

And even if you don't like it, and even if you don't think I should be proud of it, or even if you don't think I have the right to be proud of it, I'm going to be proud of what I see in the mirror. And that was the change when I sent that piece in was I became proud of what I saw in the mirror and my faults, where I was on the ethnicity spectrum, all that stuff. I was like, that's it.

Now, as an advertising and someone that's also in corporate comms, launching something on any publication on a Friday is not advised. It's not advised. And Adweek was...

It's Shabbat, man. And they're like, you know what? This is launching today, Friday.

And I was like, guys, no one's going to read this. It's also President's Day weekend. No one's going to read this.

I was like, this is doomed. This is doomed forever. And I was so sad.

I was so sad. I was like, I poured my heart into this piece. And now no one's going to read it.

And I went to sleep. And when I woke up, I look at my phone. And I'm, you know, as a brand marketing professional, you always tell your agencies and, you know, the people internally, like, I'm going to make this go viral.

You know, like, watch this go viral. Watch this start to trend. Like, watch this.

And then you do things and you make work and it goes viral and it trends. And like, I won like one literal awards for doing just that. But seeing what I wrote that represented me, that represented my truth, that represented my experience, do what I do for a living, do those types of numbers, have those numbers dance, have those numbers shut down Adweek because they didn't have the server space.

Um, it, it showed me that I shouldn't have waited so long. And I felt really bad about that. I felt super bad about that.

And it opened the floodgates to a number of different people. Um, speaking up, I think a lot of people saw me go into the fire and not die. And so they spoke up to, um, but the biggest thing that I felt was, damn, I didn't know.

I didn't know it was going to be so easy to be proud of who I was. I just didn't know. I had no idea.

And, uh, my only hope is that those actions made other people proud of who they were, no matter where they are on their journey. And so the piece that I wrote, like you mentioned, my people are dying in silence. I'm here with megaphone led to a number of different actions.

One of which being the foundation and launching of a completely new organization dedicated to supporting Asian American small businesses in which I'm the founder and executive GM of, um, that we launched at the white house a year after I wrote that piece. And so, um, and that's meta prosper. And it changed my life writing that piece changed my life.

I think it, uh, it opened up a slew of new concerns for me. Um, but it's totally worth it. I think it's totally worth it to be proud of who you are.

And it's, it feels weird to say that, but, um, before I didn't think it was worth it.

[Speaker 2] (45:18 - 46:24)

Demonstrating courage is never easy. I mean, it is, you know, I, it, what you demonstrated in that moment was incredible, um, courage and that gave others, um, the license and the, the space to feel safe to do so, which is why it's so incredibly powerful. Um, and why it's so important that companies like us bank and others are supporters of meta prosper and, and helping to provide, um, resources to these small businesses and entrepreneurs who previously may have been hesitant or may have not known, um, you know, what are the steps to launch my business and what does success look like?

And now you've empowered all of them and given them the sense of, uh, courage that is necessary to be successful. So, uh, you're a trailblazer, man. Like that, that's, it's, it's crazy.

And I don't, I hope you don't beat yourself up about that because that, that, that courage, that, that takes, um, a long time to get to that place and space where any of us feel safe enough to demonstrate that kind of courage.

[Speaker 1] (46:24 - 48:35)

You know, I think a lot of what I thought about in that moment, uh, with my grandfather, you know, I think, uh, I remember asking him, you know, right before he passed away, like, cause I lived with him for a little bit after my grandmother passed and, you know, just take care of him, make him dinner and stuff like that. And so I got to know him really, really well. You know, he was, he was part of that generation that just doesn't talk right.

That's just like, you know, kind of rough, kind of gruff and like very, like hyper-masculine and like, you know, I had like calluses on his hands cause he's a farmer. He likes to do things himself, you know, doesn't like to ask for directions. But as he got older and as I started to take care of him more, I started to ask more questions, you know, about where he was from.

Um, you know, what, what was his favorite things to grow on the farm, things like that. But the biggest question I asked him, and I was really nervous to ask him this, uh, this is, I asked him, you know, why would you join the U.S. Army? You know, what, what went through your mind when you went, when you joined the U.S. Army as they were giving your farm away and putting your, putting your family in, in prison camps? And I remember he told me, and this is the only time he ever talked to me about it because he wasn't really, I don't, I don't know why, but he, I know why he just didn't like talking about it. Um, I joined and everybody else joined, uh, because our hope was that it was our last chance to show that we were American. Yeah.

Cause you don't know what happens, right? You don't know what happens. You saw what happened with the Holocaust.

You saw what happened with slavery. You saw what happened with all these different things. And if you, if history were to repeat itself, you don't know if you're going to get another chance to really prove you belong here.

And so he felt putting on that uniform, fighting for the democracy and freedom that this country has afforded his family for generations, really generations, um, it was worth it. And his hope was that eventually someone like me or my dad or whoever would be able to exercise those freedoms.

[Speaker 6] (48:36 - 48:36)

Your kids?

[Speaker 1] (48:37 - 48:53)

Yeah, my kids. And so when I wrote the piece, that's what I thought about. That's beautiful.

If I don't write this piece, I'm not exercising the freedoms that, that this man fought for.

He fought for, no doubt.

[Speaker 3] (48:55 - 50:42)

Eric, at the time that you wrote that piece that in which you gave yourself a voice, but also empowered so many others to feel like they had a voice. Um, it was a time where so, so much of America's focus on discrimination was specifically anti-racist discrimination against black people, right? Because we all know that George Floyd was murdered at the beginning of the pandemic.

And there was so much, finally, so much attention and black lives matter movement. And it feels like America a lot of times only has enough attention to pay to one minority at a time. And Greg, I, with your guidance, I want to return to something that you kind of, you know, posited at towards the beginning of this conversation, which is, which is, and I just defer to the both of you.

Like, what do American minorities do when they're sort of pitted against each other, either through minority myths or how much attention white America has to turn to discrimination for one minority at a time? What I don't know how often I get to hear a conversation between someone who is a black American and someone who is an Asian American about this, this, this kind of us versus them mentality that has bubbled up recurrently in our history.

[Speaker 2] (50:43 - 54:12)

You know, one of the things that was really so troubling to me that. It got touched on a little bit, but didn't get enough attention was how often some of the violence against Asian Americans was actually perpetrated by black Americans. And that was that was so unfortunate and so disappointing and distressful to me because the issue is faith and not solely there's no silver bullet in any of this, but it actually is education.

When you don't know your history or you've been miseducated about your, your, your experience and you don't know the sacrifices that your grandfather and others have made and what they went through. You do suffer this trauma and the unfortunate thing is in many cases, particularly in certain urban areas, Asian communities and black communities are in proximity to each other. And so they're fighting for similar resources.

They're fighting for the same sort of recognition and awareness and clawing for for crumbs in many cases. Because they don't know their history and they don't know their shared history. Many people don't know the shared history between Asians and blacks in this country.

But it's important we start to examine that, which is why educating our young people, not only on our history as individual ethnic communities, but the history of other ethnic communities is absolutely critical. Because you start to see how much we share, how much we share in common. And, you know, every one of our, you know, communities has so much richness that we've contributed to this country.

That we will get past this notion of otherism and it becomes this collectivism of us versus me versus Eric versus Jose versus it's like, hey, man, like we like we're better together, bro. Our history and our talents and what we contribute are complimentary and our cultures are all complimentary and they all add the beautiful, you know, cultural texture of America, which is this incredible quilt. And so that's part of it.

You know, faith is so much of the incidents that Eric was referring to. And it was really heartbreaking to see how much of that was being perpetrated by the, not only, but a lot of it was being perpetrated by members of the black community. And I think it's because there's so much pain and there's so much trauma that you tend to lash out to those that are in proximity or you think are taking something away from you.

When there's a scarcity, when you have a scarcity mindset and you believe the pie is only so big and you think that some group is actually taking something from you. And when you have a culture that is being fed nothing but fear and entertainment and news, what I call like has become angertainment, is only making us more angry and fearful of each other. And all of that is being fed to us.

I think the solution is really to really get back to the fundamentals of teaching our kids and getting back to educating us on what makes us better and what makes our common experiences an additive to this whole American experience.

[Speaker 1] (54:14 - 55:09)

I mean, I couldn't say it better myself, right? I think a lot of it's education and education breeds perspective, which breeds empathy. And I think if you, I mean, the reality is, is you don't hear my voice without the black community.

You don't see Meta Prosper without the black community. Our executive sponsor, our executive sponsor and biggest investor of Meta Prosper is black. And I can tell you this right now, the hesitancy as we were building so much of this wasn't from the white community, wasn't from the black community, wasn't from the Hispanic community.

The hesitancy while we were building this was from the Asian community internally. They're like, why are you doing this? Like, is it really worth it?

All this stuff? Black community is like, oh, we're all in.

[Speaker 6] (55:10 - 55:12)

We're all in. Hey, hey.

[Speaker 1] (55:12 - 55:18)

It puts it like, well, let's go. The bet's on the table, Eric. You take it through.

[Speaker 3] (55:19 - 55:21)

What's that about? What's that about, Eric?

[Speaker 2] (55:25 - 56:20)

I don't know. I think there's a lot there. I think there's a lot there.

Because the thing is, and I'm not sure if it's true in this example. The one thing I can say, and again, I'm not trying to speak for my community, but from my perspective, the black community is not concerned. We're going to have no interest in assimilation.

Ever. That is not part of our success equation. It has never been.

Because we've never been accepted. When you start out in the founding document as three fifths of a human being, you understand how people view you, right? And so assimilation was not really something that was of interest.

It always had to be sort of this courageous, you know, like, we're just going for it because we have nothing to lose. You know, when you feel you're on the bottom, you have nothing to lose, Faith. You are going to put all your chips in because what do you get to lose?

[Speaker 1] (56:21 - 58:48)

I think what they saw from Prosper and from me was maybe someone that could break the cycle. Maybe someone that could break history and start something new, right? And I think that's why some of the most support that we've ever, like some of the most support we've ever received internally and even externally, too, is from the black community.

And I'm so grateful for that. I think the mentorship that I've received, the encouragement to not assimilate, the encouragement to continue to speak my truth, the encouragement to succeed is all from the black community. It's like it's pretty incredible.

And again, I think my hope is that the more I can talk about that, right, the more I can talk about that, the more that I allow people to understand this, the more that they realize that we are better together, that we are better in partnership, we are better in bridges. And, you know, a lot of times you see my Asian critics or even critics from other communities saying like, well, Eric Tote is successful because he just he got a cheat code. Like he he found the secret elevator that Asian people found for him.

Right. And like he has like he probably has like a bunch of Asian leaders that are just paving the path for him like that. You know, he's like their golden boy.

No, I've never had an Asian manager ever, ever, ever, ever, ever, ever, ever, ever. And the voice that you hear today, the success that you've seen on my resume, the awards that I've put up, the numbers that I've driven, the million billions of dollars that I've driven for businesses is because. Of the white and black and Hispanic community, because they see more than just the model minority, they see more than just a preconceived notion, they see hopefully something different.

And my hope is that the more I can model that and more selfishly, the more that my kids can see that, that that's what I'm modeling. And heaven forbid they decide to do what I do. I made it a little bit easier for them.

[Speaker 2] (58:50 - 58:59)

Maybe that part. That's an abundant mindset like that, like that's the that's that's the complete opposite of that scarcity mindset I talked about.

[Speaker 3] (59:00 - 59:06)

And Eric, I've heard you say that your catchphrase is how can I help you be better?

[Speaker 1] (59:07 - 1:00:28)

I was in my catchphrase. I would say it's more like. I think it's just what set me apart from my career, to be fair.

You know, I've I've always been I've always had this, I guess, understanding in my head that if I could help more people, it'll open more doors for me. Right. And maybe in a Freudian slip way, if I could help more people, maybe I could help myself.

Maybe I could figure some stuff out for myself. Right. Maybe it'll make me feel better about who I am.

Maybe make me feel better about myself. Right. And so no matter who you are, CEO, an entry level person right out of college, I will always end the conversation every single time without fail.

It's good to talk to you. If I could ever be helpful, let me know. Like, just let me know.

Nine times out of ten, no one picks up. But that one time opens up a ton of doors. You know, I've I've never applied for any job I've ever had in my entire career.

I've always been recruited. And that recruitment is always because and I believe this is because I've been helpful to the people who recruited me. Mm hmm.

Never once have I applied for a job. I mean, the first job. But everything, everything after that.

After that.

[Speaker 2] (1:00:28 - 1:00:29)

Everything after that.

[Speaker 5] (1:00:29 - 1:00:29)

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (1:00:30 - 1:01:00)

Because I, you know, from from Facebook to Nike, Nike to Snapchat, Snapchat to Airbnb, Airbnb to Gap, Gap back to Facebook. Recruited. And because every single person that has recruited me.

I've facilitated and built a relationship and equity into that relationship where if I could be helpful, let me know. That's the secret. The secret is literally just being helpful.

Right. It's just having that mindset of like, how can I help more people?

[Speaker 2] (1:01:02 - 1:01:58)

To hopefully make their lives a little bit easier. Being in service to something bigger than yourself and that that draws people to you. And that's what that that brings incredible value to not only individuals, but to organizations.

That's what that's what makes organizations successful is when you have people who understand. What the first lesson you learn as a leader is that it's no longer about you. Yes.

Yes. It's actually about the team. It's actually like it's no longer about you.

Like it's about everybody else around you and how you help them perform at their best. How you bring value to others around you. How do you move people and resources around ideas like that?

To me, if I ever have the opportunity to teach at a university, like that's the first thing I learned in leadership. It's like it's not about you anymore. It's about everything but you.

[Speaker 1] (1:01:59 - 1:02:16)

It's extraordinary. Right. I think it's extraordinary when you think about leadership styles.

You know, one of the biggest criticisms that I get is. I'm too flashy. I'm too loud.

You know, I'm too self-promotional.

[Speaker 3] (1:02:17 - 1:02:18)

From whom do you get those criticisms?

[Speaker 1] (1:02:19 - 1:02:41)

Oh, I could throw a rock and I'll hit someone. But here's the thing. But here's the thing.

And like I get those criticisms, right? And I understand it. Because one, they're probably not used to seeing someone like me do those things.

Two, I mean, that's probably the biggest one, to be fair. They're like, whoa, look at this Asian guy.

[Speaker 2] (1:02:41 - 1:02:44)

Yeah, they're rooting for you to be successful.

[Speaker 1] (1:02:45 - 1:04:23)

Being proud about what he's built in a career, you know. They're rooting for you to be successful until it happens. Exactly.

And, you know, I think you've been told to be invisible for so damn long. That anything past invisible is self-promotional. And it's not self-promotional.

You're being a self-advocate for yourself. And here's the reality, too. If you don't.

Here's the thing, too. I will never tell. I have a young daughter, right?

She's four years old. I will never tell my daughter, don't be proud of who you are. Don't be proud of the things you did.

You should feel proud first. Before anybody else is proud. Right?

And if people don't like that, forget them. Right? And does it suck, you know, when people say those things about me?

Absolutely. But the thing about it is that if I could give and build an elbow more space to make that normalized for other people that look like me, especially females that look like me, because they're disproportionately underrepresented, disproportionately affected. You know, they make they make 60 cents to every dollar of white executive.

Sixty cents. That's 40 cents difference. That's humongous.

And if I could elbow out and normalize. Being an advocate for yourself. So hopefully they feel more comfortable doing it.

I'll take all the hits then. Send them my way. Send me all your anger in my DMs. If it allows those people to be proud of themselves, send them my way. I'll take it.

[Speaker 3] (1:04:25 - 1:04:29)

Eric, I'm going to quote my husband here. The loudest boos come from the cheapest seats.

[Speaker 1] (1:04:31 - 1:05:00)

Ain't that the truth? Ain't that the truth? And it takes a certain type of person to be on the court.

It takes a certain type of person. It takes a certain type of person. It's very easy to have opinions.

It's very easy to point out flaws. It's very hard. Very, very hard.

And I say this because I feel like I have to go into the fire. Very hard. It's not for the faint of heart.

That's for damn sure.

[Speaker 2] (1:05:02 - 1:05:04)

Doing the work is hard.

[Speaker 1] (1:05:04 - 1:05:53)

It's hard. It's hard work. This is another first that I'm talking about this.

I struggle with... I'm working on it. I've never had a panic attack in my entire life until I wrote that piece.

And since I wrote that piece, I've had five different panic attacks. Five different panic attacks. I've struggled with anxiety since then.

And I'm doing work on that. I'm doing work on that. A lot of the catalyst of that is me not being able to please everybody.

Me not being able to hit 100%. Me not being... Especially with my community.

In my head, I'm like, of course, I'm going to hit 100%. I'm doing good stuff for the community. They're going to love me.

They're going to love me.

[Speaker 5] (1:05:53 - 1:06:02)

They're going to love me, right? No. No.

Maybe like 60%. But that triggers a lot of things.

[Speaker 1] (1:06:03 - 1:06:25)

And the panic attacks that I face... I put a lot of good people around me. I have a great therapist.

They help me work through it. Because I think in this evolution of where I'm going in my life and in my career, it's only going to get more intense. But I also need to have...

Just as much as I'm preaching empathy and perspective for other communities, I need to have empathy and perspective for myself.

[Speaker 2] (1:06:26 - 1:06:27)

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (1:06:27 - 1:07:22)

And that is a very tough thing. A lot of people don't understand that. When you step onto that court, and you're trying to do the good work, and you hear everything...

I hear everything. I see everything. Right?

And if I open my DMs right now, it's nasty. It's real nasty stuff. And that affects you.

That affects you deeply. And it could ruin a day very quickly. And that's what I want people to understand.

Yeah, I understand why you might not ride with me. I get it. Right?

But you have to understand, this is not for me. I promise you it's not for me. I promise you.

It's honestly for my kids. It's for something greater. It's for something greater.

And most times when people have those opinions or concerns about me, they've never even spoken to me. They don't even know who I am.

[Speaker 3] (1:07:22 - 1:07:39)

No, they don't know you. That's information about them and not you. I really want to thank you for sharing that, something Greg and I have talked about multiple times in the past, is how rare and essential vulnerability is to leadership.

[Speaker 2] (1:07:40 - 1:07:40)

Yeah, and grace.

[Speaker 3] (1:07:40 - 1:07:42)

And you're embodying that.

[Speaker 2] (1:07:42 - 1:09:09)

And we've talked about it as grace, and it's not only giving grace to others, which is something we certainly don't do enough of in general, but giving grace to ourselves. Like giving grace to ourself to not have to always be right. You know, it's funny, Eric, because I talk about this a lot.

And it's, you know, as leaders and somebody like yourself, who is so prominent in that way, we're so hardwired to be the teacher and to show up with the answers that we don't give ourself enough grace to say, you know what? I don't know. I don't have the answer.

I don't have it figured out. And I'm not even concerned with, you know, trying to please people and have those answers, or always to show up as this huge brand and this superhuman, as long as my kids and my wife and my family loves me, and they think I'm great. Like that's a hard thing to do.

It's easier said than done, especially when you've had that kind of success and you feel this undue pressure to always meet that level of performance, to always meet that level of acceptance. And, you know, and I'm speaking for myself, and it's hard to let go of that and say, I don't always need to have my cup filled that way. It's enough to be in the arena.

And sometimes I'm a hit and sometimes I'm a miss. And I'm probably going to miss a lot, you know, but that's okay.

[Speaker 3] (1:09:12 - 1:09:51)

And this part of your strength and purpose is to have people witness you trying. That's it. They're witnessing you trying, whether you fail or win.

Eric, I don't know if this will resonate with you. I heard it a couple weeks ago. It soaked into my body, and I was like, yes.

I heard someone of note quoting Billie Jean King, who said, pressure is privilege. And it reminded me that when I choose, that I have a choice to put myself in these pressure-filled situations. Which, of course, is what you're doing on a huge stage.

[Speaker 1] (1:09:51 - 1:13:36)

No, again, like I feel really, I feel very honored, you know, to be able to speak my truth and have the platform that I do and, you know, use it to hopefully do more good. And you're right. I think that to hit 100% is just massively unrealistic.

And I do think, you know, I had to, I'm still working through that. It's a work in progress. And, you know, for me, it's just understanding that I'm just trying.

Right? I'm just trying. I continue to try.

I'm not going to give up. Especially, you know, to be fair, a lot of people are giving up. You know, a lot of people are, you know, moved on to the next thing.

And I think for me, the fight that I have in me has broadened out now to just hopefully making business more diverse, hopefully making perspectives more diverse, hopefully generating more empathy. But I think the bigger thing for me is just allowing for different variations of people who look like me to be successful versus you just have to be one type of person that looks like me. And that person is typically quiet.

That person doesn't speak up. And that person doesn't, you know, ruffle feathers. You know, I always talk about this and I was talking about this to an internship group the other day is that they're from multiple different walks of life.

And they're like, well, Eric, what's your biggest tip, you know, for us as we embark on our internship journey? And I was like, well, you want like the executive response or do you want like the real talk? And they're like, what does that mean?

And then like one brave woman from Harvard, she was like, I want the real talk. And she's from the black community. And I told her straight up, I was like, I told all of them.

I was like, you know, all of you look like variations of me, right? You're all shades of brown and you're going into the marketing industry. I'm going to give you the real talk that it's not going to be easy.

It's not easy. I wish I could tell you it's like it's easy, but everyone's going to do it. But it's not going to be easy for not the reasons that you expect.

It's not going to be easy because you're going to find yourself in rooms where you're the only person with a diverse perspective. It's not going to be easy because you're going to see that you are making 70, 80 cents to the dollar, you know, to a white executive. It's not going to be easy because you're going to see work that represents your community that you're not going to like.

And you have the decision to challenge that. It's not going to be easy for all those things. But hopefully what is going to be easier for you and hopefully because of the work that I'm doing and hopefully the work that my colleagues are doing is they always say that you can't be what you can't see.

And my hope is what's easier for you is for you to see what you can be. That's my hope, right? All those other things, I can't protect you from that, right?

What's going to happen is going to happen. You have some choices to make when that does happen. But what I can hopefully promise you is because of our fight, because of our resolve, because it's not just this fine-tuned stop Asian hate thing, but instead like a larger drive for the rest of my life is I need to be what you can see so that you can be it too.

[Speaker 2] (1:13:38 - 1:15:52)

I love it. And what I really love about that is because it doesn't let individuals off the hook from having some accountability for our own success and failure. So often when many of us don't achieve what I think we maybe anticipated coming out of big schools and landing in these companies and when things don't necessarily work out, which is why you're counsel on, this is going to be hard.

It's probably going to be harder than you think it's going to be. And actually, it's not going to play out the way that you did. Like the way you have it mapped out in your head, I guarantee you it's not going to play out that way.

Exactly. It's just not. It's not.

It's not to say that you won't reach your destination, but it's not going to play out the way that you've got it planned. So just understand that right off the bat. And there are systems that need to be changed, and you might have a bad manager, and there are a lot of factors that will determine your success or failure here.

But the most important one is you. The most important one is your ability to fight, to navigate, to perform. Like nothing is more important than performance.

So regardless of all these other things that happen to you, you've got to have performance. And the advice I always give people, Eric, and I hope you agree with this one, is I always tell people there is nothing more performance, as I said, nothing more important than performance. But the second thing after that is you have to have sponsors.

I'm not talking about mentorship. I'm talking about sponsors because everything about your career and your career trajectory, everything about your career is going to be discussed in rooms that you're not in. Exactly.

That's 100% true. And so you better have somebody in that room who is advocating for you, who knows your skills, your capabilities, who's willing to advocate to put their own personal equity on the line for you. And I think that's the stuff that young people don't fully understand.

Like I hear sometimes young people will come into the workplace and say, I don't want to tell people all my business, and I don't know why they want to. They actually don't really care what you did over the weekend. Like they ask you that because they just want to know a little bit about you so they can trust you.

Because it's all based on trust.

[Speaker 5] (1:15:53 - 1:15:54)

It's relationships.

[Speaker 2] (1:15:55 - 1:16:20)

Yeah, they don't really care what you did on your vacation. They only ask to see how vulnerable you're willing to be, how much about yourself, because they are seeking to trust you. And I think it's so important when we talk to young people to give them, like you said, give them the real, like this can be hard, and it's not going to be what you thought it is.

So make sure that you're sort of sharing and building these relationships grounded in trust.

[Speaker 1] (1:16:20 - 1:17:01)

Again, you don't hear this voice. This voice is not the product of the Asian community. It's not the product of that.

It's the product of, again, a handful of white executives that are just like, that's our guy. Like that's our guy for the business. Not that's our Asian guy, but like that's our guy for the business.

Like he is a business leader, right? And this is also like they have said my names in rooms that I've never been in. You know, the black community have said my names in rooms that I've never been in.

And the black community doesn't see me as like, that's our Asian guy. They're like, no, no, that's our guy.

[Speaker 2] (1:17:02 - 1:17:02)

Right?

[Speaker 1] (1:17:03 - 1:17:51)

And you're right. The foundation of that is excellent. It has to be excellence.

It has to be excellence. Like you can believe all different things and you can advocate all you want. But what has made my voice resonate and I think give me a platform is because I've had an excellent career.

And I've had, you know, a very successful and award-winning career that the marketing industry and advertising industry has respected. And so I do think it's not just, it's not one or the other. Right.

You can be both for sure. But you have to, for one to be successful, you have to be successful.

[Speaker 3] (1:17:54 - 1:18:25)

Eric, you are turning your excellence into, you're enabling your community to succeed with MetaProsper. After listening to the two of you talk, I want to sign up for the Greg and Eric three-day empowerment retreat. But I'm going to ask a very, let's do it.

Yeah, I'm in. I want to just get to a very rudimentary question, which is how does MetaProsper work? What are your goals and what are you doing?

[Speaker 1] (1:18:26 - 1:21:28)

Yeah, absolutely. I mean, MetaProsper is, well, let me define it this way. Right.

Every, most companies have an ERG for diverse communities. Right. And those are more ERG, an employee resource group.

So you have one for, you know, for Asians, you have one for black community, Latino community, et cetera. And it's more for your internal employee base to find support, to find like-minded folks, et cetera. Very internal focused.

You know, one of the things that I saw three years ago is that coming from that soul of how do we support, you know, people who look like us? You know, one of the things that I was thinking about is how much of our content to onboard people in small businesses is in languages that people like me speak. And I did an audit and it was almost zero.

And I was like, okay, great. That's an easy one. Great.

Let's do that. Let's do that. Right.

Let's translate content to onboard people onto the business. And maybe by doing that, we'll build equity with them. Maybe we'll have some, you know, stronger revenue potential.

Maybe we'll build an economic engine and boom, just like that. It happened. It was like one little move like that to translate content into 20 different languages, you know, that represent a multitude of Americans generated economic opportunity for the company and for the community.

And I thought to myself, what if we did this on a long-term basis? What if we did this every single day for every single month? And that became MetaProsper.

MetaProsper is the official external support program for Asian American small businesses, creators, and nonprofit. And really what we're looking to do is not just provide them with good training, not just provide them with opportunities like U.S. Bank sponsorship of the 626 Night Market, where we brought together a ton of different, you know, mom and pop shops, you know, training for financial literacy, you know, all of that stuff. It's how do we partner with our biggest brands and clients so that they can speak with the probably one of the, you know, one of the biggest and fastest, not probably, it is the biggest and fastest growing community in the United States to build equity.

And how do we set better precedent to do that with the black community, with the Hispanic community? And, you know, we have a sister program called MetaElevate that does just that for the black and Hispanic community. And so for us, for us, it's how do we continue to show that representation isn't just a good thing to do, but it's a business imperative.

It's a business imperative. And, you know, the reality is the reason why I am so, I have such conviction for this is because I'm a business person. I've been one.

[Speaker 3] (1:21:28 - 1:21:30)

Greg Cunningham is nodding so hard.

[Speaker 1] (1:21:31 - 1:21:33)

I'm a business person.

[Speaker 3] (1:21:33 - 1:21:35)

I can hear you nod, Greg.

[Speaker 1] (1:21:35 - 1:23:08)

I'm a business person, right? I'm a business person. And there's something to be said about doing the right thing.

There's something to be said about doing what's good, but whether or not you believe in what's good and what's right, you can never, ever, ever, ever deny revenue and business results. My numbers don't lie. Elevate's numbers don't lie.

And so whether you believe in what's happening to our communities, whether you, whether you're still grappling with it, or whether you're on the journey to understanding and having more empathy for people who don't look like you, you cannot deny dollar in, $2 in. You cannot deny $2 become $5. You cannot deny that.

And so that's why all these programs that we built have to be rooted in business, because if we could change, if we can change the mindset of supporting diverse communities from, this feels like a good thing to do versus no, no, no, our business will cease to exist unless we do this. Because majority of American businesses grapple with that today. Just as they grapple with globalization, most American businesses right now, they're like, whoa, this is like the supply chain's all over the place.

Right. Fantastic. That's exactly what was always going to happen.

Right. Evolution is always going to happen. You cannot stop.

You cannot stop the evolution of the American people. And unless you understand what the American people looks like tomorrow, your business will cease to exist. That I promise you.

[Speaker 3] (1:23:11 - 1:23:14)

I love when Greg agrees so hard, it makes him laugh.

[Speaker 2] (1:23:15 - 1:25:45)

Yeah, no, bro, you just, you. There's so much I could say. I mean, Eric, man, thank you for, for all of that because it is such a.

It is such a poignant thing and so aligned, which is why U.S. Bank is so excited to be a part of Men of Prosper, by the way, because we do understand that these businesses that Eric talked about, how prominent the issues and the gaps are in terms of getting the appropriate tools, resources, information and capital to these small businesses. And Eric, we spent a good part of this season on our podcast, talking about how languages access and you use the word translating and how you're translating content for in over 20 languages. And, you know, we've got this little film out there, Eric, that I'm going to put a plug in because, you know, I'm a, I'm a closet marketer too.

So I got to do a little promo for our film. It's called translators and it's folks who are listening can go watch it at translatorsfilm.com. It's a short little film, 20 minute documentary about these families who translate everyday life for their family.

And, oh, by the way, we actually won best short film at Tribeca X this year with the film. So it's, it's a topic that is really top of mind for us because we know that language actually is access. And the more that we can remove barriers for individuals, families, small businesses, we can actually help them fulfill their full potential.

And the reason it's so important with small businesses and the folks that you're working with, and the reason we are so proud and happy to be excited to be a part of Meta Prosper is because when these businesses succeed, all of us succeed. Wealth disparities go away. Communities are able to become more vibrant.

There is no separation between racial justice and economic justice. They're inseparable. They're inseparable twins.

You can't have one without the other. And so if we can help these small businesses grow and scale and create jobs and create vibrancy, we start to see improvement in all other dimensions of our society. And so I, I could not be more supportive of what you said.

I cannot be more supportive of the work that you're doing. And, you know, on behalf of everybody at the bank, man, just seriously thank you for all that you're doing and thanks for your partnership with us.

[Speaker 1] (1:25:45 - 1:27:13)

No, I, I, I appreciate you all. I appreciate Della Ang. Obviously Della is a, is a huge advocate for, you know, that's one of the biggest surprises to us, you know, as we were building Meta Prosper.

Again, like Prosper is was something that was born out of an idea. You know, we, we got that out, you know, we, we, we pulled it out the mud, you know, to, you know, you know, to get it, to get it launched. And I think one of the most beautiful things, I wouldn't even say surprising, the most beautiful things is the amount of fortune 500 businesses, successful, successful financial institutions like us bank that have reached out and said, we love this.

Like let's partner, like there's something here. Right. You know, and I think it shows externally that there's still a drive, that there's still potential that there's still opportunity, you know, to, to continue to one, broaden the perspective, broaden the empathy, but also just build better business, you know, overall and set better precedent.

I think too, it shows internal validation of just like, wait a second, US bank wants to partner with you. Like, like this is for real. Like I, to be fair when us, when, when you partnered with us, you know, I had this Apple ticker for the, for the meta stock for the meta stock ticker.

Right. That US bank announces partnership with Meta Prosper showed up on the ticker. Wow.

You know how real that is. Wow. That's real.

[Speaker 5] (1:27:13 - 1:27:19)

You know how real, this came from an idea of just translating contents. That's real stuff.

[Speaker 1] (1:27:19 - 1:28:03)

That's real, real stuff that like I've never seen. I was like, Oh my, you know, and I have, I have friends that work in financial institutions texting me about that. They're like, I just saw this man.

Is this the thing that you started? And I was like, yeah, I think so. You know, so again, it's, it's beautiful because it shows we're not alone.

And I think that's one of the greatest things in the human existence to find is the feeling of not being alone and whether it's a business, whether it's your personal life, finding your tribes and finding the people who support the vision is something that keeps the fire going, you know? So I, I appreciate US bank and Della and all of you for being such great partners with us.

[Speaker 3] (1:28:04 - 1:28:20)

Eric, you do not need to ask us if you can be helpful today. You have been, I thank you. You've been so inspiring, so real, so generous of spirit.

I can't thank you enough for this conversation.

[Speaker 1] (1:28:21 - 1:29:04)

I mean, I, I appreciate you two inviting me and having this conversation again. Like it's we're in a really interesting time right now where the conversations naturally evolving. I think people are hitting you know a plateau a little bit of, of, of equity and diversity, but you know, it's up to people like us to continue that conversation because it's going to affect way more than us.

And that's why, again, I think that's why the work of prosper and the work at us bank together, you know, focused on business focused on the bottom line, I think is so important because we show that it's not a good thing.

[Speaker 3] (1:29:04 - 1:29:15)

It's a strategy to legit business strategy, the legacy of your grandfather and his regiment, because you are, you are for sure going for broke. So don't stop. Okay.

[Speaker 5] (1:29:18 - 1:29:19)

I appreciate it. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (1:29:20 - 1:29:25)

Oh my gosh. We told you it'd be an hour. This has to be a two parter.

We can't edit this.

[Speaker 2] (1:29:28 - 1:29:30)

Great. Cause you got to do part one and two.

[Speaker 3] (1:29:30 - 1:29:34)

Thank you so much. And Greg, Greg, thank you so much.

[Speaker 2] (1:29:34 - 1:29:40)

Thanks for giving us so much time, Eric. Of course. That was a great conversation.

Yes, I mean, Eric, seriously. Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Finding Death Before Death Finds You [447853fb-02bc-4882-8272-ad2f0030af82]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:33)

Finding death before death finds you. In this episode, Eckhart discusses a topic that is taboo for many. The subject of death.

In the Western world, he says denial and the fear of death has prevailed for centuries. However, Eckhart explains that need not continue. He says there is a much deeper dimension to who we are.

One that never dies. And if we can get in touch with that transcendent aspect of ourselves, our fear of death will ultimately disappear.

[Speaker 1] (0:34 - 46:36)

It's important to familiarize yourself with death. You can't really live in a wise way if you are not familiar with death. They go together.

From the point of view of the physical vehicle and the form identity, one could say that every one of us is infected with a lethal virus already. But it's not a physical virus. The virus is called time.

And in the end, it will consume you and destroy you. That's for sure. So, the outcome is already assured.

The seeming solidity of our world is an illusion. Especially in the Western world, the denial of death has been prevalent for a long time. Not so in medieval times, but since we moved into modern times.

In medieval times, in the Western world, Europe, humans were very much aware of death. It was all around them. Life was very unpredictable, more so than now.

Although nowadays, it's also unpredictable, as we are seeing. But in medieval times, even more so, of course. So, death could come at any moment.

And you can see in old paintings, medieval paintings, many people on their desk or table, they had a skull, a human skull, to remind them of death. Because if you're aware of death, everything else, you have a different perspective on everything else. For example, if you were aware continuously of mortality, short-lived nature of the individual life form, perhaps nothing would be that all-consuming and serious anymore.

If you knew any dispute or disagreement or semblance. And if you have a dispute with somebody, if you remember, in a few years, we'll both be dead. Somehow, you rise above it a little bit.

This lethal virus called time, unless something else kills you first, traffic accident every year, 1,250,000 people die, many of them young. Many people in the Western world die of drugs, overdoses of drugs, which are connected with unhappiness and despair and finding something to mitigate the unhappiness and despair or lifelessness they feel. And then they are drawn to drugs and then it kills them.

They don't know who they are. They haven't gone deeper. Nobody has taught them all the most vital things and not taught to young people.

So mortality has been a taboo in the West for a long time, ever since medieval ages came to an end. In other parts of the world, death is not yet a taboo. It's still on open display, such as in India, where the dead bodies are cremated out in the open.

Anybody can come and watch dead bodies being burned and carried to the streets and then being burned. That gives you more of a sense of reality because if you deny death, you get a distorted view of things. And not only the West denied death, even old age.

Most old people are now in senior residences whereas in other countries still you see they are out in the street. So in particular at this time, people that you know may die before their time. Some others may already have been approaching old age, death, and then through this illness, they die just a little bit sooner.

So it's important to face death, not kind of think about it in a morbid way, but just to face it, the fact of it, the inevitability of it, and to see that it's very important, spiritually too, to be aware of the short-lived nature of all life forms. One of the essential teachings of the Buddha is the fact of impermanence. A lot of the fear that people feel, yes, there's fear of loss, but deep down perhaps it could all be traced to fear of death.

Because a fear of loss is your fear of losing your job or fear of losing somebody close to you. Well, that's death that's happening to somebody else. Or you have a fear of loss of job, loss of your savings, loss of home, whatever it may be.

It's the fear, a kind of loss, a diminishment of through these things. And so these are little deaths when you lose something that was important to you. There's a little death there.

Now I want to face death and talk about death just briefly without necessarily giving you too much or anything to believe in. Some people believe, of course, death is many people in Western world especially, but increasingly the East too, believe, of course, death is the end of everything, the end of you. Because life, including human life, they believe, and that's still, of course, the mainstream belief, is an accident.

Accidentally, these atoms and molecules have come together. The whole of life is an accidental conglomeration of atoms, total chance event. There's nothing behind it.

That's the belief. There's nothing, there's nothing transcendent. The entire universe, the apparent harmony of everything, the amazing life forms and everything is just a chance event.

Or as Shakespeare put it, well, he wasn't referring to that, but that is the modern view, a tale told by an idiot full of sound and fury, signifying nothing, dreadful view of life. And of course, because that, even those humans who have not done any philosophical investigations for themselves, they have all absorbed it because it's in the mainstream culture, that belief of nothing there, chance events. Complete meaning, there's no meaning.

Any meaning they believe is, it's a fabrication. There is no meaning to the universe. There's no underlying dimension.

I believe, of course, these are grave errors, but that is still the mainstream belief. And then there are some religious people who still believe that they have their own forms of belief, of life after death. Perhaps they're a little bit better off than those who believe that there's absolutely nothing.

It's all chance. There's no transcendent meaning to human life or any life. For most, it's still, even the religious people, for most, it's still, it's a belief.

It's a conceptual idea in their head. It can perhaps free them a little bit from the fear of death, but I don't know how much. So I don't want to talk in terms of belief so that in order to go beyond the fear of death, if that is possible, is there another way rather than the belief that there is something?

If you can sense that the essential you is not a visible entity, who you are essentially cannot be found in the realm of physicality. If it could be found in the realm of physicality, then a surgeon could open your brain and find you there. Or find your memories, whatever, find your thoughts, who you are, but you are not there.

You can't find a single thought because thought does not exist in the realm of physicality. In fact, science has no idea, no matter what they say, basic truth is their ego sometimes, ego doesn't allow scientists to say that they don't know. They find it hard to say they don't know.

But the basic fact is science has no idea what consciousness is. Many scientists avoid the word altogether because they don't know what to do with it. Certainly there's a relationship between the physical brain and consciousness, but they believe that the physical brain produces consciousness as a byproduct of physicality.

But that's all they can say. But they don't know even what a thought is. Where is it?

How does a thought survive in you? For decades, memories, hundreds of thousands of memories survive in you. I can remember the most crazy, insignificant things.

People have said to me 40 years ago, so many things are there, where are they? The entire you, who you are, who you are in your essence is not, you're invisible. That's the realization.

You're essentially invisible. If you can sense that essentially who you are is an invisible presence that kind of inhabits the body, not as a belief, I believe that I'm an immortal soul, that would be an old term. But right now in this moment, can you sense the essence of who you are as an invisible presence that pervades the entire body, but goes beyond it too?

The mind has to become still for a moment so that your attention can move there. But your attention and it are actually a single thing. And again, there's a very still presence there.

And even if you only have glimpses of it, then you have a kind of direct experience of who or what you are beyond the physical body. If you are very strongly identified with the physical body, then it might be more difficult. Your identity is mainly derived from the physicality, which happens to some people, particular people who are very proud of their body or very unhappy with their body, either extreme.

If you're proud of your body, derive your sense of self from it because it looks better than other people's. Your appearance and body, it's fine. It's a limitation.

I mean, appreciating if you're lucky enough to have a great body, it's wonderful. But is that all to who you are? So this sensing of yourself as an invisible presence, even if you only have it occasionally, can free you to some extent from the fear of death.

That presence is timeless. You don't remember it. It's nothing to do with memory.

It's nothing to do with what you have achieved as a person here, whether you're a big failure or big success is irrelevant. It's nothing to do with your future. It's just so comforting to know that that deeper self is beyond the decay of the body.

Now the question arises, well, what happens to it when the body dissolves? Wait and see. I don't want to give you too many ideas to believe in, but at least there's something there that is not subject to time because let's say you are 20 years now and you can sense that.

When you're 90 years old, you can still sense that. And it's the same. And then you're less fearful or no longer fearful of your own death, which will come either when you're old or sooner or the death of other people around you or wherever they are.

Then you can see that death on one level is very sad and tragic. And on another level, it's the most natural thing in the world and part of life. And then when somebody dies close to you, you can cry or weep and at the same time feel that which is beyond death in you, which must be the same as that which is beyond death in that person who died.

One could go so far as to say, nothing ever dies, nothing real ever dies. There's only the morphosis of forms, the continuous birth and death of forms, life forms, bodies. So you can be sad when somebody dies or you may be sad even when people die that you don't know.

And at the same time, there's these two levels. On one level, death is tragic. On a higher or deeper level, it's natural and not tragic at all.

And the two can coexist in you at the same time. I experienced it when my mother died. I cried and yet I felt a great peace underneath it.

If the peace could have spoken, it probably would have said, there is no death, only forms die. But it was just peace. It didn't say anything.

And then a few months later, my dad died and they didn't even live together. And then the same thing happened again. I don't know if you've heard of, there's a famous spiritual book, it's called A Course in Miracles.

I believe it's a wonderful book if you can look beyond terminologies. And this is relevant to what we've been speaking about. It says, nothing real can be threatened.

Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God. That's it.

Nothing real can be threatened. So what is it that can be threatened? Well, of course, the body can be threatened.

Everything in this physical realm can be threatened. It's subject to destruction and decay. Nothing real can be threatened.

So is there something that, if it can't be threatened, then it's not part of the physicality of what we perceive as the physical universe. Nothing unreal exists. In ultimate terms, and that's not just A Course in Miracles, it's in all Indian spiritual philosophy and so on.

In ultimate terms, the entire universe is a kind of dream, a dream of the universal mind. You are part of the dream of the universal mind. Everything is a dream of the universal mind, where it's going.

And then the universal mind, my suggestion is, is gradually awakening. It's becoming more conscious. But nothing unreal exists.

So only what is real exists. Nothing unreal actually exists. In this realization lies a deep peace that is knowing the source of all life, which is God.

The peace of God is not peace that is derived from some circumstance or something. It's not happy circumstances that give you peace. No, the peace of God is a realization of, ultimately, who you are in your essence.

And who you are in your essence is one with what the universe is in its essence. That is the peace of God. And then you can relax and say, OK, but not as a believer.

You know that this is all fine, but there's something beyond that. And I'm part of that which is beyond. So you might say then, as I say, well, I wouldn't mind in the realm of time, could live a few more years, maybe.

Perhaps continue to be a channel for consciousness coming into this world. But if that's not to be, that's fine. It doesn't really matter.

Now, most people believe you need more time because they believe time will eventually enable them to find themselves. A fuller version of themselves. The worst thing you can do to a person is to remove time from them.

And so you have no more time. And that happens, for example, when you have an illness and you go to a doctor and the doctor says, well, maybe six weeks. You have six weeks.

It's virtually nothing. And that would be devastating for most, especially, of course, if you are completely identified with this personality in the form. You've never sensed anything beyond it.

And it's awful because you said, I haven't. I'm not comp... But then there have been cases, some I knew personally, who were told this.

They knew only a few months or a few weeks. And because time was removed from them, they suddenly accepted it. They didn't go into, oh my God, this.

And suddenly they were lived completely in the present moment. Like a little child, almost. When I was still doing counseling sessions years ago, I had a couple of people independently who had virtually no time left.

And they became enlightened beings, just the light of consciousness shining through them. And we just sat together a few times and they kind of just looked at me. There was no person there anymore.

The person was already gone. The person had already died. But the knowledge that I have no more time didn't give any food, any fuel to the person anymore.

The personality just dissolved already. And what was left when the personality dissolved was just the consciousness behind the personality and that pure consciousness shining through. And that is what you sense.

Again, you get a glimpse of when you sense within and feel that you are lived, that an invisible presence lives through you. And when the personality dies, which is the ego death, then of course, in some cases, the personality dies before the body dies. And then that shines through, the consciousness shines through.

And that's an amazing thing. In the Western world, the contemporary world, nobody knows what to do with that. There's no knowledge to refer to.

Perhaps in more distant past, yes, they would have been recognized. They would have become saints. Or in India, even nowadays, more readily they would have been recognized as holy men or women.

Just look at them. Wow. But it doesn't matter whether they were recognized or not.

They were not concerned with that. And time suddenly didn't matter anymore. What is another 10, 20, 30 years?

So what? No longer made any difference whatsoever because they realized that the essence of who they are, the total fulfillment of their lives, it doesn't matter how old they were. The destiny of humans is that realization.

Whether it comes to you shortly before you die at the age of 30 or shortly before you die at the age of 90, it doesn't matter. And of course, this is where the saying comes from. Find death before death finds you.

So that means that's the death of the personality. Now, here, what we are engaged in through the teaching and the practice is a gradual diminishment of the personality. Now, some of you, when you're confronted with death or death close to you and see a very situation involving death, it could be that suddenly your entire personality can also die.

It could happen. And that's a wonderful thing. It's the greatest thing that can happen to a human.

In the meantime, it's quite enough that here, through the practice, there is a diminishment of you as a person. The person or the personality becomes somewhat less important and all-pervasive because you begin to sense there is something beyond it. And that something beyond it is more essentially who you are than the person or the personality.

And that something beyond it can shine through the personality as long as it's there. And then the personality is actually a much nicer personality, so to speak. It's not as obnoxious as most personalities.

And it's not such a problem maker like most personalities, but the dimension is completely missing. Then without that, personalities are just a nuisance. You might have noticed.

Now, with some people, you have that shining through. There are people who have never come into touch with any spiritual teaching, and it's happening in them for some other reason, triggered by something else, and that's perfectly fine. So to have a deeper perspective on what's happening around you, because, yes, as we are experiencing this collective, in conventional terms, to use the old-fashioned word, calamity.

If you experience this right now, which is to gain a deeper perspective on it is very important. Then you're no longer drawn into the hysterical, fear-mongering, overreaction to it. And you are light in this world.

You are peace, because then there's some peace in you. You become at peace because that presence that you sense is at peace, your connectedness with Source. And then you can do a lot of good in this world.

Even just your presence does a lot of good, because you emanate a certain frequency. But, of course, you probably will do them, just be there, or could be. You might speak to people.

You may be active here or there to help whatever you feel called upon to do. But you're not devastated anymore. The end of the world could happen.

And you would still know nothing real can be threatened, nothing unreal exists. Because the world, what we see as the world is, yes, one way of looking at it is, you could say it's the dream of the universal mind. It's one way of looking at it.

Another way of looking at it is it's a surface phenomenon. Underneath it, there are vast energy movements, and there is an intelligence underlying it. And that's, we could say, to connect it with the other ways, the universal mind.

Underneath it, there is an intelligence energy field that expresses itself on the surface as the manifest life-forms continuously. But the life-forms are here. What lives through the life-forms is the universal intelligence underneath the invisible energy field that is the organizing principle behind all phenomena that arise in this world.

And that is an invisible energy field. In fact, different energies, but all deriving from one energy and then separating into other one energy field is the earth itself. The earth itself is a living being.

It has an intelligence of its own. The earth itself is a manifestation of the universal mind, of the universal consciousness. And every human being on the earth is a manifestation of the universal consciousness connected with the earth.

But the earth is not a dead thing. And this is why I will speak about this in more detail.

But for now, just a brief mention.

There were only five extinctions on the planet. Total chaos, chaotic, total eradication of, in some cases, 60, 70, even 90% of all life-forms in this, I believe, the second extinction disappeared. And then how was it that each time out of nothing, the earth regenerated itself with even more complex life-forms?

Because that which was the underlying intelligence is actually much greater than our limited human intelligence. And it is vast. It has a totally different view of time.

So it then produced new life-forms. But just to know what applies to the earth applies to each human. Underlying it, there is an invisible energy field and it holds the body together temporarily.

The important thing is to be able to sense it. And everything else, the world itself is no longer seen as the ultimate reality. The ultimate reality is unseen.

So that frees you, to some extent, from the world. But you participate in it. There's an ancient Christian saying, this is very beautiful, that points to a particular way of being in this world.

And the saying is, to be in the world, but not of it. That would be enlightened living. You are in the world, but you're not of the world.

It shows the two dimensions. It's an ancient Christian saying, to be in the world, but not of it. And that really is for us, for you, to realize and to live, to be a helpful, beneficial presence in the world.

But not realizing that your home is not in this realm. I like the English word home, H-O-M-E. What does that remind you of?

The Indian om, om, O-M, om. The sacred sound that points to the origin of all things. It could be either coincidence, or it could be that they are connected.

Would not be too surprising, because the European languages are Indo-European languages. They have many of their words have roots in Sanskrit. So what we've been talking about is pointing to the possibility of being peaceful or at peace, even in the face of apparent disaster and death and so on.

And it's sometimes only through the disaster that people find that dimension. There is a transcendent dimension to this universe. Just as there's a transcendent dimension to who you are.

You are who you are. There's the physical body, and there's your mind. Is that who you are?

In this dimension, the sense-perceived reality, that's not where you ultimately are. So you are invisible. You can sense that when you become very attentive and go within.

You can sense that the essence of who you are is that indefinable consciousness, the presence. It cannot be sense-perceived with the senses. But where does that come from?

What is the essence of all life? That's the light of the world, Jesus called it, the light of the world. And you are the light of the world, he said.

That's consciousness. You are consciousness. Where does it come from?

It comes from God. But where is God? And what is God?

Well, we cannot explain what God is. God is transcendent to this dimension. It's not in the universe.

There's a transcendent dimension. And from there, God emanates something into this world like the sun emanates light continuously. So God is like the sun but not part of this universe.

It emanates consciousness into this dimension. And it's this dimension of space and time. And here, the emanation of consciousness is creating a universe.

It's not finished yet. It's continuing. The consciousness that you are is a ray from the one source of all life that we call God.

So what we perceive as suffering, the birth pangs of life forms in this universe, they are like a bad dream in the process of the universe, in the process of being created still. It's not a finished thing. And there are the limited perceptions that we have create a very dream that appears like a nightmare.

But when you wake up out of it, you realize it, oh, it was only a nightmare. What does it mean on a practical level? What does it mean when a child dies in a seemingly innocent child or millions of people suffer in a meaningless way?

Now, this is very strange. If every human being is regarded as an autonomous entity, it's very tragic. But I would suggest a different perspective, just as a try it out or a higher perspective.

There's only one life. There's only one consciousness. And that manifests in countless forms, countless life forms.

It's the indwelling presence in every life form manifesting briefly, but continuously. And this one presence is the identity of each. Let's stay with human beings.

The identity of each human being is that underlying presence. That's the essence identity. Every human being is the same being on that level that gradually, that same being that lives, takes on a temporary form and then dissolves.

And in this continuous taking on form and dissolving as a form, there is an awakening process. I would suggest for a moment that you regard the entire human race, all humanity, look at it as a single organism. All humanity is one single, invisible organism.

And this organism is not separate from the source of all life. It is an emanation of the one source that we could call God if we wanted to. It's an emanation into this dimension of space and time.

And every human is, I could say, a piece of God, a tiny fragment of God in disguise. That's like a ray of sunlight in disguise. Every human.

So the essence identity of every human is consciousness. It's the light of consciousness, which is the light of God. And so what is evolving is the one human consciousness is undergoing an evolutionary process.

Every human being that ever lived and ever will live is a tiny cell, to borrow a word from the physical realm, is a tiny cell in this evolving being. It evolves in this dimension. It becomes, there's more of God that flows into it.

So there's a gradual process at work that, in a sense, you could say, a spiritualization of all matter, of all universe. Matter becomes less and less heavy and physical, including the human body. But we don't need to go there.

But to realize that your essence identity and my essence identity and the essence identity of all beings is one. And emanates from one source. And you can recognize it when you look at other human beings.

And you can, now the important thing is you need to be able to sense, if only faintly, the essence of who you are that is beyond the personality, the form, the form identity, physical, mental form, personality. The essence of who you are is not that. The essence of who you are is that which you can sense at this moment as consciousness.

Without any memory or anticipation, you sense that essence. It's only in the present. It's inseparable.

It's called presence. The presence, the consciousness. And then you realize you no longer need to believe something.

And then you can intuitively comprehend what is very misleading and could easily be misinterpreted when you express it in words. Then you can sense that there is a transcendent harmony that in this harmony transcends the apparent suffering. Because what's suffering is just the birthing process of the one consciousness.

The birthing process of this one that is gradually expressing itself more and more fully through these forms. But the forms, you and me, do not have an independent autonomous identity. It just looks like it.

We are continuously an emanation of the one. We are never separate from the one. And even when this body dissolves, the form that is beyond the body will still persist for a while before it realizes fully where it comes from, what it is connected to.

Not the personality. The personality does not survive. But there is an essence that is you that survives for quite a while until it fully realizes its home.

But gradually you live more and more consciously, which means when you have conscious connecting it with source, then all the upheavals of this world, which come in many forms, personal forms and collective forms, do not affect you anymore at the deepest level. They can still affect you on the surface level of your person. You get, oh, I'd rather be healthy than ill.

I'd rather not catch this virus. Of course you would. But you're no longer, whatever happens or doesn't happen in this world, does not affect you at the deepest level where the rock is, that is the foundation, which really means the essence of who you are.

So the only way to become free of being at the mercy not only of things that happen around you, you just hope that everything will be okay, but it's not always okay. Can't be. Not always at the mercy of things around you and no longer at the mercy of your own mind.

Whatever thoughts go through your mind, that is the dreadful fate. Then your inner state of being is dependent on what's going on around you and then you're always fearful. Oh, I might lose that or this may happen.

What do I do then? And you're at the mercy of whatever thoughts come into your head that interpret the world and interpret yourself in terms of their conditioning, which is from the past. So to become free, to become liberated, you become liberated from the world, although you should participate in the world, but with a sense of detachment.

You're not bound to it or by it. So you participate in a more enjoyable and often joyful way in the affairs of this world and you have a relationship and you appreciate the good things without needing to attach yourself to the good things or the relationship because if you lose it, you're nobody again because they give you your identity that there's nothing anymore that you need for your sense of identity because you already have found your essence identity which has nothing to do with the things of this world or your mind. And that's a wonderful liberation when you do not need the world to provide you with ultimate satisfaction, connectedness with the source of who you are.

Then you become free of the world and then you actually participate in the world in a way that not to use almost a cliché expression that makes the world a better place. But what does it mean make the world a better place? The only thing it can really mean it has any meaning is it makes the world a more conscious place so that humans begin to live more consciously and that means no longer totally identified with their personality and the conditioning of their minds.

A more conscious world is the new earth that I sometimes speak or write about. Now, it seems very often that the new earth would more easily arise if the world would not present so many obstacles to the arising of a new consciousness of which the new earth would just be an outer manifestation. What we are really talking about, of course, when we talk about a new earth, we're talking about a new consciousness.

It's not new, but it's the awakened consciousness. It's not new because it is timeless, but it's new to you, as it sometimes say in shops when you buy second-hand goods, new to you. If you haven't experienced it before, suddenly it seems like a new consciousness.

It's a deeper dimension that had always been there, but you hadn't realized it. And when you suddenly realize it, you call it new consciousness. Why not?

So there we are. The new earth is the outer manifestation of the new consciousness, which is the awakened consciousness. And this is, your purpose is to bring this into this world by embodying it, embodying it, not just through your words.

Yes, when you speak, it tends to be more inspired, more useful, more helpful, more good speech rather than destructive speech and action that you take, no longer dysfunctional, egoically motivated action, all these things are good. And even if you don't say or do anything, just the fact that you are here as representing the awakened consciousness, and even if you're not fully awakened yet, there may still be remnants of ego. That's good enough.

You represent the awakening consciousness on the planet, and that your purpose is to be there as that consciousness. Your secondary purpose is to have a fulfilling life as a personality. And the personality can never have a fulfilling life if you don't realize who you are beyond the personality.

It's only the realization who you are in your essence that can give some sense of satisfaction on the level of your personality. Otherwise, you're always looking for yourself in this world, and it's always whatever is frustrating. Every relationship will end in frustration.

Everything you achieve ultimately will not satisfy you, and you keep looking and looking. So here we are, and your job, your mission is to align yourself with the present moment and whatever is happening here and see that it is an opportunity, this upheaval that we're experiencing at the moment, and it probably will not be the first upheaval that's going to come on a collective level because this is a time for upheavals, but it is also a time for awakening. The two go together.

Just in a personal life, you need the adversity, as we've seen, to awaken. It's an opportunity, but not a guarantee. And there can be a more collective awakening if not, of course, not the whole of humanity, but far more humans through experiencing the upheaval that not only we're experiencing now, but the upheavals to come in the near future, and they are inseparable from the awakening of consciousness, and they are part of the transcendent hidden harmony behind the apparent opposites.

And so what looks like tragic and unpleasant on a conventional lower level is actually perfectly fine as it should be on a higher level. It would not be happening otherwise. It's all part of the awakening of the human being and planetary awakening.

And what awakens is not you. You don't awaken and I don't awaken. Ultimately, you and I are constructs, mental constructs, but that which shines through us, the consciousness that is awakening in this world.

There's only one consciousness that awakens. So awakening is not anybody's personal achievement. It's only there when you recognize that the person is a temporary, short-lived, relatively insignificant construct.

That's fine. You honor it as much as necessary in this dimension here, and something else is happening that far transcends the person but would not even happen if it weren't for that person. It's only because the ego was, and still to some extent is, a necessary prerequisite for the awakening of consciousness.

The very thing that seems to obstruct the awakening of consciousness is a prerequisite for it happening. That's quite amazing. In Buddhism, there's a saying that says, if there were no illusion, there would be no enlightenment.

[Speaker 2] (46:37 - 46:57)

Eckhart Tolle Finding Meaning in The Existential Void [c7f4748f-2a07-4212-bff8-e813ae80c49d]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:05)

Finding meaning in the existential void. In this episode, Eckhart talks about suffering consciously and how to deal with difficult emotions, including fear, anxiety, and regret. Eckhart also discusses nihilism, the belief that life is pointless and devoid of meaning.

He explains the idea, dates back to Darwin and his idea that evolution is a random chain of events, molecules and atoms aimlessly coming together over millions of years. Eckhart says this very limited negative view still affects millions of people today. He says nihilism in its extreme form can lead to despair and even death as many seek to medicate themselves with drugs, alcohol or other substances to escape suffering, alienation and emptiness in their lives.

Eckhart explains that we all have a deeper purpose which is connected to the purpose of the universe. He says if we align with that, then we become a bringer of light. Eckhart says the world is in dire need of awakening.

We all must ask ourselves, am I aligned with the light of consciousness?

[Speaker 1] (1:08 - 45:27)

Suffering in your life, if it still arises, use it so that the ego gets burned up by the suffering, so to speak. The ego gets burned up in this fire of suffering. Now we can call this conscious suffering.

That's a very interesting concept, conscious suffering. When suffering arises, become aware of it and accept that it's there. In the form of fear, anxiety, regret, you have self-pity, you have unhappy sense of self, complaining about your life, many forms of you've lost things, you don't know things that you had identified with, taken away from you.

Who am I now? I'm nobody. I'm nobody.

Well, that's great. Be nobody more completely. Realize fully your nobody-ness.

I don't know who I am anymore. I've lost everything. All the things I've worked for, I've begun.

Everything is so pointless. Their mind is still talking. It's all been for nothing.

It's all meaningless, meaningless. This is your mind talking. Don't believe in the things it says, but it continues talking.

Many humans in this world are suffering from what we could call nihilism. I don't know if you know that word, nihilism. Nihilism means the belief that everything is absolutely and utterly pointless.

That's a deep form of suffering. Nihilism, it doesn't make what's the point of it or just this awful life of mine. The whole world is pointless.

It's so awful. And that's very deep suffering, the total lack of meaning. Everything is arbitrary, random, and meaninglessness is a mental disease that is afflicting millions of humans because the mainstream culture still believes.

It goes back to the 19th century. It goes back to Darwin, Origin of Species. He said life evolved, which undoubtedly is true.

But he said life evolved, but the evolution of life on this planet is an arbitrary, random course of events. Molecules and atoms at random coming together and forming life forms over millions of years. Random, the idea of randomness in the theory of evolution put forward by Darwin and others, the idea of randomness means there is no purpose or intelligence behind it whatsoever.

It's a random process. In other words, it's the belief that all life on this planet has no meaning. It just is a meaningless conglomeration of atoms and molecules.

It's ultimately meaningless. That basically is the underlying assumption behind the theory of evolution that many people still believe. And it has seeped into mainstream culture.

And even people who have never even heard of Darwin, it has seeped into their belief system that we live in a meaningless universe. Before that happened, we had certain religious beliefs. So there was some meaning.

A lot of that perhaps was ideological and ego driven. Nevertheless, in the ancient religion, there is access to the transcendent is still there, here and there. There were still little openings into the transcendent, even though many forms of religion developed into ideological belief systems that strengthen the ego.

Nevertheless, religion still carried on still carry the secret of transcendence is still there hiding within the religions. And that became inaccessible to many humans. So now we have the pandemic of nihilism.

This is one of the pandemics far worse than any physical pandemic, that everything the belief that everything is meaningless. And you can have a meaning in your life that is very limited, like for many people as a meaning, okay, I want to have a career that gives you limited meaning in your personal life, working for a career, nothing wrong with that. I'm working to create a better life for myself and my family.

That's also wonderful and great. I'm working to achieve recognition in this world, etc, etc, that's fine, too. But at some point, a meaning that is purely personal may begin to lose its power.

So that let's say you've spent two or three decades working for your career, which is nothing wrong with it, you may arrive at a point where your career doesn't mean anything anymore, or you lose it. That you lose your career and your status, or it is it consumes you so completely that you become ill with stress, or in some other way, turns into something that's not satisfying at all that actually creates suffering. So something can give you limited meaning for a while for years, and then suddenly turn out to be ultimately meaningless.

Some people suddenly wake up and all my life, some people fall ill, seriously ill, and then they look back on their life and see all this was so pointless, accumulating possessions. Why did I do that? What was the point in that?

All the things that I was so anxious about, when they're now, let's say they're seriously ill now. All the things that I was so anxious about, that was so unnecessary and pointless. All the things that I'd been striving for were ultimately pointless.

That can be an opening. Suddenly, wow, the limited personal meaning, which was fine, it's better than no meaning at all. To have a personal meaning in your life, better than no meaning at all.

But ultimately, that's not satisfying in the long term. You have to go to a deeper meaning that transcends who you are as a person. And that is, am I aligned with the purpose of the universe?

That is the ultimate true meaning. Am I aligned with the purpose? And what is the purpose of the universe?

The purpose of the universe is consciousness, bringing more consciousness into this dimension. That's the purpose of the universe, bringing more consciousness into this dimension. Am I aligned with that?

Then, if that is the case, if you're aligned with that, you're a bringer of consciousness, a bringer of light. That is the ultimate true purpose. And it could be that your personal purpose and the deeper purpose can go together.

That's fine. So you can have a career, and yet it's not totally ego-dominated. While you are active working, you bring in the light of consciousness.

You do things in your work that bring more consciousness into this dimension. That's wonderful. It is not necessarily a case of either having a career or being aligned with universal purpose, which is you can bring the two together.

That's the balance between being and doing, as I sometimes call it, the balance between being and doing, bringing those two together. So there's only one true purpose in your life. And you have to discover that.

And that is, am I aligned with the consciousness? And am I a bringer of consciousness? So the end of nihilism is that your entire past becomes relatively unimportant when you realize the meaning of life is to be a bringer of consciousness.

Let's say your entire past was one disaster after another. Some people's life is like, unfortunately, it was like that. Let's say you ended up in prison because you did one wrong and bad thing after another.

But then you look back in your so-called life and say, my God, that was a disaster. My entire life was just a disaster. Okay.

But at this moment, I realize the consciousness that I am. And I've all the suffering that I have created for myself and others. All the suffering I've created for myself and others was part of the egoic dream, the delusion, the egoic delusion and the conditioning that I came into this world with.

And then you awaken at this moment. If a totally disastrous life brings you to a point of awakening now, the whole thing was great. It suddenly has a purpose.

Retrospectively, all the disasters brought you to this moment of awakening. So in retrospect, what was totally absurd and meaningless, suddenly, it fulfilled a purpose. The past can suddenly be realized as having fulfilled its purpose by creating the suffering that led to your awakening.

So there's no regret anymore about the past. It all made sense. So the meaning arises retrospectively.

It only remains absurd and disastrous if the awakening doesn't happen. Then you're trapped in the dreadful dream. Continue to be trapped in it.

Wow. So be aligned with universal purpose. That is the ultimate purpose.

No matter what you do, no matter how it expresses itself through you, that doesn't matter. Realize that. And if you want to look at your life in terms of failure and success, as many people do, is my life a failure?

Is my life a success? What criterion do you use for failure or success? Do you allow this world to tell you whether you're a failure or success?

To a large extent, this world is insane. So are you allowing an insane world to tell you whether your life is a failure or success? If this world cannot tell you, then what is it?

Obviously, the only true criterion is whether you are conscious or not in this moment. If you're conscious in this moment, instead of being totally immersed in the dream of your conditioned unawareness, the fictitious person, if you are conscious in this moment, then that is the greatest and only true success there could be in this life. Your entire past becomes irrelevant if it has taken you to this point.

In that sense, it is relevant, but ultimately it's irrelevant. You are awake in this moment. You represent the awakened state of consciousness in humanity.

Well, nothing else is success if you even want to use the term success, but I would probably recommend even here not to use the term success because that would imply that there's somebody there that says, I have achieved consciousness. And again, you would create a sense of another conceptual identity in your mind, another form of ego that says, I am conscious other than all these people are not conscious. I have achieved something.

I have achieved awakening. That's a delusion again, because the ego that claims to have achieved awakening is the ego that claims some kind of achievement. You can only awaken if the ego subsides and the ego becomes transparent.

Then awakening happens, but it's not an achievement. There's nobody there to have achieved anything. It's something that happens through you.

The ego in some way created it in a negative sense because the ego created the suffering that led to the awakening. In that sense, perhaps the ego did achieve it, but ultimately to claim I have achieved awakening is a delusion. It's an ego delusion.

So nihilism then is something, a form of suffering that can lead to an awakening. It can also lead to suicide. It can lead to despair until you die.

In many cases it does. It can lead to bitterness and resentment to desensitize yourself against the suffering of meaninglessness. You take drugs, you become addicted, and this is an epidemic of drug addiction around these days.

There's a desperate, very urgent need for the awakening of humanity, the awakening of humans. There's a great urgency now because we're moving into a critical, collectively critical situation on this planet, and that is absolutely necessary for awakening. Nobody awakens in their comfort zone.

Your mind might say, these are the optimum conditions for awakening. Nobody disturbs me. I get peace and quiet all around me.

No particular worldly challenges to distract me from my meditation periods, excellent food, everything pure and clean, two massages every day, getting rubbed with essential oils, fantastic conditions for spiritual awakening. Let's say in this spa where you pay

$2,000 per day, let's say you've won the lottery, so you go to the spa, optimum, fantastic conditions for awakening, and would you awaken there? You could become very peaceful.

It would be just very pleasant, very pleasant, and you would be very much like a plant that grows from seed in a protected environment like a greenhouse, just the right temperature, and the plant grows very quickly and blossoms, but it's very weak. The moment the greenhouse, let's say the plant is then put outside, immediately it would shrink and collapse. It hasn't developed the inner strength to exist in the real world.

So the optimum way of awakening is to use the challenges you're facing in your daily life. Instead of believing, if I could only find an ideal situation, then I would easily awaken spiritually. No, you wouldn't.

You would actually, after some initial very pleasant experiences in this imaginary spa, you would actually, your level of consciousness would go down, you would gradually go back to, you go to sleep. It's so pleasant. Presence only arises when it's necessary, when it's necessary.

Nothing comes unless it's needed. There needs to be a call for it. In other words, there needs to be a gap between the current situation and what is needed to remedy the current situation.

Things need to be difficult, otherwise change doesn't happen on every level. In the physical level, if you want to get stronger, if you wanted to have change on a physical level, what do you do to get stronger? Well, you have to exercise, you have to maybe start jogging, you start weightlifting, you start whatever you do.

But what does that mean? What does it mean? Okay, you do weightlifting, you want to have a stronger body, fine.

Or you go jogging. You're making life difficult for your body. You're making life difficult for your body.

Then the body says, if we could speak, life is, it's so difficult I need more energy, otherwise I can't cope. The body cries out for more energy. You're forcing the body to cry out for more energy, just give me more energy.

And at some point, let's say jogging at first is arduous and it's, at some point you experience an influx of energy and suddenly the physical exercise becomes invigorating. Oh, it's great, you feel more powerful, there's an influx of energy. And even the weightlifting becomes, oh, you're straight, oh.

Energy comes in, but why does it come? Because there was a cry, there's a need for it. If you had not created the need by making life difficult for your body, it wouldn't have come.

You would have remained on your couch as a couch potato and get weaker. So even on that level, it works. On any level, there needs to be a gap between the energy that's there now and the energy that's needed.

So this is where suffering comes in. Ultimately, everything is consciousness in different vibrational frequencies. There's only one energy.

The one energy can express itself as physical energy, can express the sexual energy, can express itself as emotional, as mental energy, and it can express itself as spiritual energy, which is pure consciousness, in the same way that water can be there as a solid, as ice, can be there as liquid. It's still water, but it looks something totally different. So you have a block of ice, then you can have water, which is liquid, and then you can have vapor, which is, you can't even see it.

It's water in the air. It's all water. In the same way, consciousness has different vibrational frequencies.

It can be there as physical energy, can be there as mental energy, as thinking, and it can be there as spiritual, as the highest frequency of consciousness, spiritual energy. So as I said, you have to make life difficult for your body so that your body can get stronger. And in the same way, your life experiences difficulty, which you experience as suffering, so that there can be an influx of energy, but not on a physical level necessarily, but on a higher level, an influx of spiritual energy, ultimately, that dissolves the suffering, but wouldn't have come without the suffering.

It dissolves the suffering, but without it, it wouldn't have come. There needs to be a cry for help. So you can, if you can welcome the suffering in your life, even let's take a simple thing.

Say you feel unhappy. Usually unhappiness is created with some kind of narrative in your mind that creates it. You tell yourself the sad story of my life, me and my life, and you tell yourself it's sad, or how sad it's going to be, might be even worse than the past.

So the narrative in your mind, and you feel unhappy, or you might just feel unhappy even without the narrative, because you're telling yourself a sad narrative for so long that you have an emotional equivalent of the sad narrative in your mind, and you carry that in your emotional field, this sadness that you carry here, and that expresses a feeling of unhappiness, probably associated with certain thoughts, yes, or perhaps it's nihilism, it's so pointless, whatever, I have failed, or whatever it may be, doesn't matter. Unhappiness is there. Oh, I'm so unhappy.

I'm unhappy. Okay. Now, a little experiment.

It sounds a little strange. Can you be completely okay with being unhappy? Okay, I'm unhappy.

That's fine. Let me be unhappy. Can you completely accept that you're unhappy?

Instead of not wanting to be unhappy, which is a normal thing, it's not wanting to be unhappy. I'd rather be happy than unhappy. But as an experiment, if you're unhappy, and especially if you have frequent states of unhappiness, and I'm not talking about certain situations that require action, but you haven't taken the action yet, and that's why you're unhappy, take some action, if you can do something about it.

But if unhappiness arises frequently in you, in your life, no matter where you are and what you're doing, practice complete acceptance of whatever it is that you're experiencing at this moment. As an experiment, complete acceptance of whatever it is you're experiencing at this moment. Okay, unhappy.

All right. That's okay. Let me be unhappy.

I'm just unhappy. It's okay to be unhappy. I'm unhappy.

I'm so unhappy. Let's see what happens if you completely accept that you're unhappy. I'm unhappy.

I don't want to make a prediction, but you may find that the unhappiness cannot survive if you completely accept it. It sounds very paradoxical. But anything that you completely accept does undergo transformation.

And complete acceptance is also a diminishment of ego. The ego shrinks in the state of acceptance. Now, acceptance means accept whatever you're experiencing at this moment.

That's all, just this moment. Accept whatever you're experiencing at this moment, because you might as well, because this is what you're experiencing at this moment. If you don't accept it, it gets worse.

So, accept unhappiness. Okay. You can do the same with fear.

You have anxiety, say anxiety, and you feel it in your body. Okay. You completely accept there's anxiety in your body.

You can feel it. It's a contraction. You can feel it's in your stomach.

There it is. I accept it. It's there.

Accept. Now, you may find, especially anxiety or fear, when you completely accept it, it becomes transformed into presence. So, before there was a contraction of the fear, acceptance opens it up.

Contraction is no longer there. And you just become intensely present. Where before there was fear, there's now intense presence.

And if presence is lost, you can go move back into fear. So, practice with that. Acceptance is a quick way of transcending ego, because ego thrives and lives on resistance, resisting what is.

So, practice and see what happens, especially with any form of unhappiness. And then, gradually, you live in state of alignment with the present moment. No matter what form it takes, you're aligned with what is.

And that ego subsides immediately. And there you can enter presence without more suffering. Until you practice that, you need the suffering to force you into presence.

But you don't need to wait any longer for suffering to force you into presence. If you are here now, listening to this, you've already had enough of that. You had enough suffering to bring you to this point, to this point of realization.

For the further evolution of your consciousness, you do not need more suffering. You just need to invite presence into your life, more presence into your life. And you do it by aligning yourself with the present moment, no matter what form it takes.

And then, the transcendent dimension opens up with the acceptance of the present moment. The transcendent dimension opens up in your life. And there it is.

It's a wonderful, wonderful process. Again, I use the term conscious suffering. Conscious suffering means you accept the suffering.

And by accepting the suffering, you will experience a transformation of suffering. Now, one little thing to be careful of, accepting suffering, do not mistake this for meaning that you continue to be engaged in creating an unhappy narrative in your mind about you and your life, or whatever situation it may be. That's not the acceptance of that.

You have to feel the suffering, and then accept it. But don't allow it to use your mind and continuously create an unhappy narrative in your mind. Then you'll be unconscious, and you cannot accept, because you're not even there to accept anything.

So acceptance means the narrative dissolves. And all that remains is a feeling, whatever it may be, unhappiness, anxiety, whatever it is, the feeling, and that you accept. Then the transformation happens.

That's the beauty of it. In this world, you have to be careful with what kind of thoughts you absorb from the collective, because there's so much unhappiness in the collective energy field of humanity. So it's very easy to get drawn into that.

You're not careful and participate in the suffering of the collective, fear, anxiety, anger, that's everywhere. It's also very easy to be affected by certain thoughts that can take over your mind, that come from the collective thoughts and thought patterns. Anybody who is not sufficiently present, sufficiently aware, is susceptible to being infected by certain thoughts.

Certain thoughts become lodged in your mind. Every thought is an energy formation, like you could say a little entity. Thought gets lodged in your mind and attracts associated thoughts and becomes a bundle of thoughts.

And without awareness, you identify with the thoughts, and then you're being possessed by certain thoughts. They may arise from your personal, but very commonly they arise from the collective. In your personal life, you could develop some kind of thought that, of an obsessive nature, that occupies your mind, and you can't get rid of it.

It could be the thought of one, directed to one particular person, very negative thoughts. At the simplest level, you can have a melody that you can't get rid of in your mind. You can have a whole day or two days, and you can't get rid of this thing that's in your mind.

It repeats itself again and again. You can have certain assumptions about this world. They may be totally absurd and irrational, or there may be some truth to it, but only there may be an aspect of the truth.

The most absurd thoughts could be there. You might think that the extraterrestrials are already here. Well, they may be.

And every other human is actually an alien, and you just have to look at them carefully to figure out whether they are aliens or humans. And I'm not excluding the possibility that some aliens may be here, but we are really, I'm talking about obsessive thoughts that are probably not correct. And then it covers your subsequent perception of reality, gets totally colored by the obsessive thoughts, and it can explain everything in those terms.

All the evils of the world have suddenly one explanation. Another one that's also in the collective, you can have a thought that the entire world is divided into oppressor and oppressed. Any human being either belongs to the oppressors or to the oppressed.

That was an idea in communism, in economic terms, in terms of social power. They divided humanity into oppressors and oppressed. And then they look at, you can look at any human being and say, he's oppressed, he's an oppressor.

The thing is, of course, oppressors and oppressed have existed, and some areas still exist. But to take one fragment of truth, because the totality of human life is much vaster than that, this is one aspect. But if you take one aspect that then occupies your mind because of lack of awareness, you are possessed by a thought.

And this thought says the entire world, this is just one example, it could give many examples. The essential identity of any human being is either they are oppressed or they are the oppressor. Now, of course, if that is the thoughts that dominate your mind, then obviously you would probably regard the oppressed as the good ones and the oppressors as the bad ones.

So that simplifies life enormously. You immediately can decide who is good and who is bad. And you are probably good, presumably.

Even if you are an oppressor, traditionally, you now recognize your sins and you will atone for your sins of being an oppressor and you side with the oppressed, and therefore you become one of the good people. So we have the same phenomenon in very extreme form. We all know about Soviet communism, we know about Chinese Mao Zedong Cultural Revolution, quite a crazy time period, we know national socialism in Germany, all the evils perpetrated by all these collective delusional systems that divided people into good and bad, entire groups gave them an identity.

I was in Cambodia a few years ago and visited the death camps of the Cambodians. It's a small country, so not many people are familiar with the recent history of Cambodia, but they had an extreme communist regime under a mad dictator called Pol Pot. And in that extreme communist regime, Cambodia experienced dreadful suffering.

One third of the population was killed by their own government because they were the oppressors. An oppressor was anybody who could read and write, because obviously they were exploiting the peasants. Anybody who wore glasses, they would be sent from the city into the countryside to work on the fields where they didn't have enough food, and most of them starved.

Total lack of humanity, total lack because of the entire country was dominated by one absurd and obsessive thought that made it impossible for them to relate to any human being as a human being. They relate them through the conceptualization that thought had created for them. They couldn't sense the humanity, the being of the other human anymore, the moment that imposed a conceptual identity on them.

This is an extreme example of what can happen to you when you're taken over by certain thoughts in your mind. This is not to mean that, of course, oppressor and oppressive existed and exist, but it's not the entire explanation. There are many other facts in this life.

But I'm saying all this because you need to be very alert so that your mind is not taken over by certain thoughts that invade your mind and color your view of reality. There are certain irrational thoughts that are floating around in the collective at the present time. It's very easy for you to absorb some of them and being possessed by certain thoughts that may be so irrational that it's unbelievable, but I'm not giving any examples.

You have to find it out for yourself with awareness you can. Be very careful with observing your mind. Be there as a witness of your mind so that you don't get taken over by certain thoughts, that your mind does not get taken over by certain thoughts, and then you cannot perceive reality anymore as it is.

Everything is colored by the veil of irrational thinking. Nowadays, these things can spread very quickly and easily, these irrational things. In the past, they were confined to either one country or one area in a particular country.

But nowadays, certain irrational thoughts can go through the entire world through the technology we have and can quickly affect millions of humans all over the world. So in the past, you had it, as I said, limited. Let's say the hunt for witches in the past, totally absurd and irrational.

It's a mental disease that affected certain countries or areas in certain countries. And this mental disease, then, there were some places in Europe, there were villages and towns in Europe in the Middle Ages. During that time of collective insanity, there were almost no women left in some villages and towns at that time because they're all being burned or drowned because they were called as witches, absolute insanity.

So don't underestimate how insane humans can become. The only antidote that you have against it is awareness so that your mind does not get affected by a mental virus. The awareness is aware of what your mind is doing so that your mind does not get occupied by one particular way of thinking, which is probably irrational.

When there's lack of awareness, you can be taken over by, in politics, one of the other thought stream, some may be called right wing or left wing. If there's no awareness or very little awareness, one or two or the other of those streams can take you over completely. This is a thought stream that takes you over and you don't know it because you identify with it.

And then you are drifting towards an extreme, either to the right or to the left. And the more you go to an extreme, the more irrational you become without knowing it, and so on. So again, what we call politically left and right are simply streams of thought.

And every stream of thought attempts to grow in you. That's what thought does. A thought comes in, and then it attempts to get a bit bigger and suddenly attempts to survive in you.

That's fine. But without awareness, you get hijacked by a stream of thought. So in political terms, you get hijacked either by one or the other side.

And the more people get hijacked in one direction, the more they create another segment of the population that is hijacked in the other direction. So then the extremes become more pronounced, as it's maybe happening in the United States and some other Western countries these days. So aware, stay aware, aware, so you are the space of awareness for your thoughts.

Be the witnessing consciousness. Even when you watch the news, be the witnessing consciousness. Don't get drawn into, yes, have your opinions, but don't get hijacked by opinions, which are only thoughts.

Don't get taken over by them. Through presence, develop the immunity against toxic thoughts. Because if you don't have that, an entire country could be taken over by what ultimately would be mass psychosis temporarily.

It can last for a few years. Mass psychosis is not uncommon. It can take over, as I pointed out before, it can take over entire countries when then millions of people become deluded and usually involves a lot of suffering and destructiveness and violence.

All you can do is take responsibility for your space of awareness, be the awareness, so that you do not participate. If there should be a mass psychosis, you won't be part of it. You will be there as the awareness.

And the more people can be there as the awareness, the less likely it is that it will develop into a mass psychosis. And if it should develop, the more people are still aware while it happens, the more short-lived this episode would be. So we are moving into very interesting times.

As you might have noticed, the next few years will be very challenging collectively. But this is strangely, from a higher point of view, is necessary for the evolution of consciousness. It doesn't look like that, but it is.

Humans don't evolve except in critical situations, which often are self-created, both either personally or collectively. But you are well-prepared, you are all aware, and it's very unlikely that any of you will actually become part of the collective insanity that to some extent is already here and might even grow. It is very unlikely that you will be part of that.

You will represent the sanity within the insanity if it should grow even further. All right.

Eckhart Tolle Finding Our Timeless Essence [1b492153-8cb9-407e-9ded-1efa2c0ffbe5]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:01)

Finding our timeless essence. In this episode, Eckhart talks about the sense of guilt which has plagued humanity through the centuries. He says it's part of the ego's dysfunction.

The feeling that not only is there something wrong with the world, there's also something wrong with me. Eckhart explains certain religious traditions have interpreted this as God's punishment. We believe somehow we are at fault when bad things happen.

He says this results in a heavy pain body, burdened by resentments, grievances, and also the sense of being a victim. Eckhart says there are ego identities based on faulty thinking. He believes what's needed is wisdom so we can free ourselves to find our true identity.

Some traditions call it our Buddha nature or Christ consciousness. Eckhart says this aspect of us cannot be harmed by what has happened to us. It is not touched by suffering.

He believes we must look inside to find this timeless essence that lives within each of us.

[Speaker 1] (1:11 - 37:23)

Perhaps this is going to be the silent talk. Stillness speaks. It's a little paradox.

I just realized that this title of the little book I wrote is a paradox. We talked about a belief or more accurately a living realization in all ancient indigenous cultures, a realization of the aliveness of the world beyond what we can see with our senses. So the anthropologists call that animism.

A later term is panpsychism. Pan means all or everything. Psychism means it has aliveness in it, whatever you want to call it.

I call it consciousness. Everything is endowed with some degree of spirit or consciousness. Many religions of the world also have that in Hinduism and certain forms of Christianity.

There is an enigmatic term of the Trinity in Christianity, the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. You could interpret that as meaning the Father would correspond to God, the transcendent God, the One, the Godhead that does not exist in space and time, is transcendent to this dimension. The Son would be the realization of that reality within the human being.

In esoteric Christianity that would be called the Christ within. In certain schools of Buddhism that is called your Buddha nature, your innate Buddha nature, that which transcends the conditioned personality. That is the inner realization of what on the outer level we can call in Christianity the Father, the transcendent Godhead.

And then in between we have the Holy Spirit which is that which pervades the universe, the emanation of God that pervades the universe, that is in everything. So we have the three, the inner realization that when it is known within the human, that is the, call it the Son in Christianity or Christ within or Buddha nature. But of course Buddha nature is the spirit that is within everything.

So in Buddhism they say for example, they ask, does a blade of grass have Buddha nature? Yes, everything has Buddha nature. And so another term for that which pervades the universe, which is of course consciousness, is anima mundi, it's a Latin ancient term for the soul of the world, the soul of the world.

So that is that which underlies all things you perceive in this dimension. Behind it there is a vast intelligence, but that can be realized within the human being. It's not just a belief system or some kind of dogma, it's more than that.

And once you realize that within, then and only then, even if you don't realize it fully, just glimpses of it, distant glimpses even, or more fully, and only then can you recognize it, sense it in the outer world. And that is, I call it sensing, it's kind of, it depends how one uses language, feeling, sensing, sensing I believe is the best word I can find. So you sense it in the outer world.

The world is then no longer dead, because it has been deadened by conceptualization in the human mind, excessive, excessive thinking. Thinking, the most wonderful thing that enabled humans to do the most amazing things, also became a burden and something that was turning against humans when it became excessive. And when thinking became excessive, then humans began to derive their entire sense of identity, their sense of self from the movement of thought.

And this is kind of where we are at now, where the world is perceived as devoid of intelligence, the external world, it has become deadened to our senses, to deeper senses, and then all kinds of dreadful things arise like a sense of meaninglessness that can seep into millions of individual human beings, a sense of pointlessness of it all, a sense of nihilism or nihilism, nothing makes sense, what's the point? And then all you can end up with is hedonistic pursuits, in other words, seeking temporary pleasures, which give very temporary satisfaction and then always end in more suffering and pain.

And another one associated with that is the seeking of power or whatever the ego believes will satisfy it, satisfy you, you have become the ego then. But there's always this dreadful thing hiding behind every apparent achievement of the ego, that sense of pointlessness that is now affecting millions of human beings. It's not entirely new in the history of the human race, that sense of pointless already existed in certain individuals here and there.

There's a book in the Bible, the Old Testament, that is kind of an expression of that sense, probably being written, we don't know who the author was, well the book is called Ecclesiastes and it begins with a famous statement, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. Vanity in the older sense of the word means pointlessness. So it will presumably be written by an old man, we assume, who saw that everything is so short-lived and he describes all that in the book.

It's beautifully written, it's a great work of literature and it's a reflection of that state of consciousness. So basically he says just get out of life whatever you can because you're going to die and no matter what you achieve you're still going to die. So even if you achieve wisdom you're still going to die and it's all pointless anyway.

But he writes in more beautiful language than I'm summarizing it here. But it's funny how that book found its way into the Bible. Somebody's wondering about the pointlessness of it all.

So that afflicted certain individuals here and there, but not vast numbers of people as it does now. And a lot to do with it is the fact that in the mainstream culture the entire universe is regarded as a random coming together, an accidental coming together of atoms and molecules and then accidentally all this comes into existence. Then of course there is another religious theory that God regarded as an architect or something like that who created it all.

At some point God created it all. And what did he do then? So some people would say well he must have walked away after he created it all.

Because if he were controlling things now then that wouldn't make sense because I could do better than that. So that happens when the belief is there's an external creator who does it all and then according to some beliefs he's still in charge of things. Omnipotent, an omnipotent entity somewhere looking over things.

Traditionally the belief was that if bad things happened it's God's punishment. Traditionally not many people dared say how dare you God punish us or punish me. They immediately said it's our fault, I know, it's my fault, I know.

That was the traditional approach. Even when I was a child I was brought up as a Catholic and in those early days I believe I seem to remember the mass was still there was a lot of Latin in the mass which is very nice. And even as a child at ten years old we had to say, we had to beat our chest and say mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa, mea culpa.

My guilt, my blame, I am to blame. As a child I tried to figure out what that was, why I was to blame. And at the age of ten came the first communion, that is a big event in the life, I don't know if it still is in the life of a Catholic child.

The first communion is preceded by the first confession of your sins in the cubicle, dark, dark cube, very scary. And then before you do that, the day before or days before you have to what was called searching your conscience for your sins. And I took it more seriously I remember than other children, because other children were playing in the streets saying, are you coming to join us?

No, I was sitting at a table, I had stacked up books upright around me to hide the paper which I was going to write down my sins. But it took a lot really to think very hard, it must have done something really bad. I came up with a few minor things and I even invented one or two because there wasn't enough on the paper.

But the sense of guilt goes through the millennia of deep seated guilt in the human mind and that is also part of the egoic consciousness, the sense of not only is there something wrong with the world, there is something wrong with me too. And even more fundamentally that sense which is part of egoic consciousness in the sense there is something fundamentally wrong with me. However, in religious terms it expresses itself as this, it's immediately saying we deserve your punishment God, because we feel bad, I feel so bad, I deserve what I'm getting.

And that is the feeling of guilt. So whenever a disaster happened in the past, a natural disaster, earthquake, pestilence, the black death, all the dreadful things that happened, floods, fires, volcanic eruptions, whatever it may be, humans immediately said, they didn't say how dreadful this is, why is this happening, God is punishing us for our sins, we deserve it, it's our guilt, we need to atone. And then came global warming and then bad things happened perhaps through that and who knows perhaps for the first time when humans say, we caused all this, it's our fault, maybe for the first time they are right.

So the dysfunction created by the egoic consciousness that brings about a lot of havoc on every level in the human life, on the individual level and the collective level. So all these are things that can now be transcended. We don't need a feeling of guilt, just a clear, we need wisdom, we can let go of guilt as we let go of egoic consciousness, guilt also disappears because guilt is on an individual level, it means that you have done something bad in the past.

At that time you didn't know that it was bad, we presume, you did it because this was a manifestation of your level of consciousness at that time. Then you become a bit more conscious, then you look back on your past and say, oh I did that. And that can easily develop into a feeling of strong guilt which strengthens the ego.

So in other words, you transform human unconsciousness as it manifested through you at that time, you transform the human unconsciousness into an identity. So you manufacture an identity for yourself out of that and say, that's me, I am a bad person. So it's equating unconscious action with identity.

And then again, that becomes another heavy part of the egoic identity. Many people carry a sense of individual guilt about something they did or failed to do but should have done in the past. And they cannot let go of, I'm speaking, I know that quite a few people usually ask me questions about that, so this will be relevant to quite a few people for quite a few people.

So they carry an identity around not recognizing what you manifested was human unconsciousness at the time. But you recognize, you know that it created suffering in some way to other humans and yet to transform that into an identity is a mistake, it keeps you trapped in egoic consciousness. But this also applies to other people.

If other people did something bad, then what is called guilt, then that becomes, you have a resentment or grievance towards somebody else. And again, it is quite likely that whatever happened at that time, almost certainly it was perpetrated by a human being who was, maybe he, she still is now, if they're still alive, who was unconscious, forced by the egoic, the dysfunction of the egoic self to perpetrate that. And again, the danger is if we equate the unconscious action of another if we make an identity for the other out of that, that is also a trap for the ego again.

So whether you do it to yourself, in which case it is guilt, a guilt-ridden sense of self, or somebody else did something to you and then you are burdened with a sense of deep resentment or grievance or a sense of having been a victim of somebody and then you adopt a victim identity, which again is a very strong egoic identity. So you see yourself as a victim, you think of yourself as a victim of this or that event or those actions, but those are all egoic identities. You can recognize what somebody did in the past and you may not.

Forgiveness is something we need to be very careful with because it's often used in a superficial sense. People say you need to forgive yourself for something you did and they say you need to forgive somebody else for what they did and then sometimes people say, I forgive you, but how deep does it go? Perhaps they have an image of themselves as quite spiritual and then that what they say corresponds, they want simply to reinforce the image they have of themselves as a spiritual person who does not harbor resentment.

I'm too spiritual for resentment. I forgive you, you're fine. But deep down there's still many negative emotions when you have a strong self-image of a particular kind, for example spiritual or religious, you have that this is who I am and then it can easily happen that you deny certain things that contradict your belief in who you are, the exact opposite of your belief of being a spiritual or religious person.

There are many cases that happened over many centuries to many religious people, impossible to recognize the negative emotions within themselves because they would have conflicted with their self-image and if you then repress them, they get even worse and then they come out in bursts of extreme anger or even violence. Even that is justified then by the egoic mind. So the unconscious parent who beats their child in a rage but who thinks of themselves as spiritual, say I'm doing it for your own good.

So they reinterpret what they are doing which is bad, they reinterpret it so that it fits in with their self-image as a good person. So you lie to yourself continuously. Crazy.

So all these things happen because there is lack of awareness and you are looking for an identity and you are grasping wherever you can find your identity in the past, you are grasping at something, certain memories, images, so you haven't found your deeper identity which is the indwelling consciousness itself and then you need some substitute identity. So these are all cases where people have substitute identities, they have conceptual identities of who they are and basically you live in a kind of, in your own matrix conditioned by egoic mind and you cannot see reality, you can't see what you are doing. Jesus said the famous words on the cross, forgive them for they know not what they do.

What he means of course, maybe if it had been in recent times he would have expressed it slightly differently, would have said forgive them for they are totally unconscious. Now the forgiving, the real forgiving happens when you recognize that there is a dimension in you that has not been affected by whatever happened to you, or whatever anybody did to you. There is a dimension in you which is why we are here to access that more deeply and again whether we call that the stillness, the consciousness itself, the unconditioned consciousness or if you are religious, Christ consciousness, the Christ within the inner Christ, the inner Buddha, Buddha nature, whatever you want to call it.

There is something that actually cannot be touched by anything that happens to you as a person. As a person you can suffer a lot in this world and some people suffer more than others but everybody suffers. As a person you suffer, as a human you suffer.

The being beyond the human, because as you know you are a human being, the being beyond the human is actually not touched by suffering. So you have to find that, that timeless essence that is within you, that is the inner aspect of what we call the world soul, which also the world soul also is beyond suffering. And the world soul continuously creates and recreates although things die all the time.

The world soul, there have already been 4 or 5 mass extinctions on the planet over millions and millions of years when each time life on the planet became 80% destroyed, 70%, even 90% on one mass extinction on the planet. Almost all life forms wiped out.

And you would say this is definitely the end.

But it wasn't the end. The planet regenerated after several mass extinctions, it regenerated again, just took a while, not too long, just a few million years. It regenerated and then the life that then arose was of an even greater complexity of life forms.

There was something that could not be destroyed, even when the meteorites hit, they say the last extinction perhaps was when the dinosaurs became extinct. A huge meteorite hit the planet and led to extinction of life, a lot of, most of life on the planet. But there was something beyond it.

There was this planetary intelligence, Anima Mundi is the soul of the world but one aspect of the larger soul of the world is the soul of the planet. The soul of the planet is an aspect of the world soul and your soul is an aspect also of the world soul, they are not separate. So the planet is a life form that has its own intelligence which is an aspect of the one intelligence.

And out of that the recreation happens again and again and each time chaos erupts and destroys it, a higher order develops out of the chaos. Which is not to say that we should welcome the next extinction that we perhaps create. So we should, it is our task to learn to recognize again the sacredness of life on the planet that is vital part of the awakening of human consciousness.

At the very beginning of the Course in Miracles there are two or three sentences that are supposed to summarize the whole course. If you understand those, and the Course in Miracles is the same length as the Bible so it is a lot to read and a long, very long. If you understand those two or three sentences at the beginning, you don't need to read the rest.

So that's good. And so the summary of the Course in Miracles according to that is as follows. Nothing real can be threatened.

Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God. Can you say that again?

Nothing real can be threatened. Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.

I'm not going to explain it now. I'll let you to figure it out for yourself. You have enough wisdom.

So that's a very deep statement. So ultimately, all the forms... Oh, I'm beginning to explain it now.

OK, since I've started I might as well finish. Ultimately, all the forms of life that you see are only the forms of life, including your physical form and even your psychological form. They are forms of life but not life itself.

Life itself is indestructible. And life itself can be equated with consciousness itself. Consciousness itself, which is the essence of every life form.

And the essence of every life form cannot be destroyed. Only the outer, what we perceive as the outer form, of course, is very fragile and is subject to impermanence and its existence is very fleeting. So in those terms, the only absolutely real thing is that which gives life to everything and that cannot be destroyed.

Which is not to say that we should disrespect the forms of life. It is very important that we come into a relationship of reverence and love with the natural world because after all, it's another manifestation of who you are, who or what you are in your essence. So you always, when you recognize more deeply other life forms and you recognize, you sense the inherent aliveness in these life forms, that recognition is a form of love, real love.

And that is of vital importance to come to that realization. So what you love is, well, there is a Christian expression, it's not an absolutely ideal expression, it's not absolutely right, but it's an approximation of the truth. So the Christian expression is, you don't love the creature, you love the creator in the creature.

So what you love in the creature is the creator of the creature, but it's not really the creator, it's the essence of the creature. So in ultimate terms then, if you want to use theistic language, what you love in the other is ultimately always God. So that's when you love a form of life, what you really love is God hiding, having taken on the temporary disguise of that particular form of life, God, or rather the emanation of God, which is consciousness.

The consciousness that you are, that you can sense at this very moment as the essence of your being, do we ask, is that God? Well, yes and no. You can't ask the same question of whether the light of the sun is the sun or not.

The light of the sun that hits your skin and you can feel its warmth, and the life-giving energy of the sun that is the very warmth in your body, is derived from calories, which is derived from sun energy, so we are here physically because of the sun, and the rays of the sun that reach us, are they the sun? Yes and no. Obviously they are connected to the sun, they come, there is a oneness, but in the same way, the consciousness that animates all life forms, including you here, is an emanation of that one that is ancient cultures regarded the sun as God, because it is the closest analogy you can have, except that God has no physical existence in space and time.

It's the transcendent one of which we can say nothing, but we cannot imagine or visualize anything. It's the transcendent one that emanates consciousness, which is the light of God, into this dimension, and in this dimension there is an evolutionary process, where God itself is beyond time. So, if you say, is consciousness God?

Well, yes and no, in the same way that you say, is the light of the sun that I can feel, am I feeling the sun now? In a way, yes, but there is still a huge difference between the actual sun, which is of inconceivable energy, can't even imagine, and the sunlight that you feel, so yes and no. The consciousness then, the closest I can get to it, is to say it is an emanation of God, it is still one with God, so you are an emanation of the one.

So what you can sense in yourself as consciousness is the light of God, and this is why Jesus said, you are the light of the world, because you are consciousness. So that frees you from the absurd belief that all there is to you is this little person with its little problems and its short past and its short future. That's all that's me, that is not very satisfying.

I feel that there is more to you than that, and there is a deeper dimension to who you are. This dimension of who you are is the consciousness of the universe. We think of ourselves as entities, but ultimately we are not entities, we are processes.

One could go so far as to say that all nouns that we use, like tree, table, flower, whatever, earth, all nouns are actually a misperception that they are separate entities, whereas in reality there is a web of interconnectedness. The entire universe is one being in this web of interconnectedness, so ultimately there are no things, nouns, everything is a verb, everything happens. An event rather than a thing, and here these events unfold in what we call time in this dimension.

Eckhart Tolle Finding Peace; Accepting What Is [3ec4ccab-fcb6-4cfd-b280-229fd242af44]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:36)

Finding peace. Accepting what is. In this episode Eckhart talks with a live audience.

He says the world is not here to make us happy. It's here to make us conscious. So if we are looking for fulfillment in a particular relationship, job, or life circumstances, we may find disappointment instead.

We find peace when we let go of the demand that people and situations should fulfill us. When we accept what is, it becomes possible to find freedom in the here and now.

[Speaker 1] (0:38 - 38:46)

The world is not here to make you happy. If you believe the world is here to make you happy, you're in for a lot of frustration. Because then believe that your relationship is meant to make you happy.

Then you believe that whoever you are with, boyfriend, girlfriend, spouse, meant to make you happy. Then you believe the place where you live is meant to be totally satisfying. The place where you work is meant to be totally satisfying.

It's meant to make you happy. So then you believe that any condition, any place, any person, any situation is meant to make you happy. And if it doesn't make you happy, there is something wrong.

That is an erroneous belief. The world is not here to make you happy. The world is here to make you conscious.

And it can only make you conscious by challenging you. So all is well. And as the world challenges you and makes you conscious, your so-called happiness, which is a somewhat maybe, I don't use it that much to talk about the deeper state.

But the so-called happiness, you no longer look for it. To look to happiness to be provided by certain things or people in your life. And that's a great liberation when you realize this situation or this person is not here to make me happy.

It's here to make me conscious. And then you become happy. Something deeper arises that does not depend on what's going on there, whether a certain situation being in a certain way.

You become happy when you let go of the demand that people and situations and things should make you happy. Because if you interpret this on a superficial level, you might think, oh, that's a very negative thing to say that the world can't make you happy. It's not.

You just give up looking for happiness where you can't find it. But you can find it in yourself. Here and now.

But I don't call it happiness. It's called presence. And then you meet the challenges of life through presence.

And through the challenges, your presence becomes stronger and stronger. And even if you lose it completely through a huge challenge, then it reemerges stronger. Sometimes presence gets obscured, can get obscured by some huge thing happening in your life.

And then ultimately it emerges again and it's stronger. So without presence, no matter where you are, you will always encounter misery, ultimately, because the world is so frustrating. Relationships are so frustrating and difficult.

And human beings are so difficult. Most humans are. Jean-Paul Sartre said, hell is other people.

And so whether you are alone, you're miserable when you're alone, you're miserable in the relationship. There's one man who texted after breaking up with his girlfriend, texted, I don't know if that's what it was, but he texted, I'm so miserable without you, it's like having you here. So that's your destiny if you think the world is here to make you happy.

I mentioned one way of finding out how much progress you're making on the spiritual path, and that is how you deal with challenges in your daily life. Little challenges, big challenges. Of course, there are more little challenges than big challenges, but the big ones come occasionally.

These are the external challenges. Then there are the internal challenges. And the internal challenges are the challenges that come through your mind.

Your mind wanting to possess you completely. You're being challenged by repetitive, destructive, and negative thoughts. Realize, don't confuse the two levels of challenges and think that what is a challenge that arises in your mind is actually an external challenge.

Many challenges that you think are external are actually internal. There are external challenges, of course. You suddenly are confronted with losing your home, you're losing your job, somebody leaves you, or you leave somebody, or somebody close to you becomes ill.

You become ill, that's a kind of external challenge. Even that I would call externals. Or somebody close to you dies, a loved one dies, or has an accident, or you have an accident.

These are challenges on an external level. But a huge amount of challenges, a far greater amount, actually originates in your mind. But most people confuse that with an external challenge.

In other words, many, many times when you think you're in certain situations that make you upset or angry, cause you suffering, when you look closely, the situation itself does not cause you the suffering. But the way in which your mind interprets the situation is how the suffering arises. And you can verify that for yourself anywhere where you get upset about a situation, about having to wait for too long somewhere, and you go, this is so upsetting, why can't they, can't they organize things better?

I don't, I shouldn't, they shouldn't be doing that. Why do they hire people like that? This is so, just, such an annoying situation.

Okay, now this person has not separated the situation and their mental interpretation of the situation. It's an annoying, really annoying. Okay, what's annoying?

The fact that you have to stand here and wait for something? Or what your mind is commenting about it? Where does the annoyance arise?

What is the annoyance? So in many, many instances, you will find when you separate a situation from what your mind is saying about the situation, suddenly you realize the situation is not challenging at all. It just is as it is.

And if I breathe and look around, there's nothing wrong with standing here and waiting for something. But a minute ago, my mind says this was a very annoying situation, and you felt the corresponding emotion. I can't take any more of this.

Why am I even doing this? I can't believe it. You're being challenged not by a situation, you're being challenged by your mind.

So a lot of the things in your life, including bigger things than just having to wait in line and be feeling upset, a lot of things, if you separate the narrative in your mind that judges a situation in a certain way, if you look at that as an interpretation or narrative or judgment, and then look at the situation without imposing the narrative on it, you suddenly see, well, this just is as it is. In itself, it's nothing.

It's not annoying at all. The annoyance is something that I give to it. My mind unconsciously looks at it in a certain way and creates suffering.

So a lot of the time, you can be able to observe in your daily life, when you get upset about this, that, or that, it's not the situation that you find yourself in. It's the story in your mind about the situation. It's the suffering.

And that, of course, is connected with identifying with thinking, being completely identified with thinking in the absence of awareness. When there's no awareness, that's the reality that you inhabit. To become aware of the narrative in your mind and being able to separate a situation and the narrative implies that there is already enough awareness in you to be able to do that.

If there were not enough awareness in you, you would not be able to separate the narrative and the situation. They would be experienced as one. And so that's the essence of unconsciousness.

So look at challenges very carefully. Is there a real challenge here? In which case, either you take action or you accept what is, or is there a challenge that arises in my mind, is being supplied by my mind?

What would this situation be if I did not think these thoughts about it? And even you can go back into your past and say, for example, I was deeply betrayed by my ex-partner, ex-wife, ex-husband. I was very deeply, deeply betrayed by him or her.

On one level, that may be true. On another higher level, it's a story in your mind. And when you recognize that your ex-wife or husband or partner only acted according to their level of consciousness at the time, because no human being can act beyond their level of consciousness at the time of acting, then you say, well, that was their unconsciousness.

And suddenly you're not suffering anymore because you don't keep alive in your mind the narrative that he betrayed me. This is a very painful thing. If you want to be free of that, you can let go of that particular narrative and just look at the events.

And look at also, yes, at the time, went through painful emotions. That's what you experience. And occasionally, you might still experience painful emotions, but if the narrative gets locked in your mind, you will experience a painful emotion for the rest of your life.

There might have been a place for the painful emotion in the moment of this thing happening, but by being identified with that particular narrative, you are forced to re-experience that emotion continuously because the narrative reminds you of it. Again, not being able to separate the situation and the mental interpretation of the situation. Awareness.

Only awareness can free you of that. Only awareness can recognize that this is an illusion, ultimately. So the challenges are the twofold, external and internal, and very often, they are confused.

They are not recognized, that you cannot separate them. This is vital to practice. And so that's one way of finding out how much progress you're making on the spiritual path.

And the other is, whether in your daily life, you're able to have little moments of spaciousness or presence. Many little moments. How many little moments can you have of spaciousness or presence?

Now, this could just be a moment when you look out of the window of your room for 10 seconds, 15 seconds, observe what's there, the sky, the tree, the cars, without labeling it mentally, so that the sense perception happens against a background of spacious presence. In other words, your mind is still while you perceive. That is progress on the spiritual path.

If you meditate, of course, if you practice formal meditation, then that the aim of meditation is also to bring you to that point of pure awareness. And sometimes the act of meditating, if not done rightly, can be an obstacle in itself, especially if you have the idea in your mind that you are practicing, that you're doing a meditation, which implies you need to get somewhere with your meditation. Meditation is not a doing, ultimately.

Meditation, you can't really do a meditation. Meditation is the realization of being, which isn't a doing. So the realization of being is another word for becoming conscious of yourself as presence.

So when you then look at something, I'm just using as an example the visual perception. I could also use auditory perception. I could also use touch.

But the predominant sense for humans is seeing. When you look at something, you can look at something without imposing interpretation. Are you able to do that for just a brief moment?

Are you able to look around this room, take it in, and at the same time as being aware of what you are taking in, the sense perceptions in this room, you are also aware. Let's do it right now. It's not a doing.

We'll just have to use words. At the same time as you're taking in the totality of this room visually, and you hear the noise, my voice and any other noise. And at the same time, are you able to be aware of yourself?

Not yourself as the person, not yourself as the historical person that has a name and a history. No. Are you aware of yourself as the underlying presence?

Can you sense that presence that is the, so to speak, one could use an analogy, it's the canvas on which the sense perception is painted. So can you be aware of the canvas, which is your presence, as well as be aware of the picture on the canvas? Whereas before, you were only aware of the picture on the canvas, or identified with the picture.

But now you become aware of the underlying canvas. I recommend this very highly to practice that. Don't demand that you should hold this for long periods of time, and do it in a non-formal way, just as often as you can, especially when you're waiting for something.

How many times are you waiting for something? Waiting is an important part of people's lives. Unfortunately, nowadays, waiting is usually filled with looking at your phone, your smartphone.

Before the arrival of smartphones, you just were stuck with yourself. Now, of course, you can escape the situation of waiting by looking at your phone, and then you're somewhere else. But if you can, let's not give in to that, because there's probably nothing really important to look at.

If you can use the moments of waiting and transform them into presence, just look around, and look in your room, be in your room, whether it's a hotel room or a room at home, sit in your room for just a minute, maybe even two. If you enjoy it, it might be more. And look around, and just feel your own presence as the presence of awareness.

And that awareness, without that awareness, you wouldn't be able to perceive anything. So you perceive against the background of awareness, innocent perception, in which you don't know anything conceptually, but there is a deeper knowing there that is non-conceptual, that to the conceptual mind looks like a state of ignorance. There's a depth suddenly.

You become deeper. The more you're able to access the dimension that is beyond thought, the deeper you become as a human being. And the more creatively you can actually think when you do use thinking, because then the thinking is connected to the deeper awareness, and then can be inspired by that dimension, which is the dimension where all creativity arises.

So if you want to become a better thinker, if you want to be able to use your mind more effectively, including using your mind to manifest, which the mind is a hugely powerful thing, you can manifest incredible things with your mind. But you can only develop a better, more powerful mind if you're able to get out of your mind. You become a better thinker by developing the ability to refrain from thinking.

Then you have the balance in your life. Two dimensions. You suddenly become aware of two dimensions in you.

There's two of you. There is a form identity of you, your body, your personality, your history, the person of who you are. And then there is a dimension of depth in you.

There's a presence. There's a deep presence. There's an awareness.

There's a stillness, an aliveness, a spaciousness. That is a dimension that transcends thinking. Then you can use both.

After a while, you're able to bring the two even together. At first, they seem separate states. You step out of thinking, and it's a great liberation.

It's rising above thinking, not falling below thinking. You can do that when you go to sleep. You can do that when you go to the bar and have a few drinks.

You fall below thinking. And here, the real spiritual practice is rising above thinking. And so you become familiar with that state of not thinking.

And then your thinking becomes more fruitful, more creative, more original. You have occasionally original thoughts. Now, most humans don't have original thoughts, not a single one.

All the thoughts that they have are learned thoughts from the conditioning of their mind. And then this is another way of putting it, is to say it's the dimension of form and formlessness in you. There is the timeless essence of who you are, which is formless presence.

And for a little while, there is you as this particular form, which is fine too, which has its place too, which is to be also acknowledged and honored and looked after and accepted, including its imperfections. You don't demand that you as this form identity should become this perfect being, perfect body, perfect looks, perfect articulation, perfect everything. It's not going to happen.

Well, if it does happen, it won't last for very long because this body is impermanent and this personality is impermanent. The person is impermanent, but underneath the impermanence is hidden something deeper and timeless. And so to sense that in yourself, that is liberation so that eventually your sense of identity is not derived anymore from the person, although the person is acknowledged and honored, but you realize that's not really who you are.

Really who you are is the presence. And that's what the Buddha tried to point to. That's what Jesus tried to point to.

The Buddha calls it emptiness as the essence. But I would suggest another translation of that term. I would suggest spaciousness or formlessness.

And Jesus said, the kingdom of heaven. What is heaven? Heaven is the sky.

That's another word for sky. And what's the sky? Spaciousness.

In this sense-perceived world, the closest you can get to that inner dimension in the sense-perceived world is to look at the sky, because the sky is both something and nothing. The sky seems to be something, but it doesn't actually exist as something because you could never find it. Even if you went up in a rocket, you could never say, oh, here's the sky.

Before you know it, you're beyond it, and where was the sky? So all the sky is is vast spaciousness, formlessness. So when Jesus talks about the kingdom of heaven, he talks about the dimension of spaciousness.

Kingdom means dimension in modern terminology. The dimension of spaciousness in you. Finding that is your salvation.

What's the terminology? And the Buddha says the emptiness is the essential reality of who you are, which means spaciousness. And finding that frees you from suffering.

That is how suffering is transcended. It's all the same, just misunderstood. Jesus' words were more misunderstood than the Buddha's words, but it's all the same.

And so you become a being that inhabits two worlds, the world of form, here, and the formless. You live from the formless, and the formless lives through you and begins to express itself through you, and that is the greater consciousness. It's universal consciousness that uses your brain to express itself through, uses you to express it.

So you are a focal point of consciousness in this world. The world consciousness, universal consciousness, every human, what looks like a human being, is a focalization of a universal consciousness. That's me.

And then you're gone. Consciousness coming through, and another consciousness coming through. And all over the planet, consciousness in billions of forms, like sparks of the divine, light up and die down.

The one, it's the one appearing as the many, and it's the one consciousness growing, manifesting itself more fully in this dimension. It comes from another dimension where there's no time and no development, that's okay. But in this dimension, it manifests more and more fully.

It wants to come in for some reason, and that's the destiny of the world. There's a transmutation happening, and gradually, of course, you are part of that. The entire so-called physical universe is being transmuted through consciousness, and then let's not go too far.

We don't need to step too many steps ahead, just one or two at a time. So you need to just realize that there is infinitely more to you than who you are as a person. And whatever your situation is like on a personal level, whether your life is a great success or a huge failure, and those two things, of course, narratives in your mind, they're not a reality.

You can have the narrative, I am the greatest, I am the master of the universe, or I will be the, you'll see, I'll be the master of the universe. Whether it's a great success or a great failure, those are just narratives in your mind. But whatever it is, ultimately, it doesn't matter all that much what you have achieved or failed.

There's one true achievement, and that's how much consciousness expresses itself through you at this moment. And you could have failed at everything. You could have messed it all up.

Whatever you did, let's assume, whatever you did in life always turned out into a huge mess. You messed up the whole thing. Let's take that extreme.

There may be some of you who have that idea in their head, I messed up completely. Well, you did, so why are you here? Why are you here?

Well, I'm here because, oh, how conscious are you? If all your messing up brought you to a point of spiritual awakening, which means you're conscious at this moment, and you know yourself as consciousness, that means at this moment, in and through you, the universe has become conscious of itself, because that's who you are. You are the universe becoming conscious of itself.

Obviously, you're an essential part of the universe, and you are becoming conscious as the universe. And it's an amazing thing. So whatever happens or does not happen on a personal level may be important to the person.

And of course, it's good to do the best you can on a personal level, but ultimately, your life, your success in life or failure is determined by how much consciousness comes through you into this world. How do you look at something? What is your consciousness when you look at another human being and interact with another human being?

When you speak, how much presence is there? How much are you aligned with the present moment, being able to accept the isness of things, and yet being capable of action, but not reaction? That's what matters.

So your success or failure, if you even want to use those terms, as somebody once said, it's good to make plans and have goals, because otherwise, how would you know that you failed? Success and failure are concepts, of course, in your mind. But it is possible, of course, that every situation that you went wrong in your life, and yet you're here now.

You might even be in prison. You might be listening to this in prison. Hopefully, there are people who either at this moment or in some other now, the one now, are listening to this in prison.

You're conscious now. That determines your success as a human being. But you no longer say, I am conscious, because that's a conceptual identity again.

So you have to be aware of the ego coming in through the back door and claiming something, constructing another conceptual identity for yourself. And it has happened to some spiritual teachers who became free of ego and became a channel for presence to come through. And after years of being bombarded with projections of their disciples, especially if they lived in ashrams and never met any other human beings except their disciples, and they're being bombarded with projections of specialness, you are the greatest.

We believe that you are the greatest, because you're our teacher. And after a few years, their mind succumbs to that belief that, oh, that's actually true. I am the greatest.

I'm the greatest that ever lived and ever will live. That's me. And then you enhance your form identity.

If one day you see me walk on stage in a golden robe, then you know it's happened to me. And then my request now that I'm conscious is, please let me know. It's good to give people around you permission to let you know when they see that you have lost yourself again in some form of ego.

And when they do let you know, and they tell you your partner or friend or relative tells you, isn't that your ego talking? Or isn't that your pain body talking? Your ego?

If then you say, what are you talking about? My ego? You should look at yours.

That means they were right. It's your ego. But when you say, if they tell you that, and you say, really?

I have to look into that. And you put your attention goes within, because they may be right. And then you either say, no, it wasn't ego.

Or you realize, yeah, you're right. It was. So that means there's presence there.

Either that then somebody says, that's your ego. It can either suddenly, if they were right, lift you into presence, or you can clearly see, no, it's not. It's better not to tell the person, even if you believe that could be that person's ego, you don't have to tell them that.

So realize who you are in your essence and honor and be compassionate with who you are on the level of the person. Be in the two worlds, the world of formlessness and the world of form, being and doing. Thinking is also doing.

So you have the two dimensions and then you bring them together. That's the ultimate way to live. That means even while you think, and even while you do things, and even while you talk to people, there's always a sense of underlying presence.

So they no longer have separate moments, although initially this is vital. You no longer have separate, this is, I'm now present and then I'm totally in my mind again. I'm present and I'm totally in my mind again.

And the two come together. You talk to somebody and you listen before you reply. You're listening to the person and you can sense the awareness in you listening.

As you sense the awareness in you, you can sense the awareness or the consciousness in the other person. And when you can sense the other person, when you can perceive the other person, not only as a physical body, not only as a psychological entity that makes up the person, but when you can sense the underlying consciousness in that person, and you can only sense that because you can sense your consciousness and ultimately it's not yours and it's not his or hers, it's consciousness. When you can sense another person as consciousness, that means you love them.

That's the deeper meaning of love. It's the recognition that the other person in essence is one with who you are. So ultimately the only personal being you ever love is yourself.

And you see yourself everywhere. That is a deeper meaning of self-love, not the egoic self-love, but the recognition of the other as yourself. And not only the other human can also look at a dog and recognize when you look into the eyes of a dog, you recognize the consciousness of the dog looking through those eyes.

And although it's lovely to the touch, you can touch the dog and it feels lovely, and the joy of the dog transmits itself to you, that wagging tail, and you feel joyful for a moment and forget about your problems for a moment. But really what you love in the dog when you look at the dog is the consciousness of the dog, because you see it's just a different expression of the consciousness that you also are. So even in the dog you meet yourself.

And that's why you can love the dog more easily in many cases than another human, because there is less in the way. There's less mental obstruction. The dog does not have a conceptual mind that judges you.

It just loves you to be there. And when the dog looks at you, there's no conceptual mind activity in the dog. Consciousness, yes.

But there's no formulation in the mind that says, I wonder, do you really love me? Are you going to feed me tonight? I don't like the way you looked at me yesterday.

No, there's not as much consciousness as in a human, but it's less obstructed. So sometimes it seems there's more than in the human. But in the dog, there's not the obstruction of the conceptual mind.

So the being, you can have access to the being of the dog more easily than you can have access to the being of a human. But when you do have access to the being of the human, the consciousness of a human, it's a beautiful realization. And that is where true love resides and arises.

So as we finish for tonight, please enjoy for the rest of the days here, meeting yourself in many different disguises called other human beings. And when you interact with yourself in the disguise of other human beings, realize that they have the two levels to the other human being. There's a form, and there's the underlying consciousness.

Ultimately, they are one in the same way that the ripple on the surface of the ocean is one with the ocean and just seems to have some independent existence for a little while. So when you look at another human being, there's the form. That human being is a ripple on the surface of the ocean of consciousness in the same way that you are a ripple on the surface of the ocean of consciousness.

Or if you are a VIP, you are a wave on the surface of the ocean of consciousness. And realize that that ripple that you are interacting with is not only a ripple, but is also the ocean. And you are not only a ripple or a wave, you are also the ocean of consciousness.

And as that, you are meeting yourself. And then you don't need to always immediately react judgmentally to the way in which the person, the ripple, how the ripple behaves, whether you like that particular ripple or you don't like that particular ripple from the level of your ripple nature, doesn't really matter that much anymore. Because do you realize there's so much more there than the ripple.

And once you sense that, then even the ripple as in its ripple nature looks beautiful, because the entirety of the ocean ultimately expresses itself through it shines through it. And you can sense that as yourself.

Eckhart Tolle Finding the Essential Self [1875ed09-6334-4fb7-a66c-1c6cce3f3408]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:35)

Finding the essential self. In this episode, Eckhart leads a meditation and then answers questions. He says the essential self is not defined by the personality, life circumstances, or history.

It's the transcendent dimension beyond that, which is the only place we will find lasting freedom and true happiness. We may not have awareness of our essential self consistently. We will lose it many times and then regain it.

Finding it is a gradual process of waking up to who we truly are.

[Speaker 1] (0:38 - 46:12)

I very much hope that you're not waiting for our meditation to start because it started already. Welcome to another live meditation. Please remember what I may have mentioned before.

We are not doing a meditation. We are not doing anything. You can't do a meditation.

Meditation is not about doing, but finding the dimension of being that which already is, always is, the underlying is-ness, so to speak. Meditation is becoming aware of the space. In this case here, the space between two sentences or two words that I speak.

Some spaces are very short. Some are longer. And during this live meditation, the spaces are more important than the words.

Perhaps I should use the singular. It's always the same space, the space. It appears to be many spaces, but it is the one inner space.

So what happens when you become aware of the space? Really, you're not aware of anything as such. The best way of putting it is to say that you are aware of being aware.

You can sense this underlying spacious awareness, or as I often call it, presence. And you can sense that as, ultimately, yourself, the essence of yourself, a beingness. You become aware that you are.

You become aware of the I am, a presence. You can't really say much about it, and you can't think about it. It appears when there's a cessation of thinking, and yet, you're not falling asleep.

You're not becoming unconscious. You're not drifting off into some dreamland. You rise above thinking.

That is the alertness that is part of being present. I sometimes refer to that as inner stillness. In the gap between two thoughts, you become aware of an inner stillness.

But the awareness and stillness are one single thing, or better, no thing. Only when we speak about it, when we use words to talk about it, as soon as you use words, you have a subject and an object in the sentence. Duality arises.

So we say, in the gap between two thoughts, you become aware of this inner stillness. And yet, that's not how it ultimately is, because there is no subject-object relationship in that awareness. The awareness and the stillness are the same thing, the same no thing.

Some mystics have used the word nothing. For example, St. John of the Cross, a Spanish medieval mystic, used the word when he was looking for God, and finally he reached the top of the mountain in one of his poems, and he found nothing, no thing. Does that not remind you of the Buddha's term, sunyata, emptiness?

A better translation would be perhaps spaciousness or formlessness. Does that not remind you also of the kingdom of heaven that Jesus talks about, which I translate, I provide a more contemporary version of that by calling it, by substituting these words, kingdom. Kingdom means realm or dimension.

The realm, dimension of heaven is the sky, the heavens, the vast spaciousness of the heavens, of the sky. That was the closest word that Jesus could find to point to that inner dimension. So the dimension of spaciousness is the kingdom of heaven.

It's in you here now. Sunyata, emptiness, spaciousness. It is no thing, but it is not nothing.

I'm not going to explain that. I believe I wrote somewhere, you are never more essentially yourself than when you are still. When you are still, that was the quote, more or less.

So when you are still, you are most essentially yourself, not the form self, the form identity, formless self, which the Buddhists call the no self. Let me remind you to be aware of the spaces during our meditation. You're not aware of the spaces between words and sentences and even the underlying space, even while I talk, which is all in you, then all you have is concepts and not even particularly interesting concepts, because I'm talking about no thing, not very memorable.

When I speak, the thought arises and immediately becomes the word. It arises spontaneously. In between, there's no thought in the gaps.

So you connect to that state of consciousness of not thinking. When you're looking at someone who is not thinking, who has not fallen below thinking, but risen above thinking, then you're not really looking at a person, but you're looking at something deeper, sensing something deeper, the essence behind the person. And when you sense the essence behind this image, I still look like a person, in what level of form I am a person.

But when you look into my eyes, for example, the fact that I'm not thinking, that there's only an awareness, can help you to connect with that dimension within yourself. And then we're in the same state of consciousness. And then you're not looking at another person.

And I just reflect back to you who you are, essentially, beyond the historical person or personality that's conditioned by the past, of course. So there's the historical you that's related to the realm of thinking, the conditioned you with all its memories and experiences, successes and failures, the personality that has a life situation. For most of you, in part at least, the life situation is problematic because it is very rare for somebody's life situation not to be problematic, at least in some areas, health, relationships, close relationships, finances, money, career situation, work situation, living situation, your home.

And of all these, it's likely that one or two, at this time, present problems, are not going well, so it seems. And that's just how it is. There is no perfect life situation for very long.

Everything is in flux, or as the Buddha called it, the impermanence of all things. And so the perfection cannot be found in your life situation, although it does improve greatly if you connect with, become aware of, that which is deeper than the personality that has a life situation. And that is your essential beingness, your essential self, beyond the conditioned personality, beyond the life situation that reflects the conditioned personality.

When you're unaware of your essential beingness, the stillness within, the awareness, when you don't know yourself as the awareness, as the consciousness, then your life situation, with all the things that I just mentioned, health, finances, relationship, work, home, all those things that make up your life situation, when you're not aware of the transcendent dimensions in you, then the life situation is all-consuming, assumes an importance, it's all-consuming, and draws you in, you react to it, and a lot of the time causes you anxiety, stress, regret, resentment, grievances, guilt, fear, unease, frustration, the sense of never arriving where you need to be, the sense of always reaching out to some ultimately unattainable goal, living always for the next mentally projected moment in time, that's normal existence. And this normal existence is what the Buddha called dukkha, meaning suffering, can also be translated as just plain unhappiness, unsatisfactoriness, and that's why Jesus talked about salvation, what do you need to be saved from, salvation, misunderstood concepts by most Christians, you need to be saved from yourself, you need to be saved from an absurdly limited sense of identity, the historical person, the limited conditioned mind-made entity, the egoic self, and so how are you saved from yourself, by discovering the transcendent dimension within you, the realm of pure awareness, the kingdom of heaven, so you're saved from being confined to this prison, the internal prison of yourself, of course, your historical person continues for a while, it has its place in the scheme of things, it continues to be important in a way, as I mentioned somewhere else, it continues to matter to some extent, you try to work on it, make it better, why not, your health's possible, you work on it, you do the right things, eat the right things, respect the body, or work, or acquire new skills, learn new things, create new things, find a new relationship, or work on your existing relationships, strive for more abundance in your life, there's nothing wrong with that, all those things have their place, all those things still matter, but the difference is, they no longer matter absolutely, they're relatively important, but not absolutely important, so all those things are no longer, they don't totally consume you, you don't look to any of those things for some ultimate completion or satisfaction, and then it's actually, everything goes much better, when you don't look to relationship, or a relationship, to provide you with some ultimate satisfaction, then the relationship suddenly improves greatly, because you no longer think that there's somebody there who should make you happy, or when you acquire a new skill, learn a new, something new, a new skill, that's a lovely thing too, when you don't look to it, try to achieve through the acquisition of that skill, to achieve some kind of ultimate satisfaction, or completion, or fulfillment, then actually you are better at what you do, when it's no longer serving your egoic self, that wants to complete itself through some achievement, or some goal, or recognition, and you can work on abundance, why not, it's that you're playing in the world of form, you are here, you might as well play in the world of form, not looking to form, whether it's people, or situations, or conditions, or circumstances, or things, not looking to the world of form, which is the world, because through it, you want to find yourself, or become happy, that doesn't work, the happiness, true happiness, I don't even use that word, because happiness usually is used with reference to superficial things, all the things that I mentioned are superficial, so true happiness arises, when you become aware of the transcendent dimension in yourself, then there's a peace, an aliveness, a peaceful aliveness in the background, a stillness, but that stillness is alive, and that is consciousness itself, the light of consciousness, which is not yours, it is an emanation of the one source of all life, that one source of all life that is totally transcendent, that you cannot talk about, which is sometimes referred to by a three-letter word, that ultimate source emanates, and your consciousness, which is not yours, it appears to be, but it is an emanation from the one source, and remains ultimately connected with the one source, is not separate from it, and all life around you is an emanation, all life around you, therefore, is ultimately you, is ultimately I, the identity of all things, all beings, the essence, identity, all expressions of the one consciousness, which is like the light coming from the sun, the consciousness is the light, using this analogy, the sun is the source, so it has been said, I don't remember by whom, but it's beautiful, consciousness is asleep in the stone, in the mineral realm, so-called lifeless matter, but it's not lifeless, so-called inanimate matter, but it's not inanimate, consciousness is asleep in the stone, consciousness dreams in the plant, consciousness awakens in the animal, consciousness becomes aware of itself, potentially, in the human form, through the human form, and that is the purpose of the human form, the purpose is for consciousness to become aware of itself, and that purpose is being fulfilled here and now, and that self-awareness then needs to be there in your daily life, that's the challenge, and you won't necessarily always be able to have that awareness of who you essentially are, you may lose it many times, and then regain it, lose it, regain it, it is a gradual process of awakening to who you truly are. Welcome to a question and answer session, so one question here asks, you've shared the story before of the time when you asked for acceleration, is there a way to accelerate spiritual awakening?

What this question refers to is the story that I told many years ago when I asked to be used for the purpose of spiritual awakening, to be used more, I was already doing workshops and meditation sessions and seeing many individuals for counseling sessions, but I had a strong sense that more people needed to be reached, and so I asked, I was in an empty small village church in England, sitting there, and I asked for acceleration of the teaching getting out into the world, and a few months later it came, I did not ask though for acceleration of spiritual awakening, because that had already happened, now the question I was asking, is there a way to accelerate spiritual awakening? If you ask please, I'd like to awaken soon, that probably is not a good way of going about it, is there a way to accelerate spiritual awakening?

Yes there is, but you don't need to ask in the way that I did, which I was asking for something different, all you need to do, or rather not do, is don't give yourself time, don't look to the future for spiritual awakening, so that the main focus of your life becomes the present moment, so instead of projecting some future state that you want to achieve, completely let go of the idea of future, especially with reference to spiritual awakening, and of course I'm not talking about practical matters, making plans and so on, that's all good, making appointments, setting intentions, all that is fine, but not look to the future for some ultimate fulfillment, release or awakening, so you bring your attention into the present moment, as if past and future did not exist right now, what's left of you, if you're so present, so intensely present, that you don't think about the past, you don't think about the future, your attention is just here and now, and this is what I mean when I say don't give yourself time for spiritual awakening, don't look to time to deliver spiritual awakening, time cannot deliver spiritual awakening, so your attention is in the present moment, there is a certain frequency to that, there's a certain frequency of consciousness, which is very different from the frequency of consciousness when you are engaged in conceptualization and thinking, so don't give yourself time, that is the way to accelerate spiritual awakening, so as much as possible in your daily life, be intensely present here and now, now you may not be able to do it when you are engaged in some activity, especially activities that require conceptualization, if it's a physical activity, it's easier to stay present, but there are always moments when you can return to present, even after you've been at the computer, writing emails, whatever, and then in between two emails, you again, you return to presence, until gradually, even while you're writing an email, there's a sense of presence in the background, now the word for presence is stillness, alert stillness, and that really accelerates spiritual awakening, it also builds up the power of presence in you, which you will need particularly when challenges come, if there's not sufficient presence power in you, so to speak, consciousness, awareness, if there's not enough awareness in you, when you get challenged by life, either in a small way, or in a big way, little things go wrong, big things go wrong, loss, disaster, or just obnoxious people, difficult situations, if there's not enough presence power in you, then you will fall into reactivity, mental, emotional reactivity, you will become unconscious, because you will become identified with your reaction, identified with the emotion, identified with the thoughts, and you're completely, in spiritual terms, you're then completely unconscious, if there's enough presence power in you, then that can operate when challenges come, and then you meet challenges in a totally different way, instead of making drama out of challenges, instead of converting challenges into suffering, you bring presence to the challenge, and then you don't react, you respond, the way I use these two words, react means, you're acting out of the conditioning of your mind, your mental, emotional conditioning, you're reacting, your mental, emotional conditioning, of course, comes from the past, and so when you react, you impose past on the present, and you react to the present, as if it were the past, but you don't know that, because when you're unconscious in that way, you cannot tell the difference, you cannot disentangle what's happening around you, whatever the challenge may be, and your reaction to the challenge, it becomes a single phenomenon, instead of being able to say, okay, this is the situation, and this is my reaction to the situation, they're two things, if you were able to do that, you'll already be aware, so you don't get drawn into the reaction, and even if the reaction still operates in you, there would be some awareness in the background, so you would not be totally identified with the reaction, but if you're really present, if there's enough presence power in you, when you get challenged, now whether the challenge is standing in the lineup at the airline counter, and it's not moving, and the flight has been cancelled, or standing in the waiting for this or that, you're trying to get through to the, somebody to talk to at the bank, and all you can get is a machine, small challenges that make a daily life, but it also applies to the bigger challenges, you go out, you want to go back to your car, the car is gone, been stolen, slightly bigger, you get home, your house is collapsed, the degree of challenge may be different, but the basic mechanism behind reactivity is the same, so when you meet a challenge, not through reactivity, but in presence, the way in which you deal with it is very different, first you're able to take truly intelligent and creative action, you do what's necessary, but not from the conditioning of your mind, but whatever it is that needs to be done, arises out of your conscious presence, and you can deal intelligently with situations, people, and so on, and the suffering diminishes and even dissolves, the suffering that otherwise would have been caused by the challenge, so spiritual awakening then can only be here and now, that means now, and even now as you are seeing, looking at me and listening to this, it means now, are you able to stay absolutely present right here now, and what's left of you in this moment, when you don't remember your past, your victories, your successes, your failures, your personal history, and you don't think about the future, what may happen tomorrow or next year, or is this going, am I going to get this, am I going to lose that, all that has dissolved, and it's just a sense of conscious presence, what's left of you, not the personality, because the personality exists through past, the past, the memories of past, the conditioning of your past makes up the personality, so what's left of you is just a sense of conscious presence, has no particular form, and to know yourself as conscious presence is spiritual awakening, and it's here and now, so that is the acceleration of spiritual awakening.

Another question that in some ways related to the previous one, I appreciate your comments about bringing awareness to reactions and have been working on that, however, I'm still not clear about what constitutes an appropriate response in those moments, for instance, when I'm irritated or upset, rather than my automatic reaction of yelling or shutting down, what should I do instead, so what constitutes an appropriate response in those moments when you're being challenged, something goes wrong and so on, so for instance, the questioner says, when I'm irritated or upset, rather than my automatic reaction of yelling or shutting down, what should I do instead? Well, I wouldn't say it's a question of should, but when there is some awareness left in you and that's connected with what I described in my previous answer as enough presence power in you, then you will be able to know that you are reacting in a certain way and the possibility of choice begins to come in and the choice is, is this the only way to react to this situation, is this a helpful way to react to this situation, let's say there's the irritation that I feel, the anger that I feel, wanting to shout or wanting to whatever, and maybe you're already shouting, but there's some awareness in the background and that awareness which is a higher form of intelligence than the conditioned mind and that awareness looks at your reaction and somehow the question arises, is there a better way to deal with this situation or is this the only way to deal with the situation, is this an intelligent way to deal with it, does this really improve the situation and so only you can know in that moment and when there's reactivity, always it will be the case that there is another way of dealing with the situation, there is another way of facing the situation, you're no longer totally trapped in your reactivity, so you don't ask yourself how should I face the situation, how should I deal with the situation, but ask yourself is this way of dealing with it actually helpful, the reaction, what does the questioner say, yelling or shutting down whatever the reaction is, is that the most helpful thing, is that the most intelligent way of dealing with the situation, those questions can only arise out of your awareness, out of your presence, these questions come and they may not even be formulated as thoughts, the question is implied within the awareness, it might not even, does not need to be spoken, not even spoken in your mind because when there's awareness you can actually identify a reaction as unhelpful, you can immediately recognize it as contributing nothing helpful to the situation, making your own life miserable in many cases when it's not necessary, freedom comes in and then out of the awareness a different way of dealing with the situation arises, it might not even be a decision-making process, the anger you don't need to say I must not be angry, that's not awareness, let's say if it's anger or irritation, you're able to look at the anger and realize it adds nothing useful to the situation, it just makes it more unpleasant and in many cases it's a dysfunction and you might also notice something in you loves, love in a, not true love of course, something in you wants the anger, something you likes the anger in that situation, it thrives on it, you're almost addicted to it in that moment, you want more of it, you know like you've probably encountered people they're shouting at you and after a couple of minutes they leave the room and a few seconds later they come back the door opens because they need to shout a bit more, they have had some new ideas what they can say to you and if at that moment somebody told them that this is a dysfunctional way of dealing with the situation they wouldn't want to hear that, you need to observe in yourself when it happens an almost addictive quality to the reactivity, when you are in its grip it is a form of addiction and it is an addiction, it keeps that, it's an addiction of the ego, it keeps the ego going, not only keeps it going, it inflates the ego, anger particularly does that, it's a huge ego inflation, anger is always because in miracles says anger is always an attempt to make somebody feel guilty and when you are able to do that then of course by implication you are superior of course to the personal situation that you're angry at and the ego loves that superiority that comes with anger, moral superiority, righteous anger, being offended, a very fashionable thing these days on the internet, being offended by this, being offended by that, outraged, I'm outraged, you can go on the internet and feel angry while you're posting your angry posts, oh it's so wonderful, really, and when you observe that you're actually something and you love that but at the same time you see it's not helpful to anybody, it's not helpful to you, it's not helpful to them, it just creates more drama and so when there is awareness, some awareness in the background, you can suddenly see is there another way of dealing with this or perhaps there's nothing that I need to do, perhaps it's best not to say anything in some situations but when there's awareness in you then out of the awareness a more intelligent way, a non-dysfunctional way of dealing with situations and people arises, what that is varies from situation to situation so the question then when I'm irritated or upset rather than my automatic reaction of yelling or shutting down, what should I do instead, so this I've just answered that, don't ask yourself what should I do, just ask yourself is there another way, a more intelligent way, a more sane way and invariably you will find that there indeed is a more sane way of dealing with the situation and one more related question to this, what can I do in the heat of the moment to break free from old reactive patterns, I tend to lose it so to speak before there is awareness, I'm trying to have awareness and presence before I react, any suggestions, so you can see how it's related to what we've just been saying and partially or partly I have already answered it but I will add a little bit more, so what can I do in the heat of the moment to break free from old reactive patterns, I tend to lose it before there is awareness, so the questioner gets taken over by the reaction before awareness can arise, he says I'm trying to have awareness and presence before I react but how and again that comes back to what I mentioned earlier, you need to cultivate presence in non-challenging situations so that you can sustain presence when the challenges come and of course as you know they keep coming, if you think you will reach a point in your life when you will no longer experience life as challenging, some people think that that's possible or even desirable, then you're deceiving yourself, life is challenge, you can almost equate life with challenge, not only for humans, every life form, animals, plants, every life form has its challenges, if it didn't have its challenges, it's a challenge meaning obstacles on your path, something seemingly negative that seems to prevent you from going where you want to go, where you feel you need to go, an obstacle on your path, so if you don't realize the nature of life it may sometimes almost seem that there's some malicious deity or devil that continuously puts obstacles in your path that seems to delight in sabotaging your designs and that would be a misinterpretation of how life happens and unfolds, there's nothing personal in that, everybody in different ways gets intensely challenged by life, continuously encounters obstacles and the strange thing is the only way that you can evolve as a human being, the only way you can grow in consciousness is by encountering obstacles and then you overcome the obstacles or you transcend the obstacles and that is how the evolution of consciousness happens, so it's all those seemingly negative things that happen in your life that look like blockages potentially are doorways into awakened consciousness, so let's come back to the question, I tend to lose it before there's awareness, I'm trying to have awareness and presence before I react, usually the progression as you evolve in consciousness, as you become more conscious, usually it goes like this, after you've been engaged in some unconscious reactivity and it's now subsided and then suddenly awareness comes back and say, oh I got completely caught up in my reaction, so when the energy of it has subsided then the awareness returns, the awareness had become obscured completely, your presence had become obscured completely by the mental emotional reaction and when it subsided then the awareness comes back and oh and out of the awareness other non-helpful thoughts may arise like oh I just can't do it, why do you always lose, I always lose it, why can't I do this and then next time it happens you still react and just as the energy subsides of the reactivity you already as it begins to subside awareness already comes in there, so in the final stages of your reaction some awareness comes back in, the next thing that happens is you're engaged, you're in the middle of a reaction and in the middle of the reaction an awareness arises in you, it doesn't free you, you're still reacting but there is an awareness that knows that you're reacting in that way and then as there's even more consciousness awareness in you, they can even be there in the beginning of it just as the reaction arises, it may not yet stop it or it may but not by suppressing it but it could stop it by realizing this is very dysfunctional, this is it's not intelligent, is there a better way as I mentioned before, at this stage already freedom is there, the possibility of choosing something else and so as awareness grows in you then you may reach the point also where it is so you're so present that the old reactivity doesn't arise anymore at all but until that happens, work with it use the challenge as part of your spiritual practice, don't beat yourself up if you lose it if you lose it again and again, build up your presence power as I said before in non-challenging situations when you're waiting somewhere and you're not particularly challenged, bring your attention completely to the present moment, be here now, you're waiting at the elevator, it's only 20 seconds, 30 seconds and you're present, I recommend by the way that whenever you have short periods of waiting, resist the temptation of getting your phone out of your pocket and looking at it and engaging with it, what for, use it instead unless there's something important you have to make a call, there's an important message but not as an habitual, an automatic thing as most people these days do, there's no moment when their mind is not engaged in something there's complete lack of spaciousness, inner spaciousness, the addictive quality of the phone the smartphone as it's called, that can be very unhelpful to the arising of presence so don't fall into this trap, this addictive pattern of filling up every little moment in your life when before smartphones existed, you might have just sat there and looked around but no, no longer these days sits anywhere and looks around, nobody go to a public place, they're all looking at, they're too engaged in this, what are they, they're not aware of their surroundings so they're not present, they are, this is an externalization of the human mind, it amplifies, the smartphone amplifies the human mind, yes it can be used for helpful things too but in many, many cases and most of the time it actually obscures the awareness so be aware of the addictive nature of it, use it when it's needed of course, I have one too virtually everybody has one and it is an externalization of course of the human mind don't become its slave, don't be addicted to it, another good thing is to idea is to keep your bedroom free of devices and you at least you have some space before you go to sleep and when you wake up but also during the day, waiting, short moments of waiting, don't fill up every moment so bring attention to these short moments whenever you're waiting for something so that you can use those moments in as growing in presence then you build up presence power and then it will be much easier to deal with the challenges when they come.

Eckhart Tolle Forgiveness and Awakening [0e19c1dd-9cc4-49ed-8216-4ff757fe1380]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:30)

Forgiveness and awakening. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience about forgiveness. He says most of us carry resentments or grievances.

Eckhart calls them internal dark spots that block consciousness from emerging and strengthen the ego. True forgiveness, he says, is not something we make happen. It arises naturally when we're connected to the deeper essence of who we are.

[Speaker 1] (0:32 - 23:17)

The ego loves grievances, but as long as you carry even one grievance, and grievance is a long-standing resentment. Resentment could be short-lived, but grievance tends to be a very long thing. It goes on and on.

At least that's how I define it. The grievance goes on and on, and you carry it in your mind. And even just one surviving grievance in you can prevent you from fully accessing presence, from actually fully awakening.

It's a dark spot in you that prevents consciousness from arising fully. So you have to be really very careful to see what they do to you and see that the addiction to a grievance is only what is addicted is your false. The personality derives the egoic personality.

The ego derives sustenance from the grievance and strength from the grievance. So if you harbor a grievance, that means that the ego itself is still operating. It is not you who is harboring the grievance.

It's the ego in you that is harboring the grievance. So if you have a surviving grievance in you towards another person, you need to know that ultimately it's not you, it's the ego. It's still operating.

So you can develop in other areas of your life, and the ego can remain in you, even can attach itself. Let's say you're awakening beautifully, but there's one corner in your mind where the ego survives because it has attached itself to a grievance. And there can be other corners too, where the ego can attach itself to anything to do with the past.

It attaches itself to a particular thing in your mind, and there it's waiting. And occasionally it can then even in other situations, the ego can still come back more easily because it's there. It's still feeding on the grievance.

So it's not starving. It's still feeding on this grievance that you harbor. So ultimately forgiveness is to realize that the dimension in you, which is the deeper half.

Remember, you're the two halves. You're the personality, the person, and you have the unconditioned, the deep I. So by being the deeper half, the deep I, nothing ever was done to that deep I.

Perhaps something was done for the deep I to be obscured completely, but the deep I in itself is beyond anything that could be done to it. Nobody can injure it. That is untouchable.

It is invulnerable. It is the foremost dimension in you. Once you can sense that in yourself, forgiveness becomes very easy because not only are you present when you sense that in yourself, but also you are connected with a dimension in which nothing ever happened to you.

Nothing ever happened at this deepest dimension. And then the forgiveness happens almost automatically because nothing ever happened to who you are in the essence of your being. And that's an amazing realization.

And it's not something that you arrive at through thinking or through some mental act of forgiveness, as if forgiveness was something that you could do. You can't really do forgiveness. The true forgiveness arises spontaneously from the essence of who you are.

And that includes forgiveness of yourself. If in the past, this is a question I'm often asked, people carry a sense of guilt around, and that is very similar to the grievance. That again is, guilt is like grievance.

It is a mental, emotional entity that you carry within you. And you need to know that, that that's what it is. And forgiveness here, forgiveness to yourself for something that you did in the past, and you now recognize as bad in whatever way, as immoral, as you recognize because now you're much more conscious than you were when you did that.

But you still may carry this deep sense of guilt. And how do you get rid of that? First, you need to observe that this lives in you as a mental, emotional energy field.

And as long as you identify with it, it becomes part of your ego. The ego is form identity. The ego would prefer to have something great to identify with, but it will readily also identify with something bad.

And then you have a conceptual identity of yourself as a person who is bad. I'm a bad person because I did that. Conceptual sense of self, conceptual reality again arises.

And that does not help anybody. It causes you to be stuck in ego and unconsciousness. So again here, guilt dissolves.

Guilt involves forgiveness of yourself. Again, it's not something you can do. It's something that arises when you go deep enough so that you realize the essence of who you are.

And you, of course, as you know, you realize it beyond conceptualization. The essence of who you are is presence, conscious presence, alert, stillness, awareness. And you can sense the essence of who you are.

Then there's no reference anymore to anything in your mind or your emotional field that gives you an identity. You know that this is, this unconscious action happened through you because when this happened, you manifested in this form, basically your evolutionary stage. Nobody can act beyond the evolutionary stage of their consciousness.

So you acted out the unconscious state of humanity. It manifested through you. That happens continuously.

And there is ultimately no true I in it. There is no true identity in it. If you look to that for your identity, you are lost again in egoic identity.

And you're unconscious again. You recognize, perhaps you take action to do something good. You might want to either, you might talk to that person or not.

All this is secondary. You will know what is right to do if there's anything to do. But the main thing is that you go deep enough.

And when you're there and know who you are beyond form, then forgiveness arises automatically. You don't have to do it. So that's either with reference to yourself or reference to another person.

So that's extremely important. There are pockets of egoic identity. So you have to be alert so that if they exist in you, non-forgiveness in whatever form, grievance, guilt, all those things, need to be very, very conscious of that and see, find the space when nothing ever happened there.

At this deepest level, nothing was ever done to you. And that's an enormous sense of freedom. But unfortunately, it deprives the ego, unfortunately to the ego, it deprives the ego from one of its favorite identities, and that's victim.

So the ego loves to see yourself as a victim or a victor. But victim is more common. I wonder why.

Well, not so many people can say, now I have triumphed, I am the great one for a little while. And then that dissolves. But this victim identity is very strong.

And it's there when you have one element of the grievance towards another person is always that you have become, in the past, a victim of that person, one way or another. One could almost even say that if you harbor guilt, and you identify with the guilt, even there, there is an element of victimhood, you become a victim of yourself, of your own past. A very subtle thing, this victimhood, and the ego loves it.

And it's there in a small way. Even when, whenever you complain about something, but there's no possibility of any change at this moment by voicing your complaint. So you're complaining uselessly, either in your mind or out loud, about a place that you are at, there's something wrong with it, a person, there's something wrong with him or her, they're not doing what they should be doing, or they're doing the wrong thing.

Or there's something about them that's not right. Or they failed to do, but should have done that, but did that, all kinds of things. It could be complaining about what you are doing.

You're doing it, but you don't want to be doing it. It's awful to have to do this, but you're doing it every day of your life. It's awful, but I'm enjoying it.

Just, I'm stuck in this dreadful job. There are many areas where you complain. You complain about, you can abstract things, government, politicians, or you single out a few.

That is always an element of victimhood, it's an element of, very often, moral superiority, because when you're a victim, that automatically makes you, this is an unconscious process behind it, it automatically makes you morally superior to whoever made you into a victim. Or whatever situation you're complaining about, you are pronouncing judgment, therefore you are elevating yourself, you are judging this situation as wanting, insufficient, not good enough. Therefore, one can even be morally superior to a situation.

You can complain about the state of humanity, how dreadful it is. If I were to complain about God, of course, God doesn't exist, otherwise there wouldn't be all that suffering in this world. I would do it differently.

So, very subtle things, but these all things are easy to recognize when you're present within. I just mentioned them because these are so common. Well, I said they're easy to recognize.

Sometimes they are not even that easy to recognize, and that is why I mentioned it. So, be alert, watch, be alert. Jesus says somewhere in the gospels, watch, watch, be alert, watch.

I don't think he said be alert, but watch, be watchful. So, as you go back into your normal life situation, in any situation, starts with going away from here, be aware of especially the background dimension of the deep eye. When you are going into the bus or the car or the plane, as you start thinking again about what you have to do tomorrow or next week, the continuous practice of being aware of the background awareness, aware of awareness.

It's a single thing, but it sounds like two things when you talk about it. Be aware of awareness, be aware of yourself as the awareness. That is the continuous practice, and sometimes the awareness will be perhaps when you're sitting on a bus traveling to Calgary or something like that.

So, you're sitting on the bus and you're contemplating nature, which is better than thinking about what you're going to do tomorrow. You're contemplating nature, and while you're contemplating nature, you sense this underlying presence at the same time. You're present.

Then the personality is receded. The deeper eye is perceiving through you. It is you through the form.

Then you step, let's say you fly back somewhere. Then you're at the airport checking in. If you're lucky, you get your first challenge there to practice with.

Small challenge, two-hour delay to your flight. Oh, okay, it's fine. I don't mind.

I'm spiritual. That's not the right approach, of course. The flight is canceled.

That's a slightly bigger one. Okay. That's what is, undoubtedly.

Whether you argue with it or not, that's what is. The only gain you have when you argue with what is, is the ego grows. It's a gain to the ego, not to you.

If you can stop arguing with the simple is-ness of the present moment, you're basically spiritual master. Just simple as that. The difference between you and the Zen master who looks like this great stern figure, he's no longer arguing with the is-ness of this moment.

He doesn't know more than you. You probably know more than most spiritual teachers that ever lived in the sense of data or information or so-called education. Undoubtedly, everybody here knows more than Jesus did in terms of information or data, obviously.

He didn't have reference to, he couldn't Google anything. And the Buddha, too. It's not more knowledge that makes you into a spiritually advanced or enlightened or awake being.

It's something else. It is non-resistance to the is-ness of life, which is always now. That's a huge portal to the deep eye.

People tell me sometimes, that's so difficult. That's the wrong way around. The other way it makes life so difficult.

Continuously arguing with the is-ness of this moment, that makes life into a huge burden. It's so difficult to say yes to this moment. It is.

It's a habit, a mental habit that's been there for thousands of years. It may be, yes, it may be difficult to break this habit. But once when you're there, you realize that's the only easy way to live.

The only way that produces a flow to your life is to let go of arguing with the is-ness of this moment. And also, that's the end of the ego, because it couldn't survive without the food of arguing the is-ness of what is. And the dysfunctional thinking, a lot of that is to do with arguing with what is, trying to get away from it, arguing with it.

So to welcome what is is an amazing spiritual practice. But that means no matter what form it takes, and if you cannot welcome it, you can accept it. This is what is.

You almost, we could say you welcome it. You might not necessarily say, let's say your flight is canceled. You might not necessarily say, great.

Wonderful. Because that would be, probably, you would be doing this because you want to strengthen your spiritual, your identity again. It's just, that's what is, okay?

Right. The amount of thinking you do, useless thinking, immediately diminishes. Because when you no longer argue with what is, you think much less.

In fact, in order to truly accept the is-ness of this moment, you have to let go of thinking, at least in that moment, because that's just the is-ness of it. Okay. And then the next thing arises.

And then it becomes habitual that immediately you're aligned with the is-ness. That's the enlightened state. You may remember the story.

I've told it once or twice before, or more times. The disciple who came to the master and said, I'm going away now. I want to leave you for a year because I'm not finding enlightenment with you.

So maybe I'll find it somewhere else. Can you give me some advice though? What's my spiritual practice during that year while I seek out other situations and other experiences?

The master said, yes, wherever you go, whatever situation you find yourself in, and whatever happens to you, say these words. Thanks for everything. I have no complaint whatsoever.

And that's your spiritual practice. Okay. So I can do that.

And after a year, he came back to the master and said, well, did you do your spiritual practice? He said, yes, but it didn't work. And then the master said, thanks for everything.

I have no complaint whatsoever. And at that moment, the disciple became enlightened. Before, of course, he was just repeating the words and suddenly he went where the words pointed to.

Wouldn't that be amazing? Whatever happens to you, you have this, not the words anymore, but you have the attitude. Thanks for everything.

Thanks for this. I have no complaint whatsoever. And then have no complaint.

It would transform your life, obviously. And I'm giving you this because as the leaving presence, because you are like the disciple, hopefully you're not like the disciple, because the disciple didn't get it. He stayed for years with the master and he didn't get it.

But it is a very powerful spiritual practice. And yes, of course, it requires presence. And it's not in the words.

The words are just the signposts to that inner state. And of course, thanks for everything implies gratitude and implies appreciation of everything. So you don't wait until something unpleasant happened so that then you apply, thanks for everything, I have no complaint whatsoever.

No, the thanks for everything and the absence of complaint is in every moment. You don't have to wait for a bad thing in order to practice alignment with the present moment. Then it probably wouldn't work.

You appreciate the present moment in all its little manifestations, the many, many things that you would habitually overlook, all the beauty around you, the aliveness around you, that you appreciate. And that is part of the thanks for everything, thanks for this. When you look at a glass, as I'm doing it again, there's a glass of water, the light shines in, and it sparkles here and there.

And there's a little bit of a rainbow effect. And it's an amazing aliveness, this glass of water, the glass sparkles and the water in the glass, and it reflects the light. And if only for five seconds, I look at this and appreciate it, instead of reducing it just to a utilitarian thing that I use in the service of something else, which would be drinking, it's a very big difference.

I appreciate the otherwise hidden thing in this life, and we are surrounded by them. So you no longer have to repeat in your mind, okay, you may want to occasionally as a signpost, thank you for this glass of water. That's okay.

But the deeper appreciation is beyond words. So let's have a moment of stillness.

Eckhart Tolle Forgiving Our Unconsciousness [f5cd5134-4bc9-464b-ade1-3b06bf9b4918]

[Speaker 3] (0:00 - 0:53)

Forgiving our unconsciousness. In this episode, Eckhart talks briefly about what he calls the beingness behind our five senses, which is the deeper essence of who we are. Eckhart then answers a question about forgiveness.

He says, until we're strongly connected to our deeper self, all of us will act out unconscious patterns that cause suffering. Eckhart explains these scenarios usually reflect our state of consciousness and are often the result of our past experiences. However, he does believe that we all eventually wake up and ask, how could I have done that?

He says, recognizing our unconsciousness is in itself forgiveness. He urges listeners to understand that we didn't have the awareness to make a different choice at the time. And once we realize that we can make amends to those we've hurt and learn to forgive our unconsciousness.

Hello, everybody. Let's come into the present moment as fully as possible. Realize that right now, your sense perceptions are working, visual, auditory, maybe some others, and realize the consciousness behind, so to speak, behind the sense perceptions, the awareness.

Without the awareness, you would not see anything or hear anything. And so in addition to being aware of the sense perceptions, see if you can be aware also of yourself behind the sense perception, which is the awareness. There's a sense of presence, cannot define it.

It's very simple. There's no past in it. It is there whether you are 20 years old or 80, doesn't matter.

There's a sense of presence, beingness, the essence of who you are that gets mixed up with sense perceptions and memories of sense perceptions, experiences. The essential sense of beingness of who you are gets entangled with sense perceptions, which all your experiences that you accumulate. And usually your identity is derived from that which has become entangled with the sense perceptions.

The sense of awareness enables the sense perceptions to be, enables all your experiences to be experienced. But your identity, when you're not awake, is completely derived from the experiences sensory, which is your life story and all that, and the ways in which the mind interprets the experiences. So the accumulation and the memory of your experiences and the way in which the mind attaches stories to those memories of experiences, that for most people constitutes their identity.

And they feel that's something very precious there. They don't want to lose it. You can sense there's something, you are there somewhere, but you think it's in that which gives life to the sense perceptions, but you don't realize that the essence of your identity is not the experiences and sense perceptions, et cetera, the thoughts, but the consciousness itself.

So the most fundamental thing when you, as you awaken, the most fundamental shift, that's what it is, is the shift from, shift in identity from being the accumulated experience, the life story, story of your life, people call it my life, and your sense of self derived from it, that is the normal sense of identity, unsatisfactory, often very frustrating and full of hopes and fears. Time becomes very important for that identity, that sense of self, who you are, it's determined by the past on that level. And then there's a future that might be a, you think might free you from your insufficient and somehow unsatisfying sense of identity right now, because every egoic self suffers from a sense of insufficiency, a sense of lack, a sense of not being, there's something not right, there's something wrong, I don't know what it is, an underlying feeling of unease, anxiety, whatever it may be, there's a feeling there's something not right, or there's something missing, that's an essential part of every identity, every egoic identity, discontent with brief interludes of, oh, it's great, life is great, usually followed by a letdown, a disappointment, you can experience this with people, almost everybody lets you down eventually, because you had unrealistic expectations of what another human being could do for you, every situation lets you down, because you had unrealistic expectations of the capacity of any external situation to provide you with a satisfying, lasting sense of self, and then the search continues, so, and you're not quite, there's always the sense you haven't arrived yet, you're on your way, but you haven't arrived yet, and in some sense, of course, it's true, because there's still some future probably, and there are many things you could still do, but that sense of having, not having arrived, you have two basic emotions, or mind patterns, mental emotional patterns, that look towards the future for liberation from the unsatisfying sense of self, so you look to the future, it sometimes might be called hope, hope is usually regarded as a good thing, I suppose it is, better than despair, but hope is always, you're not rooted in the present, but you hope that one day, you will be okay, fulfilled, complete, a more complete version of yourself, and on some level, this is actually true, on the level of form, there are things you can still learn that you didn't know, don't know yet, you can learn many things, acquire and achieve things, all this is fine, except it is not fine, when you look to those things for an ultimate sense of self or identity, you may become very good at something, but even there, that's fine, on its own level, this is a necessary part of being a human here, but there's another level, which this does not work, and that the level of knowing yourself truly and fully, being rooted at a deep place, that is not subject to time, a place from where ultimate satisfaction and peace emanates, and you cannot find that on the level of the person, any experience, so it's good to experience things, which includes relationships, et cetera, et cetera, it's good to experience things, but what is the source of suffering is to have unrealistic expectations, so that the experience should provide lasting fulfillment and a lasting sense of self, for that, you have to go beyond experience and find the experiencer, and the experiencer is consciousness, to give it a word, one could say, it's better not to name it, that may be true, and there are many other names we could give it, now the question is, at this very moment, there's a certain amount of experiencing happening in your consciousness, the actual experience of this, our session here, and perhaps some thoughts come and go about what you're going to have for dinner tonight, or what you will have to deal with tomorrow, or something that happened yesterday, or whatever it may be, the complex problems of your life, perhaps they're so complex that they don't even allow you to be fully present with this session, and your mind is saying, yes, but I have bigger problems than this, I really should be concerned with that, I should solve those first, then I can be engaged in spiritual awakening, but I have to solve my problems first, there's so many, of course, that's not how it works, so you allow this experience to be there, and you become aware of that space that underlies all experience, and that is presence, stillness is sometimes what we call it, stillness, now what is stillness? A cessation of the stream of thinking, stillness is not, does not depend on external noise, or absence of noise, stillness also doesn't depend on whether you are moving, or you're sitting still, as you know, the word stillness in English could refer to absence of sound, or it could refer to absence of movement, so when there's absence of sound, it's very still, or when you're not moving, or you can say to a child, sit still, don't move, don't fidget so much, sit, sitting still, absence of movement, or absence of sound, but when we use the word stillness, it refers to something else, that can be there even when there is external sound, and even when there is movement, it's an inner dimension of consciousness, the stillness, in the gap between two thoughts, for example, now, that was it, now there's nothing memorable there, you can't remember it, it's not an experience as such, because it's a background to all experience, so you become aware of the background to all experience, which is yourself, consciousness, that's a liberation, and that is a shift in identity, from being identified with a foreground, which is sensory experience, thoughts, and emotions, the foreground of your life, for most people, it's not the foreground, it's all they know, so there's sensory experience, thoughts, emotions, that's the foreground, the background is the space, now, there are many words we can use to point to it, it doesn't matter what we use, whether we call it stillness, we call it space, call it awareness, consciousness, and again, awareness, again, is used a lot these days, you say you read about awareness, growing awareness, making people aware of this, and aware of that, and aware of that, but this awareness is not the awareness of something, it's the awareness of awareness, self-awareness, a silent, but alive sense of spaciousness, for example, now, and now, discover that it's not that difficult to be aware of awareness, and then you go about your life, which is a foreground, without losing the, again, another image we use is, without losing the vertical dimension, you cope, you're able to handle the horizontal dimension of your life, whatever you have to do here, in this world, while you're here, as a physical body, but you don't lose touch with the vertical dimension, which is a timeless dimension, then that's being rooted in the unconditioned consciousness, and that is not yours, and it doesn't really have a location, it does not have a geographical location, although I sometimes use the term your consciousness, it's not really yours, because even for the moment I say your consciousness, language has created already a duality, you and your consciousness, but there isn't you and your consciousness, you are consciousness, you don't have it, and it's not something that happens to you, but when we use language, inevitably duality arises, and you have to look beyond that, otherwise you start questioning and say, okay, my consciousness, who am I without the consciousness?

Nothing, you are consciousness, you don't have it, now what happens when you approach the end of this incarnation, and you can't remember things very clearly anymore, in some cases, you might even lose your memory, and for a little while, it can be good, for example, people suffer from conditions like Alzheimer's, and the personality seems to dissolve, you don't remember who they are anymore, they don't recognize anybody anymore, and there's a temporary, sometimes a temporary length of time period when this process happens, and I've known one or two cases, somebody used to be very unhappy all their life, and then she began to develop memory loss, for a certain time period, she became suddenly very happy, because she couldn't remember her problematic self anymore, but then she lost that also, so what happened there, is that evidence that the brain produces consciousness? There's a relationship, now most people still, and this is why there's such fear of death, because we've been conditioned by our culture to believe that all there is, is matter, our entire reality is based on matter, it goes down to the atoms, and even subatomic particles, but still, so those would be the building blocks of matter, there's a general belief that the universe is physical, it's material, and there's a widespread, of course, yes, there are religious people who still believe that there's something that survives, but many people don't have that belief anymore, because they have another belief, and that other belief is another form of religion, it's that's, there's only this, there's only that, and when this physical form, I disappear completely, I, but what I, are you talking about? What is the I that disappears completely?

Consciousness is, by many people, regarded as a, an inexplicable byproduct of brain activity, they don't know what it is, scientists have no idea what consciousness is, and they believe it's a, well, the term is an epiphenomenon, which means a byproduct, of mind activity, this is a physical organ, that somehow produces something that we don't understand, and we call it consciousness, is that the truth?

No, but more, some scientists are beginning to suspect that that is not the truth, there is a relationship between the brain and consciousness, but it's not that the brain produces consciousness, but the brain is a channel, through which consciousness filters into this dimension, enters this dimension, when somebody loses their memory completely, as in the case of Alzheimer, consciousness is beginning to, it can no longer express itself clearly through the medium of the brain, in the same way that when your phone, your cell phone, is defective, you can no longer, or your computer, you can no longer download all the information that's in the cloud, as they call it, it's a cloud, so then the, suddenly the information is defective, it doesn't work anymore, bits and pieces still appear, but it's not, you can't download it anymore, it doesn't mean that the consciousness was never, that the cloud is not in the computer, it was always a download, that's all, and so then the instrument becomes defective, and then the instrument dies, consciousness withdraws, when people use their memories through Alzheimer, the consciousness that they are, withdraws more gradually, they die before the physical death happens, the consciousness already cannot use the brain as a channel anymore, so the fundamental spiritual practice is your attention, return your attention as much as possible to awareness, in, during the day, many times, simple things, great spiritual practice, I recommend today, windows, windows, you always have a window somewhere, so there's a window, take a few step backs from the window, so you use the totality of the window, and then you look through the window, it has a frame, and you contemplate what's there, very attentive, alert, you observe what's there, without labeling it mentally in any way, and as you do that, if a label unconsciously arises, just let it go, it's unimportant, so you're practicing perception and experience without naming it, amazing spiritual practice, the ultimate spiritual practice, you experience it through sensory perception, but you don't name it, and yet you know what it is, but not conceptually, on the other hand, also, you also know that there's a deep mystery of what you're looking at, and you know every conceptual knowledge is ultimately fairly meaningless, although you need it in this world, but when you call a tree a tree, you still don't really know what it is, you just attach the label to it, and the label prevents you from looking more deeply, and sensing the tree more deeply, so whenever there's any window you have, look out of the window for a minute or so, and simply contemplate alertly what it is that you see, but without calling it anything, and then at the same time, and so that's not all, at the same time, as you perceive, be aware of yourself as the perceiver, not the person, the historical person, nor the consciousness that is perceiving, when you don't label and name things, then you're not a person anymore, you're the consciousness, basically you have died already, this is the good death, the death of the person, and you can have this death many times in one day, when the stream of thinking stops and awareness remains, you have died as a person, and what arises where the person was, is awareness or consciousness, and then the person suddenly reincarnates again, and is back a minute later, and then perhaps you die again a little bit later, there's another minute during which the person recedes, and awareness arises, oh, another death, and then you realize the essence of who you are is not anything that you can see with your senses, you start with your senses, and then you sense something deeper that is not sensory perception, you feel it, you sense it, you are invisible, you are an invisible presence, when you die, what remains is just the physical form, and you are gone, and then the form dissolves.

Okay, before we go to the questions, I'll just ask you, sense this invisible you, that is not the body, and is not psychological memory or anything like that, that is not a product of brain activity, and there are many accounts of survival of consciousness beyond the physical death, but I'm not too concerned with that, because I'm more concerned with realizing the consciousness here and now, and when you realize that, then the fear of physical death diminishes and disappears.

Perhaps we'll come back to some things I've just said during the answers, because in essence, one could almost say that there's only one answer to every question, and as the essence of every answer is there, so let's just see, and sometimes when you realize the essence, the question disappears. In case the question hasn't disappeared, let's see what our first question is.

[Speaker 2] (25:48 - 27:12)

Thank you, Hecate. I do have a question. I have observed that forgiveness is the only way out of the past, out of its repetition and out of karma, but I can also see something in me, that something in me believes or fears that forgiveness means forgetting or negligence, and would not allow me to prevent the repetition of the past.

I know this isn't true. What I usually observe is that the more I hang on to the past, the more it repeats itself, and the more the mistakes come back. But there is something in me that feels trapped in a loop, and does not surrender, does not forgive my own mistakes, my own relationships, my own unconscious decisions.

I guess this part of me somehow feels too responsible for bringing awareness to the world and to my relationships, which closes the door to spontaneity, to genuine enthusiasm, and to new experiences, new learnings, new mistakes. This seriousness gets in the way of natural awakening, and I guess all of this is connected to the difficulty I sometimes experience to forgive myself about the past. So in a sum up, would you reflect on that subject, forgiveness from an open heart?

[Speaker 1] (27:13 - 47:01)

Thank you, thank you. Very good question. So one could say that basically, many humans carry the burden of the past in their psyche.

They carry the past as a burden. And forgiveness, of course, can refer to forgiving yourself. We'll probably talk mainly about that, because your question was mainly about that.

In other cases, forgiveness, of course, can also refer to other people in your life, what other people have done or done to you. That's another area of forgiveness. And then you have the area that you mentioned, where you look back on your past, and you realize certain things you did, you regret now, you see they were perhaps not conscious, perhaps you acted out of egoic desires, or emotional impulses, or whatever it may be.

And the question here, as you may remember, just before you started asking the question, I said, what I talked about in the first part of our session, may come back as part of the answer to some of the questions, or all of the questions. The most important thing is, those things from the past, when you look at those things, the consciousness is looking at things that perhaps you did in the past, is not the same consciousness that produced those things in the past. You were not at the time, you did what you did, because it was a reflection of your state of consciousness at that time.

So, humans do, even a single human being, can even within the space of a day, can experience very different levels of consciousness. Until awareness comes in very strongly, there isn't really one human being, you are many. Until there is something that comes in that transcends those many personalities, patterns in you, unconscious mental, emotional patterns, often looks like, I'm not talking about schizophrenia is when it becomes very pronounced, but every normal human being is many human beings at different times.

Sometimes they may do something very destructive, either to themselves or others, and create a lot of suffering. In a moment of deep unconsciousness, and a few hours later, they wake up and say, how could I have done that? In some cases, it's not a few hours later, in some cases, a few years later, more consciousness has arisen, and they say, how could I have done that?

So, every human being manifests different levels of consciousness. And some human beings, of course, are relatively unconscious. So, a lot of what they do is ego motivated, reactive, is the outcome, is the result of the way in which they have been conditioned in their childhood, and the conditioning, the way in which they have been conditioned to act and react and think and emotions throughout childhood, that controls the rest of their life.

And there's no awareness in some, in many people, that awareness almost never comes. In some, it comes briefly and periodically. The question is, where do you derive your sense of self from?

Who am I? Is the question. Do you derive your sense of self from those things that happened in the past, that you did in the past, or you've, in some cases, perhaps you failed to do, but should have done, or you did do them, but you should not have done them, because they were, perhaps they caused suffering for others or for yourself.

Those things, you now recognize those things as the result of unconsciousness in you, because unconsciousness does create a lot of suffering for yourself and others. It's the human ego, the way in which the ego has been conditioned, creates the suffering. In the moment of creating the suffering, it doesn't know that that's what the human being is doing.

In that moment, there's no choice. There's not enough consciousness to have a choice. Sometimes when more consciousness arises after an event, either an hour later or 20 years later, then with that consciousness, if that situation were to arise again, then you would have a choice, and you would not act in that way.

So, if you have a, if there's more consciousness in you now than there was 10 years ago, or 20 years ago, then you would have acted differently at those times. But who was it that acted in those ways in the past? Is that your identity?

Is that who you are? Or was that a pattern in you, a mental-emotional pattern, reactive pattern, pattern of behavior that acted through you? And is it wise to derive your sense of identity from unconscious patterns that manifested through you in the past?

Now, when you do that, it leads to a lot of suffering, because then you say, I did that. That was me. And then you carry that as a burden for the rest of your life, perhaps.

And in some cases, some humans perpetrated one very bad thing. Maybe they killed somebody, an extreme case. And of course, that is quite a burden to carry when you wake up out of that unconsciousness that did that.

It's a burden to carry that. But even there, as more consciousness arises in you, then you can look back and realize that was unconsciousness operating through you. And you did not, at the time, have a choice.

The mind may tell yourself, yes, I did have a choice. No, you didn't have a choice. No human being can act beyond their level of consciousness at any given moment.

At any given moment, you cannot act that is beyond the level of consciousness that operates in you at that moment. So, in some cases, it has very, very dramatic and serious consequences when a human does one thing in the past. Sometimes very young people do it.

They might get drunk and then get in the car. They're 18 years old. They drink, they get in the car, kill somebody.

And then, depending on what country you live in, you might spend 20, 30 years in prison for a moment of unconsciousness. So, on an external level, it can have very serious consequences. But the most important thing, no matter what it is, even in the case of you've done something very bad, the most important thing is not to derive your sense of identity from past unconsciousness, but recognize unconsciousness for what it was.

But in order to do this, you need to go deeper within yourself and access the power of presence in you, now, here and now. The power of presence is what we talked about in the first part of our session. You access the power of presence in your consciousness.

And you can then experience a shift in identity from who you are is that conscious presence. The rest is ways in which you've been conditioned to act. Unconsciousness, we call that.

Unconsciousness means lack of awareness. Something operates in you that is the product of conditioning from the past. So, you recognize something that happened in the past that forced you almost to act in certain ways, and you recognize it as unconsciousness.

And to recognize that as unconsciousness is forgiveness. Forgiveness is no longer seeking an identity in the past, and especially in things that are very unpleasant. There are many unpleasant things in virtually everybody's past.

There are many unpleasant things. There are things that you did, and there are things that were done to you. In either case, to recognize that what happened in the past is a result of human unconsciousness.

You don't personalize it anymore. So, not to personalize unconsciousness for yourself and others is forgiveness. Don't make an identity out of manifestations of unconsciousness.

Don't make an identity out of that, not for yourself and not for others. So, another human being did something. Let's say parents, even parents sometimes as you grow up, you realize your parents perhaps did, or one of your parents did very wrong things.

You say, well, if I had had more conscious parents, my life would have been easier. For example, you'd say, why did they do this to me? They did this to you because they were unconscious, spiritually speaking.

They acted out their conditioning, and their parents acted out their conditioning. And sometimes the conditioning goes from generation to generation. In some families, you could go back several hundred years and find the same patterns of dysfunctional behavior, perpetuating themselves from generation to generation.

Until finally, one human being comes and transcends that and awakens out of that, is no longer forced to act out the patterns from the past. And then this human being, which is you, can look back and recognize the past for what it is, manifestations of human unconsciousness, manifestations of the present level of human unconsciousness. And you can look at the whole world collectively, look back at the 20th century, and especially the first half of the 20th century, the dreadful things that human beings did to each other.

Millions killed, you can't even count it, hundreds of millions, one country against another and within countries. How is it possible? Well, this is a manifestation of the evolution of human consciousness.

And it's a slow evolution. And it shows where humans are at collectively. And the 20th century, the first half, especially where there were many regressive periods from, as I said before, you have in one individual human being, you can have different levels of consciousness at different times.

In the collective also, you can have different consciousness at different times. And collectively, this is just a side, humans, societies, countries, any collective, sometimes experiences a regressive movement in consciousness when they become, they had such, had reached a certain level of consciousness, and then they sink back into a lower level. This is how some countries can perpetuate terrible suffering and do dreadful things to each other, as if they were in the grip of collective psychosis that happens with totalitarian regimes when they take over a country, for example, as happened in Germany, in Russia, in China, during certain periods in the 20th century.

Millions got killed. It's the country descending into deeper unconsciousness. And sometimes countries that were already relatively conscious, relatively, came sank back into deep unconsciousness, like, like a mental illness, psychosis.

And we are not free of that. It could happen again. I see science here and there in the collective that it could be happening again.

But that does not mean you have to be part of that. But I'm mentioning this, there's a lot to forgive in this, you have to forgive whole of humanity. When you look back on humanity, if you don't want to hate humanity and say, I don't want to be human, I can see what humans have done.

They're all crazy. I'd rather not be human. So you have to, you have to forgive the whole of humanity.

They've also done good things. There have been, there are moments, there is an evolution of consciousness, undoubtedly. And there are aggressive, regressive periods too.

So you forgive not only yourself, you forgive your parents, you forgive your ex-spouse, you forgive your, whatever your siblings may have done, you forgive your neighbor, you forgive the totality of humanity for its craziness. Because you recognize we are all part of the evolution of consciousness here on this planet. And you are part of that.

And you are now, you're evolving from your level of consciousness now. You look back and you see what you did, but was that you ultimately? No, it was the conditioned entity that was produced by your past that did that.

And instead of deriving your sense of who you are from the movement of unconsciousness, you derive your sense of who you are from the presence that you are now. That is a liberation. And that's true.

Forgiveness is realizing that ultimately there's nothing to forgive. There's only human unconsciousness and there's a gradual awakening in humanity. And on that past awakening, there are many times when humans regress temporarily and then they come out of it again.

And there's a gradual, a gradual awakening of consciousness. There was a line in the New Testament by St. Paul who wrote that all of creation up to the present time is, what word did he use? Is groaning in pain as if in childbirth.

It's like the pains of childbirth. He says, not only humans, but all creation is undergoing the pains of childbirth. It's a very deep statement because what is birthing is a consciousness.

And it's a painful process at first. To become more conscious is painful. To be less conscious like a tree or an animal as conscious, but life is less problematic for a dog than it is for a human.

That's why a dog is more joyful than most humans. So consciousness at first is almost a burden. And then as you rise beyond, it frees you.

But it's a burden when you are at an intermediate stage as you were until now, where you become aware of the unconsciousness, but you cannot free yourself from it because you think that's me. And then presence frees you from the past because that's what it is. It doesn't mean you don't remember the past, but you recognize it for what it is.

You can remember it, but you know now what it is. Manifestation of human unconsciousness. Don't look for yourself in it.

You are not that. You are the presence. And then as you go through life, increasingly be more rooted in the presence, then the possibility or the likelihood that you will do more unconscious things that create suffering for yourself and others diminishes and then disappears.

When you're conscious, you do not create additional suffering for yourself or others. The world changes in that way when humans no longer create suffering out of unconsciousness. And you are at that stage where the shift can happen.

You recognize the past and you look at it like a child that breaks something, breaks a valuable object because it doesn't know any better. So you will look upon this child with compassion. And you could look back on your past also with compassion.

You have to go through the evolution of consciousness. And on that path, suffering happens. Things are done to you that make you suffer.

You do things to others that make them suffer. And then you begin to transcend that. And then you realize the past has nothing to do with who you are.

And that's the transcendence. And that's where you are at now. The possibility arises.

Presence frees you from the past.

Eckhart Tolle Forgiving the Unforgivable [36a57c9b-fe28-4f77-9b71-9821c322a0f0]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 1:03)

Forgiving the unforgivable. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions about a variety of concerns. A man experiences relentless anxiety and says meditation doesn't relieve his symptoms.

Eckhart explains an overactive pain body is at the root of his troubles. He then shares the wisdom he gained through healing his own pain body. Another audience member asks if there are any transgressions which are unforgivable.

Eckhart explains some violations may seem beyond acceptance but our goal is not to try to forgive. He says instead forgiveness occurs naturally as we outgrow the limitations of our personality. Finally, a woman asks if it's necessary to forgive others who have wronged us in order to revolve spiritually.

Eckhart shares the trauma he experienced from his abusive father and he explains how through spiritual growth he was able to realize his father was a wounded man. Once Eckhart awakened to this fact, he says forgiveness flowed.

[Speaker 1] (1:04 - 36:46)

Just checking to see if everybody is still present. I'll do just a few questions from the streaming questions. Joseph asking, hello Eckhart, every morning I awake with extreme feelings of anxiety.

It is like a knot in my stomach area and it feels very uncomfortable. It is accompanied by fearful thoughts and emotions. I am able to observe it in my inner body.

Nevertheless, it always continues and is getting stronger. I try to be present and feel my inner body but this won't stop it. Hmm, by the time I'm getting up I feel drained of energy and I'm still anxious.

What else can I do? So there's probably a pain body in you that is almost continuously active whereas most pain bodies have periods of inactivity. You can hardly feel it or you can't feel it at all and then periods when they become active and create drama either in your mind or in your life or both.

This sometimes happens that a pain body is almost continuously active and particularly when he wakes up it seems he can feel it. Later on I assume during the day he gets distracted by other things and so the feeling of anxiety will still be there but will recede a little bit I assume. I can't ask him here, he's not here, but what to do with this extreme feeling of anxiety that comes to many people.

It comes also in the middle of the night when they wake up. I used to have that in my 20s when I woke up often and can't sleep and in this horrible universe that seems everything seems alien and almost threatening. That kind of feeling is described by the writer and philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre in a novel he wrote called La Nausee which is nausea which is the feeling of the nausea of existence of dread.

So for Joseph breathing I would recommend a definitely a breathing practice but it will probably have to be more structured than what we are doing here and I very rarely recommend specific practices but intuitively I sense for Joseph to take up the practice of Qigong, Chinese Qigong practice which is related to Tai Chi. Qigong in particular is to awaken the dormant energy in the body and it involves both movement and breath and it's a structured practice. Find a good teacher or you might be able to even online I don't know and it can awaken the inner body energy, the Qi as they call it.

It's a structured practice involving movement and breath. Whatever they do. The thing people, people learn these things.

It's good to learn it but originally the people who teach that who originally taught it did it intuitively just in the way I did it just now. Intuitively they go and then you hold something even manipulate energy they go they hold the energy here between the hands and of course in the movies they're in some of these Chinese movies they're the great masters then they hold this ball of energy and they can throw it at you but Qigong does not free you from the ego in fact your ability to practice Qigong could also be incorporated into the ego. It could but it is very very helpful for some people and in this case I would I would recommend that some Qigong practitioners actually develop a lot of enormous Qi which in itself is not the deepest energy Qi is halfway between the unmanifested and the manifested. Qi is also what you feel when you put your attention into the inner body it's halfway between the manifested and the unmanifested but some Qigong practitioners can actually they can light they can ignite paper with the energy that they project into their hands but Joseph doesn't need to do that.

The origin of Tai Chi I feel very strongly also which is basically presence through movement the origin of Tai Chi is I've convinced ancient masters began to move spontaneously as part of their feeling of aliveness and meditation practice they began to a spontaneous kind of dance with energy were being moved by the energy and it was nice and flowing flowing movement and they went on and the disciples were looking on and say what's he doing and then the disciples started to write down now he's lifting his left leg and now the right hand goes up and then gradually over time it became a system and that's fine but I believe it originated from spontaneous being moved spontaneously and intuitively it was a joyous dance with movement and it but you can learn it so it the it works also as you learn it as a structured practice so that's my recommendation for a person who suffers from extreme anxiety Jill from Delaware hello ask are there any past actions which are unforgivable also have you had a major past regret that you've had to work through and how did you do it you don't have to name the specific regret oh that's good well yes some major regrets yes in the early days I didn't take out the garbage and and I don't know if I can forgive myself my self-image has been shattered by this I thought I was an enlightened master well yeah well it was a big one and there are some things one does unconsciously I don't nothing really major in my life a few things one is ashamed of yes in my youth I did some weird things just because it's a funny story I'll tell you just one little anecdote from my early years my first year in England I got a temporary job in Sussex working in an office for three months a summer job that was my first time in England and then towards the end of that period I was going to go back home at the time I was living in Spain with my dad and then there's a woman in that office who was going to go on vacation and she said why don't you stay another four weeks house it for me my house I said oh god that's great yeah I'd like to stay another four weeks house it I was 19 and yeah it's a nice house suburban house and the pantry and the fridge was full of food all kinds of food items was full she liked me maybe she was an early prepper for getting getting ready for the apocalypse but there was food cans of this and that and and everything and the freezer and then there was wine in racks wine racks everywhere now my background was very very poor my dad was a drop out at the time in Spain they had moved to Spain at that time we had nothing we didn't have enough money to buy even a fridge in a hot country no fridge no television no telephone no radio nothing no hot water occasionally we had cold water and so we went always bought the minimum we went out every day to the market looking for the cheapest vegetables and stuff to sell and brought it back had to be consumed because it would go off in the heat we couldn't store anything anywhere so and there I was never not having experienced any abundance of food in this place and in my ignorance I believed that he had bought all this for me I could not imagine that anybody would store these things as it was what a kind person to get all this and I used all these things during four weeks including the wine which obviously she bought from me of course and fortunately I had scheduled to fly home before she came back but then later she called me and she said I was so shocked when I arrived home what did you do oh oh I didn't know uh and then she said well you'll need to send me the this amount of money and then I worked hard get some part-time jobs at the time I was back in Spain for a while and I had several jobs I was doing I started work when I was 16 interpreting translation work mainly of restaurant menus and tour guide so I was already a guide at the age of 17 I was had started doing tour guides in buses guiding tourists anyway that's a long story so I worked extra hard so that I could pay back this woman so that she could restock her pantry and so on and that for a long time I felt a bit ashamed but not anymore I have let go of all this now including including the garbage so there are things in everybody's life there may be something that I have repressed Nakari remember who knows but are there some things that are unforgivable that either I suppose to yourself or to others it may appear that there are some dreadful things but the nature of forgiveness is strange forgiveness isn't really something that you can really effectively do although people try to do it forgiveness happens naturally when you reconnect with the essence of who you are that is beyond the personality all this the unconscious stuff is perpetrated by the conditioned personality the conditioned mind that makes up the conditioned personality and so when you go deep enough and so you no longer derive your identity from the personality and whatever the personality has done you can still recognize these were this was bad you may even make up want to make up for something that the person did that you now recognize as bad as I sent this woman the money that she had lost and that was good so that's fine you may try to make up but no longer deriving your identity from it that is the main thing then when the identity is derived from the deeper place then what we conventionally call forgiveness happens by itself you don't need to do anything also this applies to when something was done to you that is bad at this deep level of presence that is always pristine and is not affected by whatever happened to the person no matter how bad it was so bad things that happened to you certain perpetrators did bad things to you then how do you forgive them let's say even you might be injured by something people did to you it's very hard as an actual conscious decision that I must forgive I don't know how deep that would go probably not that deep or that might give you a satisfying feeling of being a good person who is able to forgive but if you go deep enough you realize that the essence of who you are was never affected by that it cannot be then you can easily forgive yourself or rather it happens automatically but you still recognize the badness of it I saw an example of this quite a few years ago there was a woman in Texas in a in prison she had been sentenced to death I don't remember her name it might be 15 20 years ago I don't know she had done the most dreadful things she was under the influence of drugs and she had personally killed with a I think with a big knife two people she and her boyfriend had broken into a house and she had personally under the influence of drugs or whatever killed with a knife the most horrific murders and she even enjoyed doing it it's they found some evidence later she talked to somebody and she said she enjoyed doing it it was horrible she was on death row for several years and on death row something happened to her she went through a I believe it was through Christian teachings but something happened to her and a shift a complete shift happened and then later I saw an interview with her and I could see that she had touched the essence of her being and she knew that what she had done was terrible but there were peace just emanated from her she had broken through and it was amazing to see it seems almost impossible how can a person who did that awaken to that but it happened to her and then at that time she I think she applied she said I can do perhaps good things in prison while I'm still alive so she applied for instead of death sentence to be reduced to life sentence in prison but at that time the at least the governor of Texas he said no and she got executed but what is the amazing thing that I could see she knew that how bad that was that she had done and yet she did not carry the burden of it anymore the the essence of shining so that's a very rare case but it was amazing to see so this is something that seems totally unforgivable to yourself and yet it can happen so ultimately I believe there's nothing unforgivable but the important thing for everybody to realize is forgiveness true forgiveness happens as a natural consequence of connecting with the essence of who you are then it just happens ah Anna from Australia is a related question where the answer will be short because we've already been talking about it Australia is probably tomorrow evening there or something like that not that it matters it's a present present moment there too is it necessary to forgive others who we feel have wronged us in order to evolve for example should Ukrainians forgive Russia or an abused child forgive the abuser or is it enough to simply acknowledge the misdeed and move on is it necessary to forgive others who we feel have wronged us in order to evolve Ukrainians Russia well entire countries that's a different matter a country consists of millions of people and I don't think every individual in a particular country necessarily carries the guilt collective guilt perpetrated by a certain section of that country but the individuals is it necessary to forgive in order to evolve yes that's that is the case if you carry any kind of grievance towards another person or group of people that would prevent you from awakening to the essence of who you are that would become a little a little barrier to about that realization so it's important to let go of grievances and so on so you go as deep as you can and then they dissolve by themselves if you can go deep enough but if you hold on to a grievance you have to be ready to let go if you hold on to it becomes part of your ego so that's the danger it's very hard to explain Jesus said when you go to temple and pray before you go to temple make sure that you forgive your brother because otherwise their prayer will not be very good I had resentment towards my father for quite a long time until I awakened because my father had I was never punished physically but that so that is a good thing but he was sometimes violent towards my mother and he was extremely prone to outbursts of extreme anger which to me as a child felt like physical assault not even anger towards me it was mostly towards my mother but it fell to the home and I could feel feel it like a physical assault of my being so it's like an unexploded bomb you live with an unexploded bomb it could explode at any moment and every continuous state of tension and anxiety horrible and then my dad or you I loved him but he had also a gigantic ego I say that I hope he's not present right now here two or three years after he passed away I was with Kim in a we had stopped in a restaurant on the way to California we were driving stopped in a restaurant for meal and I was talking about I said my dad had to had a big ego and the waiter had just before I said he had put a carafe of water on the table with two glasses as they do in restaurants at the moment I said my dad had a big ego the carafe of water burst now before I continue about that I have to add in the later stages of his life my dad became partly enlightened and was still partly carrying the burden of the heavy ego so it was a strange mixture in some areas of his life he was almost enlightened in other areas there was still enormous ego he became a hybrid creature interesting but in his earlier life he was very the ego was so strong I realized later it is called narcissistic personality disorder which is an extreme form of ego and so I had some resentment until I the awakening came and then for the first time I could meet my dad without any resentment I was able to listen to him he would not discuss anything but with anybody he was just kind of talking a loud voice to tell you how things are and you have to listen for a long long time this is how it is and this is what they are these and these politicians he were they don't know what to do okay and I was just happy to just listen suddenly there was no resentment anymore and that was the beginning of some changes coming to my dad when I there was no longer that resistance there was an acceptance and then in some areas he began to change gradually never completely but in some areas he changed so he had some wisdom arose in him in his next lifetime he will perhaps become totally enlightened on his good side his enlightened being he accepted me always completely whatever I did was fine you drop out of university fine it's fine you do the right thing it's good my mom was different so a complete acceptance and great and he could wait they say only masters can wait they didn't become impatient he could wait for hours for something on the telephone if you couldn't reach somebody on the telephone he would pick up the phone every two minutes and dial the same number for an hour or two but not get upset at all was beginnings of enlightenment the glass is still intact that's a good sign one more question from here lee from sunnyvale california I believe I heard you mentioned several years ago that people trying to feel presence tended to fall into two categories those who felt presence while being more quiet and peaceful and those who felt presence with action or activity assuming I remembered this correctly I was wondering if you can expand on this the reason I ask is that when I heard this statement I immediately felt that I belonged in the second category while I'm not athletic I have definitely felt presence during some unusual activities such as driving on busy fast-moving freeways and even after watching particularly well-done action sequences in movies thank you well certainly some people experience presence when they're engaged in fairly dangerous activities that is a fact and whether it's mountain climbing or even surfing that's the big thing here now why and I'm absolutely sure I don't know if there are any surfers here probably when you are engaged in surfing you're not thinking about yourself you're not thinking you are really absolutely pretty you have to be absolutely present and if you lose it then you there you go one thought and you're gone surfing is wonderful I wish I had learned that it's too late now of course I probably miracles are possible but any dangerous activity that forces you into the present moment and if you if you lost presence you would probably have an accident so but engaging in it I don't recommend by the way dangerous activity so don't blame me I don't recommend dangerous activity especially not driving fast on the freeways just to see if you can be present surfing is relatively it forces you into presence but I suppose you could conceivably be injured or die but it's not quite as dangerous as climbing up the rock face or whatever people do so certain activities force you into presence some people you might have heard get addicted to what they call it adrenaline that comes but I don't don't see things from the physical perspective I very rarely mention these words but what they really mean yes adrenaline is a physical part of what happens what they feel in my terminology what they feel is a heightened sense of aliveness because while they're engaged in these activities they are free free of themselves they are free of thought they're absolutely present and that gives them this heightened they feel really alive in those moments and so what happens then they become almost addicted to that activity they have to do it again and again because it's so wonderful and again they could learn that they do not have to if they've had experiences of presence and that's a good thing and then then they could see if they can also if they come into contact with the spiritual teaching perhaps they're able to also enter presence without hanging on a rock face and almost falling off or endangering your life by driving too fast on the freeway certainly some sports people who engage in competitive sports experience presence through that that is true the important thing is presence eventually needs to come into your daily life rather than just being confined to one particular activity but one can see with some sports people that they are they're very intensely alive when engaging that although some people are even there are we have some ego that can come in we're probably i don't know during their performance or activity or just after or before i don't know and so that's that then another aspect of that is that some people become present when things go drastically wrong in their lives they experience extreme loss loss of home loss of all possessions loss of a loved one loss of status in society you become suddenly become noble to everybody dislikes you because you send out the wrong tweet and and from one day to the next you get cancelled so your loss of identity who am i i got cancelled to some people that is actually an extreme form of loss it's surprising they get cancelled on twitter and all these other things and then their life is ruined they think and other people they lose their possessions and they commit suicide because they lost all their possessions it's the famous thing in there when there was big depression in the 30s many people in new york jumped out of the skyscrapers commit suicide because they lost all their possessions so because their identity was in that and without that there were nothing but so that can happen when you lose something it can make you totally unconscious you're already unconscious and then you're even more unconscious it strengthens the ego so the ego says there's no point in living anymore i'm going to destroy myself as a last triumph of rebellion against this world i'm going to commit suicide ah there you are i did it oh i'm going to you can't say i did it i'm going to do it but other people when they a huge loss happens and then it leaves a huge hole in their existence in their life perhaps the loss of a child is a dreadful thing it's bad enough to lose a parent but if it's the other way around the loss of a child is a huge loss it can be very very painful or you you're part of millions of people who lose you become a refugee lose everything no home and there you're on the road to to nobody knows where you've left everything behind nothing left and there's a possibility of awakening to the essence of who you are and suddenly experience that and it happens all the time but only to a small percentage of those people who do experience these things but the potential is always there when everything that the ego had identified with is removed from you you are left with nothing your identity crumbles the egoic identity cannot be sustained anymore because everything it that gave gave it sustenance has been taken away and so in the absence of ego suddenly that which had been hidden underneath the ego emerges and that is called in christian teaching the peace that passes all understanding you can't figure out why you suddenly feel so peaceful when you lost everything so that happens also and that can happen to people who've never come into contact with any spiritual teaching just then of course presence can also rise in the face of beauty when you are alone on a mountaintop and and these are usually moments that come and go that may not may not last but they they're glimpses of presence and that's beautiful too so activities that are dangerous yes deep loss that can be a more lasting presence that arises through deep loss it could destroy your ego permanently and then you are permanently at peace even when your life goes back to normal you would still have that essence would still be alive in you and then there's another is the voluntary embracing of presence which is you all of you you've had enough suffering to have brought you here so that's good and you realize you do not need awful dreadful loss in order to enter presence because you voluntarily invite presence into your life so you don't need for life to take everything away from you but if it should do that if it did that then you would be really prepared and it would be immediately you would drop there you are i'm always present it's always in the background somewhere this presence that's great when i was diagnosed with cancer in january this year and which cancer means maybe you only have a few more months to live you don't know when they first tell you that your cancer oh maybe only a few more months to live that's the mind and immediately i dropped into very enormous just only presence there was nothing left but presence it was amazing i looked around and i was sitting in my living room for hours just there was no the person didn't reappear or only only occasionally little here's the person and gone again the person gone again and i don't know whether that had something to do with the fact that now after an operation i had it doesn't seem doesn't seem to be any more cancer in the body at least for now so that can the possibility of imminent death can of course be a wonderful deepening because it really forces you into into the present if you're ready for it you're all ready for it so if it should happen to you you'll be fine if you're not ready for it it's very painful very painful but even then it could happen that it fell off the ego cracks thank you

Eckhart Tolle Foundation For Successful Living [c403d83f-dd57-4c95-923c-3bf9099412f8]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:29)

Foundation for Successful Living. In this episode, Eckhart reflects on what it takes to create a successful life. He says, we must live with a foot in two worlds.

We must learn to reconcile the everyday with the transcendent. He explains why we should consciously manifest our aims and aspirations while also practicing presence. Eckhart says, the most important part of living in this world is bringing those two together.

[Speaker 1] (0:31 - 2:12)

Welcome everybody, wherever you are in the here and now. There's the one consciousness, the one being. And all you can say is that, I am that.

There's no other anymore. It's all the I am, manifestations of the I am. So, I'm going to be quiet just for half a minute or so, and to continue to enjoy that presence that is behind each one of you that is one, the one presence.

And the amazing thing is, in conventional language, I love each one of you. I don't know you on a personal level, but it's unnecessary. What does that mean?

I recognize myself, the essence of who I am in each one of you, and that recognition is love. Quite amazing. So, let's move to the first question about manifestation, conscious manifestation.

So, let's go ahead with the first question and the first questioner.

[Speaker 3] (2:13 - 2:48)

Hello, thank you, Eckhart, for being with us. Thank you. My question is, in the spiritual world, I've often encountered the notion that, instead of asking, what do I expect from life, one needs to ask, what does life expect of me, and to rise to whatever the present moment calls for us to do.

How do you reconcile that notion with the notion of conscious manifestation, where we're inherently attracting what we maybe wish or hope to see more of into our lives, rather than accepting whatever arises?

[Speaker 1] (2:49 - 34:38)

Thank you, thank you, good question. Let's hope there's going to be a good answer. A good question deserves a good answer.

So, how to reconcile accepting what arises in the present moment, and at the same time, perhaps, holding in your mind an image of what you want to manifest in your life, or using affirmations. Now, that's the, perhaps that's the most important part of manifesting, living in this world, is to bring the two together, accepting whatever arises in the present moment, without losing the ability to, in your day-to-day life, in your personal and professional life, without losing the ability to have goals, for example, and move towards goals, or to have certain aims. When you practice manifestation techniques, it might, you might do it as set aside, a few minutes every day, maybe twice a day, maybe in the morning and in the evening.

When you focus on something that you want to manifest, the rest of the time, you live your life without continuously thinking about something that is other than what arises in the present moment. So, it's important, the very foundation for successful living, but also the very foundation for manifesting things, is to be deeply accepting of whatever the present moment brings, to face it in that state of acceptance. Acceptance, if you're not in a state of acceptance, it's a state of acceptance that takes you deeper into the vertical dimension, which is beyond ego.

The state of non-acceptance keeps you trapped in egoic limit, very limited egoic consciousness. So, when you are in opposition to the present moment, in whatever form it arises, and that's very easy to fall back into that, even for spiritual practitioners, so to speak, it's fall back into this deep seated habit of being in opposition to what arises in the present moment. So, it's vital to recognize that something that is the case now, cannot be otherwise in this moment.

This is beyond any doubt. It is because that's how it is. You cannot wish it away or say it shouldn't be, it is.

Whatever is arising now is. It's dysfunctional to argue with it or to create some kind of mental, emotional resistance to it. It does not mean that change cannot take place.

It does not mean that you cannot take action in order to manifest something that you would prefer. But the important thing is at this moment, there's no division, nor there's no antagonism between you and what you experience as your reality. That's very important.

Not to have an antagonistic relationship with whatever arises in the present moment. It's, one could give many examples. Some, you may find yourself in a place that's not so pleasant, you may be stuck somewhere that perhaps may have become a familiar experience for many people these last few months.

They are stuck at home, I suppose, many. And for some that might be nice if you have a home with a nice big garden or something like that, it's not perhaps not so bad. If you have a small apartment, can't get out, several more people are there, then it might be more difficult to accept what is, but that is precisely the practice.

The more difficult that act of acceptance is, the deeper it will take you if you succeed in that act of non-resistance. If you succeed in not resisting in a situation that is, looks on the surface unacceptable, it can take you very quickly, very deep beyond ego. So what opens up in the state of acceptance is the vertical dimension that you are cut off from when you argue with what is mentally or emotionally even, one could say.

And then you see that in the present, if that is your starting point, the very foundation is to be in alignment with the isness of this. This is not to be confused with some kind of interpretation of what arises in the present moment. So the acceptance of the present moment does not depend, because you could interpret things in many different ways.

People usually impose some kind of interpretation on what's happening around them. And if you have a positive interpretation, you're closer to acceptance than when you have a negative interpretation of what's happening around you. Let's say you lose your home because of the current situation, you can't pay your rent or mortgage anymore.

And perhaps for a while you have to live in a tent or in your car. And there's always, of course, always ever just this moment. This moment is as it is.

So there you sit in your tent or in your car and you take this moment. Now you can interpret, if you give it a positive interpretation, you say, well, it's a challenge for me to be here and it's not so bad actually living in the car. I can manage, I can survive.

I hope it doesn't last for too long, but I can, it's okay. I shouldn't complain because other people will have it much worse than me. They don't even have a car to live in or a tent.

They may, I could be without a tent, but I have a tent. This is not bad. It's actually takes you a bit closer to acceptance, but it's not yet, it's not really the full acceptance.

It's some kind of, you have to spin a pleasant story to make you feel good. So you are still somehow dependent on what's going on in your mind for your state of deep wellbeing. But in order to become independent, not only of the, as far as your inner state of consciousness is concerned, to become independent, not only of whatever is at the present moment, your external circumstances, and external includes even what's happening in your body.

Let's say something, some disability, illness, disability, any external circumstance to become free of dependency as far as your state of consciousness, your inner state is concerned, to become free of this reactivity to external conditions so that your inner state is no longer determined by external conditions, but not only is not determined by external conditions, your inner state is also not determined by your mind, what your mind is saying, whatever your mind is. So if your mind is interpreting your external conditions in a negative way, then of course you experience emotions that reflect those negative thoughts and it's not a pleasant state, you're stuck, you are resistant, and it's much less likely that you will be able to move on quickly from that situation because you are not connected with the power of life itself that is beyond the conditioned mind, that is the consciousness. So a positive interpretation is better than a negative one, it takes you a little closer to full acceptance, but it's not full acceptance yet, you're still dependent on what, and your mind could change its mind quickly. So for a few days, you're good with telling yourself a nice narrative about what's happening in your life, and then you get, I'm really tired of telling myself this nice narrative when I really know it isn't nice at all, so it could quickly shift, and you start to complain.

So even that is not the solution, it's not full acceptance, full acceptance is to give up, calling it good or bad, that sounds almost like being asked, asking somebody to be superhuman, isn't it human to interpret? Yes, it is, but there is another way if you want to awaken spiritually, and the universe wants you to awaken spiritually, there's something that is beyond the polarities of good and bad, but that is transcendent dimension of consciousness, and to discover that possibility and that reality in yourself is the most amazing thing that could happen to you in this lifetime or any other lifetime, to discover the transcendent dimension where your inner state through that absolute yes to what is, which is no longer a mental thing, you let go of needing to interpret this moment, and this moment becomes the foundation for your life, you still have a history, yes, of course, but you're not interpreting anymore this moment, you just accept it, and then you may see that certain things may be needed to change the external appearance of this moment, for example, let's say you're in your tent, and you realize fully that it would be helpful to get out of your tent before it gets too cold, before the summer is over, and you realize that you need to take certain steps on a practical level in order to change your external situation with which you are totally okay here and now, you're not complaining at all, in fact, there are many aspects of it that are deeply enjoyable, because when you accept the present moment, everything that you perceive, that you look on, that you hear, is there's not only an acceptance, there's also an appreciation of the fullness of life that's always around you, it's the simple act of breathing, the still presence of a tree, of a plant, the still presence even of a so-called inanimate object, everything is lovely in its beingness, there's a fullness of life around you, there's the sky, there's the sun, sunshine, water, you've entered the vertical dimension, and from that deeper state of consciousness, then action that then you need to take on the external horizontal dimension of life becomes more empowered and more inspired because it's no longer coming from some kind of negative state, either arising of some kind of angry state or some kind of fearful state, action that is motivated by fear is not pleasant, does not create pleasant experiences for yourself or other people, you will make yourself and others unhappy, but if you can be deeply accepting of the present moment and then you make, if you don't know yet what action to take, you close your eyes or you don't, it doesn't matter, and then you see what it is that you need to do in order to change the external situation because you may have a preference, you have preferences as far as this person is concerned for living in a house that's rather than a tent in the long term, and so you can have a certain visualization of what it is or you want certain, to engage in a certain activity, a certain type of work, we'll be talking more about this, I'm sure, in the next few answers to the questions, but the very foundation is the acceptance and then it does not mean that change cannot happen in your life once you've become aligned with the isness of the present moment, it does not mean that you become incapable of action or that the motivation for taking action isn't there anymore, the motivation changes from neediness or wanting to either to protect or enhance your egoic identity through something that you acquire, feeling getting rid of the sense of lack or insufficiency that is part of egoic identity, those motivations disappear and another motivation arises and that is the motivation that the joy of manifesting something because the universe openly enjoys it too and you're a part of the universe, the universe loves manifesting life forms and all kinds of things in this world and everywhere, if you look at the millions of life forms on this planet that the universal intelligence has manifested and continues to manifest gradually becoming over millions or billions of years, greater complexity and more consciousness flows into these life forms that the universe delights in manifesting, so the universe loves manifesting form and the human manifestation, conscious manifestation is none other than an extension of what the universe is already doing and now it can do it through you.

If you look at, I saw the, I'm not a diver into the ocean, it's lovely, it's a lovely thing, people are able to dive and look at the life forms in the sea but I saw it on the screen the other day, the unbelievable life forms that you see in the ocean like creations of some incredible fantasy that nobody could even have dreamt of, the life forms that you, such incredible beauty and exquisite forms, what, there's obviously some kind of, behind the world of appearances, there is a vast intelligence that creates continuously these delights, it must delight in creating all these forms and that's, you yourself are a creation of that, you are one of these life forms that created by this underlying intelligence, which is an emanation of the source of all life, God, you're an emanation of that and then that can, when you're no longer coming from egoic separation, you can be a conscious participant in the act of creation that the universe is engaged in, the entire sense-perceived universe could be regarded as a vast act of creation that, and it's growing, the complexity is growing and that's the outward movement of the universe, the universe has this, the outward movement is the creation of form and you are a reflection of that, but there's also an inward movement, the inward, it's like an out-breath and in-breath, so when the universe creates, it creates directly, well, I don't want to go into that too much, but there is an underlying intelligence that expresses itself through life forms and there are strands or branches or in this underlying intelligence that there are creative forces that emanate from the source, we can't, we don't see them and they are responsible for the creation of various life forms, sometimes in older civilization, they call them spirits or nature spirits and other things, they are all, they are in the unseen, what Socrates said according to Plato that underlying the world of forms that we see, there are mental formations, there's already, it's translated as ideas in the mind of God, there's a blueprint, so to speak, a pattern in the unseen and that is the creative force behind plants, animals, but don't want to go too far into this, the important thing to realize is that the universe has two movements and the human being is a microcosm of the entire universe, the human being loves to and should be engaged in the act of creation as a co-creator with the greater intelligence, only an expression of it, there's a tendency of the universe that is meant to be like that, to lose itself in the creation, so it's the, every life form is then, especially in the human, the human loses its connectedness, its awareness that it is only a temporary expression of the one and then you take everything that happens is absolutely real and that's a very frightening thing that then everything has an absolute reality, everything around you because you have lost yourself in the dream of form because ultimately what the universe is creating is this incredibly beautiful dream-like world, it's an artistic, like gigantic artistic creation, but that's the outward movement, that's the out-breath, the whole world comes into being and then there's the in-breath when the universe again becomes conscious of itself because before it had lost itself in the millions, billions of life forms, it wanted to do that, to experience this beauty and then the other movement is necessary just as you need to breathe in and breathe out, both movements are necessary, sometimes I call it the outward journey which is when you manifest things and the inward journey which is the journey into yourself, into the timeless now, the vertical dimension and that's the in-breath one could say and it is quite possible that that is the entire universe reflected in the human in and out-breath, the entire universe is probably being breathed out and breathed in, the big bang is the out-breath and it's still continuing, it is continuous creation and then at some point during the out-breath, the other factor comes in and that is the desire to breathe in again because you're approaching the end of the out-breath and you get some, and then the universe breathes in which would be the end of the world, the entire universe is returning to absolute oneness and then perhaps there's another out-breath as in similar things I said in ancient Indian philosophy, Brahman, that one is breathing out the universe and so in your own life, if you are connected with the unconditioned deeper intelligence, then it's a joy to be engaged in the act of creation because you are no longer engaged in it as a person but as an extension of the one intelligence so there's no contradiction anymore between being deeply rooted in the present moment which is a transcendent you, the transcendence, the being of you is in deeply, is in the timeless transcendent dimension of consciousness that is a being.

Then there's the human, human being, right? You are a human being. The being is the transcendent dimension of who you are.

The human is the things where you move in the horizontal dimension in time. There you take steps and there are things that when you look at the horizontal dimension, there are things that it would be good to do. You see things without losing your connectedness to the deeper dimension from there, you look and then you see things how you can improve your so-called life on the horizontal dimension where the person lives, what you call the person.

There are things that you can do to improve your life or to bring in, to contribute some good, what some form to this world. And by doing that, improve what you call your life and to bring some good into this world is the essence of any good that you bring into this world is always you bring in more consciousness. You connect it to the consciousness, you bring in through whatever activity.

Let's see the being and the human. You are not only a human. Human is a conditioned person.

More fundamentally, you are the being. If you forget that, then the human is lost. And if the human goes through life without ever, even having a glimpse of the being that is the transcendent dimension who they are, then no life can be fulfilling.

Life will be very frustrating, even if through sheer hard work of willpower, you can achieve things, yes. Through sheer hard work and willpower, you can achieve things. They will not be deeply creative, not really bringing something really new into this world, but you could create wealth, you could create a big thing through sheer willpower, but in the process, you're making yourself and many other people unhappy.

And you're creating in Eastern times, you're creating a lot of karma. So that's not, so the conscious manifestation is not the application of willpower to make things happen. It's a very different process.

It's aligning yourself to an underlying power so that things happen without exercising your willpower. And they happen much more powerfully in that way. When one speaks to talk about it, it's quite complex.

When you actually live it, it's very simple. But when one tries to explain it in words, it becomes very seemingly complex. Also, it's worth mentioning that in a person's life, there may be periods when living in the present moment is more important than creating anything, when you may not feel called upon to manifest something other than what is for certain periods of your life.

And you're simply in alignment with what is here now. And even that is manifestation, but it's a different kind of manifestation. You are, you're still, you're manifesting your reality still, even if you have no particular aim about wanting to achieve this or to bring about that, you're still manifesting the way in which, how do you experience your life?

How do you experience your reality? How do you respond to challenges that life brings? One could also call that conscious manifestation because you manifest the reality of how you experience the things that are happening in this moment, that in itself is a creative act.

And some people have little interest, that's fine too, in creating too much. They're very much drawn to the being dimension. Realize that ultimately there's no contradiction between being and the human or being and doing.

The human is the doing, but the being is the awareness. So that's a practice that you have to experience for yourself, how it feels to be completely fine with this moment and yet realize that as a person, there are certain things that you may want to bring about or create. Your wellbeing is not dependent on the outcome.

That's vital in any manifestation practice. The non-attachment to the outcome. If you're attached to the outcome and you are excessively focused on that which you want to achieve, then the journey towards it becomes something that is of low quality because there's not much consciousness in it.

It's not a pleasant journey. If all you want is arriving, the journey's not pleasant. And once you have arrived, that's it.

Some other journey starts. So just to finish the way I experienced it, I've spent quite a long time in a state of very peaceful alignment with the present moment and just responding to things that arose in the present moment. After I spent time just drifting a little bit, but being very, very much in a state of joy, people came to me occasionally asking questions and gradually answering people's questions became my job.

Then at some point I could feel something, from an impulse from within, something wanted to come out. And there was a feeling of almost a kind of, in a, not disturbance, but something in the energy field that usually was very, very peaceful. There was something going, and at first I didn't know what it was.

And then at that point I made some affirmations. I said I wanted an acceleration of what I was meant to do. The acceleration then came in the form of me writing the power of now.

So just to summarize, you don't need to get away, you go more deeply into the present moment. If you want to change your external situation, on a personal level, there are things to be done, not continuously, but there are time periods, definitely when there are things to be done. And you can see more clearly what it is, because then it's connected to the unconditioned intelligence, and then it can operate from it, rather than just the limited person doing things in order to satisfy its illusory needs, to satisfy its illusory needs and wants.

Eckhart Tolle Freedom Comes from Awareness [1b077bf7-0377-4866-82a0-871fd71faf95]

[Speaker 5] (0:00 - 0:46)

Freedom comes from awareness. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions from an audience in Hawaii. A man asks if we actually have free will.

Eckhart explains we won't experience free will while living on the level of ego because we're conditioned by the past. He believes until we transcend our past, we are at the mercy of our unconscious patterns. A woman who's a therapist and works with trauma survivors asks how to deal with her resentment at God for the abuse her clients suffer.

She questions how can God allow such awful things to happen? Eckhart says this view of God is actually a misconception. He goes on to explain that humans are in the process of awakening and suffering is part of our evolution.

[Speaker 1] (0:48 - 1:18)

Let's see if there are any questions. Hopefully not a question like, what is the meaning of the universe? Or what did you have for breakfast?

Or are you in telepathic contact with Ashtar, commander of the galactic fleet? I'm not allowed to choose anybody here, but...

[Speaker 4] (1:19 - 2:23)

Hello, Eckhart. Hello. Thank you to you and Cam and your whole team for this experience.

Something that's been really helpful for me, first as a concept when I was in college, took a philosophy course, was the idea that there's no free will. At the deepest sense, meaning we're not ultimately responsible for our actions in the sense that everything is cause and effect in this universe. It's all connected.

I didn't choose my brain. And ultimately, I don't choose the thoughts that arise because I am who I am in every moment based on the universal impulse and my ingredients as a human being. And then over the last couple of years, I've experienced that through meditation, the arising of thoughts.

And now I feel like it's a self-evident truth. Right. So I've googled Eckhart Tolle free will.

I've looked for it. I've tried to find your thoughts on it. So I'm wondering what your ideas are on free will.

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:24 - 9:48)

Thank you very much. Yes, wonderful question. I'm surprised there's nothing on Google about Eckhart and free will, but maybe I haven't said anything about it.

So here we go. As you know, it's an eternal, ancient philosophical question, and there's never been a definitive answer that everybody would agree with in that sense. So, okay, let's start on one level, and then we go on to the next level.

On the level of egoic unconsciousness, where you are a conditioned entity, your mental, emotional makeup is totally conditioned by the past, and you are completely identified with the conditioning of your mind. In that state that, spiritually speaking, is the unconscious state, it is obvious that in that state, there is no freedom at all, because you are forced to act out the unconscious conditioning of your mind, with which you are completely identified. So most people would probably agree, if you understand, that on that level, there is no possibility of freedom.

Your actions are determined by your conditioned mind, you are forced to act as you do, because there's no choice, because choice would imply some awareness. So on that level, there's certainly no freedom. Then, awareness comes in, the human being begins to awaken.

Then it appears, I'm not saying it is the case, it appears that then freedom begins to be a possibility, because you can choose to step out of the conditioning of your mind. You can recognize a conditioned thought, and you are no longer compelled to act it out, because there is an awareness there. You can choose a certain course of action, not from the conditioning of your mind, but from the presence.

So you can act, and you have much more freedom, that before you could not have. Freedom comes with awareness. So it's then, relative to the unconscious state, there is now freedom to act.

But, if you look more deeply, even there, even there on that level, you are connected with the totality of consciousness, you're only an expression of the totality of consciousness. You are not really a separate entity. Was it Alan Watts who said, you are in the same way that the wave is something that the ocean is doing, you are something that the whole universe is doing, in the same way.

So the wave is something the ocean is doing, you are something that the universe is doing. So although it appears from a certain, relative to a previous state of unconscious, there is freedom, and relative to that, there is freedom. But then if you look more deeply into that, you realize that even there, one cannot say that you are choosing this, you are an expression of consciousness, and consciousness, one could say, is choosing, and you think you're doing it.

Sometimes people ask me, can you choose to be present? And from one perspective, you can choose to be present. From another perspective, one could say that presence chooses you, it chooses to become present through you, depends how you look at it.

So in ultimate terms, or in relative terms, there is freedom relative to the unconscious state, when you become unconscious. But even there, it's only relative to the unconscious state. Even there, there is not absolute freedom, because you do not exist as an independent entity, you're part of the web of interconnectedness, that is the whole universe.

So in that sense, there is no freedom of choice of the individual, because ultimately, there is no individual. Thank you so much, I appreciate it. Thank you.

Just want to add one more thing to that. Because you mentioned, everybody's doing their best, and so on. And I agreed that nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness.

A question that may arise, though, is responsibility and punishment. Because if the criminal or whoever the perpetrator is not responsible, because they are totally in the grip of their conditioning, does that mean then that the perpetrator is not responsible for what they do? And it does seem to be the case, a very unconscious person, in that sense, is not responsible for what they do.

Now, does that mean we must not punish this person because he couldn't help it? Now, that's a difficult point. There is a destiny for human beings, human beings are meant to move out of the unconscious state.

And if they are not moving out of the unconscious state, they create suffering, and they will have to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness, which eventually awakens them. So when humans suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness, eventually leads to suffering. And then there is a possibility of awakening.

So although they may not be conscious for what they do, it doesn't mean that karmic retribution on that level does not operate. Punishment is necessary, and sometimes it could be at the hands of the law or the judicial system. First of all, other humans need to be protected from them, so they need to be put away.

And although they are not, they may not be responsible, but they will have to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness. And by suffering the consequences of their unconsciousness, there is a possibility of awakening. I've had contact with quite a few people who are imprisoned, and they have written to me, and they have experienced an awakening in prison.

They suffered the consequences of their unconsciousness, and that led to an awakening.

[Speaker 3] (9:59 - 10:29)

Aloha. So my question is about, okay, clairvoyance, psychic mediums, people that have like the ability to contact and have these spirits from this other dimension come in, near-death experiences. If you, if we are all able to access this unlimited realm of consciousness, have you ever been able to have that experience?

[Speaker 1] (10:30 - 10:35)

To be aware of spirit presences, you mean perhaps?

[Speaker 3] (10:37 - 11:18)

Yeah, and like for one example I have is a friend that I know, she has this uncanny ability, she was helping the police find one of her friends' husband who had mysteriously disappeared, and he was in the attic. She kept saying he's up in the attic. The cops went up there, he wasn't there.

Six months later, there was like this dripping. Yeah, it was him. He was up there.

He was dead. And she just knew. How would she know that?

She's in Florida, and they were in like Connecticut. So this knowing of things like this nature, like ghosts, spirits, reincarnated people that pass on, they communicate from that realm. What is your take on that?

[Speaker 1] (11:18 - 12:49)

Thank you, thank you. When I was young, a long time ago, I had some interest in that, and I experimented a little bit with that, and I had a little bit of experience with presences. But when I went through my awakening, I lost interest in that.

My focus was not on that, although I have come into contact with quite a few people who, over the years, who channel spirits and spirit presences. And I've spoken to and looked at what is being channeled. The important question is, these presences are also just manifestations of the one consciousness, obviously.

So whatever you contact, and even if you contact extraterrestrials, they will be manifestation of the one consciousness. So ultimately, there's nothing alien in this world. So my message to you then is simply, don't seek it out, but when it does appear, look at it, use your discernment to see whether there's genuine wisdom there.

But primarily, look to yourself, allow consciousness to use you, and find the wisdom that is already in you, so that it can come forth. Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (12:59 - 12:59)

Hello.

[Speaker 1] (12:59 - 13:00)

Hello.

[Speaker 2] (13:00 - 15:07)

My question for today, I'd like to phrase it using a metaphor that you used. You mentioned the story of a man who had just had dinner, and had walked around asking if there was a chef. And I loved that metaphor.

I wrote it down. So I have some questions for the chef. Okay.

So I've been a mental health therapist for almost 10 years. I've specialized working specifically with survivors of sexual trauma, survivors of very severe and complex trauma. In my clinical career, I've worked with women, men, children who've been raped by fathers, mothers, siblings, multiple times.

I've also worked with different individuals who have been permanently mutilated by the violence, the physical violence done onto them. So that's me as a professional in the healing. And also in my personal life, my grandmother, she was murdered by her husband, shot nine times in front of all of her children to see.

And my mother became an alcoholic at age seven due to the trauma. And so surprisingly, I'm a very charming, calm person. I love what I do.

I love healing people. I love helping people. So sometimes though, I feel a little bit hopeless for them at times because of all of the pain and suffering they've gone through.

And I get very upset sometimes. I think if there is a chef that's making the dinner that we're eating, well, why did that person get like a horrible plate? And I have a little bit of resentment, if I'm honest, as a person.

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (15:08 - 27:26)

Thank you. Thank you. Thank you.

Of course, what you're saying seems to be justified. The question is justified, seemingly. And if you feel a little bit of resentment towards the chef, that's also justified.

And of course, traditionally, this is used as an argument by many people to prove that actually there is no chef. People who say, if there were a God, then how would he possibly allow this amount of suffering to happen? And people say, if I were a God, I would not allow this to happen, obviously.

And therefore, I'm morally superior to any God. If there is a God, obviously, my morals are much higher than this God's morals, which probably means there is no God. Or if there is a God, it's a malevolent being, they say.

There was the, in early Christian times and pre-Christian times, there was a sect, a religious sect called the Gnostics, G-N-O, Gnostics, Gnostics, you don't pronounce the G, the Gnostics. They were interested in two things, direct knowledge of the divine through inner realization, but they also had a strange belief. And they had the belief that the entire world was created by a malevolent, inferior God, not the real God.

And they had ample opportunity to prove, because they pointed all the dreadful things that were happening in the world, look at the children suffering, look at this. So they came to the conclusion that this world was a product, were created by a malevolent God, and they completely rejected this world. And that, I believe, was not a wise conclusion, although there's a lot to be said for the Gnostics otherwise.

So the argument then goes, if there were a God, he could not possibly allow these things to happen, therefore it proves that we live in a random universe, where things just happen randomly to people. That would be one possible conclusion. The other possible conclusion would be what the Gnostics said, and related to the Gnostics conclusion would be to say there is also a devil in this world, the antagonist of God, and that this devil is creating all this suffering, and the devil is, this is a traditional Christian, the devil is the antagonist of God, and is making humans suffer and doing all this.

So you have all these possible interpretations or conclusions, none of which I believe are actually correct. The starting point is the assumption, what I would say is the erroneous starting point is the assumption that there is a God that is a controlling figure, that controls events from somewhere, and makes things happen, or allows things to happen that he could prevent. So he is omnipotent, so either he uses his omnipotence to torture people, or he doesn't use his omnipotence and just let things go.

Either case, not a very desirable God. So the traditional argument actually for the non-existence of God is this, all the suffering in the world, that's the traditional. But the departure of this is, in my view, a misconception of what God is.

To see God as a power figure, that controlling entity, I would suggest that is a wrong way of understanding what God actually means. As an alternative suggestion, I would say that we live in an awakening universe, and what awakens within us, slowly, is the consciousness which is divine. God consciousness slowly awakens in us.

Closer to what God is relative to humans, is Jesus on the cross. Jesus on the cross is an image of human suffering. Even if you're not a Christian, you can probably understand that Jesus could be regarded as an archetypal human.

Jesus embodies the suffering humanity, represents every suffering human. That is a, gets us a little bit closer to the reality of God, and think there is one power figure somewhere who is not doing what he should be doing. So God has incarnated into the human, and the human is in the process of awakening, and the suffering of humanity is part of the birth pangs of the awakening consciousness.

Every suffering human is living the suffering of Christ on the cross also. Every human is Jesus on the cross, the suffering human entity. And the suffering is the, what is, so one could say then, that almost, that God is suffering in every human, in that sense, when God is not yet fully expressed in this world.

God himself is suffering in every human, and human being, in this dimension, as it slowly, slowly comes more fully into this dimension. And this is a process, a birth process. There's actually a line in the Bible that speaks of by St. Paul, that the entire world is going through the pains of birth. The entire world is groaning as if in childbirth. That's what St. Paul says in one of his letters. The suffering is the gradual birthing of the divine in this world.

So in every human, one could say there is Jesus suffering. There is not a controlling entity as such, because God does not exist in space or time somewhere and looks upon this world. The consciousness that is the essence of who you are is the emanation of God.

And in this dimension, there is a gradual awakening out of unconsciousness. And the awakening process can be very painful for many humans until they realize their true essence. And that is the way out of the suffering that is, you described, that many humans have been through.

There is the possibility for the suffering to lead to a deeper realization of that in every human that's beyond suffering. There's a deep essence in every human that actually cannot be touched by suffering, but that may be heavily obscured by layers of intense suffering. If you can awaken that deep essence that is in every human, then that would be the redemption from suffering.

Christianity, of course, is the central image of Christianity is an image of suffering. That makes more sense than to say there is some omnipotent God who could prevent it. And traditionally, by the way, Buddha also talks about the central teaching of the Buddha is suffering.

He speaks of the ever-present human suffering, many degrees of suffering. I teach suffering and the end of suffering, said the Buddha. The central image of Christianity is Jesus on the cross, the suffering human.

They say in Christianity that you have to believe in Jesus to be saved. That never made much sense to me. What would make sense to me, and perhaps the belief is a misinterpretation.

What would make sense to me is to say, if you identify with Jesus, if you can identify with his, if your suffering is all the same as Jesus suffering, if you identify with Jesus, that can lead to a redemption because Jesus becomes the archetype of suffering. And if you can feel that you are suffering for and with Jesus, then that takes it into a transpersonal realm. And you can come to an acceptance of what has happened, a deep acceptance of what has happened.

And that acceptance then can free you from the burden of the emotional and mental memory of the suffering, and something else can emerge from within you. So these are complex things, but the main thing is that I do not see, I don't, it is advisable to see God as a controlling figure that is not doing what he should be doing. That is the main thing.

So suffering is part of the human condition, some much more acutely than others, that is true. But every human being has their share of suffering. Sooner or later, it will come to everyone.

And that is only one incarnation, the suffering human. As I see it, the human will then reemerge again in a different form, and will most likely, if not in this lifetime, will in the next lifetime be able to come much more quickly to an awakening. I know it from my own, if I had not suffered in my childhood, it wasn't as extreme as what you describe.

But to live in a very dysfunctional household, where there's constant conflict, and screaming and shouting for a little sensitive child, is horrible. And so relative to the suffering that you describe, it perhaps is not that much, but to me it was a lot of suffering. And retrospectively, I know that that has been ultimately a necessary part of my eventual awakening.

So that's how it is. And then we can come to an acceptance of the suffering, and ultimately a transcendence of the suffering. That's all.

One could talk about it for much longer, but it's just steering you in a direction that I think is more helpful than thinking of a God that's not doing what he should be doing. Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Glimpses Of Awareness [bafdf907-2159-411c-9f3c-b3715c08be85]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:40)

Glimpses of awareness. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions about our identification with the ego and our thoughts. He says the light of consciousness is relentlessly gobbled up by the mind and turned into thinking.

He believes practicing presence is the only immunity against our thoughts. As we begin to awaken, we have what he calls glimpses of awareness. We lose them and then gain them back.

Eckhart says we don't have to wait for those glimpses to arise spontaneously. He explains we need to invite them into our lives so that awakened consciousness becomes an integral part of who we are.

[Speaker 4] (0:41 - 0:55)

How do I keep my mind clear? I have glimpses of what I believe is awareness. Then I find having glimpses again, which means I lose it regularly.

How do we stay more in the present moment?

[Speaker 1] (0:56 - 21:23)

Thank you. Thank you. So what tends to happen is that the glimpses of awareness that arise spontaneously as a human goes through the awakening process tend to become longer.

So it's just a few things and then suddenly you have longer periods of awareness or presence. And that's wonderful. The good news, of course, is that you have these glimpses of awareness, which means the awakening process is already happening.

So be happy with that and be grateful when a glimpse of awareness arises spontaneously in your life in certain situations. It doesn't matter where or how, but also know that you don't have to just wait for these glimpses to arise spontaneously. It's important to realize that you can actually invite awareness or presence into your life.

So you don't always have to wait for it to happen spontaneously. For example, you could be very busy with something and you notice that you become irritated or your mind is very cluttered and you realize that and you say, okay, I choose to be present right now. Doesn't have to be long.

I choose presence right now. And how do you choose presence? You have to somehow extract, so to speak, or to retrieve your consciousness from the stream of thinking, because when your mind is very cluttered, which is a normal state for most humans, when your mind is very cluttered, thought activity is absorbing all your consciousness.

Your consciousness is continuously transformed into thoughts, into form. There's no spaciousness left. Spaciousness is formless consciousness, unconditioned consciousness.

So the light of consciousness is gobbled up by your mind, which is then continuously transforming consciousness into thinking. So the mind absorbs all of all consciousness. And for many humans, that's their life, basically.

And they are identified with this mind that the consciousness has become thought. So when you say, okay, my mind is cluttered, I'm becoming anxious, or whatever it may be, I choose presence. Still, the question arises, how do you retrieve consciousness from being completely absorbed by the thought activity?

You had to get your consciousness out of the stream of thinking, pull it out of the stream of thinking, which is not easy at first. If you just say, I want to be present now, then you will find you can't, because the mind just carries on. But I want to be present, but I can't be present.

And then the mind will probably tell you, there's no point in even trying, which of course is another thought, which is not necessarily true. But the mind will tell you, oh, I can't possibly be present now. What presence?

I've got other problems than presence. When I've solved my problems, then I'll be present. That's what the mind tends to say.

And so the question is, how do I get the consciousness out of the mind so that it's not completely absorbed continuously by mind activity? And that's the simple choice. You need some anchor, so to speak, to direct consciousness towards that, that sustains consciousness that's not in the mind.

And the good anchor for that is, for example, the inner body, to feel the inner body. So instead of thinking then, in order to feel the inner body, you need to take attention away from thought activity. You cannot feel the inner body and still be thinking about your problems.

You have to take attention away and put attention into the body. So your attention goes into your hands. For example, it's a good place to start usually.

And you can feel the aliveness in your hands. Very subtle at first, but there it is. And then your attention could move to your feet at the same time as you still feel the aliveness in your hands.

You could feel the aliveness in your feet simultaneously. And then you connect the rest of the body. You may not be able to feel all parts of the body as clearly as your hands, but it's fine.

You begin to feel that your body is alive internally. And what you're feeling actually is already beyond the physical body. You're already feeling an energy field that's beyond the physical.

And then that can become a great anchor for staying present. It doesn't matter for how long, two minutes, three minutes, five minutes, even one minute is quite good. Feeling the inner body then takes attention away from useless thinking.

And closely associated with the feeling of inner body is awareness of breath, awareness of your breathing. They are somehow connected. You can even bring them together so that you have awareness of the breath as it moves in and out of the body.

And awareness of the inner body as a totality, a total energy field. So you're aware of the breathing and the energy in the inner body at the same time. It's a single thing.

You're breathing and make sure you feel your breath going into the abdomen, that you feel it in there. That can be a great help. There's an energy field there that is helpful when you feel the inner body.

So you're breathing into the, without forcing anything, just normal breathing. And you follow the breath with your attention. And then you feel the breath moving into the abdomen.

It doesn't actually, the air doesn't actually move into the abdomen, but energy does as you feel, if you follow the breath. And then you can very quickly come to a point where you feel very much alive and quite peaceful. Whereas three minutes before, you were anxious and burdened with negative thoughts and a lot of mental clutter.

Then you have shifted your attention into the inner body and the breathing, and you feel suddenly intensely alive. And it's beautiful. This is a moment also, it's not just presence.

Yes, it's presence, but presence is also self-transcendence. You've transcended the little personal me, and you're connecting with a deeper energy field, which is consciousness. It's a portal into the unconditioned consciousness.

It's a portal into that. So the inner body is a great anchor for presence. It's just a choice.

I'm choosing to be present. If you don't have much time, even just taking one or two conscious breaths, many times during the day can be a wonderful, very, very helpful mini meditation, so to speak. Just one conscious breath, which takes about, I don't know, 20 seconds.

Let's just do, one conscious breath goes like this, in and out. One more time, in and out.

Attention on your breath.

One or two conscious breaths. Not difficult. Three might be even better, but even one is already a gain in consciousness, because it's arising of a little bit of spaciousness.

To be aware of your breath, your attention needs to be there. It cannot be absorbed by thinking. This is what the secret of the Buddha.

The Buddha recommended breath awareness as the most important, the most powerful meditation, just breath awareness. Anapanasati yoga is the term. It's awareness of the ingoing and outgoing breath.

And the Buddha didn't say, stop thinking. That's difficult for most people. It's not impossible to go there directly.

But he said, be aware of your breath. And then of course, people realized when they're aware of their breath, they're not thinking. You can either think, or you can be aware of your breathing, but not both.

So a very clever way of stopping people's minds was to say, be aware of your breathing. Oh, so you're inviting moments of presence or awareness into your life. And so you need something like inner body and or breath to take your attention away from your consciousness, away from mind activity.

One other thing that I often recommend when you choose awareness is to simply choose to be present with your sense perceptions. So that you awaken to your sense perceptions, which then become more acute. You could either, you can focus on one sense perception, like visual or auditory, or even tactile, or even taste.

But the predominant sense perceptions are for most humans are the visual and the auditory. So you can focus on sense perception, be very conscious. Let's say there's certain noises that you can hear outside.

If they're natural, they're more helpful than manmade noises, but other noises can also work. So you notice a noise and you continue to be very alert and just continue listening. One could say you listen.

Oh, and when you really listen, you're not thinking. You have to give your complete attention to the listening. That's another way of stepping out of the clutter of your mind and inviting awareness or presence into your life.

You have to, when you really listen, there needs to be an alertness behind. And that alertness is consciousness itself, the attention behind the listening, the alertness behind the listening. Same thing with a visual.

You can look at either one particular object or a flower or a tree or a leaf or whatever it may be, or you can take in the totality of a landscape. If you're somewhere and there's a landscape and you take in the totality, that's another way of, and you perceive in that state of alert attention, pure perception without labeling it. And if a label should arise in your mind, you let it go immediately.

If thoughts come and interpret what you're seeing or what you're hearing, you let it go. Another way is very helpful when you listen, instead of listening, it's particularly helpful when you have a repetitive noise, for example, bird song, for example, or some other maybe animal noise or some, or maybe just noise of the rustling of leaves in the wind or something that's all, you listen to the noise and then you listen to the silent spaces in between the noises. That's a very powerful thing.

If you listen to the silent spaces in between the noise, certain types of music are very conducive to that. I recommend the Japanese bamboo flute, which is called shakuhachi. Shakuhachi is a simple bamboo with low holes in it.

And the great masters of the shakuhachi flute play extremely meditative music. And when you listen to it, the secret is to pay, one could say, almost to pay more attention to the silent spaces between the sounds than to the sounds. And that's a very powerful thing.

So listening to a noise is great, it's helpful already, but if you're able to listen to a silence, that is the most wonderful meditation. Now, what does it mean to listen to a silence? Let's say you're in a silent room and there's no noise whatsoever.

This could happen at night perhaps when you're surrounded by silence and you listen. What do you listen to? When I say listen to the silence, what does that mean?

If there's nothing to listen to, does it even have any meaning when I say, listen to the silence? Well, you are listening, but there's nothing there. This can also be helpful when, if you have a, I don't, unfortunately, I don't have a bell here.

When you have a bell that it rings or a gong that goes, you sound the gong, it goes, or whatever, and then the sound gradually subsides, less, and you listen very carefully. And then the moment comes when the sound is gone, but you continue to listen. What are you listening to?

Nothing, and that's the secret, because when there's nothing there to listen to, what arises is the consciousness without an object, pure consciousness. There's no object in the listening anymore. So it's not, I have, I sometimes use the expression object consciousness and space consciousness.

Object consciousness is to be conscious of something. You're conscious of something that you perceive with your senses, or you're conscious of a thought, or you're conscious of an emotion. That's all object consciousness, conscious of something.

And again, for most people, that's all they know, but space consciousness is to be conscious of consciousness itself, to be conscious that you're conscious, to be aware that you're aware, awareness of awareness, conscious of being conscious. That is space consciousness. So when you listen to the silence, immediately the mind is obviously completely still, and there's nothing there, and that is the arising of space consciousness, which is unconditioned consciousness, stillness.

If you haven't read, there's a little book that many people, advanced practitioners of presence find helpful. A little book I wrote, Stillness Speaks, and that is a book for meditative reading. You just read one page or half a page, and then just become still, and it just takes you into presence.

It doesn't have much to feed your mind, just little mini meditations to take you into presence. Stillness Speaks, of course, it doesn't say anything. So inviting, again, inviting awareness.

When it happens spontaneously, it's wonderful, but it's not enough. Now, when you've had a taste of presence awareness, then you're able to also invite it into your life, and then that speeds up the awakening process. Don't beat yourself up when you lose it, that's fine, because the moment you regain it, it's a gain in consciousness.

Don't fall into the trap of believing your egoic mind when it judges you for having lost it, because the moment that you lost it, you have it again. Because if you're really lost, you don't know you're lost. The people who are really lost have no idea that they are lost.

But if you know that you're lost, there's a knowing there that's not part of the state of being lost. It's the same way of being, let's say, somebody's crazy or insane. If you know that you're insane, you're not completely insane, because there's a knowing there.

So people who are really insane, they're so absorbed in their condition, they don't know it. And of course, they believe they're not insane at all. So that knowing is the awakened part of you that knows, suddenly knows that you've been trapped in mental clutter for the past two hours.

And suddenly, you know, that's the arising of knowing. So it's a wonderful thing. There's no need to condemn yourself for not having been present.

Because when you notice that you're present, you're there. Or at least the possibility of choosing presence is there. It's possible that you notice that you're not present for two seconds, and then immediately you fall back into being absorbed by the thinking mind.

But the noticing of being present brings in the element of choice. The element of choice is to say, I choose presence now for the next two minutes, or whatever it may be, I choose presence. The element of choice is absent when you are totally at the mercy of your mind.

There is no choice. Choice implies awareness. And then you can choose to be present.

That's how it works. So I hope that answers your question. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (21:24 - 21:44)

Hello. Hi, Eckhart. Thank you for taking my question.

And my question is basically, is the energy body also associated with sexual energy? And I'm also wondering if then sexual energy, is it also part of the spiritual energy? Or is it another ego identification?

[Speaker 1] (21:45 - 36:30)

Right. Thank you. Thank you.

Ultimately, there's only one energy, there's only one energy, the energy manifests in different vibrational frequencies. So one could say to the ultimate truth is, there's only one consciousness, that is the everything that arises in this world is a manifestation of the one underlying consciousness that emanates from the source of all life. And if God means anything, that's what God is.

God is that which the unnameable, unknowable source of all life that is beyond space and time, from which consciousness emanates, just as light emanates from the sun. So the emanation, the consciousness that you are, is an emanation of source. You are an emanation of God, so to speak, every human.

And when you notice that in yourself, then you become conscious of your connectedness with source. And that is the purpose of human life, to realize that connectedness with source. And that which emanates, the consciousness manifests through human beings in different ways.

It can manifest at different vibrational frequencies, as physical energy at certain frequency, sexual energy, another frequency, emotional energy, mind energy, thought energy, all manifestations of the same different frequency, in the same way that in the external world, where you have objects, one could say that when you have inanimate objects like stones and minerals, because they say that before there were any plants on the planet, or let alone animals, there was just stones, minerals.

And a mineral, a stone is also consciousness at a very low vibrational frequencies, just so low you can't it has a, the stone has a billions of the consciousness that you have, one billions. It is, one could say the material world is frozen consciousness, to use an analogy from water. Frozen consciousness is the mineral realm that is a low vibrational frequency, and that, and a stone of course has a very long lifespan, it goes on for, can go on for a million years and longer.

Then consciousness in plant life suddenly arises, and that is a higher vibrational frequency of consciousness beginning to happen on the planet. First tiny life forms or in the ocean they arise, tiny life forms arise. So there's an ancient saying, I can't remember where it comes from, it says consciousness is asleep in the mineral, consciousness is dreaming in the plant, in the flower, in the tree, in vegetable life, consciousness is dreaming there.

And then we have another vibrational frequency of consciousness, and there's not a clear dividing line between the realms, because there are some life forms where you can't say, is that, is that, does it belong to the vegetative realm, or is it animal realm? We don't know, it's in between, but then the animal realm again is a different vibrational frequency of consciousness. And there we could say consciousness begins to awaken in the animal.

So it's, it's asleep in the stone, it's dreaming in plants, it begins to awaken, but it's still in part dreaming in the animal, but the first glimpses of awakening of consciousness, and then there comes humans, they are called also out of the animal realm have come the human realm, and the human is potentially the realm where consciousness awakens to itself, that is the destiny of the human realm, and that would be the high frequency of consciousness.

When you feel you have physical, you yourself embody many different frequencies of consciousness, you embody the physical, you embody the, the sexual, which is connected to the physical, but it's also connected to the emotional, and it's also connected to the mental in humans. The, the sexual is, again, is connected to ego in many cases in human beings. So whatever you identify with becomes part of your ego.

If you identify with your physical energy, it becomes part of your egoic self. If you identify with your sexual energy, that becomes part of your egoic self, and can become very problematic for humans, because the moment you identify with something, if you identify with sexual energy, sexual energy becomes part of your, the whole structure of your ego, which is very problematic, and that immediately sex becomes a big problem for you. And so the, you identify with it.

Many humans have a problem with their body, because they identify with body, and there's something wrong with it, it's not good enough. Or if it is good enough, in some cases, if you're lucky, your body is better looking than most other people's body, and then that becomes a big problem, because then most of your ego is identified with physical appearance, which leads to great suffering later in life, because your physical appearance is no longer satisfying after a while, and then we become very unhappy. So whatever you identify with becomes problematic.

If you can allow it to be there without ego, demanding ego satisfaction from something, then it's fine, it's relatively unproblematic, no matter where you look, that it will apply.

But yes, whatever you identify with becomes part of your ego. It can even happen when you, as you become more spiritually aware, and again, we have a higher frequency of consciousness, let's say stillness arises more often, you become aware more often, and you realize that many humans are still very, very unconscious, which is a fact, but then again, the trap is that you can, you identify with the arising awareness, and you say that's part of who you, you are superior to other humans, because you're more present. That's the, in other words, the ego can come back through the, back in through the back door, as I call it, the ego comes in through the back door and claims some kind of achievement, because you're more present than other humans, and says, I did that, and then that will obscure the arising presence again.

The ego will claim some kind of achievement, I did that, so ego identification can still happen at the higher vibrational frequencies, so you have to be very careful with spiritual ego also, so it can come in at many, many levels. So all we need to then realize is not to derive our sense of self from any kind of form, whether it's a physical form, it's a physical body, whether it's an emotional form or mental form, whatever it may be, not to identify with it, because identify means, if you identify with something, something gives you your sense of self. You derive your sense of who you are from that which you identify with, and it's always ultimately an illusion.

You can, let's just say, to some extent, yes, you will have a little bit of identification with things that's perhaps inevitable. You identify a little bit with your body perhaps, a little bit with this, a little bit with that, but it's never very much, because there's something much more vital than you, than anything in form, which is the consciousness that you are, that is timeless, but you can't compare it to somebody else's consciousness, my consciousness is better than yours, because there's only one consciousness, and every human is a manifestation of the one consciousness, except they may not know it, but they are also a manifestation of the one consciousness, a ray of this one consciousness, even if they don't know it. This is a wonderful thing when you go beyond ego, because ego always moves in the opposites of inferiority and superiority.

When your identity is ego-based, you will always either feel inferior to some people and superior to others, and the ego continuously fears inferiority and wants to counteract inferiority, but it's seeking superiority. So, there's this comparative thing that operates continuously in the egoic sense of self, you compare yourself to others, and you need to be, you're afraid of being inferior, and often you find that you are inferior, and that feels very bad, and then the ego tries to compensate with something else, by, for example, by diminishing somebody else's achievements, because if somebody else's achievement makes you feel inferior, all the ego can do is diminish verbally their achievements in order to make itself feel better, or you have somebody's body is better than yours, and then you can make comments about how obsessed these people is their body, so it's such a primitive way of living, and again, it's a judgment, and it's satisfying to the ego, but it doesn't really help you in any way, except get more trapped in ego. Ego is a constant source of amusing, when there's awareness, ego becomes amusing, how it, what it does, how it tries to continuously defend itself and strengthen itself, so many examples one could give.

So, whatever you identify with, it means you've identified with an illusion, there's a saying in this little, the book, A Course in Miracles, which is an interesting book, not for everybody, but for some people, it's good, it says, because one of the big things for ego is defensiveness, the ego becomes very defensive, it's always afraid of being diminished, and so, a quote from A Course in Miracles is, whenever you become defensive about anything, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion, whenever you become defensive about anything, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion, because you, of course, you only become defensive about something that has some kind of form that you identify with, that is not who you are, ever, so defensiveness is a good way of also noticing in oneself, if it's still there in you from time to time, become aware of it, whatever you become aware, whenever you become aware of any manifestation of ego in you, it's a wonderful thing, you don't have to beat yourself up and say, oh, I still have this ego, no, to be aware of ego is already, means you already have one foot out of ego, when you're aware of your ego, you're no longer totally in the grip of your ego, only people who are totally in the grip of your ego, have zero awareness of their ego, they are the ego, so you're already half free, when you recognize your ego and you can observe it, sometimes you can only observe it retrospectively, perhaps it just played out its act for several hours and then you get home and say, oh, you go back and retrospectively come on, that was my ego, that's fine, at least now you know, whether you are in the middle of it or retrospectively, if you're aware of ego, you're not totally in the grip of it anymore and that's the good news, so, thank you, thank you.

Perhaps a moment of stillness, stillness is not something that, or meditation, it's not something that you do by the way, it's not, now we're doing stillness, it's just something that you notice, it's already here, it's already here, nothing to achieve, just what is, perhaps you become aware of your breathing, or perhaps your mind just simply stops for a while, thank you, thank you, thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Glimpsing What Is Sacred [8c7d1189-037d-48c0-983b-0458a93f6e9b]

Glimpsing what is sacred. In this podcast, Eckhart says it's vitally important that we become familiar with the mystical aspect of our lives. However, he explains, it is not something we can easily define, nor can we truly understand sacredness until we catch a glimpse of it.

For that to happen, Eckhart says, we must learn to stop the mind with its incessant thinking and labeling so we can become present. Eckhart reveals that on a deeper level, presence is actually the presence of God, not the traditional idea of God, but a vast intelligence that permeates the entire universe. For many, he says, thinking and objectifying others as well as ourselves is a barrier to this direct experience.

He explains, the concept is beautifully illustrated by the Greek myth of Narcissus.

[Speaker 1] (0:52 - 47:53)

My life is a narrative. And for many people, because they identify with a narrative, it is a heavy burden. It's full of regrets, grievances, anxiety, and the burden of past and future.

You may have heard in ancient Greece, there's a mythological tale of a young man. There's very deep wisdom in mythology, hidden in mythology. So there's a Greek myth of Narcissus.

He looked into this pool of water and he realized that was him. And according to the tale, he fell in love with himself. I am so beautiful.

Suddenly, he wasn't himself anymore. A second self arose, which was an image self. This mythological tale describes the beginning of the human ego.

An entity arises that is an image, a mind-made image of who you are. Instead of being who you are, you begin to have a relationship with yourself. There is a split, a duality has come in.

So then you have me and myself. And now, of course, this mental image of me has grown and grown and grown. So humans now live with this image of who or what they are, which builds up from early childhood.

So the world telling you who you are, you're this, that, you identify with all. Identify means you derive your sense of self from this, that, or the other. Possessions begins with a toy that a child calls my toy, mine, it's mine, it's me.

And the toy becomes later, other toys come, possessions. Later, the toy becomes your BMW or whatever toy you look for, for your sense of self. BMW may not be enough because too many people have it.

Maybe a Ferrari will actually complete me. And because Ferrari is very loud, the engine is very, very noisy, everybody's going to look at me. And that the ego feels good.

It feels enhanced. Or it could be that after you achieve the Ferrari, you suddenly come to a talk by Eckhart and you realize that was your ego. And then you say, okay, I'm getting rid of that.

From now on, I'm only using a bicycle. And then you get your bicycle and then you see somebody else, this Lamborghini pulling up beside you. And you feel, look at that, that uninvolved human there.

I am obviously infinitely superior now. You can exchange one ego for another ego. The second one is the spiritual ego, can be just as strong as the non-spiritual, the materialistic ego.

So possessions, attainment, abilities, even children already say, I can jump up this wall. You can't do that, can you? Look, I can do it, you can't.

Ah, the ego feels better. And the other ego feels diminished. Oh, I can't.

So the egoic self, then we now have devices that can amplify the egoic self. The phone, I have it somewhere. Over many hundreds and thousands of years, people have already projected this image of who they are, had a relationship with that image, who they are.

Often a love-hate relationship. Some people hate themselves. I don't like my body.

I don't like who I am. I don't like this. What an awful way to live.

I hate myself. It's much better to love yourself. So in New Age teachings, you learn to let go of this dysfunctional relationship with yourself, and then this is a good thing.

It's much better to love yourself than to hate yourself. But you have to achieve that transition. It's not easy if the hating yourself has been deeply ingrained.

You may have to put little stickers on your bathroom mirror. I love myself. Oh, yes.

And everywhere. You are lovable. Oh, thank you.

Thank you. Yes. And again, this is fine.

It's a transitional stage. It's not the final stage. Sometimes in New Age things, it's the final stage.

It's a lovely transitional stage. But really, it's the stage of awakening is that you begin to let go of having a relationship with yourself so that you can just be yourself. And you have to be in the present moment in order to be yourself.

So a relationship with yourself that eventually is transcended so that you can simply be in the present moment. And let's go deeper now so that in the present moment, which is a portal into the awakened state in this present moment, let's see who or what are you in the present moment without reference to any thought, without reference to any thought about who you are. That's an interesting pointer.

In other words, what does it feel like to be yourself without remembering your past or thinking about the future just in this moment? You don't need to remember your email address or anything. It's not necessary now or what you ate yesterday.

Without reference to past and future, do you disappear or what is left of you without the narrative that usually do you describe as my life? Without that memory of that, you need to revive continuously. Without that, what does it feel like to be you?

And I cannot answer that. I can only give it to you as a pointer and slow down a little bit as I talk so that you can perhaps inquire, investigate internally what it feels like. What is the most essential thing about your identity?

Are you still there when you don't think about your life like now? Are you still there and what is that? I'm not going to answer it and I don't expect a conceptual answer.

That's me. There was a spiritual teacher in India whose favorite meditation was asking his disciples to ask themselves, who am I? You can also ask yourself, what am I?

Who or what? What am I? What am I?

But don't answer it verbally, but feel or sense what it means to be alive or to be you. What am I? There's a gap in the stream of thinking.

Then what is there when there's a gap in the stream of thinking like now? And in that gap, there's a stillness. Yes?

There's also a sense of there's something there, but it's hard to describe. There's a sense of presence of beingness. And in that sense of presence of beingness, you know that you are.

You can say, I am. You know that without adding any qualifiers to it, without adding anything to the I am, it's a pure sense of being, which is I am. It's very peaceful.

You need an alertness to sustain it just for a little bit. Without the alertness, you will immediately fall back into the stream of thinking. But it's not, you don't use willpower to stop your thinking mind.

That doesn't really work. So you don't hold your breath in order to stop thinking. It might work for a little while, but then you think even more.

It's like a boiling kettle. Hold the lid on a boiling kettle. Just alertness.

And so Jesus said, and what I say to you, I say to all, stay awake. In some translations, it's translated as stay alert. What I say to you, I say to all, stay alert.

That alertness is consciousness without thought. It seems at first just to be an absence. Okay.

Stillness, one could say is the absence of noise in a stillness in absence. It might seem at first as a kind of nothingness. And yet, if you stay with it for a little bit, just a few more seconds, stay alert.

Then you can sense it's not just the absence of something. It's also the presence of something, but not so much the presence of something, but the sense of presence itself, not of something. And so that is dimension of consciousness.

That is the fourth dimension of consciousness, awareness, or presence. And you encounter that in between two thoughts, or, for example, if you find it hard to stop thinking, don't use your willpower, use a little device, use a little bit of help. For example, become aware that you're breathing.

You become aware of, you're aware of the inflowing and outflowing breath. And your attention moves with the breath into the body and out of the body. And again, your attention is there.

And again, your attention follows the breath into the body, stop for a second, and out of the body. You might, it's helpful if you can breathe as deep as the abdomen, although the air doesn't actually reach it, but your attention reaches it. Now you may realize that when you become aware of your breath, which is a very ancient meditation method, when you become aware of your breath, you cannot be thinking at the same time.

That's why the Buddha recommended this meditation, which is called Anapanasati, which is the awareness of your breath stops your mind, the thinking mind automatically. The moment you start thinking, you lose awareness of your breath. So the Buddha said, his main teaching, I would say, is be aware of your breathing.

He didn't say, stop thinking, because that seems too difficult. But awareness of your breath is possible. And automatically, thinking subsides, what remains is a sense of alert presence, that is the awakened consciousness.

And that is inseparable from what I call the vertical dimension of life. It is the presence in the now. There's no time in this sense of beingness, stillness, alertness.

There is no time. And yet, that is essentially who or what you are, that gets usually mixed up with content, a bit like diluted. So this is the consciousness that is in its pure form.

When you start thinking, it's still consciousness, but it takes on a form, a thought form. When you perceive things, it's consciousness perceiving. The perception is a form in your mind.

Consciousness has taken on a form, takes on many forms continuously. And there is a bundle of thought forms in your mind that make up the main part of your sense of identity. And that is the, when you identify with that, and you don't know yourself more deeply in the vertical dimension, then that's the ego.

But when you know yourself more deeply in the vertical dimension of the present moment, then all that is, is that which makes up your personality. Of course, it's still there. Your story, the narrative of you, unchanged, it's still there.

The difference, however, is you no longer look to it for your ultimate sense of self. You don't derive your true and ultimate identity from the narrative of your life that you tell yourself in your mind. Of course, it's still there.

But you don't look to it for your, for liberation or fulfillment, or some future self. You don't even look to that for liberation or fulfillment, because all that is the horizontal dimension of life. That is time, what time operates.

And for millions of humans still, that's all they ever know. All they ever identify with is the personality conditioned by the past, problematic, problem-making, continuously, often very dysfunctional, coloring everything that you see and perceive. It's like through this veil of conditioning, you perceive the world and judge it through the veil of your mental conditioning.

You don't see anything clearly. So this is the the awakening into that Turiya, the fourth state of consciousness, the awakened state, that all, all the ancient teachings already pointed to as a possibility. And it's here now, and it's more important now.

It's not just something for very few humans to realize, but something that becomes available to more and more humans, especially now that we are being confronted collectively with various manifestations of adversity. And it's not the end yet, fortunately. It's not the end yet.

There's more to come. So this gives you this dimension, the awakened dimension. This is where the resilience you find for living in troubled times.

This is where you can, you are rooted in this ultimately deep and unshakable rooted consciousness of being. You realize who or what you are beyond the personality. It's not, they're not ultimately two.

The analogy I often use is the ocean and the ripple on the surface of the ocean. You are a ripple on the surface of the ocean as a personality, surrounded by other ripples on this horizontal dimension. Some ripples you like, many others you don't like.

Some ripples are very unpleasant, a few others are great, you like them. And yet you're only a ripple, and it's uneasy, and it's never quite enough, and others are bigger ripples and waves occasionally. Who is that guy?

It's a wave. And life becomes unsatisfying. And at some point you meet another ripple who says, have you not realized who or what you are beyond your ripple existence?

And you say, no, no, I haven't. Okay, then can you sense, if you stop thinking for a moment, can you sense the depths of you? Can you sense that there's more to you than this surface appearance?

And the ripple goes, no, no, okay. And finally the attention goes deeper, the vertical dimension opens up, and the ripple goes, oh. And then of course the ripple won't know what to say, doesn't know what it is, but it senses something.

It senses that it's connectedness to something vast, infinite. It's the ocean. And it's not only senses it connectedness, it senses it's oneness with that.

That is self-transcendence of the ripple. And in this analogy, of course, you are the ripple. And this is the essence of all spirituality is to sense that in yourself, in the vertical dimension of yourself, to sense it as yourself.

And the moment we talk about it, it sounds as if it were something that you perceive, this sense, but it's only because we use language and then every sentence has a subject and an object. So you could say, I am aware of myself. Yes, it's true, but ultimately that's not how it is because the moment you have said that, you've created a duality, I, myself.

But when you sense the essence of who you are, there's no duality. The awareness of yourself is the awareness. So it's not being aware of something, but being aware of awareness itself, so to speak.

You can, you sense your own consciousness as consciousness. You know you are. That's an amazing thing.

It's all so simple that it's impossible to realize, to know that you are, not as a particular this or that. It's pure beingness. You know that you are, and you can sense that you are.

That is such a liberation and such a wonderful, ah. And then you realize there is a depth to who you are that far transcends who you are as a personality. And that is, in some spiritual traditions, that is called liberation.

And you can see why it liberates you from yourself. Jesus also used the term salvation. You can use salvation, you can use liberation.

So once you have a glimpse, it's your mission to invite that dimension into your life more and more. Not just doing meditation. Meditation is good if you have a meditation practice, if you meditate rightly.

And many people don't meditate rightly. The mistake that can easily creep into meditation is you meditate in order to achieve a particular goal. Or you have a future self of an awakened master, and you want to achieve that.

And therefore, you have the idea that you are doing a meditation in order to get somewhere. Very hard to get rid of this mind pattern because everywhere else it operates. You always do something in order to achieve something.

And in order to achieve something through your doing, you need time. For everything, you need time. Even make a cup of tea, you need time.

And this doing idea can easily come into the idea of meditating. So you're doing it in order to get somewhere. So you bring future time into your meditation unconsciously without knowing it.

And whereas meditation, true meditation, is not a doing, but it's the realization of being. And there's no time in being. Simple realization that you are.

Some techniques are fine. Eventually, every technique you have to let go. Like a raft.

Buddhism has the analogy or story of a raft that you use to cross a river. You use a raft to cross a river. When you've crossed the river, you don't take up the raft and carry it around with you.

So the raft is a technique or the teaching that can take you there, perhaps. But once you're there, you realize you don't need it. So whatever technique you use in meditation, eventually it is to be transcended.

Or you can transcend it right now without any technique. This is why I don't call this a meditation, because if I... Again, I love meditation, but there's another possibility, and that is any given moment to invite this awareness into your life, this dimension to see there is a possibility of awakening, simply realizing that you are in this moment.

Awareness of awareness. The realization of being. Then this deepens.

Again, this is time to talk about something timeless. And that becomes your identity. The being.

Not the personality or any achievement or whatever it may be in your past or future.

That's fine. You handle your life consciously.

It will actually improve when you are rooted in the unconditioned consciousness, because that's what it is. Then if you are rooted in the vertical dimension, things begin to actually also improve in the horizontal dimension, because that consciousness flows into your life. Not that it ever becomes totally free of challenges.

The challenges continue. But the challenges will then only take you deeper instead of making you more unconscious, which is what they often do for many humans. Self-realization.

You can use that expression. That's who or what you are beyond the personality. And then that is what Jesus calls when there's a parable about him.

He tells a parable about a man who builds a house, and the house is built on sand. And when the storms come and the floods come, the house is swept away. And then there's another man who, before building a house, he digs deep until he reaches the rock, which is deep.

And so he reaches the front after he digs deep and finds the foundation. And then he builds the house on the rock, and the floods come, and the rains come, and the storms come, and the house is not swept away. It stands.

This is an analogy about states of consciousness. The state of deep connectedness with being, the vertical dimension, and the state of being trapped only on the horizontal dimension, when life becomes actually suffering, to use the term of the Buddha. Frustrating, suffering, and then you can resent it all, and so on.

Now your mission is to invite this into your life throughout the day. Don't miss an opportunity. Yes, you still go about your normal activities, but allow yourself to become aware of the vertical dimension as much as possible.

It seems at first there's a current in you that doesn't want that. There isn't the egoic self that will tell you that this is not the time to be present. I've got so much on my plate, I can't be present now.

Don't talk to me about this. Look what I'm dealing with here. And you want me to be spiritual?

I'll be spiritual when I've solved all that, and then I'll find a nice place, a retreat center in Bali, and then I can finally... Of course, life does not stop challenging you, so don't wait. Have your life interspersed with that brief moments, initially brief, brief moments of spaciousness.

Brief moments of spaciousness. One conscious breath is already something. Let's say you are on your computer.

Okay, one conscious breath. You look away from the screen. If you can, look away at the sky or a plant, anything natural, or close your eyes.

But if you close your eyes, then your screen will still be there. You'll still see the computer screen, awful. One conscious breath, a little bit of spaciousness has opened up.

And during that time period, which if you measure in time, it would be like maybe 10 seconds, whatever, but that is a little bit of spacious consciousness you have suddenly experienced. And you might even want to take a second conscious breath. Follow the breath with your attention.

And maybe even a third, although your mind says, I don't have time for this, but it's only one minute. So don't believe every thought that comes in and says, I have to deal with this first. I have to do this first.

That's another parable in the Gospels where you're invited to a wedding feast, people get invited to a wedding and everybody says, let me do this first. First, I need to sell my cattle. No, I need to do this first.

Let me do this first. There's always something. Don't believe your mind when it says, not now.

Come to it now. There's nobody who does not have one minute to be aware of their breath. Unless it's an emergency, you have to get to the hospital now.

Okay. Get into your car. Every time I recommend you close the door and stay just a moment of spaciousness.

I suggest half a minute to one minute, but don't measure it. Just feel it. Okay, I'm going to do one minute now.

And then you're just internally already trying to get to the end of it. You have to be, be there. Anytime you're waiting for something, be present.

If you cannot just be present, this ability may arise a little bit later when you can just decide, so to speak, not the right word, to just be free of thinking, but just be aware. So that comes a little bit later. Just the ability to just have that space. Somebody asked me some years ago, what's your greatest achievement in life?

And I said, well, my greatest achievement is I don't think when I don't have to think or don't want to think. I don't need to think. That's my greatest achievement.

It's not really an achievement, is it? It wouldn't get me a job. I'm applying for a job in my, what are you going to see the resume?

Can be free of thinking. So it's not, it's not an achievement. Again, it would be a misperception to call it an achievement because that discovery, this realization, that dimension of consciousness has already always been there.

In that sense, it's not an achievement. I have made it. No, you didn't do anything.

You just became aware of being, which is not a doing. It sounds like a doing when you talk about it. You become aware of being, not an achievement because being is the essence of who you are.

And to know the essence of who you are is not an achievement. And so, wow. But until you're able to do that, it's not a doing.

We just talk about it that way. Use the breath. There are other entry points also into this present moment, which is present moment awareness.

Another entry point is through the feeling of inner body. I call it inner body awareness. That can be also a portal into a presence.

And that is very simply sensing the aliveness that is within your body. This is often easily connected to breath awareness because when you breathe deeply into the body, you can sense down into the abdomen and you can sense there's an energy that begins, you begin to realize there's an energy there. It's not what you sense.

It's the animating presence, one could say, in the body, not the physical body. And that's inseparable. It's a manifestation of consciousness, the consciousness that keeps the body alive, that inhabits the body, the animating presence, the inhabiting presence.

And you can sense it. And you can sense the inner body. From there, every cell of the body is alive.

Many humans are never present in the body. So inner body awareness is another portal into presence. You can either start with breathing into the abdomen, as deep as the abdomen, and then feel the energy spreading from the abdomen into the rest of the body.

It's always been there. But now you sense it. And then you get a global sense of aliveness throughout the inner body.

And that becomes your portal into presence. And it becomes an anchor for presence, too. And after a while, perhaps the body image disappears and there's just presence remains.

So these are closely connected, the breath awareness and inner body awareness.

They're all connected. If you have one, the others automatically come in also.

Another entry point highly, highly to be recommended is sense perceptions. When you come into the present moment, the first thing you may become aware of is the world that surrounds you. In other words, you become more aware of your sense perceptions, visual, auditory, and alertness arises.

So the alertness is there behind the sense perception. You're more aware of any sounds you hear, whatever you see. You look around, you listen.

Perhaps other senses are involved, too. If you're out in nature, perhaps you can feel the air, a breeze on your skin, or the warmth of the sunlight on your skin. Perhaps there's a scent, especially out in nature, whatever you can smell.

So sensory awareness can also be an important entry point, but it only works if you let go of interpreting what you perceive. And that's not that difficult because interpreting is a habit, a deeply ingrained mental habit. Whenever you look at something immediately, you have to call it something.

And it's not necessary. You can actually more deeply perceive things more clearly, more deeply, at a deeper level, sense the aliveness that's in everything, if you don't interpret, label, mentally, compulsively. So here now, as I talk about it, practice here now, you see the totality of this room.

Perhaps a word may arise, beautiful, but you don't need to interpret it. Just take it in. Just be the awareness for the sense perception, instead of labeling it.

Be the awareness. So you become like a little child that looks at the world for the first time. That's perhaps why Jesus said you have to become as little children, otherwise you cannot enter the kingdom.

Because a little child hasn't got the conceptual knowledge, the mental concepts yet. And you need an alertness to sustain it for a little while. It doesn't have to be long.

It's a beautiful spiritual practice, easier in nature than in the city. Because in the city, everything is made by the human mind. Cars, buildings, and so on.

Although you might have a bit of sky, or a tree here and there, that's good. But it stimulates the mind much more, city landscape. Once the presence, the power, so to speak, has grown in you, then you can be in the middle of a city and also be in that state of pure awareness.

But first of all, in nature it's easier, quite a bit easier. You go out into nature. Sky is beautiful.

I love sky, the changing sky. I love weather, all kinds of weather. And to actually really perceive the weather, the changing weather, doesn't matter what it is.

Soon you will have opportunity living in this city to experience a lot of wet weather. And so instead of when you open up the curtain and it's, let's say it's the middle of December, or it's already gone on to January or February, and it opens one more time, and then look at the sky and the mind might say, oh no, not another rainy day. You've labeled, why not open the curtains and just look with now no judgment, no interpretation.

It's a spiritual practice in itself. And then you perceive more deeply and you know things non-conceptually. If you look at a flower or a tree, choose, occasionally choose one tree, and I hope this doesn't sound too kind of new agey, but it's beautiful.

You look at a tree and give it attention. Just give it some attention. The movements, the quivering leaves, and there's a slight breeze.

It's alive. There's an aliveness there that is hiding behind the surface appearance of tree. Even the tree has a sense of beingness.

You can sense its being more deeply than you could ever sense it if you were labeling it mentally. Well, there is a time for labeling things too when you communicate and so on. It's useful.

You need to have both. The conceptual knowledge is helpful and necessary in this world, but if you're confined on the level of concepts, then you are trapped there. You're trapped in the horizontal dimension.

You're continuously conceptualizing. The deeper connectedness with life is missing. So it creates a continuous sense of separation.

So you need both. I emphasize this non-conceptual knowing that is part of being present. And I recommend that when you experience new things, there are always two ways of experiencing.

Perhaps if you started traveling again, let's say you go to some unknown place and there's a beautiful building. Let's say you go into a temple or a cathedral, ancient cathedral somewhere, and how do you experience it? You experience it through learning about it, which is one way.

There's nothing wrong with it. You can hire a guide that is recording that takes you through the cathedral and explains everything fine. Or you can walk around with your phone and look for photo opportunities for this, this, this, or yourself there and there.

It's me there and that's me there and there's another me there. Or you can also experience it by just entering this magnificent, let's say it's a magnificent building or temple or cathedral. You can enter and you go, wow, wow, wow.

That's a nice word. Wow. And then you walk around, take in the entire energy field of it and the beauty of the various things that you see.

And you sense the totality of this room and then you come out of it. And conceptually, you've known nothing, but yet you have experienced it very deeply. That's another way of being there.

And if you can, after that, you go through one more time and learn about it conceptually. And if you have even more time on the third day, you go in and then you will have learned about the history of this place, et cetera, et cetera. And also if you have the ability to experience it beyond concepts and you can be in both worlds at the same time, where you know things, but in between the knowing, there are all these spaces of pure awareness.

So you can interpret things and know things about it, but not confined to that. You can also experience it more deeply. You need, it's vitally to have these two dimensions in your life.

Otherwise, I emphasize, of course, the non-conceptual because the entire world is lost in the conceptual. The entire world is lost in conceptual identities, conceptualizing everything, manufacturing identities for other people, judging concepts, not being able to relate deeply beyond the conceptual personalities. All that is a huge limitation in our lives to be just trapped on that level.

We need both, of course. So you can look at a flower. It's unbelievable, but there's so much there and that goes beyond what you see.

There's something, and again, it also goes beyond concept. When you call a tree, whatever the tree is, it's an oak tree, usually then you have the illusion that you really, now you know what it is. It's an oak tree.

Okay, now let's go on to the next thing. What tree is that? Oh, that's that.

That's a Douglas fir. Okay, Douglas fir. Okay, what's the next thing?

So you never, it gives you the illusion that you know what it is when you have attached a label to it, but there's a possibility of relating to it at a deeper level. And then we find a completely different relationship to nature. We relate nature at a much deeper level than just the conceptual, and that needs to be awakened.

It's part of the awakened consciousness to realize that connectedness with nature and the sacredness of nature. The sacredness, and sacredness is not something you would hear very often these days, and sacredness is not something that one can easily define.

The conceptual mind asks, what do you mean by sacredness?

You cannot know what sacredness means unless you have at least a glimpse of sacredness. And you can have a glimpse of sacredness when your mind stops and you become present. And even here, when you become present of this spaciousness in this room, you become present of not only what's in this room, but you become aware of the space of this room.

And so the sense of presence is not only within, it's also without. There's a presence here that the mind cannot even know of it, it can't interpret it. Yes, it's a little bit mystical, but it is vitally important to have access to that dimension in your life.

Vitally important. And this is, I don't usually, I don't use that word very much, because there's so many misconceptions around the word God. But in a deeper sense, you could say that presence presence is the presence of God.

Not the traditional authority figure in the sky, but something that pervades a vast intelligence that pervades the entire universe. And that is also the essence of who you are. The consciousness of you, I call that the emanation of the light of God.

That is the consciousness that you are. And so when you know yourself as consciousness, then that is in theistic terms, is the beginning of God realization. Not that you are God as this little thing, but you can, you can feel your connectedness to something vast and that you are actually carried by it.

And you're only temporarily a ripple on the surface of existence, but in essence, you are the ocean. And that is a liberating realization that who you are in your essence. Thank you.

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:30)

Growing up and waking up. In this episode, Eckhart talks to a live audience about the path to awakening. He says there are two stages to a person's life, waking up and growing up.

Many start to awaken only to later discover large parts of their personality lag behind. They haven't really grown up. To reach maturity, Eckhart says spiritual practice must encompass all of who we are and become part of our daily routine.

[Speaker 1] (0:33 - 34:55)

We may be talking a little bit more about the relationship between your form identity and your essence identity. It's a very interesting subject. One could write a book or two about it.

I don't know who is going to write it. Maybe one of you. To be aware, whether you are contemplating nature or whatever it is, that's a state of contemplation.

Be the awareness rather than the person that labels things mentally. And then there's the deep I suddenly arises in that state of contemplation, which could involve looking or listening or combination of all the senses. And then also any time you are doing something, walking from here to there, handling something, use it to practice just stepping out of thought and just be there as thoughtless awareness as you walk from A to B.

Don't make it too long. Don't say, well, I will be in thoughtless awareness until I reach the end of the lake, the other end of the lake. You might fail probably, or you may succeed, in which case you'll be totally enlightened.

Just a short from here to the door, not walking with the heaviness of the personality, not walking, making every step a means to an end. Every step is an end in itself. That's presence.

Presence in action and presence in non-action in contemplation. It's important to practice presence in action. Otherwise, the only time you can be spiritual is when you are sitting quietly somewhere and you're not being disturbed by anything or anybody.

As somebody said to me on a retreat, I can be very spiritual when I'm alone in my room, but the moment I step out, I lose it. So it's great if you can be in a protected environment like here. It's a wonderful thing.

But even here, begin to practice bringing presence also into doing. And the doing you do here is probably more simple than the doing you do at work or at home. It becomes more complex.

The doing here is relatively simple. You're either walking from A to B, or you are getting your food or going up to your room and sorting out your things, getting undressed, getting dressed, brushing your teeth. It's relatively easy still to bring, but it's important.

So really one could say you begin to experience the merging of being and doing so that they don't exist as two separate things in your life. And so that not every time you start being active, you're gone. You're just totally in your mind, in the reactive mode, and so on.

And so you don't want to have two compartments in your life. The spiritual, between 7.30 and eight o'clock every morning, I'm spiritual. And then I deal with real life, what really matters.

There's a friend of mine who lost all her investments through some scheme in New York. When she was telling her friend about it on the phone, but she was very upset, your life savings are gone. Of course, one thing, of course, she's justified in being up.

Wouldn't you be upset if your life savings were gone? Yes. And her friend said, well, just be present with what is.

But she said, this is not the time to be spiritual. So this is a good training ground here for merging being and doing. Start with simple things.

Also, when you talk to people here, having a conversation, important that there's some awareness of being remains in the background, even while you speak, which means there is a certain spaciousness. And it doesn't necessarily mean that you have to talk very slowly because now you are so spiritual that you don't talk fast anymore. And I hope everybody notices that I'm very spiritual.

You can talk normally, but it is possible that if you are a very fast talker, naturally, it is possible that it may by itself slow down a little bit. If in your normal, until you awakened, began to awaken spiritually, that you may slow down a little. You don't have to do it by being aware that you're being dragged along by every thought that arises, by being aware that immediately the awareness already changes things.

You don't have to do it. So the words I sometimes use as pointers is to ask yourself, not necessarily in words, is there some spaciousness while I'm talking, while I'm dealing with this situation, with this problem, discussing something, is there some spaciousness or am I totally in every thought that comes? The loss of spaciousness in any relationship means that you probably won't have to wait for long until the next conflict arises in the relationship.

When there's complete loss of spaciousness presence in the relationship, then just wait a few minutes or an hour or tomorrow, and you'll experience some friction because there's only form. There's no awareness of the transcendent dimension. So here you practice awareness of the transcendent dimension, which is your essence.

So walking from A to B, and then again, a little stretch, any simple action. So the, there's your form identity and the emerging essence identity, as we call it. Now, what happens?

What is the relationship between your form identity and your essence identity? Now, as you know, when you completely identify with your form identity, the physical body, and even more importantly, the psychological form of you, the invisible you that consists of thought and emotion, the mental, emotional, invisible mental, emotional entity that is who you are on a certain level. When you're completely identified with every arising thought and every arising emotion and every arising reaction, that's ego.

The complete identification with that is ego. But when there's no longer a complete identification, there's still form identity. You may experience thoughts arising without knowing why they suddenly arise.

And yet, if there's even a slight awareness in the background that these are thoughts, you're not totally invested with your sense of self in every thought that arises. And if a thought that tells you something unpleasant about yourself or your life, certain judgment about my life, isn't it all so pointless now it has come to this? Why do I have to deal with this again and again?

There's no end to it. What's the point of it all? Why is it always me that has to do that stuff?

And then these thoughts perhaps have arisen in you for many years periodically and regularly. And suddenly you notice that these thoughts are arising that are telling you that you're not getting anywhere in your life, that most of your search and your activities have been futile. What have I got to show for it?

Absolutely nothing have I got to show whatsoever. Okay. And suddenly there's an awareness of these thoughts and you might notice that these are thoughts that are not new.

And so you're not totally invested in the thoughts. That means those thoughts that have certain judgments about your life, gradually they lose the capacity to make you unhappy because you don't completely believe in them anymore. They're recognized as thought patterns, conditioned mind.

After a while, they even subside. You have them less frequently. So it's no longer ego.

Now, as the presence arises, usually it does not very easily necessarily become integrated into your form identity. When I went through a transition externally, very little changed. And mine was unusual because it came drastically and very, it was drastic and very sudden, but it didn't immediately change anything much externally.

I was still engaged in the academic world for three more years after that and didn't fully realize that that wasn't right for me anymore. It took time. I didn't know anymore than I did before.

There was just peace in the background. And occasionally, the pull towards unhappiness came a few times, like a pull on your sleeve in the form of a thought, come this way, follow me, says the unhappy thought. That says something about you and your life.

And I noticed it, I didn't follow it, but I could have followed it. And then I would have been lost again in mind identification and perhaps after a while come out again. Now, a question that is very interesting and complex, the answer is complex.

And I'm often asked this question, do you need to develop what people call a healthy ego? I was often asked that. Do I need to develop a full, healthy, functioning ego before I can transcend the ego?

Well, no ego is completely healthy because every ego has certain elements of dysfunction and they may be certain corners in your life. But it is true that as far as your form identity is concerned, there is a development as you grow older. And to some extent, whether or not you can integrate the arising presence with your form identity, to some extent has something to do with where you are at as this form identity in your life cycle.

There was a spiritual teacher in the early 20th century, Gurdjieff, who said, I don't totally agree with him, but there's some truth there. He said that unless you're already fully established in the physical realm, so you have a weaningful work and you have built up your life and you have taken responsibility for your family and you have all built up all that. He said, then you can embark on spiritual work.

Don't even attempt to embark on spiritual work unless you have first achieved maturity in the physical realm. There's some truth in that, but you cannot, there are so many exceptions. You cannot really have one general rule that applies to everybody.

But yes, let's say you are man or woman in the early 20s. Let's say that you are still, you're exploring life. You are kind of finding yourself, as you put it, when you talk to yourself and others.

Let's say that you have already explored various avenues, none of which you found satisfying. You went to college, but after two years, it was getting a bit boring. Then you left and tried something else.

And you had a few jobs, but they didn't work out that well either. You had some interesting sexual encounters, but no relationship lasted for more than three weeks because you were totally immature emotionally. And I stuck at the level of an eight year old.

And one day you walk across the street and you've been smoking some weed. And so they're not paying attention. You get hit by a car and then you find yourself in hospital with a serious condition.

And when you wake up, something happened. That shock brought about an opening in your form identity. And you can suddenly feel something, some great power in you.

And then you, finally you come out of hospital and you realize that in certain situations involving other people, you speak spiritual truth. It just comes. You suddenly find yourself entering that state and you talk and you don't know what's happening.

And then at other times, you're just a normal, the normal person that you were before. And then you read a few books and then you talk a bit more and suddenly you become a spiritual teacher. But your form identity basically is still the same as it was before, except the crack has appeared in it.

And through that crack, the transcendent dimension from time to time emerges. But you're still emotionally as immature as you were before. And still other aspects of your personality are still the same, needing recognition and waiting for all kinds of things.

Now, if you waited a bit, a few more, a few years, it's possible that gradually the, the crack would widen and perhaps affect areas of your form identity and thereby gradually transform them. So the integration would take years. But if you become a spiritual teacher too soon, then all those aspects of your ego and your form identity will suddenly realize that they are in the vicinity of an enormous power.

And then the various sub-personalities, as one could call them, these are various areas in your consciousness that from time to time emerge and take over. Everybody who is not awakened is to some extent under the control of emerging sub-personalities, which is just a word. These are patterns in your psyche that from time to time in certain situations take you over.

And then you become this particular person in that particular situation. So the, the ego is still there. And then I'm mentioning this because it could happen to you.

You could feel drawn to somebody who speaks the truth and it's a wonderful thing. It's a transformational thing to be, and you feel changes are happening in you. You become a disciple of somebody and you may not realize that this person has not grown up.

The philosopher Ken Wilber has two interesting words, terms that he uses. He says, there's two things in a person's life, growing up and waking up. So it happens occasionally that you begin to wake up, but huge aspects of your personality haven't grown up yet.

And then you have to be very careful when you go to teachers like that. And they're not even necessarily young. They could all be in their mid thirties.

They could be 40, who knows, but it's more likely when they're young, just the same. If you look at the history of the Roman emperors, the craziest ones were the ones who were really very young. They couldn't deal with all that.

Their ego got totally insane. So if you go to a spiritual teacher, you feel, you attach yourself to a spiritual teacher, and then there are a few warning signs you need to look out for that tell you that there are aspects of this teacher that have not grown up yet. And so you get the truth, then after a while gets mixed up, the spiritual truth, which undoubtedly is there, gets mixed up with egoic needs.

The undeveloped form identity has many needs. So it begins with something very common, sexual relations that the teacher begins to have with various disciples. And not that he or she says to anybody who comes, you should know that I have sexual relations with many of my disciples.

So if you're okay with that, then come. That would be fine, but that's not usually the case. Usually the teacher will show, and that is a sub personality that has been there.

It still exists. And the sub personality's job is to find a sexual partner. So it gets active, needs to get laid is the expression.

And so the, of course, this, it identifies with a spiritual power. And so this happened many times. So usually they tell you are very special, and I will give you tantric initiation after which you will be totally enlightened.

So if you get a message from me, this is my room number. And by tomorrow morning, you will be totally enlightened. Then you know that something has gone wrong.

And it's time to leave me. I can guarantee, I may not be able to guarantee everything, but I can guarantee that that won't happen. So, but this is very common.

This is only one sign of an immature vehicle, expressing spiritual truth, especially in teaching situations. The next sign is that the claims the teacher makes about who he or she is become more and more outlandish and exaggerated and weird, just plain weird. And another sign is that he or she begins to denigrate other teachers, except those that are dead.

Of course, every teaching has certain limitations and that's natural, but I actually welcome every spiritual teaching and spiritual teacher. And most of my encounters with other spiritual teachers have been good and wonderful, except two. And of course, I'm not mentioning any names.

In any case, one has already passed away, but even then, I'm not going to mention the name. So that's another thing to look out for. And another thing to look out for is the teacher attempts to somehow bind you to him or her, to prevent you from, if the impulse should come to you to leave me, then there's something that keeps you here.

For example, transfer all your possessions to me, then that'll keep you here. Or as has been the case recently in the newspapers, I could brand you with a mark on your skin with my initials that you are mine. That's just been in the news very recently, a teacher did it.

So now this is, can be quite dangerous because there are people who get drawn to this for a good reason, because there is, amongst all that egoic stuff, for a while at least, he or she is in teaching situations able to express spiritual truth that has some transformational value. For some, for a while, it could happen, or it's perhaps likely to happen that eventually, even in teaching situations, they become contaminated with egoic untruths. And it's so confusing for spiritual seekers to disentangle the truth that person speaks and the untruth is brought in by the ego.

And some people have become so disenchanted and they condemn them all because they believe that everything that they experienced with this teacher was false. But that is not necessarily and probably not the case. So you need to disentangle that there was some spiritual truth there, but it's, it is advisable that you do not stay with this channel of spiritual truth.

And if it could be a very good sign, a very good sign that you now need to find your own disclosure to the source that is within you. If you are very disappointed by your spiritual teacher and because the vehicle turns out to be immature, then that may be a good sign that you, this is really the time, use that suffering and allow it to take you to a deep place so that you find the source within you, the transcendent dimension that's within you. You no longer look outside.

So if the vehicle then has the form identity that you are, has quite a bit to do with whether you are able to anchor the awakened state here in this dimension. So to anchor the awakened state in this dimension, your form identity has a role to play. And it is helpful if you have developed a relatively mature form identity.

It doesn't necessarily mean that you need to be old, but you've done certain things here. You've already, you maybe have achieved certain successes. You have, you've graduated or you've had a job and it worked.

And then of course you discover, began to discover more and more elements of dissatisfaction with whatever you were doing. And that was the beginning of your spiritual path. Very interesting in connection with this form and essence.

There is in India and various other places in the Middle East, in Pakistan and in Iran and in the Sufi tradition, particularly there's a phenomenon of people, men, more men, occasionally women too. There are people walking around the streets and the countryside who seem insane. They are disoriented, but there's something about them that others, if they have certain spiritual discernment, recognize.

So although they appear insane and they might walk around, they may not say much or anything and they walk. And there's a word in Sufism, the word to describe them is must, which is spelled M-A-S-T. Must means intoxicated.

And the full term is must Allah, which means God intoxicated. That is recognized as a state. It is people whose form identity was so undeveloped that when, for some reason, the influx came of the emerging essence, the form could not deal with it.

It's like plugging a toy engine into a high voltage outlet. That's not going to work very well. But there is something in these humans that others have recognized as there's more, there's not, they're not crazy in the normal sense of the word.

So there are thousands of them. So they are called God intoxicated, as that is the term of these musts. There was a sage in India in the first part, early part of the 20th century, whose name was Mia Baba, not to be confused with Sai Baba or any of the other numerous Babas.

Mia Baba was the silent sage who for 40 years was in silence, did not speak, but he had a particular interest in the God intoxicated ones. And he said the difference between them and ordinary madness is their minds are slow, have slowed down much slower than a normal mind and in how he saw it. And he said, at the real craziness is when the mind speeds up, it is much faster than the normal.

Now the God intoxicated ones are experiencing a slowing down of the mind to such an extent that they cannot cope with the world anymore. They cannot function in this world anymore. This is a good example of how when the vehicle is totally unsuitable for some reason, and we don't know how these people, at what stage of their life, the influx of consciousness came into them, but they were definitely not ready for it.

And so that is an extreme example of relationship between form and essence not working. So Mia Baba spent years of his life helping these people and some of them became recognized as like saints and this would probably never have happened in the West. And it is also true that there are people in mental homes in the West who are of that kind, who have experienced this influx and the vehicle was totally unprepared and totally immature and it kind of blew all the fuses.

That is a very interesting subject. For you then the important thing is none of this is likely to happen to you. And if it is, if the call to teach comes, just wait a little, just don't be, don't rush into it.

Give it a little bit of time and let it develop very organically. And so that there's a deepening and so that the awakened state becomes more integrated with your form identity. Another thing that people do, they immediately write a book about it.

There's nothing wrong with writing a book, it's great. But just give it a little bit of time, let it mature. You had a great awakening experience and then you took, even you talk about it and then you write about it and it gets dispersed.

It's not contained anymore. So it's better for a while not to talk about your spiritual awakening, just to live it, not to talk about it. Let be what you, you begin to embody it so that you can embody it.

The big question is where you are at spiritually is not what spiritual experience you can have in the, in one limited area of your life, but how integrated the awakened consciousness is in your daily life. So if you want a reflection of where you are at spiritually, it's not even your ability to talk well about it. It's more, how do you deal with everyday challenges and situations and difficult people and so on.

That is, reflects back to you where you are at in your spiritual awakening and to what extent essence identity and form identity have become integrated. It's through your daily life and your relationships that they become integrated. So it's not enough to have a beautiful, it's a wonderful thing to have a beautiful experience of awakening here.

That's stage one. That's great. And the next challenge is to bring it into your, into your daily life.

Eckhart Tolle Growing in Consciousness [e92fe77d-1541-4f14-93ca-34acaaf80829]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:39)

Growing in consciousness. In this episode, Eckhart talks about expanding our consciousness. He says that we outgrow the limited perception we have of ourselves.

A person with a personality and a product of our past. We need to get in touch with what Eckhart calls the deep eye or the transcendent self. He says we're more than our personalities and more than our bodies.

Eckhart shares what we perceive with our senses is only a tiny fraction of what's actually here. He believes what is essential in us is invisible to the eye and not something we perceive with our senses.

[Speaker 1] (0:41 - 33:50)

Welcome everybody to this moment. It's always the present moment. New challenges are waiting to be overcome or transcended so that we grow in consciousness.

Growing in consciousness is a way, one way of putting it. It's a way of perceiving what's going on from our perspective of time. The temporal perspective where most of the time we live.

But when we say growing in consciousness or becoming more conscious, it seems to imply process of time that gradually you become more conscious. And from the point of view of where we are in this dimension, that certainly seems to be the case. But another way of looking at it is that a deeper dimension of consciousness is manifesting itself, is emanating through you more and more fully.

But that dimension is timeless. The present moment is timeless. It's always now.

So there's a little paradox here. It seems to take time for us to fully inhabit or to fully connect with the transcendent dimension within ourselves, which is the timeless. So we just have to live with this paradox.

The moment we talk about spiritual things, paradox almost inevitably arises. This is why at the beginning of the famous Chinese Tao Te Ching, one of the greatest spiritual books, the first sentence is, the Tao that you can speak of is not the true Tao. We can't really talk of that transcendent mystery.

The moment we talk about it, it gets distorted and becomes paradoxical. And yet we do. But we need to know that what all words can do is point to something that is beyond words.

So the answer is not in the words. The words are not the truth. They can point to it, but they are not it.

So when words are used, the tendency of the mind is to believe in certain words that are uttered. But that's not how it works, because if you believe just in the words, then it's mistaking the signpost for that to which the signpost points. Or another way of putting it, mistaking the map for the actual territory.

So we need to be tolerant with words and use them as pointers, no more than that. Some pointers work better for certain people and other pointers work for other people. This is why I often use different kinds of pointers.

You can choose one, the one that you respond to. The one that takes you beyond the pointer is the one that works for you. What emerges, as you may have heard me say it before, there are two of you here.

So to speak, again, it's just words. It's not the absolute truth. It's a pointer.

There are two of you here. There's you as a person and you as the transcendent consciousness, the unconditioned consciousness. You are both, let's say, the person is the ripple on the surface of the ocean and the transcendent consciousness is the ocean.

You are the ripple, undoubtedly. You have a form. Some ripples are bigger than others, but none of the ripples last for very long.

And yes, you as a person, you have a form identity, physical and psychological form, personality, body. And yet you are here to enable the deeper dimension of consciousness. Deeper or higher, you have a choice of pointers, deeper dimension, higher dimension, whatever works best for you.

It's just words. We're here for this deeper dimension, what I call the deep eye to emerge into this dimension because the deep eye does not originate in this dimension. And you are essentially the deep eye, which is consciousness, and you are temporarily a person and a personality.

The greatest limitation for a human being is to be exclusively trapped throughout a lifetime, to be exclusively trapped in a personality with all its conditionings, with all its reactive patterns, the condition by the past. You are a product as a personality. You are a product of your past, both your personal past, your environmental past, the cultural past, whatever culture you are born into, it goes back hundreds of years, thousands of years.

You are a product as a person. You are a product of that. If you had been born 500 years ago, you would be a different person.

You would have different beliefs, very different, just a different form of conditioning. And that's fine. That's how it is in this dimension.

We are all here as persons and personalities, conditioned entities with all kinds of quirks and idiosyncrasies and characteristics, some good, some troublesome, many, in fact, if you only know yourself as a person or personality, then you are in trouble. Trouble is an essential part of being limited to being a person without any glimpse of anything transcendent within yourself. And then you are trapped in that.

And when you watch movies almost all the time, that's all you ever see, people who are trapped in their limited little selves and react to things from there and create a lot of trouble for themselves and others. Another word for trouble could be suffering. When you only know yourself as a personality, then this is what the Buddha described as then you, everything you, every situation you encounter, sooner or later ends up in dukkha, meaning suffering, can also be translated as unsatisfactoriness, misery, or simple, plain unhappiness.

Even if you had some glimpses of the transcendent dimension, that already is a great help. Let's see, this is where salvation lies, to use a Christian term. Liberation would be another term you could use, such as Hindu or Buddhist.

Awakening, another term. They all mean the same thing. They are pointers pointing to the same thing.

And just to have glimpses of the deeper I, the deep I in you, rather than the surface I. The surface I is the person. The deep I is the consciousness in the same way that the ripple or the wave is the person.

The ocean is the consciousness. And you are essentially the ocean and temporarily the person. So how do you know yourself as the deep I?

The moment of cessation of the stream of thinking. Not the cessation of the stream of thinking that happens when you fall asleep, but the cessation of the stream of thinking when you remain very alert. In fact, become more alert.

Perhaps just a few seconds, you look at a cloud that just appeared in the sky. And for two or three seconds, it's so striking that it stops your mind for two or three seconds while you look at the cloud. And there's an inner response.

Oh, something within response. It doesn't have to be a cloud. It could be a tree, an animal, a flower.

And you look and, oh. Then the mind comes back with interpretations. But while you looked and there was an inner response and you felt somehow, one could also connect it with it for a moment, and something responded.

And later then when the mind comes in, it will interpret it in some way. This is what the mind does, the thinking mind. And it will call it something.

It might say, beautiful. That's a beautiful cloud. Or it might say, how pretty.

Not the most profound statement the mind could make, but let it be. How pretty. Or it might say, if you're knowledgeable about the history of art, the mind might compare it to some painting it has seen.

Oh, look at that Turner sky. Oh, Turner, British landscape and sky painter. Yes, yes, yes.

And so you interpret, that's fine. But what you forget is the significance of the first moment of perception and the still space that was there for two or three seconds in the first moment of perception. That's overlooked.

If you can become conscious of, in the first moment of perceiving something, natural things work very well for that. The first moment of perception doesn't have to be visual. It can also be auditory.

You listen, there's a bird song. You listen somewhere there's bird song and your attention goes there. And for a few seconds, there's a pure listening.

And then the mind says something about it. But the significant thing is the first moment when there is the pure listening, because it's not just the listening, because without the consciousness behind the listening, there would be no listening. The auditory organ of perception would mean nothing without a consciousness behind it.

So the listening becomes possible because there is a listener. There is a listening consciousness that makes the perception possible. And that consciousness is still in the first few moments of perception quite often.

With some humans, their mind is so active that that first moment is so short, it's impossible to even catch it because they immediately comment on everything they perceive. If you find that in your life gradually, when you look at something, you perceive something, you listen to something, there's not an immediate jump into interpretation or labeling. That is a wonderful sign.

It is a sign that you are deepening. It is a sign that the deep eye is beginning to emerge more. There is a depth to who you are when you are not immediately, always immediately judging, interpreting, and labeling everything.

That is a sign of progress in your life. That is the arising of, one could call it, inner space. Inner space arise.

A certain spaciousness arises where before there was only clutter, the clutter of your mind, and the identification with the clutter of your mind, which created the person. So that was there before. Now, the deepening happens when you realize there's a bit more spaciousness coming into your life.

And one of the things, as I just pointed out, is through perceiving something and not compulsively needing to immediately classify, label, judge it, or to have some kind of position, personal position towards it. I like it. I don't like it.

Whatever. So you let it be for a moment. You let it be.

You become aware of a depth dimension within yourself, the deep eye. And the deep eye is consciousness. And then you may find that you notice it more often when it happens.

Because before, people sometimes have the experience of depth, but they don't realize it. They attribute it to something else. They have the experience of depth when they look at something wonderful, beautiful, for example, and it's so overwhelmingly beautiful, like a sunset or some bird song can be just wonderful or something miraculous.

Yet you look at a hummingbird hovering and you look at it, you're just, oh. And afterwards, when you talk about it, it felt good. You talk about it.

That moment when I climbed, or when I climbed that mountain last year, two years ago, and it took five hours to reach the top. And when I reached the top, there was suddenly this vast space of the sky where the sun was beginning to set and it was the most beautiful moment of my life. And I'll always remember that.

I wish I could get that back. I have to go back to that mountain too. But you don't realize that the essence of that experience, you want to call it that, in that moment it was, it had a time span.

So in that sense, it was an experience. But the essence of that was that the beauty of two things stopped your mind. The ascent of the mountain required so much focus and attention that you didn't have much time to think about your personal problems.

So already as you were beginning to climb the mountain, it gave you moments of, fairly prolonged moments of self-transcendence because your attention had to be there. There's always a risk and danger involved when you climb a mountain. So your attention had to be fully in the present moment.

So the self, the mind made self, could not absorb most of your attention and think about whatever it thinks about. The attention had to be in the present moment because there was an element of danger. That was the first thing that started to free you from yourself.

Self-transcendence is a transcendence of the mind that creates the self. So already, and then you reach the top of the mountain, it's just one example. And you saw this vast landscape and it stopped your mind.

It was so overwhelming that it stopped your mind. And because it stopped your mind, you had this experience of depth, of self-transcendence. And that was so good.

But many people, unless they perhaps had some contact with spiritual teaching, they may not even realize that that is why that was such a deep experience. The deep experience was there because the activity of climbing a mountain and then finally seeing the incredible beauty stopped your mind. It stopped your mind and something else emerged that cannot be defined in any way.

The deep eye, a conscious presence emerged through which this was being perceived. So it wasn't, people confuse the thing that stopped the mind with that which enabled them to be momentarily in that awakened state that was the self-transcendent state. So glimpses of that are the beginning of the awakening.

So the personality no longer has this overwhelming importance that consumes you completely with its problems and its shortcomings and it regrets and its anxieties and it all kinds of things that create the problem of your life, all the things you'd have to think about, the uncertainties of the future, the regrets of the past, what people doubts about who you really are, are you good enough or not really good enough or you're so good that nobody's better than you or whatever narrative you have that provides the source of your identity and whatever narrative the mind comes up with, it's never satisfying for very long even if you think you're the greatest that ever lived, soon life will show you that you're not the greatest that ever lived. So the deep eye begins to emerge in many people's life when the person is being challenged.

So I just gave you some lovely scenarios where the deep eye could emerge, but more frequently than that, the deep eye emerges when life becomes very uncomfortable for the personality. So that happens easily. So it happens on a small scale.

It tends to happen very frequently. Things go wrong here and there, no matter how much positive thinking you do, which is a good thing, but things will go wrong here and there, not according to expectation. Things break down and then you lose something and then people act in weird ways.

They shouldn't behave like that, but they do. People are troublesome. You are a burden to yourself.

People become burdens. Your life situation is so problematic. Oh, there's just no end to it.

And then comes the collective problems. If your personal problems weren't enough, suddenly some kind of pandemic arises, a collective problem that, oh my God, didn't I have enough with my personal problems? And now comes this.

I can't take any more of this. Anxiety arises. Am I going to die?

Am I going to die? Yes. We don't know when, but certainly yes, of course you're going to die.

The person doesn't last very long. And then fear, the fear arises and becomes very uncomfortable to continue to be there only as a person. And so that's a good thing.

If life gets difficult for you, for the person, can't take any more. That's another good point to reach. And then suddenly you discover the possibility of living in the present moment more than in past and future, which is the opening into the transcendent dimension is the present moment, if you only give attention to it.

When past and future, especially future for many people, become so fearful or heavy, then the way out is to give more attention to the present moment now. And in order for this to happen, your level of attention needs to rise. There's only this moment.

Are you aware of this moment right now? Yes. That is the portal into transcendence.

This also applied to, in the example I gave of climbing the mountain and standing on top of the mountains, you were present. The ascent forced you to be present because of the danger. And then you were present because the beauty was so overwhelming for a moment.

So present moment can come into your life in various ways. It comes through suffering. You're forced into the present moment, but sometimes it can come through a moment of overwhelming beauty too.

It comes a moment when you look into the eyes of a baby for a few seconds, you can sense the consciousness that is behind those eyes. And you can, ah, or the eyes of a dog. You can look in the eyes of a dog and you can sense the consciousness that is there.

And the consciousness is not part of this dimension. So the portal is always present moments. Life will have to force you into it for many people.

And once you realize that that is where the shift in consciousness happens, then you can voluntarily quite often choose to be present, to have more attention in the present moment than in past and future. You still know enough about past and future. It's fine.

Of course, you know where you're going, but the step you're taking now is the most important step. Everything else is secondary. Still may have some importance, but it's not of primary importance.

So becoming present, that's the simplest thing, becoming present. What happens when you become present? You become present of sense perception.

You become present that you're breathing. You know you're breathing and you're not, you don't need to label anything mentally. You just notice things.

You notice sense perceptions. You notice your breath. You notice the aliveness within your body, inner body awareness.

You notice in the present moment, you notice what is there. External things, you notice them. And internal things, you notice them.

Emotion may be there. You notice that there's some anxiety living in you. You notice there's the anxiety.

You notice it. You become the space for it. You become the space for everything, for all perceptions.

You notice it. And then you begin to realize who or what you essentially are. When you notice everything that is, you are the space for it.

You become aware in addition to what you are noticing. And you're not, when you notice, by the way, you don't reject anything. When you notice this, you accept what is.

In this moment, you're not rejecting anything. That's vital. Otherwise you're not present.

You just, you notice it. This is what is. You can't argue with it.

Well, you can, if you want to be unhappy, you argue with what is. That strengthens the personality, the fiction of who you are. But essentially this is what is.

And it's only the present moment, not some complicated life situation that you want to get out of. That's fine. And this is not what is.

What is, is what you're experiencing at this moment. Your experience of this moment. Inner, outer.

This is what is. So you notice it and you allow it to be. And by noticing it and allowing it to be, you become aware of something else that is not in addition to what is already there, but something that is the prerequisite for everything that you notice.

And that is, you become aware of yourself as the one that notices everything. The field of presence that you are. Not the person anymore.

That's a deep eye now. You're now the deep eye. You are the field of presence that notices everything.

So we become aware of two dimensions. That which you notice externally or internally, and that which makes all noticing possible, which is the consciousness that you are, which is one could say the canvas on which your entire life is painted. That changes quite often, but it's, you become aware of the canvas.

Everything else that is painted on the canvas is what you notice. That's fundamentally changes everything. The way in which you experience your life becomes much easier and more pleasant because you experience it from the dimension of self-transcendence of the unconditioned consciousness.

The person still emerges from time to time. The person comes back and says, what did I see? This is what I think about the, this is the pandemic.

It's all nonsense. It's all whatever the person says is fine. But gradually you're no longer completely taken over by that entity.

What do you think you are? The personality, the person. And that gets worse as the older you get, unless some transcendence comes into your life.

Old age is another opportunity for transcendence. When old age comes, the body gets weaker. Life giving you another, maybe the last opportunity in this lifetime to become present.

If you haven't been able to, if you've been living in egoic resistance for your entire life. Finally, when you're 80, things begin to fail in your body. There's an opportunity for surrender and presence, and then the flowering can still happen.

The personality recedes, consciousness emerges. So that's why I said there's two of you here. There is the transcendent being that you are, and there is the person.

So the awakening is to awaken to that dimension of the transcendent being, which happens every time there's a cessation of the stream of thinking, no matter how short, and there's a realization of that which remains when the stream of thinking subsides. And that which remains, you cannot name. You can only be it.

That's why another word for it is the being that you are. The personality is a human, and the transcendent dimension who you are is the being. Most people on the planet are still just humans.

They haven't realized yet that they are human beings because the being dimension is the awakening to who you essentially are. And that's the destiny of humanity, and of every human being is to realize the being part of being human. The human part alone is just very frustrating.

Just, you'll never find any satisfaction there that lasts for long. So how do you judge whether your life is successful or not? Well, don't allow the world to tell you whether your life has been a success or not, because the world doesn't know of what really matters.

It doesn't know that. So is your life a success or a failure? There's only this, your consciousness now.

Are you able to be here as a human being? That is the purpose of your life, is that realization. Then your life, you have succeeded.

Life has succeeded. The human, one could almost say, is the seed for the being. So when you have a seed that goes into the soil, eventually the seed breaks open and something emerges out of the seed, a plant, and opens up.

In the same way, the person gradually undergoes a process of erosion. It gets eroded by the suffering of life. And at some point, a state of surrender is reached when the suffering begins to be transcended because nothing is resisted anymore.

That is the process of realization. So in a nutshell, before we go on to the questions, and can there any left, we are here as humans and we are here to realize the being dimension so that we become human beings. We already are human beings, but if you don't know the being dimension, it's virtually as if you didn't, as if it weren't there.

It's like a beggar. I think I wrote about that somewhere. It's like a beggar who has sitting on a box filled with gold, but he's begging because he doesn't know what's in the box.

So do you call him rich or poor? Do you say he is very poor? Well, I'm using that analogy because the being dimension is not something that the person achieves.

That would be ego. If you think I have to achieve the being dimension. No, you have to recede.

You have to become somewhat, one could say transparent to the being dimension. So the person weakens so that the being can shine through more fully. So the person does not achieve realization at all.

So awakening, enlightenment, realization is never an achievement. Nobody achieves it. You have to get the self out of the way.

So there's nobody who could say, I have achieved enlightenment. No, nothing. All you can do is realize something that's already there.

That is already the essence of who you are. Let's see if there are any questions left.

[Speaker 3] (33:51 - 34:30)

Hello, Eckhart. Here's my question. So if awareness is engaged by rising above our thoughts and becoming more aware of sensory perceptions in the moment, like the sights, the sounds, feeling our feet on the floor, our breathing.

So where does our awareness or beingness go when the body dies and there's no channel for awareness through our physical senses? So what will be aware, what will be aware of how our consciousness perceive beingness when there's no sensory perceptions of the body any longer to be through? It's hard to put into words.

[Speaker 1] (34:31 - 46:15)

Good question. Very good question. Thank you.

Perhaps the first thing to realize fully is that what you see in this world, what the senses can perceive in this world is a surface phenomenon. It is a tiny fraction of what's actually there. It's a tiny fraction of what's actually there.

So if we start with a simple thing, I mentioned just earlier a dog, or if you prefer cats, you substitute a cat. A dog is a more simple being than a human. So let's, I'll give this example of a dog.

Here's a dog, and the dog has a body, fur, and so on. When you look into the eyes of a dog and the dog responds to you, you already connect with something that is invisible because you don't connect with the fur or what's underneath the fur is bones and blood and tissue on the physical level. That's all there is to the dog.

There's the fur that covers it up. It's the same. The human's the same.

There's the skin, and beyond the skin, there's bones, blood, like the body is like whatever, 70% water. There's bones, blood, tissue. That's all there is.

So on the physical level, when you look into the eyes of the dog, the dog is not actually there as the physical being. This is not what you notice when you look into the eyes of the dog and something within you responds to the being of the dog. This being of the dog is invisible.

The same as your being is invisible. You cannot find the dog by cutting open the dog and looking at the organs of the dog. The dog is not there.

As I said in the little book, The Little Prince, I think it was written a long time ago, one of the quotes from that book is, what is essential is invisible to the eye. This eye, which means any sensory perception, anything that you can receive with your senses. What is essential is invisible to the eye, which means it cannot be perceived with the senses.

So that which you respond to and what responds to you is already not part of this dimension. The dog as the consciousness of the dog, you cannot find the dog in this material dimension. So what you love in the dog, although it may be pleasant to touch the dog, the soft fur and so on, but what you respond to and love is invisible.

Essentially, you love the consciousness of the dog, not the material. The physical appearance is very much secondary. So whatever we perceive here is a surface phenomenon and that applies to you also, of course.

Now, who you are as a... First, you are a physical body. The physical body has a certain lifespan, fairly short.

And then you have thoughts and emotions that make up the person, but already that dimension is beyond the physical. Nobody knows ultimately, no scientist has yet figured out what a thought actually is. There are certain correlations with thinking and structures in the brain, but nobody knows what a thought is, where it lives.

You cannot find a thought. You have millions of memories and thoughts, but no scientist could ever find any of them by dissecting your brain or emotions. Although the physical body can respond when there's an emotion or even a sensory perception.

If you imagine biting into a lemon, the body responds and saliva will accumulate in your mouth because the body thinks what the mind creates is already reality. There's another story to talk about there. The body cannot differentiate between what your mind is creating or whether there's actual reality or your mind is just creating it.

A lot of anxiety arises there, but let's put that aside. It's not our focus here now. So all your memories, where do they actually live?

Now, traditionally, we think they are somehow accumulated in the neurons, the atoms, molecules of your body, but how and why, we do not know. Nobody knows. Where's the memory?

I could say to you, do you remember your grandmother? And suddenly, immediately, the memory comes back to you. Do you remember the house where you lived when you were eight years old?

Or do you remember? And immediately you can go back and say, yes, do you remember even, but what did the door feel like when you opened it? Do you remember it?

And then there was a cupboard. Do you remember opening that cupboard? Yeah.

Where did this memory live all that time? Where was that? Are there certain molecules in your brain that represent the memory of your grandmother or the memory of touching something when you were eight years old?

We don't know. Because these things already, even on the level of the personality, they do not exist in the material realm. They already exist.

Thoughts and emotions already exist in a dimension that transcends physical reality. So thoughts and emotions are already part of the non-physical. In other words, a dimension beyond the physical.

So when you go into yourself, into thoughts and emotions, you are still there as a non-physical representation of you. When the body dissolves, this accumulation of thought and emotion that you call you does not immediately disappear. When the body dissolves, this accumulation that you call you is still there, but there's a physical presence.

There's still a form identity there, but now this form identity is no longer physical form. It's thought form and emotional form. So there's a thought body and an emotional body that still persists with all its accumulated, all its accumulated conditioning, all the desires that are still there because they do not live in the physical realm.

All the desires and a lot of the conditioning is still there. And even there are many, many accounts of people whose brain activity stopped and the heart stopped. It's called near-death experiences.

And the many, many credible reports of people who were able to observe their own body in hospital or wherever it may be. But what eyes did they have? The question.

So there is an equivalent of the physical body in a more ethereal realm, not part of this dimension, where these organs are still there. So these organs are only a surface appearance in the physical dimension of a deeper thing because you also have a non-physical body. And this non-physical body, that when you go deeper into it, then you begin to reach what Carl Jung called the collective unconscious of humanity, which is also, you are part of that also.

So when you go beyond the personal thought and emotional body, you begin to go into the humanities collective conscious body. You're also part of that. And when you go even deeper, then you're beginning to go gradually, you begin to go towards the unconditioned consciousness, which is the pure light of consciousness.

The purpose of life is still the awakening. That's no matter where you are. So one more thing to do with your question is of course, questioning the consciousness, the greatest mystery of life, is the question that scientists ask, is consciousness produced by the physical brain?

And mainstream science mostly still says, yes, it is. But if you ask mainstream science, well, what is consciousness? They don't know.

They say it must be produced by the physical brain because there is only matter. They say there is nothing beyond matter. Materialism, that's what true materialism is.

True materialism doesn't mean to want to accumulate as many material goods as possible. True materialism is to believe that there's nothing beyond that which we can detect with our senses. That's all there is.

And there are even scientists who say, well, consciousness is some kind of delusion because they don't know what it is. So the great mystery is consciousness, is mainstream science says consciousness is a by-product of what happens in the brain, the physical brain. But that is a misperception.

And at some point, perhaps we will realize, science will realize that that is not the case, that consciousness is prior to all that. Consciousness pervades the entire universe. And consciousness is something that the physical brain can channel so that consciousness assumes a particular form when it is channeled through the physical brain.

Then this world arises, what we perceive as a world. And there are many worlds. This is not the only world.

There's entire astral dimension and so on. These are very interesting things I could talk about, but it would be not, it's fascinating, but not helpful for awakening. So I hope that answers at least to some extent your question.

Thank you.

Eckhart Tolle Healing Fear Through Difficult Times [7ff12f9b-34ff-4a98-9d41-ad2e017904c2]

[Speaker 2] (0:01 - 0:52)

Transforming our fear through difficult times. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions about how to deal with our fears, especially when confronted with a crisis. He says intelligent action cannot occur when we're gripped by anxiety and negative thinking, which can be incredibly destructive.

What's needed is wisdom. Looking at the totality of the situation, not just one aspect of the problem. Eckhart says we must free ourselves from the negative thinking that accompanies fear and align ourselves with what he calls the vertical dimension, the place where we are one with all that is.

He also urges us to pay attention to the most important thing in any situation, our state of consciousness.

[Speaker 1] (0:54 - 50:15)

Effective and intelligent action does not arise out of fear. And no matter, this requires not only action that you take in your personal life, but also action that we need to take on a collective level. If the action that we take arises out of fear, it's unlikely that it will be effective because what is missing then is wisdom.

Wisdom that takes into account the totality of a situation, not just focuses on one aspect of a problem and tries to solve it there, disregarding how it affects other things. So what's happening collectively to us is then potentially a great awakener for many humans. And practice whenever the fearful thinking arises, realize that it is not helpful, it's destructive, and realize that the primary factor in your life is connected with the vertical dimension.

In other words, the primary factor is your state of consciousness in any situation, any problematic situation, any challenging situation. How do you respond to it? The primary factor and your primary attention needs to be on your inner energy field, your state of consciousness.

If that is not right, if that is negative egoically, ego means complete identification with mind, if the ego is there, the ego may have good intentions. It may look good at the beginning of an egoic thing that the ego says, this is what we need to do. But if you disregard your underlying consciousness, then you will find that the famous proverb applies, the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

So there have been many people in the world their good intentions have led to disaster because they disregarded their own consciousness. They just had an idea in their head, let's create a society that is a society where humans are equal, they're no longer exploited, let's get rid of the dreadful things of private property, and that all sounds so wonderful, so that's all great, it's called communism, let's try it out. And they tried it out, it just, it looked so great intention, I suppose, well there might not have been totally pure, there might have been a resentment also and other things with it, but there were good intentions there.

They just forgot about the human ego, the unconsciousness in every human being, including the people who wanted to bring about the revolution. And then it led to millions dead, killed, how I don't want to go into it now, don't need to, but you can read history books. Now it could work if there's a change in human consciousness then naturally the world that humans manifest will be very different, but there cannot be a true change outside without the inner change.

If you try to implement an outer change without an inner change, then you will lead again create a new set of problems, could be worse than the original ones. So I highly recommend that in the morning and at night that you go to sleep at night sensing the inner body, not reading the news on your phone and then go to sleep, not watching television and then go to sleep. It's better if there's no device at all in your bedroom, but if you can't help it, if you think it needs to be there, that's fine, but go to sleep from the inner body.

When you wake up, first thing, feel the inner body for five minutes, ten minutes. Don't read on your phone. You'll know soon enough what's happening in the world.

In the middle of the night you wake up, inner body, especially if you're tortured by your mind. How come I feel so much like a separate person? You say we are one being, but why do I feel like a separate entity, a me?

Why is this feeling so deep in me? On one level you are a separate person. There is a form identity.

You are this particular form and the amazing thing is there's not a single human being on the planet or ever has been who is exactly like you. Of course there may be people who very much resemble you, but it's unlikely that your mother or father would ever be fooled by somebody says he or she is you, but would immediately recognize you out of billions of humans and that's just the outer appearance and even your life story, the story of your life on the level form is very unique. There are many similarities, yes, with others and depends of course how individualized you are.

If you lived in a tribal consciousness then there would be far more similarities. If you lived in a more individualized consciousness then enormous differences between humans. So your form identity as a form identity, which is your body, your mental makeup, the psychology of you, the personality, the aspects that make up your personality, the elements of who you are as a person, which as they're all mental-emotional formations that are in you, you identify with them, they are you.

This is your psychological form of you and again nobody is quite the same as you. You're unique and that's all to do with your form identity. Every human is different and yet, yes, there are many similarities especially in the way in which their mind functions.

The content of people's minds differs but the basic functioning of the egoic mind is the same. In other words, you derive your sense of identity from certain images and narratives in your mind accompanied by emotions. This is a conditioning of your mind.

That's the same for everybody. So the basic mechanism behind the ego is the same. The content of the ego varies.

Depends what culture you grow up in, what life experiences you've had, especially in childhood and so on. But that's all your form identity. And the ego, by the way, if you don't know what it is, ego is complete identification with the conditioned mind.

That's the ego. When you're no longer identified with the conditioned mind, there is still a conditioned mind but there's an awareness behind it, which means you're relatively free of ego, although not perhaps for quite a while. Periodically you will get drawn back into complete identification.

The ego is back and you're out again and you're back again and you're out again. I know people who've been on the spiritual path for many years and I can often observe that there's almost two humans are there in one. One is the conditioned ego personality that sometimes operates totally and at other times there is a more awakened consciousness there that speaks through them and acts through them.

And you never know who is going to be there at any given moment. And very interesting to see, at first people who meet you, if you are such a person, somebody who meets you, one state, somebody may meet you at a time when you're egoically possessed, the ego has taken possession of you again and you're in a reactive mode and a fearful mode or you want to control, you want something from somebody, whatever the ego wants to add to itself and somebody meets you there and you have a certain impression of who you are and then may not realize that the next day you may be suddenly very conscious. But that person then would already have formed an idea of who you are and might not even realize that the next day you're very conscious because that person will already have formed certain judgments about you, understandably so, because you're a jerk in that state, will have formed certain judgments about you and then of course these judgments are stuck in the person's mind, their own egoic mind and even if you behave differently you might not even see it anymore because they've already formed an opinion or judgment about who you are. The mistake is when you see a human being you think there's a single entity then. I'm not just talking about humans manifest, humans are actually on the spiritual path, who are in the process of awakening or in whom the awakening process is happening, they can still be drawn back into egoic state of consciousness, especially when certain challenges happen.

As I said, collective or personal, they can be drawn back into fearful mode, reactive mode, until the challenges of life, whether they are personal or of a collective kind, the big collective ones, until the challenges of life, instead of drawing you back into egoic state of consciousness, reactive and so on, the challenges can also have the opposite effect and this is why they are so helpful, they can awaken you and so many of you are at this point where you could go either way, you could be drawn back through, at the moment, big collective challenges, you could be drawn back into a reactive, fearful, egoically possessed state of consciousness, especially if you listen to the news and the media too much and then you get drawn in, or the challenge is the great awakener and we are here, right here and now, in order to make sure that the challenges have this awakening function in you and in as many humans as possible and then, this doesn't mean that action is not important, action, of course we need to take action, it's important, but it's not the primary factor, action is always the secondary factor, primary factor is your state of consciousness that determines what kind of action you take, whether it's intelligent or stupid, it determines what the energy is that flows into the action that you take, so why we are here then is to use this precious time and I call it precious although normally, conventionally, the times we are living in would be called threatening, fearful, bad times, upheavals, disaster, and there may be more to come and it's a great opportunity within the totality of human evolution from a higher perspective, all these things are necessary developments, if it's happening it's necessary, there is an inevitability about whatever form the present moment takes, whatever form this moment takes, right here now, is to do with the whole history of the universe has brought about this moment, the form it takes, so it couldn't be otherwise, but that doesn't mean that it has to stay the same, is as it is, and that's an interesting thing, that acceptance doesn't mean you are stuck in it, you're more likely to be stuck in it if you resist what is, famous saying, what you resist persists, so you're more likely to be stuck with this on a personal level or collective level, if you resist inner resistance, but if you can accept that this is what is, and then you can say, okay, fine, and where do I go from here, but you might need to take some action, but once you've said fine to the isness of this, you're more intelligent, because you're no longer reactive, you cannot say okay to what is, no matter what the appearance of it is, the okay to what is, to be friendly with the present moment, no matter what form it takes, enables you to have some access to the vertical dimension, the depth in you, which means also access the unconditioned intelligence, so it's the moment you are no longer resistant to the present moment, you become truly intelligent and capable of intelligent action.

There are people who are in conventional terms called intelligent, they might have a PhD or two, but live in continuous reactivity, denial, and they're against what is, and the action is not ultimately intelligent. I call it intelligence in the service of madness. If you build an atom bomb, or you build chemical weapons, or you build something that is extremely destructive to the environment just for profit, of course, yes, it requires intelligence to build these things, it requires great intelligence to build an atom bomb, or chemical weapon, or some huge thing that uses nature and destroys it, but it's not true intelligence, it's egoic cleverness.

The real intelligence, which is inseparable from wisdom, a rare word these days, you won't hear much about wisdom, and you can't get a PhD in wisdom, so that arises from that deeper level, where the wisdom and intelligence are a single thing. Here's a question. Do we need all this suffering and adversity that the planet is currently facing to bring forth a new Earth that you wrote about?

Apparently, yes, otherwise it wouldn't be happening. Well, that was a short answer. Oh, I just realized that I haven't fully answered the previous question, which was, how come I feel so much like a separate person?

You say we are one being, but why do I feel like a separate entity, a me? Why is this feeling so deep in me? So I already gave one half of the answer, and then I got sidetracked, so the one half of the answer was, yes, you are a separate being.

As a form identity, you are a separate being, and that's how it's meant to be, and it's fine. The only problem arises, or the suffering arises, if this separate being is the only way in which you know yourself. You only know yourself as this separate being, then, yes, then you are in a state of delusion, ultimately, because you don't know the most vital fact about yourself, and I don't talk about conceptual knowing.

So there's nothing wrong with being that's a separate being, as long as you have this body and so on, you are a separate being. But is that all? If you only know yourself as a separate being, then your life is frustrating, and you suffer a lot, because you ignore an entire dimension of your existence, and that is the vertical dimension.

And in the vertical dimension, you are connected, one with all that is, not only with every other human, you're connected with a source of all life that sometimes is called God, and you need to know that. How do you know that? It begins with a simple thing.

Here and now, this moment, stop thinking, just a moment of no thought, like now, doesn't matter how long, 5 seconds, 10 seconds, no thought, stillness. And in that brief moment of stillness, strange thing is, from the point of view of the horizontal you, you no longer know who you are in that moment of stillness, where there's only still presence, you don't know who you are. On the horizontal dimension, you know very well who you are, you can talk about it endlessly, can think about it endlessly.

But on the vertical dimension, the moment you enter it, in the moment of no thought, you no longer know who you are. And that not knowing, in conceptual terms, activates a deeper knowing that's non-conceptual. So in that moment, you know who you are, but you can't talk about it, because you know that you are that presence.

But it's not differentiated, and you can't remember it. So there's a deep knowing there, in that unknowing, there is a deep knowing. You have to have the courage to go into that unknowing and be rooted in that unknowing, and then the other dimension of you can operate much more effectively, fruitfully, harmoniously, compassionately, in this world.

The horizontal, the personality of you, can only become transformed if you realize the other dimension. I sometimes call this vertical the transcendent dimension of consciousness. So you need both as a human being here, your destiny, your fate, your purpose, your mission, is to live in both worlds at the same time.

There, where you don't know yourself, but you do know, but no longer conceptually, and the horizontal. It expresses itself more and more in the horizontal dimension of life. It expresses itself more and more here.

It transforms what's here. And that's the secret of life for humans at the present time. And to realize that is why we're here.

I hear a question, why do I choose to react when I know better, in quotation marks? Is being exhausted an excuse for making a shameful choice? Do I actually want to react and be bad?

That's interesting. People who are in the process of awakening often experience periods when they are very unawakened again. They revert back into reactivity and ego consciousness.

And then they are back in a more awakened state. And when they get into a more awakened state, they look back on something that perhaps they did the other day, or yesterday, or this morning, and say, how could I have been so, why was I suddenly so, whatever, I don't know what the questioner refers to, why was I so reactive to that person? Why was I so angry?

Why did I do that? How could I have done that? Then it happens repeatedly, and he's asking, why do I choose to react when I know better?

Now, the answer, of course, is you don't choose to react. And you know better only afterwards. So in the moment, you have no choice, because you are run by the conditioned mind, the mental-emotional field with its conditioned patterns.

And to be run by the conditioned mind means to be trapped in ego. So it's the ego in you that does it. You have no choice.

The choice only comes in when you're aware. So the choice would be there if you've noticed, let's say, in a conversation or an interaction with somebody, and you can suddenly feel the impulse to react and to say something, or whatever it is. And at that moment, if you could know it for what it is, an awareness is there.

And at that moment, you could choose either to say what you wanted to say, what the impulse wanted you to say, or you can let it go, not suppress it. Let it go, because you realize it as, to use a Buddhist term, unskillful. Buddhists like the term unskillful living.

Basically, that means, I call it unconscious, and Buddhists call it unskillful, unskillful action. And so you recognize it as unskillful, and you just let it go. But until that happens, when the awareness is there, yes, the impulse is about to take you over.

What tends to happen is the awareness comes in afterwards, but the time interval between having to act something out and realizing that this is what you did, the time interval gets shorter. So at first, you may act something out, and two days later, you think, oh. And then you act something out, and one day later, you act something out, and an hour later, you say, oh, the awareness comes.

And then you act something out, and a minute after you did it, you know it, oh, you did it again. Sometimes, of course, you find people apologize to others. They say, I'm so sorry I said that.

At that time, they were not sorry, because something else was in them that did it, almost another subpersonality, and the ego was there, did it. And most egos have different subpersonalities. They're all aspects of the ego.

So you have one subpersonality that, in certain circumstances, acts like a little child, oh. And then another one, when it gets triggered by something like money, suddenly gets extremely angry and fearful. Oh, you took that money away from me.

So you have a multiplicity of people inside you, and others who meet you happen to just meet one of them at that particular time. And you never know which one is going to come up any given day or in any given circumstance. I had close observation with people when I lived for a little while in a commune in England many years ago with a shared house with a bit of land.

And I could so clearly observe with many people living there how many of them were different people on different days, completely different. And I was often sitting at breakfast downstairs, and I could hear steps coming down. I wonder who is coming down now.

It could be the same human being, but a different incarnation of that same person. A very cheerful person. What a wonderful morning.

Great, isn't it? Great to be alive. We should be grateful to God for being here in this wonderful...

And the next day, God talked to me. Leave me alone. Don't want to know.

Same person. But in all cases, unconscious, taken over by certain patterns. Now, when there's awareness, then the different sub-personalities, which are aspects of the ego, are kind of more contained.

So you don't lose yourself in one or the other. They are more contained, and gradually they dissipate. So you're no longer many different people.

And then as you grow more conscious, you find yourself, you're basically the same, same, same in every circumstance. And you don't act out roles anymore, which is, you're the same whether you meet the Pope or the Dalai Lama, or you meet a person sweeping the street. It's exactly the same, because you don't have a mental image of who you're meeting, and you don't operate through mental images anymore.

You're meeting a human being. You're meeting the being. It's the same.

So when it happens, you don't have a choice, so you don't choose. The questioner asked, why do I choose to react? You don't choose.

It happens to you. Now, the next part of the question is, is being exhausted an excuse for making a shameful choice? It is true that when people who are beginning to awaken often find that when they have low energy, their consciousness is also low.

So they are tired, or they had a long day and exhausted, and then they just can't be present anymore. They don't have the energy to be present. Don't talk to me about presence.

I don't want to know just what is all that rubbish, presence. They're exhausted. A time comes when they begin to realize that, and then even when they're exhausted, they can still know that they're exhausted without it making them unconscious.

And the last part of the question is, do I actually want to react and be bad? No, you don't want to react and be bad, but the ego wants to react. And being bad is not bad either for the ego.

Trouble is good. To have an argument with somebody is great. To try to prove somebody's wrong is great.

The ego loves that. It needs to be right. It needs an enemy somewhere.

Please give me an enemy. Because if I don't have an enemy, I don't know who I am anymore. I define myself through the other.

And so I need to emphasize the otherness of the other, because otherwise I don't know who I am anymore. Individual people do it. Entire countries do it.

So they point to another country as those are the bad guys over there. The mainstream media, they participate. They habitually create an image of another country as bad.

And it's ego. It's collective ego. They don't know what they do.

So the question is not, do I actually want to react and be bad? No, you're not even there when it happens. It's happening to you or inside you, and you can't know anything about it.

You're asleep at that moment. Spiritually speaking, you're asleep. In other words, unconscious at that moment.

The moment you become conscious again, you look back and say, oh, I did it again. Well, you didn't. It happened to you.

But you have to suffer the consequences. Now some people, when this happens, there are people who are very unconscious and have violent tendency, very unconscious. They can even perpetrate acts of violence in moments of deep unconsciousness when they overcome.

They may not even be really aware at any time, but they can function normally for some of the time. In other words, I call that normal unconsciousness. You still can function, be a part of society.

Yes, in conflict with others, yes, but nevertheless, in normal unconsciousness, you can be part of society and function like millions of others, normal unconsciousness. And then periodically, from normal unconsciousness, they go down to deep unconsciousness. And such deep unconsciousness, they can perpetrate acts of violence.

Sometimes it happens through alcohol. Many crimes are committed because people get completely drunk, and then they get a gun, and then they shoot somebody. Just an argument is enough, and something dreadful happens.

So one could say, is this person who is now going to prison for the rest of his life, is he responsible? If he was completely unconscious when he did that, it just happened to him, and he did it, is he responsible? Now, if he's not responsible, as I seem to imply, because it's unconscious, then naturally, you would have to say, well, then he shouldn't go to prison, should he?

Well, then the reason you should give why he should go to prison is to protect others, because it probably will happen again. That's one reason why he should go to prison. And I would agree with that.

There's another reason, and that is, even though people may not be responsible for their unconsciousness, they still have to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness. And this is how evolution happens. Many humans, they don't necessarily go to prison.

There are other consequences for unconsciousness. So even if you're not responsible, because it is the destiny of humans to become more conscious, to grow in consciousness. And for very unconscious humans, the way they become more conscious is to suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness.

And by suffering the consequences of their unconsciousness, they become more conscious. In other words, some people become more conscious after 20 or 30 years in prison, or just a few years, and suddenly, suddenly the personality subsides and something else arises, and they go, wow. And they can't, who did that?

So it's a little paradoxical, but this is how evolution happens. For very unconscious humans, they perpetrate, they do bad things. Sometimes the consequence is their own premature death, because if you kill a few people, one day somebody kills you, or they get maimed, or whatever it is, you suffer the consequences of your unconsciousness.

And through that extreme suffering, there's an opportunity of awakening. So quite a few very unconscious humans awaken in that way. So you could say the ego, their very unconscious ego, ultimately becomes an instrument for their awakening, which is the ego's own death.

My final answer to the question then is, it may be that there's certain situations that you go into in your daily life that you know are more likely to trigger your unconscious reactivity, in other words, make you unconscious. It could be a person that you go visit, and this person always makes you unconscious, and that could be somebody you work with, or it could be somebody you've known for a very long time in your family, whoever it may be, maybe your parents. Whenever you visit your parents, the same script is being played out.

Your mother or father accuses you of not being good enough, or whatever they do, and you react, and you storm out, and you shout, oh, this is one of many possible scenarios. Or you, before having contact with your ex-spouse, for some reason you still need to be in contact to know that you're going to be triggered, and then instead of just going into the situation, use it as a spiritual practice to see if you can stay present while you talk to them. But you have to really feel your entire body when you talk to your ex-wife or ex-husband, and you have to go, okay, don't tell them I'm just practicing being present, that doesn't work.

Just be present as much as you can, so that's opportunity. And that's, of course, people with whom you share a lot of history are often like that. You need to, they trigger you.

And so before you interact with them, know, okay, I'll stay present now. And then you go into this high degree of alertness when you talk to them, so that you're not forced to act out the same script again, the same reactivity again, and again, and again. So as Ram Dass said, famous advice, if you're so enlightened, go and spend two weeks with your parents.

If you think you're so enlightened, go visit your parents for two weeks. Ah, well, that will give you good feedback where you're at. And it is often the case that other humans give you feedback as to your state of consciousness, because it's easy to fool yourself when you're alone in the room, or out in nature, and you say, oh, I'm completely enlightened now.

Nothing is bothering me. Wonderful. And then the next thing happens.

You meet somebody. What? How dare you say that?

How dare you? There's an interesting division. That's another challenge in our present age right now.

Not as acute a challenge as the pandemic, but there's a division between people, not only in the United States, but in many other Western countries, but perhaps, maybe stronger in the United States, but it's definitely also there in other Western countries, a division between, it's hard to put a name to it, maybe traditionally it was called left-wing and right-wing, but they seem to be, the polarities become more pronounced, as if they can't meet anymore, they can't have a conversation anymore.

And here's a question about what advice do you have when someone finds themselves in conversations with family members, friends, or co-workers, and it is obvious there are strong differences of opinion on a particular topic, such as health care, guns, same-sex marriage, immigration policies, homelessness, and politics. Yes. Well, what advice do you have when somebody finds themselves in conversations like that?

The way the question is asked, I don't see a problem. I know what the problem is. Strong differences of opinion.

Well, that wouldn't be a problem, would it? But there's more to it than that. It's not just strong differences of opinion, because that would be fine.

You have a different opinion than I. Okay. But that's not how it is.

What the questioner means, of course, is that people are identified with their opinion. What is an opinion? It's a thought form in your head.

And you've probably adopted that taken from somewhere outside, from watching the internet, mainstream media, or some alternative source. You took in some opinion about any of these topics, and it becomes your opinion. What's an opinion?

It's a thought form. Now, an unconscious person, lack of awareness, awareness being at the deeper dimension of consciousness or higher dimension of consciousness, an unconscious person derives their sense of self from thought, plus emotions. Thoughts give them their sense.

So if you derive your identity from a thought, then you need to be right. Your opinion is regarded as the truth. You derive your sense of self from your opinion.

Therefore, if anybody questions it or contradicts, this person is actually perceived as attacking you, not as somebody who has a different opinion. The unconscious perception is that this person is attacking you. And then you react as if you had been almost physically attacked.

And this is how a discussion about these topics becomes very toxic. And it's not only when you're physically together, it operates in an exaggerated form when people only communicate online. And they communicate with people they haven't never even met.

All they have of the person is a statement that this person posted. And they react as if this person were the devil and their mortal enemy. They know nothing about this person.

And then they post something to insult that person, say what a dreadful human being you are. And once you've posted this thing, your ego feels a little bit bigger. But then of course comes a reply of that person.

And then you have to react to that. And then other people post things in reply to that. And then you find yourself in the middle of this.

Some people are behind you. Others are behind this other guy. And you can sit there for hours.

And the ego loves it. Completely crazy. It's one of the insanities of our civilization.

And there are many is that kind of interaction, complete identification with conceptual ideas and mistaking who a person is reducing another human being to a mental concept. Completely insane. And this is a new technology has enabled the human ego to proliferate and grow in that way.

And the people who participate in that don't even know that it's insane. And that's making them more and more unconscious. So the polarity has become more pronounced in viewpoints and opinions.

So you have basically, that can be kind of divided into left and right. Where is that going? Well, how is it going to end?

We don't know. Is there going to be some actual civil conflict? Is it going to end peacefully?

It depends how human consciousness, human consciousness will grow. It either grows through violent conflict, or it grows in a more peaceful way. In every age, the ego, the collective ego, manifests in different forms, but they differ from time period to time period.

In the 20th century, you had the collective ego manifesting in certain ways, for example, leading to the insanities of the First World War, and the Second World War, First World War, everybody was eager to fight in every country. They would say, Yeah, we're having another war. Great.

If you were there, you'd have been have to be very conscious to see the insanity of it all. Because it's not easy, you need to be pretty awakened to recognize the insanity in your own cultural environment, retrospectively, you can see it more easily, or they were crazy. Or you can go back to the Middle Ages, and many of the beliefs and what they did, and they burned people and they put the most absurd ideas.

Yes, there were some enlightened people, too. But the general culture was pretty crazy. And you can see how can they make it easy to see how crazy the human collective ego can be.

But how crazy is it? No, you could be part of it. Some of your opinions could be part of the insanity of the collective ego, and you wouldn't even know it.

I'm not going to tell you what it might be, because it's for you to become aware enough to find out for yourself. But yes, this age has a growing craziness about it, too. It's always what applies to the individual, what applies to the collective.

It's easier to see the unconsciousness in others than it is to recognize the unconsciousness in yourself. Just as it is easier to see the collective unconsciousness in a certain culture in past ages, or somewhere totally different on the planet, easier to see that than to see the craziness in your present, your own culture, where you are living. You need more awareness to see it.

I do not attack verbally any crazy beliefs that I see around in the popular culture because it's pointless. It would be like saying when somebody comes to me, if I were a psychologist or psychiatrist, and somebody comes and says, I am, well, let's say, what's a common delusion? I am a reincarnation of Napoleon, but nobody believes me.

I would not question and say, no, you're not. That's a delusion. I would just listen.

There's no point in, because if I question the delusion, he'll just run away or attack me. So I just listen. Okay, that's interesting.

And then perhaps by acting as the presence for his belief system, perhaps I can bring more presence to him just by being the presence there for him. And then perhaps he will have enough awareness to recognize his own delusion. And then I wouldn't have had, instead of me trying to convince him that he is deluded, I'm just there as the presence.

And I do the same. I don't comment on contemporary culture very much, except in general terms, because it's not helpful. It's my job to help people awaken.

As they awaken, they become aware of their thought processes, and they will also become aware of certain thought processes that are completely deluded, that they have taken on from somewhere, probably the internet. So I still need to complete my answer to this question. What advice do you have when you find yourself in conversations with people and so on, completely different opinions?

Well, what is your state of consciousness when you're engaged in these conversations with friends or family members and you disagree? That's the question to ask yourself. What is your state?

Do you experience certain emotions? How do you interact with them when you have a discussion about this or that? Are you completely identified with your opinion?

Do you become defensive or aggressive when you talk? Then you are part of the unconsciousness. And for the unconsciousness to operate, it needs at least two.

It needs two sides. If you don't offer any opposition to their viewpoints, then the conversation would quickly come to an end. Is it possible to have a conversation with completely different viewpoints about these topics without involvement of the ego?

Yes, it is possible. You do not have to give up your opinions. You can have your opinions on whatever these subjects you mentioned or others, but what you have to give up as you awaken, you do give up, is your identification with your opinions.

In other words, deriving your sense of identity, your sense of who you are from your mental positions. That's a delusion. And as long as you do that, you're engaged in a very unpleasant discussion where you're actually not defending the truth.

You're defending your fictitious sense of self. And the more you defend your fictitious sense of self, the more unconscious you become, up to the point of physical violence sometimes. That's it.

So it's up to you. It's not so much what others do. It's up to you to see, are you able to express your opinion even almost forcefully?

This is what I believe, but you are not in it. It's just that your opinion is there. It is.

Because, so where are you? You are behind that much deeper. You're the presence.

It's nothing to do with thought. So you derive your identity from the deeper place, your essence identity, and then you can play with ideas and discuss them. Now the question is, can the other person also do that, or are they completely identified?

Well, maybe they're still completely identified with their opinions, in which case it would be a very strange experiment to have a discussion with one participant not identified with their opinion, the other participant completely identified with their opinion. It would be interesting to see where that goes, or whether the conversation will quickly come to an end. There certainly would, that person who is identified, would they perhaps suddenly run away, because it's so weird to be, to have somebody who has no ego involvement in the discussion.

And that's for you to practice. Are you identified with your mental positions, or are you able to explain your mental positions without the self involved in them, your egoic self? Interesting experiment, so next time be very conscious when you have these discussions.

Now when you're discussing online, on the internet, it's a different matter. You're not really meeting a human being there. Do you dehumanize people by responding as if these people, who have different opinions, were the devil or your personal enemies?

So you have to be very conscious how do you interact with people if you do online, people that you've never even met. So be very, very much aware of your inner state while you don't post anything, or give it some time. That's perhaps a good recommendation.

Before you write something, but don't post it. Give it at least half an hour, one hour, or even better, have a good night's sleep. In the morning, look at it again, and then see, do I want to post this or not?

In many cases, you may want to say, okay, I don't need this. So the time interval perhaps is a helpful thing.

Eckhart Tolle Healing Our Obsession with Doing [38be18ad-9a9d-41a7-b597-b42f3b2c94df]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:45)

Healing our obsession with doing. In this episode Eckhart talks further about how critical it is that we balance being with doing. He says without it we will not reach the deeper dimension of consciousness that is our legacy.

He explains that when we're so obsessed with doing and achieving we can't appreciate whatever it is here in the present moment, much less attain enlightenment. He states that the world is already overrun with doing and the result is chaos and that the solution to many of our problems, both individual and collective, start with seeking stillness. He reveals that we are never more ourselves than when we are still.

[Speaker 1] (0:48 - 39:11)

This must be what is called the limelight. I don't know what it has to do with lime. There must be some reason in the etymology of the limelight.

This may be a question and answer session. I say maybe because you never know. As the ancient Middle Eastern proverb says, the camel driver has his plans and the camel has its own plans.

Perhaps we can start with a few, before we go on to questions, a few additional remarks about the important subject of being and doing and finding a balance. And before finding a balance, being able to enter to access the being dimension. That's already a good start.

And then at first, what tends to happen, but also not invariably, is you enter the being dimension or access it when you're in a place that is conducive to the stillness or the serenity or here, a protected space, or perhaps at home in your room or here in your room, out in nature. And at first, the being dimension is associated with a conscious cessation of doing. That's how you first realize it.

It's when you're not doing anything and you can just be, consciously be, which implies a, no matter how brief, since a cessation of the primary doing, which is the thinking doing. Without a brief cessation in the stream of thinking, it's hard to find the being dimension. But later on, as you become consciously rooted in the being dimension, thinking and being can come together.

They are not irreconcilable. Irreconcilable. And in fact, that is one of your tasks is to, when you do think, not to be totally identified with a stream of thinking.

In other words, there's some attention in the background. There's an awareness, a field of, or a space of awareness in the background, even while you're engaged in thinking. As it is now, as I'm speaking, of course, the mind is operating, but I can sense, and perhaps you can, in the background, behind the words, beyond the words, in between the words, there's that space of stillness, beingness, whatever you want to call it.

And if you can sense it, it's in you. Because only being can be aware of being, not the mind. If you believe being emanates from me, I suppose it does, but the recognition of being can only happen through accessing that dimension within yourself.

Only being can recognize being, not the mind. The mind, however, may come in when you, let's say you recognize the being dimension that emanates from this thing, that's the body or whatever it is. It emanates, and you sense it.

The moment you sense it, it's in you also, consciously. Now it's possible that the mind may come in and misinterpret what's going on, and the mind may confuse the form of the spiritual teacher, or whoever it happens to be, the form identity with the being dimension, and then suddenly the teacher is regarded as a supernatural being, or a kind of godlike figure, or some great guru, or whatever, because you confuse that which transcends the form, for which the form is only an opening, you confuse that with the form, and then you make that person through whom being shines, you make that person very special. This can happen easily.

It's a misinterpretation, but at least you recognized being, but what you overlooked is, because not everybody will recognize it in the being dimension in a human being, if it shines through strongly, not everybody will recognize. Some people say, what's this all about? Why are these people all listening to this guy for two hours?

He's not special, he doesn't even jump up and down the stage. He's just boring, isn't he? He's boring.

So that's a danger. That is also a danger as far as the spiritual teacher is concerned, because there may be remnants of ego left in him or her. And if the teacher is bombarded with continuous projections of specialness, he or she may begin to believe, in other words, the ego comes back through the back door and regains ascendancy, and the ego comes back, and then the teacher begins to think, to feel a specialness in the person, the form.

And then it has happened many times, the teacher makes statements such as, I'm certainly the greatest teacher alive on the planet at the present moment. Or it may go so far as to say, I'm the greatest that has ever lived. All the others were precursors.

I have arrived. There is something incredibly special coming through, but it is nobody's possession. It's nobody's achievement.

It does not belong to the form dimension. But the form dimension can be an opening, just like a window. In a way, one could say, this body and this mind is the window frame.

What you see is the window frame. But what the most important thing about the window is the light that comes through the window, that's the opening. And this may also happen to you as presence arises, if it's not happened already, for many of you probably has happened already, you come into contact with people who are helped by your presence.

Even if you don't feel that you know what to do, because it doesn't work like that. And they are drawn to you, they're helped by your presence. There's a kind of transmission, it can awaken the presence in the other, that dimension, the being dimension in the other.

And then you can find, they may then become attached to you, because they feel so good in your presence. And they can't let go. And again, the danger already arises then that you feel, I, I have done this.

There's a, one could call that healing in a deeper sense, not just physical healing, but the true healing is the reconnection with the being dimension, that's the true healing. And there's a phrase in this book called the cause and miracles, which is, the healer does not heal, he lets healing be. He does not heal, he lets healing be.

So when you are with people who are seeking help, then you don't need to go into your mind and say, how can I help this person? And the person is talking to you, and you already think, perhaps I could say that, I can say that. It doesn't work like that.

You're just present. At some point, you may say something from, comes from a deeper place, or you may not even say anything, and there's just an answer may suddenly appear in the other person, and suddenly, oh, and you never said or did anything, you just sat there. So at first, the being dimension, you find it as separate from external activity or thinking.

That's a good beginning. And then gradually, you learn that it is not irreconcilable with external activities. It's a presence through movement is a good practice, because you do not need to sit still to find stillness, which is another word for it, which people believe initially.

Stillness also has kind of two meanings in English. On the one hand, stillness means the absence of noise. But another meaning of stillness is the absence of movement.

And you say, sit still. It's the absence of movement. He stood still, he sat.

So it's stillness points in English to the absence of either noise or movement. So when we talk about stillness, you might think you have to, you can't move in order to be, to consciously sense the being dimension, you clearly mustn't move. And then you learn you can actually move.

And in fact, it can be helpful. You begin with that. And then you can perform certain tasks, and still being that connectedness with being instead of completely losing yourself in the activity.

You can have goals to pursue, which is in the realm of doing. It's good to have goals, although there may be periods in your life when you don't need any goals. Certainly, if you reach a certain age, it becomes increasingly pointless to pursue goals, at least at the latest by the age of 95.

You don't need to pursue any more goals unless for some reason you have to. But even before then, there may be time periods in your life when the pursuit of goals is not necessary. And you can become more deeply immersed, just be engaged in ordinary everyday activity without having pursuing any particular big goal, big or small, working towards something.

But on the whole, it's good to have goals. But again, goals belong to the realm of doing. And that's fine.

The problem arises if the goal absorbs so much of your attention, the meaning, the desired outcome, the place you want to arrive at, whatever that may be, passing an exam, achieving a certain position, acquiring mastery in some activity, whatever it may be. If the desired outcome occupies a place in your mind that's overwhelming or you desperately need to arrive at that place, then in the meantime, all the things that you do, the steps you take, the activities you undertake in order to arrive at your goal, are then simply a means to an end. And they are not enjoyable because you desperately want to have arrived already, to have attained that already.

So some ambitious people are like that. They are, what's the expression, consumed by ambition. This is almost literally true.

And in the meantime, they're very unhappy while they're working so hard or whatever they do to achieve their goal. And not only are they unhappy and full of anger very often and irritation when things don't go the way they want them to go, when little obstacles arise, as they always do, often in the form of people. So often they get angry.

So the entire journey is a place of unhappiness and stress and turmoil and often toxic emotions. And not only do they make themselves unhappy, whoever's around them is also unhappy. The entire company, if it's a big business, the entire company is unhappy basically and stressed.

And so although there is a saying that in order to achieve anything in life, you need to learn to, what's the expression, it's to delay gratification. There is some truth to that, some truth. You can have a young person, one young person studies to go to college and studies in the evenings and only goes out occasionally.

Then their next door neighbor can't be bothered, wants immediate gratification and starts drinking and indulging in not only intoxicating beverages, but also substances and whatever hangs out in clubs. And what's the point in doing anything? And a few years later, the one who delayed gratification achieved something.

And so that seems to be true. The danger is with that recipe of delayed gratification is it becomes a mindset in you that you cannot get rid of after a few years of practicing delayed gratification. You never arrive at gratification except very briefly.

And then you have to delay again because you have another goal that consumes you. That's the danger. And all that means that it's not balanced.

The life is not balanced by the being dimension. You're so obsessed with doing and arriving and achieving that you cannot appreciate whatever is here at the present moment. It's like you're on a hike and you want to go to the top of the mountain or whatever it is.

You're determined to do it in six hours. I'm doing to do it. I'm timing myself and I'm going to do it.

On the way, you see the most beautiful flowers and the sky and incredible marvels of nature. You don't see any of that because you desperately want to arrive. This is your task.

And finally you make it. But what was the journey like? It wasn't that great because you didn't see all the beauty around you.

As the expression goes, you couldn't stop and smell the flowers. Because if you could stop for a moment, there's the being dimension, is present moment. It's inseparable from the present moment, from acknowledging the present moment.

That's the portal or the entry point into the being dimension is the present moment. If you miss that, you might have certain successes as what the world called success. You might have certain successes in life, but fairly pointless because the whole journey was a journey of unhappiness.

And even when you arrive, you're still a stressed out being. I'm not necessarily saying everybody is successful. There may be some humans who are able to balance being.

In fact, there are, I've met a few who are very successful in the world. Nevertheless, I'm not lost in the activity, still being able to appreciate the present moment. And then what about the delayed gratification then?

How does that work? Well, is it possible to change your attitude and instead of saying, okay, I have to delay gratification, are you able perhaps to enjoy whatever activity you engage in? Let's say you're learning to play an instrument and you want to get good at it.

And other people are playing around and you are practicing. Are you able perhaps to experience gratification even with a practice before you arrive at mastery, even at the very beginning? So it is possible to move.

Many, many tasks can be performed in such a way that you don't need to delay gratification. Your attitude towards the task can change so that the task itself becomes satisfying already in itself. And then you don't need to delay gratification because the gratification can already be here in the present moment.

Many things can be actually enjoyed, although the world may tell you you're doing this in order to arrive. It's only a means to an end. And when that becomes a mindset, then your entire life becomes a means to an end.

Where's the end? You never arrive. So you are transforming, converting, reducing the present moment to a means to an end.

The one thing that only, the only thing that ever is real, you're saying, well, that's just, I'm just trying to get there. This is just a stepping stone. That's the unconscious pattern.

I'm trying to get there. Here is never good enough. Why is it not good enough?

Because the true goodness derives from that inner place, the recognition of being. That's the source of all joy or happiness. Joy might be a better word.

Happiness is kind of more superficial. Happy. I'm so happy.

Things are going great for me. I'm happy. So everything is going great.

Until the next day. Something went wrong. I'm not happy anymore.

And the strange thing is you can experience the superficial emotions of happiness and unhappiness while you're connected to the deeper dimension of being. So when somebody close to you dies, weeping can happen. So you, one cannot say, I'm still happy.

My, my mother has died. My father's died. My child has died.

I'm, I'm still happy though. I'm happy. No, you can't be.

How can you be happy? But you may be weeping, but deep inside you're at peace, even while on the surface, there is a movement of sadness, which one would call unhappiness. And then something good happens and say, Oh, great.

It's fine. But it's not. It doesn't make you ecstatic when something good happens to you.

You've won the lottery. That's the thing people think of that when something good happens. Oh, by the way, as you probably know this, you've been written books about it.

But many, many people, the majority of people who make big lottery wins, their life deteriorates over a period of five, five to 10 years, they become more unhappy than they were before. But that's another matter. So something good happens.

And again, if you're totally dependent on external conditions for your happiness, then if something good happens, like lottery win, you go, you're incredibly, incredibly, you're on a huge high. You can sometimes see people, people to suddenly achieve something and to go, wow. That's a high, and it won't last very long.

But if you're connected with being you still go, oh, that's great. But it's no longer. There's no longer this unbalanced reaction.

I remember Oprah was telling the story about me that I forgotten about it. But she told it several times. And she called me if she wanted to tell me about the new us had been selected for a book club.

She called me, I have selected your book. I said, Oh, that's good. That's wonderful.

Great. And she thought, well, that's strange. That's not how normally people react.

And then she said, and also I want to do with you a six week, six or eight seminar every week, we're going to do it together on the webinar, on the book, one chapter per week. And I said, Oh, have you done this before? He said, No, I haven't this first time.

Oh, that's great. Yes, I'll do it. And she found that so strange that later she talked about, he said, when I called Eckhart, he just said, Okay.

I was happy. And then perhaps a couple of years later, I haven't heard from her in two years. She's forgotten about me.

So, and this applies to even a simple thing, I gave the example of going on a hike, or walk, or whatever, again, to bring in the appreciation of the present moment, even while you're pursuing a goal, so that the activity, the action is of a high quality, that's an interesting way of putting it. You perform an action consciously in the present moment, not because you want to get to some other moment, you give your fullest attention to whatever action you're taking at this moment, whether you're on a hike, it's the step you're taking now, and you're looking around, there's beauty everywhere. So you give your fullest attention to the action you're taking.

That's high quality action. Consciousness flows into what you do in the present moment. And the strange thing is, you are more likely to succeed in your endeavors.

If that is the underlying state of consciousness, you're more likely to succeed when you no longer desperately need to succeed. And so you begin to bring together the being dimension and the doing dimension in activities, honor the present moment. It's more important than the next moment or the yes, you want to get to your goal, but whatever is now is of primary importance.

That's a shift in consciousness. Whatever your activity or you're doing is now is of primary importance. The getting there is of secondary importance.

You need it, it's good, but it's of secondary importance. There's a story of a Zen master who was watching an archery competition where they have big bows and arrows. And there was a famous master of archery, and he wasn't doing very well.

He was not hitting the target. And the master was watching, the disciple asked, why isn't he doing well today? And the master said something like, his desire to win deprives him of power.

His desire to be the best deprives him of it. In other words, he is not totally present. He is focusing on the outcome, not totally present in the doing.

And so the doing is of a lower quality. And the wonderful thing is not every endeavor that you undertake is going to succeed. That's just the nature of things.

You may have great plans, maybe you never arrive. It's possible. Go to Los Angeles, where in every good restaurant, all the waiters and waitresses are actors.

But for the time being, they are out of a job, but they are wanting to arrive. Obviously, a few do, and many do not. Does that mean a failed life?

Not at all. Something else will arise that may be infinitely better than acting. But in the meantime, how do you perform the activity that you're engaged in now?

Do you honor the present moment? What would you like? Yes, okay.

An omelet, right? Okay. And then you bring it and you put the plate down on the table consciously.

It's very different from somebody who's just a waiter, just puts it, there it is. Here you are. Okay.

Put it down consciously. It doesn't have to be slower than normal, just consciously. And then you honor the other person.

Is there anything else I can get you? Is there any? Oh, right.

And so you're enjoying even that instead of mentally saying, this is what has come to now. I'm working as a waiter and I was meant to be a great star. And perhaps life will move in a totally different direction.

But the starting point is the performance of the action now, which if it's done consciously, much more likely to lead to the next thing, whatever that may be. It may be totally different from acting. The point may come when you are happy that you never became a great star in Hollywood, because we might see that a lot of that is actually extremely fake.

It doesn't necessarily mean that everybody in there is fake, but well, many are. Yeah. Not all.

And then the next thing to reconcile the doing and being, this is advanced practice. While you're engaged in speaking and thinking, not to lose yourself in the stream of the mind, the mental stream, especially discussing something. You have opinions that may be important to you.

Do you derive your identity from your opinions? Or are you just holding opinions and your identity comes from a deeper place? That's the question.

If your identity comes from a deeper place, then you can remain, your awareness remains in the deeper place. So the awareness is the deeper place. So you're engaged in speaking and thinking.

Let's say you need to solve, there's a problem to be solved. This is constructive thinking. What can I do in order to get to where I want to go?

What can I do about this problem? I can do this, this or that. Well, that's not it.

And then there you learn to step out of thinking periodically and become alert and still. And when you resume thinking, often an insight suddenly arises, a thought that you hadn't had before comes from a deeper place. And not only that, sometimes if you access that deeper place, so your thinking can be interspersed with spaces.

And even while you talk, you say what you had to say, and then you come to an end. And you step back into awareness while you listen to the other person. And you're not preparing the next thing you're going to say.

You just, you're present and you listen, stepping back into presence. So that you're not dragged along in this mind stream. Often when people have discussions and you can observe how there's just no end, they're being dragged along this stream.

So it's a bit like this awareness in the background, which is the being dimension, while things happen in the foreground, that is the secret to living a fulfilled life, no matter what form that takes externally. And so one could compare this to, one can use the analogy of, let's say your life is a painting. And all the situations and the things that you do and that happen to you, let's say it's a moving painting.

Well, most paintings are not static. But in this analogy, you have a painting, it's moving, it's your life, all the stuff that happens to people and situations and so on. But the painting is painted on a canvas.

Without the canvas, there could be no painting. So let's take this analogy a little bit further, where it becomes a little bit absurd. Let's say the painting wants to become conscious of itself.

And it realizes that suddenly, the very foundation for it all is the canvas. The painting becomes aware of the canvas and not only of the things that happen on the canvas. So what is the canvas in this analogy?

That is the space, space consciousness, as I sometimes call it, being consciousness. And the rest is the foreground, the entire life is foreground, which is object consciousness, space consciousness, optic consciousness, being, doing, being, becoming, because on that level of doing, you're also engaged in becoming. You're doing and you develop as a human being, you become more knowledgeable, you become more experienced, you become stronger, you become whatever you become, there's a development, there's a growth, that's fine, that's wonderful.

And of course, at some point, there's a downside to the becoming, the becoming is no longer a positive thing, because you're becoming old. After all the achievements, if there are achievements, you suddenly realize, I have become many wonderful things and now I'm becoming old. So don't get too much drawn into the stream of becoming, although it's a good thing, it's part of being human, you have to be engaged in the stream of becoming.

But if that's all there is, it will not end well. It cannot. Then the point comes when things that you have acquired, you have to let go, that's the older you get, and you lose abilities, bodily functions, and so on.

So you have the two sides of becoming, there's nothing wrong with becoming. And if you have a correct attitude towards becoming, because there's more to your consciousness than the stream of becoming, then even the negative side of becoming, is not going to be terrible anymore. Because the growing old process, you observe it, and it doesn't matter at all, it's fine.

I'm speaking from experience. And there's a place inside you that doesn't feel old at all. The consciousness is timeless and it's only when you accidentally look in the mirror and you say, who is that?

That's, who is that old man? But imagine how hard it is to grow old when you have been identified with a body, for example, derived your sense of self-worth from looking good or being strong. How dreadful that is, what the suffering, the psychological suffering, far more than physical suffering that comes when certain bodily functions are not functioning anymore.

So the psychological suffering is terrible. And even achievements, at some point, you have to let go, or it's taken away from you. So, my intention was to deliver a few additional remarks to...

The camel had its own plans.

Eckhart Tolle Healing Trauma Through Presence [dd1596ad-12ec-4ae6-a956-edc9ba5f85bb]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:49)

Healing trauma through presence. In this podcast, Eckhart answers questions about healing from childhood trauma. He says it is important to acknowledge the trauma and to work through it, but not to get stuck in it.

He believes that while we may feel like a victim, it is not ultimately who we are. Eckhart shares stories about his own childhood trauma. He explains that his father had intense anger issues and abandoned Eckhart and his mother when he was just 11 years old.

As an adult, Eckhart later realized that his father had been traumatized by his own childhood. He says dysfunctional family patterns are handed down generation after generation, and he says healing happens when we break the cycle and that by practicing presence, we realize we're more than all the painful things we have experienced.

[Speaker 4] (0:52 - 1:07)

I think this is something many people will relate to. The person writes in, how can I overcome childhood traumas related to my parents and earliest experiences that I can clearly see are affecting my life today?

[Speaker 1] (1:08 - 20:53)

Right. Trauma would be some significant form of suffering that happened to you as a child, which is not uncommon. The question is, how does this trauma manifest in your present life and in the present moment?

How does it diminish your enjoyment of life, your experience of the present moment? How does it bring about perhaps even dysfunctional behavior in you? And then you can, if you look at it closely, you can see it exists in you as probably an emotion, an emotional field that I call it the pain body.

It gets triggered. It may not always be on the surface, but in certain situations, particularly, it gets triggered. And when it takes you almost, one could say it takes you over partially or completely.

So the trauma exists in you as an emotion. And it also exists in you as a thought or a stream of thinking as a narrative in your mind. Because these are certain things that happened.

You remember these things, and you have a particular way of explaining them to yourself. And trauma, in most of these cases, means that some other human being, whether it's parents or caregivers, or other or siblings or other humans, inflicted suffering on you that left these emotional, mental emotional wounds in you. So the only way you can overcome is by intensifying your presence, so that when the trauma becomes reactivated in you, and you experience it as an emotion or as a certain stream of thinking in your head, you're aware that this is what it is.

You know where it comes from, and you can feel it. And as you become more present, the first thing that you are able to overcome will be your narrative, the narrative in your mind that's connected with certain traumatic events. The emotion is there.

For the time being, all you can do is accept it when it comes, but recognize it for what it is. The question is whether the emotion still has a strong link with your thought processes. In other words, you think about these things that happened, and people that were involved in what happened.

And this often, when you think about these things that happened in the past that were done to you, be very much aware of what kind of narrative you have in your mind, and whether the narrative in your mind, whether you are a character in this narrative in your mind, and whether you, like in a, we call it a narrative, so it's a kind of, let's say it's like a story, are aware of whether you are a character that is a victim of these events, of these people.

And that is actually a hidden way for the ego to thrive in you, is by creating, by using certain painful life experiences, especially from childhood, can even be after childhood, using them so that you form a victim identity around these events. So you, there are the perpetrators, and you are the victim. I'm not denying that bad things and terrible things happen to people, and terrible things perhaps happen to you.

The question is whether by reviving continuously these past events in your mind, you are creating, or ask yourself, am I creating an identity for myself that is mind made, a conceptual identity in which I am the victim? And that is a very seductive thing. The ego, as you may remember or know, the ego looks for superiority in whatever way it can.

It needs to be superior to somebody or others to enhance its sense of self, its fictitious sense of self. It's a mind made, it's a conceptual sense of self. And if you cannot be the great one who achieves great successes, or has more things than others, can do more things than others, looks better than others, is stronger than others, these are ego identities too, conceptual identities.

But many people don't have anything, they don't have much more than others, they are not better looking than others, they don't know more than others, can't do more than others, so where does the ego go if you don't have anything? So in the case of trauma, but not only in the case of past trauma, even in many other cases, the ego seeks itself, it seeks to continuously replenish itself by building up a victim identity for yourself. I'm not denying that bad things happen to you, but are you creating, this is a very, very thing you need to be very much aware of, are you creating an identity, which is ultimately a fictitious identity, it's a conceptual identity, which is a narrative-based identity, are you creating a victim identity for yourself out of these events?

If you are, then that's the ego, and once you have established that, it's not easy to get out of it. I don't know whether that's the case with you, the questioner, you may have already gone beyond victim identity and just experienced the trauma as emotion that comes up periodically, or certain kinds of reactivity in certain situations that are based on the traumatic events. So you have to see for yourself whether it's primarily emotional, whether the trauma survives in you as the pain body or such as emotional suffering, or whether the trauma also abides in you through continuously dwelling on narratives in your mind, in which your victim identity is continuously strengthened by reviving the narratives in your mind.

You think about these events, you maybe even talk about them, think about them again, and you have to, these perpetrators then, you're also constructing an identity for them. Why do humans inflict suffering on others? And of course it is to do with the evolutionary stage of human development, because humans have inflicted an unbelievable amount of suffering on their fellow humans in people's personal lives, and collectively even more.

You go to a history book and see how many millions upon millions of humans have been, even in the 20th century, have been killed by other humans, not just in warfare between nations, even within nations. Governments killed their own people, millions of them. So it's an unbelievable amount, and this is to do with the unconsciousness in humanity.

They are, as Jesus is supposed to have said on the cross, forgive them for they know not what they do. Now what does that mean? It means that they know not what they do means they are completely unconscious.

They are in the mercy of the egoic sense of self. They are unconscious. Forgive them means recognize that they manifest this unconscious evolutionary stage of human development, but don't make an identity out of it for these people.

Don't say this is who they are. So neither this is not who they are, whoever has inflicted suffering on you, and the victim is not who you are. So that you get out of conceptual identities that are built around certain traumatic events, coming back to your question.

So we often, by the way, you also need to do that collectively, because it's very seductive to create a collective victim identity, so when you belong to a group, or you think mentally, you say, in this group, bad things have been done to this group, and of course, yes, humans have inflicted, certain groups of humans have inflicted suffering on other groups of humans, and we're not denying that it's to do with human unconsciousness.

But the fallacy is if we build up an identity around that, that is a conceptual identity in the mind, which is ego, that keeps you trapped in, ultimately, the state of unconsciousness yourself. So you recognize the perpetrators did what they did, because there was not enough consciousness there to do otherwise. Coming back to just a little example from my life, my father was drawn to when my parents were still married, and I was a child between the age of one and 11.

They were living together with me. My father was at intense anger in him. Later, I realized why, but we don't need to go into that.

It's to do with certain dramatic events in his childhood. So he could be triggered by a word, or somebody said something, and there was always stress when he was there, because it was like an unexploded bomb that you had living with you, could go off at any moment into intense anger. And later, I realized, how could I blame him for that?

He was at the mercy of that conditioning in himself. It was created by his own suffering. And the people who inflicted that suffering on him, they did it because they had their own traumatic events in their childhood.

It can go back generation and generations. So the unconsciousness is passed on in certain ways to children and their descendants, and so on. And so it was never his identity.

It was never who he was. He couldn't help it. He was at the mercy of that conditioning.

And so once you recognize that, then you no longer construct an identity for these perpetrators. You see what they did. Forgiveness means you recognize that it happened as a result of human unconsciousness.

It doesn't necessarily mean that you may want to even spend time with them. Forgiveness doesn't mean that, necessarily. And you may want to continue not to have contact with them anymore.

That's possible too, but there's no longer an internal narrative around it that strengthens your own sense of identity. So getting rid of the victim identity is very important as an important step in overcoming the remnants of past trauma. So you recognize it.

Then you see the narrative in your mind, it's simply you rephrase the narrative as you were the victim of human unconsciousness. As we all are, to a greater or lesser degree, you were the victim of human unconsciousness, but it was part of the evolutionary process of humanity. But the strange thing is, humans do not evolve except through suffering, challenges.

That you ask this question, the questioner, and you are here asking this question because of what happened to you. So you are awakening spiritually, because you need to overcome the trauma. If there was no trauma that you needed to overcome, you wouldn't be here.

You would be, I don't know, you would be sitting somewhere drinking a beer and watching television. There's what else to do. So these things are very helpful.

Be grateful that that's there. Be careful with the narrative in your mind so that the mental processes no longer create a perpetrator identity or a victim identity. And so then that becomes, once you're no longer at the mercy of the thought processes, then all you're left with is emotion that comes up from time to time.

And the emotion no longer controls your thinking. That's the important step in overcoming trauma, pain body. If the emotion, you're no longer doing the emotional thinking that's connected to that past event.

So when the pain body arises, you're able to observe it directly, to be aware of it directly. It no longer rises up into your mind and reactivates the narrative in your mind about what they did to me, what they or he or she did to me, the dreadful, or maybe it was God, what God did to me, or how unfairly life treated me, all that. But when the emotion rises up into your mind, it reactivates this old narrative.

And that, as you become more present, the emotion will remain for a while. But the link between the emotion and your thought processes gets severed. And that's the most important step, because if you do not sever or cut the link between the emotion and your thought processes, if that doesn't happen, then there's a vicious circle, because your thought processes that continuously revive the traumatic event, feed the emotion periodically, which is the pain body.

The thought processes feed the emotion, then the emotion rises back into your mind and feeds your thinking. And that is a vicious circle in which some humans are trapped until they die. And so cutting the link between your thought processes and the emotion is vital, because it can only happen through presence.

So that your thought processes and your thinking then no longer produces suffering. Your thinking is no longer ego-based. Of course, you remember the event, but it no longer has an ego around it.

And what you're left with then is the emotion that will come up from time to time, and may still from time to create certain reactions, but if you say not enough presence yet. And as presence grows, through the practice of awareness in everyday life, not just when you're being challenged, but in everyday life, practice as much as possible to be present. We've spoken about that, be present whenever you can.

And as presence grows in you, the pain body begins to become transmuted. Whether it becomes totally transmuted in your lifetime, we don't know. But ultimately, it doesn't matter, because you're no longer at the mercy of it.

It is no longer your identity. Your identity is no longer determined by the traumatic event. And that's an enormous liberation.

Because if your essential identity, if you believe that that identity is, to a large extent, created by the traumatic event, then you're trapped in ego, and you're trapped in unconsciousness, and you're trapped in resentment, and you're trapped in suffering. So that's so important. So the, your identity is, is no longer derived from thought processes.

Your identity comes from a deeper place, the place of presence, you are the presence. And that's, that's liberation, you're not, your identity is no longer determined by what is derived from the trauma. And that is how gradually the trauma diminishes.

As long as you're identified, as long as it determines who you feel or think you are, you cannot become free. It could go on for, if you live for hundreds of years, go on for hundreds of years, and you probably pass on that particular conditioning even to others. So this is the, I've just explained the, the process, it's, it's terribly important.

And the time will come if it is not already now, where you become grateful for the trauma, because it, it forced you into awakening. And that is the, that's the grace that's hiding behind every seemingly negative event. It's always there.

[Speaker 3] (20:55 - 21:04)

Good evening, Eckhart. First of all, namaste and thank you for the profound change you and Kim have brought to my life.

[Speaker 1] (21:05 - 21:05)

Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (21:06 - 22:03)

My question is related to the inner body meditation. So I've been practicing it regularly in these past few weeks. And you've mentioned before that the success criterion is the sense of joy.

During this meditation practices, I think I've experienced moments of emptiness in the best sense of the work, like, you know, moments where I feel at deep peace where, you know, there are no emotions or thoughts whatsoever. But there's no joy either. I mean, it's like pure emptiness.

So I'm just wondering if there's any other success criterion other than the sense of joy? Or is this just another different type of joy you are referring to? In other words, am I doing this correctly?

That's my question.

[Speaker 1] (22:03 - 29:15)

Yeah, well, that's a good question. Yeah. It's probably best not to look for joy, but just to be to be present.

But if possible, intensify your the sensing of presence a bit more so that the presence to be present is both active and a passive thing. The passive thing is because when you totally accept, for example, when you totally accept this moment as it is, the portal into presence opens up to complete because you're completely okay with this moment as it is. So complete acceptance of this moment is the portal into presence, one of the portals into presence, complete acceptance of what is this moment.

And that's one could say is the passive, or one could almost say the yin aspect of presence. It's that the same like the images of Mary, this female, except the hands are stretched out, it receives whatever is there, it allows whatever is there, or kwan yin, or whatever it may be, that's presence. There's another, the other aspect of presence is active, and it's more yang.

And there's an intensity behind it, the two kind of come together. So when you accept this moment as it is, you might think, accepting kind of as, oh, I accept this. But there's also there needs to be at the same time, an intensity of presence.

And with that intensity, you sense more acutely what presence is. There's no stress behind it. But there's a, there's a high degree of alertness behind.

But in that alertness, you're not really looking for anything, not even for joy. Because you're looking for something, then there's very reason why you can't find it. So the, there's an intensity of presence, and all you feel is that intensity of presence.

And it's sometimes compared to the sword of presence, the sword, the sword of presence cuts through time. And then in the presence, you don't look for joy. Because if the more aware you become of the presence, and that's already a wrong way of putting it, because we're using language, we're creating subject and object.

When I say you become aware of presence, it's not really the case. Because you and presence are the same, you essentially are presence. So you become aware of yourself, but you still have a subject and object.

There's a self-awareness that self and that is, you become more deeply aware of yourself, there's a self-awareness in you. And then you reach a point where that self-awareness is very, very alive. You may not call it joy.

You may have certain ideas associated with joy that don't actually fit here. But there's an intense feeling of aliveness. And this is the light, you are the light of the world, Jesus said, you are the light of the world.

But you have to know that it's not enough to say, okay, I believe you. That's not it. He said it because he wanted you to know it directly.

And when you know this, this light, that is the essence of who you are, which is awareness, we could call that joy, but that may not even be the right word for it. There is an intense aliveness, it's lovely, it's wonderful to be, to know yourself at this deepest level. It's so alive.

Maybe forget about the word joy because it might have associations that don't fit here. It could be, some people call it, there's some spiritual teachers who use the term happiness. I don't really use happiness to describe it because happiness belongs to the world of gain and loss.

When you get happy, oh, I'm so happy. It's not that kind of thing. But because the words are limited, sometimes certain spiritual teachers say your true nature is happiness, some teachers have said, some Indian teachers, some others.

Your true nature is happiness. Again, I know exactly what they mean and they're right, but it can be misleading because what is usually called happiness is something very superficial compared to what we are talking about here. So let's forget about joy and just sense the intense aliveness that is the essence of who you are.

That's enough. Whatever you want to call it is fine. You don't need to call it anything.

That would probably be best. In order to take you there, the words, as you know, the words I use are pointers. They're just signposts.

Some pointers work better than other pointers for certain people. And that is why I use a variety of pointers. Because some work for one person, but not for another person.

So I use other pointers because they might work better for other people. So joy is not a pointer that works for you. Forget about it.

Intense aliveness. Just that's all. And then it deepens.

And whatever it becomes, then who knows, maybe some, you'll find some other word if you wanted to talk about it, to describe it. So that's really what it is. But don't, don't look for any experience or anything like that.

Because the thing that the, when you're, what you're looking for is where you're looking from. What you're looking for is where that's, I believe St. Francis even said that. What you're looking for is where you're looking from.

So if you're looking for joy, then eventually you have to forget about joy and just be aware of the, what does it mean I'm looking for? It's an intensity of consciousness. So it's like having a flashlight and the flashlight is looking for itself.

Where am I? And at some point the flashlight becomes aware, oh, I'm actually what I was looking for. I am the light.

I was looking for the light there. That's how it is. It's very hard to talk about these things.

Thank you. I really appreciate it.

[Speaker 4] (29:16 - 29:37)

Eckhart, I'm going to sneak one final question in here to end our session this evening. Why is consciousness interested in becoming conscious of itself? What's the problem with remaining unconscious of itself?

What does consciousness gain by becoming conscious of itself?

[Speaker 1] (29:37 - 32:20)

No, because you and the universe are not two separate things. You are an essential part of the universe. When you ask these big questions, it's often more helpful to rephrase the question.

And we are more likely to find the answer within yourself. If you rephrase the question, and then it's no longer abstract. So your first question is, why is consciousness interested in becoming conscious of yourself?

Rephrase the question and ask yourself, why am I interested in becoming conscious? Why am I interested in becoming conscious? And I'm sure there's a reason why you are here.

There's a reason why you asked that question. And when you look into why am I interested in becoming conscious, you will find an answer why you want to become more conscious. And the next question is, what is the problem with consciousness remaining unconscious of itself?

Rephrase the question. What is the problem with me remaining unconscious? Ask yourself the question, what's wrong with me if I just remain unconscious?

You will find a very good answer why you don't want to remain unconscious. For one, you don't want to suffer anymore. You don't want to inhabit a nightmare anymore.

And there are many other answers that will come to you if you ask, why? What is the problem with me remaining unconscious? You will know all very well what the problem is with you remaining unconscious.

What does gain by becoming conscious of itself? What do I gain by awakening? What do I gain becoming more conscious?

And again, this question you can answer for yourself. But then at the same time, you will have found the answer to this bigger question that you asked about universal consciousness itself. So with this, because you are a microcosm of the totality of the whole, and all the important things that you need to know, through intensifying self observation, the answers are all in you.

And I've just shown you how easily you can actually find them. And then the questions are no longer abstract, because the way you ask them, they're abstract. You can think about it, no, this is very concrete.

This all concerns you, because you are consciousness, wanting to awaken, and your life will show you why. And there's the answer.

[Speaker 2] (32:21 - 32:42)

Eckhart Tolle Inner Peace [ff563ac7-e1c9-434e-a436-ad6c012cef69]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:33)

Inner peace. In this podcast, Eckhart elaborates on the path toward inner peace. He shares how we can align ourselves with what he calls the is-ness of the present moment and unburden ourselves from unnecessary thinking.

Eckhart says we are here primarily to awaken to who we are beyond our three-dimensional form. That is the only way to lead a truly satisfying life and to reach what Eckhart describes as timeless consciousness.

[Speaker 1] (0:36 - 46:29)

The good news is, according to the weather forecast, the sun is going to come out shortly before sunset. And the other good news is it doesn't really matter what the weather is like out there. Being independent of external conditions, not reactive to external conditions, accepting of external conditions because they already are the is-ness of things here and now, that's the quickest way to inner peace, is to align yourself with the is-ness of what is, even if you think it requires some action to do something about it.

But in the meantime, it is. Then you can do something. Not about the weather, probably.

You can try through focused power of consciousness. Not impossible, but unnecessary. And that's also a quick way to not being burdened by unnecessary thinking to align yourself with the is-ness.

And then there isn't that much to think about unless it's a constructive thing. The problem needs to be solved, a so-called problem. We are primarily here to deepen our realization of who we are beyond form.

Both the Buddha and Jesus talked about an inner dimension that is formless, that you need to realize in order to become free of complete dependency on the forms that your life takes. The Buddha talked about what's traditionally translated as emptiness, as the essential condition, the essential you. Better translation would have been, now we have got emptiness in all the scriptures that's been translated, but spaciousness or formlessness would have been a better translation.

Jesus talks about the sky that's within you. That's another word for heaven. The kingdom of the sky translated into more modern terminology, the dimension of spaciousness.

The kingdom of heaven is the old translation. This is hard to relate to nowadays, kingdom of heaven. If he had been speaking today, he would have said the dimension of spaciousness.

Because when you look up at the sky, you see spaciousness, especially when it's not cloudy. The clouds kind of represent the thoughts in your consciousness. And the sky is the vast expanse without which there wouldn't be any room for the clouds.

There couldn't be any clouds. So the empty sky is spacious. Now, an interesting thing about the sky is, although we have a word for it, it doesn't actually exist in the world of forms, because if you ever traveled upwards and wanted to encounter the sky, you would never find it because there's no such thing as the sky, really.

So you can't say, oh, here's the sky. I'm touching it now. Or you can't even say I'm in the sky.

Where? It's just a way of perceiving the spaciousness. We call it sky.

And the color blue appears because of the juxtaposition of the sunlight and the blackness of space behind it in some strange way. But the main thing is there isn't a thing that's the sky. So very cleverly, Jesus used that because he was trying to point to something that is very hard to point to using concepts and words.

So he chose the most suitable pointer in the language, in words, that he could find. And the most suitable one that he could find to point to this inner dimension that is in every human being, but ignored and unknown to most humans. So to point to it, he chose sky because he realized just like that inner dimension of spaciousness, you can never actually pinpoint it and say, I've got it.

I have got it. There would already be a duality of it, the spaciousness, and I. But the spaciousness is the essence of I.

There's no duality there. You can never say, here it is. And this is another thing that he actually said.

Some things that you read in the New Testament, I can feel very strongly, he actually almost literally said that. Then there are other things that were distorted when they just started writing it down. And then there are other things that he never said, but somebody said it might be a good idea if he had said that.

So the kingdom of heaven, you can never say in a free translation, he said, oh, it's over there. Or, oh, it's over there. Look, here it is.

You can never say that because it is within you. In the same way, consciousness, which is what we are talking about, consciousness is the formless consciousness. That's the essence of who you are.

It cannot become an object of knowledge like everything else can, where you have, you are the perceiving or the acting subject. I see the chair. I realize consciousness.

You can't really say that because consciousness is the primordial subject of all experience. It cannot be an object in your experience. That's an interesting thing.

So in the form identified consciousness, you become an object to yourself. In ego, you have a relationship with yourself. And when you realize the essence of who you are, you realize yourself as consciousness, which is not an object.

It's the I, the most fundamental subject of all experience. So let's, an example. Some people say I'm looking for myself.

I'm looking for my real self. I'm looking for something more real than what I know about myself. There must be a deeper dimension and I'm looking for it.

Other people might say they're looking for God or for realization of God, looking for something. And when you become aware of that in you, that's looking without having found any answer, without having found anything, and you're still looking for that thing, God, your true self. Where is it?

I haven't found it. And then the mind stops. And then you realize all the consciousness behind the looking is what you were looking for.

But the consciousness became thought. And then you believe that there's something external to look for. So this is very hard to put into words.

But when the mind stops, what's left is just the spaciousness of consciousness. And that is the substratum, to use a geological term, of everything, of all experience. And that is the most liberating thing.

The only truly liberating thing is to realize, in essence, you are formless consciousness. And then the seeking stops. You no longer need to look for your true self or God, because you realize that is the essence.

You might say, do you then realize that you are God? I wouldn't put it like that. It's a little bit like you realize that you are, let's use an analogy, you are a ray of sunlight.

And as this ray of sunlight, you've always been looking out here. So you are the little ray of sunlight, thinking you're an independent entity with other rays of sunlight, everywhere around you, and they're all looking for things. And then the ray of sunlight that considers itself to be an independent entity, autonomous, having certain relationships with other rays of sunlight, and even with itself, to me, becomes still for a moment, and then realizes there is a depth to who I am that goes all the way back to the sun.

But they can only realize that when you stop thinking. Then you become aware, the ray of sunlight, you become aware of your own depth. There's no end to you.

There isn't this finite little thing. As the minds, the thinking mind stops, there is a suddenly a depth. And in that you realize that you are not a disconnected fragment that has been thrown into this universe by some malignant deity that enjoys your suffering.

No, but that you are an essential part of the universe. You haven't been thrown into the universe. You have come out of the universe.

And so in this analogy, you have come out of the sun. And as the mind stops, and then you can actually sense how far you go back, but there's no distance. You are actually never, never separate from the sun.

The ray of sunlight realizes suddenly that it is still actually part of the sun. Nor we can say where the sun actually finishes. It doesn't have a boundary.

So the light that reaches us from the sun, one could say, is still part of the sun. We are all within this vast energy field of the sun. This is an analogy.

Sun is the closest you can get in the sense perceived universe to the source of all life, because in the sense perceived universe here, the sun is the source of all life. The very heat in your body comes actually from the sun. All the energy we use is stored up energy from the sun.

One day we will find a way of using sun energy in a much more intelligent way than fossil fuels and so on, but that's another matter. The ray of sunlight realizes that it's still connected to this vastness, to the source. And that's the self-realization of the ray of sunlight, that it was never separate and could not even exist as a separate entity.

It's totally impossible. And then the ray of sunlight actually becomes a much more peaceful and relaxed being while it's still there. I'm talking about you, of course, because you've realized without any needing to convince yourself of anything or take up some new belief.

No, through actual direct realization, you realize your connectedness with something very deep. So you're not just a little person. You're also the kingdom of heaven, or as the Buddha called it, spaciousness, sunyata.

So there's two of you, and this is not an ultimate truth. Ultimately there's only one, but temporarily it sometimes helps to have a certain perspective on things. There's two of you, that which expresses itself in form, the physical body and all the stuff that's in your mind and in your emotional field, that all that makes up the person, that has a limited lifespan.

Even if there's a continuation of that after the body dissolves, it has a limited lifespan because no form is permanent. So all forms are continuously changing. I would be dreadful if you survived as this personality that you are now.

I mean, who would want to be the same personality for centuries and millennia? There's an evolution of consciousness. So the body is short-lived, that which is beyond the body may continue for a while as it continues on its journey of self-realization.

But you are that which is the form identity, and more essentially you are that essence identity, the two. And all the great spiritual teachings, all they do is point to the possibility for you to realize that there's more to you than meets the eye, to use an expression. What meets the eye is first when you see another human being, or you look in the mirror, or you look down yourself, what meets the eye is first the physical body.

Then what meets the eye, metaphorically speaking, when you meet another human being is their personality, how they act, what they say, how they behave. That's already unseen, but it manifests in the scene, so it meets the eye. That's all the form of the person and your own form.

And all spiritual teachings really come down to somebody trying to show you that there is another dimension to who you are, and whether they call it the kingdom of heaven that's within you, or the emptiness that's the essence of who you are. Or in other teachings, the true self. In India, they talk about the true self or the self, it's sometimes called.

And then people who haven't had any, not even a glimpse of a realization, they may be religious scholars, they say that Hinduism, the Hindu talk of a true self or the great self, and the Buddhist teachings of no self is totally opposite. They don't realize that they're talking about the same thing from a different perspective. When Buddha talks about the unreality of the self, he's talking about the unreality of your form identity, the dreamlike nature of your form identity.

And in order to get you to realize your essence identity, he talked about inner spaciousness. And what is meditation all about that he taught is to help you stop the mind, not as an active thing, but as a relinquishing. And then there's the spaciousness.

And then you know who you are without having added any concept in your mind to who you are. When we think of knowing who you are, we think you must know more about you, but that's not that knowing. If you want to know more about you, then you'd have to perhaps go to psychoanalysis, and then you can delve deeply into your form identity.

Many things will come up, but eventually you'd have to go deeper beyond that in order to be free of complete identification with form. So let me just remind you that the essential practice is to relinquish thinking, not by falling below thinking, but by rising above thinking. Some of you are already advanced enough presence, there's enough presence power in you that you can actually by choice say there's nothing to think about and I won't think for a while now.

And then you can even do things in that state of complete inner alert stillness, prepare a cup of tea. And every moment happens against a background of alert stillness. Walk from point A to point B, and every step happens against this background of alert stillness.

Look around you, whatever it may be, in a room or outside, perceive everything with your senses. And all the sense perceptions happen against this background of alert stillness without any mental commentary. And you know what you're looking at without imposing any mental label on it.

When you look at a tree, you don't impose the label tree on it, but you know that you're looking at a manifestation of life. The moment you put a label on it, we, of course, we need labels on a certain level, but we also need not to be trapped in the labels that we have given things. We need to be able to use the mental labels when they are needed, but to be entirely trapped in the mental labels that we've given to everything, that's a dreadful limitation.

Everything is absolutely mysterious. Everything is miraculous and mysterious. And when you put a label on it, a mental label, you think you know what it is, but you don't.

It's just a mental label. So to really get to the inner realization of a tree, for example, you have to let go of the labels. And then you can sense there's more to the tree than when you utter the word tree than you think you know.

But there's a depth to that. It's an alive being also. And I'm using just tree as an example.

So to be able to, this is the practice, inviting presence, thoughtless awareness into your life as much as possible and see how much more enjoyable things become, how you notice things around you that before were meaningless. You didn't ever look at them. You notice beauty in many places that would be called ordinary, not just beauty in things that are absolutely stand out, but beauty in seemingly unremarkable things and aliveness in seemingly inanimate things.

And that comes when you perceive the world against this background of alert inner stillness. In those times, the personality recedes. Occasionally, certain thoughts may come, and then they go away again, and then the spaciousness is back.

So you will be amazed how, as you become more familiar with that state of alert stillness, how that changes how you experience life. So you no longer experience life only as that old person that you've been stuck with since you were born. You honor that because that's your form identity.

And that person can also improve. It can learn things. It can improve in many ways.

It can play in the world of form. But then the wonderful thing is the formless self or no self and who you are as a person do not remain separate. There isn't that there are times when you are completely in the formless, still and alert.

And then there are other times when you're involved in thinking, there's a possibility of bringing the two together. And that happens kind of naturally after a while, as you invite the alert stillness into your life more often, then you'll notice that even when you think, you continue to be aware of the tiniest gaps in between your thoughts, like now, and then I speak again, and then there's another little gap. And in that you're aware of the gaps between thoughts, and you're aware, so to speak, also of a background to all thinking, that's the alert stillness is still there.

And then you could engage in a discussion with someone without losing yourself in this dream of thinking, of mind, and without identifying with any mental position, which is seeking your identity to reinforce, to strengthen your identity by defending your mental position about something. You don't need it anymore because you realize no mental position is your true identity. You can still have mental positions, but without the self in them.

So there's no longer a sense of me or self in your mental, you can, why not keep your opinions, everybody has certain perspective on things, you have a certain perspective on whatever, politics, philosophy, spirituality, that's fine. You're not looking for an identity anymore in being right about something. It's still put forward your viewpoint because you are in touch with a more essential identity, and that's the stillness behind your thinking and in between the thoughts.

So you can sense an alertness even while you speak in the background and in between. So the two dimensions come together. And so the way in which you use your mind changes.

In fact, you're now able to use your mind, you as a consciousness, the mind is connected, linking into that deeper dimension of no thought, which is primordial intelligence. It's where all creative insight comes from. And then your mind becomes a much more helpful tool, and it can create, it can manifest things.

But what it manifests comes from the consciousness, rather than a little person that thinks, I need to manifest this or that in order to be happy. And of course, once you have manifested it, you're happy for a little while, and then you're unhappy again, needing something else to manifest. And now I need this.

Okay, I've got the house now. Now I need the relationship. And then I need that.

And then I need to be recognized by people. There's no end to it. And the more you have achieved on the level of form, the more you realize that that's not it.

So the two dimensions of you, here we are primarily concerned with the formless dimension, because that's what spirituality is about. There are many other things where you can go to workshops to learn how to improve your form identity, how to strengthen that. You can do it.

Yeah, yeah. That's fine too. That has its place also.

You could go to that kind of workshop, as long as you are in touch with something deeper, you can try it. So there is a place for manifesting on the level of form, because the universe is manifesting continuously on the level of form. So if we realize that we can manifest things on the level of form, that's a wonderful realization through the power of thinking.

The question is, do you know yourself only as form? Or do you know yourself also as the formless? If you know yourself also as the formless consciousness, then actually what happens is the formless consciousness inspires you to manifest certain things, not the ego anymore.

The ego says, I need this to be happy. And then I need that to be happy. And then I need to get rid of that to be happy.

But that primordial intelligence, if you are in touch with that as your essence, that can inspire you, your mind, to manifest what it wants to manifest, because the universe delights in manifestation. As you can see, when you look at the life forms on this planet alone, in the sea, I don't know how many, maybe a million different life forms in the sea alone and on land and in the seen and the unseen, the universe must delight in creation and exploring. And every life form is an expression of the one consciousness exploring the universe that it created in different ways.

A fly that's flying around here is another expression of the one consciousness and really is another universe. The fly doesn't experience the universe that we experience. It's in the same place, but it experienced something different as the one consciousness, all these temporary forms.

And that's the Leela, the divine play of forms, what in India is called the Leela, the divine play. And we can participate in that divine play, become co-creators. And that is part of our destiny, that a point will come when human consciousness will be able to manifest forms very easily.

So there is the creation of the universe. I call it the outgoing movement of the universe into manifestation. And then there is the ingoing movement of the universe.

The universe also wants to know itself, its own essence. And it does that through you and through me. How do I know all this?

I know this because I have observed the two movements within myself. I am a microcosm of the macrocosm. You can discover all the secrets of the universe by looking into yourself.

So I can find within myself, sometimes the desire to create and to manifest. And then there comes a seemingly contradictory desire to return to the source, to become still. You don't need anything anymore.

You just are totally, totally at peace in that beautiful stillness. That's your return. The universe realizes itself as the underlying formless consciousness.

When you realize the underlying formless consciousness, that is the essence of who you are, it's not really you realizing it because you are only the universe appearing temporarily as this particular person, but it's only a temporary appearance. So when you realize your own essence as consciousness, that's the universe is realizing its own essence as consciousness because you are the universe, an essential part of the universe. So there is no personal realization, really.

There's universal realization. It's a miraculous thing. So the universe wants seemingly contradictory things.

There's a cycle. It seems perhaps scientists have had some glimpse of the truth when they say the universe expands and then at some point it starts to contract again. And then at some point it disappears into the nothingness out of which it all came.

It's like the heartbeat or the in-breath and the out-breath. The universe goes into multiplicity, creation, billions and billions, count trillions of life forms. There's a cycle for humans too, when they go out and then comes the cycle of returning home to the source.

But if you hadn't gone out, you wouldn't realize your own source. So they depend on each other, creation and the outgoing movement and the return movement. And you can find that in your own life.

It may well be that we are drawn to the return movement of self-realization as consciousness because the universe is beginning to go in that direction after billions of years of creation. And then comes a period, and this would be a miraculous period on this planet, on many other planets, when humans as expressions of the one consciousness are in connection with a source while they are engaged in creation rather than, as it happens until very recently, losing yourself in your creations, losing yourself in the mind, losing touch with the source of who you are, and losing yourself in stuff out there, your mind primarily, and thinking everything else is out, all the answers are out there, and this is who you're fighting out there against this and that. And this is a dream, the dream of consciousness, the dream of the universe.

And the universe wanted to experience, in order to really experience the dream, you need to believe that it's absolutely real. So it needs to go out there and lose itself in every life form. Then to some extent, the humans mostly see themselves as totally separate against all the others.

It's part of the dream. And then the dream gradually comes to an end, and then the awakening begins. And in the middle of the dream, you start to realize something, oh, the source, and you become still, and then awareness arises.

And that spiritual awakening for the human being, and it's a spiritual awakening of the universe. Your spiritual awakening is the spiritual awakening of the universe. And then the awareness comes, and then you begin to live with awareness rather than losing yourself in every mind form, in every perception, in every drama.

Lucid living, it's a bit like we all know about lucid dreaming, which happens when in the middle of a dream at night, you suddenly know, oh, this is a dream. This is quite an interesting realization. But here we have, as the awareness arises, which we call spiritual awakening, you can have lucid living, which means you're still participate in this ultimate dream of form, the dream of life.

And yet you're aware of your own essence as the timeless space without which there couldn't be any dream. It's the very condition for any dream even to exist. That's lucid living when you're not drawn totally anymore into all the creations of your mind, you're able to play with it.

And that would bring when more humans are able to live in that way, then we can engage in joyful creation of things, not the neediness. Joyful creation, enjoy the beauty and multiplicity of the universe and of our own creations without self-seeking, which is of the ego. So we no longer create in the service of the ego, but as expressions of the one consciousness delighting in conscious creation.

And that's already part of the return journey. I'm saying this just to point to the fact that the change in consciousness that's happening in you is a universal movement. It's not just a personal thing.

It would not happen if it were not part of a larger movement, universal movement of awakening. So there are probably countless life forms awakening elsewhere in our galaxy and many other galaxies. And some probably started to awaken a long time ago who would now look at us as, oh, these poor little things, they're only just beginning.

That's okay. Now, not each one of you, not every one of you is able to yet step into no thought without some kind of help. Meditation is designed to help you with that.

But as you probably know, the main thing I recommend is to have some attention in the inner energy field of your body. And that keeps thought at bay in a gentle, non-violent way, not willpower. It involves no willpower.

So it involves just a decision that right now you would prefer to be alert and still and not be thinking. And that decision you could arrive at because you've realized that, let's say for the past hour, you've been engaged in futile, useless thinking that all it did was make you unhappy. And suddenly the awareness is there again that had been temporarily lost.

And you say, what's all this futile thinking about? It's just making me unhappy. It has no point whatsoever.

And then a decision comes to not to think because you realize there is another dimension in you that is deeper than thinking. So you, okay, I'd rather be there than up there in the mind. And how can I get there?

Because the mind will have its momentum. Your presence power, so to speak, is already quite developed. You may find it very hard to stop the momentum once it started, to stop the momentum of thinking.

There's an enormous pull, a gravitational pull behind it. And for some, if presence power is not yet that developed, you can say, I need to stop thinking, but I can't because it goes on and on. And I can't stop it.

It's like a river. You can't get out of this raging river. It drags you along, especially when you're stuck in a train of negative thinking or fearful thinking or angry thinking.

You don't even want to get out because you're so identified with a stream of thinking that your sense of self is in it. And you don't want to lose that sense of self. It's a fictitious sense of self, but it's a sense of self.

And so you don't want to stop your train of angry thinking. You want more angry thinking. And if possible, you're looking for more feedback from others to reinforce your angry thinking.

I need another argument. And after you've walked back out of the room, after a one-hour argument, you walk back into the room because you haven't had enough. You need to talk to that person again.

Oh, one more thing I want to tell you. And even when that person is no longer there, you're still thinking, and then you need to pick up the phone and tell your friends about it. And then you repeat the whole argument that you just had and how right you are and how wrong the other person was.

And then when you hang up the phone, it still goes on in your head. And at that moment, to tell somebody you need to stop thinking would be futile. The person doesn't even want to stop thinking because that person is the thinking.

Total identification with thought. So there needs to be a realization. Some awareness needs to be there.

It's totally pointless to talk to anybody about stopping thinking without having at least some access to awareness, maybe not in the moment of enormously empowered thinking, empowered not in a good way, but the awareness needs to bear that what's going on inside me right now. And then at some point, you might be able to realize what's happening to you. It's happening to you.

You didn't actually do it. It just happened to you because you're being possessed by your mind. And then at some point, you realize that there is a choice, perhaps not when you're in the middle of it.

At some point, a very strong mind stream subsides. You might get tired of it. And then it goes and then finally go, oops.

Oh, and then do I choose to carry on? Does it make me feel happy? No, it doesn't.

I thought it did because I felt so good to be angry about that, but it's not, doesn't make you feel, the body doesn't really feel, if you asked your body, it would tell you this feels horrible. But of course, if you're not in touch with your body, you're only up here, you don't even know that. And then at some moment, the choice comes in.

At other moments, the choice may come much more quickly because it's just the usual stream of futile, in the middle of the night, you wake up, the usual stream of futile thinking. And then awareness comes in, there's a choice. And then a decision comes.

And that decision is just no willpower. It's just a decision. I'd rather be still than not be thinking.

And once you know that, then you can take your attention into the inner energy field of the body. That's your choice. Instead of giving more attention to your thinking, you just take your attention into the inner energy field of the body.

And suddenly you feel the aliveness that pervades the entire body. So you have taken consciousness away from the mind and put it in here. And you can't think that much anymore.

You can't feel the body and be engaged in a lot of thinking. And if you really fully experience the aliveness in the inner body, the mind stops. And so that becomes an anchor for awareness, an anchor for presence.

Even if you cannot feel the entire body, it would be enough to just go into your hands with your attention. Just take consciousness into your hands and feel the aliveness in your hands. That alone can take attention away from useless thinking.

And can you continue to feel? Because that is part of experiencing the present moment, which actually feels quite good. It feels good to be alive.

That's an amazing realization. So inner body, or even just a part of the body, the totality of the body is best if you can. It's not that difficult.

You start with one part, hands, and can I feel my feet also? Yeah, I can feel hands and feet. Can I feel my legs?

Yeah, a little bit less. And then the totality of, oh, okay, I got it. You might also notice that you're breathing then, which is the other way.

It can be combined with body awareness, but breathing is the other way of taking attention away from the mind. The most ancient meditation method is breath awareness, because breath awareness takes attention away from thinking, but keeps you alert. And breath happens all the time.

And breath is virtually formless. So it's easier to get in touch with a formless consciousness by placing attention on the formless breath. Other meditation objects are clearly defined in form.

You can have an object that you focus on. You can have a mental object that you focus on. You can have a mantra that you focus on.

Those can work too, but they are more clearly defined in form. Where's the breath? You can't say it is.

It's semi-formless or formless. So to place attention on that, which can also automatically bring you in touch with the body, the in-breath. It's so beautiful to have attention on your breath and the out-breath.

And immediately your mind becomes still. So you can either be thinking or can have your attention on your breathing, but you can't have both. The moment you think, you're not aware of your breath anymore.

And that also really applies to the inner body. To have full attention in the inner body, you can't be thinking. So those two things, which are really closely linked, breath awareness, you can make it into a meditation.

So you can sit in meditation and then you can observe the ingoing and outgoing breaths. You can also observe the gaps between the ingoing and outgoing breaths. You breathe out, brief gap of nothingness.

And then you start breathing in again, a brief gap of neither in nor out. And the cycle continues. I read somewhere that the Buddha said, if you're aware of your breath for one hour, I don't know if they even had hours at the time, but if you're aware of your breath for one hour, you'll be completely enlightened.

But if you lose it, you have to start from the beginning again. Just one thought coming in, okay, start all over. Okay, I can see one or two of you saying, I'm going to do that.

Let's take a moment of stillness. A few more minutes of stillness. If you are still thinking, remember, put your attention on your breath, or the inner body or both.

Eckhart Tolle Inner Spaciousness [b0ace2a7-63c6-4138-b296-ad8f013feae4]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:31)

Inner spaciousness. In this episode, Eckhart talks to a live audience about bringing meditation practice, or what Eckhart calls presence, into our everyday lives. However, he cautions against making meditation one more chore on our to-do list.

He says, so often there is the underlying assumption that we must become good at meditation or succeed at it. That in itself can actually become a hindrance. The idea is not to do meditation, but to be.

[Speaker 1] (0:33 - 47:54)

Many of you probably have a meditation practice. As you know, I don't usually talk about formal meditation, but it's wonderful if people have a formal meditation and practice it. This is more about bringing the so-called meditative state into your normal life.

Presence. Meditation is an attempt to become present. Sometimes it works and sometimes it remains an attempt for years.

And you can become a good meditator by sitting for an hour every day and all you're still doing is attempting to become present. Meditation can be helpful. It can also become an obstacle to being present.

Because almost inevitably, when you meditate, you have this underlying assumption that you are doing something. You're doing a meditation. And in that doing the meditation, you're trying to get somewhere.

For example, trying to become still. And so trying to become still is having projection of a future place that you want to get to. And there's an underlying sense that you are doing something.

You could even put it in your schedule. You can say such a time you're meeting someone meeting, committee meeting at 11, meditation at 12. And so there's just another doing.

Whereas the true meditation involves no doing, but simply the essence of it is the realization of being. So you can relinquish all doing when you have a meditation technique, which may be helpful, but if it's not used rightly, it becomes part of your doing. And then it can actually stop you from the realization of being which is already here.

Now, nothing needs to be added to you to realize that you are now to realize your own being. So often when you meditate, the underlying assumption is that something needs to be added need to become good at it, you need to succeed at it. And that in itself becomes a hindrance.

So in Zen, very often, they don't give you any technique, they just go now sit here and you won't get up again for three hours. So and then you say, Well, what do I do? Just sit in Zen when you when they use the word sit, they usually mean meditate.

So when you arrive in a Zen monastery, they greet you and they might say, How long have you been sitting? Oh, I've been sitting for 15 years. And then when you sit in Zen, there may be other similar traditions, it's not comfortable, because it gets very painful for the body unless you're extremely flexible, which I'm not.

And most people are not. So if you sit for two or three or four hours or all night facing a wall, they love doing that. And then they open the windows, although it's freezing cold.

So they create very unpleasant conditions for your meditation. And not only that, the instructor or master may walk around and hit you when he sees that you're dropping or falling. And you suddenly feel with a little cane on your back.

And then you have to thank him. But they don't give you a technique as such as just watch, you might say what your breath but really even that often they just say, just watch what arises thoughts and emotions will arise. And the longer you sit, the more powerfully thoughts and emotions will arise and the thoughts and emotions will say, get me out of here.

How could I have been so mad to come here? And then you start thinking about what excuse could I give? I could pretend to be really sick suddenly.

So in other words, they create conditions that are designed one could say almost to produce suffering without actually injuring yourself. They don't go that far, but they are conditions designed to produce an enormous amount of suffering. And so you sit there facing your own suffering and an enormous amount of resistance.

And then if it works for you, at some point, you come to the realization that the unpleasant conditions, which include pain in the body, various parts of the body, your back, your legs, you're feeling cold and you're shivering. Maybe you hadn't had a satisfying meal in a long time. So there's some hunger, not extreme, but there's hunger, there's pain, there's cold, and there's nothing to look at, just a wall.

And so at some point you realize that the suffering is not produced by the conditions, which cannot be described as pleasant, but are as they are. But the real suffering is the resistance to the conditions, which happens on the level of thinking plus emotions that reflect the thoughts. So you become aware of yourself as the resisting entity and realize when you come to a point where you can't stand being there anymore, then either you leave or you break through to surrender and you suddenly let go of any thought about it, and then the emotion subsides too.

When you're no longer telling your body that this is terrible, then eventually the emotion that reflects the thought that this is a terrible place to be, then the emotion also subsides. And then all that's left is the conditions of that moment, which are pain in the body, pain in the neck or wherever else, and cold, some hunger, and there you are. And then it's possible to break through to a deeper level where suddenly, despite the conditions of that moment, you feel peace because your mind has stopped commenting in any way.

Your mind is not even trying. If your mind is saying, this is really good for you, you should be liking this, that doesn't really work. So your mind is not trying to go to the opposite from where it was first, where it said, this is awful.

Your mind simply surrenders completely. And so it doesn't say anything anymore. And this is to repeat something that can happen to a human being naturally by being faced with the challenges of life, which can pile up.

And your life situation, as I call it, which means all the circumstances of your life can become so unpleasant and painful that you can't stand the suffering anymore. And that is a wonderful point to reach, not being able to stand the suffering anymore, because at that point, you may realize not just conceptually, but deep to every fiber of your being, that the suffering comes from the resistance. The resistance happens on the level of the mind.

And so it happens to people naturally that when faced with unpleasant life situations, they suddenly can't stand it anymore. And something in them surrenders, which means the mind subsides. And without the mind creating thinking, all that's left is really the present moment.

And that's the awakening into the present moment, which is more likely to come when things are not going well than when everything is totally fine. So you may be at a point, most of you, where you don't need the suffering anymore to be pushed into surrender, because that's what life is trying to do. It gives you all these challenges, and eventually you have to surrender.

But there is another way, and perhaps you're here because you've already had enough suffering. You can voluntarily choose it even without having to be pushed into surrender through suffering. So you can choose to relinquish thought, for example, which otherwise a human being would always do.

And even then, only a minority would only do facing extreme conditions in their life. And here, some humans have reached the level of consciousness where they no longer need to be faced with extreme conditions. Although if you were, and if you are here because at some point in your life you were faced with extreme conditions, then obviously that's a wonderful thing, because that brought you here.

And now here you realize, for the further evolution of your consciousness and the emergence of presence through you, you don't need more suffering because you now voluntarily are able, and this is the evolutionary leap forward for humanity, when a human being can do that, can relinquish thought by choice and simply say, I'll be present now. And you can let go of resistance if you still notice resistance arising in certain conditions of your life. You can very quickly notice it.

Anytime you get upset about anything, that is actually quite helpful. Don't fall into the trap of thinking, why am I getting upset? I should be spiritual enough not to get upset about these things.

Why have I been going to all these classes and workshops? You know, the voice in the head, you can talk to yourself, but why do you still do that? And then the other you says, well, I'm trying, I've been trying.

And then the other one says, well, you're not trying hard enough. And then at some point you realize it's the voice in the head that this time has split itself in two, as I believe in one therapy, it's called the top dog and the underdog. And so you have a discussion with yourself.

One says, you, and the other one, yeah, I couldn't help it. But of course, it's all the, it's the voice in the head. And even having that inner dialogue with yourself is a form of suffering.

It's an inner conflict, and it's simply produced by the voice in the head, which sometimes seems to be two voices in the head, sometimes even three. And sometimes, of course, as you well know, sometimes the voice in the head is your mother's voice. Eat your vegetables.

But that would be relatively harmless, but it says many other things probably. But whatever voice it is, it's the voice. So you recognize when you get upset, you recognize the mechanism behind it.

It was resistance, mind, mental, emotional resistance to the present moment, you lost presence. And at that moment, when you notice upset, any kind of upset, that can be a little alarm bell and says, oh, you lost the present moment, you lost presence. And at that moment, you can have presence, it's here already.

So becoming upset is can be very helpful, if you know how to use it. If you don't know how to use it, then the upset is something that is unconscious and operates in you and makes you unconscious. But if you know how to use it, it's very helpful, can always bring you back into the present moment and acceptance of the present moment.

And it's amazing what things people get upset about. Many very unimportant things can create upset, you might have noticed. But at the moment of being upset, you don't know that these are unimportant.

They seem to be overwhelmingly important. The tiniest things can become overwhelmingly important. So what you are growing into is in any situation that you encounter, not to be exclusively focused on the situation, but to have some focus, some awareness at a deeper level.

And you might, as you know, when I say awareness at that deeper level, you are not aware of anything. On the outer level of your life, you're aware of whatever goes on. Usually in normal usage, when you use the word aware, you say aware of what?

You can't use the word aware without saying aware of what you sometimes read in newspapers and so on. Increasing awareness, but it's usually followed by about certain issues, increasing awareness about the environment, increasing awareness about climate change, increasing awareness about what we need to do in education. And all this is wonderful.

You're increasing awareness about all these things. So in all the various situations of your life, at any given moment, your awareness is aware of whatever goes on around you. Then that is not enough.

Awareness of what's going around you, you need to be aware of at a deeper level of the awareness itself. You need to be aware that you are aware, right at this moment, for example, you're aware of my voice, you're aware of this room, you're aware of whatever sense perceptions you can now register in your consciousness. But at the same time, this wonderful thing is possible.

That is you can be aware of awareness. In other words, you realize you are conscious that you are conscious. This is the one fact in your life that is beyond any doubt, because it is so obviously the case.

Right now, you are conscious. And even that may be a distortion that happens through language, because there is no real you apart from that consciousness. So if I express it verbally, and if I say you are conscious, or if I say I am conscious, which is language operates like that.

But even that is a slight distortion, because that implies that I and conscious are two things. But the essence of who I am, apart from consciousness, there is no me, there is no I, there would be nothing. Consciousness is who I am.

So it would be more accurate to say, I am consciousness, that is who you are. And to realize you are consciousness is at the same time a realization of this vast realm of inner stillness, because that consciousness is the unconditioned consciousness that is just vast spaciousness and great depths. I am consciousness.

After you say it, how do you know that you are conscious or you are consciousness? It's so obvious, you cannot possibly doubt it. This is the one fact about your life that you cannot doubt, because all the rest may be a dream.

There's no way of proving that us sitting in this room here now is a dream that you are having. There's no way of disproving that this is not a dream. And many philosophers have looked at ordinary human existence and described it as dream, dreamlike.

In many ways, it is a kind of dream, because what does a dream do? It appears, and then suddenly it's gone. And the situation too, it appears, and then next week it'll be gone.

And then you might wake up one morning and say, retreat, asiloma. Was that a dream or did that happen? So this may be a dream, but even if it is a dream, it still applies that you are conscious in that dream.

Right now, if you were not conscious, there would be no dream. Nobody could have a dream. The dream could not appear.

So it becomes irrelevant whether this is so-called reality or so-called dream. The actual reality is that you are conscious, whether it's a dream or reality. Consciousness is still required even for a dream to exist.

It needs to exist in the light of a consciousness. So you could well say, and this is getting closer to the truth, that everything that happens in the world, in your life or in the world at large, is the dream that the one consciousness is having, including yourself, including your person. That vast consciousness is infinite.

It can have dreams, dream that includes an infinite number of scenarios and entities and beings and life forms, all coming together and in this web of interconnectedness and appearing as the vast dream that appears as the entire universe and what happens in it. Consciousness dreaming and consciousness dreams so that all these things in the dream, which are part of the one consciousness, seem to have an independent existence. They don't realize that they are part of the dream of the one consciousness until they wake up.

And they wake up in the dream. And in the dream, the one consciousness wakes up after a few million years of dreaming, or billion years, and the one consciousness wakes up in the dream and says, I know who I am now. I am consciousness.

And then you look around and it's quite a nice dream. It's quite interesting. So when you realize that you are consciousness, the universe realizes itself through you.

After a few billion years of dreaming and creating this incredible multiplicity of life forms and the universe, which is dream-like, consciousness wakes up and becomes aware of itself. You could say God becomes aware of itself in this dimension. Words can only give you an approximation.

I cannot explain the universe in words. I mean, it would be absurd to even try. So whatever I say is like, it's a bit like this, or it's a bit like that's not it.

The words could not express it. I mean, I've said it before. When you speak, it's just a few sounds produced by the vocal cords, plus air pressure produced by the tongue.

So the rest, the rest is a five vowels. A, I, E, O, U, R, O, E, O. So you put these together a little bit of air pressure and a few sounds produced by the vocal cords, and you are trying to explain the meaning of the universe.

But you can give a hint, that's all an approximation. Or the same thing, of course, on paper, just a few symbols, scribbles, print, printed page on a computer screen. No, of course you cannot encapsulate the secret of the universe, but one can get a sense of what it is.

And then there is a deeper knowing that cannot really be expressed in through language or words or any other symbol. And so the reason why I am pointing to it with words now, and when you are ready to hear this, and you are ready to experience, to realize that within yourself, this awakening of consciousness, and in that there is a deep, you kind of know what is at the heart of the universe. But could you explain it?

No. You can give a few hints. If you are poetically inclined, you might write a poem about it.

Or if you are musically inclined, you might write a musical piece that points to it. It's not it, it points to it. All these things can only point to it.

Or you're an artist, or you may dance and point to it through your dance. But when you become aware of yourself as consciousness, you realize what lies at the heart of the universe, because the heart, meaning the innermost dimension of yourself, the core, the heart, is when you find that within yourself, that is the heart of the universe, because you are a microcosm of the entire universe. So to explore the secret of the universe, you will not find it, although I love science fiction, and I love spaceships, but you won't find the secret of the universe by traveling out there to explore the last, what is it, space, the last frontier.

Yes. Of course, the last frontier is the inner space, but the outer space is very interesting, but you won't find the heart of the universe out there. So that doesn't mean never go there.

That's, that's one dimension of human existence, is the outward dimension. But the secret of the universe, you can only find that within yourself. What is it that lies at the, what is the essence behind it all?

The essence behind it all is that one thing that is not mentioned when you read books about cosmology, you read books by famous scientists trying to figure out the mystery of the universe and the galaxies and the black holes, and you can read these books and often you find the greatest mystery of the universe, they never mention once. You can have these books and read the entire book without the word consciousness ever appearing once in the whole entire book. It's about figuring out the secret of the universe and the greatest mystery of the universe, far greater than any number of galaxies, the greatest mystery of the universe and the greatest miracle is that the universe is conscious.

And to ignore that and try to figure out what the secret of the universe is, you ignore the most obvious thing that's right, not just in front of your nose, but behind your nose. And you try to figure out what the great mystery is of the universe. Well, you forget the most important factor, which is yourself, your innermost being, because you're looking so much out there, trying to figure it all out.

And you overlook the fact that the secret, you already carry it within you, the secret of the universe. It's easy to overlook the consciousness that you are, because sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions are so noisy and clamor for your attention. You need to think about this thing.

Oh, look at me, look at, this is so important, this situation, look what he just did. Are you going to do something about it? Yes, I need to do something about it.

And then another thought, an emotion comes in. Everything demands your attention all the time. Thoughts demand your attention.

Other people demand your attention. The incoming email demands your attention. Another Facebook posting demands your attention.

A text message is coming in demanding your attention. And then there's the traffic to cope with. And then you're running late already.

So it's so easy to overlook because the gravitational pull, both of the external world and the world of thought and emotion is so enormous that it's not surprising that people lose themselves totally in the world of form. And then they start believing that the solution to everything must be found in the world of form. They just need to look harder.

And then you get that restless person who is never at ease anywhere because they're trying to figure something out. They're really trying to figure out how to get to a place where they can be at peace. So they need to get this done first.

Let me first do this. And then the next thing, you have to deal with this now. And the only thing I have to achieve this and I'll be okay, I think.

Never get there because then something else demands your attention. And when you deal with this, you just sort it on one situation. Another one collapses behind you.

Describing ordinary existence. And not surprising that people overlook this very gentle but incredibly powerful thing that is at the core of who you are. Because your attention gets continuously, you get hypnotized by everything.

You get hypnotized by every situation, by every thought that comes in, by every emotion. And so you're always identified with this and that and reactive to this or that. And of course then you get, people get very exhausted with life.

They get tired of life. Can't take it anymore. So this overlooking is important because when you realize that there is something vital that you tend to, until recently, you have always overlooked.

And what is that? You overlook the very thing that makes it possible for the world that you experience to exist. The very thing or no thing that makes it possible for you to think, to experience anything.

And that's consciousness. So the moment you become aware of consciousness and that has always been there, but you always overlooked it, another way of putting it is become aware of your own presence. You become aware of yourself, not as a historical person, a person with a history, but become aware of yourself at a deeper level.

Become aware of yourself as a conscious presence. And that had always been there, but it was continuously overlooked because other things seem to be so important. And even for humans who are awakening into this now, they still experience being hypnotized and completely distracted easily by other things.

Even if you're already awakening, you can still find that a relatively unimportant situation can draw you in completely. And again, you forgot who you are, because that's what it is. When you get upset about anything, you have forgotten who you are, essentially.

So self-remembering, I would say, be aware of your own presence and practice that. First, the easiest practice is when you're in nature or perceiving anything around nature. So you become aware of the perceiving presence and letting go of labeling, unless you need the label to explain something to somebody.

But otherwise, you walk around, you watch the ocean, you watch trees, the sand here, the sky, even if it's gray, let go of the thought, oh no, not another June gloom day. Let go of the thought and just be the presence behind your sense perceptions. That's the easiest practice.

It's also, you can practice with an animal, a dog or a cat also to just be present. This is why people love being with dogs and cats, because they don't stimulate your complicating thinking mind. They are simple creatures.

They are conscious, but pre-thought, they don't have an opinion about you. He just responds to the present moment. And humans are much more difficult to stay present with, you might have noticed.

The natural world is easier to be present with. And as you perceive, and you might even do things in the natural world, you may do gardening, you may be walking, you may whatever, and you can still be there as a presence more than a person. There may be a bit of a person too, because occasionally you have thoughts, you may not be able to remain, nor do you need to in thoughtless awareness for long stretches of time, but predominantly be there at the presence.

And then the person occasionally will come in, of course, a thought might say, I wonder what's for dinner tonight, or it might say, oh, that's a nice tree, I wonder what that's called, but it's not really that important right now what that's called, and then you let go of that thought. And so there's more experiencing without thought, than through thought. The two fundamental ways of experiencing the world, through thought and conceptual knowledge, and without thought and conceptual knowledge.

Which is awareness or presence. Most humans don't know that. Why don't they teach that at school, that there are two fundamental ways of experiencing things.

One is through thought and so on. And one is through simple looking, listening, hearing, being present with. Shouldn't that be even more important than being able to count from one to 100, or to be able to write, or read.

The most fundamental thing, the possibility that there is another consciousness in you that's possible, rather than just the thinking and the, but at school they, all they stimulate, unless it's a, it's an alternative school, all they stimulate is from a very early age, or the conceptual mind only, and the continuous doing through the conceptual mind, never being, doing, doing, thinking, thinking, adding more and more concepts. And the best students are the ones who are the quickest thinkers, not those who are the most profound thinkers, because to be a profound thinker means there are moments of stillness.

Otherwise, you're not a profound thinker if you're always thinking. If you're always thinking, you're a superficial thinker. Profound thinking doesn't really exist.

All it means is, you have spaces of no thought, and if you have spaces of no thought, then your thinking becomes more inspired. It is inspired by this, the depths of awareness. And so, but at school, these children who are slower because they go deeper, they're encouraged to let go of that, and think more, accumulate knowledge.

Albert Einstein, until up to the age of five, he was so slow, because he was naturally, there were spaces in him, he wouldn't give fast answers, because you could ask a simple question, and he would just, hmm. And in the meantime, all the other children all went, I know, I know. But the question probably had, there was a much more profound answer possible, but he needed to go within for that.

All this is not recognized, it hasn't been for a long time, but we are getting back, we are now rediscovering something, whether the people in the past had glimpses of knowledge of the importance of stillness and awareness. For example, the importance that ancient tribal societies give to the elders, because the elders represent the deeper dimension of life. And again, there was a reason why the elders were important.

The elders represented the dimension of stillness. Now what, what function do elders have in our society? None, because they are just put away into homes, and then they sit there and watch television, unfortunately.

So there's another huge area where new structures need to be created. If some of you may want to do that, I would encourage you. Old age is a wonderful opportunity for surrender, deepening, becoming aware of yourself as presence, but it's better not to wait until you're old, because it may be too late, because many old people don't realize who they are just because they get old, they get just more entrenched in their patterns.

So instead of becoming like this, and the ageless consciousness shining through, they become cranky. They've been in resistance even before they got old, but now that they're old, they're even more in resistance. I don't want that.

That's a pity. Miss the opportunity of old age. Become aware of yourself as presence.

You're reaching the heart of the universe. Whether or not you can say anything about it doesn't matter. Consciousness, the greatest mystery of the universe, and you embody it.

What could be a greater mystery than the fact that the universe is conscious? So now let's see if we can enjoy the presence that you are, the stillness. We'll just go on for a little while, see what it feels like.

And I may occasionally say a few words while we meditate, which may be helpful to some of you just to wake you up in case you drift. The challenge in meditation is that you are drifting below thought. Of course, when you drift far enough below thought, you fall asleep.

But real meditation, of course, is being alert and awake. So alert and so awake that thoughts just don't come in anymore. But the real meditation is choiceless awareness.

So sometimes you need this first, and then when the mind has stopped, then you go like that. Then so you're not focused on any one thing in particular anymore. It's just expansive awareness.

You can even look around in that state. I can look around this room without a single thought in my head, and so can you, probably some of you. You look around this room without a single thought in your head and be aware simultaneously of your surroundings and your own presence as consciousness.

Another way of putting it, you can be aware of the stillness underneath your sense perceptions. That's consciousness. You can meditate with your eyes closed.

Most people do it with their eyes closed. You can also occasionally open your eyes and still remain in that state of presence. So that one important step for meditators is to realize they don't need to keep their eyes closed to be present.

Because if you associate being present with your eyes closed, the moment you open your eyes, you're not present again. Initially, it can be helpful to have your eyes closed. If you cannot keep thoughts at bay simply by choosing not to think as we sit here, you will need to put your attention on something, and I suggest feeling the aliveness in the inner body, or be aware of your breathing flowing in the air, flowing in and out of the body.

Or even simultaneously, be aware of the aliveness in your body and be aware of the fact that you're breathing. So it's just that awareness that can help you to be still, to be free of thinking. When you hear the bell once, it's not the end of the meditation.

I just ring it to remind you to be present. If you're drifting off into thinking, put your attention back into the body. Now open your eyes and continue your meditation with your eyes open.

So just being present with your sense perceptions. Some people tell me that sometimes I have to demonstrate the arising of the inner space without thinking. I sometimes go like that.

So in between the left hand and the right hand, there's a space of no thinking. So normally in the unconscious thinking state, there's no space, just one thought after another. And then you become alert enough to create a space between thoughts.

People have told me that they actually find it helpful occasionally in daily life when nobody's looking to hold your hands like that, because that's an outer representation of an inner state. And it can be helpful to have the outer representation as an anchor, at least as you practice the thoughtless state, to have that as an anchor for thoughtless. So it's good that this talk is boring.

That leaves more room for the awareness of space. Music, when it has a spiritual dimension, also has spaces in it, or an underlying spaciousness. Some visual art also has spaciousness in it.

And when you look at it, you may find there isn't much there. For example, certain Asian paintings, a little tree in a corner, a little distant mountain, a tiny human standing somewhere, and 85% of the painting is empty space. It might be the sky or just empty space.

And you look at it, and if you really look at it, you become aware that the essence of the painting is not what's there to be seen, but the essence is what's not there, space. And so looking at that can be a realization of your own spaciousness. It's so liberating to realize the essence of yourself as stillness, space.

You are so much more than the little me, more than your personal history, successes and failures, the successes that turned into failures, the failures that turned into successes. One little practice I would recommend, take five minutes or so. You can practice here, of course, but at home, everybody has five minutes.

Don't believe your mind when it tells you you don't have five minutes. And the practice is sit somewhere outside or indoors for five minutes and practice perception without interference of thinking, which means you just look around wherever you are. You may look at occasionally your gaze rests upon one thing for a little while, and then you look on.

Then you take in the totality of whatever surrounds you. And as you do, you're aware simultaneously of what you are seeing, but without calling it anything. And you're aware of the stillness that is your essence.

That's the background to the visual sense perceptions, like a canvas. And so this is a blank canvas, and whatever you see is the painting on the canvas that appears and disappears, appears and disappears. But the canvas is the spacious stillness.

It's a beautiful way of perceiving the world. And another practice similar to this, particularly good when you're outside, but also indoors, sit for five minutes again, and be very alert. Pay attention to whatever you are hearing.

Alert listening. The slightest sounds. No sound is better or worse than another.

Just every sound is received. Beautiful bird song. A motorbike driving past.

But you are again the canvas for the sound this time, and it's all just registered. And you have no preference. Any sound is fine.

And you're aware of yourself as the presence, the listening presence, the alertness that makes the hearing possible. And again, as much as possible, no mental labeling. The subtlest sounds are the best that way, because they require your greatest alertness to some distant sound.

So if you sit in a very still place, in nature perhaps, see how far you can hear. So sitting, and sitting without leaning back is better. There's a natural alertness that comes as you sit upright.

And then you go first to visual practice. You may do that. Some other time you do five minutes auditory presence practice.

So it's good.

Eckhart Tolle Intelligence Greater Than the Mind [7a0cbc1f-efb6-4941-9bc7-02d96ef06e76]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:39)

Intelligence greater than the mind. In this podcast, Eckhart talks with a live audience in Greece. He kicks off the session discussing the spiritual wisdom of ancient Greek philosophers.

He says among the most renowned was Socrates, who humbly said, I am the only one who knows that he knows nothing. Eckhart believes Socrates was saying he was comfortable with the state of not knowing and the pure awareness connected to deep insight. Eckhart explains why he believes we all have access to this vast intelligence, which is greater than the mind.

He says, we find it when we practice presence.

[Speaker 1] (0:41 - 30:45)

One of the things you become comfortable with or learn here, perhaps, is a transcending a mind pattern that could be described as always waiting for the next thing. Most people are not aware of it because it's always there. And something that's always there, you're not really aware of.

When I'm not speaking right now, when this pauses, I'm not asking myself what I'm going to say next. It would be stressful. Would be even more stressful if before a session, I was thinking, what am I going to talk about?

In other words, I don't know what I'm going to talk about. Since nothing is planned, we have to see what the present moment comes up with, what comes out of it. I don't know if you've seen, I haven't yet spoken much about the Greek, the ancient Greek philosophers, fascinating.

I may or may not talk about them at some point. There's a book, it's called Lost Masters, and it's written by Linda Johnson. And the foreword is by Eckhart Tolle.

And it's about the hitherto neglected spiritual dimension in the teachings of the ancient Greek philosophers. Wonderful read. Although you shouldn't read too much while you're here.

But if you have to read, that's not a bad book to read. And so it starts with probably the pre-Socratics who lived around 500 BC at the time of the Buddha. People such as Heraclitus and Parmenides and Pythagoras.

Fantastic. Pythagoras, amazing philosopher. That was the beginning.

And then there's a span of about 750 years of Greek philosophy. And it ends in approximately the year 250 AD. In the year 250, so 750 years later approximately, the last philosopher is Plotinus, which in other languages may be called Plotino, Plotino, et cetera, et cetera.

Plotinus, a very profound philosopher. Amazing insights into spirituality. Not an easy read though.

So, and this is the book that I wrote the foreword. One thing that I mentioned in the foreword was a comment on a very famous statement by Socrates. And Socrates, when he was asked, why do people call you the wisest of all men?

Or maybe it's not. It could have been, why does the Oracle at Delphi call you the wisest of all men? And then people started to call him the wisest of all men.

Why do they call you that? And of course his famous answer was, because I'm the only one who knows that he knows nothing. And this answer has not really been understood, as I see it, in its depths.

It's usually interpreted as feigned modesty. He's saying he knows nothing, but he knows very well that he knows a lot. He's just pretending that he has no ego, but it wasn't like that.

And I mentioned it in the foreword, knowing that he knows nothing. This is reported by Plato because Socrates never wrote anything. So everything we know about Socrates was written by his disciple, Plato.

And then when I saw that for the first time, I realized the actual meaning of it, which Plato didn't recognize because he was not quite as profound as Socrates, although he had great insights too. Socrates was comfortable with a state of not knowing. He did not teach from accumulated knowledge.

And that's a very vital thing. I mentioned that in the foreword and talked about it. And the author, Linda Johnson, then told me, oh, amazing.

I never thought of that. And it's not easy to recognize. Now, what does that mean?

As you probably know, Socrates taught through dialogues with people. So people come to him with a question, and then he asks them another question, and then they answer, and then he asks another question. And gradually, the dialogue develops.

And as the dialogue develops, gradually, his insights become deeper, and he shows that the questioner is actually misperceiving many things. He has certain assumptions which are not true, and gradually this emerges. And it is clear to me that the power, the creative power that came through him came because he was comfortable with the state of not knowing, which means it is the state of pure awareness, cessation of thinking.

And that, from the point of view of the conceptual mind, looks like a state of complete ignorance. Because obviously, the conceptual mind says, when you're not thinking, you don't know anything. So, and in a way, it is.

But by entering that state, you begin to have access to a deeper source of knowledge or knowing that is within you, an intelligence that is greater than the intelligence of the mind, and greater than anything that could be measured in IQ tests. So if you can access the state of not knowing, it's become comfortable with not knowing, then your mind becomes more creative because the creative impulse comes from this, the depths of the awareness, the deep eye, as I sometimes call it, as opposed to the surface eye, the personality, with its accumulated knowledge and its conditioning. And so Socrates was able to just sit there and be in spacious awareness, which is not knowing and knowing that he's not knowing, which is different, again, from a fool who might sit there and not know a thing, but he doesn't know that he doesn't know anything.

And this is why often a wise person has been mistaken for a fool, because they both are in that state, but a very different state of not knowing. One is below thought, the other one is above thought. You do not need to continuously find a position, a mental position towards what's going on around you at every given moment.

So if you can be as much as possible in that state of clarity, in which there is no movement of thought, but just an aware presence, then you become a very powerful creative force in any situation. It could be a meeting, it would be a committee meeting, it could be all kinds of things where people are discussing something, need to arrive at some kind of conclusion or decision. And if you can be there and embody this clarity of presence, where you're not continuously engaged in immediately formulating conceptualizations, but to have that space of just, you take in what's there, you listen.

To be able to listen to another human being, extremely important, but how do you really listen to another? You cannot listen when you yourself are already preparing the next thing that you're going to say. You're not really listening, you're not giving attention.

This is particularly important, not only in a work situation, it's particularly important with your children, for example, to be able to give them attention, which really is more than listening to what somebody is saying. It is listening in this attention, you sense beyond the personality of this person and beyond whatever this person is saying. So there's a sensing of the essence of this person also, but you can only do it because you're aware of your own essence.

And then you develop the ability to step back from thinking periodically, or perhaps frequently, and then speak or think, then step back from thinking. So your consciousness, your ordinary consciousness is no longer a continuous stream of thinking.

It is thinking that is interspersed with spaciousness.

And that's not that difficult to practice. But of course, yes, it is true that the momentum behind thinking is enormous. It has a pull, a gravitational pull, and especially if your entire sense of identity is bound up with thinking, the narrative of yourself, and you need to keep it alive.

So it's a lovely practice. You can do it first in non-challenging situations, simple conversation, really give attention to somebody. And this attention, which we call listening, is more than just auditory perception.

It is an energy field of presence. And that changes the nature of the interaction with the other human. You're no longer just interacting on the human level.

In addition to the human level, where you talk, whatever it is you're talking about, there's the being level, the presence. Then you have the two dimensions. And humans, most humans, maybe not all, if they're totally immersed in their mind, they may not notice anything.

But many humans will notice something about you, but they may not be able, probably won't be able to interpret what it is. Or they can feel perhaps that it is, they like to be around you or in your presence because they feel kind of recognized in their being, acknowledged, particularly important with children. Since most people these days are completely mind absorbed, most children suffer from a lack of acknowledgement of their being.

The attention that is given to children by most parents is purely mental and emotional. So mentally, emotionally, they do whatever they can, but most of the interaction, and if you look into normal family environment, most of the interaction is to do with getting something done or stopping to do something. Do that, don't do that.

Have you done that? What's the next thing that we're going to do? There's always this momentum to, and what are you doing now?

What's this one? Okay, there's never a stopping and acknowledging the other person's being, the child's being. So many children have a sense of something missing.

They don't know what it is. It's an obscure underlying sense of unease. And that sense of unease, I'm talking about parents who are not present at all with their children, which unfortunately is still the majority of parents these days.

There is a sense, an underlying sense of unease. And that surfaces then often when a child, especially when they reach puberty, become teenagers, many teenagers are very unhappy. And even many children these days are not happy.

They are unhappy. The prescription medications that are given to children to affect their mental, emotional state is just amazing. So children are restless, uneasy.

It doesn't help that they're involved a lot with these devices, takes them out of themselves. But you as a parent, your main task, in addition to the practical things that you need to do to look after the child, have you brushed your teeth? Yeah, that's an important question.

But it's more important to give the child attention. And then you can start with listening. What did you do today?

How are you feeling? And then listen. But listening is more than listening.

There's an outflow. It's an energy field that arises and that can touch the other human being at the deepest level. And then gradually the other can become aware of that dimension, the child in this case, can become aware of that dimension within themselves a little bit, because they are being acknowledged in the depths of their being.

Their being is being acknowledged. You're not just operating on the human level, although the human is of course necessary, perfectly fine. But it's not enough.

In any relationship or any interaction, the purely human level is not enough for a satisfying relationship. If the spaciousness, which is one way of putting it, if the spaciousness is not there in the relationship, the spaciousness is missing. If there's no space in the relationship, the relationship frequently manifests conflict and friction and dissatisfaction and frustration.

Because on the human level, every human being that you spend time with or live with will exhibit certain characteristics or idiosyncrasies that you find annoying and upsetting after a while. No matter who you meet and live with, you will find that, oh dear, now he's doing that again. Why can't he do that?

Why is she always saying, don't get it, what's that weird way of, why is he eating like that? And so it's, sometimes you come to an arrangement and find you somehow manage to live together, but there's not, there's not the, the spaciousness isn't there. You have to do it.

It has to start with you. And even if the other is not spacious at all, maybe doesn't get it, sometimes it, the other, it jumps across and the other one also gets it, but it, maybe you're the only one in the relationship who is able to be spacious and the other one might be totally unspacious with a very cluttered mind. And there you are.

And he or she is, what to do then? This is a very, a question that is frequently asked. Of course, I never tell people what to do.

They have to realize for themselves what to do. And as the, again, let's just come back briefly to the state of not, of not knowing includes in that moment, not knowing who or what you are, having no, obviously when you come, there's a moment of cessation of thinking and just aware presence. In that moment, you have no opinion about yourself.

How could you? Because an opinion is a thought. You have no opinion about who you are.

That's a very liberating thing. If you can begin to live like that and see how unimportant the opinions are that you hold about yourself or others, it's an enormous liberation. And it's an enormous freedom to have no, it sounds a little, as if, sounds a little weird to some people at first.

How can you have no opinion? Do I have an opinion about myself? Let's see.

There's a human level. There's the human level, of course, is there. And there's the transcendent dimension that comes through the human dimension and kind of, yes, that's an interesting question.

What happens to the human dimension? I'll come back to myself in a second, if you're interested. What happens to the human dimension as the unconditioned consciousness emerges more fully in you?

How does it affect the conditioned entity of yourself, the egoic self? How does it, how does it affect, does it completely change it into something absolutely wonderful? Or does it totally remain the same as it's always been?

Well, either of these statements are not correct. It does not transform the human into some perfect human being. There's no such thing.

And even if you started living with the Buddha, you would get annoyed about certain things after a while and realize that the Buddha also has certain characteristics as a human that are limited in one way, because as a human, you must have certain limitations. You can't be everything. You're good at this, but bad at that.

However, a change does happen to the conditioned entity. You are no longer in the grip of your conditioning so that it determines what you do in this world. It determines what you think and how you act and react in this world.

You are no longer at the mercy of your conditioning. That is true. Certain aspects of your conditioning remain.

They are still there. But you do not confuse them with who you are. So you're not identified.

And the very dysfunctional ways of conditioning, those that create suffering for yourself and others, gradually they erode. Other forms of conditioning may remain, including things where people would say, you are awakened. How can you still do that?

Because your ideas about how an awakened human behaves may not be correct. There was an Indian man, a very great spiritual teacher, who before he awakened was a chain smoker, and after he awakened was still a chain smoker. And somebody recorded his talks and did a very good editing job.

And out of that emerged one of the great spiritual books in the world. It's called, I Am That, by the Indian spiritual teacher Nisargadatta Maharaj. You can forget the Maharaj, which is a title, which means the great king.

Nisargadatta, Nisargadatta, not easy to remember. But I Am That, you can remember that. And that's a wonderful read that takes you into a presence.

Every chapter takes you into a presence. One of my favorite books. Anyway, he was a chain smoker before awakening and continued to be a chain smoker after.

He just, it didn't matter to him anymore. And finally died of throat cancer. He didn't mind.

Certain idiosyncrasies remain, but those that make your life and other people's lives difficult and unpleasant tend to get eroded and dissolve. And you are no longer in the grip of your conditioning. So you can respond to situations and to people from the depths of awareness as a deep eye, rather than the conditioning of your mind.

You're not at the mercy of your conditioning anymore. And you're not identified with it. People sometimes say, don't you always, don't you need an ego to function in this world?

Surely you need an ego. How can you be egoless in this world and function? This is the way of semantics, the way I use the word ego.

When I use ego, what it means is complete identification with your form identity, the body and the mind. So that's ego. Then you don't, you don't, you are the, as I use the analogy that I used before, you are the actor who has learned his script, his role, the script so well that he is acting it out, no longer knowing anything else except the script that dominates and his mind and mental, emotional field.

So that's, that the ego is complete identification, complete lack of awareness. So identification with the, the, the mental, emotional entity. And then, however, form identity remains.

So you, you remain a, a human with its idiosyncrasies, some of which don't go away and others do. So the, I still haven't answered the question, do I have an opinion about who I am? I have to look into it carefully because I need to give a truthful answer.

Well, I, I don't have a conceptual identity and because that would be a burden and it would become an obstacle. So I'm described perhaps as a spiritual teacher and I am a spiritual teacher right at this moment when I'm kind of teaching. The question is, am I still a spiritual teacher when I walk away from here towards my room or when I'm back home or when I'm buying, going to a supermarket to buy something?

Do I carry the identity with me as the great spiritual teacher is now going to the supermarket? I don't. I, I'm let go of that identity.

So I don't, there's no, unfortunately, there's no sense of deep, yes, it is satisfying to know that the teaching is reaching so many people, but I don't get that sense that I'm doing it. I am changing people's lives because what, what does that mean? I am, who is this I?

If this I means the deep I, the consciousness, then that is true. But the deep I is the, is, is your deep I too. It is the universal, this is a deep I of the universe.

And so the, the human is the vehicle for the expression of that. And that's fine. I like that.

I like to be a vehicle for the expression of the deep I. And in a sense, a lot of the time, especially in the teaching situation, I am the deep I talking. And then the, and again, this, you may find the same.

There may, you may notice certain variations on a daily basis. Sometimes there's a bit more of your personality operating. You are the, the super, the surface I.

And then there's the deep I. There's, there might be, you might experience degrees, certain degrees of intensity.

Eckhart Tolle Invincible Summer [34a309c8-837e-4286-ae5c-aefe85d04024]

[Speaker 2] (0:01 - 0:54)

Invincible Summer. In this podcast, Eckhart talks to a live audience in Hawaii. He ponders the paradise surrounding them, the sun, the palm trees, and the sea, and then quotes famous French philosopher Albert Camus, who said, In the midst of winter, I found there was within me an invincible summer.

Eckhart explains that Camus is referring to the spiritual dimension, or what he calls the alive inner peace at the core of our being. Eckhart says it's inevitable that life's hardships will pull us off center, and dark thoughts about the past or the future will divide us from the light of consciousness. He explains that if we learn to push past the darkness, returning to our inner refuge again and again, it will become a practice.

And Eckhart believes this is what having a spiritual life is all about.

[Speaker 1] (1:02 - 28:16)

I'm almost six minutes late. Unforgivable. The reason is, the internet seems to be down for the live streaming, and we were waiting for the internet to come back up.

It still isn't up. And of course, I was getting more and more stressed. So I said I would just begin with a silence.

Well, we do that anyway, quite often. So we'll be in stillness for a minute, or two, or three. And that's a good thing.

And then they will let us know if the internet is working or not. If it doesn't work, we will spend the rest of the session in total silence. Some people have this vision when they think of what they want to achieve in life.

They want to live in Hawaii and spend the rest of their life sitting under a palm tree, sipping a cocktail. And then they've made it. I made it.

Worked hard for 45 years. And finally, I made it. And now what?

Some of you live in the Northern Hemisphere, so you are moving back into winter. Those who live in the Southern Hemisphere or around here, well, in South America, Australia, your summer is beginning. That's fine.

But many of you, it's the winter. Ooh. There's a quote by a famous French writer, Albert Camus, who said in one of his writings, "In the depths of winter, I discovered deep within myself an invincible summer." This quote can only be appreciated by people. It's not appreciated by people who live in an internal summer anyway. But of course, summer and winter are used metaphorically here. In the depths of winter, which means unpleasant circumstances, things not working well, whatever it may be, challenges, difficulties.

In the depths of winter, I discovered deep within myself an invincible summer. So he's obviously, he speaks from, he obviously spoke from his own experience, a realization of this dimension that our gathering is all about and the spiritual life is all about. It's a discovery of that dimension within yourself.

One could call it a kind of inner peace, but an alive peace, not a dead peace. A very alive peace. And you return to it in case you lose it, as it's likely that from time to time the world will cause you to lose it.

And then you return to it again and again until it becomes second nature to you, and it's always in the background of your being. It's always there, if only faintly in the background. You return to it by coming back into using the portal of the present moment and that the portal into that vertical dimension, which is where the peace is, opens up in the present moment.

So that is truly to be regarded as a portal. Then you have past and future, which otherwise dominate your attention, move away for a while, and all that is just this. Past recedes, future recedes, because they only exist in the mind as thought.

When you move out of thought, there's also no past and future, they recede. And then you have the vibrancy and aliveness of this moment. And then you have a few means of using this portal into the present moment.

And just reminding you, because you will need that as you go away from here, you have sensory perceptions. Sometimes the first thing you become aware of heightened sensory perceptions as your attention moves into the present moment, because in the present moment you are somewhere and there's things to be perceived. And the next is awareness of your breath.

And they don't have to be separate. They kind of merge into one. As you enter the present moment, first step is usually, oh, you kind of, you wake up into the present moment.

One could almost say, if before you were immersed in thinking, it's like a dark veil, because you think you're in a dark place. Thinking about the next thing that you need to arrive at the next point somewhere. When is the internet going to be up again?

What can we do about it? What if it doesn't come up again? What do we do then?

Oh my God, these people are going to complain everywhere. What are you going to do? We should have arranged this earlier.

I don't know what, how we could have done it. Oh. Completely lost in thought.

It's not, it's fairly common, extremely common for people to be lost in dimension. And then, oh, oh, I forgot that I'm here. The present moment is usually not that bad at all.

That's a surprising realization. The mind says, but it's going to be bad tomorrow morning. I go, yeah.

And then tomorrow morning comes and it's the present moment. And maybe what the mind projected isn't happening at all. Or it is happening, like, you live somewhere in Europe and the electricity gets cut off.

Could be happening this winter, apparently. Oh my God. Well, you have to put on two or more sweaters.

Is it that bad? Or get, go back into bed. It's just what it is.

Without the building on top of it, an unhappy entity that's complaining and feeling sorry for itself, or feels hostile towards something. So there may be some unpleasantness on a physical level in certain occasions, but not the superstructure of a suffering self. So in that sense, suffering goes.

And then even unpleasantness in the body is no longer really suffering. The real suffering is the psychological suffering of this entity, the self. Without that, things are relatively simple and you can deal with them in the present moment.

There's always enough power, more than enough to deal with it in the present moment, which is come to an alignment, see if anything can be done. If it can be done, then the wisdom operates through you and you take wise action, as Buddhists call it, skillful action. Wise conscious action, I sometimes call it.

You do the right thing, not reactive thing. Let's do this here. But you have to consider all the repercussions because you haven't gone still for even a moment to consider the totality of the situation.

And so you enter the present moment with your attention, through breath awareness, and then that moves into inner body awareness and that becomes part of, of being present. And then you can be present within and without. You're still conscious of your surroundings and you sense the presence that pervades the entire body.

And let's see. And there you find the invincible summer. The motivation for finding the invincible summer within you is greater if your surroundings, if you find yourself in the winter, as far as your surroundings are concerned, I'm using this metaphorically now.

If we were using it literally, then if you lived in a Y, you would be not motivated to find the invincible summer within yourself because you already have it without. But it's not to be, it's not to be seen literally. So winter points to difficult circumstances externally.

So the motivation for awakening into that dimension is greater as you face difficulties in life. Well, that's for some people, that is a revelation because they think when they face difficulty, something has gone wrong. And of course the mind calls it that something has gone wrong, but life is full of them.

And no matter how much positive thinking you do, which is highly advisable, it's wonderful, it can work very well. And still life will challenge you with difficulties. But they don't need to turn into suffering.

In fact, they become the motivating force for going deeper. And this is why the ancient Romans, they already recognized this truth. They were, they had the Stoics, Stoic philosophy, beautifully set out in a book that I highly recommend that was written 2000 years ago by the Roman emperor Marcus Aurelius.

The book is called Meditations. It's not about meditation, but it's called Meditations. Little pieces of contemplation about living consciously, basically.

So the Stoics, through the Stoics, the Romans discovered this truth, and there's a famous Latin saying which goes, per aspera ad astra, which translates as, through adversity to the stars. We only grow through adversity. And then the presence deepens, or if you are not present yet, it brings about the beginning of the awakening.

Now, one of the tasks that is waiting for you is the integration, of course, of this state of consciousness, of presence, with your active life. And that is also a challenge. For many people, the motivation for generating energy and doing things is very often a sense of discontent, of fear, anxiety.

I remember when I was a student, I was unhappy, but I worked very hard. And my motivating force was I had to prove to the world that I could do it, that I was worth it. And there was a fear of not being good enough.

So propelled by fear and a sense of unworthiness, that became the motivating force for working hard in a continuous state of stress. And I remember one person, another student said, he observed me and said, you should take up meditation. He had taken up meditation, and I said, no, I'm not going to do any work anymore if I do that.

I don't want this inner peace, I'm not, I'm going to be lazy. And a few weeks later, this same student came in and said, he was holding a flower, and he said, I'm leaving the university now. I'm joining an ashram.

Great. And I thought, you see, he couldn't make it. That was a time when quite a few people started to kind of drop out.

And they were attracted by various spiritual organizations, group, big organizations that attracted people like Osho. I forgot the names now. There was another young guru that attracted lots of people and several others.

We even had one lecturer who came back after a summer vacation, who had actually gone to India and announced, my name is now Ananda something, something, or adopted an Indian name. It was all great. There was a spiritual awakening, a small scale spiritual awakening happening.

But at that time, not to me yet, I had to suffer a bit more. And I never joined an organization. That's not another good nor bad thing, but it wasn't necessary, it seems.

For some people, it's helpful. For others, not. So the integration, what is the motivating force for taking action?

If you no longer have a sense of lack and insufficiency, which is normal in the egoic consciousness, what is it that motivates you to act upon the world, to create something new, if it is not to satisfy your ego, to make your ego feel bigger, more powerful, better. And the ego in its comparative state always wants to be better than the other. So the main thing is the point of departure or the foundation for doing is no longer a sense of lack or insufficiency, because whatever doing arises out of that state of consciousness, which is the egoic state, is going to also contribute to your stress and unhappiness.

And in the meantime, you make many others also unhappy. Anybody around you becomes stressed and is unhappy. But as you become more aligned with the deeper consciousness, the realization may come to you of either embarking on some new endeavor or enterprise or undertaking or activity.

Or it could be that it just transforms the way in which you conduct your present activities that you are already engaged in. So it sometimes takes you out completely out of your normal life and brings something totally new, which could happen if you work in a very dysfunctional environment, a company where it's totally dominated by ego, a continuous conflict between people and struggle for getting ahead and stress. And if you are in that environment, embody presence, then it is likely that either they will, as the expression goes, they will let you go quite soon, because energetically you don't fit in anymore in that environment, or you wake up one morning and say, that's it.

No matter what, I cannot be part of this craziness anymore. Or it could be that in your whatever activity you are doing at this moment, whatever you engaged in at the present time, you continue to do it with an added dimension of presence. The same job, but the way in which you do it is different.

Most importantly, you are practicing what is described in the ancient scripture of the Bhagavad Gita as karma yoga. Your work needs to be karma yoga. Yoga means spiritual practice.

Karma means action. So you make action into your spiritual practice, which means you give your fullest attention to the performance of your action in the moment. This is how you reconcile becoming present, which at first you experience when you're sitting still and the environment is conducive to it.

First that, and then you bring it into action. So the most important thing is to learn for you now, whatever action you perform, obviously it has a purpose. The purpose of the action, even if you're an artist, then it's relatively easy.

The purpose is to do a painting or a sculpture or whatever. Then the purpose is you want to create a work of art. Then it's relatively easy if you're engaged in work that is creative by its very nature, then it is easier to stay in the present moment.

But not all types of work are like that. So you may be working on a computer, or you may be working on connecting with people through the internet or whatever people do these days, or a service job in a service industry, or a big boss of a big company. I'm so happy I've never been the boss of a big company, but if it's your destiny, I'm a bad boss and a bad employee.

I don't like to tell people what to do, and I don't like to be told what to do. So completely dysfunctional for our civilization. So you bring awareness into whatever action you want.

Very often the action will be communicating with people. And you bring, so the purpose of your interaction, every interaction has a purpose. We want to arrive at a solution for this problem or whatever, or we want to expand our company or we want whatever.

Every interaction has a purpose. The purpose, by its very nature, is in the future. Purpose is always, not always, but we'll get there in a second.

The purpose is usually in the future. So it is easy to become so distracted by the future purpose that the quality of your action in the present, which is the only place where you can act, the quality of it is diminished because of an excessive focus on the desired outcome. So the qualitative difference in karma yoga is honoring, appreciating the moment of action, giving your fullest attention to it.

And that is a complete reversal of how people usually act. And that makes every action into something that's actually enjoyable, which before it was just a task that you had to perform, you didn't really want it, to be doing it. And then it becomes the present, the doing in the present moment becomes enjoyable.

Then if you, the energy that arises out of that, after a while it takes over and some, a deeper intelligence flows into what you do. And then you get also inspiration of what can be done better. And we're talking at the moment about performing what you're already doing and making it conscious.

And if it is something entirely new, perhaps you will not continue where you are at the present time. Something entirely new may arise. Quite a few of you, some of you are already spiritual teachers in your own way, perhaps through some other modality, you're already working with people and disseminating consciousness.

Some of you are becoming spiritual teachers. And ultimately, every one of you in the wider sense is going to be, or already is a spiritual teacher, because when you embody the new consciousness, the presence, you cannot not teach. Just by embodying presence, you teach presence.

The satisfaction is then derived from the doing and not from the arriving. There's still some, you're still, you're happy when you conclude something, it worked, it's fine, it's great. But the journey was enjoyable and you're continuously on a journey.

It's the important thing is so that stress does not arise anymore in your life. The journey, the present moment is, becomes enjoyable. The whole problem of achieving through postponing satisfaction, you don't need to do that anymore.

The satisfaction is shifts from being derived from the desired outcome to being derived from the action that's being performed in this moment. The desired outcome is fine if it works. And if it doesn't work, because it doesn't always work, the journey was enjoyable.

Eckhart Tolle It Is Always Now [b283a139-20cd-4c6f-b802-b50830dd4b65]

[Speaker 2] (0:00 - 0:55)

It is always now. In this episode, Eckhart talks with an audience in Brisbane, Australia. He explains the reason for their gathering is to accelerate their awakening.

He says everything we experience occurs in the now, and it will never not be now. He says most people don't realize this because their attention is elsewhere, absorbed by the past or future. He explains we believe we are a product of our history, childhood and family background, yet we are more than that.

Eckhart says the difficulties we encounter then can be the catalyst to awaken now. He says had he not gone through painful childhood and years of unconsciousness, he would never have grown spiritually. He explains the paradox this way.

His suffering pushed him to a new level of consciousness. He says we are living through crises now because challenges propel us toward evolution.

[Speaker 1] (0:58 - 36:38)

Ah, it's checking if everybody is present. There may be one or two who are not completely present, but that's okay. By the end of this evening, they either will be or they will have left in disgust, because nothing the speaker said made any sense.

But most of you, almost all of you are awakening or awakened beings. For most humans, it's a process. Awakening is a process that they go through.

And most of you are here because you are going through this process. Of awakening, although you may not have used this particular term, you may not call it awakening, or you may not even know exactly what I mean when I say awakening. It is the arising of a certain dimension of consciousness that is deeper than or higher, whatever term you want to use, than the ordinary state of consciousness, which I sometimes call the egoic state.

And humanity has arrived at this point where the transition from the usual state of consciousness, which I call unconsciousness, to consciousness, this transition has become absolutely necessary, because we are living in very challenging times. And the strange thing is that it's only in very challenging times that humans actually evolve. You might know that it applies both on a collective level and a personal level.

You may know that from your personal life. If you had not gone through certain challenges in your life, difficulties, emotional, mental, physical pain, challenges come in many forms, and great loss. If you had not gone through that, you would not be here.

I know I wouldn't be here if I had not gone through very difficult years of unconsciousness. And so the purpose of our gathering here is to, one could say, to accelerate or deepen this awakening in you. So let's see why we are here.

And it's not just a gathering that works on an intellectual or conceptual level, although I am talking, I haven't prepared anything. I hope you don't mind. I lost my script many years ago, never found it again.

And there's not just the normal dimension in a gathering like this. You listen to the speaker and you agree or disagree, or you find it interesting or not interesting or entertaining. You learn, perhaps you learn new things, or maybe you don't.

That's one level. That's a normal conventional level at which gatherings like this operate when there is a talk. I am giving a talk.

Okay. But there's another dimension to this talk, and it's hard to describe. It's a dimension of presence.

And the reason why this dimension is there is because the words kind of arise out of presence. So they're not prepared, they arise out of presence. Although I must admit, on the one hand, basically, for the past 40 years, I've been speaking about the same things.

But the strange thing is, although I've been speaking about the same things, it's, somewhat different each time it takes on a somewhat different form. Sometimes it corresponds to the energy field of the audience. And each time, this is really weird, to me, it feels completely new and fresh.

Although, if you're only listening to this on a conceptual level, if you do not have access to that dimension of presence within yourself, and then listen from there, there may be one or two, as I mentioned, who don't have that yet. But then you might say, hasn't he said that before? I overheard years ago, I just remembered, after the talk, I went to the bathroom.

I was in a stall, and some of the other people were in the bathroom commenting about the talk I had just given. They didn't know I was there. Won't happen tonight, don't worry.

And I heard them saying, has he said anything new? No, not really. It's all in his books.

It wasn't really anything new. Okay, that was a sign they didn't, they understood it conceptually, perhaps, but it was old. They did not have access to the deeper dimension that is actually there.

Even if you read a book that was written from a state of presence, like those books, but there are other spiritual books that are similar. When you pick up a book like that, you might have read it three, four, five times, and then a few months pass, or a year passes, and you pick it up again. And the strange thing is, it's fresh and new again.

Because it activates that dimension of presence in you. The words point to that dimension of presence. So they're not words that you need to believe in.

I believe that there's only the present moment, because I read it in a book. But to realize at a deeper level what that means, that this is all there ever is, this present now, the entire life, is only ever now, has never not been now, will never not be now. To realize that at a deeper level is something very different from just listening from the conceptual mind.

Okay, right. Well, he said that before. He said there's only the now three years ago and 20 years ago.

Does that mean that there isn't only the now, because he talked about it 20 years ago? Okay, that's the human mind, the conceptual mind. So you pick up a spiritual book that has this power, one could say.

I don't know how it gets into the book, into the words, but it's there somehow. And immediately, it helps you go a bit deeper again into a presence that perhaps you were losing yourself in your mind again. You pick up a book, read a couple of pages, you're no longer reading this book that you might have read four or five times already.

But then when you reread, you're no longer, you don't read it for additional knowledge, you read it for another reason, in order to become more present. It helps you suddenly, wow. It even happened to me, there were, I don't know, last year or whenever, for some reason, I picked up The Power of Now, and I hadn't looked at it for at least 10 years.

And I read a page, I said, wow, this is so good. But I didn't have that strange feeling that we might imagine, or I wrote that. I don't know where this came from, but it's good.

It has this power. It's not of the person. And so this is the dimension of presence that is here that is more important, one could say, than the conceptual level.

And as the evening progresses, we will go more deeply into this dimension. And by saying that, I am aware that there's already a little paradox here, because I'm saying, as the evening progresses, we are going to go more deeply into the present moment. Aren't we already there?

Of course, you cannot escape the present moment. It's always present. But very few people, unless they are going through the awakening process, not many humans are actually truly conscious of the present moment.

Most humans' attention is almost completely absorbed by past and future. They live almost exclusively through memory and anticipation. So they're pulled this way and that way.

The tendency is, if you're young, you're pulled more towards living for the future. There's nothing wrong with it. Of course, making plans and having a goal, that's all fine.

But being so focused and obsessed by the goal, for example, that you want to achieve, or whether it's a small-scale goal, which is like, I wish it were already this evening, or I wish it were this weekend, or a long-term goal, you're working towards something, examine, you're a young person doing exams or whatever, or you're learning some skill, I wish I was already, and you're projecting yourself continuously.

So there's a deep mental habit that everybody inherits, that is to be obsessed by the next moment, to always regard the next moment as, when I put it like this, I'm making something conscious that before was unconscious, and that is always regarding the next moment as somehow more desirable than this one. This is an unconscious way of being in this world. This is what I call the unawakened state.

Unconsciously, they don't verbalize that in their minds. They don't say, I always think that the next moment is more important than that one, but that's the reality of their mental state, is that they're always wanting to get away from this moment. They're always, what's the next thing?

Some better moment in the future. But as you get older and older and older, the so-called future shrinks. And then you tend to go more into the past.

Oh, I remember, that was, was that 50 years ago? That one, and many things suddenly, and then there are all kinds of emotions associated with memories from the past. Sometimes it's nostalgia, or regret, or feeling of guilt, or of kind of grievance, or resentment, or something didn't go right.

And people, sometimes people think their entire life was one big failure. I didn't make it. Make what?

And so this is, we're talking about time, how time absorbs your attention continuously, so you miss the timeless now. The only place where life actually is experienced, the only place where life can unfold, it is not given much attention. There's more attention in either future or past than the present.

Yes, of course, you have some attention in the present. You don't, you know where you're going. You don't bump into furniture.

You're not 100% absent, but only 95%. And with the remaining 5%, you're doing okay. You still know where to go, but you're not really here.

You're elsewhere. We call that being lost in time, one could say. Not time, of course, it's something you cannot escape on this dimension of existence.

The surface dimension, I call it, where things happen. Everything happens in time. Everything that you do requires time.

Every doing implies that there's time. Time is the space for the doing, even the slightest doing. Making a cup of tea requires time.

Learning to play an instrument, learning another language, experiencing this or that, going from A to B, all this requires time. And so you live in this stream of time, and this stream of time is regarded as extremely valuable because you need more time to be fully yourself. That's an unconscious assumption.

I need more time. And time, as you look, most humans look to time, the next moment, or the one after that, or the one after that. They always look to time for greater, some greater good.

Not this good. This isn't good enough. It's never good enough.

Or if it is, it's briefly good enough. Yes, okay, you have a great meal, feels so good to be eating, sensory pleasure, that passes very quickly, and then you have to pay, probably have to pay a price for it later. Or you can engage in sexuality, and then again, yes, okay, for a little while you're in the moment, and the mind comes back in.

And that's where the problems start. Immediately, as soon as the mind comes back in, you go, oh. And then again, you start looking to the next moment.

Okay, this wasn't really it. I thought it was, but it turned out not to be. So many times you think this is it, but then it turns out it's not it.

And often you think this is the person that's going to make me happy, and then it turns out it was the very person that makes you unhappy. A few of you may recognize what I just said. And so you look again to time for, okay, I'm still hoping to meet the one that's going to do it, to make me happy, until finally you say, maybe that one doesn't exist.

Or the mind forms some other weird conclusion, like all men are horrible, or all women are horrible. They're all like that. There's no point in even trying.

Okay, then you have some other stuff in your mind. Okay, then you live that out, and then you look to something else. I'm done with all that, but I'm now looking for something else.
